

DMConsole NPC List

Introduction

The idea of this list is to provide easily accessible information for a DM during or before a session. I've found that a DM has two levels of information necessary for creation. The first level is the fast immediate information. The DM will need the most basic of facts about some spontaneously needed NPC. Often this means needing a name and imagining a generic physical description to go with the name. The other level comes into play during preparation for a session. During preparation the DM needs to come up with as much information as possible to weave a believable character into the tale that will fulfill some role such as a friend, merchant or rival. I know that trying to find resources to help with this, I found many different tools and products. While learning to code I decided that I should build my own that included everything I thought I would need.

This list of NPCs was created using a generator I made for my website DMConsole.com. The philosophy behind the NPC generator is that it gives you enough information to feel like your world is populated by fleshed out characters. However I did not want it to provide pages upon pages of randomized information for one character that bogged the DM down while searching for a name and a few basic facts. I hope that the end result of the generator and this list is that it provides a balance between the two.

This list was set to generate only humans, and is sorted into 50 males and then 50 females. The only difference between the two is a gender appropriate name list of "common" medieval first names and some clothes differences for the social classes.

The first paragraph for each generated NPC has a light personality descriptor, a story role archetype, physical appearance, clothes, and a voice type. The second paragraph contains a social class, profession, hate, fear, flaw, a good quality, a personal interest, and a desire. The final paragraph is where a spouse name, a deity to worship, languages known and a social class based amount of coin is generated.

I hope the list serves you well! Go and weave your stories! - Rob
