For Donald and Michale

Dungeons have probably always been. However, during recent recorded history mankind has gone to great lengths to deny their very existence. Indeed, creating a whole school of study under the genre of science in order to banish the mere suspicion of the truth — that Dungeons, and our worse fears, do actually exist.

Dungeons ruled by Demons and inhabited by Dragons were first stumbled upon and explored by a few adventurous people about ten years ago. Word of their discovery was ignored by the press because it was at first sketchy and seemingly impossible. Those early brave explorers, or Adventurers as they became known, were usually ill-prepared both physically and mentally for the pitiless perils encountered in the depths of their discovery. Some did not return from the depths and others vowed never to descend again. It was only slowly that word leaked out of the fabulous wealth and fantastic adventure to be found in a Dungeon. Before long, however, small bands of adventurous people all over the world were searching out and descending into long forgotten Dungeons that had been sealed up for hundreds, sometimes thousands of years.

We stumbled upon Zarakan's Dungeon quite by accident while on a camping trip in the Southwestern United States. The following are some friends, enemies and situations we encountered while briefly exploring a small section of Zarakan's lair.
