

IMP

A RACE OF LESSER INFERNALS STARVED FOR DOMINANCE AND POWER.

By Christopher Zito

BITE SIZED DEVILRY

Devils revel to see mortals slowly lose their humanity and persuade them into their own ranks, to corrupt mortals to become apart of demonic society is the pinnacle of achievement for any infernal being worth their own weight in evil. However with their rise to power in the infernal hierarchy, why spend countless hours on petty droll such as corrupting a farmer who commits' an act of murder or some would-be wizard looking for quick and easy power through dealings?

This sort of low level job was then given to the weakest of the infernals, the Imps, often thrust upon mortals as assistants and slowly but surely lure the mortal it is in service to down a darker path. Normally, Imps are no bigger then a house cat, fluttering about their mortal "masters" sporting small fangs, bat like wings and a protruding stinger on the end of their tail. While an Imp may gain some joy in turning a mortal into a functional member of infernal society, there is a sour feeling to this as they are seen as mere pawns by their true infernal masters and even the mortals they are serving.

An Imp's true desire is to escape their station in life and ascend to a greater form, a more powerful demon and gain the respect they deserve, but what if this process is too slow? An Imp may grow in size and power but still lack the respect or the greater form as dictated by law of Infernal Promotion, so one has to imagine with all these promises of more and no real gain, when does it stop? When is the final straw broken for an Imp's patience for real power?

PROMOTION!? WHAT FOR?

Imps can be seen as punchlines by any mage worth their own merit in casting a fireball or two and the Imp's servitude can be held in accountability so long as the wizard does not brush with death. Even if the mage dies what's stopping a higher ranking devil to simply toss the Imp aside to a new master? An Imp's deeds can grant them a "Promotion", an acumination of mass, power and magic that can grant them physical boons. If an Imp's greed was particularly impressive and was able to hoard large amounts of wealth, their master could see fit that their power is worth turning them into a Barbed Devil, or if the Imp's love for torture was neigh insatiable a promotion to a Spined Devil would be in order. However why would a devil in a higher state of power care for such accomplishments? Imps are beneath them, so back to their jobs of being under not only the devil's thumb, but some mortal who they are trying to wrestle with for their souls.

Clearly from a devil's perspective unless the Imp's deeds align with their own goals or the goals of Infernal society, then there is no reason to even worry about such rise in rank, so simply let them serve in these small and insignificant states for all eternity for all the devil is concerned with. Most Imps are in no position to argue this fate and simple continue to amass deeds, souls and power to one day join the ranks of their infernal brethren. However some Imps with the knowledge and experience they have by serving under multiple masters will one day simply believe their station in life is beneath them and put their power to the test wither their mortal or infernal masters would care to facilitate or not.

FAMILIARS UNCHAINED

Enough is enough, an Imp's patience can no longer be tested, they crave freedom from their repetitive and meaningless stations. With enough time and power amassed a Imp's physical size can alter and their rebellion from servitude can rival the mortal master they serve. Maybe even with enough power living amongst the mortals the Imp can also obtain enough power to break their bonds from their infernal masters and become their own kind of devil, there are stories of mortals prevailing over devils and demons, so how hard could it possibly be?

Imp's may either break their bonds of servitude from a mortal by killing them, working with them to create a deal for freedom or even in rare cases form an actual kinship and relationship with the mortal they are tied to. As such Imp adventurers are rare but shows testament to the Imp's capability that adventuring guilds may fancy the idea of a small infernal in their ranks. They are sneaky, mischievous and can acuminate many fiendish abilities over time, some even gain small samples of power from their long overdue infernal promotions, talents any thieves or assassin guild would find commendable and useful.

With enough time, trust and even love, an Imp may join in physical union with a mortal creature sharing a bond to create Material-born Imps, an idea that some holy orders find appalling. Infernals are dangerous enough when they attempt to invade the material realm, but to fathom the idea that Imps born of the Material my be slain but simply return to the Material rather then the Hells that spawned them is a apocalyptic scenario most clerics and priests dare not allow to pass. Dispite this belief, the death of a Material-born Imp is the same as any other mortal and it's body would simply perish as any other mortal's does.

Perhaps your Imp character was once a Lesser Devil who had recently been demoted to a lesser form and now seeks to regain it's former glory, or the Imp has lost it's memory of it's former life and slowly regains it's memories as it uses it's powers common Imps lack.
