Fortunately for the Tuigan, the Naican force which had worked its way around the pass had finally arrived. Two thousand Naican warriors fell upon the barricaded Commani from behind, dealing enormous destruction, and preventing further Tuigan losses.

Final Outcome

When the second wave arrived, the Commani fell. Yamun lost over 1,000 men but the Commani were defeated.

After the conquest of Abatai's army, Yamun offered terms: acknowledge Yamun as khahan of all the tribes or die. Ordus whose Khans acknowledged Yamun were accepted as members of the glorious army of the Tuigan. Those who did not, he executed or enslaved all males who could not pass beneath a cart hitch.

Chapter 2 The War of Semphar

"The brave man's word is a coat of mail."
al-Hamid, the Lion of Semphar

"Towers are measured by their shadows; great men by their slanderers!"
Abu Bakr, Caliph of Semphar

Although the rise of Yamun Khahan was one of the pivotal events in the history of the Endless Waste, it went virtually unnoticed until the Year of the Dragon (1352 DR). That year, the armies of Yamun Khahan turned their attentions to the wealthy caravans of The Silk Road and The Golden Way.

The first raids were minor, and the caravan masters wrote off lost caravans as accidental. As the number of lost caravans increased and survivors made their way back to civilization, the tale of the lost caravans was told.

By the beginning of the Year of the Serpent (1359 DR), the nations bordering the trade ways decided that a meeting was necessary to discuss the Tuigan threat. A council was called by the Caliph of Semphar on Alturiak (February) 15, at his palace in Dhaztanar to resolve the problem. Cormyr, the Dalelands, Sembia, Impiltur, Thesk, Rashemen, Mulhorand, even far Khazari and Shou Lung all sent emissaries.

When Yamun Khahan was told of the council by his agents he sent his own envoy: the anda General Chanar Ogh Kho, and an "honor guard" of 10,000 warriors. There, Chanar Ogh Kho presented Yamun Khahan's proposal to the assembly: a tax on all caravans and acceptance of the Khahan as emperor of all, or die.

The Lords were defiant. King Azoun of Cormyr was most eloquent in rejecting the Khahan's proposal, the other Lords agreed. General Chanar was told that the lands of Faerun and Kara-Tur were not under the rule of the Khahan, nor was Yamun "Emperor Of All The World."

Abu Bakr, Caliph of Semphar, sent five changs of cavalry to escort the "honor guard" of General Chanar out of Semphar. The council then decided to increase troop strength for caravans, and tentatively agreed to band their caravans together for defense.

Once rebuffed, the Khahan did not merely continue to raid caravans. When he learned of the council's decision, he ordered his son Hubadai to attack and conquer Semphar.

Hubadai's army comprised five tumens—50,000 men. He divided them into three detachments. The first, of 20,000 men, poured through Howling Gap, along the Silk Road, through Iliphanar and Darabjind. The second and third defeated the garrison at Fergana Pass on Ches (March) 7, 1359 DR, and headed southwest into the Shalhoond forest.

The two forces then split. The second force of 10,000 men headed south through Taquasma, then southwest through Anbar and Siniyat, subduing resistance there. After Siniyat, they turned west through Qumis and Maristan.

The third force, consisting of 20,000 men, led by Hubadai himself, swept west through Duir-tanal and Nihawand. After conquering these insignificant towns, they turned southwest again, passing through Saaid and Baduraya.

The three forces met at the Semphari capital of Dhaztanar. Hubadai's arrived first, reaching the city on Ches 30, the remaining troops arrived within the next few days. A brief siege, and the nomads burst into Dhaztanar under false flags of truce, plundering the outer city.

Despite their determination, they could not penetrate the Madinat, the central keep which protected the crystal palace of the Caliph. They made several attempts, but the narrow brick streets and high stone walls stymied their limited siegecraft. Hubadai contented himself with plundering Dhaztanar and declared Semphar to be part of the empire of Yamun Khahan. He appointed administrators to rule in the name of the Khahan, and left a small garrison to besiege the Madinat. Hubadai returned with the remainder of his forces to the steppe. The Tuigan garrison used the Semphari's own siege equipment and sappers against the Madinat. By Mirtul (May) 19, the Caliph conceded the Madinat to the Tuigan commander, yielding Semphar to Yamun Khahan.

Organization of the Semphari Army

The army of Semphar was a professional army; most of its troops made the military a career. It had been restructured by the great Caliph al-Hamid, the Lion of Semphar, who was succeeded as Caliph by his son, Abu Bakr. Abu Bakr had allowed the army to decay into a cadre of sycophant officers and demoralized troops.

In organization, Semphari armies followed the model established by the ancient Imaskari Empire. Each unit was organized by category. There was a High General of Cavalry, a High General of Infantry, a General of the Siege, a High Wizard of Warfare, etc. When a force was formed, a Commander of the Faithful was appointed by the Caliph and furnished with troops from each service. To drive off bandits, the Commander of the Faithful might be allocated cavalry, some infantry, and a few wizards, each unit having its own commander.

Branches of the army were organized differently. The infantry was divided into companies of 120 men. Thirty companies formed a niqom, or legion, of 3600 men and staff officers. The basic cavalry unit was a cadre of 60 horsemen. The chang, or march, consisted of 60 units. The mages of Semphar fought in units of 12 sorcerers, led by a wizard of great power.

Even within a branch, units specialized. The infantry was comprised of skirmishers, slingers, spearmen, heavy infantry and archers, each in their own niqom. The cavalry had *chang*s of both heavy and light cavalry.

Under al-Hamid, this prospered into a potent system for the deployment of forces. Commanders of the Faithful were selected from all of the services. They were well known for personal bravery and tactical skill. Entering the ranks of the Commanders of the Faithful was a high honor, the achievement of lifelong service and loyalty. The individual forces assigned to a Commander were each led by an officer familiar with their capabilities and best able to advise the Commander on the use of his troop.

After the rise of Abu Bakr this practice was neglected. Officers were promoted by the Caliph, and Abu Bakr paid most attention to those who flattered him. He became enamored with the cavalry and their grand spectacles. He filled the ranks of the Commanders of the Faithful with cavalry officers, creating hard feelings and diminishing the cooperation of the various units. Many of these Commanders were less than inspired and others refused all advice and assistance from their subordinates. They trusted instead their own innate abilities and studied of the art of war, often from a scroll in the library!

The wizards in particular resented the loss of their favored status, and refused to cooperate with the haughty cavalry commanders. The Caliph in turn punished the wizards and scattered them. Retiring the few wizard Commanders remaining, he prevented the formation of an organized mage opposition.

It was this last action that left Semphar and Dhaztanar open to Tuigan invasion. Only a handful of wizards were available to oppose the Tuigan. The Caliph's favored cavalry, in all its finery, were inadequately trained—no match for the savage power and skill of the nomads. Many of the infantry were lost in a foolish sally, led by a glory seeking Commander, against the Tuigan. Still, nearly two niqoms remained to fight the nomads in the city streets and defend the walls of the Madinat.

Arms and Armor of the Semphari

The warriors of Semphar were well equipped. Even the most humble foot soldier (except skirmishers) wore a long tunic of ring mail. Officers wore brilliantly polished chain mail. Heavy Cavalry Officers wore plate mail and their horses were barded.

All soldiers wore the traditional robes and turbans of the Semphari; colors indicating service and rank. Infantrymen wore white, cavalrymen yellow, sappers grey, and mages wore a light blue. Darker turbans also indicated rank. The Caliph wore a black turban marking his exalted rank.

The weapons of the Semphari displayed little of the variation seen in the nomad army. Soldiers were issued weapons appropriate for their niqom or chang and, officers excepted, were not permitted any other. Preferred were the spear and scimitar. The Semphari trained to use the scimitar in an unusual back handed style. The hilt was gripped so that the blade extended forearm to elbow, then slashed as if the blade were part of the forearm. This style was somewhat difficult for the nomads to defend against when first encountered, but was not appreciably superior to the normal extended sword position.

Some chang had experimented with the unwieldy khopesh for its exotic look, but in the face of its shortcomings, its use was abandoned in Semphar.

Semphari skirmishers used the sling, and were widely known for accuracy with the special form of shot which they used. Rather than round, the shot was long with a sharp end, shaped much like a miniature war dart. It was heavy, and could do considerable damage even to an armored opponent. Semphari archers used the short bow, but archery was not common in Semphar. Having little timber of their own, the wood for their bows had to be imported from Shalhoond.

Semphari light infantrymen carried medium size round shields charged with the emblem of their company. The heavy infantry carried war shields protecting most of the body. Cavalrymen favored light bucklers which could be carried on the saddle and used in close combat.

Fighting Tactics of the Semphari

Under al-Hamid, the Semphari were talented and imaginative warriors. Their battles were marked by the precision of their troops and their flexibility. The Commander of the Faithful employed extensive signals using giant, bellows blown ram's horns to control even the largest force. Horn codes were assigned to each unit and order, so that in a matter of seconds, the Commander of the Faithful could deliver precise commands to any unit on the field. This gave him excellent control of each individual unit, while maintaining enough unit autonomy to fight effectively.

One problem with the signaling system was that it sent messages only one way. The individual units had no method of signaling the Commander of the Faithful except by messenger or magical notice—a service not usually available to every unit. Thus, even when one of the units had information which the Commander might need, he often did not receive it. To balance this, a diviner was generally attached to the staff of the Commander, providing a mage's eye view of the battle, and helping to gather intelligence.

Coordination of forces suffered under Abu Bakr. The hostility between service branches, and within some branches, led to an intense rivalry for glory within Semphar's military. In battle each unit acted with almost total autonomy. Coordination with other units occurred only when necessary. Abu Bakr confused the divisiveness in his army with increased military ardor, encouraging such action on the part of his troops as heroic, despite the protests of his Commanders.

In terms of individual unit tactics, however, the Semphari were still to be respected. Their infantry was well led and capable of precisely executing complex maneuvers—the single benefit of precision drilling for Abu Bakr. The cavalry was less talented, having spent little time in actual battle, though the occasional chang could still be found which had been hardened in battle with bandits of the Raurin desert. The wizards and sappers maintained their skills, but both groups were out of favor with Abu Bakr; the wizards for the reasons stated above. The sappers were ignored because the Caliph considered their traditional work to be beneath a soldier's dignity. His attitude insured they would be unlikely to have much influence on the course of battle.

The Battle of the Eastern Gate: Tarsakh (April) 2, 1359 DR

Hubadai's forces seized the city of Dhaztanar in mid spring, in the Year of the Serpent. During the attack, a large force of nomads under Gugan Cho Han, a subcommander, made a forced rush at the Eastern Gate of the Madinat, hoping to burst through it and take city. It was the battle for the Eastern Gate which determined the fate of the Madinat, and of the nation of Semphar.

The Disposition of Forces

Three minghams of nomads (3,000 men) charged through the Shari-souk, the Market Quarter of Dhaztanar, trying to reach the Eastern Gate before it was closed. The Gate had been opened by one of the infantry niqom which had been guarding the Shari-souk and attempting a strategic retreat into the Madinat.

Within the Madinat, Abu Bakr watched the battle beside the Commander of the Faithful for city defense. With the nomads approaching, Abu Bakr ordered the Commander to seal the Madinat, knowing that this would trap Semphar's own soldiers outside the gates to face the steppe warriors alone. When the Commander refused to condemn his own men, Abu Bakr executed him and ordered that the gates be closed. This prevented the nomads and the friendly infantry from entering the citadel, and assured the destruction of the niqom.

In this instance, the disobedience of the separate forces worked to Semphar's benefit. The wizards, outraged at the sacrifice of the infantrymen, began firing spells into the nomads hoping to give the infantry more time. Meanwhile, the palace guard approached to close

The Conquest of Khazari

“A sheaf without a sheaf band is straw!”
Prince Ogandi, to a council of his nobles.

While Hubadai rained misery on the forces of Semphar, the main body of Yamun Khahan’s army, nearly 50,000 strong, moved across the steppe toward the eastern land of Khazari. Yamun Khahan sought to conquer Khazari as he had Hubadai conquer Semphar. He wanted to punish the impudence of the lands which had met in council against him and to secure dominance and control of east/west trade.

The border between the Endless Waste and Khazari was marked by Katakoro Shan, a vast mountain range dominating the eastern border of the steppe, south of the Dragonwall. Steep and treacherous, only two passes would allow an army the size of Yamun Khahan’s to enter Khazari—Alashan and Manass.

Alashan was the main western gateway to Khazari. The Silk Road passed through the city at the pass, and Alashan’s immense fortifications were a man made mountain blocking the pass. In addition, smaller fortresses, strategically placed, dotted the pass approaching the city. Large forces, filing through the narrow pass, could be held at bay by small groups of archers.

Between the garrisons of the pass fortifications and the city defenses, nearly 7,000 men were on active duty in Alashan. Reserves who could be called to war could double that number.

Manass, on the other hand, acted primarily as a barrier to prevent passage through the natural breach in the Katakoro Shan. The city was situated roughly in the center of the pass, so that Manass’ archers commanded the passage to either side. Manass did not block the entire pass as the wall at Alashan did. A complement of 5,000 men could be called up to garrison the walls, including 3,000 regular cavalry and 2,000 irregular infantry. The cavalry often raided nearby nomad villages to keep them from encroaching too closely on civilized domains.

Yamun Khahan selected Manass as his entry point into Khazari. He arrived on Ches (March) 19, 1359 DR with 6,000 men, leaving the rest to infiltrate other, narrower, passes through the mountains. An envoy was sent to demand Manass’ surrender. The governor, Sanjar al-Mulk, thought the Tuigan a small bandit force, and executed the Tuigan honor guard. He sent the envoy back to Yamun, with the guards heads as his refusal. Thus, Yamun Khahan came to fight his first great battle against a walled city.

Organization of the Khazari Army

The armed forces of Khazari were divided into hundreds of independent companies, each led by a single knight or governor. Leadership positions were hereditary, and feuding between rival nobles was common. Khazari was divided into opposing factions.

Each private army was organized differently. As would be expected in a former Shou protectorate, most nobles copied the Shou system of military units based on the number 20 (Chapter 5). Many of the weaker nobles did not bother to structure their forces so rigidly. Some used the same system as the Shou, but based them on 16, 15, 12, or even 8 men. This was especially common in older houses whose wealth had diminished, but who had no desire to lose the honor of their ancestors. A Khazari noble leading three Peng-ta may have had anywhere from 1,536 to 24,000 men!

Separate from these noble forces were the forces of the monasteries of Khazari. The monasteries of Khazari, like those of Shou Lung, are among the most skilled in Kara-Tur. Each monastery led its own warriors, in small groups of 10 to 20, the most senior monks in command. Pull time monastery living made these warriors among the most highly coordinated in Khazari's arsenal.

In theory, Prince Ogandi, ruler of Khazari, had authority to call up both noble and monastery forces in defense of the kingdom. In practice, the Prince had to garner the support of the nobles and the monasteries before calling for their support. The Prince's personal troops were inadequate to enforce his will or to defend the kingdom. On the eve of the invasion, the monasteries supported the Prince, while the knights and governors tried to subdue his power.

Prince Ogandi was also opposed by the mandarins of Shou Lung. Most nobles possessing forces of any size had one or two Shou advisors. The main purpose of these 'advisors' was to ensure Khazari remained disunited—just the way Shou Lung Mandarins wanted it to be.

The Prince spent much of his time in political maneuvering and conciliation, trying to unite the warring leaders of his kingdom into a single force.

If not aborted, the Prince's labors were at least delayed by the Tuigan invasion. Once the Manass garrison had surrendered, Khazari was left open to Tuigan raiding. Without a strong military to defend his country, Prince Ogandi was forced to sue for peace.

Arms and Armor of the Khazari

The typical Khazari soldier wore leather armor or ring mail under a loose fitting cotton robe. Colored, padded armor, extending from shoulder to ankle, was also quite common. Colors denoted the noble who commanded the unit; vibrant reds, blues, and greens were standard. The most consistent item of the uniform was the helm. This was a peaked affair with long ear flaps, much like the Tuigan helm, studded with metal and decorated with colored plumes.

Officers were better armored, with scale mail and a steel helm open at the face. Although regimental plumage was usually worn, officers limited their outer mantle to simple tabards or perhaps just a colored belt.

The most characteristic Khazari weapon was the krisna, a heavy knife having a wavy blade. The krisna was the standard close fighting weapon of almost all Khazari military groups. The sharp point allowed it to penetrate armor easily, and the wavy blade created a wound wider than the blade.

Another melee weapon used by the Khazari was the swordstaff. This weapon resembled the glaive of Faerum, and was similarly used, though the Khazari used the blunt end of the pole like a quarterstaff. An excellent parrying weapon, most Khazari troops carried the swordstaff in lieu of a shield.

The Khazari medium bow was an undistinguished weapon. The Khazari themselves were indifferent archers, although the guardians of the western passes had more skill than most. In the battle of Manass, nearly 1,000 Khazari archers only slowed a Tuigan charge of 1,000 men—a deplorable showing. It can only be assumed that the Alashan garrisons would have fared better.

The monks of Khazari rarely wore armor, their primary defenses were the religious tenets of the Path of Enlightenment. However, as warriors, they were nearly as skilled as their Shou counterparts. The monks placed more emphasis on weapon based fighting forms. Particularly favored were the Khazari naginata, the sang kauw (a double headed spear with a crescent shaped blade projecting from the center) and the jitte (a tapered iron bar with a projecting short hook near the handle). They did not use shields.

Fighting Tactics of the Khazari

The Khazari practiced two distinct forms of warfare, depending on the threat. An external threat required the defense of the mountain passes from fortified positions. Under these conditions, tactics were simple. The Khazari remained inside their forts pelting the enemy with missile fire until he left. Occasionally, cavalry forces would ride out to drive off particularly persistent bandits, but only when the commander was sure there was little chance of defeat.

This earned the Khazari an undeserved reputation as cowardly fighters. The Khazari had no interest in territorial expansion into the steppe, or into Shou Lung which would be foolhardy at best. Their interests were best served by defending their well defined, natural borders from invasion. It was not in the Khazari interest to engage a foreign enemy on "honorable" terms.

An internal threat required different methods. The frequent feuding of noble houses, often prompted by their Shou advisors, developed its own system of honor. Hiding behind fortifications was dishonorable behavior, even when challenged by a superior force. Accordingly, few of the fortresses and castles in the remainder of Kara-Tur in Khazari were fortified. Most villages did not even have a protective moat; though many of the monasteries were fortified. Often located on remote mountainsides or at the edges of civilization, the forts were necessary. They were not, however, a defensive network across all Khazari.

According to Koja of Khazari, the Khahan had no knowledge of what he was going to find in Khazari. Certainly he knew of the walled cities on the border of the steppe, but never before had a Tuigan attempted to conquer one of these mighty fortresses. Had it been a city of yurts, like his capital Quara-band, Yamun Khahan would have known exactly what to do. Instead, he found himself facing an impenetrable wall of stone.

Against such battlements, the Khahan applied his notorious, devious tactics. He sent a minghan to the walls, trying to ascertain the strength and skill of the garrison. After a few preliminary feints, he retreated the force, causing an advance by the Manass forces. Although his own troops were too far away to take advantage of this, the eager attack of the Manass garrison led Yamun Khahan to his eventual strategy.

The Khahan pulled the majority of his forces away from Manass and, early the following morning, Ches 20, staged the rout of a single minghan led by Shahin Khan. To ensure that the Manass garrison would take notice, Shahin Khan burned everything he encountered on the steppe side of the Manass fortification. As anticipated, the garrison of Manass charged out of their battlements to drive off the 'defeated foe'.

The Disposition of Forces

Unfortunately for the Khazari, the rest of the Khahan's army was not far away. Shahin Khan led his pursuers, all 5,000 men of the Manass garrison, directly into the valley, trapping them between the Khahan's forces.

The Khahan had divided his remaining forces into three sections. His own section of 2,000 men was concealed in a gully at the western most end of the small valley. Goyuk Khan and Prince Jadaran, each with 1,500 men, waited, hidden on either side of the valley.

Tactics of the Combatants

The Manass garrison entered the trap and divided in two as the Khahan's forces attacked. The cavalry, which had been closely pursuing Shahin Khan's minghan, rode past Yamun Khahan's forces. The infantry, struggling to keep pace with the mounted warriors, were trapped between Prince Jadaran's and Goyuk Khan's troops.

The Flow of Battle

When the trap was sprung, the first sign the Manass garrison had was the impact of volley after volley of arrows into their ranks. The infantry, outnumbered two to one, were quickly shaken by the onslaught of the archers. The cavalry, in turn outnumbering the khahan's, was so intent on its pursuit of Shahin's force (and so masked by the dust of their passage) that they did not know where the arrows came from.

Once the cavalry had passed, Yamun Khahan's 2,000 men poured into the pass, charging into the rear flank of the Manass cavalry. Shahin's men turned to stop the cavalry advance. It took but a short time for the Tuigan to push way their way through the cavalry's ranks, disrupting the close formation and crushing the majority of the Manass horsemen. The cavalry battle devolved into small knots of fighting, and the riders of Manass were quickly overcome. The infantry fared worse. Prince Jadaran sent 500 nomads to cut off any retreat, using the remainder of his forces to rain arrows onto the Manass infantry. Outnumbered and trapped between two forces, the infantry surrendered.

The Final Outcome

The Manass garrison was rapidly defeated, although not without cost. Minor damage was inflicted on the nomads. Yamun Khahan was wounded in the battle, likely by a Shou assassin.

Yamun quickly recovered from his injuries and again approached the city, demanding surrender of all of Khazari. Dismayed by the defeat of the garrison, Sanjar al-Mulk sent an urgent message to his cousin Prince Ogandi, begging for aid against the barbarian invasion.

Prince Ogandi realized that without the garrison, the nomads would take Manass within a few days. Worse, this would allow them access to the entire nation, including Alashan's undefended eastern side. Rather than subject Khazari to ruin, Prince Ogandi surrendered on Ches 23, 1359.

Not all of the nobles complied with the order. Several declared independence from Prince Ogandi, branding him a traitor to Khazari. The Tuigan, under Prince Jadaran, scattered across Khazari, subduing resistance and quickly settled Khazari into the role of a nation in fealty to the Khahan.

Conquest of Khazari was not enough for Yamun Khahan. He demanded the lives of all responsible for the death of his envoy's honor guard: the governor, his wizard, and two mandarins from Shou Lung. During negotiations he reduced terms; the governor, Sanjar al Mulk, was held hostage and the other three executed. Prince Jadaran was appointed governor of Khazari and the khahan proceeded to his next target: Shou Lung.

Author's Note

The battle of Manass is depicted here as "typical" of Khazari and Tuigan forces. In fact it was the only battle, as Prince Ogandi surrendered once Manass was defeated.

What might have happened had Khazari been unified? Their armies numbered over 75,000 men, and the steep, rocky terrain of Khazari was not suited to horsemen, which hampered the effectiveness of the Tuigan cavalry. Hubadai's army, which later entered Khazari (Chapter 4), must be weighed in this speculation, as must the interests of the Shou in protecting the Khazari buffer state. With the monasteries committed, the Khahan might well have been stopped here.

Chapter 4 Invasion of Shou Lung

“Those who have made no errors have arranged for certain triumph.”
The Book of Heaven

The Tuigan’s next objective after opening the Khazari western border was the Empire of Shou Lung.

Yamun Khahan considered entering Shou Lung via the Repo La Pass. However, the pass was blocked with snow and would remain so for several weeks. Yamun’s troops would not tolerate a delay of that length, nor would he wish to give the Shou that much time to prepare. He decided to attack the Dragonwall.

According to legend, the Dragonwall is a petrified dragon laid across the foothills of the western border to block invasions from the steppe for eternity. Despite the dubious veracity of the legend, the Dragonwall had rarely been penetrated for millennia.

Before leaving Khazari, Yamun Khahan recalled the balance of his forces. By the time he reached the Dragonwall, he had more than 60,000 men, and another 150,000 on the way.

He proceeded to the southern end of the Dragonwall, near the trading city of Lo Tu. Much of Mai Yuan’s Army 20,000 troops, defended its southern tip.

Koja of Khazari was the only historian traveling with Yamun during the invasion of Shou Lung. In his works, Koja is strangely silent about the methods Yamun Khahan used to breach the Dragonwall. Despite protestations as a man of peace, Koja shows an uncanny eye for the details of war in describing the Khahan’s battles. Perhaps, despite Tuigan prejudice, magic was used.

On Tarsakh (April) 19, 1359 DR, Yamun Khahan’s army, 210,000 strong, penetrated the Dragonwall—to the astonishment of the Shou army—just west of the city of Lo Tu. The garrison crumpled at the onslaught. The Khahan’s troops began their ride across the Plain of Horses (Mai Yuan) toward the capital of Tai Tung, stopping only to sack the undefended city of Lo Tu.

The Mandarins of the Forbidden City took the Tuigan threat seriously, after Khazari’s fall and the failure of the Dragonwall. They still thought the Tuigan witless barbarians, but an army of 25,000 under Shou Lung’s Minister of War, Kwan Chan Sen, was gathered to block their march across Mai Yuan. Kwan Chan Sen’s army met the Tuigan on Tarsakh 30, along the Tsen-Ching, a tributary of the Sheng-Ti river, at the Battle of the Sorghum Field.

Kwan underestimated both Tuigan cunning and troop strength, and set a trap which the Tuigan turned against him. By the end of battle, the Shou had lost nearly 20,000 men, the Tuigan fewer than 5,000. The Shou retreated before the Tuigan horde, which had turned south toward the city of Yenching.

Under General Batu Min Ho’s orders, the Shou burned everything in their path. They fired the grain fields, as well as stored grain which could aid the Tuigan, and ordered the peasants to do the same. Thus, instead of Shou fodder, the Tuigan found only scorched earth. Dispersing forces to accomplish this crippled the Shou fighting force.

It did, however, slow the Tuigan advance to a crawl. The nomads, rather than advancing up to 50 miles a day, were slowed to less than 10. They were barely able to forage enough grain to feed their horses.

The survivors of the Battle of the Sorghum Field regrouped and returned to Tai Tung. The Emperor called 50,000 men from the personal armies of his nobles, the Twenty-Five Armies, and 100,000 men from the provincial armies.

After hearing reports from veteran officers, the Emperor gave General Batu command of the assembled forces as the Army of the Northern Marches. General Batu placed the Twenty-Five Armies under the command of a mandarin, Tzu Hsuang.

The Battle for Shou Lung

General Batu's army was outnumbered two to one and the enemy had better mobility. His own troops had suffered a serious defeat; nevertheless he developed a plan to stop the Tuigan.

Continuing the destruction of grain in the invasion area, he hoped to slow the Tuigan further and buy needed time. He split his forces into two divisions. The Twenty-Five Armies were sent west along the Kuan Post Road to Shou'kuan. Simultaneously, General Batu led the provincial armies by ship up the Shang-ti River to Yenching.

His plan was to entice the nomads to chase the Twenty-Five Armies as far as Shou'kuan and besiege them, waiting for the provincial armies to arrive. When the two armies met they would catch the Tuigan between their forces.

Although General Batu correctly assessed the speed of the Tuigan and their destination, he underestimated their savagery and cunning. The Tuigan received further reinforcements from Yamun Khahan's son Hubadai when his army of 40,000 joined them. When the Tuigan army reached Yenching on Mirtul (May) 21, they smashed the city in a surprise attack, giving the local governor no time to destroy the granaries, finally providing fodder for Tuigan horses. In retaliation for the

The capture of Yenching’s granaries simplified the Tuigan logistic problem. Yamun Khahan left most of the horses at Yenching along with a garrison of 75,000 men. He then proceeded with his remaining troops along the Kuan Post Road to Shou’kuan.

By Flamerule (July) 10, General Batu’s plan blossomed. Simultaneously, the provincial armies under General Batu attacked the garrison at Yenching, and Tzu Hsuang’s Twenty Five Armies first encountered Yamun Khahan’s main force. The Twenty-Five Armies were unable to hold against an overwhelming force. Instead of making an orderly retreat to Shou’kuan, however, the Armies were demolished and routed. Only 15,000 remained when the Twenty-Five Armies stumbled back to Shou’kuan. Worse, the Mirror of Shao, the ancient magical device which General Batu had used for communications, was destroyed.

General Batu drove the Tuigan out, stampeding the nomad horses and firing Yenching, and losing only 20,000 men. Having re-taken the city, he began the march to Shou’kuan.

The siege of Shou’kuan began on Flamerule 21, 1359 DR. The city prefect had burned the granaries when he saw the Tuigan army. Although weakened and hungry, the Twenty Five Armies were sufficient to hold the sturdy walls of Shou’kuan against a Tuigan assault. The Khahan could not risk leaving a garrison to hold them, nor could he allow them to attack his rear in a later battle. Thus, as General Batu had anticipated, the Tuigan were forced to wait for the Twenty-Five Armies to surrender.

Yamun Khahan was not a commander with the patience for protracted siege. After a few aborted forays against the walls, the khahan overcame his troops’ hesitation concerning the use of magic. On Eleasias (August) 2, his shamans created a magical smoke bridge over the walls of Shou’kuan, allowing a small force to enter the city and take the main gate. Once the gate was taken the city, and its defenders, were lost.

General Batu’s Provincial Armies had arrived the previous night from Yenching. The General disguised his men as Tuigan and appropriated some of their horses. He reasoned that a large band of nomad warriors would provoke less comment from the khahan’s scouts than a Shou Army. On horseback, with minimal training, it took almost three weeks to make the 300 mile trek. They had yet to approach the city, waiting for daylight to attack the Tuigan.

Although the Provincial Armies were able to attack the besieging force, they could not prevent the Tuigan from taking the city. Rather than being besiegers, the Tuigan now became the besieged, though by an inferior force. After the battle, Yamun Khahan’s horse warriors numbered over 120,000, and 60,000 of General Batu’s troops remained.

Even though he still outnumbered the enemy, Yamun Khahan’s position was unenviable. While the Shou could not attack him in Shou’kuan, they could keep him caged in the city until his men starved to death. If he attacked, he could probably conquer the Shou army, but at terrible cost to his own men. Worst of all, he had no reserves.

General Batu’s position was not much better. He had stripped the northern provinces of troops to fight the Tuigan. To gain additional troop strength he would have had to pull valuable troops from the southern provinces, leaving the south undefended and inviting invasion by Shou Lung’s traditional enemy, T’u Lung. Cold weather was coming, raising the possibility of disease should a prolonged siege be required. After twelve days trapped in Shou’kuan, Yamun Khahan sued for peace on Eleasias 24. He agreed to leave Shou Lung and cited as his only demand the lives of two Shou ministers who had offended him: Mandarin Ju-Hai Chou and Minister of War Kwan Chan Sen. General Batu agreed, subject only to the approval of the Emperor.

Yamun Khahan's envoy was escorted to the summer palace at Tai Tung, where the Emperor assented to the treaty. On Eleint (September) 9, 120,000 Tuigan left Shou Lung, not to return in Yamun Khahan's lifetime. General Batu Min Ho, with a nomad's contempt for the politics of the Empire, quit the army of Shou Lung and joined the Tuigan.

Organization of the Shou Army

The regular Shou military forces were divided into fourteen provincial armies, one for each of the provinces of Shou Lung. The size of each army was determined by the needs of the province and its susceptibility to invasion. The province of Mai Yuan, on the borders of Khazari and the steppe, had one of the largest armies; Sheng-ti, an interior province, had one of the smallest.

Each provincial army was divided into Cheng-ti (legions) of 8,000 men. These were mixed forces of cavalry, infantry, archers, and sappers. They were further divided into twenty Cheng-lo (cohorts) of 400 men each. A Cheng-lo of infantry or archers was divided into twenty Cheng-wa (platoons) of twenty peng (warriors). A Cheng-lo of cavalry or sappers comprised 200 peng with horses or siege equipment. Troop types were not mixed within a Cheng-lo. In addition to the regular troops, each level of troop—Cheng-lo, Cheng-wa, and Cheng-ti—had its own commanding officer, who was exempted from the troop count. Larger units had an adjutant as well. In addition, Cheng-ti often had a contingent of wu jen (mages), who provided surveillance through clairvoyance spells. The wu jen also supplied weather control and magical attacks.

This arrangement of units, based on the number twenty, inscribed in the Shou Book of Heaven, has survived in Shou Lung for over 2,000 years.

The provincial forces of the Army of the Northern Marches led by General Batu Min Ho were drawn from the northern provinces of Chukei, Ching Tung, Ti Erte, Hungtse, and the capital province of Wang Kuo. Mai Yuan's army was destroyed at the Dragonwall. The thirteen Cheng-ti which comprised General Batu's provincial forces represented slightly under two-thirds of the active military force of northern Shou Lung. A total force of over 300,000 men was spread across the empire.

The remainder of the Army of the Northern Marches were the Twenty-Five Armies, including the personal cavalry of nobles from across the empire, mostly from the north. The noble armies were not as standardized as the military. An army could range from 500 cavalrymen to 5,000 infantrymen, with artillery and racketeers. Neither were the noble armies as well trained, having devoted most of their lives to defending the compounds of their lords. Worse, nobles insisted on leading their forces, making the Twenty-Five Armies a fractious force of questionable military ability.

Regardless of origins, the majority of the Shou military consisted of infantry and archers. Within a Cheng-ti, the usual ratio was three infantry to one bowman. Cavalry was rare since most grain was required to feed the huge population of Shou Lung, with little left to support large herds of horses. Sappers are uncommon, except in some of the noble armies and the southeastern provinces, bordering directly on the fortifications of T'u Lung.

Arms and Armor of the Shou

The standard arms of the Shou infantryman were the chien, a double edged sword with straight sides, and a heavy crossbow. Shou warriors were taught to thrust and slash with their chien. The crossbow was used to stop charges and to sweep the enemy just before the crash of a charge.

The armor of the Shou included a leather helm and a lun'kia. The lun'kia was a war corselet made of fifteen layers of paper and glue. Inexpensive in large quantities (as required by the Shou armies), it provided protection comparable to Faerun ring mail. When not engaged on the field, soldiers wore waitao, heavy quilted coats which provided protection similar to that of leather armor. Shou infantrymen also carried war shields which extended from the shoulder to the knee, primarily used for protection against missile fire.

Archers were lightly armored, and wore leather helmets. The t'ai po, a five-foot Shou longbow with a maximum range of nearly 200 yards was deemed protection enough. Cavalrymen wore ring mail and carried short lances and swords. Their horses were not barded, which made the rider a less tempting target than his mount.

Officers' taos were single edged swords with square tips. Although used for fighting, their primary purpose was the execution of deserters. Shou officers wore plate armor called ki'a, and were adorned with bright plumage on steel helms. Adorned with symbols and reliefs detailing the history and past glory of the officer's family, the expensive ki'a were handed down from generation to generation. To lose the family ki'a brought dishonor upon the name.

Shou military training stressed the skills of moving in formation, holding against a charge, and executing complex formation changes. Given such a large and disciplined force, it was necessary that the Shou doctrine of war be based on the tenet of sacrifice. A Tuigan force might simulate a rout, or even sacrifice a few men to gather important information about troop dispositions. The Shou, on the other hand, would send men into positions where they could easily be destroyed, hoping to draw the enemy into an inferior position.

A typical Shou battle plan would situate a small force in an untenable tactical position, enticing the enemy to attack. Once engaged, reserves struck the enemy's flank and rear.

The Battle of the Sorghum Field Tarsakh 30, 1359 DR

The Battle of the Sorghum Field was the Tuigan's first encounter with a ready Shou force. The outcome determined the course of the Shou/Tuigan war.

The Tuigan had penetrated the Dragonwall on Tarsakh 19, destroying the Army of Mai Yuan. It took until Tarsakh 30 to assemble a force of regular armies from Chukei and Ching Tung to stand between the barbarians and the Shou heartland. Led by Minister Kwan, they were situated in a series of low hills east of Lo Tu, along the banks of the Tsen-Ching River.

Minister Kwan's plan was simple. Nine Cheng-lo of infantry (3,600 men), one Cheng-lo of archers (400 men), and eight Cheng-lo of cavalry (1,600 men), were placed in a marshy area on a bend in the Tsen-Ching River. The force was led by General Batu Min Ho.

The infantry formed the forward line, supported by the cavalry behind them, with the archers in the rear. Their position was established facing north, with their backs against a hillside. The Tsen-Ching River bordered their eastern flank; the western flank exposed. A second hill lay ahead of them to the north, about 600 yards away.

The remaining Shou, nearly 20,000 strong, were hidden behind the southern hill in a protected ravine. Kwan's battle plan assumed that the nomads would charge the obviously weak force on the riverbank along the exposed western flank. Once engaged, the remaining Shou force would swarm to the attack.

In support of his plan, Batu had the catapults of the main force hidden at the top of the hill and loaded with balls of pitch ready to light.

Minister Kwan had grossly underestimated both the size of the Tuigan horde, and the thoroughness of its scouts. Yamun Khahan committed 3 tumens (30,000 men) to enter the trap, sending another 5 tumens around to the south to assault the hidden force once they left the ravine.

The Flow of Battle

The initial Tuigan probe was a single minghan (1,000 men), which feinted at General Batu's forces from the north, trying either to trigger the trap prematurely or to pull the forces at the riverside out of the range of their support. After a few exchanges of arrow fire, the probe retreated.

Moments later, a second probe of 3,000 Tuigan horse came over the hilltop, attacking from the north. They charged General Batu's force, drummers thundering a strong beat, warriors taking punishing casualties from crossbow fire, but still devastating General Batu's infantry.

General Batu recognized the signal in the drumming, but knew not the code. He ordered his archers to fire at the drummers. When the drums stopped, some Tuigan pulled away, others were suddenly outnumbered and destroyed.

Yamun Khahan's plan was quickly revealed.

Charging the exposed western flank of General Batu's trapped force, 25,000 Tuigan poured along the western edge of the northern hill.

As the Tuigan hit Batu's army, it crumpled into retreat, fleeing up the southern hill and down to the river's edge. General Batu had the foresight to arrange reed bundles to be placed at the river's edge for those who fled east. As they reached the river, General Batu had them grab a bundle and jump in.

As the Tuigan force became strung out along the northern edge of the hill, 4,000 archers of the Shou came to the hilltop and fired into the mass of Tuigan. Simultaneously, catapults fired flaming balls of pitch beyond the Tuigan force, trapping it in the low valley with only one exit, directly through the Shou force. Behind the archers, 15,000 infantry awaited orders to charge.

The Tuigan rained a heavy curtain of death on the trapped forces of General Batu, while the majority of their forces charged up the hill engaging the main Shou army. At that precise moment the remainder of the Tuigan force attacked from the south, behind the main Shou army. Now, instead of the Tuigan force being trapped against a wall of fire by the Shou, the Shou were caught between two forces of Tuigan and the river.

The Final Outcome

Trapped, outnumbered two to one, the Shou army died. General Batu's foresight saved nearly 2,000 men. Of the other 20,000 troops in the Shou army, fewer than 500 lived to reach Yenching.

Tuigan losses were low. Of the 80,000 nomads in the battle, fewer than 5,000 were lost. The Tuigan advanced, sure of their ability to conquer.

Chapter 5 The War With Thay

"Where others see misfortune, I see only opportunity."

Zulkir Szass Tam

For two months, the Tuigan army travelled east, seeking new lands to conquer. At the beginning of the month of Uktar (November), Yamun Khahan's army reached the Sunrise Mountains.

He wanted to get through the mountains before the winter snows closed the passes. Finding one open pass, the khahan sent 5 minghans (5,000 men), led by General Chanar Ogh Kho, to scout the far side of the mountains. One week later, on Uktar 11, Chanar returned with 100 men and tales of a wealthy and powerful land, the kingdom of Thay.

Thay was one of the most feared kingdoms in Faerun. The ruling Red Wizards were powerful, and brooked no interference in their affairs.

Chanar's scouting party entered Thay through a pass at the eastern border, north of the city of Pyarados. They raided several villages along the River Surague before encountering a foot legion of the Tharch of Pyarados.

The initial battle, with relatively untrained garrison troops, went well for the nomads. The 1,500 soldiers of the Thayvian Legion of Shar's Kiss were on a punitive mission to a small village which had failed to provide the appropriate taxes to the Tharchion. The Legion was not prepared to find 5,000 horsemen raiding deep within Thay. The Legion fled back to the city to report to Valerios, Tharchion of Pyarados.

The Tharchion immediately saw what damage a force the size of Yamun's could do in Thay. He ordered two heavy infantry legions (4,000 men) and one cavalry legion (1,000 men) into action. He requested magic support from the Zulkir of Conjuraction/Summoning, and was provided two Circles of wizards.

They tracked down Chanar's 5 minghans, and on Nuktar 9, attacked with cavalry and then heavy infantry. The Thayvians left only one route of escape. The Circles summoned elementals of fire and earth, devastating the nomads.

Chanar and 100 men escaped to return to Yamun Khahan. General Batu Min Ho offered to lead a war party to Thay.

Organization of the Armies of Thay

The army of Thay was a mixed collection of troop types and organizational structures. Military Legions were sponsored by the Red Wizards and Tharchions of Thay, and each patron organized his Legion to his personal taste and method. Therefore, any statements about the Thay military will be generalizations.

Thayvian foot legions embraced between 800 and 2,000 soldiers.

Foot legions would be skirmishers, light foot, heavy foot, or garrison troops. Each had its own armor and banners.

Cavalry legions were based on any sort of mount. Horses were common, but nearly any other creature that could be ridden had been tried in Thay. The most famous of the exotic cavalry was the Griffon Legion of the Tharchion of Pyarados. Before their devastation at the hands of the Tuigan, 350 mages rode griffon steeds. Even dragons were tried as mounts, but not successfully. Dragons willing to assist the Red Wizards were found to be untrustworthy, and there were never enough dragons in Thay to form more than a token flight.

Thayvian cavalry was known for its skill throughout Faerun. Almost all cavalry was heavy. The mounts were fully barded, and most cavalry men were trained in archery. A few were mages trained to cast magic while mounted.

The Thayvians made extensive use of humanoid troops, segregating them into their own legions to prevent friction with humans and for better control. Skirmishers were usually goblin troops, human or orc light foot, and heavy foot predominantly gnoll. There were no nonhuman cavalry legions, unless the centaur legion of the Tharch of Thaymount is counted.

They utilized undead troops, notably the Legion of Cyric, comprising over 1,000 zombies led by priests of that baleful god. While not exceptional fighters, the fear they generated on the battlefield more than made up for their lack of military prowess. Moreover, enemies of the Legion knew that if they died without totally disabling wounds, they might join the Legion.

There were rumors of a skeletal cavalry, the Legion of Bones, sponsored by Zulkir Szass Tam. These warriors were reputedly the remains of a Mulhorand cavalry unit which was sent to Thay to put down the rebellion when Thay won its independence. They were armed with fell weapons from that ancient empire.

Given the Thayvian focus on the power of wizards, it is not surprising that mages played an important role in the military. Other than the cavalry, most mages in military service were part of small groups known as Circles. A Circle consisted of a Wizard and his apprentices. Through rituals, apprentices added their power to the Wizards', allowing more spells to be cast during a single day.

When combined, the power of a Circle was greater than that of all but the most potent mages in Faerun. Fortunately the rituals to establish a Circle were time consuming and easily disrupted. Magic was only useful for fixed battles, when the Wizard was aware of his enemy's approach, and had time to prepare.

The peoples of Faerun feared the Circles with good reason. Ten or twelve mages working together, even without a focus to drive their magic, could still do tremendous damage. Hundreds of mages, which Thay brought to the battlefield when the need arose, could destroy tens of thousands of unprepared infantry.

Fighting Tactics of Thay

They made heavy use of battlefield magic. A few mages, capable of at least one or two spells, were sent into battle with the smallest legion of skirmishers. But Thay also heavily supplemented every large force with Wizards.

This magical ability made up for the poor quality of most Thayvian troops (cavalry excepted) and the limited tactical ability of their generals. The Armies of Thay could tolerate enormous casualties, particularly among humanoid legions, to accomplish a strategic goal. Humanoids bred quickly and provided a constant source of new recruits.

Armies led by the Red Wizards considered anyone not a member of their order to be someone less than essential. To accomplish their purposes, they were quite willing to allow lesser mortals to die. Red Wizards were known to sacrifice their own troops along with the enemy to insure victory.

The Battle of the Griffon Legion: Uktar 15, 1359 DR

General Batu's men entered Thay on Uktar 12 through the same pass used by General Chanar. Where Chanar had found only light resistance, General Batu met repeated ambushes. Not powerful enough to seriously injure his force, they did slow his progress to 15 miles a day.

It took three days to travel through the pass. When General Batu's force reached the other side, the famed Griffon Legion was at the mouth of the pass waiting for them.

The Griffon Legion comprised 350 griffons, each trained from birth to bear wizard riders. Aboard each were mages capable of unleashing devastating spells against their enemies.

To provide the Griffon Legion with ground support, the Tharchion added 10,000 gnolls from his personal heavy infantry Legions. He also requested and received several Circles of wizards from the School of Evocation/Invocation. Bowing to pressure from senior family members, and knowing Thay outnumbered the Tuigan, he gave command to his nephew, Gavros Mediocros. To assist Gavros, he appointed an old adventuring companion, Hovros Balmavos.

The Tuigan force led by General Batu Min Ho into Thay was no larger than that of General Chanar. Also, the Thayvians were alerted to the Tuigan presence by General Chanar's earlier indiscriminate raiding. Considering how few of General Chanar's forces came out of Thay, General Batu and his nomads would be lucky to leave Thay alive.

Disposition of Forces

Thay's primary obstacle was the sheer size of the pass. At its mouth the valley was nearly 10 miles across. Even with 10,000 gnolls it was a challenge to cover that much terrain effectively.

Gavros showed remarkable military skill in arranging a trap for the Tuigan. He distributed his gnolls in groups of 50 along a thin line across the end of the pass, and sent the Griffon Legion high above and to the rear as a reserve. The spacing of his gnoll units allowed him to cover the entire mouth of the pass with arrow fire from several overlapping units. A more concentrated force would not have been able to cover so large an area. Assuming the Tuigan would attempt to penetrate the thin line somewhere near the center, he would envelop the nomads and send the Griffon Legion to destroy them.

The Flow of Battle

When General Batu realized what he was facing, he spread his main force of 4,000 Tuigan into a widely spaced skirmish line so only a few horsemen would be caught by any one spell. Widening the line until it spanned the pass, there was no way for the Thayvian commanders to guess where he would strike. He sent 1,000 men up the canyon walls to take firing stations on both sides of the narrow canyon.

Upon a signal, the line charged. Instead of forming a wedge and attacking a single point on the line, as Gavros had expected, the Tuigan divided into groups of 20 and attacked all of the gnoll units simultaneously. Thus, the Tuigan prevented unengaged units from pinning them in a web of arrow fire.

Even so, this tactic could not work for long. Each 20 Tuigan fought 50 gnolls—an uneven contest despite Tuigan prowess. Fortunately, General Batu's plan did not require the Tuigan to destroy the gnolls.

After brief fighting, the Tuigan began to rout from the center, then rippled outward, to north and south. Although the Tuigan fired arrows with withering effect as they fled, the gnolls pursued them. The Griffon Legion advanced, raining destruction.

At this point, the Tuigan atop the canyon walls entered the fray. When the Griffon Legion came between the two halves of the Tuigan force on the sides of the canyon, the Tuigan opened fire. Fully half of the Griffon Legion fell from the sky in the first volley, rider or griffon mortally wounded. The remainder wheeled to escape, but before the volleys ceased, nearly 250 of the Griffon Legion lay on the valley floor. The Tuigan rout instantly reversed. The gnolls found themselves with Tuigan on three sides. Despite their numbers, they could not get at 1,000 archers who were too high and too fast to catch. Most of the gnolls died; the rest fled.

The Final Outcome

After the battle, Szass Tam, Zulkir of Necromancy in Thay and the most politically prominent of the Red Wizards, approached General Batu Min Ho. Upon learning the true Tuigan strength, he magically summoned Yamun Khahan and offered him a truce—the Thayvians would not assault the Tuigan, if the Tuigan would attack Rashemen.

Although his advisors recommended attacking Thay, the khahan had other considerations. He realized that even if the Zulkir was bluffing, battling the magic of Thay would sap the morale of his army. The nomads were uncomfortable battling sorcery; a few battles with the enchanted armies of Thay would drive his men home to their ordus.

The khahan also knew that winter snows would shut the pass which had admitted General Batu to Thay. Although there was enough time to return his troops, he could not bring 100,000 men through the pass in the time remaining. The possibility of avalanches destroying a large portion of his force, perhaps assisted by Thayvian magic, was dangerously high. Therefore, after due consideration, and gaining the concession of three Red Wizards to support the Rashemen campaign, the khahan agreed to the Zulkir's proposal. The Tuigan forces turned north.

Chapter 6 War in Rashemen

"If we run after two hares, we will catch neither."

Hyarmon Huzzilthar, Iron Lord of Rashemen

Yamun Khahan left Thay and returned to his main force east of the Sunrise Mountains. Guided by the Red Wizards, he moved north along Golden Way trade route to Citadel Rashemar.

Impervious to attack, the Citadel squatted over the trade route; its stone walls stood 25 feet above the Golden Way. From the parapets a garrison of 2,000 warriors allowed caravans to pass and repelled bandits. The snows had been late that year, but bandits and caravans never risked the passes in winter.

Citadel Rashemar was a paper tiger. The Tuigan force swept past the fortress on the Feast of the Moon (November 31), and left a small force of 5,000 to besiege the garrison. They proceeded as if it were not even there.

Simultaneously, 40,000 Thavyian troops made an assault across the Gorge of Gavros into Rashemen. Hyarmon Huzzilthar, Iron Lord of Rashemen, led the defending forces. The Iron Lord drew all his forces away from the north to hold Thay at the Gorge, leaving the way open to the Tuigan.

Caught between the armies of the Tuigan and the Red Wizards, the Iron Lord focused his forces on stopping the Thayvians, leaving the harassment of the Tuigan to the Witches.

The Witches, although numerically weaker than the Red Wizards of Thay, were a united group of powerful mages with centuries of experience fighting the legions of Thay. They sent clouds of poisonous gas and flame, elementals and enchanted creatures, even enchanted bands of Tuigan, to attack the nomad army. Their tactics caused only minimal casualties to the Tuigan but prevented the nomads from spreading across Rashemen to the southern front.

Despite containment, the Tuigan sacked much of Rashemen. The Witches sent warnings, but they could not stop an army 1,000 times their number.

The Tuigan eventually made their way across Rashemen, By Hammer (January) 27, 1360 DR, most them had reached the edge of the Lake of Tears, at the headwaters of the River Mulsantir. The river was too wide for the Tuigan to cross and much of it was filled with large chunks of ice. Advised by the Red Wizards, they started to build ships to cross the Mulsantir after the spring thaw.

On Alturiak (February) 16, when Thay had still not attacked, the fangs of Rashemen turned their attention to the Tuigan. The Witches led a detachment of forces to the enemy encampment.

On Alturiak 29, they attacked the Tuigan. The witchboats of Rashemen deposited 35,000 berserkers north and south of the Tuigan force, pinning 100,000 Tuigan against the River.

Organization of the Armies of Rashemen

The warriors of Rashemen were divided into small bands, each swearing fealty to one of the chieftains of Rashemen. A fang (a chieftain and his warriors) came together for adventure and to defend their territory.

The chieftains swore fealty to the Huhrong, the “Iron Lord”, who was effectively “king” of Rashemen, administering justice and leading its troops in battle.

The Iron Lord was Hyarmon Huzzilthar, a grizzled veteran of seventy-nine winters. He was chosen by the Witches of Rashemen in secret, by consensus. His predecessor, Targuth Athkarr the “Old Wolf”, was removed by the Witches when he became senile. Targuth was taken by them and never seen again and it was believed, in Rashemen, that the Witches cared for him for the rest of his life.

The Rashemen were not an aggressive people. They had never invaded other lands and their only wars had been to stop Thay incursions.

When not under attack, the chieftains were fairly independent, having no concept of a “professional military.”

The true rulers of Rashemen were the Witches. They were revered and heeded and it was certain death to harm or to disobey a Witch. Rashemen believed that there were between 60 and 100 of them, all female, and that they possessed feared and unknown power.

Arms and Armor of the Berserkers

The berserkers of Rashemen were tall, strong people who dressed in furs or hides in winter, and wore only thin leather tunics in summer. Disdaining armor, they preferred to trust their own prowess and speed.

The weapons the berserkers preferred were swords and axes, short bows, and lances. They rarely used shields and fought mounted on small ponies, nimbler than steppe ponies but not as fast.

Another important “weapon” of the Rashemen berserker was jhuild (firewine) made by the Witches, and drunk by the warriors before battle. Jhuild deadened pain and inflamed passions, bringing the berserker rage which drove the Rashemen to battle.

The Witches of Rashemen wore black robes and face masks, and bore magical rings, wands, and whips. If Witches left Rashemen, they had to abandon their robes and conceal their powers. Prior to the Horde Wars, none did so.

Fighting Tactics of the Rashemen

The berserkers of Rashemen were vicious fighters with little sense of subtle tactics. The chieftains were savvy enough to avoid obvious traps.

The Tuigan waited at the edge of the Lake of Tears for the spring thaw. Fully 75,000 men labored on ships intended to carry them across the lake in the spring. The remaining 25,000 foraged across Rashemen, gathering food and supplies for the Tuigan army.

Yamun Khahan was unconcerned about attack. He had roamed Rashemen for two months and had rarely seen more than 50 warriors at a time. Even the Witches would not attack a force the size of Yamun's. He had sent out scouting parties to warn him of the approach of any sizable threat.

The khahan did not know much about ship transport. General Batu Min Ho had advised him that an assault was impossible; the river was too filled with ice to allow it. This assumption was the cause of the greatest rout of the Horde since its formation, for the Tuigan knew nothing of the Rashemen witchboats.

The Disposition of Forces

The Witches of Rashemen deposited 35,000 berserkers in two major armies to the north and south of the Tuigan camp. The boats had passed the scouts, who were looking for a land bound force, and left their troops inside the Tuigan lines, undetected.

The camp was unprepared for battle. Most of the horses were tethered in a large herd to the south of the camp. The nomads were scattered across the hillside, away from the bone chilling cold of the lake. Some remained in camp, others labored to the west on the skeletons of ships for the spring.

The Flow of Battle

The forces of Rashemen attacked in three groups. The first strike of 10,000 men hit the southern edge of the camp, trying to reach the ship skeletons and separate the Tuigan from their horses. The second came down in a broad line to the north to block that escape. The third mass of 15,000 berserk warriors poured into the camp and slaughtered every warrior they encountered.

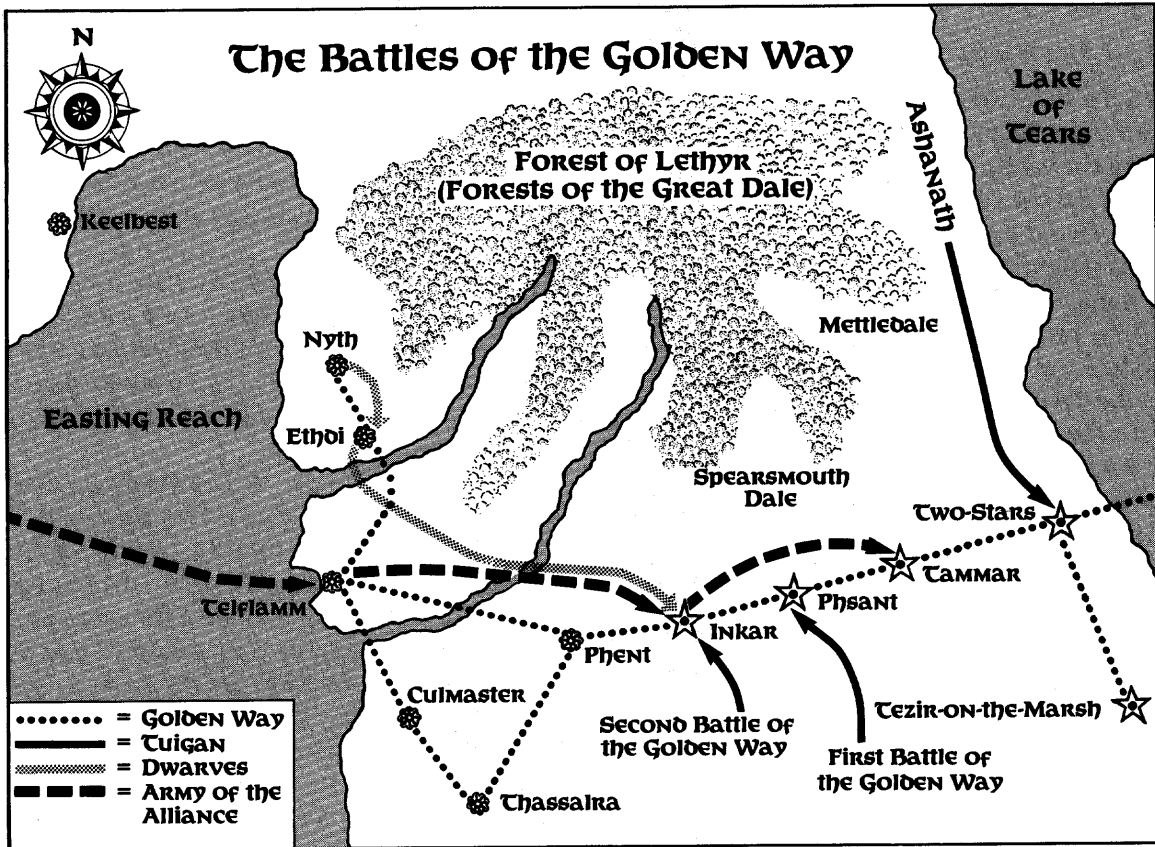

The Tuigan were in immediate peril. They outnumbered the Rashemen, but their indefensible position made them easy targets. Here and there nomads rallied to their khans and fought effectively, but overall there was chaos.

Then Yamun Khahan took charge. He ordered a jagun (100 men) to loose most of the horses, stampeding them into the southern Rashemen force to delay them. A second jagun, with extra weapons, was sent to reinforce the shipworkers. Finally with two minghans of dayguards, he rushed forward to engage the enemy. The uncoordinated knots of men rallied to the kha-han's standard as it passed; the tide of battle began to turn.

As the Rashemen forces faltered, the Witches entered the fray. Sailing crewless witchboats down the river, the ice floes moving out of their way, they hurled fire, ice, and creatures at the beleaguered Tuigan.

Trapped between the river and the Rashemen, the Tuigan began to panic. Horses circled about the battlefield, a few Tuigan managed to regain their mounts, but most remained afoot.

The Red Wizards then entered the melee. Rather than engaging the Rashemen force, they turned their magic on the Lake of Tears and formed a wide dry path across to Ashanath. The rush of water escaping the parted river thrust the witchboats away from the battle, dashing one or two against the ice.

Overcoming their dread of magic, the Tuigan retreated across the river. Yamun Khahan managed to regroup most of his forces and recover their mounts before they fled. The Rashemen pressed them inexorably across the Lake of Tears. The remaining Witches attacked, dispelling the Wizards' path across the river, drowning the Tuigan who had not reached the Ashanath shore.

The Final Outcome

The Tuigan lost nearly a quarter of their forces on that wintry shore. Most fell in battle with the Rashemen, but nearly 5,000 drowned, trapped on the lake when the Witches reversed the Wizards' spells. The remaining 60,000 stood shivering on the eastern shore of Ashanath. There they camped, awaiting spring to resume their campaign.

The Rashemen, having driven the main Tuigan force from their soil, divided. Half were sent across Rashemen to capture or eliminate the remaining Tuigan forces, and the rest were rushed back to the Gorge of Gavros to face any renewed Thayvian threat.

Chapter 7 The Crusade

"My duty to Cormyr demands that I help avert a crisis that could threaten any part of the continent."

King Azoun of Cormyr

The Tuigan force wintered in Ashanath and eastern Thesk. During the coldest months, though the nomads were not raiding, they had not been forgotten by the people of Faerun.

On Tarsakh (April) 10, King Azoun of Cormyr summoned a council of the leaders of the Heartlands of Faerun, to discuss the Tuigan threat. The Dalelands, Sembia, Cormyr, and the free cities of Tantras, Hillsfar, and Ravens Bluff sent envoys. There, a woman of Rashemen, reputed to be one of the Witches, reported on the Tuigan threat.

Although they were still over a thousand miles away, the leaders of the Heartlands decided to take the war to the Tuigan. Led by King Azoun, Heartlands began a crusade. To the 28,000 troops of the Heartlands, King Azoun added 2,000 dwarven warriors from the Earthfast mountains and 1,000 orcs from Zhentil Keep.

By Tarsakh 17, 1360 DR, the Tuigan army was again on the move. They took the city of Tezir-on-the-Marsh on Tarsakh 25, and Two Stars on Mirtul (May) 17. Thousands of refugees poured westward, flooding the streets of Tammur.

By Kythorn (June) 8, the Western army had assembled in Telflamm. The dwarves and orcs, who had come separately, met King Azoun just south of the trading city of Uthmerg. Azoun's ships then carried the orcs south to Telflamm. By mutual agreement, the dwarves of Earthfast marched on their own, both because traveling by ship was repellent to them and because of the presence of the orcs from Zhentil Keep. The main force of the Alliance marched south from Telflamm, along the Golden Way toward Phent. The dwarves came south and southeast, skirting the southern end of the Forest of Lethyr.

The Tuigan army marched on, unconcerned by the Alliance forces ahead. They overwhelmed the road fortresses in eastern Thesk, besieging and conquering Tammar on Kythorn 15, and the city of Phsant on Kythorn 20.

The Alliance forces reached the town of Inkar on Kythorn 24. Scouts located the nomads' encampment in a valley west of Phsant, just north of the Golden Way. King Azoun sent emissaries to the Tuigan camp. Although one was slain, the other returned with the khahan's demand to meet with King Azoun in person.

On Flamerule (July) 2, King Azoun and his advisors entered the Tuigan camp in an unsuccessful attempt to avoid battle. The 100,000 Tuigan troops who remained, outnumbered the Alliance forces by more than two to one, but King Azoun did not back down. Although the Alliance would have preferred to wait for the arrival of the dwarves, battle was joined on Flamerule 3, 1360 DR.

Organization of the Army of the Alliance

The Army of the Alliance was not a unified military force. In this single army, men of many nations and races fought side by side against a common enemy.

The forces of Cormyr formed the heart of the Army of the Alliance. They were divided into professional soldiers from the army, and troops from the noble houses of Cormyr owed to the King through scutage (shield tax). Volunteers from the Cormyrian cities of Suzail and Arabel, and wizards from the cities of Cormyr made up the remainder of their forces. The professional soldiers were predominately pikemen. Noble troops, often personally led by Cormyr's nobles, were comprised of heavy cavalry. Most of the volunteers could, at best, have been described as skirmishers, light infantry and archers and few had any military experience.

The wizards of Cormyr were focused around the famous Council of Mages, the "War Wizards" of Cormyr. This council included over 300 wizards from the cities and noble fiefs of Cormyr who had been drafted for service in Cormyr's army during time of war.

Sembia did not provide any of her own troops. The kingdom maintained only a small army and there were no troops available to spare on the quest. Instead, Sembia provided sufficient funds to hire 4,000 mercenaries. Most of these were heavy infantry selected to stiffen the Alliance lines.

The Dales sent 4,000 men, primarily archers. Hillsfar sent only 600 men at arms, most of them cavalymen from the Red Plumes. Their numbers bolstered the noble troops of Cormyr. Tantras, Ravens Bluff, and the other cities of the Heartlands sent 7,400 men between them. These were primarily volunteers like those from Cormyr. The cities also provided more than 300 wizards to aid the Cormyr contingent.

Zhentil Keep sent 1,000 orc medium infantry with their own leader, Vrakk. The orc troops had considerable battle experience, much of it against the Dales, but were unused to fighting in a large army.

The dwarves of Earthfast sent 2,000 heavy pikemen, trained in the use of square and massed formations. Since much of their training had been designed to fight cavalry, these troops had a value to the Alliance forces far exceeding their number.

The infantry, including the troops from Zhentil Keep, was placed under the command of Farl Bloodaxe, the ranking general of the Cormyrian army. General Brunthar Elventree of Battledale led the archers, who were predominately Dalesmen. The cavalry were led by Lord Harcourt, a noble of Cormyr who was well respected by the other nobles. Vangerdast of Cormyr, King Azoun's advisor, led the War Wizards.

Within each branch of the Army, the organization followed traditional Cormyrian chains of command. Sub commanders were appointed for each thousand men, with sergeants in charge of each hundred.

Arms and Armor of the Alliance

Unlike the professional armies of Shou Lung, the Army of the Alliance showed little unity in appearance or weaponry. There was no time, after the formation of the army, to create uniforms or even to train together, so each unit dressed in its regular battle gear. Except for the professional military, there was little unity even within a given section.

The king's bodyguard wore chain mail and tunics emblazoned with the Purple Dragon. They carried long swords and medium shields. The other Cormyrian professionals wore studded leather armor and carried pikes, short swords, and body shields. The mercenaries were better armored, usually with scale or chain mail, and carrying medium shields. The volunteer infantry armed itself with spears, swords, or axes and carried makeshift shields. Armor was either of leather or they wore no armor.

The wealthier nobles of Cormyr commonly wore plate mail with full plate barding for their horses. Nobles of lesser means settled for banded mail and full scale barding. Their troops typically wore chain mail with chain or leather barding. Weaponry included lances, swords, and medium shields.

The warriors of the Dales wore leather armor and dressed in the light green unofficial uniform of the Dalesmen. Their arms included the long bow, of which they were masters, and short swords.

Hillsfar's Red Plumes were as well armored as the mercenaries; many of them even wore banded mail. Their horses were barded with chain or leather, much like the noble troops of Cormyr. Weapons varied, but maces, axes, and short bows which could be used from horseback, were common. The Red Plumes of Hillsfar did not use lances.

The volunteers from Tantras, Ravens Bluff, and the other cities of the Heartlands varied between the formal uniforms and regular armor of the Cormyrian soldiery to the sparse equipment of the volunteer warriors. The dwarven pikemen wore dwarf forged full plate armor, and carried crossbows as well as pikes. The orcs of Zhentil Keep wore greasy black leather armor, occasionally supplemented with bits of chain or plate. They used a wide variety of crude weapons: swords, flails, maces, axes, spears, and polearms.

The Battles of the Golden Way: Flamerule 3-5, 1360 DR

The armies of King Azoun and Yamun Khahan camped thirty miles apart, just west of the city of Phsant. On the morning of Flamerule 3, King Azoun's forces arrayed themselves across the Golden Way, the trade road which was Thesk's lifeblood. There they awaited the Khahan's attack.

The Disposition of Forces

The forces of the Alliance were deployed in the traditional fashion of Heartlands armies. The center of the force was held by two lines of infantry. The first line, four men deep, consisted largely of pikemen and spearmen in close formation. The second line, shorter and to the rear, comprised swordsmen and axemen who would fall upon the Tuigan if they penetrated the main line.

The cavalry was deployed in wings to either side of the frontal line, ready to sweep forward into the Tuigan flank once the infantry had stopped the charge. The archers stood in four groups within the second rank, prepared to fire at the advancing Tuigan force over the heads of the infantry before them.

The wizards remained behind the infantry, their spells ready for the Tuigan charge. Vangerdahast had fallen ill. He had accompanied King Azoun on his visit to Yamun Khahan and the spells staving off his old age had collapsed when he entered the magic-dead area the Tuigan had chosen as their campsite. While Vangerdahast was unavailable, his second in command took up leadership of the War Wizards.

The Tuigan approached the outnumbered Alliance in three lines of horsemen, three deep, and spread completely across the Golden Way.

The Flow of Battle

The first Tuigan assault was 15 minghans (15,000 men). Typically, the first assault was to gauge the archery of Yamun Khahan's opponent. The nomads charged to a distance of 50 yards from the Alliance lines, absorbing three volleys from Alliance longbowmen before returning fire and fleeing. In the first charge, the Tuigan lost 4,000 men to the Alliance's 300.

The second charge of 30,000 further ravaged the nomad army. In addition to the archery, which claimed 4,000 Tuigan lives, the War Wizards fired their first volley. They hurled hundreds of fireballs into the Tuigan line just as they turned to fire bows. The wizards followed the fireballs with an assault of dozens of earth elementals. Instead of raining more arrows on the Alliance, Tuigan horsemen died by the thousands.

The cavalry, against orders, decided to charge the weakened ranks of the nomads. The Tuigan commander of the assault quickly began a rout back to the main Tuigan force and the Alliance cavalry obligingly followed, leaving the infantry to fend for itself.

King Azoun ordered the infantry to fall back, but the uncoordinated efforts of forces from half a dozen armies were unable to prevent the Tuigan from encircling the Alliance.

The cavalry managed to defeat the fleeing nomads, but in the process isolated themselves so badly that the khahan's main force easily encircled and destroyed them.

The infantry might have been wiped out as well had the dwarves not arrived at the battle site at that moment. When the Tuigan commander saw this small force coming from the north, he dispatched 5,000 horsemen to eliminate them.

Many of the Tuigan fell to the dwarven crossbows, but more fell to the dwarves' pikes. The dwarves were using formed squares which the Tuigan could easily encircle, and did, but they could not easily defeat them. The Tuigan horses were vulnerable to the dwarven pikes. The Earthfast dwarves were well enough trained to crush much of the Tuigan assault force between their own formations.

The dwarves then advanced to assist the armies of the Alliance in fending off the majority of the Tuigan attack. The Alliance's position had always been defensive, though the wizards and archers had been able to prevent the Tuigan force from establishing a complete encirclement. The dwarves acted where they could, assaulting the Tuigan archers from behind initially, then working within the Alliance forces to stiffen the human infantry.

By afternoon, the Tuigan had had enough. Yamun Khahan ordered a retreat, and his forces returned to their magic-dead campsite to consider their alternatives.

The Aftermath

Nearly 30,000 Tuigan died at the First Battle of the Golden Way, leaving 70,000 at large in Thesk. Some Tuigan were captured, including General Batu Min Ho, one of the khahan's ablest commanders.

The Army of the Alliance, however, had suffered more severely. Fifteen thousand men had died on the first day of battle, including almost all of the cavalymen and most of the front line mercenaries. Nearly a quarter of the wizards were also slain. The soldiers remaining were primarily light to medium infantry men, and only dwarves were left to provide any heavily armored force. Perhaps worst of all, King Azoun himself was injured in the battle, felled with a leg wound. His daughter, Princess Alusair, then took command of the Alliance forces.

The Tuigan force had retreated to regroup and plan a new assault. They had not been defeated, and Princess Alusair knew that they would return. That night she pulled the Western forces back, west along the Golden Way, to a more defensible position between two wooded areas. The woods would prevent the Tuigan from encircling the Army of the Alliance, while the narrow front that remained would offset the numerical advantage of the nomads.

By the morning, King Azoun was better, although his leg wound was still serious. Vangerdahast had also improved, enhancing the morale of the War Wizards. Nevertheless, the Army of the Alliance was in desperate trouble. King Azoun offered each man in the army the opportunity to leave without recrimination. Only 100 out of 15,000 accepted his offer.

The Second Battle of the Golden Way

Despite their more defensible position, the Alliance was still heavily outnumbered. Nearly 70,000 Tuigan still opposed their 15,000 man army, and they had lost their best troops.

King Azoun and his generals came up with a plan that would defeat the Tuigan. Azoun had the dwarves of Earthfast dig hundreds of small holes, in a semicircular band, in front of the Alliance forces. The holes would be extremely dangerous for the nomad horsemen, for they would break the horses' legs and stop any Tuigan charge. He then directed the War Wizards to cover the holes with an illusion so that the ground appeared the same as the rest of the terrain.

The Alliance infantry established themselves in two strong ranks across the narrowed Golden Way. The dwarves anchored the left end of the line with the remaining heavy infantry in the center. The archers and wizards were stationed within the second rank of the infantry.

The Flow of Battle

The Tuigan began their onslaught with a small foray. They charged the Alliance lines with 1,000 riders, too few to make an effective attack on 15,000 men. Many fell from arrow fire, but the remaining few pulled up just a few yards from the illusion shrouded holes. They shot fire arrows into the woods to drive the Alliance from its flanking position.

As the Tuigan raiders retreated, the Alliance wizards responded. They summoned up a storm to extinguish the small fires which had sprung up and further muddied the embattled field.

Yamun Khahan lost patience with the Alliance. The Tuigan horde charged the westerners, still unaware of the horse destroying terrain hidden just beneath the illusion.

King Azoun's scouts identified the khahan's own standard in the center of the line. He had Vangerdahast conjure a barrier of force which allowed the khahan and his bodyguard of 50 men to ride safely above the trapped field. Then the Tuigan charge hit the line of holes at full speed. Wave after wave of Tuigan horses were stopped at the edge, their legs broken by holes or collapsing atop other less fortunate riders. Once the trap was revealed, the wizards allowed the illusion to fade. The khahan and his bodyguard escaped the devastation, only to be isolated from the remainder of the Tuigan horde. Separated from his main force, Yamun Khahan found himself trapped between the Alliance lines and the wall created by fallen Tuigan mounts.

King Azoun and his hand picked bodyguard of 200 charged; their target was the small knot of Tuigan around the Khahan. Simultaneously, Alliance archers opened fire on the twisted pile of Tuigan at the edge of the trap. King Azoun's small force surrounded the khahan and his bodyguard. After a brief and fierce combat, Yamun Khahan, "Emperor Of All The World", was dead. He had been killed in single combat with King Azoun of Cormyr himself.

Without Yamun Khahan, the Tuigan's spirit was broken. The Horde was routed, fleeing eastward along the Golden Way and disintegrating into squabbling tribes before they even regained sight of the steppe. Factions developed around General Chanar Ong Kho, the khahan's sons, and other warriors, as each gained or lost support to become the Khahan's successor. The lack of a unifying leader tore the Tuigan horde apart.

The Alliance was not unscathed. Although there were few casualties in the Second Battle of the Golden Way, Torg mac Cei, Ironlord of Earthfast, was killed in the final fighting.

The remainder of the Alliance stayed in Thesk for another month caring for the Tuigan prisoners, making certain the barbarians had left Thesk, and helping where they could to rebuild the devastated kingdom. Eventually Rashemen reported that Thay had withdrawn back across her borders, and the Iron Lord could devote his total attention to eliminating the Tuigan threat. The Army of the Alliance could go home.

Conclusion

The defenders of Faerun won a tremendous victory on the rolling plains of Thesk. Like most tales of life and conflict, however, the story did not end there. The dwarves of Earthfast buried their leader, Torg mac Cei, in a stone cairn at the battle site. The remaining dwarves then marched back to Earthfast, having met their obligations of honor. Although at one time it appeared that the Alliance would bring the somber dwarves into closer contact with the Heartlands, this did not come to pass.

Keep were to establish a new outpost in Thesk, and there they were to remain, despite the Theskan government's best attempts to be rid of them.

The peace with Zhentil Keep persisted, in part because of King Azoun's agreement to leave the Zhentish garrison at Darkhold unmolested for one year. The Zhentish have taken full advantage of this agreement, strengthening their fortifications and ensuring that, when the year is over, Darkhold will be able to take care of itself.

The warriors of the Dales returned home and once again took up the watch against Zhentil Keep. Despite their evil deities, the Zhentarim were true to their agreement and left the Dales unmolested during the crusade. No sooner were the Dalesmen back, however, than the Zhentarim resumed their usual efforts to add the Dales to their growing territory.

King Azoun and the Cormyrian army returned home to a heroes' welcome. All those who participated in the campaign became members of the Order of the Golden Way, and the people of Cormyr have rewarded them in countless ways. King Azoun has also established the Hostels of the Golden Way, where the families of those who fell in the Crusade could get food, shelter, and assistance.

The horse warriors of the steppe exploded into a host of factions and seemed intent on battling one another, rather than their neighbors, for a time. Semphar and Khazari, both satrapies of the Tuigan under Yamun Khahan, strengthened themselves so that the Tuigan yoke could be thrown from their kingdoms.

From a historical perspective, the Horde Wars caused significant changes in the Realms. Faerun and Kara-Tur resumed active communication for the first time in centuries. Trade along the Silk Road became greater than it had been in anyone's lifetime, except perhaps during the long life of the Sage of Shadowdale himself.

The most important change was in the way the Heartlands viewed themselves. Before the Horde War, the individual nations of the Heartlands were content to remain within their own borders, facing their own internal challenges. However, since they have been involved in "Deeds of Greatness," their minds have turned to more ambitious thoughts.

Some whispered that King Azoun would again unite the Heartlands, this time creating a new empire in the heart of Faerun. Others spoke of a crusade against Thay, or perhaps Zhentil Keep. Still others, all too few, spoke of the dangers of overweening pride.

This is a history. It can only show us what has gone before, it cannot predict what will come after. If empire is the destiny of the Heartlands, this history will become cautionary, telling the tale of one would be "Emperor of All The World."

BATTLESYSTEM™ Statistics

The following information will provide AD&D® game BATTLESYSTEM™ statistics for the armies and leaders of the Horde War. These may be used in a miniatures campaign as a troop list, and in a role playing campaign as a basis for portraying the participants in the Horde War in game terms.

The numerical abilities given in this section are typical for the armies listed. Of course, a specific unit could easily have different ratings than those provided here. Players will have to do their own conversions for specific units.

The basic listing for each troop type provides the five principal ratings—attack dice, armor rating, hits, morale rating and movement allowance. Below that line are given any additional information which applies, such as range of missile weapons, whether the unit is regular or irregular, and so forth.

It should be noted that in standard BATTLESYSTEM™ games all figures (except leaders and commanders) represent 10 soldiers. Thus, a troop of 1,000 soldiers would be represented by 100 figures on the tabletop.

Some of the battles of the Horde War involved tens of thousands of soldiers, and would require thousands of figures to represent. You may wish to use a scale of 100 soldiers to the figure instead. Should you do this,

the following special rules should be used:

1) In order to keep the battle in scale, divide all movement rates and missile ranges by 3. Thus, a figure with a move of 24" would move 8" on the tabletop, and a commander with a CD of 15" would have an effective CD of 5".

2) Although commanders are still used to establish which units are under command, individual combatants (such as leader figures) are not counted as doing damage when fighting in mass formation. However, heroes can still challenge one another to Heroic Combat and such combats are resolved normally.

Goblin Skirmishers: AD 6; AR 8; Hits 1; ML 11 ; MV 6"; Hated foes: dwarves, gnomes; Goblins are hampered in daylight, which causes them a -1 modifier to morale and gives any opponent a -1 benefit to AR when being attacked.

Heavy Human Infantry: AD 8; AR 6; Hits 1; ML 12; MV 6"

Gnoll Infantry: AD 8; AR 7; Hits 2; ML 11; MV 9"; Irregular only; Chaotic; Hated foe: minotaurs; The gnolls' brittle morale is directly related to their hyena origin. Gnolls must check morale during every step in which the unit loses even a single figure, and at any other time when a morale check would be required. However, gnollish savagery is reflected in the creatures' ability to function as berserkers—gaining double attack dice in melee combat after they have made a positive morale check. Legion of Cyric (undead legion): AD 8; AR 9; Hits 2; ML N/A; MV 6"; Irregular only; Cause horror, -1; Zombies not only move slowly, they have poor reactions. Any opponent attacking the Legion of Cyric in melee always attacks first.

Light Cavalry: AD 8; AR 8; Hits 2; ML 12; MV 24"

Heavy Cavalry: AD 8; AR 8; Hits 3; ML 14; MV 15"

Griffin Legion: AD 12; AR 6; Hits 4; ML 11; MV 12" /30"; Maneuverability Class C; The Griffon Legion is treated as flying cavalry; they can charge, receiving the appropriate bonuses—they are still not capable of regular formation. Note also that many of the riders of the Griffon Legion are mages, albeit weak ones. Each figure (representing 10 riders) can cast 2 1st level, 2 2nd level, 2 3rd level, and 1 4th level spells. In addition, a figure may cast up to 2 spells in the same turn.

Legion of Bones: AD 10; AR 8; Hits 2; ML n/a; MV 18"; Because of the monsters' fleshless forms, any hits inflicted on them by stabbing or slashing weapons (including arrows, spears, swords, axes, etc.) are divided in half (round up) before rolling armor checks for the skeletons. For example, if an archer unit inflicts 9 hits on a skeleton unit, the skeletons only make armor checks for 5 hits.

Wizard's Circle: AD 6; AR 6; Hits 4; ML 14; MV 12"; A Wizard's Circle represents a Red Wizard and his apprentices combining their magical powers. Their concentration is so great that despite the power of the wizard, he cannot be used as a leader on the battlefield (thus no CD). A Wizard's Circle can cast four 1st, three 2nd, three 3rd, and two 4th level spells because the combining ritual increases the number of spells.

Valerios Theokillos, Tharchion of Pyrados: AD 10; AR 4; Hits 5; CD 11" ; MV 12"

Zulkir Szass Tam: AD 8; AR 3; Hits 8; CD 12"; MV 18"; Can only command wizardly or undead troops. Szass Tam can cast 2 1st, 2 2nd, 2 3rd, 2 4th, 2 5th, and 2 6th level spells.

Rashemen

Berserkers: AD 6; AR 8; Hits 1; ML 12; MV 12"; A fang of Rashemen in good order when using jhuild (Rashemen firewine), earns double AD when engaged in melee combat from the fanatical intensity of its attack. (This is not cumulative with a charge benefit; x2 AD is the greatest bonus the unit can receive.) Rashemen berserkers are exempt from morale checks until the unit is reduced to 50% or less of its original size; thereafter it checks normally.

Witch: AD 8; AR 5; Hits 5; CD 7"; MV 24"; Cause horror, -1, range 5"; The mighty witches of Rashemen can each use 2 1st, 2 2nd, 2 3rd, 1 4th, and 1 5th level spell. Note that unlike the Circles of Thay, each figure represents only a single mage.

Chieftain: AD 10; AR 4; Hits 4; CD 8" ; MV 9"

Cormyrian Infantry: AD 8; AR 7; Hits 2; ML 12; MV 9"; Second rank can attack in melee Cormyrian Volunteer Irregulars: AD 6; AR 9; Hits 1; ML 10; MV 12"; Irregular only Noble Cavalry: AD 8; AR 5; Hits 4; ML 15; MV 12"

War Wizard: AD 4; AR 7; Hits 3; CD 5"; MV 12"; Cause horror, -1, range 3"; A typical Cormyrian war wizard can cast 2 1st, 2 2nd, and 1 3rd level spell.

King Azoun: AD 10; AR 3; Hits 10; CD 20"; MV 9"

Farl Bloodaxe: AD 10; AR 4; Hits 6; CD 12"; MV 9"

Horde Campaign

This is the first in a series of reference books aimed at the recreationist. In these pages are the battles fought by Yamun Khahan, Batu Min Ho, and all the others caught up in the sweeping Horde campaigns. The strategies and disposition of forces are set forth in plain terms. Sixteen color plates show the arms and armor used by each army. BATTLESYSTEM[™] Rules statistics allow for the complete recreation of each battle fought in this massive campaign. Ten interior maps delineate the terrain and forces involved in each major confrontation. With this book you, too, can fight from the edges of far eastern Kara-Tur across the steppes into the heartlands of Faerun. Whether you wish to replay the wars in precise detail, or try your own strategies, this is the book that will help you achieve your goal.

BEDINE LANGUAGE AND NAMES

Names

Bedine do not use surnames; if there is a possibility of confusion between two individuals of the same tribe, who share the same name, nickname, "son of," or "wife of" designation is added to one man's name by the elders, in everyday speech—or, if the two men concerned are of greatly differing ages, "the Young" and "the Old" may also be used. Here follow some sample Bedine names; roll 1d20 to select a name at random. A better practice is to select names from the list, and make up different names that "sound right" (such as Brudrin, Fuulam, and Shariim, for men, and Alasharra, and Tsethli, for women) as often as possible.

A Few Words In Uloushinn

The Bedine tongue, called "Uloushinn" by sages, though the Bedine themselves seem to have no name for it, is old, and boasts a large vocabulary. A few words are given here, for the use of DMs in "spicing up" the speech of encountered Bedine. This is not a grammatical guide to Uloushinn.

aba— a loose-fitting robe; the basic garment of the Bedine, worn by both sexes. Over it, a dark (usually black), billowing over-robe (called a jellaba or "night cloak") is worn at night, for warmth and concealment

akeud— a blood-oath

akh— brother

akuna— a promise, debt owed through an agreement or obligation to the dead amarat— a curving horn, hand-carved and worn at the belt. Its brazen tones carry on the desert winds, to cry warning to other Bedine

'ali— high

'amiq— deep

ard— land, territory, hunting-ground

'arif— know

asad— lion

asan— (temporary) shelter or refuge

'atshan— thirsty

'avn— spring (of water)

aziir— scimitar

aziirla— killing, murder (however done)

'azim— great (in power, rank)

ba'id— away, far away

bakia— a wooden cup, used for drinking water or tea

berrani— stranger

bi— prefix, meaning: 'at,' 'in,' or 'with'

bir— well (of water)

dahab— gold

da'if— weak

darab— strike, hit

difa— code of behavior, decree or judgement

djebira— a saddlebag

dukhhkhan— smoke

el— lord (or sir) a title of respect preceding the person's name e.g. "El Zorah," although it actually as something close to "The") fadda— silver

fagr— dawn, day-break

fahim— understand

fakha— fruit

gab— bring (a thing)

gazma (plural: gizam)— boot gedid— new

gemel (plural: gimal)— camel

ghani— rich

ghashim— foolish

ghazal (plural: ghozlan)— gazelle

gooud (plural: goouds)— mature camel (not to be used to describe any other sort of camel; this means a full-grown, trained riding variety, the 'top quality' animal)

gu'an— hungry

habl— rope, tether

haddad— smith

haddir— bring (a person)

hadid— iron, steel (weapons-metal)

hagar— stone

haouadjejs— elaborately decorated box-shaped camel-litters used only by the wealthiest Bedine families, for their women and baggage to travel in, in (relative) comfort

haram— forbidden

harr— hot (to be)

hat— give (to me)

hawa— air

heya— up (also "get up")

hiram (plural: ihrima)— blanket

ibn awa— jackal

ibn haram— rascal (= son of thieves)

ibriq— jug

ihteres— be careful

inzil— dismount get (or go) down (from there) jambiya— a curved, double-edged dagger, worn in a belt scabbard by both sexes (customarily the only weapon of a woman) jellaba— a "night cloak," or heavy camel's wool robe, worn by Bedine over their abas kalam— talk

kasar— break (kesser: broke; kessrin: broken)

kebir— large

keffiyeh (plural: keffiyehs)— a head-cloth, usually white to soak up as little of the sun's heat as possible; worn by Bedine when outside their tents khabbir— tell

khowwan (plural: khowwans)— tribe;

"people of..."

kitab (plural: kutub)— book

ksur— fortress

kuerabiche— a shoulder-sack, or carry-

INTRODUCTION: ANAUROCH, THE GREAT DESERT

When we learned their aims, it was too late. We could not strike down what had been done without laying waste to all Toril. Too high a price, we judged—and left them the harsh sands they had created. But for humans, memory is a failing thing, and today we see a savage desert that makes men as cruel and keen-sharp as swordblades, or leaves their bones to bleach in the sun. Not even legends remember fair Netheril as it truly was; folk think of us as decadent, idle, wholly evil necromancers.

I wonder how, much else of the history we hold to be true is twisted thus?

—Rhaugilath “the Ageless,” Lich-King of Orbedal
Of the Fall of Netheril

To folk in the Realms today, Anauroch (pronounced: “An-OAR-ock-hh”) is a fierce, unconquerable desert, a vast, sundering shield between the Sword Coast North and the Moonsea North. It forces trade and travel into long, torturous overland routes between the westernmost ports on the Sea of Fallen Stars (chiefly Westgate, Suzail, and Teziir) to Amn, Baldur’s Gate, and Waterdeep, mostly by way of Iriaebor and the River Chionthar.

These strategic places are enriched by the endless stream of caravans, but merchants have always sought shorter, cheaper routes, often braving the “flat” but harsh Great Desert.

Always? Not so, say the sages: little more than five hundred years ago, Anauroch held little sand, and several verdant, wealthy human realms—with lakes and merchant ships of their own. At least one of these lands, Netheril, was then the height of human achievement in magic and the arts.

What happened to so suddenly and thoroughly sweep all this away? DMs will find the answer in “The Secret of Anauroch” chapter; players perusing these pages should resist the beckoning temptation to peek at it, so as to fully enjoy the perils that lurk in Anauroch—and even reach out to those who sneak along the Desertsedge.

Most folk of Faerun see Anauroch as a scorching waste of sand, “The Wall That Near Divides The Heartlands,” a good place never to go near. What can be found in a barren desert, to be worth the dangers of the trip?)

Most folk, as is often the case, are wrong. The first things Elminster said of Anauroch was that it is not a natural desert, and is not all hot sands. Anauroch today is three deserts: the hot, sandy place most imagine it all to be, called “the Sword” by sages because of the fierce human Bedine nomads who dwell there; a higher, wind-scoured land of bare rock, called “the Plain of Standing Stones,” though very little of it is a flat plain: and in the north, a vast, rift-scored ice sheet overlying bedrock, known as “the High Ice.” These three areas were once very different. All held proud, rich cities of elves, men, dwarves, and others; cities that may still stand, buried or merely hidden by the vast desolation, their riches waiting. Elminster says Anauroch is “the largest—and probably wealthiest-treasure-house in all Toril.” Even those who agree can show fell, treasures recovered from it, but when this was pointed out, Elminster merely shrugged and held up an ornate, hand-sized carving of a spired castle. Strolling to the door of his ramshackle tower, he tossed it into the air, whispered a secret word—and in the meadow beyond his pool, a huge castle of black obsidian suddenly stood, tall and splendid and very real.

“When too many guests come calling to sleep here,” the Old Mage of Shadowdale said mildly, “I always have this; one of the least powerful magics of the Netherese, but the only one I’ve found in Anauroch. I haven’t much time to go wandering about there, mind—this was just lying on a table, in an old house half-buried in sand. Where?” He smiled, and waved northwards. “Oh—just out there.” This book explores all three regions of Anauroch, for those who want to go “just out there.”

A WHIRLWIND TOUR OF ANAUROCH

The accompanying map provides a quick overview of Anauroch. Folk of Faerun have a tendency to think of the Great Desert simply as an empty but impassable place-and explorers interested in it may hear lots of wild tales about its dangers, but will find almost nothing in the way of hard information about an area that is at least as big as the Inner Sea! Hence this guide. At a glance, one can see that Anauroch has been divided into three regions: the Sword, the Plain of Standing Stones, and the High Ice.

These vast areas (which are admittedly artificial divisions, made by human sages for their own convenience) vary widely in their dangers and character, and are detailed in separate chapters of this sourcebook. Their characteristics are summarized here.

The Sword

The southernmost band of Anauroch is a desert of sand dunes, scorching hot by day, and icy cold at night. Its winters are as harsh as those of the other lands in the North-but in summer, it is a land of killing heat. The most populous part of Anauroch, it is the area most visited by outsiders (usually human merchants trying to find a shorter trade-route from the Moonsea cities to the Sword Coast lands, or adventurers seeking the lost riches of long-buried kingdoms). To them, the hot sands resemble the Dust Desert of Raurin, and other, more southerly deserts of the Realms-and because all most folk elsewhere in the Realms know of Anauroch is what such travelers tell of it, most in the Realms think Anauroch is all one Great Sand Sea.

This sandy region is certainly the area of most interest to outsiders-partly for its strategic importance (to those seeking a trade-route, or a way past a certain realm, or an invasion route into a land), and partly because of The Lost Kingdoms that lie beneath it, whose buried ruins are widely believed to hold great riches and magic. (Something of the present-day truth of these fallen realms is explored in the chapter entitled "The Lost Kingdoms.")

One might expect, given the ready supply of slaves employed by the goblin races and some human peoples, that The Sand Sea would have been dug up into a succession of mounds of sand between huge quarry-pits, long ago, searching for this lost wealth.

Almost every year, some daring adventurers do venture into the sands to seek their fortunes-but large-scale mining has never succeeded.

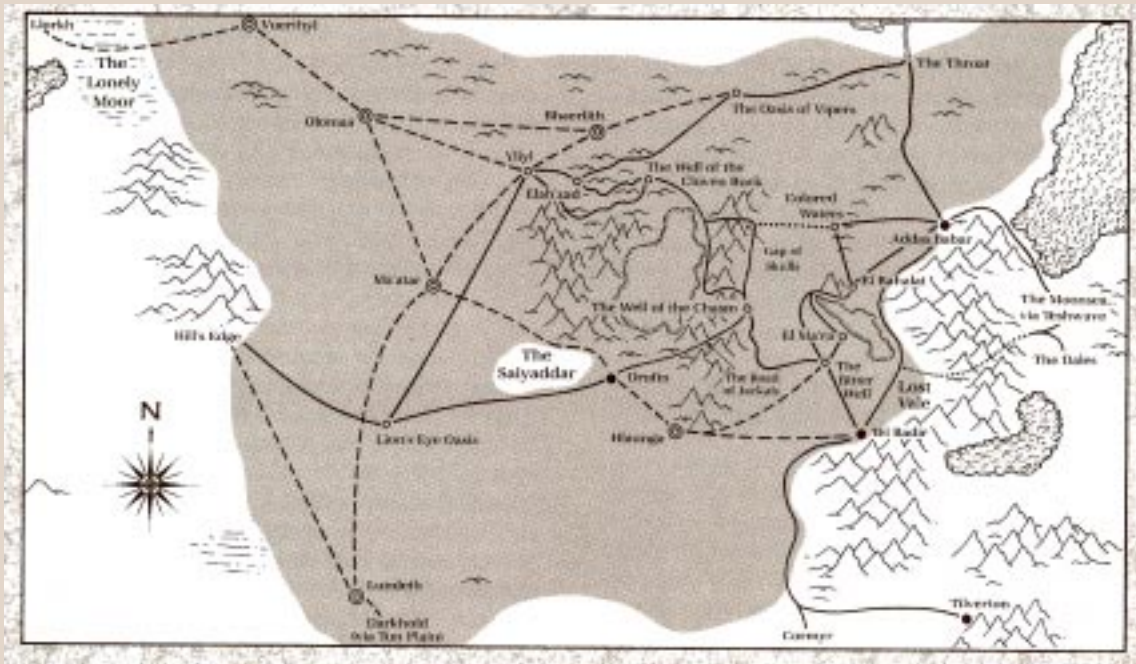

It fails underground because dwarves and others who try to enter by underground ways are never heard from again. Something (or a lot of somethings) slays them. The tunnels known to exist are ancient ways, and come up in the fiercely-defended elven hold of Evereska, the mountains of Tethyamar, and at various hidden places in the Stonelands.

It fails on or above the surface for two reasons: the harsh conditions (both the elements and monsters; the mountains that ring Anauroch are home to many wyverns and dragons, who customarily hunt for prey over the sands), and the Bedine.

The Bedine (described later in this book) are fierce, nomadic human tribes. Although they fear "sorcery," some among them are masters of desert magic, and their fearlessness, warlike nature, and expert knowledge of the desert make them deadly foes, in Anauroch. It is their ways (raiding both each other and any outsiders who venture into the sands they roam) that have given the sandy southernmost region of Anauroch its colloquial name: "The Sword." The Sword stretches from the midst of The Lonely Moor in the west to the northern end of the Border Forest in the east, and from west to south to east (ignoring mountain ranges and the broken Desertsedge borderlands) borders on the Sword Coast "backlands" (once the dwarven realm of Delzoun, in the north, and the human realm of Netheril, south of that), the elven fortress-realm of Evereska, and areas that once made up the dwarven realm of Oghrann: the human settlements of the River Reaching Highlands, the Zhentarim-controlled Sunset Mountains area, and the nomad-roamed Tun Plain.

Then it touches on the kingdom of Cormyr (through the Goblin Marches and the Stonelands, which Cormyr has always claimed but never really ruled), the independent Dalelands (including Lost Vale, the ruins of now-vanished Tarkhaldale), the long-vanished dwarven realm of Tethyamar (now peaks roamed by goblins, orcs, and bugbears), and the Border Forest. The Goblin Marches is an ill-defined area of crags, drumlins, and bogs, cloaked with many thorny thickets-and home to goblins, orcs, and kobolds.

It lies below the heights of the Stonelands, which is a broken region of pine forests, ridges, tors, and tangled ravines that surrounds the Stormhorns mountain range, and runs east of it almost as far as Shadow Gap.

Most merchants reach the dwellers in the desert by means of a narrow, long-dry river valley that divides the broken heights of the Stonelands from Alauthwaerd, "the Watcher," southernmost peak of the Desertsouth Mountains. This valley, Raudilauth (which means "Desertdoor" in an ancient tongue; but the language and its speakers are forgotten, but the meaning has survived) links the overland trade-road through Shadow Gap with the lands of the D'tarig (a race described in the "Other Peoples of Anauroch" chapter).

Let us see the Sword briefly through Bedine eyes. The Bedine know that the sand sea where they live is vast indeed-and although a hard land, it is alive. Many plants, insects, birds, and animals live on or burrow under the endless dunes-and there is a dark, dangerous world lurking below: the catacombs of the Buried Ones. The meager pastures of Anauroch support few men and camels: in a year of riding from pasture to pasture, a Bedine tribe might meet as many as two other tribes. In this harsh land, such meetings are seldom friendly.

Most Bedine know that the desert gives way to a wind-scoured land of barren rock on all sides. In some direction-probably to the south-this must give way to areas settled by men for occasionally non-Bedine "paleskins" or "bonehide" men come into the desert. These intruders (most Bedine use the term "outlanders") seldom live long.

The Desertsedge

In actuality, the edges of the Sword rise into rocky foothills, dotted with scrub plants and marked by caves, breakneck ravines carved out by small, rushing streams (that plunge down into the desert, where they soon vanish, drunk down by the thirsty sands). This uneasy border area is lashed by winds and frequent storms (where hot and cold air clash), and roamed by many fearsome monsters. It is known as the Desertsedge (or "Desert's Edge," depending on the cartographer), and aside from temperature, varies little from the northern- and easternmost explored mountains of the Sword Coast lands, to the infamous Stonelands, to The Glittering Snows.

The Plain of Standing Stones

The middling region of Anauroch begins where the sands of Anauroch give way to bare rock, and rises in a plateau-a plateau broken by so many rifts, and sculpted into so many spires and fantastic crags that its name of "plain" is a bitter travelers' joke.

The "Plain" is considered to end where the ice begins: the icy cliffs that are the southernmost edge of the massive glacial ice sheets that make up the High Ice.

This wind-lashed, cold, rocky region is known for its mineral wealth and many monsters. Comparatively few folk know that it also holds hidden valleys, many of which have water, rich meadows, and even support large wild herds of crag sheep. The outlaws, dwarven bands, human and hobgoblin barbarian tribes, and ogre, hill giant, and verbeeg groups who dwell here don't welcome intruders—except as food or victims.

The Plain is bordered on the west by the "Frozen Sea" (discussed in the chapter on "The High Ice" in this book), which runs down the Desertsedge as far as the northern Lonely Moor. On the eastern side of Anauroch, there is no real boundary between it and the Tortured Land—except that the latter holds far more moisture, and with it both wind-sculpted ice and many more plants. Where the plants end and bare rock begins, going west, travelers consider Anauroch to have begun. Few stay long enough to map or even get a good look at the border area; it is a cold and savage wilderness of marauding monsters.

The High Ice

Least known of the three regions of Anauroch, this glacial wilderness has no known (as yet) northern border—it is said to stretch on forever. Although a traveler would search in vain for trees, there is a surprising amount of life here, growing scant inches upwards from the ice and rock. Here yeti, remorhaz, white dragons, and other chill horrors reign over a frigid land that few humans have ever seen—and fewer want to.

THE SECRET OF ANAUROCH

The name “Anauroch” once meant just what now called the High Ice: a rift-scarred glacial ice sheet, that gave way (as one traveled south) to rocky uplands where many wild sheep roamed, and thence to thick forests where stags reigned and dryads dwelt. Those uplands, now scoured to bare rock, are known today as the Plain of Standing Stones.

South of them were rich, verdant human kingdoms and independent cities—small, but governed by long years of peace and plenty and bustling with trade. These, whose very names are forgotten by most in the Realms today, are the Lost Kingdoms (and are described in the chapter of that name, later in these pages).

That was less than five hundred years ago—but since then, the meadows and forests of the wild uplands have been swept away, and the woods, farms, lakes and cities of the Lost Kingdoms all buried in the howling sands of the Sword.

Impossible, sages who know little of magic might say—and have. No desert comes out of nowhere, to cover so much of Faerun, so fast,

True enough; no natural desert grows so large, so quickly. A magical change, however, can be as sudden and violent as its maker has the power and will to cause.

The Phaerimm

In caverns under the rich human kingdoms, in an area of the Underdark known as the Phaerlin, dwelt a race of ancient, fell beings who had long worked at mastering magic to defend themselves against the predators of the Realms Below. This race, known as the Phaerimm (they are fuller detailed in an entry in the “Monsters of Anauroch” chapter of this book), are foul and dangerous to human eyes, but they work magic as dragons do, and in aggressiveness and intelligence are not very different from humans.

The Phaerimm thought of the area as their own realm and ignored those who dwelt on the surface (in which they had little interest). That changed when the human residents of one of those surface territories rose suddenly in magical strength, to challenge (however unwittingly) the power of the Phaerimm. Phaerimm magics were interfered with, or destroyed. Magic (in the hands of the human wizards of Netheril) was used to slay encountered Phaerimm “monsters” as the humans began to explore, mine, and alter the underways, seeking gems and metal-ores.

They found death. The most powerful Phaerimm worked together to develop a mighty spell that would destroy the things that humans lived on: the lifedrain.

The Lifedrain

This spell was cast, and cast again, by brave Phaerimm venturing onto the surface by night, over all the lands of men that menaced the realm of the Phaerimm. Once it was set in motion, the Phaerimm hurled themselves into a spellwar, attacking Netherese wizards, trying to steal or destroy their spellbooks, and trying above all to disrupt their researches, thin their ranks, and keep them too busy fighting to have time enough to learn the secrets of the mightiest Phaerimm spell—or to have time to act against it.

The Phaerimm prevailed. As the well-protected Phaerimm struck magically at each Netherese wizard and every simple everyday magic practiced by the Netherese, and the realm erupted in ceaseless chaos, the drying effects of thousands of lifedrain spells spread. Castles were made uninhabitable by bold Phaerimm casting the spells within their liralls—and the folk of Netheril who could not work magic were slaughtered and terrorized by the score in the magical fray. The Phaerimm did not care what happened to the surface, and lashed out with spells or laid them in waiting as traps, freely.

The bewildered Netherese fought back—but they had become a decadent, refined, wealthy race of self-interested, independent individuals, with interests all over Faerun, and all too little time to spare for anything save what they chose to spend it on. The Netherese had lost the need to stand and fight together, and were given no time to regain it. As the magical onslaught continued, the desolation of the lifedrain spells continued, driving folk from their homes and farms. Dust storms lashed Netheril for the first time, and displaced beasts of all sorts, from harmless scurrying things to dangerous monsters, roamed the land that was left, desperate and bewildered, quick to lash out at the disorganized humans.

The Netherese began to flee. First the common folk, with no leadership or salvation from the wizards in sight, little food and water, and the land risen against them, fled with what they could carry, south and west, to Amn, the Sword Coast, Irieabor, Cormyr, and the cities all about the Sea of Fallen Stars.

Then the mages left, deserted by those who fed them and provided for their needs, and in most cases intent on their own researches and aims over everything else. They scattered all over the known North, settling alone in a thousand remote valleys and hidden fastnesses. Large bands of them flew far to the south in the magical flying ships devised a decade earlier, to found the wizards' realm of Halruaa.

The desolation continued; east of Netheril, a desert formed as the Narrow Sea dried up, and winds carried away the dried-out soil. This devastation was viewed with alarm by the elves of Evereska and the Elven Court, who-like the Netherese wizards before them—could find no way to check the advance of the spreading desert.

After this foul magic destroyed the land's flora and fauna, and stripped it of the ability to retain water and grow new things, the winds and the harsh climate did the rest, creating the Great Sand Sea we know now.

The Sharn Act

Fortunately for all surface life on Faerun, the Phaerimm were not the only magically-powerful race who dwelt in the North. To the west of Phaerimm territory, across a vastness of "wild" Underdark, were the tunnels claimed then by the Sharn (from about Secomber to the Sword Coast, in a narrow region centered on the channel of the lower Delimbiyr, reaching about as far north as Sarcrag). A mysterious, whimsical spellcasting race, the Sharn are sometimes encountered in the great dungeon of UnderMountain today, and are detailed in their own Monstrous Compendium entry in The Ruins of UnderMountain boxed set.

Most Sharn only dabble in magic; beyond personal abilities (detailed in their monster entry), they command only what magic they can seize in the form of items, potions, and scrolls. A few Sharn, however, study magic, and these can rise to rival the most powerful human wizards in magical might.

Elminster warns that Sharn wizards avoid human contact, and should not be pursued if they are inadvertently discovered. In game terms, most range in power from about the strength of a 19th level wizard to a match for a 26th level mage, most employ magics not known to humans, and some seem able to cast two separate spells in a round! It is certain, however, that the magical efforts of certain Sharn, five hundred years ago, saved Faerun for all surface-dwellers—and that the Sharn have made no move to rule or even influence what they saved since. The Sharn wizards checked the advance of the Phaerimm-invoked devastation with newly devised, awesomely powerful spells of their own.

These unidentified spells halted the advance of lifedrain spells, and somehow confined the Phaerimm within the area they had already devastated. The Sharn took no further interest in the Phaerimm, and windswept, desolate Anauroch today remains the prison of this proud, terrible race.

The Phaerimm, Now

Like all caged beasts, the Phaerimm want out of their underground prison. They are working tirelessly to overcome the Sharn spells that bind them in a certain area of the Underdark, using magically-influenced agents (laertis, Zhentarim who foolishly venture into their reach, and far worse creatures) to reach out beyond their prison. These agents seek out and bring back whatever magic they can seize, and spread rumors of rich treasure, to attract humans to Anauroch. The Phaerimm await the prey that their agents send-waiting to devour, enslave, and interrogate, in hopes of learning ways to defeat the Sharn magic.

More details of current Phaerimm life, aims, and affairs are given in a later chapter of this hook, "The Phaerimm,"

Restoring Anauroch

Beings who want to destroy the desert conditions of Anauroch will find that even the most powerful spells will not prevail against life-drain effects until the Phaerimm are gone. Even then, expunging those deadly magics will necessitate great amounts of magical power (perhaps involving the sacrifice of mortal wizards' lives, magical items and artifacts, and perhaps even divine aid).

The result will be large "magic-dead" areas, their effects as described in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Adventures sourcebook. They will make restoration of living things all the more slow and backbreaking: water, grasses, and all must be brought in by hand, with weather magic (to bring rains and stop soil-blowing winds) available only on the borders. Decades—even centuries-of work will be needed to make the desert only a memory.

BEDINE SOCIETY

Enslave the Bedine? They would find it easier to cage the wind.

Bhadla of the D'tarig,
from The Parched Sea

The Bedine are always more concerned with vengeance than with what is right-and always is far too often for any folk to live long, or live untwisted.

Elminster of Shadowdale
(interview for this sourcebook)

The Bedine do not plan everything out in advance.

Ruha of the Bedine,
from The Parched Sea

Few in the Realms have even heard of the Bedine of Anauroch. Fewer still know the true nature of Bedine society.

Legends speak of fierce men who dwell in the dry, sun-baked sands of Anauroch, swathed in long robes against the sun. These ruthless men ride camels, force their women to cover their faces, and wage endless war on each other with scimitars, for possession of camels and women (who may change hands hundreds of times in their brief, brutal lives). The Bedine hate magic, and kill all wizards they discover. When they need magical aid, they call on the gods-and often, the gods answer them directly.

More reliable sources (such as sages) tend to believe that the Bedine live in nomadic tribes, ruled by rival sheikhs, and that their male-dominated society is warlike, hardened by the harsh desert life. They are experts on living in conditions that swiftly kill those not used to the perils of Anauroch. These Bedine are cruel, backward people (after all, they choose to live in a harsh desert, and fear and avoid using magic). They dwell in tents, wear loose, flowing robes and cover their heads against the sun, cover the faces of all the women, herd camels, and butcher each other (and, with even more enthusiasm, any intruders unlucky enough to come within their reach) with scimitars. Except when they are fighting, Bedine move slowly, and are very lazy.

What more can be learned, with the aid of Elminster's library, Harper contacts, and his years of snoop—er, exploring the Realms?

The Nature of The Bedine

An outsider's view of any people is often distorted. This is especially true of the Bedine, for few folk of Faerun know enough of harsh desert conditions to understand why Bedine are as they are, and do as they do.

Bedine are brown-skinned, proud, warlike humans, who live a nomadic, tribal existence in the Sword, the hot "sand sea" which makes up the southernmost part of Anauroch. They dwell in tribes who will freely share food and water with those in need, but who otherwise carry on endless, deadly rivalries.

The largest known Bedine tribe is about three hundred men, women, and children strong. There are over a hundred Bedine tribes; some of them have never even heard of each other, let alone seen each other in the vastness of the Great Desert.

Most Bedine have brown eyes, and almost everyone has black or brown hair: blonde hair, blue eyes, and white skin are great rarities, marking outsiders, or "outlander blood." The apparent laziness of Bedine is due to a practice of wise desert-dwellers: to avoid excessive water loss (sweating) or "the heat-faints" (sunstroke), never run in the heat of the day. To shield themselves from the baking sun, Bedine of both sexes wear loose robes, known as abas, cover their heads, and dwell in tents.

Women of almost all Bedine tribes cover their bodies (except for hands, feet, and eyes), unless they are alone, or with only their husbands, in their tents (see "Customs," later in this chapter).

Most Bedine consider honor more important than life. They see much death, and believe the gods measure Bedine by their behavior in life. Among the Bedine, ending a man's life is not considered much different than killing any other animal (save that a man's family may avenge his death, so one must be more prudent in killing).

This pride and ruthlessness is balanced by a pragmatism usually voiced by the harsh tongues and long memories of the elder women of a tribe—an attitude reflected by Ruha, heroine of The Parched Sea, when she says, "You do what you must to survive, and I will do the same." Bedine live in the Mother Desert by choice, and understand little of other lands, or those who come from them. How could other places be better—or different—than the great Mother Desert? Tales of vast stretches of water, of trees so thickly grown that one cannot see through them, stretching for a day's walk or more—all of these may well be purest fancy. If they do exist, they must be the twisted result of magic, or the work of evil gods, turning the land into an unnatural state. A place without sand and the fierce heat of At'ar (the sun, worshipped by Bedine as a goddess; Bedine religion is discussed in "The Gods of Anauroch" chapter) is a strange place, where things are not as they should be, and men who dwell there become perverted and soft. Bedine dealings with outlanders (see "Bedine Dealings With Others," below) reinforce this belief; the outlanders they encounter tend to be gentle, foolish in judgement and in the ways of the desert, and to trust overmuch in cursed magic (see "Magic and the Bedine," later in this chapter).

Something of the character of Bedine can be gleaned by quoting some of their sayings: "A careful warrior will make a wise elder." "It is honorable to help a stranger, but remember that no friend is ever a stranger" "The enemy of my enemy is a friend." "If strangers speak with the honeyed tongues of bees, beware: their bite may carry the venom of the scorpion." "I would rather die with my enemy's blood on my blade, than live a slave?" "With Kozah's wind, we drove the enemy before us like gazelles before the lion' A Bedine compliment: "You think like a camel thief."

Rank, Status, and Rule

Bedine live in tribes, ruled by sheikhs. In Bedine society, men rule and dominate. In many tribes, a man may have more than one wife at a time (so long as he can support every woman he claims as his own).

The organization of tribes varies, but most work something like this: the word of the sheikh is law, so long as he stays within fairly strict limits of "tradition," which outline a code of what a Bedine (sheikh or child) can and cannot do.

Important decisions are made by a council of the tribe's elders (in practice, these are almost always exclusively male warriors of the tribe, but older women exert much influence on their mates, and their words are often voiced by their husbands in council). There are typically six or so elders, but in a large tribe there may be twice that many. A council, traditionally held in the sheikh's tent and guarded so that women and strangers camped with the tribe cannot get close enough to hear, is usually one long-drawn-out argument.

If the elders cannot decide on a matter, the sheikh's duty is to decide for all. The sheikh's word is law, so long as he breaks none of the important traditions of the Bedine (these rules by which all live include, for example, the requirements that water must be given to the thirsty, and that oaths must be kept). Non-Bedine guests, at the sheikh's option, may be exempt from some Bedine traditions—such as a warriors' challenge: a fight to the death over possession of a woman.

The sheikh's ultimate threat to secure obedience to his will is banishment from the tribe. If a sheikh uses this unwisely, the tribe will dissolve, as all who disagree with him leave. More than one sheikh has been left alone (or accompanied only by family members or a few loyal retainers) after misjudging the extent of his authority or the wisdom of his judgements. A good sheikh always thinks first of the welfare of the tribe -but that phrase has been the refuge of many a foolish, indecisive, or overcautious sheikh, down the long, dry desert years.

Most sheikhs function as generals in battle, directing their warriors from a vantage point, or from the rear, or in the center of their forces-but many have been known to lead charges (often dying in the process, as every enemy warrior wants to be the first to slay a rival sheikh, and risks all to bring down the enemy).

For men, success in Bedine society is measured in honor (battle-prowess), and wealth is measured in camels-or wives. A woman's status is linked to that of her husband, augmented by any additional influence she may have in the decisions of a tribe due to special regard for her, or for knowledge she possesses. For example, a woman who has fought well as a warrior will be regarded more highly by male warriors than other women; a woman who carries the memories and desert experience of great age is given more respect than even the most desirable young woman of the tribe—and a sheikh facing a beast he has never seen, or a problem he has never faced, will defer to the judgement of any woman of the tribe who knows more about the matter at hand.

Bedine Dealings With Others

The Bedine are concerned with survival; their daily existence is a long struggle with the desert, with a Bedine victory being a chance to see the sun rise over the desert tomorrow.

Most Bedine know that Anauroch is vast indeed, and gives way in the north to a land of hard-baked earth and wind-scoured stone. Used to desert ways and life, they believe that this Stone Sea is more lifeless and desolate than the sands of the Sword. Few Bedine have ever ventured far into it-and even fewer have seen the world outside the desert: the Lands of Many, Many Men and Savage Beasts. Bedine know that such a place exists, because the various light-skinned and strangely-garbed intruders must come from somewhere-but most Bedine would flatly deny that any land is water-rich enough that people could always dwell in one spot, farm crops from the land as well as pasture animals, have enough water to waste it in ornamental fountains or to bathe freely, live amongst trees so plentiful as to block one's sight-or could be as numerous as the intruders say; if hundreds of Bedine ever lived crowded together in a space as big as a large dune, they would soon all perish for lack of food and water-or slay each other in desperate bids to gain these necessities for themselves.

Bedine tend to judge other lands by the outlanders who have come to Anauroch—who tend to be desperate outlaws or reckless adventurers, schemers with plans of their own for the Bedine (such as the ruthless Zhentarim and the grasping D'tarig), or lost and feeble madmen. Few of these berrani know all that much of desert ways, and few impress the Bedine. It is not surprising that few Bedine think much of the world beyond Anauroch's sands, or want to see more of it.

Among Bedine who have not fought them, or detected their magic yet, the Zhentarim or "Black Robes" are considered rich, polite, very useful merchants: traders who always seem to have just the things that the Bedine need most. More than one Bedine sheikh has acquired a magnificent scimitar as a gift from a Zhentarim "Lord": a magic weapon that will influence him to evil ways, or even allow a Zhentarim mage to directly guide his actions through mind-altering magic.

The Zhentarim have spent much time, and many lives, in pursuit of the goal of establishing a trade route across the desert, either with Bedine aid, or with the Bedine exterminated or serving Zhentarim masters. (They have been countered by a few brave Harpers and the meddling archmages of Faerun, such as Elminster of Shadowdale, The Simbul of Aglarond, Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun of Waterdeep, Vangerdahast of Cormyr, and the like.) It is a measure of the stubbornness and savage strength of the Bedine that the magically-aided Zhentarim, working against a people largely without magic of their own, have not yet succeeded in making Anauroch their own.

In turn, the Bedine tribes have never gathered enough strength to menace Cormyr, the Dales, Hill's Edge, and other lands and settlements within their reach because they are always fighting among themselves, and because of the harsh desert winters.

Each winter, when the Snowwinds (great, howling fall snowstorms) come, every tribe has to invade one of the subterranean "buried kingdoms," or perish before the fury of winter. Most of these subterranean areas have inhabitants already, or contain predators who are waiting for the expected arrival of mobile food (the Bedines).

Every year, the Bedine must fight these monsters-beholders and worse!-for shelter, or perish. With death at their backs, they succeed more often than not, but the endless warfare saps their strength.

Bedine speak of men they have no respect for as "jackals," and especially despise smooth-tongued, deceitful tricksters or dishonest traders: "jackals with tongues of sugared water." They see enemies among other Bedine tribes as often as among outlanders-and it seems very unlikely that an "oversheikh" or "emir" would ever arise to unite more than a half-dozen tribes. Most tribal army gatherings (as opposed to temporary alliances, or non-aggression-pact friendships) have been made in response to specific "outside" threats, such as Zhentarim-led or lamia attacks, laerti invasions, and the like.

Bedine privately consider outlanders to be strange in their ways, sometimes dangerous, but at heart weaker than Bedine. As a result, they give non-Bedine a chance to surrender where they would not expect a Bedine to do so; men who have no honor cannot lose it. At the same time, Bedine tend to keep an open mind; an outlander can acquire honor in their eyes by his words and deeds.

The Nomadic Existence

Very few places in the Sword are verdant enough to support permanent residents-and the few places that are (such as the oasis of Elah'zad) tend to be held sacred by all Bedine, and the property of no single tribe. Safety is another reason for the nomadic Bedine existence: a tribe that is always in one place can easily be attacked by rival tribes or by predators, who always know exactly where to find them.

A Bedine camp at peace is generally a circle of tents, their entrances facing inward. (A few tribes, such as the Ruwaldi, pitch their tents in a series of parallel rows, the mouths facing inward, to confront each other across a narrow corridor. They believe this more orderly arrangement is more secure.) In all cases, a Bedine camp is a guarded stronghold against desert perils, such as predatory monsters and rival tribes.

In a peaceful camp, the youngest children run about between the tents or wrestle within the circle. The older girls watch them, or help their mothers spin camel's wool, repair carpets, boots, and robes, and do other domestic work-such as gathering camel-dung (consisting almost entirely of very dry plant fibers), which is shaped into patties, and later lit with flint and steel and a little tinder, such as torn cloth, to make cooking-fires. Visitors are welcomed by the women whistling from beneath their veils; this sound also serves to alert everyone in the circle that intruders have arrived.

Young boys practice fighting, stalking, or caring for weapons. Older boys hunt for desert game and scout outside the camp, learning landmarks and watching for intruders.

The men take turns keeping watch, posted all around the encampment, well outside. They carry warning horns to signal danger or their need for aid, and need not be within sight of each other or the camp. Warriors not on watch practice with their weapons, attend to the sheikh and elders, and act as go-betweens, running messages, reports, and comments between the sheikh's tent, the tents of waiting warriors, and those keeping watch. The "waiting warriors" (those sleeping after watch, or too sick or wounded to serve on watch, or merely "extras" not needed at present for such duties) may spend their time in gambling, chatter, and tale-spinning, but they are ready to act as needed, to defend the camp, hunt for game, or carry orders.

A typical Bedine tent is conical, made of thick-woven camel hair, and is held up by wooden tentpoles, with (if the owner is wealthy enough) one or more additional "fly" pieces erected over it, to shade and cool the tent as much as possible, and to deflect blown sand from the tent itself. These extra tent sheets are called "flies" by most merchants of Faerun, but are known as rihba'ids (= "wind-aways") to Bedine. Tents are usually dyed with henna, rubbed coffee-grounds, or other juices, and may be decorated with patterns or (rarely) with tribal symbols.

A tent has a ground-carpet (a sheikh's is very richly colored), to keep as much sand as possible out of everything. Tents are encircled by nabat-shef-habls (= "plant-sword-ropes"), or thorn-girdles. A thorn-girdle is made of thorns, sharp bones, metal scraps too rusty to use, glass shards, sharp twigs, and the like, woven into a string of vines, cloth scraps, or rope. It is put all around the inside of a tent, to keep out scorpions, snakes, and other small desert wanderers.

Inside a Bedine tent, one generally finds cushions to recline and sleep on, blankets, a low table (used while sitting, kneeling, or reclining), and several packs. Most Bedine women set up their ground-loom and get out their cooking pots at every opportunity. Weapons and garments are hung from hooks on the tentpoles—the garments high up or around the edges of the tent, and the weapons within easy reach and near the center.

Most Bedine sleeping tents are triangular in floorplan, the overlapped and sewn "skins" of each tent held up by three upright cornerpoles, linked by a triangle of floorpoles (to which the ground-carpet is hooked, lashed, or pegged) and another triangle of ceilingpoles.

Blankets and garments are sometimes hung to create viewblock "walls" within a tent, to permit some privacy, or to conceal belongings or disorder from visitors. Folk of more than one family (such as a group of unmarried warriors) who are sharing shelter typically sleep six to a tent, their sleeping-carpets in a rough circle with their heads at the center, using kuerabiches as pillows,

The most precious belongings in any tent are the skins of milk and water, hanging from the poles in the center of the tent. When the Bedine are camped at an oasis with a pool or stream of water, as many skins as possible are submerged, to keep them cool and to make the skins themselves thoroughly damp (so as to stay supple, unwithered, and resistant to punctures, a while longer).

Even in summer, nights can be cold. Bedine who lack a tent or time to safely erect one (for example, when raiding another tribe) customarily dig out a little room, walled and roofed with their shields, in a dune. This sleeping-space is known as an asan-shurr, or "sand-shelter." In contrast to the simple sand-shelter is the grand tent of a sheikh. A rich sheikh has a large pavilion, usually made of blond camel's wool. It has several "rooms" separated from each other by tapestries, so that a council can be held in one, cooking can go on in another, and women can meet in a third, with yet another used for storage, another for dressing and wardrobe, and another for private one-to-one discussions, separate from the larger council.

When necessary, a tent is illuminated by butter-lamps, which provide a dim, flickering light. Rich Bedine may tint or scent their lamps with oils, perfumes, and the like, or even have tinted, shuttered glass oil lamps, used for special occasions. A sheikh holding a feast may even have a central smoke-hole open in the roof of his tent, and roast the meat for the feast in a hearth under it, inside the tent. This is a common way for one sheikh to entertain another, when tribes meet in friendly circumstances.

A Bedine encampment is lit by campfires by night. Each campfire resembles a “star” of branches, the fire burning at the center; as they burn away, the branches are carefully pushed inward, toward the center. Those planning to sneak up on an encamped Bedine tribe are warned that the sentries are posted well outside the reach of the firelight, where they can be part of the night, and not targets outlined by the light, or blinded by it.

When Bedine are searching for someone after dark, or an attack is underway, they use torches. These are long, resin-coated branches, deliberately placed to project from the star-shaped campfires, to give an easy handhold, and to keep them from burning away too quickly.

Pulled out, they are used to give light, and thrown as weapons against robed attackers. If their light endangers their wielders, torches are quickly smothered by burying the blazing ends in sand.

Bedine campfires must be constantly tended to prevent their going out, but this is better than wasting any more precious wood than is absolutely necessary. If a fire is left untended during a battle, it often burns outward until all that is left is a circle of ash, encircled by a ring of smoldering woody ends.

Bedine keep camels (the most important desert animal to them, detailed in their own section later in this chapter) and splay-footed, sand-running dogs. Bedine dogs fight off jackals and snakes, warn of intruders with their keen noses and loud barking, and help herd camels; they are not regarded as pets.

Bedine have little medicine (and no magical healing, thanks to their discomfort with magic in general). Their lack of dentistry and hard lives make many of them toothless in middle age and elder years.

Customs

There are too few pages in this book to explore all the complex, half-remembered Bedine customs, which often vary from tribe to tribe, so this section presents a handful of common Bedine customs likely to be useful or important in play.

The first customs to affect visitors (such as PCs) to a tribe are those surrounding the treatment of guests. Only a sheikh can offer strangers full guest-right, which includes the right to sleep within the tribe’s encampment. Guests are asked to share black tea or (if they are honored, and it is the evening) hot salted coffee. A Bedine typically makes such drinks in a battered, blackened pot (metal is scarce; such a thing might cost as much as two camels), and serves it in a carved wooden cup; a sheikh may serve drinks to honored guests in silver cups.

In early evening, when the sun is down, Bedine men like to sing ballads to the accompaniment of their plucked rebabas, sitting outside their tents in small groups, while their wives serve them hot, salted coffee.

Bedine do not express gratitude for food and water. They regard these two essentials as the property of whoever needs them at the time. To “civilized” outlanders, this may seem a strangely charitable custom for a people who think it praiseworthy to kill a man in order to steal his camel.

Honor dictates that the sheikh banish or execute anyone who assaults his guest (unless the assault is justified by another Bedine custom or tradition—such as a warrior attacking a guest who tries to use magic against the sheikh).

Any warrior of a tribe has the right to enter the sheikh's tent without announcement. Women and guests do not, unless bidden to do so by a warrior.

Only men can welcome guests to a tent. The traditional greeting is: "Has somebody come to my khreima in need of help?" Wives must remain silent; if they are alone, and another man asks for entry, most women sing one of the traditional Bedine songs, to signal that the husband is not present—and, if they wish (by choice of song and lyrics), to tell the man outside if he is welcome to enter, or not, what is happening within, or where the husband is and what he is doing.

Angry, sly, or hostile Bedine women may comment aloud (pretending that they cannot be heard by the man outside) on what they or their husband are doing, or about strangers or unwelcome guests who come calling, or something of the sort—without ever acknowledging or directly replying to the person outside the tent. If they are unmarried, it is permissible for them to call, "Is there someone at my door?" Bedine women wear the veil from puberty (or in some cases, earlier), and once veiled, are not supposed to come close to men of another family, even when riding camels; such behavior is considered "brazen." Men, however, are free to approach women closely, although an unwelcome advance causes anger on the part of the woman's family. A woman should not speak to a man of another family without either several other men present, or in the hearing of a man of her own family; unrelated men and women should not have secret conversations together.

It is common for cousins and more distant relatives to marry each other. Both women and their fathers have a veto over marriage choices in most Bedine tribes, and women seldom have any chance to get to know men of other families. Families already related by marriage are likely to be friendlier together, giving men more opportunities to court women.

Fathers typically arrange matches for their daughters. Bedine men who court women without the approval of the family are usually challenged by men of the woman's family. The fight is to the death; the winner gets the woman (or retains possession of her as a free woman, in her own family). When a match is made, the husband-to-be (or his father or tribe) pays a bride-price to the father, typically in camels. There is a wedding feast, at which the couple drinks together from a marriage cup filled with honeyed camel milk by the groom's father.

This system often results in stormy marriages, where the husband and wife only really get to know each other after they are wed. There is a "honeymoon" period after marriage known as pardah, in which the new bride is confined to her husband's tent. She is forbidden to speak directly to any man except her husband, and must stay in the tent unless brought forth by her husband, or at the orders of the sheikh (conveyed through elder women of the tribe). Some tribes call this "the seven days of bliss" (the actual time period varies from tribe to tribe), but the custom probably arose to stop frightened brides from trying to flee back to their fathers' tribes.

A Bedine man is obligated to care for a dead brother's wife for two years, after which time he has the choice of sending her away or marrying her himself.

Aside from the requirements of both personal and family honor (such as caring for a brother's widow), Bedine men have far more personal freedom than their women—when they aren't scrambling to obey the orders of the sheikh, as warriors must. Although many men resent the orders of sheikhs who are foolish, or confused by age, only veterans dare to question orders—the younger men gain rank within the tribe only through eager obedience and splendid battle-performance, and find hesitating over orders hard, as it goes against their childhood training.

Boys are trained to obey orders, use weapons, and learn the ways of the desert as soon as they are old enough to understand what is happening around them. They are schooled to fight, and fight well. Even young boys are taken on raids, expected to stand watch (with a veteran warrior, as his message-runner), and to help in any fight when the tribe is attacked, usually by protecting the camels and the women. After a boy kills his first man, he undertakes a solitary camel raid on another tribe, the el a'sarad, as a rite of passage.

Bedine are sometimes labelled "superstitious" by outlanders. They ascribe storms, disasters, and all strange happenings, as well as everyday desert conditions, to the whims and stills of the gods.

The Bedine gods are detailed in "The Gods of Anauroch" chapter, and are worshipped by prayer, ritual sacrifices (usually of camels), and by obedience to what the Bedine know is favored behavior. The Bedine tribes have "holy men," wise in the lore of the gods and at interpreting divine will through natural signs, but there are no Bedine spell-wielding priests (as the rest of the Realms and other AD&D® game worlds know them). The Bedine are so concerned with daily survival that they have no time for divine aims and precepts; their relationship with the gods is generally one of fear and appeasement.

Most Bedine have seen too much hardship and death to be anything other than fatalistic toward the gods-and even if one avoids the wrath of the gods, there are always the djinn.

The djinn (detailed in Volume 1 of the Monstrous Compendium, under “Genie”) are feared as evil spirits who roam Anauroch, and who have the power to shape-shift or turn invisible, move with uncanny silence, cast dangerous spells, and devour living men even as jackals will fall on a dead or badly wounded one.

Djinn are evil, but they are not always cruel or predictable; they may aid one person on a whim, or merely cause “impossible” things to occur in a sort of entertaining chaos, to stir things up for their own amusement. This makes appeasing a djinni impossible, and avoiding crossing them in an encounter a matter of luck-and rather short luck, at that.

The Bedine tend to respect, but not fear, most desert predators. Those that they are afraid of include lamia, laertis (whom they call asabis, or “The Evil Ones Below,” a fell, magic-using race that most Bedine know only as a name-and the reason why, they are told in childhood, they must never dig too deeply. These are the Phaerimm, but their true name and powers are unknown to all Bedine alive today.

Perhaps through unconsciously resisting the mind-influencing spells of the buried Phaerimm for many generations, Bedine loathe the very thought of slavery, and tend to fight on in helpless situations, preferring to die with honor rather than suffer the shame of defeat. It is not unknown for such bravery to be admired by rivals; an elder warrior of a tribe, or a sheikh, may offer an embattled rival the chance to become one of the tribe-a warrior with the same rights and duties as all others.

It is dishonorable to beg for this-but not at all shameful to agree, if it is offered. The embattled one kisses whatever weapon he or she bears (his open hand, if he has no weapon), and lays it at the feet of the sheikh, who kisses the embattled one’s forehead, offers him wine, and into it introduces a few drops of blood from them both. They share the cup together, and the embattled one is thereby considered a new member of the tribe. He is now duty-bound to fight those of his former tribe to the death, and is not well regarded by anyone if he changes allegiance again (ways of achieving this with honor include being the last survivor of the new tribe, free to take up with anyone, or in convincing members of the tribe one wishes to rejoin that one was persuaded to join the new tribe through “evil magic”).

Bedine fear magic, and shun or cast out “witches” who wield it. Beyond small, useful or healing effects (“the favor of the gods”), magic is regarded as treacherous against friends and wielders, and a dishonorable weapon to use against enemies. Even the most fearless Bedine are wary of those who can work magic, either by spell or item. A being must be insane, very brave, or very evil to touch or even willingly draw near a magical item.

The Bedine aversion to magic is more fully described in the next section of this chapter.

Most Bedine want to become rich and acquire much honor, have many descendants, and perhaps to discover a rich oasis, found a tribe, or become a sheikh. These aims usually fade into the background in the daily struggle to survive—and the aim of most Bedine, in the end, is to die honorably, or to be respected and cared for, in old age. Few Bedine want to leave the desert, although there is the occasional one who wants to explore to the ends of the earth.

Some Bedine women want more independence, and there are rumored to be all-female, or female-dominated, Bedine tribes (these rumors are true; the Shaara and the Lilithai are tribes of female warriors, who subjugate men and herd camels-but these tribes are small, isolated in the northern Sword, and remain mere talk to most Bedine).

Although love is a luxury in Bedine society, many Bedine are romantics at heart, and dream of the perfect passion between a man and a woman “made for each other by the gods,” who will share a splendid life in the desert together.

Bedine have few days dedicated to the gods, but some tribes hold annual feasts to commemorate great battles, or the founding of the tribe, or the birthday or anniversary of ascension of the current sheikh.

When Bedine die, their relatives bathe them, sacrificing precious water so that the deceased can meet the gods cleansed and at peace. Bodies are stripped of useful gear, and buried deeply, with rocks atop them if possible. Enemies and non-Bedine are simply left for the vultures.

Food

Everyday Bedine fare consists of camel-milk, a handful of bitterleaf grass, and "sand stew," a slow-cooked broth of palm-leaves, sand-grass-roots, desert lizards and bats. Onionlike root tubers are also dug up from the sand and eaten.

Meat of any sort is a delicacy. Roast hare and figs is a fine meal; a gazelle buck basted in honey and spices is a rare feast. Apricots and milk are another "special meal." Camel-milk and water are carried in skins; butter travels in tubes made of dried lizard skins. Bedine women prize their cooking pots—which they clean by scouring with sand—highly. To give a Bedine woman a new, strong pot is to bestow on her a great gift.

Garb And Adornment

Burnooses (hooded cloaks) are not unknown in the desert, nor are turbans, but most Bedine cover their heads with flowing head-scarves (keffiyehs), held on by brow-bands. Bedine can tell the tribe of another Bedine by the color and pattern of his keffiyeh, which may for example have red and white checks, green stripes, blue lightning-flashes, lines of red spots, or be solid brown or black.

There are exceptions to this "norm": some northerly Bedine tribes wear trousers, loose shirts, and vests, not abas. There are even Bedine tribes (who dwell in the eastern central stretches of the Sword) whose men wear turbans and cover their faces with scarves, and whose women go without veils.

Many Bedines wear their wealth as finger-rings, or jewels adorning their sword-scabbards (to a nomad, wealth that is not portable is worthless).

Bedine have no way to forge or refine metal, and must trade frankincense and myrrh (both tree gums) to get it. Metal is therefore valued highly—even a rusted, useless pot may be fashioned into an ornamental necklace of medallions.

Bedine women of some tribes tattoo their cheeks for personal adornment, or paint their hands and cheeks with henna. Many use frankincense as perfume. Its sweet odor can pervade entire tents on festive occasions when a few grains of powdered frankincense are cast on a fire or lamp-flame.

Arts

Skilled Bedine dye or paint themselves and the cloth of their clothing and tents; some make "sand-pebble-scenes," usually when telling tales.

Bedine preserve much of their tribal lore in songs that are chanted together. Some of these tunes are eerie and mournful, telling of the dead, lost love, or disaster; there are also war-songs and feast-songs (such as "Tlinlyn, Fool of the Desert") full of jokes and rollicking choruses that all join in on.

Slaves

Slaves are not kept by the Bedine—to become a slave is regarded as a "fate worse than death" by Bedine. Bedine take pleasure in slaying outlanders whom they know to be slavers. Freed slaves are left to wander in the desert, or-if they fight well—are offered a place in the tribe.

Those who are obviously unhappy, or who are a burden to the tribe, are cast out the next time the Bedine travel near the edge of Anauroch (for example, to trade with the D'tarig). Such "guests" of the tribe are expected to work for their food by carrying packs of belongings when the tribe is traveling, for example.

Magic and The Bedine

No tribe of the Bedine has abided magic in all the generations (there have been at least twelve, and probably many more, but the Bedine have lost count) since the Scattering.

Bedine myth holds that there were once Three Ancient Tribes of Bedine. The sheikhs of these three tribes dreamed of ruling all the people, and so they had their sorcerers summon N'asr's djinn to make war upon each other.

The war destroyed the land and gave birth to Anauroch. It took the gods themselves to set the world right again, and some of them died before the carnage could be stopped. The surviving gods scattered the Three Tribes to the corners of the world and forbade them ever to use magic again.

That is why the Bedine think ill of any who use magic. Any member of a tribe caught working magic must leave the tribe; honored guests must leave the tribe's encampment.

Even if a user-of-magic aids a tribe, tradition is clear: witches and sorcerers are to be outcasts. If they are consorted with, the gods will surely deliver the Bedine who do so into defeat and slavery. Magic is for the gods, not men.

Bedine women, in particular, are feared if they wield magic-men rightly see them as a threat to the "peace of the tribe" (i.e., the status quo social order, with men on top). As "witches," they are driven out of the tribe to make their own way in the desert. The desert is expected to kill them; they are not expected to flourish alone, nor to someday return to work vengeance on those who cast them out.

This seemingly unlikely survival happens all too often; many a sheikh sends his best warriors out soon after a witch has been driven forth, to hunt her down and kill her before her night raids and food thefts cause his fearful tribe to question his decision or his competence to rule. (Typically a witch who is stalking a tribe attacks one tent a night, slaying its inhabitants with magic, and taking what goods can be had.) There many tales of "shunned women" taking revenge on those who harmed them or drove them out-and Bedine always keep watch for the "lurking magic" of bitter, insane, or desperate "witches and wizards of the sand" (Bedine cast out for using magic).

Bedine mages employ a strange mixture of spells gained from intruders and developed for desert needs; these are detailed further in the chapter "Wind and Sand Magic." To avoid being cast out, Bedine mages try to conceal any magical powers they may have, often sewing their written spells (the runes burned or scratched into scraps of hide) into their abas, between two layers of cloth.

Most well-made abas are reversible, with a darker side, for night concealment, and a lighter, dun-colored side, for use by day. Scraps of hide or cloth are sewn into high-stress areas (elbows, cuffs, and shoulder-yokes) for extra thickness and durability-and all but the finest abas have been patched and mended a few times-so a spell or six can be readily hidden by any Bedine skillful with a bone needle in this way.

A Bedine mage openly casts spells only to avoid certain death, or when death seems inevitable. In all other cases, magic is worked "on the sly," so that results can be attributed to the capriciousness of a djinni, the aid of the gods, or some other explanation.

As always with the Bedine, there are exceptions to this abhorrence of magic. There are tribes whose sheikhs have come to tolerate magic; tribes who have found magical weapons and items uncovered by the sands, and see no wrong in using these "gifts of the gods" so long as they don't cast spells and seek to learn magic; and bands of Bedine wizards, such as the Asheira ("Shunned Ones").

Camels

The most important creature in all the Realms to a Bedine tribesman is the camel.

Camels provide Bedine with emergency food and water, and work as their everyday beast of burden and steed. Camels are fairly common in Anauroch, and plentiful in the far-off deserts of Calimshan and Raurin.

Camels are bad-tempered beasts, given to biting, groaning, breaking wind, kicking, rolling to rid themselves of a rider, and even spitting.

The camel is detailed in Volume 1 of the Monstrous Compendium, under "Animal, Herd," and can be summarized as follows: INT 1-4; AL N; AC 7; MV 21; HD 3; THAC0 16; #AT 1; Dmg 1-4; SA Spitting: no hp damage, but 25% chance of hit targets being blinded for 1-3 rounds; SZ L (8' tall); ML 3; XP 65.

A well-watered camel has a firm hump and bloated belly; the camel takes a better part of a day to drink its fill-but once "full," it can work for 12 + 1d10 days without getting another drink, if it has to, and isn't injured at some point. If the thirsty camel has regular access to food, roll 3d4 dice instead of 1d10; if the camel is idling or resting and not working, it can go without water for 20 + 1d10 days.

A camel working hard in full sun, without access to water, loses a quarter of its body weight (and Strength, and carrying capacity, and MV rate) every 7 days. It can't drink vast "extra" quantities of water, and only accepts sufficient water to restore its body weight. A full-grown camel weighs around 500 pounds.

A camel ridden to water-exhaustion will collapse, and will die if it doesn't immediately get water and at least three full days of rest (two days will do, if it gets a full meal as well). Camels nearing dehydration begin to stumble, snort and groan constantly (instead of merely most of the time, their normal complaints), and they roar, roll their eyes, and collapse if ridden too far. When water is short, Bedine give it to their camels, and drink camel-milk themselves (from the she-camels; Bedine drink directly from the teats, to minimize evaporation).

The broad, fleshy pads of a camel's feet allow it to walk on the surface of even loose, shifting sand, sinking in only a few inches, rather than going in deeply (and exhaustingly), the way men on foot, horses, and other non-desert beasts do. (A Bedine fleeing a fight with outlanders sometimes lashes shields he has seized from the fallen to his feet for the same reason-the broad, hard surfaces of the shields allow him to run along the surface of the sand faster than he might walk through it.) In mud, a camel's movement rate drops to 16; deep mud or quicksand will reduce it to 12—note that camels perish in quicksand only if it is so large a bog that they can't swim and thrash across it in 4 rounds; a laden camel can carry a rider and gear through quicksand in this way.

Some camels are gelded when young, which improves their disposition and usually makes them grow larger and stronger, as they burn less energy through nervousness or fighting. The camels of northern tribes have longer "wool." The sheikh's camel, alone of all the camels in a Bedine khowwan, is usually adorned with bells. These warn others of his approach, mark the sheikh's camel for precedence in conditions of bad visibility and confusion (dust-clouds, for instance), denote wealth, and have the practical use of concealing whispered words shared by the sheikh with scouts and elders from eavesdroppers riding nearby.

When a tribe is camped, most camel-tending is done by the Bedine children, the "herdboys" (young girls also do this work, but are more often kept busy doing the dirtiest camp jobs, or carrying water, and usually herd camels under the command of a chosen boy).

The camels graze on the best grassland that the Bedine can find by day, and are herded to a guarded area (a waterhole, if there is one) at twilight, and tied up to stakes or large boulders, or hobbled.

A hobble, called a “breakstride” by the Bedine, is a length of rope just long enough to prevent the camel confined by it from taking a full stride. The camel has one or both pairs of opposing ankles tied together with hobbles, which are usually woven with thorns or covered with a bitter paste of crushed insects, to prevent the camel from gnawing them through. The paste is better than the thorns, which can harm herdboys, dogs, other camels, and also cut through the hobbles themselves. Strong camels, or those with a tendency to wander, may have stones bored through with holes threaded onto their hobbles.

The task of the herdboys is to keep a sharp watch out for snakes, scorpions, other digging, flying, or surface predators of the sands (including raiding Bedine from rival tribes, although it is rare for any of these to slip through the adult Bedine sentries that every tribe posts, day and night, whenever the tribe is encamped), and drive these away from the camels, or to cry the alarm and bring the men of the tribe to deal with greater dangers.

The herdboys must also prevent camels from straying, fighting with each other, drinking too deeply, and wandering into areas of rocks and leg-breaking ground fissures. Herdboys (and girls under their direction) gather camel-dung for the making of fuel-patties.

Diseased camels must be kept apart from the others, and in areas where grasses are few, the whole herd must be kept slowly moving (in the same direction, not each camel following its own head in search of better grazing). The need of camels for fresh pasturage, more than anything else, is what forces Bedine tribes to live nomadic lives; rare is the oasis or pasture that can provide enough forage for a tribal camel herd for more than sixty continuous days.

Traveling camels always try to sample any vegetation that looks as if it has any moisture or life left in it at all, as they bellow and grunt their way through the desert.

Camels traveling in the dry sands are watered nightly, by emptying waterskins into large camel-skin buckets. A typical waterskin holds four gallons of water; two skins is a meager daily water ration for a camel.

Desperate Bedine will ride their camels to death, milk, skin and then butcher the dead and dying, and catch all the blood they can in the skins. Eating meat makes one thirsty for days, so the camel blood, milk, and a little desert salt are mixed together for a drink to go with it.

Desert Travel

Camels are ridden by means of halters and saddles. An experienced rider can sleep in the saddle as he rides, without falling off (though this would be foolish except in the center of a large Bedine party, traveling in good weather). A trained camel can be tethered for a short time by driving one’s lance deep into a dune, and wrapping the camel’s reins around the lance-shaft.

When warriors travel in the desert, it is the duty of their women to lead the string of baggage camels, by means of long reins.

A Bedine khowwan on the move may seem a disorganized herd to inexperienced eyes, but there is a deliberate order to the group. Riding far ahead of and behind the main group, mounted on the fastest camels and well beyond sight, are the youngest and most daring warriors. They are scouts, who will use their amarats (warning horns) to alert the tribe of any dangers lurking ahead—or approaching from behind. These horns have distinctive tones; Bedine can tell the horns of their own tribe, and even those of specific individuals (such as the sheikh and prominent warriors).

Ringling the tribe at a distance of about a thousand yards are the rest of the warriors, accompanied by their eldest sons, with well-trained hunting dogs and falcons.

Bedine hunting dogs are generally “Wild Dogs,” detailed in Volume 1 of the Monstrous Compendium, under “Dog.” DMs should use the standard statistics for most Bedine dogs, but switch to modified “War Dog” statistics for the best dogs the Bedine breed: the sleek saluki dogs.

These proud beasts can be summarized as follows: INT 4; AL N; AC 6; MV 17; HD 3; THACO 17; #AT 1; Dmg 2-8; SZ M (6' long); ML 12; XP 65.

Bedine falcons are the standard sort covered in Volume 2 of the Monstrous Compendium, under “Hawk” and are as follows: INT 1; AL Nil; AC 5; MV Fl 36 (B); HD 1 - 1; THACO 20; #AT 3; Dmg 1/1/1; SA plummeting dive: +2 on attack roll, talons do 2 hp damage each, but no beak attack possible (on later rounds, falcons attack target’s eyes, with a 25% chance of a 1d10-round blinding strike for each successful attack, with a 10% chance of permanent blindness in the eye struck); SD never surprised; SZ S (2' long); ML 6; XP 65.

As they travel, the sons watch the desert around for signs of game. Periodically they release a hound or bird, or burst into a gallop themselves, riding to the hunt. They usually ride back to the center of the caravan with a hare, lizard, or some other meat (such as a gazelle, or plump desert bird) for the evening’s pot, before resuming their places in the watchful ring.

At the center of the caravan ride the mothers and sisters. The wealthiest women ride in elaborately decorated litters (known as haousdjejs), but most families cannot afford the extra camel’s wool needed to make one of these box-shaped litters.

Around them, watched and guided by walking children and by women holding long reins, are the baggage camels, tribal belongings lashed to them with leather thongs. The women and children usually walk to avoid tiring the camels, but when a tribe is moving in haste, everyone rides camels, the youngest children clinging to the baggage atop the baggage camels. With everyone doubled up on camels, and the whole group moving at a deliberate, steady rate, a large tribe can cover as much as forty miles a day across the sands.

Warfare

Bedine use scimitars, daggers, lances and arrows (all of which they may employ from camel-back) in their struggles against each other and other desert predators. Desert wind and heat shimmer (by day) and poor visibility (by night) limit the usefulness of archery at long range; most combat is decided at swords’ points. Most fighting occurs at night—not only does darkness allow attackers some concealment, but the lack of a blazing sun makes it more likely that anyone can survive the exertions of combat. Battle is usually marked by loud battle-cries; raiding is usually silent and deadly. The use of magic is frowned upon, even in battle.

Most fighting between Bedine tribes occurs when one tribe tries to raid another, to seize camels, wives, and food and other goods. This typically occurs in the coolness and concealment of night, and although there is something in the practice of recreation and even (for younger, hurt, or low-status Bedine) of “proving one’s manhood,” it is often a matter of desperate necessity: a tribe must take the food and water it needs, or perish.

“Waterless summers” (droughts) are all too common in the Sword. Settlements outside the desert but near enough to be reached, and weak enough for Bedine tribesmen to successfully raid, are nonexistent. So one Bedine tribe must attack another. Although most Bedine accept raiding as inevitable, years of bitter fighting between certain rival tribes have built up feuds that may cause battle at any time, whenever a tribesman of either side encounters the other.

The only reason that all the Bedine tribes are not constantly at each other’s throats in an unending desert war is because of the custom of paying a blood price for any Bedine slain by friendly or allied tribes—a price, in camels and goods, or in the life of the murderer, given up to the other tribe—too high for most Bedine to want to pay.

Many Bedine have perished in hopeless fights they enter knowing death can be escaped only by some miracle. They go in, and die in vain, because it is a matter of honor for the entire tribe. This bravery makes them deadly foes-but it is also foolishness that allows non-Bedine opponents, such as the Zhen-tarim, to lead the Bedine into disaster and defeat, over and over again, once they have learned how the Bedine think and act.

Bedine Names and Language

For a selection of common Bedine names, see the inside front covers of this book. There the DM will also find a introductory glossary of words in Uloushinn, the Bedine tongue. DMs should remember that outlanders who use magic to understand or communicate with Bedine are likely to be attacked on the spot.

THE PHAERIMM

These sinister beings (detailed in the “Monsters of Anauroch” chapter) are the present rulers of the Buried Realms, and the creators of Anauroch as we know it today. Their mind-controlling spells hold even illithids in thrall, and influence-in a subtle but all-pervasive rule-all creatures beneath Anauroch. PCs in the Buried Realms must make Intelligence Checks at least once per turn, or fall under a Phaerimm charm or suggestion.

Through controlled minds, the Phaerimm rule an entire nation of beholders who think themselves independent, dwelling in several ruined cities of the Anaurian Underdark. The beholders are mighty, employing Death Tyrants (undead beholders) and orc, hobgoblin, and xorn slaves of their own, as they mine for wealth and scheme to expand their realms southward and up to the surface world. They are, however, loosely ruled by an Elder Orb (a spellcasting beholder of great powers; its type is detailed in The Ruins of UnderMountain boxed set)—and that Orb, Rilathdool, is the pawn of the Phaerimm.

So the Phaerimm rule-haughty, scheming always among themselves, but keeping behind a screen of mind-controlled slaves from mind flayers to giants, goblinkin of all sorts to humans. Ever they vie with each other for supremacy in non-violent, subtle confrontations of brinksmanship, one Phaerimm demonstrating the superiority of its strategy, forethought, and influence over that of another; and ever they seek to break the spell-bonds the Sharn have placed on them, and expand their influence over more and more of Faerun. Where the Phaerimm cannot (yet) go, their agents can reach. What agents? The Phaerimm are busily subverting the Red Wizards of Thay, any adventurers who come within reach (i.e., into Anauroch), and the Zhentarim who have intruded into Anauroch, too. Even Elminster must tread warily around these titans of magic and intrigue; he can tell us little of the spells they have developed.

Phaerimm enjoy magic, and exult in wielding its unleashed power. They are fascinated by new spells and effects, and admire those who show genius in the mastery and devising of magic: such as Phaerl, “The First.” Phaerl perished in the War Against the Sharn, but Phaerimm still venerate his memory, and obey Phaerl’s one-time colleague, Ooumraun “The Seeker,” a ancient, huge, wrinkled Phaerimm who developed many of the Phaerimm spells (and, it is whispered, others of awesome power not yet revealed to fellow Phaerimm, with which Ooumraun has defended itself against the challenges and treacheries of ambitious Phaerimm over the years).

Although Phaerimm memorize spells much as human wizards do, they cast spells by effort of will alone, and can also adopt a single spell of each level as “natural.” The spell (which cannot be changed, once chosen) is retained in their brain structure. Phaerimm regain “natural” spells without study every day. Phaerimm are true masters of magic; some sages believe that their meddling may have created most of the magic-using monsters that menace the Realms today (including, perhaps, the beholder races!). Even the least experienced and powerful Phaerimm are capable of developing strange and terrifying new magics (providing DMs ideal opportunities for testing or introducing new spells into a campaign), and the veterans of the race know or can anticipate every nuance and side-effect of magic they observe being wielded. No elder Phaerimm will be caught unawares by a spell’s range, precise effects, the results of its combination with other magics, or the like; but Phaerimm may be slow to unleash magic at intruders, for fear of playing into the plans of a rival Phaerimm.

The moisture-drinking magics of the Phaerimm that created the wastes of Anauroch hold sway over the surface, but rarely stray into the depths beneath.

THE ZHENTARIM IN ANAUROCH

The most violent, persistent, and numerous group of outlanders active in Anauroch today are the Zhentarim: the evil cabal of wizards and priests who have long ruled Zhentil Keep, and have spread their influence and rule over much of the North. The strength of the Zhentarim is their magic, but one can't eat a spell, or use it (often) to buy things. The wealth of the Zhentarim comes from the caravan-trade they control, carrying valuable goods of all kinds (including stolen goods, slaves, and other illegal, high-priced wares) from place to place.

The Zhentarim merchant reputation is built on their no-questions-asked practices of handling goods (even kidnap victims or stolen temple gold), of using magic and strong armored forces to guard their caravans, and always getting cargo through regardless of the perils of the road. The 'Black Robes' try to get goods where they're going faster than everyone else, and to do this, they have set about sabotaging competitors (an ongoing campaign of local vandalism, murder, and arson spread all over the Realms) and establishing strategic trade-routes under their own control.

The major route planned by the Zhentarim links the Moonsea (from the city of Zhentil Keep) with the Sword Coast, running just south of Anauroch. The map on page 30 shows the ways in which Zhent goods move, and future Zhentarim plans for caravan travel. Through the years, these plans have involved the Zhentarim in battles with Hillsfar (to control Yulash and to lessen Hillsfar's importance as a rival trade-center), and with orcs and brigands throughout the North. There have also been skirmishes with Cormyr (who annexed Tilverton to avoid having Zhentil Keep openly seize it), Shadowdale (which continues to resist Zhent efforts to conquer it, thanks to Elminster, Storm Silverhand and other Harpers, and The Knights of Myth Drannor), and Daggerdale. Local folk in the Corm Orp area, Hill's Edge, Llorkh, Loudwater, and the Dragonspear Castle area are also experienced Zhent-fighters.

The Zhentarim continue to be enriched by trade with the drow (whose tunnels come to the surface near Shadowdale; only Thay and certain folk in decadent Mulhorand seem willing to compete with the Zhents in trading openly with the dark elves), but must spend a lot of money to maintain their present route, thanks to the aggressions of goblinkin and human brigands in the Stonelands, Cormyrean patrols, and the resistance of locals all along the chosen way. Darkhold, for instance (detailed in the Castles boxed game accessory), exists entirely to protect the trade route; there are many smaller cave strongholds protecting Yellow Snake Pass, that collectively cost more than Darkhold does to staff and provision.

To pile up gold pieces in numbers they love and foresee, over the long run, the Zhentarim need to establish a secure route that is shorter and safer than the present one: one that is less vulnerable to the whims and aggressions of strong nearby realms like Cormyr. Zhent agents work tirelessly to foment unrest in Sembia, Cormyr, the Dales, Hill's Edge, Iriaebor, and strategic Sword Coast communities, both to keep these places busy with their own troubles (and therefore unable to spare the time or arms to menace passing Zhent caravans), and to keep the present route profitable. This is not enough, according to the Zhentarim leaders: a shorter route must be found. That means crossing Anauroch.

The Zhentarim have been trying to do just that for more than twenty winters now, with (so far) decidedly limited success. They haven't stopped trying, however, and a player character who ventures into Anauroch today will almost certainly encounter Zhentarim agents, and (hostile to everyone else) Zhentarim activity.

The Zhentarim face the same harsh, forbidding conditions in Anauroch that have stopped everyone else from using it as a fast traveling route before the Zhents came along. At first, the Zhentarim assumed that they could neutralize these perils with magic or use magic to avoid them, by flying over the desert, or digging a route underneath it.

They failed. Both the skies above Anauroch and the depths beneath its sands are home to magic so strong and complex that the Zhentarim have not yet managed to overcome it (and may never do so). The reasons for this can be found in the chapters on “The Phaeirrm” and “The Secret of Anauroch.” These magics continue to thwart Zhent agents, and in some cases subvert the minds of agents to make them unwittingly work against Zhent plans.

The only part of Anauroch useful for a shorter trade route is the Sword. The Stonelands, the Plain of Standing Stones, and the High Ice are all broken terrain, full of barriers—and with hostile aerial creatures ready to disrupt any regular trade that tries to fly over the natural barriers.

The Zhentarim tried establishing bases in the hidden valleys of the Plain, and flying caravans across. Each and every trip, once their attempts became regular, was imperilled by a gauntlet of wyverns and dragons that actually lined up in midair to await the intruders. Blasting a way through the skies with spells proved too costly in wizards (the Zhentarim are hated throughout the North; to survive at all, they need many healthy wizards active on the ground) for the Zhents to continue it—and a few forays over the Stonelands brought forth both an aerial Cormyrean cavalry, and a number of independent menaces (including flying Harpers, and dracoliches from the Thunder Peaks, alerted by the rival Cult of the Dragon) to endanger the air-way.

So, summing up the costs in magic, personnel, and supplies of all these longer detours by air or over the more northerly parts of Anauroch, the Zhents were left with only one choice for their route: the blazing sands of the Sword.

Crossing the Sword means dealing with the treacherous D'tarig (if there's to be any trade across Anauroch, the D'tarig aim to control it and grow fat on it) and the fierce Bedine.

The D'tarig are foolish, disorganized, and selfish enough that the Zhentarim can treat them as they did the folk of Melvaunt, Phlan, and other rivals in the Dragonreach lands. They used magic to spy out D'tarig individuals and communities, hired certain D'tarig as their agents, and killed or impoverished (by vandalism, arranged misfortunes, and the like) certain others, to effectively persuade the D'tarig into leaving them alone or helping them. (The D'tarig themselves are detailed in the chapter on “Other Peoples of Anauroch.”) The Bedine, used to fighting each other and almost everything else they encounter, present a tougher obstacle to overcome. Very few of them can be bought, and none of them can be intimidated by threats or magic; the use of hostile magic by an outlander makes them determined to destroy that being, not to surrender or obey him.

The Zhentarim tried their usual bullying methods, and sending “strike teams” of powerful wizards heavily protected by magical items to slay key Bedine leaders; but these had little lasting effect (the new sheikhs were of the same essential nature as the slain ones, the Bedine will not tolerate an outsider as a sheikh, and the Bedine tribes are too small to fool anyone with magic, to install a Zhentarim agent as a sheikh in the magical guise of a Bedine), and even attracted the attention of Harpers, Dragon Cultists, independent meddlers such as The Simbul of Aglarond and Elminster. Some of these acted directly against the Zhents, or sent agents to work against them.

The Zhents then adopted a new, two-pronged strategy (anticipated by Harpers such as Lander of Sembia). This consisted of a velvet-gloved hand of friendship—and a strong, treacherous sword of force.

The Black Robes approach a Bedine sheikh, offer him a friendly trade-treaty (with bribes of steel, rare and valuable in the desert, used for making the best weapons, and gems), and find a pretext to invite the sheikh's family or other important members of the tribe into their camp. Then they hold these 'guests,' controlled by magic, to guarantee the tribe's submission.

Zhentarim agents are then installed to watch over the tribe: magelings with enough magic to spy for signs of rebellion, and to crush it or call in magic-powerful reinforcements. At the same time, the Black Robes begin to enrich the tribe, introducing coins, gold, gems, wine, and rich food. The most troublesome tribesmen are plied with drink to keep them docile. Should their fighting fury be needed, there are other means to rouse them. By magic, the Zhentarim learn of any famous or respected elders of the tribe who have died, and use their magic again to send images of these dead by night to speak to the tribesmen and convince them that it is right to follow the way of the Black Robes. When the tribe is loyal to them, the Zhentarim move on to the next one.

At the same time, the Zhentarim hire armies of over three thousand man-eating, desert-dwelling laertis (detailed in the "Monsters of Anauroch" chapter of this book), and promise them protection by day against any Bedine who try to avenge fellows whom the laertis ate or slew at night (the laertis must hide from the sun during the day). This protection is provided by several hundred Zhentilar warriors, accompanied by Zhentarim priests and wizards. This human army goes into the desert carrying all the food and drink they need with them (when they defeat a Bedine tribe, they'll butcher its camels and roast them to gain a "free" feast).

If diplomacy fails or falters, the army is used to subdue a dozen tribes, and then use hostages, bribery, and violence to enslave the others. The controlled tribes are used to overpower the others, the laerti allowed to feed freely on Bedine so long as they leave Zhent caravans alone (if they become a problem later, the laertis can themselves be exterminated with spells) and the Zhentilar army leaves the desert, its task done. The Zhentilar warriors are highly disciplined fighters, experts at defending fortifications against sieges and at performing "dirty tricks" in overland battles. They are not hampered by the rules and traditions of their Bedine foes, and can quickly acquire desert lore (if not the deep knowledge and instincts of a native Bedine) through magical interrogations and mind-control of captured Bedine.

The FORGOTTEN REALMS® novel The Parched Sea describes one Zhentarim campaign to defeat the Bedine. The silky-moustachioed, heavily-scarred warrior El Zarud, a Zhentilar warrior, is the spokesman of the Black Robes among the Bedine until slain. His superior (who posed as his assistant) is the Zhentarim wizard Yhekal, and under their direction, the hired laertis attack tribe after tribe, traveling by night, and accompanied by the human Zhentilar warriors, who establish protective camps (at the oases they have seized from the Bedine) by day.

With the help of magic and Harper agents, the Bedine fight back. Bedine war parties harry the Zhents from all sides with arrows, and scatter at night into small bands camped wide distances apart, so Zhents seeking revenge have to hunt them by night instead of traveling on to the next oasis; the invading army must travel on, or lose its riding and pack-camels to lack of food and water (the Bedine camel herds are limited in size by the available forage in the desert; the huge Zhentarim army needs far more beasts than any one oasis can support). To counterattack means to starve the camels.

The increasingly desperate Zhentarim do not hesitate to poison oases: the ultimate atrocity, in Bedine eyes, but one that may ultimately win the Zhents victory, if they have magic enough to neutralize poison for each and every one of their own caravans, once the Bedine have been wiped out.

If the present campaign fails to force a way through the Bedine, across the desert, the Zhentarim will mount another. The Zhentarim leadership has, as usual, sent ambitious Zhentarim magelings into Anauroch to “prove themselves.” The reward is wealth, magical power (by items and even scrolls of spells, given by superiors) and rank in the Black Network, and to refuse means either instant death, or orders so dangerous as to make an inglorious death inevitable, so mages will continue to risk the perils of the Sword to conquer it for the Zhentarim.

Some of these Zhentarim agents use rings of invisibility and blinking, and (a Zhentarim specialty) rings that allow them dimension door. They always have magic enough to overwhelm and capture individual Bedine, and to interrogate them, and they have coins and metal enough to buy what loyalty they can. A few (such as the wizard Yhekal, who is at least a W9, and has skin and hair as pale as white sand, flashing blue eyes, and wears a hooded purple robe and silver wrist-bracers) are powerful or influential enough to have clones or other magical means of resurrecting themselves, should they be slain in the desert.

The Black Robes have offered D'tarig and some Bedine five hundred gold pieces “per head” for identifying Harpers to them (telling the desert folk that the Harpers are a tribe of meddling fools who stand in the path of free commerce and the growth of kingdoms). They know that Those Who Harp will be their chief foes in their attempt to set up a trade route across Anauroch.

This tendency of Zhent commanders to get things done with a minimum of risk and bother to the main organization by letting (or forcing) underlings to “prove themselves” by doing difficult things in any unsupervised, sloppy, and reckless manner they want to, just to get the job done, allows DMs to freely tailor Zhent forces to challenge PCs. A Zhentarim band can be a dozen warriors led by a W4 or W6, or anything up to an army of several hundred under a dozen wizards, each of up to 12th level.

DMs are also free to have Zhentarim acting personally against PCs in Anauroch, in running fights, without any efficient organization that alerts one group of Zhents when the PCs are fighting with another (necessarily, if the PCs are too weak to survive). Zhentarim can be of any rank or influence the DM wishes; not even Elminster knows what ambitious mages, wizards, priests of Bane, Cyric or the other evil gods, thieves, and warriors have joined the Zhentarim recently.

Please refer to “The Sword” chapter for details of Zhentarim bases established in the desert (including an ingenious practice of “growing” an oasis around a decanter of endless water). At least five such bases are known to exist in the desert: Bhaerlith, Haunga, Ma'atar, Olomaa, and Vuerthyl.

The Zhentarim can rely on supplies and reinforcements from a Zhentilar encampment in Arntethyl, the high alpine valley where the River Tesh is formed, and spills out of the mountains (down gorges to the valley of the Tesh, where the main Zhentilar and mercenary encampments are located, around the ruins of Teshwave) and from Darkhold (in emergencies only; the man who calls for these when they are not needed will pay with his head-after suitable torments have been visited upon him).

At least a thousand warriors are in Arntethyl, and at least twenty Zhentarim magelings (W3s to W9s). They are under the command of the wizard Ruatheene, Manshoon's latest favorite. She is only a W6, but maintains order with the help of a beholder of awesome size and powers, Araunglauth, whose abode Arntethyl has been for almost seventy years.

Ruatheene will not enter Anauroch, whatever happens-but she will unleash the eager magelings under her, if the Zhentarim suffer reverses in the desert. They include Mhaumask of Mordulkin (LE hm W9); Ologhyn of Voonlar (NE hm W7; known for his collection of rare and strange wands); Hlartenth of Procampur (LE hm W8, a wizard under a curse that changes him from male to female, or vice versa, every few hours); Arachhar Sevenstar, of Yhaunn (NE hm W6, a young genius known for devising many new spells and for his frequent, giggling bouts of insanity); Aglast Thimm (NE hm W5, a grim man who has worked for the Zhentarim as a poisoner in many cities around the Inner Sea, until his skills became too widely suspected for continued usefulness); and Orauna Speldarnshar (CE hf W6, a one-time Calishite dancing-girl, who hates men and enjoys magically destroying them at every opportunity).

The Zhentarim intend to enslave the D'tarig even if their attempts to conquer the Bedine fail. When the Desertsouth Mountains are firmly in their control, they intend to gather and breed hill giants to unleash in Shadow Gap and the Tilverton area, and begin a slow conquering of the desert by building forts and wiping out the Bedine tribe by tribe, advancing across the desert step by step. If this becomes necessary, Manshoon intends to send powerful Zhentarim to capture at least one Bedine sorceress, and learn from her (forcibly, if need be) the desert-related magic of the Bedine (the main spells of which appear in the "Wind and Sand Magic" chapter of this book).

When running Zhentarim forces, the DM should keep in mind two things: the Black Robes did not get as far as they have in Faerun already by being stupid; and, as Lander of the Harpers tells a Bedine sheikh, "Threats are the only truthful words you will ever hear a Zhentarim speak."

OTHER PEOPLES OF ANAUROCH

Many peoples, monstrous (to human eyes) and otherwise, dwell in or under Anauroch. Here we look briefly at some of them.

The D'tarig

These diminutive folk (averaging just over four feet tall) may be descended from marriages between humans and dwarves in the Tethyamar area. They are the desert folk most commonly encountered by outlanders.

The D'tarig dwell on the eastern and southeastern fringes of Anauroch, where they herd goats and sheep in the foothills, and make rare trips to Tilverton to trade. (Since the Zhentarim started coming to them, these trips have grown even rarer. Why go to the trouble and expense of travel, when it is easier to let greedy buyers come to you?) D'tarig tend to be self-serving and rather cowardly. They will switch loyalties readily, to those who pay them most highly.

They like to travel in large groups, well-armed with poisoned javelins and bolts for their crossbows. The sticky brown venom they have developed is a secret preparation, known only to a few elders of the people. It causes sleep in humans (save vs. poison to avoid), but tends to be fatal to orcs, goblins, and other related humanoid (save vs. poison at -2: success means 2d4 points of additional damage, failure means death in 1d4 rounds).

D'tarig have their own throaty language, and largely avoid contact with other humans. The exceptions to this are the most adventurous of the tribe, who tend to be younger. They are often hired by outsiders who want guides into the desert, for they typically claim to be experts who know every dune and oasis of great Anauroch. The unwary are warned of the Sembian merchant saying about D'tarig claims: "If you have an infant son, and the son dies when a D'tarig is in town, the D'tarig will show up claiming to be the son of your son, and try to take everything you own." In the desert, D'tarig wear white burnouses and turbans, with splay-footed sandwalking boots,. Only their dark eyes, puggish noses, and leathery brows are exposed.

Older, more greedy D'tarig who are braver than their fellows are known as "desert walkers," for they venture into the desert to trade metal (usually metal weapons, though pots and other vessels are also valued) to the Bedine in return for camel-loads of collected resin from cassia, myrrh, and frankincense trees. Some D'tarig can collect these resins for themselves, from trees growing on the verges of the Sword, on the banks of streams that come down rocky ravines from the Mountains of Tethyamar to meander among the dunes, and ultimately sink into the sand, and vanish). But it is easiest to let Bedine do all the messy, hot, long work of gathering-and the demand for the resin far outstrips the supply provided by the few trees that the D'tarig can reach. The D'tarig sell their jars of gathered resin to merchants sponsored by the Zhentarim. The friendly Black Robes then sell it to temples all over the Realms for the making of incense.

D'tarig have been known to keep slaves, but tend to regard them as too much trouble. Slaves have to be watched constantly, for the D'tarig are a suspicious people. They boast that "no one and nothing can beguile the D'tarig? D'tarig are selfish, brutish folk. They have none of the land-lore and stone-skill of dwarves; most do not even know that lodestones (and therefore, compasses) exist, and must find their way in the desert by learning the oasis-trails and the stars. They tend to keep to themselves out of fear for trouble. More than one D'tarig has said, "Only a fool strays from his path to search out another man's trouble." On the other hand, D'tarig are not humorless or wretchedly craven in their fear of danger; witness this exchange between Bhadla of the D'tarig and Lander, a Harper (from the novel The Parched Sea, by Troy Denning):

Bhadla shook his head. "This is foolish business," he said. "It will probably get you killed."

"Perhaps," Lander agreed. "I'll try not to take you and Musalim with me." "Good. For that, we would charge extra," Bhadla said . . .

DMs should portray D'tarig as suspicious, taciturn, even sullen folk who are too short to wield long swords or longer and heavier weapons, and whose stature forces them into comical climbs into camel and horse saddles. Otherwise, they should be considered normal humans, save that a few (10%) seem to have inherited the uncanny sense of direction (even in dark, underground, or unfamiliar surroundings) possessed by many dwarves.

Oh, and one other thing—a D'tarig always has six or seven more tricks, double-crosses, escape routes, fallback plans, and poisoned weapons up his sleeves, down his boots, in his hair, or even up his nose. (Short-tempered barbarians of the Savage North have been known to cut down D'tarig on sight, just to avoid all the irritating, wearying intrigue and treachery they know will come.)

Most D'tarig that adventurers will meet with are fighters or thieves of 2nd to 5th (1d4 + 1) level. They tend to guide visitors to the trading villages of Tel Badir and Addas Babar. Most D'tarig have a house or place of business in one or both of these settlements, but keep their families safe in comfortably furnished cave homes higher in the mountains. Orc and goblin attacks have made regular patrols in the heights necessary; adventurers are warned that these patrols tend to employ ambushes, poisoned weapons, trip-wires, and boulder avalanches first, and ask questions of the survivors (if any) later.

The Laertis

These ruthless, aggressive, desert-dwelling, intelligent lizards are fully detailed in the "Monsters of Anauroch" chapter, but deserve mention here because of their dominance over the desert underways of the eastern Sword. Forced to shelter from the heat of the day, the laertis can roam the desert surface by night, and over the years have slain many Bedine both for food (they eat the soft organs of humans) and for the pleasure of killing. The Bedine call them asahis, which means "The Evil Ones Below." Recently, the laertis have been hired by the Zhentarim as mercenary troops in a war of extermination against the Bedine as the Zhentarim try repeatedly and forcibly to create a trade route across the desert, controlled by themselves, to link the rich Moonsea trade with Waterdeep, Baldur's Gate, and the Sword Coast trade that those cities can reach. The Zhentarim see this "shortest and cheapest" route as the key to achieving supremacy over Amn in trade matters. Only the years will tell if they can forge and hold such a "golden road through the sands."

The Lamia

The infamous flesh-eating race of lamia are rarer in Anauroch than in more southerly deserts (such as those of Calimshan). Perhaps because flesh to eat is rare and the laertis compete for the same diet, lamia tend to be found in the western end of the Sword, and in the Frozen Sea.

The largest and most powerful lamia community is in the city of Hlaungadath (described in "The High Ice" chapter), but they are also known to roam the desert due east of Hill's Edge (where they often battle expeditions from that city and Zhentarim patrols out of Yellow Snake Pass), and to dwell at Lion's Eye Oasis, the most verdant spot in the western Sword.

The lamia of Lion's Eye are currently led by The Glaendra, a female lamia noble of striking height (9') and beauty. She is said to command both much wealth (in the form of rubies and emeralds looted from sand-covered ruins in the area controlled by the lamia), and a formidable arsenal of magical weapons and items, gathered over the years from Netherese tombs, abandoned towers, and storage-crypts.

Outsiders

There aren't many sane folk who choose to visit Anauroch more than once (most visitors perish on their first trip into the Great Desert). As might be expected, some of these are desperate outlaws trying to hide from pursuers, and others are adventurers overly convinced of their own heroic invulnerability. The most numerous group, however, are merchants: those who come to make a coin or two.

Some, notably the Zhentarim, come in force, and try to make their way by force. They must be powerful indeed to overmatch the fierce Bedine, the desert beasts, and the claws of the desert itself.

Some dream of the fabled wealth of the Lost Kingdoms, and hire adventurers or even try on their own, to scurry into the desert to scoop up the heaps of gold coins and rivers of gems that they fondly hope must be just lying around, guarded only by a few camels and vultures.

The wisest merchants set their sights on less grand dreams. They come to the desert verges, bringing coins, food, fine cloth, and iron-work such as chains, belt-buckles, drinking cups, buckets, cooking pots, knives, forks and ladles, and the like. They trade these to the D'tarig and others who dwell along the Desertsedge, for resins and the occasional caged desert beast or Lost Kingdom tomb-artifact. These incense traders travel along the Desertsedge, in well-armed groups, and then depart, leaving the dangerous task of trading with the Bedine out on the sands to the D'tarig. These merchants make much smaller heaps of coins than the other sorts, but they make them year after year, and may even live to retire on them (a fate that seldom befalls the other two sorts of merchants).

Prominent among the veteran independent incense traders currently active in the Anauroch trade are Bruithyn Ammacaster, of Selgauni (LN hm F6), and Guldagh Ironfist (NE hm P7) of Westgate.

Bruithyn is known to carry an iron bands of Bilarro sphere, to deal with those who threaten him. He is always accompanied by a loyal bodyguard of at least three Sembian mercenary warriors, and a priest of Lathander for healing purposes, hired at the temple in Eveningstar. These priests are always well paid, and Bruithyn is popular at the temple for the extra gifts he makes to the cause, when his trade goes well.

Guldagh is the sort of thug that one prefers never to deal with. He would steal the shroud off a corpse (and has). His band of nine or fewer (the number varies with the number of fatal skirmishes gotten into on the present trip) thieves are drawn from the poisoned-dagger boys of Westgate's dirtier alleys. Guldagh persuades them to take a chance to get rich quick (and usually, to flee certain death if they stay in the city, due to feuds they've gotten themselves drawn into), and then plunges across Cormyr or Sembia in an orgy of petty theft, vandalism, and muggings.

Guldagh then leads his band to D'tarig territory, does the same sort of thing there until he's gained as much incense as possible by illegal means, and then heads west along the Desertsedge, trading for as much more as he can get. If enemies show up, his band darts into the Stonelands. Increasingly, orcs have lain in wait for him. It is whispered that he has a fortified lair somewhere in the Stonelands, but no one has ever found it.

An organized bandit troop is also said to lair in the Stonelands, raiding orc-holds, Bedine encampments, and caravans in northern Cormyr with equal stealth and boldness. Known as The Desert Wind, this band is a myth, or a memory of a desperate band now dead in some misadventure, or able to lie low for years on end—for no one has seen them in recent seasons.

THE SWORD

This region lies like a broad swordblade across the southern end of Anauroch. Its name does not derive from maps, however; it comes from the chief human (and sometimes orc) activity of the area: carving up others, often and with gusto.

This is the hot, dry, sand-dune desolation that most outsiders think composes all Anauroch. It is the area that sees most outsiders: trying to find riches, escape foes, or shorten caravan costs by venturing into the desert. The Bedine nomadic human tribes dwell here, raiding (or rarely, trading peacefully with) each other and with friendly caravan-masters. Their presence makes this the most heavily populated area of Anauroch; and yet a Bedine riding across the Sword might meet with only three tribes in a year.

The Landscape

Outlanders see the Sword as an endless sea of crescent-shaped dunes that rise and fall like waves in a sandstorm (hence Anauroch's most popular nickname, "The Great Sand Sea"). It is indeed a hot, sandy region, but is in fact much more varied than that.

Sand dunes do cover most of its surface. All four types of desert dunes can be found in the Sword: "waves" (transverse), "troughs" (longitudinal), "crescents" (barchan), and "star" dunes.

Transverse dunes are wavelike ridges, formed by moderate winds blowing always in the same direction. These winds move only light sand; the heavier grains swirl aside in eddies, forming ridges across the direction of the blowing wind.

Longitudinal dunes form when stronger one-way winds are present. They move heavier sand, cutting long troughs (parallel to the wind direction) through the transverse ridges.

Barchan dunes form where sand is relatively scarce, lying thinly atop rock. A wind blowing in one direction (in the Sword, usually from west to east) blows the sand into ridges, as with a transverse dune, but is able to move along the ends of the ridge more readily than the humped center. Thus, the ends advance and curve inward, forming a crescent. Novice outlanders should note that the ends of a crescent dune always point opposite the direction of the prevailing wind. (Westerly winds create east-pointing crescents.)

Star dunes, named for their shape, have ridges radiating from a central height, and are relatively stationary (whereas the other three types of dunes "migrate" steadily in the direction of the wind). Star dunes form when winds blow from all quarters, rather than predominantly from one direction.

Many dunes in the Sword are high indeed, but there are few draa (sand mountains, of over a hundred feet in height) among them; rocky pinnacles and ridges are the usual heights in this land.

Tall rock outcroppings are rare; far more common are small ridges or piles of weathered rock. Their crevices and shaded ledges give a home to snakes, lizards, nocturnal raptors, and desert bats.

A few of these rocky outcroppings overlie water, reached by crevices and fissures in the rocks. Larger creatures may lair here, deep beneath the hot sands, venturing forth in the chill night. Thorny salt-bushes and other scrub growth on a ridge tell of certain water somewhere beneath.

Even if there is no water to be found in a rockpile, it can provide shade to a creature able to slither through cracks, or dig out a resting-place by shifting rocks.

Distant booming sounds are not uncommon in the Sword. Sometimes these are caused by faraway thunder: the Stonelands, along the southern edge of the unnatural "dry" area in which much of Anauroch lies (see "The Secret of Anauroch" chapter), see many violent storms, fogs, and unsettled conditions. More often, the sounds are made by sand heavier than a castle keep, falling down the slip-face of a high dune. One slip may set off others, in a chorus that causes the ground to tremble with a repeating beat.

Some superstitious Bedine attribute the rumblings to the knelling alarms of long-buried fortresses, the “ghost-haunted castles of the Buried Lands,” which is the term by which they know the Lost Kingdoms.

Not all of the Sword is sand. Besides the obvious exceptions of oases and mountain ranges, areas of the desert such as At’ar’s Looking Glass are plains (flat sheets) of pebbles or bare rock sheets. These are covered with glistening salt, evaporated from the infrequent rainfalls by the terrific heat of the sun beating on the stone. These salt pans gleam a dazzling white in the sun. Some salt pans, near the southern edges of the Sword, are treacherously thin crusts covering saltwater bogs deep enough to drown in.

In the rare cases where one finds a stream in the desert (almost always when it has sprung up on a mountain and run down into the sands, to soon vanish), it forms a gulch. If the water is sufficient, the gulch will be roofed with the droopy, twiggy branches of ghafl trees, and lined with tasseled sedges of qassis bushes. These crowd together around the water, offering animals down in the draw shaded shelter (and concealment from the eyes of all watchers not actually in the gulch). The tinkling of the stream can be clearly heard from afar when the wind is low, and at other times the wind carries the smell of the water to camels and other desert animals. Doves and quail live around such a watercourse.

Rain is too infrequent to keep streams and rivers flowing continuously in the Sword; where there is no natural spring causing it, the water dries up between rains, leaving dry wadis (dusty, open watercourses). These may become raging, muddy torrents when rain does fall-for there is nothing in this parched land to catch or slow the flowing water.

When a spring fails, streams may vanish altogether. The small ponds or lakes fed by such springs then dry up, forming mamlahahs, or “dead waters:’ These appear as small, flat-bottomed valleys, their clay-rich soil cracked into a plain of irregular alabaster pentagons as hard as ceramics baked by humans. A muddy pond surrounded by acacia trees is left, at the last of the deep water; when the water fails entirely, these also die away.

The heated air of any sand desert causes mirages (false images of water, oases, or other phantom things, on the horizon) and heat shimmer.

Heat shimmer is a visual distortion that dwellers in the Sword are quite used to, but by day it still causes even veterans of desert life to fire missile weapons (at medium or long range) at - 2 to hit. This handicap increases to - 4 when the target is a mirror image (as caused by the wizardly spell), or a being engaged in blinking or wearing a cloak of displacement.

The Desert By Day

By day, the desert is a merciless oven, little suited to human existence. Wise desert dwellers hide in what shade they can find, or move only slowly and carefully, doing only light work (digging back into shelter if disturbed is commonly the only strenuous task most desert life undertakes). The desert winds provide a steady drone, dropping at sunset.

On a clear night, sunset in the Sword looks something like this: At’ar (as Bedine call the sun) sinks steadily towards the western horizon, a great disk of blinding yellow light that turns the sea of dunes ahead into a labyrinth of silhouettes and dazzling yellow reflections. The lowering sun darkens to scarlet, and as it sets behind the dunes, the western sky turns a spectacular amber and ruby. As the light fades, the troughs between the dunes turn velvety shades of ebony and indigo, while the crests of the dunes are tipped with a rosy ethereal glow. More level areas turn purple at dusk. Everything darkens: slowly at first, and then with increasing speed. Deep purple gives way to the blackness of night (unless or until the moon rises, and the pale greenish-white moonlight lights the tops of the dunes). The temperature drops with the light, lingering in the sand for longer than it does in the air.

The Desert By Night

In the Sword, the desert is chilly at night, the sky usually clear. The winds die to gentle breezes, or fail altogether. The stars form a brilliant, glittering display overhead.

The constellations are many and varied—or at least, the countless stars visible in the clear desert sky are known by many names throughout the Realms, varying from race to race, realm to realm, and even from Bedine tribe to Bedine tribe. Here we will mention only those most useful for navigating. These “most prominent” stars are visible all over the North, and are used by travelers in many, many places outside the borders of Anauroch.

The west is marked by two “fuzzy” clusters of blue-white stars, which appear as two side-by-side crescents or arcs in the sky, points downward. To most Bedine, these are The Two Jambiyas (and this is mirrored in the Moonsea cities, whose folk generally call them The Double Daggers). To some Bedine, these are the Eyes of Elah (closed, only the lashes visible); in like manner, some barbarian tribes of the Sword Coast North call these the Eyes of the Watching Woman, and men of Hill’s Edge speak of “where Selune looks back.” Whatever one calls, them, true west can be found exactly halfway between the two arcs-heading “straight between the eyes.”

The North is marked by an awesome circle of large, bright stars with utter darkness between them, which is known to most folk today as Mystra’s Star Circle (her floating Castle of Night, in childrens’ fairytales, is said to float in the center of the darkness). Due north is marked by the brightest “Brow Star,” called Alagairtha by the Bedine, after a proud Bedine sorceress who is said to have challenged the gods long, long ago, and been imprisoned in the heavens as a punishment: to preserve her breathtaking beauty, but keep her forever frozen and helpless.

Other folk in the Realms call this constellation the Crown of the North, or just the “Cold Crown.” Some believe it to be the Eye of Evil, or the Hole That Leads To Darkness; some Bedine tribes believe that this place is N’asr’s Tent, the dwelling-place of the Lord of the Dead. Most Bedine call it the Circle of Swords (the shining scimitars of the greatest Bedine gathered by N’asr) or the Circle of Coins (thrown on high by the gods, to taunt poor men).

East in the Sword’s sky is marked by At’ar’s Arrows: three converging lines of stars, each with a cluster of stars at its outward end, or “point.” Where the three lines come together is due east. The Bedine believe that these are three fiery arrows launched by the sun goddess, to clear and mark her way (as the sun rises here). To folk elsewhere in the Realms, these stars are called the Arrows of the Gods, the Sun’s Signpost, or the Caltrop.

South in the desert sky is marked by a zigzag line of stars that ‘crawls’ along the horizon, from west to east, beginning with an upswept “head” or bright starry cluster, and ending with a curving “tail” of stars. To the Bedine, this is the Serpent of the Sands, Urwath, “The Swallower.” The desert nomads believe that this creature is wild and amoral, older than the gods, and that it swallows mountains, trees, and grasses to create the desert, leaving only sand in its wake. Its presence in the southern sky, most Bedine believe, means that the desert will continually expand southward, as it eats its way across the Outlands.

Folk elsewhere in the Realms do not see this line of stars so clearly; not being on their horizon most of the time, it is enmeshed in a tangle of small constellations, and is not thought of as a unit. In Tunland, Cormyr, Iriaebor, and Westgate, however, it is recognized as a star configuration marking the direction “south:” and is known respectively as Faeraula, the Sword of the South, the Southfires, and the Lightning Bolt.

Weather in The Sword

The Sword desert tends to be very hot and windy by day, and very cold and relatively calm by night.

This part of Anauroch rarely sees rain or snow, even when lands around are lashed by torrential rains, or locked in the grip of howling blizzards. The area is just too dry. Most “weather” consists of differences in wind direction and force, from still “dead air” to windstorms that reshape the desert landscape. Violent winds always catch up and carry along desert sand, and are detailed further in the “Dangers of the Desert” section, under “Sandstorms” The main visible characteristic of sandstorms (or “duststorms,” as they are also called) is that the sky is obliterated: vision is typically reduced to only a few feet.

Rainfall is scarce and variable: one spot gets it, but a mile away, no rain may fall. The rare “wet storms” of the Sword tend to be both short and violent. Lightning strikes are common, thunder rolls, and the rainfall is hard (even battering) and fast. When the storms are small, and travel over hot salt pans, the heat may evaporate the rain before it reaches the ground, creating a “ghost storm” that sweeps across the desert, raining hard, without ever wetting the landscape land thirsty Bedine) below.

More often, the rare rainstorms lash the ground, transforming wadis into raging torrents that can drown camels and even larger creatures in moments. The sparse vegetation of the Sword cannot hold water; rain runs over the land, seeking the lowest elevations, until it sinks into a salt pan or is all evaporated away by the heat of the sun.

All over the desert, as the water falls on the sand, flowers open. Insects rush to them and swarm in the air to mate, lay eggs, and feed, hurrying to take advantage of the fleeting moisture. So too do the reptiles, birds, and mammals of the desert. Perennial plants blossom and set seed, and some plants spring up from seed to dot the desert with brief life; when the water is all gone, they will have grown, flowered, and produced seeds again, to wither and die in the dry heat that follows. Cacti swell up in these wet spells, storing water.

The desert is briefly a place of plenty, and the Bedine rush about, gathering all they can (many desert herbs and fruits can only be found at such times). Rains have even been known to halt battles, as everyone turns to gathering precious foodstuffs. With most of the desert snakes, lizards, and other animals on the move, they are plentiful, easily seen, and are relatively easy prey.

Desert Wildlife

Although conditions in the Sword are as harsh as those known in Raurin and other, larger hot sand deserts, the Swords' unnatural origins enable it to exist much closer to plentiful water, and very different climates, than other deserts. This allows more intrusions into the Sword than may occur in other deserts, both from so-called intelligent creatures (such as humans and orcs), and from lesser life, such as insects. Swarms of moths are not unknown in Anauroch, coming out of the Stonelands and the backlands of the Sword Coast. Insect swarms can be met with in spring and fall in the hot region, and at all times except chill winter along the edges of the desert.

Insect Swarms These are fully detailed in Volume 4 of the Monstrous Compendium. DMs lacking this DRAGONLANCE[®] appendix can use the following simplification: Characters with AC 0 or less in contact with a swarm are 80% likely, each round, to be bitten for 1 hp of damage (plus 1% per point of Armor Class; i.e., a being with an AC of 6 has an 86% chance, an unarmored person [AC 10] a 90% chance of being bitten). Vision is reduced to 2d8 feet, and all beings caught in the swarm suffer -2 on attack and damage rolls due to pain, loss of clear vision, and the interference of the countless flying insects. Beings in a swarm are unable to speak (insects will clog their mouths), so most spellcasting is impossible. (For variety, use the effects of the insect plague spell.)

Insect swarms eat everything edible (i.e., the meager desert plants, and any available carrion) in their path; this can cause camels to starve, if forced to travel through the same area the swarm did. Smoke or fire scatters swarms, or turns them away. Other attacks totalling 60 points of damage crush enough insects to cause the swarm to move on. (Most insects are edible, and five handfuls can sustain a starving human, but eating them is not pleasant. Their acidity may cause sudden stabbing pains when the eater exerts himself; in combat, AC is reduced by 1, and attack rolls are made at -1.) Rolling in sand or dousing with water temporarily removes insects from a being. (If PCs manage to exterminate an entire swarm, award 2,000 experience points.) Insects are the most numerous desert creatures, but are not the most visible, except when swarming. Most Bedine will tell a questioner that they see the incessantly-tittering, nocturnal desert bats most often of all desert wildlife.

Desert Bats These bats wing over the dark desert (Fl 14, MC B) in search of insects of all sorts and sizes. They are AC 7, have 1d4 hp each, and can bite for 1 hp of damage (THAC0 20), but most avoid contact with large creatures if at all possible. Some drink blood, and will bite sleeping camels or humans with needle-sharp fangs, fluttering rapidly away an instant later when their target awakens. Desert bats lair in rock crevices by day, and tend to be dark in hue, leathery and bony (a desperate man might need seven or more to make a meal). Very few (8%) carry diseases.

Daytime Desert Life Only a few wild desert creatures are active during the day, such as camels, grasshoppers, beetles, and spiders, which have long legs to hold them away from the hot sand.

Lizards, snakes, antelopes (particularly gazelles), asses (especially onagers), and lions can be found in plenty, if one knows where and when to look, in the Sword. The most common large animals are camels.

Camels Camels (also described in the "Bedine Society" chapter) are native to the Sword. Wild camel droves have become very rare, however: Bedine hunters have seen to that, scouring the desert in search of animals to capture and tame.

A wild drove typically consists of one or two males and three to five females, sleeping in the open at night and grazing by day on grasses, brushwood, and shrubs.

The males fight and bite savagely during mating times (right after the rains). Camels have a gestation period of 370 to 440 days, and give birth to single young. Infant camels are suckled for 3 or 4 months, and aren't fully grown until they are 16 or 17. Camels only live to be around 25 years old.

To stay in peak condition (full carrying or pulling capacity), a camel working in the hot desert needs to drink some water at least every third day. In cold winter weather, camels can go without drinking for several months. Contrary to the beliefs of most outlanders, camels do not have water-sac organs, although desperate nomads kill camels and drink both their pea-green, salty rumen-sac fluid, and their blood.

Pack dromedaries can carry 600 pounds, and a Bactrian camel up to 1000, for around 30 miles a day. Normal walking speed is only 3 miles per hour. A fast walk (both legs on one side stepping forward, then the other side) is 6 miles per hour, but camels can only keep this up for a few hours at a time.

Racing camels can go almost twice as fast as pack animals, but to keep one moving at its fastest pace (the long trot) the rider must create a sore on the camel's neck, and prick it continuously.

The Strange And The Unknown Desert wildlife is little known to outlanders, and new forms are being discovered constantly. There are even rumors that a magical gate has been opened somewhere in the northern Sword, linking Faerun with the world of Krynn: adventurers have reported meeting with hatori, horax, skrits, and even tylors there. Explorers are warned: just about anything may be met with in the desert! Of interest to outlanders (only due to their odd appearance) are curious "fuzzy crawling brains" (as the adventurer Thayalin of Baldur's Gate aptly described them) seen after rainfalls. These are giant velvet earthmites: vivid, hand-sized, wrinkled, furry, red, crawling things. They are harmless, unintelligent, and inedible, and emerge during the rains to eat termites, mate, and then burrow back down under the sands until the next rains.

Even in "dead" central areas of the Sword, dried windborne vegetation supports a few insects, which in turn are fed upon by arachnids and reptiles. In some areas, the ground is white not with salt, but with the large shells of countless desert snails. The snails themselves slip out of their shells to spend the dry summer in a torpor, deep down in cracks in the ground, or among rocks. Their abandoned shells are sealed up with an exuded membrane, to trap as much moisture inside as possible, but a shell only holds enough moisture to sustain a thirsty human body for a day if that body (by means of magic, perhaps) is four inches tall, or less.

Wizards with pocketfuls of snail-shells and a spellbook with a reduce spell in it have walked alive out of the Sword, by moving (in normal size) at night, shrinking, drinking the moisture in a shell, and sheltering in it by day, studying to replace the used reduce spell and sleeping).

Desert Plants

Plants are far fewer in desert areas than elsewhere in the Realms, but they are present in a great variety of types and sizes. Most are thick and fleshy, and have small leaf and surface areas, so as to hold as much moisture as possible. Most also have features to discourage predators, such as thorns, unpleasant odors, or poisonous or laxative juices or secretions.

Desert plants tend to have short life cycles; like the animals, they must take advantage of brief periods of "wet" after rainfall. Some plants can grow, flower, and produce seeds in as little as a ride (10 days).

Typical Plant Varieties

The more numerous desert plant types are briefly described below for DM use in describing desert landscapes. Those that are especially edible (or dangerous to eat) are noted. The profusion of plant life found in oases is covered later in this chapter, in its own section, as are "desert crops."

Allium is an onion-like plant that grows up from a buried "crown" in spears, like asparagus. It is eaten by many desert-dwellers, both human and animal, and is always a good source of water. It is hardy; a dead allium withers but allium rarely rots or carries any mold, fungus, or disease.

Boojum Trees may grow to the height of a man's shoulder, but are more often only three feet or less tall. They resemble giant parsnips (or whitish carrots), growing upside-down, on the ground, because they have conical whitish trunks, that taper to their topmost point.

Bare for much of the time, boojum trees sprout leaves in times of rain. In a few weeks, these leaves drop off; the stems they leave behind are thorns that can scratch humans for 1-2 hp of damage per contact, and which dissuade grazing desert animals from munching on boojum wood. The boojum trees of the Sword are not edible, but a desperate human could chew the woody flesh to get some water from plant juices.

Bunch Grasses grow in bunches or tufts, from bulbs buried in the sand. The tops (broad-bladed grass spears, a favorite food of grazing desert animals) wither and die each year, only to come up again from the bulb. The bulbs are edible but unappetizing; a man would have to eat about thirty of them every 24 hours to gain enough water for survival.

Buried Tubers are a valuable regular food-source for Bedine and other desert animals intelligent enough (and physically suited) to dig for them. These can grow as large as two men's heads, and hold much water (life-savers in times of drought).

On the surface, these plants are found by their grassy stems (which flower during rains), and tend to grow in a line, following the shape of the buried root beneath. The roots tend to be brown or golden-brown in hue, knobbly, and grow in a long, roughly straight cylindrical shape. They have hairlike roots growing out of them, all over: tough, stringy things that may be as long as seven men are tall, and are best gnawed or cut off, if one wants to take the tuber out of the sand and carry it away.

Cacti are the most impressive desert plants. They all tend to be bulbous and prickly, but range in shape from "prickly pear" ground-bud sorts to giant "saguaro" multi-armed upright types.

A staple to some Bedine tribes, cacti can be mashed to yield drinking syrup which will keep for months, or can be fermented into a drink. The cactus flesh can be eaten, the seeds made into a sort of butter, the stems of giant cacti used as tent-poles, the thorns used as sewing-needles, and the dried husks of long-dead cacti can be burned as fuel.

Few cacti taste nice, and only a few can be cut open to yield plentiful “free” water; most must be mashed, or the flesh chewed, to extract moisture. The thorns dissuade most desert life from disturbing cacti, unless they have swords to cut it apart. No known cacti in the Sword can throw their needles at targets that aren’t touching them, but many have thorns that detach at the slightest brush of a solid body. Cacti thorn-damage ranges from 1 point for a single contact with a small cactus up to 2d12 points for a full-body fall or charge into a giant saguaro. Most contacts (e.g. being hit by a prickly cactus “club” wielded by a human opponent, or stumbling into an upright cactus) deal 2d4 points of damage.

Cereus grows from a buried bulb. The variety found in the Sword looks dead by day, its small cluster of leafy stems drooping and shrivelled. At night, the leaves open to reveal floral blooms that gather moisture, and are sticky enough to trap insects that light upon them, which the plant drains for food. Both the flowers and the bulbs are edible, but the gluey floral secretions make most humans who eat them violently ill, costing moisture and food value, rather than bestowing it.

Chenopods are grasses that grow in arc-shaped tufts. They are a vivid reddish-purple, and their juices are poisonous tall mammals who eat of this type of plant must save vs. poison or immediately suffer 2d4 hp damage, followed by a 2d12-turn period of nausea and mental confusion). Beings affected by chenopod poison make attack and damage rolls at -2, and suffer an Armor Class penalty of 3 points. At the onset of contact with the poison, the victim must make two successful Intelligence checks. If either or both fail, the victim is feble-minded until the poison wears off.

Chenopods have a biting, nose-stinging odor. They grow evenly spaced in the sand, because their efficient roots drink all the water for a certain distance around them, and no other plants can grow in that space. To eyes not versed in desert ways, this always looks as though the chenopods were deliberately planted by human (or other intelligent) hands.

These hardy plants tend to be found in a ring around the outermost watered fringes of an oasis, spring, or other water source.

Creosote bushes found in the Sword are small, gnarled, many-branched things that are russet, rust, or purplish-black in hue; they are tarry, oozing black, sticky liquid whenever their jointed branches are broken. They are burned by Bedine over catchbasins to extract a sticky tar used for sealing water-containers.

Lichens are the scabrous, repulsive-looking grey-green growths on rocks. They are edible (but unappealing, and of very low food value), and grow on the sides of rocks closest to large bodies of water. In the westernmost third of the Sword, lichens grow on the western sides of rocks, in response to damp winds blowing in from the Marsh of Chelimber.

Mesquite trees provide Bedine with most of their firewood. These unimpressive trees may yield a surprising amount of wood, once uprooted and sun-dried: their roots may go down a hundred feet or more to tap deep water. In doing so, the trees stabilize sand dunes they are growing on, holding them in place against wind migration.

Ocotillo are root-based plants with leafless, dead-looking stems (except just after rainfall, when they sprout many tiny leaflets, which soon fall off). As a result, they escape many desert foragers, being dismissed as “dead.” The variety found in the Sword is not edible except as roughage for very hungry, antelopes and camels.

Puncture-Vines are thankfully-rare creeper plants that grow in rocky areas where some water is present. They flower in rainfalls, but otherwise look like mottled green ropes tangled upon the ground, marked every foot or so by a ring or “collar” of bristling thorns, which are sharp, sturdy, and almost impossible to avoid. Contact with any collar of thorns does 1d4 points of damage; a being falling on several collars, or who is bound with a length of thorny vine, suffers damage per collar contacted, for every contact with, or movement to get out of, the vine.

Saltbush (or Saltbrush) are a variety of withered-looking shrubs that are the most numerous desert plants. They stud dunes all over the Sword, and form the main diet of camels on the move.

Windmills, named for their overall shape, are flowering plants that send out several stems along the ground, radiating out like spokes of a wheel, to gather water, and to send up other tufts. They anchor the sandy surfaces of dunes, and their tough stems can be used to tie things down (until they dry out and fall apart, which takes 3d10 days; add 1d8 days whenever a stem is wetted by rain, blood, or submersion in water).

Desert "Crops"

In addition to plants harvested for personal survival, Bedine (and others who venture into the Sword) can glean goods from the desert that can be sold for profit: desert "crops." The best-known of these are frankincense, myrrh, and salt (though few village folk in Amn or even the Dragonreach, for instance, know that these things come from the desert). Bedine selling such crops generally trade with D'tarig, but may sell these things to outlanders (if the outlanders have things the Bedine want, and seem too powerful for the Bedine to overpower and slay).

The most important "desert crops" of the Sword are listed here, in alphabetical order. They are the reasons why many merchants venture north from Arabel and Tilverton, and east from Hill's Edge, to meet with the Bedine—and they are spoils that more than one adventuring band has brought back from the hot sands.

First, there is the favorite drink of the Bedine: coffee. The plants whose beans yield the bitter brew (which increases in popularity across the North, as the years pass) grow wild in certain oases and mountain valleys in the central Sword, and some Bedine tribes have begun to cultivate it.

Certain trees, particularly in mountainous areas of the eastern and northeastern Sword (and westward, in hills along the southern edge of the Plain of Standing Stones, where many small, nameless streams rush down out of the rocks, to sink into the sands and be lost) yield another desert crop: an aromatic, amber-hued resin known as dragons' blood.

Its trees mingle with others, those types that produce the more famous frankincense and myrrh, and all three resins are used in similar ways.

It is difficult to put prices on resin crops, because "raw" resin is often bartered away by the Bedine, not sold—and commands far less than buyers must eventually pay for it in far-off cities of the Realms. Roughly, a Bedine sells a fist-sized lump of the finest raw frankincense for 1 gold piece. An identical lump of dragons' blood is worth 5 sp, and an identical lump of myrrh 3 gp.

Frankincense is derived from trees of several related species. All have very short trunks; they split near the ground into a fan of branches. The ideal growing conditions for these trees are a steady, hot sun, pale limestone soil, and heavy dew from a monsoon (wet, onshore coastal) wind, or from abundant mists. (On the watered northeastern edge of the Sword, these occur each morning, as the sun rapidly heats cold, damp ground.) Frankincense is harvested by chipping away bark from tree branches with a spatulalike chisel, scraping clean a patch the size of a man's hand. Milk-white sap "tears" well up in the wound immediately. The harvester moves on to other trees. When he returns, three weeks later, the ooze will have hardened into a translucent golden resin: frankincense.

The first scrapings are worthless; the secand cutting, weeks later, yields low-quality frankincense (typically used by Bedine in their own bodyrub perfumes and aromatic “tent-smokes,” burned in braziers); only the third gives pure, sweet-scented frankincense.

Across the Realms, frankincense is used for rituals and health purposes. Specifically, it sees use in the scenting of incense, which is burned in various religious rituals (for example, to appease a god, to consecrate or cleanse a temple, to mask the odor of cremations, and so on). Its odor also makes it a valued ingredient in cosmetics, from simple Bedine pastes to the most intricate and costly spiced concoctions of Calimshan and Mulhorand.

Frankincense is also thought by many to be useful in curing gout, mental confusion, vision problems, and skin disorders. The almost white variety, known as shihri, is chewed by Bedine and some folk of Unther, Mulhorand, Raurin, Thay, Tharsult and Calimshan because it’s “good for the teeth and gums, and helps clear the brain.” (Just how effective frankincense really is in such endeavors varies from person to person, and in game terms, is left up to the DM.)

The desert hills and mountains yield another sort of riches: gold, which in the Sword tends to be found in pure, soft, large nuggets or lump-like inclusions in larger rocks. Many Bedine tribes make their own coins, using the sand as a mold, but more often, nuggets are melted into egg-shaped “trade-balls” or fashioned into heavier bars, called “fists,” that fit into a man’s palm, with a row of fingerholes, rather like a pair of “brass knuckles.” The value of either unit of gold varies with the market (supply), and the particular piece’s size and purity, but a ball tends to be worth around 15 gp, and a fist around 25.

The mountainous areas of the desert, particularly near permanent sources of water, give shelter to many birds. The droppings of these fowl (unlike, say, those splashed on a neglected stone statue in some ruin of the Sword Coast North) are not washed away by the infrequent desert storms, and over the years may accumulate, on the rocks where birds nest or perch often, into thick concretions. This guano is a rich fertilizer, prized in large cities of the Realms. It is also burned as fuel by those who can stand the heavy, cloying smell. A sack of guano as big as a man’s head might fetch a Bedine the equivalent of 1 sp.

Other desert rocks yield deposits of gypsum (used in the making of plaster and alabaster). It is broken off into chunks, although the dust is as valuable and useful, and also sold in head-sized sacks (the D’tarig continually supply the Bedine with empty sacks), which command about the same price as guano.

Certain bushes, which grow here and there in the mountain foothills and knolls of the Sword, yield indigo. This dark blue dye is derived by stirring the crushed leaves of the indigo bush into water, which yields a mixture as thick as porridge. This mixture is used as a clothing dye; sun-baked clay jars of it are traded by the Bedine, who put it to their own use by putting purchased rolls of cotton cloth into the dye jars, soaking them for days, and then rolling the cloth out on a dirt surface and beating it for hours with wooden mallets, to work the dye into the cloth.

In winter, some Bedine tribesmen rub indigo mixed with sesame seeds (for their oil, when crushed in the hands) on their bare chests and legs. They believe it keeps them warm.

Myrrh is a resin harvested from a single thorny, squat species of tree that grows deep in the Sword. It is three times as expensive as frankincense, but only one-fifth as popular. When heated, this resin breaks down easily into an aromatic oil of many uses. Oil of myrrh is employed in religious purifying anointings; burned as a fumigant; added in tiny amounts to sauces in cooking; and used in embalming and as a medicine for pregnant Bedine women. The resin can also be formed into beads that are strung into necklaces, releasing the fragrance when warmed by the skin.

Bedine cooking-fires also yield potash, sold

“in the rough” and as the valuable Faerunian rarities glass and soap.

The conversion of potash (with other ingredients, such as sand) into glass and soap are processes held secret by certain Bedine tribes, although many in the Realms know them. An outlander who reveals he knows how to make glass, or soap, to such a Bedine tribe will be slain to “protect the secret.” The nomads simply won’t believe the arts of making soap and glass are widely-known.

Bedine signal-glasses (small, curved hand-mirrors) are made by such processes. Some signal-mirrors are curved to fit into a small earthen pot with a lid, for concealment and to prevent accidental flashes when riding in the sun.

Bedine also mine salt in the Sword. In some places—especially in the eastern Sword, where the sands cover the ancient, hardened remnants of vanished seas—salt can be cut from the ground in slabs. When working these deposits, Bedine tend to cut slabs as long as a man and that weigh as much as two men, so that one can be strapped to either side of a pack camel.

Salt is valuable in the North both for curing and preserving, and a camel-slab can fetch as much as 30 gp. Humans need extra salt to survive in the hot desert, so Bedine consume a lot of the salt they gather.

Small “veins” of salt can be found in many places in the Sword, in crevices between rocks. Salt can also be derived by evaporating saline water on hot, bare patches of rock, although few Bedine tribes can safely reach the salt-pans that overlie water, to cut them open. No plants will grow where salt is too plentiful, even when water is abundant; to the experienced desert-dweller's eye, a spot where there is water enough for plants, but which has none, is a telltale sign of salt.

Sesame seeds can be gathered only by those Bedine near the Desertsedge, but they are used both as a food (roasted and eaten by the handful) and as a source of sesame oil, which has many uses (chiefly in cooking). It is sold by some Bedine tribes in clay jugs that taper at both ends, as long as a man's leg and as large around in the middle as a man's head, for about 1 sp a jug.

Sesame oil is derived by means of camel-powered mills. A camel is driven around and around in a circle, hauling a wooden beam counterweighted with stones. The hub of the beam turns in a mortar hollowed from a desert acacia, crushing sesame seeds to make the oil.

Desert plants also yield tanbark and turmeric, used by Bedine women as a makeup and sunscreen, and by many folk of Faerun as a dye and a spice-but supplies of these are intermittent, and they do not command high prices.

Oases

All creatures of the desert are more numerous where water is more plentiful. The oasis, or shallah (a word older than the Bedine tongue, and known in the Moonsea area and Amn, suggesting it came with mankind from the ancient South), is a name given to places where, in this most dry of deserts, there is always water. Oases are "islands of life" in the desert, readily recognizable by the green plants that grow in profusion about them. They are the areas that the Bedine (and in particular, their camels) depend upon, to survive. Almost all oases in the Sword are claimed by a Bedine tribe, or shared (seldom at the same time) by several tribes.

Oases vary in size and characteristics, and some have become poisoned, so that their water gives aid only to those with magical means of purifying it, or immunity to the taint. There is such a thing as a "false oasis," where the water fails from time to time.

A typical oasis is centered around a pond, usually a spring-fed depression. Streams don't flow far in a sandy desert; the water sinks into the sand and is lost again, and the sun evaporates rainwater quickly from depressions. A lasting pool requires an additional source of water.

Around this watersource wild shrubs and trees spring up; often apricot trees and thornflower bushes, overseen by soaring palm trees. Oases undisturbed by man support more shrubs, oleander and tamarisk trees than date palms, fruit trees, and vegetables. But in the Sword, Bedine hands have worked on almost every oasis, carefully selecting date palms and fruit trees, and tending them so as to cover the maximum possible area. Trees are propped up, where possible, to maximize shade and to raise the nests of birds out of the reach of some predators (fresh eggs are a delicacy on Bedine tables). For the same reason, thorny vines are trained around the trunks of trees low down, but kept carefully cut back to avoid choking the trees.

Whatever artificial means are used to make the oasis larger, or more fertile (all garbage and human refuse, for instance, are buried in crescent-shaped beds located to feed existing trees and to encourage the spread of seedlings), a distance is eventually reached at which the heat and lack of water stop tree growth. The oasis dwindles around its edges to tufts of salty grass and spindly chenopods, before giving way to the endless sea of sand again.

Jackals, hares, gazelles, and even ostriches may be found at oases in the desert-and all desert animals come to oases to drink, when they must. Bedine and others who know how can gain food in oases where there is apparently none to be had (and in many places along the less-dry sands of the Desertsedge), by digging up a staple diet of edible bulbs and roots. They also eat burrowing worms, insects, and eggs, both avian and reptilian (the empty eggshells are then used as water containers), found in oases.

New oases do occur naturally from time to time, as springs find their way to the surface in a new spot. These occurrences are rare, and the full life of an oasis is slow to develop around the newfound water, although some plants will quickly sprout in the hitherto barren sand.

Created Oases

The Zhentarim have hit upon an ingenious practice: “growing” an oasis around a decanter of endless water). At least five such bases are known to exist in the desert: Bhaerlith, Haunga, Ma’atar, Olomaa, and Vuerthyl.

The chosen sites are often bolsons (natural basins at the foot of mountains or ridges, and shielded by them from the worst of the desert winds). Wadis may already lead down into these sites from the mountains above; it is always easier to establish plants when water-hungry plants are already present.

On the other hand, the Zhentarim want to put oases where Bedine tribes won’t expect to find them (and so won’t come looking), and in strategic locations to create a trade route with abundant water, available often, so that camels are never worked to death. This leads some “created oases” to be founded in unprotected desert, or even on raised, windswept plateaus that overlook the surrounding sands.

The Zhentarim create artificial oases by digging out ponds where bedrock is near the surface, and sheltering rock outcrops are nearby, activating a decanter of endless water and dropping it in the excavation, and then bringing in seeds, plants, and the like by means of teleportation spells. This takes a lot of time and gold pieces, so the Zhents do it only when an oasis is critical to the success of a caravan route. The Bedine quickly find such new desert features, and the Zhentarim have to defend them if they want to gain any benefit from all their work.

So such artificial oases are few—and all of them sport magical and physical traps, or even fortifications, and guardians. These are sometimes minor Zhentarim wizards, with a bodyguard of warriors (the Bedine fear of sorcery makes even weak wizards more effective than four times their number of Zhentilar warriors). The guardians may also be summoned or “placed” creatures, such as guardian daemons (detailed in Volume 2 of the Monstrous Compendium) or watchghosts (detailed in The Ruins of Undermountain boxed set).

Places In The Sword

Please refer to the color mapsheet provided with this sourcebook for the locations of features mentioned here. The preceding details of desert landscape and plants should help DMs “flesh out” such places, when they are visited in the course of play. Oases or cities that may become battlegrounds should be at least rough-mapped before play therein commences.

Population: 2,600

In the foothills west of the northern end of the Tethyamar mountains is the D’tarig village of Addas Babar. Its sprawling mud huts and mud-and-beam inns (the tallest of which has three floors) can hold as many as 2,000 guests, and there is ample camping room in the area; the village sprawls over five or six ridges and the ravines and bowl valleys between them, with an open market area and only four streets that are lined with structures (as most human settlements are).

Addas Babar is the largest D'tarig settlement, and exists to serve them as a trading-center with the rest of the world; all of its D'tarig residents have "real" tunnel or cave-homes in the mountains and higher lands to the east, as well as their "village rooms." The village also serves outlanders as a hiring center for D'tarig, a refuge of sorts (and hiring center) for human outlaws from all over the Dragonreach, and a place where traveling merchants can set up shop to sell large amounts of goods without peddling wares up and down every hill of D'tarig territory.

Alagh's Pass

Named for a lone Bedine warrior who fell here long ago, heroically holding the pass against a rival tribe to allow his own tribe more time to flee, this barren mountain pass allows passage between the Saiyaddar (see below), on one side of the mountains, and the Hills of Scent (see below) on the other. On either side, the pass is entered through winding, rocky canyons whose cliffs are broken by many side-fissures-most of them ideal for ambushes.

Just below the pass, on the Hills of Scent side, is a nameless mamalahah (dried-up lake) no more than two miles across, its onetime floor now a patchwork of hard-baked alabaster pentagons. At its center is a muddy pond surrounded by acacia trees, that a Zhentarim army poisoned when fighting the Bedine.

At'ar's Looking Glass

This distinctive feature of the Sword is a roughly oval sea of burnished stones. It covers an area of about a hundred and forty miles (four and a half days of camel travel), east to west, and about two hundred miles north to south.

Its western edge is marked by a line of obelisklike mountain peaks, known as the Scimitar Spires (see below). Low, dun-colored dunes line the rest of its borders.

At'ar's Looking Glass is a flat, seemingly endless mosaic of coin-sized stones. The pebbles are mostly red, varying in hue from blond to dark brown. All are polished glass-smooth, giving these open flats a fiery, pebbled appearance. It captures the sun's heat, and is too hot for even camels to walk on for long without making them limp. A fallen Bedine, or a roast of meat, will literally cook on the stones if left motionless in the sun long enough.

There is no shade or water in the Looking Glass, and no known treasure, though there are persistent Bedine tables of gemstones scattered among all the other pebbles, polished and free for the taking to those who search diligently enough.

Azirrhath

This series of cloven and rocky spires rises out of dry desert, in the form of several barren ridges that form the shape of a gigantic chicken's foot, its toes pointing northeast.

Its name means "the Slashed Rocks," and comes from the cracked appearance of the peaks. Some Bedine have told of finding rich gold veins here, but few go looking; the deep crevices in these rocks lead down to caverns where laertis dwell (see the "Monsters of Anauroch" chapter). The laertis come each night to hunt, sometimes ranging east as far as merchant encampments around Addas Babar, where they devour the internal organs of camels and men alike.

The Zhentarim contacted the laertis to hire them as mercenary warriors in an attempt to seize control of the surface Sword (see "The Zhentarim in Anauroch"), here. It is a place avoided by the Bedine.

Bhaerlith

A rich oasis of date palms and fruit trees, recently created by the Zhentarim (see "Created Oases," earlier in this chapter). There is said to be a stone-lined underground storehouse and sleeping-chamber here.

Bhaerlith is also said to be haunted by a guardian daemon, who will attack any not bearing (or drawing) a certain symbol, who try to approach the central oasis pool or the entrances to the underground areas.

The oasis also sports many spring-sword traps, buried in the sand around its perimeter (Zhents know the safe places to enter, by using trees within as landmarks). Triggering one of these by an unlucky step causes the blade to burst forth from the sands, doing its maximum normal damage, and striking at THAC0 6.

The bodies of Bedine and other trespassers are impaled on wooden stakes outside the oasis as warnings; several Bedine trying to steal these long, sturdy wooden poles (something rare in the desert) found out the hard way that these grisly markers are themselves trapped by fell magic and by spring-swords.

Colored Waters

This large, spectacular oasis fills a bowl-shaped, steep-walled ebony basin ten miles long, eight miles wide, and over a thousand feet deep. It lies in a region of small, yellow, transverse dunes, where the sand is only a few inches deep in the wide troughs between them. As one travels through these golden sands, the land slowly rises, until one reaches the ancient volcanic cauldron wherein Colored Waters lies.

Except for a few star dunes of golden sand, the basin is covered with fine, sable-colored silt. In its center is an amber-hued cone of cinders, nearly as tall as the basin's rim. The Bedine believe this was the site of the battle where the gods destroyed N'asr's servants from the Camp of the Dead, and that the amber cone is the heaped ashes of those servants.

Five lakes, each shaped like a scimitar's crescentiform blade, ring the base of the cone. The waters of each are a different hue: emerald-green, turquoise, silver, sapphire blue, and ruby-red. Bedine legend says the different colors resulted when gods fell in that long-ago battle, and their dried blood was washed or blown into the water, and dissolved.

Around each lake are wild fig trees, tall golden grasses, and leafy green bushes. Over the entire basin floor, salt-brush and hardy lime-green qassis plants poke through the ebony ash. The shape and dark hue of the basin makes it a gigantic trap for the sun's heat; heat shimmer distorts vision above and in the basin, Colored Waters is warmed by volcanic activity from beneath, too: Bedine have brewed tea here simply by setting their pots on steaming rock-fissures. Colored Waters is the favored camp of the Mahwa tribe, under Sheikh Sa'ar.

El Ma'ra

This small but verdant oasis is named for, and marked by, El Ma'ra Dat-ur Ojhogo ("The tall god who lets men sit upon his head": see "The Gods of Anauroch"), a single, 100'-tall spire of yellow sandstone. El Ma'ra stands a mile outside the oasis that bears its name.

Encamped Bedine use the flat-topped spire as a lookout-place, their guards climbing up and down by means of ropes, and keeping watch armed and with mouth-blown "alarm horns." A fall from the spire will kill most men.

This was the favored oasis of the Qahtan tribe, until they were exterminated by the Zhentarim and their laerti allies.

El Rahalat

This gray-crowned mountain is referred to as the Shunned Mountain because of Rahalat, its resident goddess. In mortal life, Rahalat was a shunned woman (Bedine sorceress), abandoned here by her tribe. She claimed the oasis at the base of the mountain as her home, and used her magic to prevent any tribe from grazing here.

During a drought, the Dakawa tribe murdered her to gain use of the oasis, Legend holds that its spring turned to blood, and for the next ten years, anything that drank from it perished. Now, every Bedine tribe that camps at Rahalat must sacrifice a camel to the goddess or the water goes bad (turns to Type J poison, for all drinkers except beings favored by the goddess).

Rahalat's herd of goats still lives high on the mountain slopes. The goddess warns away beings who approach them too closely with the hollow knell of goat bells ringing in the minds of those she is warning, not in their ears. When she desires, Rahalat appears directly to living beings at the oasis or on the mountain (see "The Gods of Anauroch").

Elah'zad

This out-of-the-way oasis is sacred to the Bedine. Its name means "House of the Moon," and that is also the name of the temple it holds.

The oasis well-hidden in a formidable maze of salt flats and rocky hills. It is not an easy place for an invader to reach or to attack.

A seemingly-endless chain of thousand-foot-high knolls slopes at last down into a small basin entirely surrounded by grayish ridges. Over a hundred small springs well up on the basin's sides and trickle down its gentle slopes. Crimson-leaved shrubs with blue stems and twiggy trees with copper and silver sprigs border each stream, forming vividly colored bands of vegetation that are strung about the basin like an immense spider web, each strand following a life-giving stream down the hill to a central lake, encircled by lush grass.

This sapphire-hued lake covers a full mile of the Sacred Grove at the bottom of the basin. In the center of the lake is a small, grassy island, and on the island stands an alabaster palace, built in the shape of a three-quarters moon: the House of the Moon.

The Bedine cross this lake by means of two round boats of their own making. These low, clumsy craft are fashioned of camel hide stretched over wooden frames; their stitched seams let in streams of water.

The island is a small, grass-covered hill no more than a hundred yards across, topped by the three-quarter circle of the alabaster palace.

The House is made of a chalky, translucent desert rock cut so thin that anyone standing on the island can see the shapes of a throne and chairs inside, through the walls. It is entered through a gracefully curved foyer, carved from a single piece of stone shaped without any visible joints.

The foyer opens into a circular room. A huge throne covered with hammered copper sits at the far side of the room, flanked on either side by a row of stout chairs carved of dark wood. The floor is marble so black that it seems a bottomless pit; the ceiling is a single slab of translucent stone that filters sunlight into the chamber as a warm, creamy radiance. Blood spilled in the room vanishes into the black marble without a trace.

The House of the Moon is as old as the gods, and stood before the Scattering. The goddess Eldath can choose to speak through the mouth of any woman who enters it (the woman falls asleep, and the goddess directly and completely controls her body).

According to the Bedine, Elah'zad was the home of the moon goddess (Elah, or Selune), but At'ar (the sun goddess) drove her away and made it a prison for Eldath, the Mother of the Waters, because she was jealous of Eldath's beauty. Camels are not allowed to drink of the sacred waters (the streams and waters, where the Bedine believe that Eldath dwells); a separate camel well is provided for them.

DMs should consider this a place of power for Eldath, arid treat it as a temple for priests dedicated to her, wherein magical items can be recharged, faithful beings healed and cured of diseases, poisons, and mental or magical afflictions, at the DM's option.

If a DM has access to the module FA1/Halls of the High King consider The Sacred Grove to function as a "Major Grove" does, with all nine listed major grove powers, for priests and faithful of Eldath and Selune. The waters of the lake will have all the powers of a Moonwell except that of corroding metal; powers that are given in that appendix as being exercised by a "druid or other cleric of Chauntea" function only for clergy of Eldath and Selune.

Haunga

This is a verdant oasis of date palms and fruit trees, recently created by the Zhentarim (see "Created Oases," earlier in this chapter). A tree-cloaked hill at its center hides a stone-lined well chamber.

The well chamber is said to be guarded by a watchghost (detailed in the Ruins of Under-Mountain boxed set), and the main oasis pool outside watched over by a dozen skeletons who lie waiting in the water until an intelligent being tries to drink without muttering the proper password.

A water-bucket by the well and a "forgotten" blanket hung over a tree-branch by the pool are said to bear spell-traps that polymorph unfortunates (who touch them without giving another password) into frogs! More skeletal undead, the whispers run, lurk high up in the palms, waiting to hurl themselves upon intruders and bear them to the ground far below.

The Hills of Scent

This is a large area of trackless, interlocked stony sand-knolls. They are capped with gnarled, tangle-branched frankincense trees. A few scrub bushes dot the stony ground, but it is otherwise bare of vegetation.

Bedine of certain tribes, it is said, know where to find four (or even more) small, unadorned watering-holes hidden in the Hills. Others who go looking for these water-sources tend to find the lions who roam this region of knolls first—or rather, the lions find them.

Lion's Eye Oasis

The most verdant spot in the western Sword, this large oasis is home to a community of several hundred lamia, currently ruled by The Glaendra (described under “The Lamia” in the “Other Peoples of Anauroch” chapter).

The western edge of the oasis consists of dunes topped by mesquite trees, which fall away into a forest of acacias and date palms. This belt of trees (which dwindles, as one heads for the sands, into saltbrush and then chenopods) forms the southern boundary of the oasis, running east to a long, bare rock ridge whose highest point is pierced through. The wind whistles and moans constantly through this hole in the rock, which is the Lion's Eye itself.

The Lion's Eye runs north to join a higher, level-topped ridge that forms the northern wall of the oasis. All along the inside flank of this ridge runs a high meadow, a rolling, flowered-speckled stretch of lush grass, the playground of the lamia. (From time to time, the lamia hide in rocks when outlanders approach, waiting for the ignorant intruders to lead their camels up to this rich grazing-land—whereupon it really becomes the playground of the lamia!)

This meadow slopes down to meet the palm forest, along a long, narrow lake that lies at the center of the oasis. There the lamia hide their gold and gems in sunken chests that can be drawn up by ropes tied to the roots of certain palms.

Old Bedine tales of a time before the lamia came also speak of treasure in the depths of the lake—lost, ancient magical treasures, guarded by horrific water-monsters.

Lundeth

This village of sun-fire clay huts climbs the steep sides of a rock pinnacle within a day's ride of the southwestern edge of the Sword.

Surrounded by salt flats, and boasting its own deep well, it is a formidable, easily-defended stronghold.

Using magic, the Zhentarim seized it to serve as their western base of operations. Almost twenty minor magelings and underpriests of the Brotherhood currently inhabit Lundeth, served by the undead remains of the Goldor, the Bedine tribe who formerly owned and held the village.

Ma'atar

A rich oasis of nut trees and shaded vegetable plantings, recently created by the Zhentarim (see “Created Oases,” earlier in this chapter). It is encircled by a dry ditch and a stone rampart, and is said to be defended by a man who can hurl fire (a Zhentarim mageling with a wand of fire).

Ma'atar also has a guard of three underpriests and sixteen rathered bored Zhentilar warriors. They tend the tree plantations and a carefully-watered, newly-established grazing lawn inside the encircling wall. A tranquil pool fills the center of this small oasis.

Stone buildings house the Zhentarim; secret doors in their thick walls open into ladder-shafts, allowing one down into the tunnels where the Zhentarim are assembling caches of weapons, rows of magically-preserved and jointed skeletons (awaiting use as undead legions), potions and other magical supplies, and so on. The mage currently in charge of the place has also piped water down two of the tunnels, and is growing the finest frill-collar mushrooms there for use both in the oasis kitchen and in his own alchemical researches.

The Oasis of Vipers

This ancient, well-watered oasis near the northern edge of the Sword is seldom visited by wandering Bedine, because of its ongoing infestation of extremely poisonous snakes.

The bones of camels and the skulls of humans lie entangled together in the thick, ungrazed underbrush of puncture vines; ocotillos, boojum trees, and dwarf cacti. More vines enshroud the stunted acacia and leaning palm and tamarisk trees alike in a webwork of shady concealment that is the slithering home of hundreds of serpents.

Birds, lizards, and small desert rodents are all absent here; any who do arrive are quickly eaten by the snakes, who prey on each other, on low-flying desert bats and on anything else unwary or desperate enough to venture towards the three small pools of the oasis.

Olomaa

A rich oasis of fruit trees and young frankincense trees, recently created by the Zhentarim (see "Created Oases," earlier in this chapter). Olomaa sprawls over two large hills and the valley between them, and is guarded by a palisade of giant cacti, inside a dry ditch.

The sand ditch is home to many waiting, buried spring-sword traps. Triggering one of these causes the blade to burst up out of the sands, striking at THAC0 6 for its maximum normal damage.

The ditch is crossed by two stone-slab bridges, leading to man-high gates of iron, bristling with outward-projecting spear-tips, Within, Olomaa has a small, fenced pasture area, several bathing-pools and even a water-fountain, sheltered by arbors that bear many small hanging and creeping plants. A simple stone house at its center houses the four Zhentilar warrior-gardeners, their supervisor (a priest of Cyric), and the main guardian of the oasis: a beholder by the name of Xualahuu. It has lost the use of several eyes (DM's choice of which ones), and is recuperating here, relatively safe from the intrigue of Zhentil Keep and the warring rival eye tyrants of the northcoast Moonsea cities. Fiercely loyal to Manshoon of the Zhentarim, it will guard its oasis cunningly and zealously, seeking any chance to destroy intruders, seize magic, and gather treasure and valuable captives for the Brotherhood.

Orofin

Orofin lies in a broad, grassy valley, overlooked by ridges. Once it was a mighty city, "Orolin" (for more on its glorious past, refer to "The Lost Kingdoms" chapter).

Now, it is just several acres of ruined buildings, with a crumbling fortress at its center. Signs of its lost splendor can still be seen: four canals radiate outwards from the fortress, dividing the city into quarters.

The canals are lined with thick greenbriar hedges, interspersed with acacia and wild apricot trees. These wild tangles were once lush strips of parkland, and more recently home to lions and other desert predators (before a Bedine tribe slew them, and took the city for their own). The Bedine were slain in their turn, by a Zhentarim army that made its last stand here—and fell before the angry Bedine (as described in the novel The Parched Sea). The Zhentarim did manage to poison the stagnant canalwaters, in an effort to deprive their besiegers of water; that taint (which was partially caused by the bodies of slain Bedine, and partially by magic) remains, making this onetime oasis a deadly wateringplace except for the still-pure deep well of the central fortress.

Wind-blown sand covers the foundations of long-fallen buildings at the outer edges of the ruined city; crooked lines in the sand mark where alleys and avenues once ran.

The edge of the city is marked by a circular canal, that connects the four radiating canals together. A grand avenue encircles this canal, and from it four magnificent two-tier bridges leap the canals, to plunge into the center of each quarter of the city.

Each bridge is of granite, its mosaic-adorned pediments lifting two levels of roadway, each in three horseshoe-shaped arches, across the water. Every arch is crowned by a shallow point, and the central arch of each tier is decorated with a diamond-shaped mosaic. Of old, the underside of each bridge contained pumps that took water from the canals out into the surrounding fields; but the pumps are long silent, and the fields are beginning to expire into desert. Sand and bunch grasses can be seen here and there among the field grass.

The central fortress still looks magnificent, but eleven gaps now pierce its crenellated rampart-walls. Most of the buildings that lined the insides of those walls—stables, barracks, and armories—have collapsed into the inner courtyard.

This courtyard, about fifty yards across, holds a raised dais at its center, where a deep, high-pressure artesian well bubbles to the surface in a still-impressive fountain. The water empties through a small spout at the midpoint of each side of the fountain's square basin, into four ducts covered by rusty steel gratings. These ducts run to the inside edges of the walls, to form four shallow watering-pools (for long-vanished cavalry horses). Each pool has a spout at its bottom, that feeds one of the four radiating canals outside the fort. Beside each pool is a staircase up to the fortress ramparts.

There is an ancient escape tunnel from the fortress to the desert outside the city. Bedine lore holds that great treasure, perhaps the largest wealth in all the world, lies hidden somewhere in this ruined city—but so far, beyond a few gold coins, dusty gems, and ancient, cracked ivory inlays, no one has found any of it. In recent times, tales of ghouls haunting the ruins have spread across the Sword; few Bedine feel the urge to go and see the truth about ruined Orofin for themselves.

The Quarter of Emptiness

In the center of the Sword is a region known as the Quarter of Emptiness, for its lack of food and water. It is simply mile upon stretching mile of bare crescent dunes, with bedrock exposed by the winds here and there between. Bedine seldom enter it; there is nothing to go in for, and it is expected that fools who do venture in will die of thirst, at about the same time as their camels starve.

In the heart of this region is an abandoned but intact ancient city, called Rasilith by Bedine elders (see below).

Rasilith

In the depths of the Quarter of Emptiness, an ancient city stands half-buried in a massive dune. Its encircling walls are of gray stone, as thick as a camel is tall. Inside the walls, the buildings stand intact, around a central fortress.

Some sages believe this city was once Tower Hlithal, westernmost of the settlements of Anauria. Others think that it lies too far west to be Hlithal, and is even older, a remnant of a human realm that preceded what are called "The Lost Kingdoms" today.

Few folk have explored Rasilith, to settle the matter. A generation ago, a Bedine tribe did come upon the intact city, and made plans to settle there—before disaster fell upon them.

In the central courtyard of the fortress was a well. Warriors descending to clean it out said it went down five hundred feet, opening into a great labyrinth of underground grottos filled with rivers of cool water.

A fantastic claim, that seemed—but hundreds of buckets of water, as sweet as honey and cool as the night, were drawn up in a single day, and the flow never slowed. The delighted Bedine had little time to enjoy their new home; when night fell, asabis (laertis, detailed in the “Monsters of Anauroch” chapter of this sourcebook) climbed up out of the well, and slaughtered the greater part of the sleeping tribe. Only a few children (who had camped outside the walls because they were afraid to sleep in a place of so much stone) escaped, and the laertis pursued them until the full desert sunlight rose over the sands, savaging and devouring any whose galloping camels slowed or stumbled.

Laertis still lair in the caverns beneath the city, caverns ruled by the Phaerimm, who will direct forces of up to seven hundred laertis to pursue and slay anyone who finds this entry to their underground realm.

The Saiyaddar

These are the prized “Hunting-Lands” of the Bedine, not mentioned to outlanders, and by common agreement not the territory of any one Bedine tribe. These high, rolling grasslands are home to many gazelle, onagers, and a few lions that prey on them.

The Saiyaddar stretches east and west for almost a hundred miles, between a mountain range and the ruins of Orofin (see above). It is only about half as large north to south, but is the finest gazelle country in all Anauroch. Here and there in its depths, all the trees and plants of plenty that can withstand a hot environment grow, and many springs rise throughout the region, to keep its grass lush and tall. (Bedine who travel afoot here risk attack from snakes, who grow large and fat on a diet of many hares and birds.) Around the edges of the Saiyaddar, heaths of saltbrush crown the sand ridges.

The Scimitar Spires

The western edge of At’ar’s Looking Glass is marked by a line of obelisk-like rocky spires, that look like the teeth of some gigantic earthbound monster—or, as the Bedine name for them implies, like so many swords buried hilt-deep in the sand, only their upright blades protruding.

The hulking spires rise out of dusty sand in a labyrinthine forest of stone without foothills, ravines, or any visible water and plants. The mountains simply soar sharply up from the sand.

Few Bedine know the ways through this dry barrier of soaring stone; few have explored the Spires. But those who do can find their way through the Spires in at least two places (the Gap of Skulls and the Road of Jackals), and can also find, between two of the Spires, the narrow, unmarked gap that is the upper end of the descending canyon known at its far, lower end as the Chasm (see The Well of the Chasm, below).

A certain wishbone-shaped spire is the landmark for the Chasm entrance. Less than two hundred yards from it is a flat-topped rock outcrop, and at its southern end is a 9’-wide gap: the Mouth of the Abyss, the beginning of the narrow, winding canyon that descends to the Well of the Chasm.

The Shoal of Thirst

The Shoal is a great basin, stretching for miles in all directions: a waterless, endless salt flat. It sparkles underfoot, “as fiat as a pan and as endless as the sky,” white and cloudlike in full sunlight, pearl-grey when the desert sky is overcast.

The table-flat basin is so scorching that most Bedine cannot survive a trip across it. A rider’s eyes and throat sting with the salt and grit, and no plants grow because of the salt, so camels cannot eat (and must drink more water than usual).

The rare daytime rainfalls appear as purple veils, that do not reach the ground; hot air rising from the salt flats turns the rain to vapor long before it reaches the ground. When the sunlit sky is clear, mirages of blue lakes (reflections of blue sky) are common.

The Sister of Rains

This ancient oasis is isolated from most Bedine by the dreaded Shoal of Thirst. Here outcasts, such as Bedine wizards, may dwell unmolested. The witch Qoha'dar, for example, raised and trained the witch Ruha here.

The Sister of Rains oasis lies at the base of the largest peak in the mountain range known as the Wall of Fallen Djinn (see below).

It is reached by traveling up a large plant-studded wadi, home to many hares. As one travels upwards, the sand walls rise into rocky cliffs, and grass carpets the sand.

Then one comes to an ancient stone wall, fifteen feet high and stretching across the entire canyon. A rusty gate of iron opens in its center, flanked by several huge breaches broken by rare floods.

The wall is the work of a now-forgotten, long-vanished Bedine tribe who once dwelt here. They also left behind a tower, long since fallen. On the northern side of the canyon is a wide, 30' high ledge where the tower once stood. Most of its stones are scattered and half-buried, but the foundation is still intact.

In one corner of it, a corner usually filled with blown sand, is a stone trapdoor. Beneath it is a spiderweb-shrouded, cramped pit, which opens into a bat-infested corridor. To the left, it runs to a hidden entrance down the canyon, near its northern wall (this is how the bats get in and out). To the right, the corridor ends in an old vault. The Bedine sorceress Ruha hid a spellbook here for years, in a box of sun-fired clay.

On the southern wall of the canyon, across from where the tower stood, a dozen springs spill out of the rock and cascade down the cliff-face, to collect in little pools. These tiny waterfalls are the Sister of Rains. Their water gives life to dozens of fig trees and a wild thicket of fruit-bearing plants (once a tended grove).

Human skeletons and graves are both scattered about the canyon, which rises into a blind end beyond the tower. At one time, sheep and goats roamed this oasis, but jackals that visit from time to time dragged them down and devoured them, one by one.

Population: 1,900

This D'tarig hilltop village stands on the eastern edge of the Sword, overlooked by, the Tethyamar Mountains. Its winding streets run along the tops of ridges in an area of ravines and trees, an arm of plenty that reaches out into the desert. This "arm" of watered ground lies between two large streams, and four smaller ones wind and cascade their ways through the arm. West of the village, the six streams gather into a river that runs out into the desert, but soon vanishes into the hot sands.

Here the Zhentarim trade regularly with the D'tarig, at least once using this place to gather supplies to equip a desert army (purchasing whole herds of camels, for instance). This is the village where most outlander merchants come to buy frankincense and other desert goods, but they are careful to keep a low profile, for Zhentarim magic rules here, behind the scenes.

The wiser D'tarig resent the brutal power of the Black Robes, seeing beyond the gleaming gold coins they offer so profusely, and quietly work against the Zhents, ambushing a lone or drunken mageling when they can, sabotaging equipment when possible, and even setting tents or storechests afire. So far, the Zhentarim have blamed such activities on the hated Harpers, but the D'tarig are walking a dangerous road, and they know it.

They would be only too glad to hire or assist (with hiding places and the occasional healing potion) any adventuring band that would come to Tel Badir and wipe out, or at least humble, the Zhentarim—but quietly, so as not to bring the massed might of the Zhentilar armies down on the D'tarig anytime soon.

D'tarig who are especially resolved to fight the Zhents (i.e. who would fight to certain death) include Udlara Thaerintauhn (CN hf F4), a camel-breeder whose husband was slain by a casually-cast Zhentarim spell some years ago; Dyulatar Rhaumm (NE hm T7), a young but successful thief, who spent some time as a frog before escaping a Zhent magelings' polymorph spell; and the grim, grizzled D'tarig elders Thorn Abbalhar (CG hm F9) and Shandlara Iritymm (NG hf W6), both retired adventurers who have traveled far in the Realms, and know the Zhentarim for what they truly are. Thorn and Shandlara have some minor (healing) magic items, and some gold, hidden away from their adventuring days, and they will not hesitate to use it, to bring down the increasingly oppressive Zhent presence.

The strength and dispositions of Zhentarim in 23 Badir is left to the DM; Zhentarim are moved often by their superiors, and operate in an atmosphere of paranoid secrecy, as they are tested by cruel masters. It is certain that the Zhents have spies in the city posing as independent outlander merchants, and have bought some D'tarig outright. It is likely that in or about the city at all times are at least twenty Zhentilar warriors, and at least eight (usually twice that) low-level (3rd to 6th) Zhentarim magelings, sent here to await the missions in which they hope to prove themselves.

The major export of Tel Badir is good, sturdy, well-trained riding and pack camels. Even Bedine have been known to come shopping here, when they need replacement camels in a hurry. Much of the trade in Tel Badir consists of outfitting merchants with sand-sledges, sacks, waterskins, kegs and barrels, ropes, tents, and the like. Bedine come here often to buy metal cooking implements and (vastly overpriced) weapons.

VuerThyl

A well-watered oasis of fruit trees and acacias, recently created by the Zhentarim (see "Created Oases," earlier in this chapter). Extensive underground storage cellars are located here, cut out of the solid interior of a rock mesa that rises to the south of the bolson where the Zhentarim set their decanter of endless water

In their excavations, the Zhentarim cut into a rich beryl gemstone vein, which yields beautifully-hued, clear emeralds of large size (most are about the size of a warrior's fist). They also cut into an ancient tomb, where a mummified body promptly collapsed into dust. Some Zhent agents stole certain items of ancient magic from this place, and hid them from their comrades, elsewhere in the oasis. (DMs note: these items are not specified here; use this as an opportunity to introduce magic of your own choice—perhaps new magic, of your own design—into play.)

The Zhents, who employed magic to do their digging, also unwittingly freed a powerful wizard from imprisonment: a very old and evil mind flayer, who is also a 23rd level wizard. This being, Oedachlo, is lurking about the oasis, concealed by his powerful magic, until he can learn more about where he is, and what is going on in the Realms today. He may tag along with a powerful party of adventurers, keeping out of their sight, to reach more civilized and hospitable areas. He will then start searching for the human wizard who imprisoned him—or the wizard's descendants—to take vengeance. (Just who that human wizard is remains up to the DM.) The oasis has a guard of low-level Zhentarim wizards and priests, and twenty-six Zhentilar warriors, all veterans of 4th level or greater, who react instantly to attacks and strange occurrences, and who work well together.

The only trap that the oasis has is a richly-pannelled "wizard's storeroom" at the back of the barracks, which is filled with a crystal ball, powerful-looking wands and rods, and rows of potion flasks. All of these things are dummies: but the entire room will be filled by a blade barrier spell whenever a certain word of activation is spoken in one of the adjacent rooms (where Zhentarim watchers are usually posted, able to look into the storeroom via spy holes).

If a particularly strong foe is in the trap, a second word will cause a 7d6-damage fireball to explode halfway down the 60'-long, straight stone corridor that leads down one side of the barracks to the storeroom. This is usually used against a party that is fleeing the blade barrier, or standing and watching its effects.

Some of the Zhent wizards have minor "trap" magical items (left up to the DM), which they might place in the storeroom after its traps have been triggered, to catch a foe who returns thinking the place's fangs have now been drawn, and it is safe to plunder.

The Wall of Fallen Djinn

Bordering the Shoal of Thirst (see above) is a row of foothills cut through by wadis, and studded with sparse saltbrush bushes. They rise into a range of mountains five thousand feet high. The Sister of Rains oasis (see above) is located in a canyon at the base of the largest peak in this range.

From afar, the mountain range looks like a gray or dun-colored wall studded with dark spots (qassis and acacia trees). Its name comes from an ancient battle, in which a Bedine tribe that dwelt on the mountain slopes (then, it is said, well-watered by springs, and covered with a forest) perished to the last child, fighting off some djinn. Other Bedine later found evidence that the Bedine had slain over twenty djinn, an unheard-of feat.

The Well of The Chasm

This oasis is habitually used by the Raz'hadi tribe. They are of the few Bedine who know where to find the Chasm, a canyon hidden in the Scimitar Spires mountain range (see above).

The chasm entrance, marked by a distinctive nearby wishbone-shaped spire is only 9' wide, and is known as the Mouth of the Abyss.

From the Mouth, a narrow, winding canyon descends to the Well of the Chasm. Its steeply-descending chute is often barely ten feet wide, but on occasion widens to eighty feet or more, before narrowing and bending again; a place few can defend against many.

Over a distance of several miles, the canyon descends some five hundred feet below the desert, between walls marked by ledges, shelves, and sand-slides, ending in a boulder-strewn hollow: the Chasm.

In the center of this small, sand-floored valley, a deep pit in the bedrock reaches an underground stream of rust-colored water.

The Well of The Cloven Rock

Amid the Hills of Scent (see above), no more than sixty miles from sacred Elah'zad (see above) is a large, well-known oasis.

A natural bowl-shaped valley amid the countless hills studded with frankincense trees contains a grassy meadow and several thickets of wild trees of all sorts. At the center of this meadow, is the Cloven Rock itself: a large tor, riven in two, out of which gushes a spring. The spring spills out into a long, narrow lake, shaped like a curving swordblade, that cuts across the meadow to its edge, where it drains into a little stream that wanders all around the outside of the grassy bowl.

There is a well here, too: a relic of times before the spring found the surface, when water had to be drawn up laboriously from a deep cave.

Lions make this oasis their home, hunting in the surrounding hills. Bedine arriving here to camp always send in a hunting-party to slay or drive out the lions first, and post doubled guards armed with spears as well as bows and their personal swords, all the time they are encamped.

Yliyl

This tiny, isolated oasis is little more than a small pool, a few palms and scrub bushes, and the bones of those who made it here too late, and were too weak to carry on before the sun killed them. Jackals and vultures are the most frequent inhabitants of this little hollow. There are persistent Bedine rumors of buried treasure here, but some elders say that those tales are misremembered: the sands around Yliyl really hide many, many graves, of a long-ago Bedine tribe who all died of some disease, and were buried with their belongings (gems, coins, and all) to prevent any spread of infection.

Making The Sword YOUR OWN

There's not space enough in any sourcebook to mention and describe all the features known to the Bedine who dwell in the Sword; for a "barren" land, it has a lot of landmarks, holds a lot of Bedine tribes not described here, and does so by means of many, many oases not named or described in these pages.

DMs should feel free to add their own oases, particularly in the more remote parts of the Sword, in the northwest and along its border with The Plain of Standing Stones. Most oases are like Yliyl, which can be considered a "typical" waterstop oasis. A few will be larger-and there are even rumors of hidden valleys where trees, grass, and other life is abundant, and some Bedine even fish to catch food! All of these wonders are left to the DM to explore; they will be needed only if the Sword becomes the setting for a long-running campaign.

THE PLAIN OF STANDING STONES

The central region of the Great Desert is not a sandy waste, but a wind-whipped, almost treeless rocky "plain." That word is a highly fanciful misnomer; although this broad, belt-like area does rise above the sand in a plateau, it is anything but flat, or smooth.

The howling, almost ceaseless winds have shaped and torn the rock of "The Plain" into spikes, pillars, and strange wave-like shapes, making it here into a tossed sea and there into a barbed forest of frozen, endless stone.

At first glance, all appears lifeless, but closer inspection reveals a few shrubs and stunted trees clinging to rock cracks and deep ravines.

Those who can fly will see far more greenery than those who must struggle on foot among the rocks: they can look down on pockets of growth in ravines, gullies, and cragtop basins.

The entire region is rich in minerals, and has lured many greedy prospectors to their doom. The dwarves of the North call it Turlaghh, "The Field of Broken Dreams," for this reason. No accurate maps of the Plain exist; DMs should add whatever features they wish (except human settlements) to the map. The whole area is a succession of spires, spiny ridges, cliffs and rockside rubble.

The larger valleys are splendors of lush grass and vivid flowers, providing forage for large herds of wild crag sheep. These in turn provide milk, wool, and meat for outlaws, renegade dwarven bands, and a few human and hobgoblin barbarian tribes. Handfuls of ogres, hill giants, and verbeeg also dwell in caves here.

The mineral wealth of this tortured land is great, but it boasts no rich ruins or treasure-caches; there were few settlements here even before Anauroch was a desert. Its ravines, pools, and rock pillars or peaks seem endless in numbers, but only a few have been named by outlanders. These few are described here; DMs are reminded that near a named feature there may be dozens more anonymous features very much like it.

Places on The Plain

Please refer to the color mapsheet provided with this sourcebook for the locations of features mentioned here. The preceding details of desert landscape and plants should help DMs to "flesh out" such places, when they are visited in the course of play. Oases or cities that may become battlegrounds should be at least rough-mapped before play therein commences.

Aerithae's Rest

Named for the long-ago adventuress who discovered it (and nursed her battered band of adventurers back to health, to sally forth and slay the orcs they'd been fleeing), this verdant valley is about three miles long and a mile wide, and consists of a deep, clearwater central lake (fed by an underground spring that wells up into it), surrounded by a thick, tangled forest that entirely fills the earthen bowl valley, and climbs a good way up the sheer rock walls that enclose it.

Foxes, raccoons, scramble-squirrels, and bears roam this tiny paradise; vultures avoid it because of eagles that lair above the valley.

Aerithae's Rest is hard to find; it lies between two knife-sharp ridges, that join in a three-pointed peak to the south. On this peak's crest the eagles lair, and in its base are at least three caves, one of which is home to the bears. Hard climbing is necessary to get into or out of the Rest, but the ridges and ravines around it hold several known rockfaces where iron-rich ore and nuggets can be mined with only a hammer.

There are persistent rumors of an entrance to the Underdark, hidden somewhere in the Rest and recently, an adventurers' tale of battling gargoyles in the Rest has come to the inns and taverns of the Dragonreach.

Fallen Giant Rift

This crooked, many-branched crack in the earth runs for almost a dozen miles through the Plain. It is several hundred feet deep, but

Over a mile wide, and its trampled earth is thickly-grown with lush grass. Goats, sheep, and long-horned oryx antelopes graze in this rift, but the giants who dwell here dine on them too regularly for them every to grow so numerous as to denude the grass.

Named for a 40'-tall monster among giants, slain here by dwarves in a bloody, long-ago fight, the rift is still home to many (at least forty, though estimates vary) hill giants, who slay the creatures they hunt by hurling weapons at them with deadly accuracy. Some adventurers have reported seeing burros and riding-ponies, still with rotting wisps of harness lashed to them, roaming the grass amid the herds-and the giants, who seem to wage endless feuds among themselves, are thought to post guards, whose task is to hunt down all intruders, and let none escape to betray the presence of the giants to men who may bring armies to clear them out.

A spring at one end of the rift feeds several pools along its length. Many caves have been dug in the rift walls above these pools, so that the giants who dwell therein can hurl rocks down at creatures coming to drink below. Gold veins can be found in at least one of the caves, for the giants of the rift adorn themselves with necklaces of skulls—human, dwarven, and those of various predators—that have been dipped in gold, and polished.

Heroes' Helm

At about midpoint in its flow, The River of Gems curls about a rocky pinnacle known as Heroes' Helm because its shape and pair of eyehole-like caverns makes it resemble a gigantic warrior's helm.

The two eye-tunnels lead into a lofty central cavern, home to Ghondalaath, a blue dragon of awesome size and powers, a great wyrm that commands unusual and mighty spells.

The Helm rises four hundred feet above the plain; the river gorge at this point is about another hundred feet deep. Ghondalaath's cavern is about three hundred feet up the Helm and is known to have traps awaiting intruders, such as wands wedged in place to fire at certain triggers, guardian undead, and pitfall-chutes that drop victims out into a fall of several hundred feet, into the river gorge below.

The Hidden Valley of Srindin

Named for the elven explorer and adventurer who made it his home when he grew too old and gentle to roam the Realms with weapons to hand any longer, this tranquil spot is a hemispherical hidden vale, roughly two miles across. It is a picturesque combination of alpine forest and grassy meadows, watered by at least three streams that spring from its walls and rush down to the trees in ever-chattering cascades.

The three streams come together in a deep, well-like sinkhole in the center of the vale, and there can be found the two most distinctive features of the vale: Srindin's abandoned home, and a circle of corpses.

Both the home—a curve-walled, beautiful, miniature castle carved from a single great piece of stone—and the corpses are floating upright in midair, above the dark waters of the pool.

Some fell magic, or magic-using being, is present in the castle, which is said to still hold the relics and treasures amassed by Srindin during his adventuring career. The corpses are all skeletal, once-human, and clad in the rusting, disintegrating remnants of plate armor. They face each other in a circle perhaps thirty feet across. Bones and weapons that fall from them do not plunge into the water below, but sink only a few inches, and then hang in midair around the figures. Some unknown and very powerful magic holds them aloft: a magic that is demonstrably resistant to dispel magic.

The Pillar of Tauros

The distinctive crooked, hat-shaped form of this isolated rock pillar makes it a landmark visible for great distances. It rises out of a steep (50' deep) gulch, to tower some three hundred feet over the surrounding land (which takes the form of smooth rock "swells," or gently undulating mesas).

The Pillar's crest often provides a nesting site for dragons, and there is a legend that these dragons are attracted by something of interest to dragonkind: a gigantic, ancient hoard, perhaps, or draconic spells or magical items. Whatever the truth of the matter, many adventurers have seen dragons flying from the top of the Pillar, to hunt-or to fight other dragons, who come to challenge them. Some spectacular midair battles have been witnessed by terrified adventurers, and the race of the dragons reported to have lairs atop the Pillar varies from year to year, so it is hard to argue with the conclusion that something is attracting dragons strongly enough to cause fights for possession of this apparently bare, rocky height.

The Cult of the Dragon considers this a sacred place, and has begun to mount annual armed pilgrimages to it largely for the purpose of driving off or slaying adventurers who come too close to the Pillar.

The River of Gems

The fabled River of Gems is a clearwater river that runs from the edge of the Ice Wall (the northern edge of the Plain, and southern edge of the High Ice) to a sinkhole or huge crater on the edge of The Sword, called "The Throat"

(see below). Its route is one long, snaking gorge; the river is a shallow, sluggish flow trickling along the gorge bottom, which is home to many scrub plants and stunted trees.

Both gorge and riverbed are studded with many gemstones. A traveler lucky enough to reach the river can scoop up a fortune in half a day of scrambling around in the gorge (of course, getting it back to buyers is not so easy . . .). Dark cavemouths open here and there along the gorge, leading to the depths of the Underdark, beneath Anauroch. Giant bats lair within, waiting for greedy intruders to come into the gorge.

They are not the worst predators of the gorge. Legends of the River are spread by mind-controlled agents of the Phaerimm, to get the Phaerimm a steady supply of slaves and food. By night, or when intruders enter the caves, servant creatures of the Phaerimm will attack, heedless of their own safety.

At about midpoint in its flow, the river curls around a rocky pinnacle known as “Heroes’ Helm” (see above).

The Shattered Tower

This famous landmark of the Plain is a cracked stone castle that looks for all the Realms as if someone rammed it into the ground hard, at an angle, from above, breaking it with the impact.

That is indeed what happened. The Shattered Tower is actually a cloud castle that drifted too low, into reach of Phaerimm spells, and was brought crashing to earth, shattering into its present ruin.

Of old, the fabled Cloud Castles of the storm giants hung forever above the heart of Anauroch, well above the reach of the magic-draining spells cast by the Phaerimm. The giants moved their aerial castles elsewhere long ago (chiefly to the remote North, above the Spine of the World, some say), but this ruin was left behind.

Only the magic that constructed it keeps it from collapsing into rubble. Adventurers would be wise not to use much magic while inside—unless they really want to bring the whole thing crashing down on their heads! This castle has been explored (and looted) by several adventuring companies, over the years, but the mouldering bones of giants who perished in its fall still lie in its rubble-strewn halls, and years of digging await anyone who wants to be sure that they’ve checked very chamber and corner for buried riches. Survivors of the expeditions that have explored the shattered castle warn that various monsters have found the place suitable as a lair, over the years.

The Swordpoint

This distinctive peak is a useful landmark: its soaring, clean-lined needle shape is unmistakable from afar.

Manticores are known to lair nearby, drinking at several natural wells (water-filled sinkholes) around the base of the Swordpoint. Intruders trying to use one of these water-sources are likely to face a mantichore ambush.

The Throat

The River of Gems runs from the edge of the Ice Wall to The Throat, a huge, circular crater or sinkhole on the edge of The Sword. The Throat is about three miles across, and is home to thousands of desert birds (such as vultures) who nest on its steep slopes.

The Throat’s deep blue waters are said to hold heaps of gemstones, rounded by their passage down the river, and also said to hide the bones of more than one overeager adventurer, who fell afoul of whatever aquatic monsters lurk in The Throat. These might be water nagas, or freshwater morkoths, or kelpies, or something else . . . the tales of survivors who made it back out to tell of their experiences have been too fearful and garbled to be sure.

THE HIGH ICE

No human has ever found the northern edge (if there is one) of the seemingly endless expanse of snow, ice, and finally, glacial ice that covers the northern reaches of Anauroch. As desolate and wind-flayed a wilderness as the more southerly and dry areas of Anauroch, the High Ice (sometimes called the "High Land" in old texts) is an ice plain broken by deep crevasses, and roamed by dangerous remorhaz. The remorhaz dine on the fabled yeti, crevasse-dwelling ice toads, packs of winter wolves, and scurrying snow snakes (a local, white-furred, icy-blooded species of "normal constrictor" snake; refer to the "Snake" entry in MC1). These all dine on the "icejacks," plump, hare-like furred herbivores who in turn feed on the abundant, tumbleweed-like "snowflowers," found in vivid purple, yellow-green, and pink hues in crevices in the ice and rock, or blown over the plain by the frigid winds.

Above all of these wing "great soarers" (white-feathered arctic condors, identical to their temperate cousins; refer to the "Vulture" entry in MC3) and smaller scavenger birds, who glide silently above the snow, riding the winds. Most of these winged hunters are harmless to anything larger than a dog, but blue dragons and wyverns are also known to hunt over the frigid waste.

The High Ice holds natural dangers aplenty for intrepid adventurers: falls due to ice, avalanches of ice and snow, suddenly-opening crevasses, and the biting cold.

The Frozen Sea

On the western edge of the High Ice the ice fails, giving way to frozen sands. Here, in ancient days, the Narrow Sea lay like a sword, running north and south along what is now the Desertsedge. Its basin is now filled with a wind-sculpted, desolate labyrinth of frozen sand dunes, marked here and there by the diggings of bold explorers who come seeking the riches of the lost port cities-and the lairs of those creatures who prey on such fools.

This region, called by some the Frozen Sea (due to its past; the present-day explorer will search in vain for any water or ice), is a breeding-ground for many birds in spring, when ground-hugging plants appear and briefly flourish. Little other life is readily apparent here to untrained eyes.

The Frozen Sea holds certain features of interest to adventurers, including the ruined cities of Ascore, Hlaungadath, and Oreme.

Ascore

In FR5/The Savage Frontier; mention is made of evil-haunted Ascore, once a port (of the dwarven nation of Delzoun, itself little more than a memory) on this now-vanished sea. The half-buried hulks of colossal dwarven stone ships rise out of the sands east of Ascore's abandoned docks.

Even orcs avoid the ruined city. Intrepid adventurers report that hags command legions of undead there. A circle of thirteen tall, five-sided red pyramids rises in Ascore's center, and seems to be used in covey spells of great power and in rituals of worship to some evil deity-or, some whisper, a vast evil creature that lairs under the city . . .

Hlaungadath

Due east of Ascore, perhaps forty miles into the desert, another city rises out of the sands. This one is old but largely intact; long cracks lace its spired towers, and here and there a dome has fallen to winter snowloads or howling windstorms. This onetime independent human city is inhabited, and kept more or less in repair. It is now a community of lamia, who dwell here in warped luxury, amid wines, clothes, apparati, and magics scavenged from Netherese ruins over the years. The city holds great riches, but these are little cared for; one escaped human captive spoke of gems tossed carelessly into corners like so many marbles, and magic armor piled in lightless, spiderweb-shrouded storerooms. Perhaps ninety lamia dwell here, ruled by over twenty lamia nobles.

Armed with Netherese magical items (such as ropes of entanglement and wands of paralyzation), these nobles sally forth from the city in human form, whenever lamia patrols report intruders in the area. The nobles attempt to capture the intruders by magic and deception, and bring them to the city.

In the labyrinthine depths of Hlaungadath's lightless cellars and storage caverns, the lamia keep a breeding colony of human slaves, to which all captives are added. Lamia live on the cooked flesh of their slaves, especially prizing babies, but taking care not to "overeat" from the herd (depleting ranks and quality).

Ambitious nobles work on schemes for raids out of the desert, to take food-slaves from orc holds in the nearby mountains, and carry off whatever dwarves and humans they can find.

In the sands just west of Hlaungadath lies a crashed "ship of the skies." (For DMs interested in SPELLJAMMER™ campaigns, this is a galleon, its bow hopelessly smashed, but with an intact minor helm aboard. It cannot sail on water without extensive repairs, but its sturdy frame will serve for aerial voyages as long as major storms and collisions are avoided.) Its crew are long gone (fled or eaten, along with the cargo), and its origin and ownership forgotten.

The lamia know of its past use, and keep a watch over it as they search through all the records they can find, to learn how to make it fly (they simply don't realize the helm is what takes it aloft). They plan to use it for food-slave raids over the Sword Coast lands to the west, and in water-gathering expeditions to the southwest, to the rivers and marshes they know to be there. Adventurers who see the ship may figure out its power if they are familiar with other aerial ships of the Realms; the nose-down galleon, heeled over in the sand, is still tethered to the top of a high tower of the city by its long anchor-chain.

Spellgard

The Fallen Lands, a tortured, rocky waste of crumbling ruins, dense brush, and lurking, dangerous monsters, is the largest remnant of the vanished kingdom of Netheril. It boasts too many places of interest to adventurers to be detailed here, but one feature must appear in any guide to Anauroch: sinister Spellgard.

Where the southern edge of the high, broken region known as The Fallen Lands meets the western edge of Anauroch, a serpentine, rocky ridge rises from the sands. That ridge is crowned by a vast, grand castle, Spellgard.

Once the abode of Lady Saharel, of the High Mages of Netheril (a ruling elite in that kingdom of sorcery), Spellgard was called Saharelgard, and was a rich storehouse of wealth, mighty magic, and luxuries of dress, decoration, furnishings, and food.

Today it is a ruin, largely stripped of its riches by time, thieves, and abundant mosses, molds, and fungi that grow in its halls. It is a huge place of turrets, archways, balconies, and mile upon mile of interlinked stairs, galleries, and chambers. A few areas, such as the Fountain Hall, are unspoiled and luxurious.

Spellgard sits atop a well, and is cool, dim, and damp inside. This makes it ideal for fungal growth, a popular destination for desperate, parched desert folk, and a strategic "last known water" stopping-place for outsiders about to plunge into dry Anauroch.

Spellgard is said to be haunted by the Sorceress of Saharelgard, now an archlich (a rare, powerful type of undead detailed in the SPELLJAMMER™ accessory SJR1/Lost Ships). Saharel is said to be good in nature, but not welcoming to intruders, and not at all pleased to meet Zhentarim or any visitors who attack her on sight or despoil her halls.

A little known, one-way magical gate in a cellar-cavern of the High Castle in the High Dale (which pierces the Thunder Peaks to link Cormyr and Sembia, in the Dragonreach lands) leads to a grand inner hall of Spellgard.

Anyone taking this magical transport must step out over the reeking cesspool of the High Castle at just the right place, and in just the right direction. A misstep means a very unpleasant submersion in the pool; the proper step takes the user instantly into a cold, shadowed hall, lit by glowing mosses: Archmitre Hall, in the center of Spellgard.

The Hall is tall and dark and gloomy. Dark archways gape in walls all around, and moss hangs from stone balconies above. There is no other sign of life. The floor is an uneven tumble of marble, the stones punched upward as if by an angry giant from beneath.

Cold breezes blow from somewhere unseen, and dust is thick in the air. The only furnishings are stone seats, carved into the walls in little curl-ornamented niches.

A surprising number of adventurers have explored Spellgard's ways, in search of the great magic that must lie hidden here. If any have found powerful sorcery, no word has been whispered around the Realms of it. A few adventurers who survived the trip have spoken of large numbers of cunning, stealthy gargoyles hunting them around the castle, as they hunted for treasure.

An explorer today will find mushrooms and luminescent mosses growing here and there about the empty stone chambers. The torn, dusty cobwebs seem spun long ago, by now-vanished spiders. Yet there is a silent, watching feel to the place.

Room after room is empty save for little heaps of collapsed wood, gilt, and stone, where furniture has fallen before relentless passing years. Here and there are the scars of long-ago battle: scorched, blackened areas on the walls and floor, shattered stone panels, and buckled flagstones. Mold, moss, dust and rot overlay everything, and silence reigns.

Oreme

Another former port on the vanished Narrow Sea now stands isolated in the sands about two hundred miles east of Weathercote Wood. Oreme of the White Towers was a city of artisans, ruled by proud, independent mages. All are long since fled—except, legend whispers, those who became lichens. The adventurer Steeleye told of fleeing from a demi-lich somewhere in the sand-choked streets and shattered towers of this city. Vultures nest on the towers that still stand. From afar, travelers have seen at least one tall tower still towering above the sands: broader about than many castle keeps, and as tall as thirty tall warriors. Others have fallen, crushing great gaps in the walls in their ruinous descent, and lie like the shattered skeletons of beached whales, broken and white amid the shifting sands.

This far south, the sands thaw in summer, and storms blow inland from time to time, bringing moisture into the desert. From Weathercote Wood in a giant arrowhead pointing northeast, scrub plants and sagebrush grow in scattered clumps, providing abundant forage for camels and other desert dwellers.

This forage not only enticed the Zhentarim (and others before them) into thinking caravans could easily cross the sands, but provided a relatively easy road for explorers bent on plundering abandoned Oreme.

The easy road is still there, but fewer pass that way, these days; Realmslore tells of the lichens of Oreme, and less terrible but no less fatal desert predators, and of many spell trigger magical traps left behind by the mages of Oreme, to bring ill on those who might come seeking to plunder. Whether or not anything of worth is left in Oreme remains an open question. Those who might answer it have not returned, or have chosen not to draw attention to themselves by telling tales.

The High Ice

Most of Anauroch—mile upon trackless mile, a space larger than any six Realms or so that one might combine, in one's mind—is covered by a vast, fissured glacial ice sheet. Its rifts and heights are innumerable, and few bear names (or hold anything of interest) to any but the savage creatures who dwell there.

Legends whisper of cities locked in the eternal ice, buried forever—cities of great elven magic, and lost dwarven wealth, and proud orc splendor—but if any living being in the Realms has walked the hidden ways of such cities, they have not spoken of it (except, of course, for Elminster, who raised an eyebrow, and said, “Of course they’re there still: An-narath, Bhaulaea, and the rest.” When I asked him where they were, he merely smiled and said, “I do believe my memory is failing. It does that, ye know, after five hundred years or so, and I’m much older than that, now.”) A few landmarks, however, are known to folk of the Realms today, and appear on the maps. These include the Smokeholes, the Rift of Stars, and Llashloch, the Lake of Ice.

The Smokeholes

These large, round holes are eternally shrouded in cloud-like plumes of steam, created by the hot air that has melted through the ice here meeting the frigid upper air.

The Smokeholes are vents for hot, steaming, moaning air rising from underground caverns where ice meets lava flows. The hellish spaces below the ice here are known as the Caverns of Burning Ice, and particularly bold (or, if you prefer, stupid) gnomes and dwarves have mounted perilous expeditions to reach them, to forge or derive metals for the making of splendid weapons. Scalding jets of steam and noxious underearth gases make descents into the Smokeholes or the Caverns below dangerous indeed: when characters are in these areas, roll 1d12 once every three rounds. On a result of 1 or 2, apply natural effects equal to a cloudkill spell to a randomly-determined area.

Salamanders and other heat-loving monsters are said to lurk in the Caverns of Burning Ice, and dragons are known to lair in nearby grottoes warmed by hot gas escaping through tiny vents in the rock. Just how extensive the Caverns are, and what other creatures may benefit from their warmth, is not known to the surface Realms.

The Rift of Stars

There are many rifts, or large crevasses, in the surface of the seemingly-endless sheet of High Ice. Many are as large as good-sized river valleys, and all offer some shelter from the howling winds; most are home to something. Several are distinctive enough to deserve special mention.

The Rift of Stars is one such. It is large but narrow, running for many miles northeast and southwest in the ice. The riven ice here reveals a corresponding gash or cleft in the underlying rock, so that ice gives way to rocky walls. These are studded with beljurils: those strange, fist-sized gemstones of Faerun that periodically emit a cold “flash” of light. By day, the Rift may seem alive with moving, winking reflections, but at night, it is an awesomely beautiful, evershifting tapestry of glittering lights (from which it gained its name).

Many adventurers embark on the long “Road to the Rift,” made famous by caravan-merchants of Amn, down on their luck, who came up with a ballad about the Road of Gems that would make them all rich. The Rift is studded with a wealth of natural gemstone outcroppings, bristling amid the beljurils in a natural, fantastic “lode of lodes” that can make the lucky prospectors who reach it—and make it to far-off gem markets alive—very, very rich. Travelers in the High Ice have even made fortunes coming upon sacks of rough-hewn rubies, sapphires, bejurils, and chunks of amaratha (both of these last two gemstones are detailed fully in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Adventures hardcover sourcebook) abandoned by dead adventurers—or still grimly held by their dead or undead remains.

There is too little food, warmth, and water for anything to live in the Rift for long, but it is visited often by High Ice predators, and scavengers of the human sort often lurk amid the icy pinnacles near the Rift, hoping to slay other prospectors for their food, supplies, and gemstones.

The Rift contains many tiny caves and hollows, gouged out by eager miners over the years, and these may provide temporary shelter, and yield meltwater when a sunny day follows a snowfall. Bright sun turns the Rift into a blaze of reflections equal in effects to heat shimmer (see the chapter on “Dangers of the Desert”), and also causes cracking, singing sounds as the gem-laden, crystalline rocks heat up. In prolonged periods of sunlight, it is possible for unclad humans to sunbathe or even roast in the sun, draped in the right areas of the Rift.

Uashloch, The Lake of Ice

Another large glacial rift is shaped like a bent human arm. Its glistening, treacherous ice slopes descend to a lake of ice floes and steamy plumes. Hot springs bubble up from the depths of the earth here, and have melted a rift that almost freezes over, but whose icy crust never quite hardens entirely. Instead, a shifting tangle of canted, wind-sculpted ice floes covers the tepid waters that are home to many large fish and things like white-skinned coldwater octopi. The chance of good meals brings many High Ice predators (and intruders) down into the rift where they feed and are fed upon by denizens of the depths, other hungry visitors, and, some say, ice-dwelling “snow cloaklers”: a species of white-skinned cloaklers (detailed in Volume 3 of the Monstrous Compendium, the first FORGOTTEN REALMS® appendix) who dwell in the rift and nearby crevasses, and fly silently out over the lake to hunt.

The Taglorlar

All over the High Ice, rock spurs and the pressures of shifting ice throw up little pinnacles, or wave-shaped frozen heights. These prominences provide handy lookout-points to see from (and be seen on) for desert-dwellers and visitors alike. Most are claimed as lairs or at least habitual perches by snow owls, great soarers, and other flying creatures, and may serve as windbreaks (or be hollowed out into small caves) for others.

One group of these pinnacles is named, and serve as a road of landmarks for outsiders trying to reach the Rift of Stars (see above). The Taglorlar, or “Beth of Taglo,” are a line of sharp rock tors that rise out of the Plain of Standing Stones below the ice-line, and run steadily northeast for many days of travel.

No one is known to have counted all the Teeth, but many beings have used them as a road across the ice, or as homes. Travelers planning to follow the line of peaks are warned that predators there are expecting them-and waiting hungrily.

Untrivvin

This lonely peak is the abode of many yeti, and is said to be haunted. Its name means “singing rock” in a long-vanished tongue, and the name and the haunted reputation both stem from the fact that this mountain rings like a bell from time to time from the blows of hammers in the depths: hammers wielded by thaalud, or “tomb tappers” (detailed in the “Monsters of Anauroch” chapter).

Tomb tappers dwell in the depths beneath the High Ice, and deeper underground elsewhere in the Realms. This mountain is the only known surface connection with their deep tunnels; it rings because it is honeycombed with smooth-carved, curving chambers and passages. Some sages say there is much treasure to be found in Untrivvin, of gems and rare metals; others say cynically that no explorer has returned laden with such-or, as far as they know, returned at all.

THE LOST KINGDOMS

Many have heard of the Lost Kingdoms, those fabled, rich realms of long ago, that lie buried somewhere beneath the shifting sands of The Sword, in Anauroch. These lands are the source of a lot of fanciful tales, a lure for lots and lots of adventurers who'd like to get rich, and a subterranean home for the sinister Phaerimm (see "The Phaerimm").

The Buried Realms are (correctly) said to be riddled with ancient, unmarked magical gates, allowing passage—often unintentional!—from the Realms to other planes and worlds, and vice versa. Many strange creatures appear hereabouts, and more than one famous (or infamous) being of Faerun has vanished here—such as Gondegal, who stumbled between two mist-shrouded standing stones and found himself in the demiplane of Ravenloft.

Stairs, shafts, ravines, and even broad roads lead down from the Stonelands and the sands of The Sword to the Lost Kingdoms below. The folk of those buried realms have become the nomadic Bedine, fearing and shunning the depths and the magic that was once theirs.

More is said of those dark underlands, the Buried Realms, in the chapter entitled "The Phaerimm." This chapter is a guide for DMs in placing treasures and features in the depths; here we explore the glory that was, surveying the lands that were once proud. Included in this sourcebook is a map from the Year of the Tusk (112 DR), showing these Three Realms—and the beginnings of the desert created by the Phaerimm, known then as the Great Sand Sea ("Anauroch" then meant the glacier to the north, called "the High Ice" today).

Time has stolen many of the hard facts and details of the Three Realms; here we do a "whirlwind tour" to catch a few ideas of what life in the Lost Kingdoms was like, then.

Anauria

Richest of the Lost Kingdoms, Anauria was a human-ruled land of humans, elves, and half-elves, where nobles hunted boar, stags, and monstrous game while the farms of the commoners produced food for the Three Realms, and spare grain enough to sell to all the lands about the Inner Sea.

From its glittering capital, Amazandar, the City of Gems, Anauria dominated overland trade to and from the Three Realms. Rich gemmines lay underneath Amazandar, reached by well-guarded deep shafts that were kept as secret as possible by the noble families that owned them.

The most powerful noble families of Anauria were the elven houses of Nyntynel and Olyrnn, and the human lines of Thardresk (the royal house), Nemrin, and Maluradek. Anauria's greatest king was Thausimbel "The Wise" (a.k.a. "Greybeard" and "The Long-Lived"). He had elven blood, and ruled for three hundred and sixty-odd years, arranging alliances, marriages, and business dealings that wove long-lasting peace between elves, the dwarves of Oghrann, and humans in what was to become known as the Dragonreach.

The city of Anauril was noted for the making of fine steel swords, the best human smiths produced in the Moonsea North at that time. Anauria's best forges were here, working plentifully with iron and tin (but lacking much copper and zinc). Helvara was Anauria's main agricultural market and farm outfitting center. The prosperity of the land was guarded by the fortresses of Tower Hlithal (which guarded against the goblins of Araugul, nomadic ore hordes, and occasional outlaw raiders out of Asram) and Tower Ramanath (which patrolled against brigands and monsters out of the Hunters' Hills).

Asram

Second richest of the Three Realms, Asram was governed from rich Phelajarama, the City of the Serpent, known for its gold-leaf-covered carved serpents, but the most important city of the realm was Orolin, the City of Magicians. In this land, magic was used in everyday things (not reserved for a ruling elite, as in Netheril). Magicians could be hired on every street of Orolin, and their wealth and works made the city a sprawling place of villas and orchards, clustered around a circular city core with canals, parks, and a fortress.

Spell-guarded expeditions went out from Orolin to secret places in the Great Sand Sea, and brought back much gold, rarer zinc, and the finest copper known in those days. If Anauria was proud, Asram was decadent. Parties went on for days, and every citizen pursued his or her own whims, trusting to the magic of the realm to defend them against foes. Jaded young nobles even invented a sport of "monster-baiting," wherein they wore outlandish costumes and sought out monsters in their lairs, to flee through the night for the excitement of it all, until searching friends laid the pursuing beast low with magic.

The Asramian city of Ulshantir was noted for its coppersmiths and fine brass goods, whereas the port of Miirsar was known for its finely-crafted ships. Many small-net fishermen dwelt in Miirsar, going out in the dawn mists of Lake Miir every day to fish for the blue-scaled brench and the spicy crabfin.

Hlondath

Least powerful of the Three Realms, northerly Hlondath was a land of loggers and herdsmen (who kept sheep, goats, and shaggy cattle). Its capital was Mhaelos, but its most important city was Rulvadar, a fortified refuge against marauding ogres, orcs, hobgoblins, bugbears, and flind for folk in the Moonsea North. Companies of spearmen made many forays into the Border Forest. Under their protection, Hlundites made sturdy wagons, fine furniture, paper, and lumber to ship to other lands.

Independent Cities

Port Miir was a lawless, roaring place, the center of commerce for goods entering and leaving "the West Kingdoms" (as they were called then, being west of the Teshan Mountains, now known as the Desertsouth Mountains). The goods came and went east out of the port on Berothir's Trail (named for the ranger who established it, slain by orcs in doing so).

It was a city of moneylenders, caravan-masters, and "quick money," where a loose band of ruling wizards struggled to keep down the numbers and successes of thieves.

Oum was a crossroads-town, where roads and merchants met. It straddled the border between Hlondath and Asram, belonging to neither (and at times, was a source of tense hostility and confrontation between the two kingdoms). It became a place of bookshops, sages, and proud craft-folk, who made mirrors and glass windows (both rare in those days), fine clothing, jewelry, lamps, pottery and iron-ware.

Other Features

Mt. Shaddath (westernmost peak of the Desertsouth Mountains) and the Shaddan Hills (now lost in the sands of Anauroch) were both named for Shaddara, the legendary child-queen who was called "the Fair," and grew up to be a proud, keen huntress who often hunted boars and monsters in the Hunters' Hills. She was the greatest Queen of Anauria.

Mt. Shaddath is today known as Rausrawna, which means "westernmost" in the tongue of the D'tarig; its former name survives as "Shadow:" in the name Shadow Gap.

"The Burn" was once a goblin-infested forest, eradicated (with magical fire, that let no trees grow again for many a year) by an Anaurian army led by Olzogath "the Grim." Or-lath Wood, on the border between Anauria and Asram, was named for Olzogath's son, who chose to hunt goblins there, not raze a forest as his father had done. The everpresent goblins had a stronghold at Araugul (pronounced "Ar-ah-gOOL"), also known as Goblin-mount.

THE GODS OF ANAUROCH

The Phaerimm and the beholders of Toril do not venerate gods, though some of their races who dwell on other planes and worlds do. Some semi-intelligent Anaurian remorhaz worship Augaurath, a gigantic white dragon, who dwells in the High Ice (she in turn worships Task, detailed in the FOR1/Draconumicon accessory book). The lamia of Anauroch worship many different gods, both human and others, and are currently searching for a “true faith.” None of these deities are described here.

D'tarig worship the same gods as other humans, and the faith of “The Lord of the Sands” vanished with The Lost Kingdoms. Of old, the Bedine knew and worshipped all the human gods, but after the Scattering (see the “Bedine Society” chapter), they believe most of the gods turned away from the Bedine and in response, the Bedine turned away from them.

The Bedine do not have priests who are granted spells by the gods (although in rare cases, fervent prayers have caused a deity to manifest magically to aid a Bedine supplicant). Bedine are devout, following the dictates and wishes of the gods as interpreted by learned elders (“holy men”) and sheikhs, reading natural signs, but they do not have a priest “class” in the AD&D® game sense.

Recently, some Bedine have joined The Cult of the Sacred Skull, a splinter faith that worships a talking skull. (In reality, the skull is magically animated by a mind flayer High Priest, his nature concealed behind a skull mask; he is a tool of the Phaerimm, and utters what they bid him to). The Sacred Skull faithful are a ragtag band of fanatic Bedine warriors and thieves. This cult is especially active in the eastern Sword, as the Phaerimm try to offset growing Zhentarim influence.

Bedine tend to fear and obey their deities, rather than worshipping them. Chief among them is At'ar the Merciless, the “Yellow Goddess.” She is the sun, seen as a spiteful, faithless woman. Of old, “At'ar” was called “Amaunator” in full, and was the male sun deity of Netheril. At'ar tends to ignore the Bedine completely; if a DM wishes her to manifest, use the entry for Horus-Re in the FR10/Old Empires sourcebook.

Elah is the Bedine moon goddess, and is the same deity known elsewhere in the Realms as Selune. Priesthood details for Selune are given in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Adventures sourcebook; clergy of Selune will be tolerated in Anauroch, but not obeyed.

Kozah is the Bedine god of tempests; he vents his wrath by causing sandstorms (the sand left in the air for days after a major storm, that colors the sky crimson as the sun rises, is known as “Kozah’s mark”). Desert storms show his fury at the faithlessness of his wife At'ar, as the harlot enters N'asr's tent night after night (= the sun goes down). Kozah is the god Talos; priesthood details are given in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Adventures sourcebook. Clergy of Tales who enter Anauroch will be tolerated but not obeyed.

N'asr, the Lord of the Dead, is the Bedine name for Cyric, the god of death, murder, and tyranny (who has taken the place of Myrkul). The great white-bearded vultures of the desert, known as “N'asr's children,” are said to ferry spirits to the camp of the dead, taking the dead to N'asr's tent (which is somewhere westwards, beyond the setting sun), where the Pitiless One awaits.

Djinn serve N'asr; he gives the dead who displease him or who don't measure up to them for sport, and then food. The worst fate of a Bedine is to wind up the slave of N'asr, so Bedine dead are washed to cleanse away the odor of life, to avoid offending N'asr. Clerical details for Cyric appear in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Adventures sourcebook; the Bedine fear such priests, and will attack them.

The Bedine claim N'asr is the sun's lover. The sun, At'ar, forsakes her lawful husband Kozah every night to sleep in N'asr's tent.

Shaundakul, the Treacherous Lurker In The Sands, is the mischievous, malicious trickster of the desert. He appears as a jackal-headed man, but corresponds in powers to the deity Beshaba. He blinds folk, causes oases to dry out, travelers to lose their way, and so on. Shaundakul is blamed by the Bedine for all misfortune. His servants, the capricious "Windghosts" of the desert, are actually mad watchghosts (detailed fully in The Ruins of UnderMountain boxed set, and described in the "Anaurian Adventures" chapter of this book).

Under these "great gods," who are not actively worshipped (and so take little interest in Anauroch) are the "spirits of the earth," or "little gods." These gods the Bedine have daily dealings with: they are the spirits that the Bedine believe to inhabit every place or feature of the desert. The Bedine worship these demigods (largely by the sacrifice of camels or treasure), and they are very real, if seldom seen. Every oasis except those recently created by the Zhentarim, or as yet undiscovered by the Bedine has its Place Spirit, as do most other major desert features.

As demigods, all Place Spirits have the following powers: 70% Magic Resistance (40% vs. other demigods, 20% against deities of greater power; the ability to know what is happening in their territory, be it a single tor, a mountain, or an oasis), and in the area around for up to a mile distant: and the ability to see and attack into those regions of the ethereal plane touching on their place of power. Some Spirits can project a single manifestation. It can do two things at once, but can't leave the place of power. If it is destroyed, the spirit needs a full year to create another.

Place Spirits have a base saving throw of 4, and can never leave their place of power. They can communicate by speech, from a manifestation or from a "focal point" in their place of power (such as a pool at the center of an oasis). Rituals to, and commandments of, these deities vary from one to another-but most Bedine know "the rules," and no place spirit will act vengefully against an intruder who is wholly ignorant of what is right or expected; blasphemy lies only in wilfully and deliberately flouting the wishes of a spirit.

Every Place Spirit can temporarily imbue any being in their territory with spell ability, granting them any spell of 5th level or less (one spell per being, per day).

Through direct contact between the chosen being and a Place Spirit's manifestation or focal point (e.g. the being steps into the pool, or touches a certain standing stone), a spirit can also manifest its powers as follows: once a day, it can grant the limited wish of another being; twice a day, it can heal or raise dead (i.e. it can use one power twice, or use both of them once each); and it can also cast one of the following spells, once each day: regenerate, reincarnate, restoration, or resurrection.

In addition, all Place Spirits can by mental contact (within their place of power) guide beings to water, communicate its absence or hide it, and can turn water to poison or make it melt away from the body of a being trying to touch it. If they can appear as a manifestation, the manifestation can always at will emit effects equal to a rod of terror (described in the DMG) or a repulsion spell.

All Place Spirits also have an attack power related to their territory (the spirit of a mountain can hurl rocks or shake the entire mountain to cause climbers to fall off; the spirit of an oasis can cause all creatures there to be alert and hostile to an unfavored being, or cause trees to fall on the being), and so on.

These spirits are not given Legends & Lore format descriptions here because they are weak, retiring, and lack clergy; they are of most use to Bedine trying to resist outlanders.

Two sample Place Spirits are described here: El Ma'ra Dat-ur Ojhogo (= "The tall god who lets men sit upon his head") and Rahalat.

El Ma'ra inhabits the sandstone spire that bears his name. This is a lone spire of yellow sandstone (described in "The Sword" chapter of this book), which stands near an oasis, and serves Bedine as a lookout-place. A fall from the spire will kill most men, and El Ma'ra can try to throw an unv\anted being off. The unwanted one must make a Dexterity check at -4 every round, or fall from the spire. No companions or nearby beings are affected. Bedine lookouts atop the spire who pray to El Ma'ra and sacrifice a drop of their drinking-water to him (let it fall on him) can see the desert below clearly, even when the sands blow. (This ensures clarity of sight; it does not reveal what is magically concealed or extend one's range of vision.) Rahalat was a Bedine sorceress abandoned at a mountain oasis by her tribe. She used magic to prevent Bedine from using the oasis, until a tribe murdered her to get to the water.

The oasis spring turned to blood, and any who drank from it for ten years perished. Now, every tribe that camps at the oasis

(which bears her name) must sacrifice a camel to her, or the water goes bad (turns to Type J poison, except to beings favored by Rahalat).

Rahalat's herd of goats still lives on the mountain. The goddess warns away those who approach too closely by causing the hollow knell of goat bells to ring in their minds.

Rahalat's manifestation can appear in the oasis or on the mountain. She manifests as a silent, translucent white floating image, looking as she did in life: an unveiled Bedine woman her face young and strong-featured. Her face has a weary, lonely, heartbroken appearance. She cannot be turned or dispelled, and speaks only in the minds of those she meets. If she wishes, non-Bedine who are present cannot see her.

WIND AND SAND MAGIC

Here are some of the spells used by Bedine “sorcerers” and “witches” (wizards). These rare outcasts are often bitter, secretive, and not very sane. They learn magic from other Bedine, ulugarr wizards, ancient Netherese tomes, and experimentation.

Some sages argue the ability to work magic is a genetic trait, and the relatively high numbers of gifted “shunned ones” among the Bedine (given their suspicion and avoidance of magic) is due to Netherese blood.

Other sages argue just as strongly that sensitivity and aptitude for dweomercraeft is brought about by exposure to magical dweomers—and the strange (Phaerimm) spells that are part of the very existence of Anauroch have brought about the high magical aptitude of the desert-dwellers.

Whatever the truth, it is known that some Bedine, like the witch Ruha, have visions of beings and events (usually “bad” happenings) that will be met with in the future. This erratic ability can’t be learned or controlled.

Another uncontrollable Bedine “gift” is the ability to naturally detect magic by smell or feel or some unexplained sensory instinct. Most mature Bedine have this ability to some extent; in any case where a spell is cast within 60’ of a Bedine, roll 1d6 per Bedine; a roll of 5 or 6 indicates that the Bedine was alerted to the presence—somewhere near—of magic. Bedine cannot detect the presence of magical items or already-cast spells (due to the all-pervasive nature of Phaerimm spells in the desert), and cannot guess what powers a spell has, or its likely source, except by the same observation and reasoning that a Zhentilar soldier or Calishite mercenary would employ. Most Bedine have far less experience of magic than folk in the “civilized” Realms, and won’t anticipate even obvious spell attacks or effects.

Bedine spells take the form of incantations (these may be muttered, whispered, or shouted, without affecting spellcasting success) and gestures, and use material components from the desert and the Bedine themselves: spittle and water; sand, salt, stones, and rock crystals; wind or blown breath, and so on.

“Wind and sand magic,” some sages call this, and Bedine with the proper learning and practice can duplicate the effects of most “standard” wizard spells of 1st through 3rd level. The Bedine versions of these spells use earth and air components (fire and water spells are rare indeed—the former because of the danger to the caster in desert conditions, the latter because of the scarcity and value of water), instead of the material components more familiar to wizards across the Realms—but Bedine casters still study and memorize written spells, as other wizards do.

Bedine magical progress is slow and halting (although a Bedine wizard, skilled at keeping magical aptitude hidden, will hungrily pounce on an unsuspecting ulugarr wizard if any good chance occurs, to gain spellbooks). Any equivalents of “standard” wizard spells a DM wishes to use may have been developed by this or that Bedine “shunned one.” Bedine mages are allowed to live, fight, and work magic with Bedine tribesmen only when they are facing a great foe together (such as the fifteen tribes who cooperated with the witch Ruha, against the Zhentarim). This is rare indeed; Bedine wizards are almost always encountered alone, or in the company of a few servitor desert creatures.

Selected Wind and Sand Magic Spells

First-Level Spells

Sand Jambiya (Evocation)

Range: Touch

Components: V, S, M

Duration: 1d6 rounds + 1 round/level

Casting Time: 1

Area of Effect: 1 item

Saving Throw: None

This spell turns a handful of sand into a keen-edged, metallic blade. It is as hard as steel, but can't be affected by magnetic forces or heat, and is not a good conductor. It cannot be larger than twice the length of the caster's hand, nor weigh more than twice the weight of the hand. It deals 1d4 + 1 damage, and is considered magical for the purposes of what can be struck by it. A sand jambiya crumbles into loose sand if dispelled, on the caster's mental command, or instantly upon the caster's death. This spell can be combined with a flying jambiya spell (q.v.)

Sand Whisper (Alteration)

Range: Touch
Components: V, S, M
Duration: 1d4 rounds + 1 round/level
Casting Time: 1
Area of Effect: One creature or item
Saving Throw: Neg.

This spell causes silence to reign about a touched item or creature (who may be the caster). All sounds created by the protected item or being (including sounds caused by other, unprotected items striking the protected item or being) are transmitted far away and emitted in a random, everchanging location (often fooling listeners there into thinking something unseen is present).

Whether willing to be silenced or not, a recipient item or being is allowed a saving throw. If it succeeds, the spell fails and is lost.

This spell does not prevent beings from speaking words of activation (of magical items), or uttering the vocal components of spellcasting (and so cannot hamper or prohibit the use of spells and magical items by "silenced" creatures). Noise-based attacks (such as the wail of a banshee or the roar of an androsphinx) are not prevented, but their effects are turned elsewhere, to random locations (and unsuspecting, unintended targets). These locations can be as far distant from the "silenced" source as 2d6 miles plus 1 mile per level of the caster.

Wind Compass (Alteration)

Range: Special
Components: V, S, M
Duration: 1 hour/level
Casting Time: 1
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

By the use of sand and blown spittle, the caster creates a tiny moaning wind that sounds only in his or her ear. Its steady tone rises or falls if the caster turns aside (to the right or left, respectively) of a chosen direction. Returning to the proper course restores the proper wind hum.

This spell is most often used at night or in blinding sandstorms. It allows the caster to travel in an unerring, pre-chosen direction—but cannot guide along a non-straight route, or find features (it can point "northwest," but not "to the blue dragon's cave"). Casting another spell does not end a wind compass.

Second-Level Spells

Flying Jambiya (Alteration)

Range: 1 yard/level
Components: V, S, M
Duration: 3 rounds
Casting Time: 2
Area of Effect: One item
Saving Throw: None

This specialized spell works only on short metal-bladed weapons such as a dagger, jambiya, dirk, or knife, and the blade created by a sand jambiya spell. The caster whispers an incantation, blows on the chosen weapon (which must be held during casting), and then throws or lets go of the weapon. As long as the caster concentrates on the weapon, the weapon is animated by the caster's will, "flying" about to attack foes at a distance.

The animated weapon strikes once per round, with the caster's normal THAC0, but receives a +2 bonus to its attack rolls, and is considered a magical weapon for purposes of what it can strike (if it is magical, add these benefits to its normal bonuses). Its damage, however, is at - 1 (to a minimum of 1).

While animated, the weapon is AC0, and is considered to have 12 hp. Striking it for more than 12 hp damage ends the spell, but doesn't actually damage the weapon.

A flying jambiya must be concentrated on continuously by the caster. The spell ends instantly if the caster dies, begins any spellcasting, falls unconscious, or goes out of range. The caster can move the animated weapon 60' per round. An injury to the caster will ruin casting of a flying jambiya, but won't by itself end control over an existing jambiya. If control is ever lost, the spell ends, and the weapon falls to the ground.

Pillar of Sand (Alteration)

Range: Touch
 Components: L, S, M
 Duration: 1 turn+ 1 round/level
 Casting Time: 2
 Area of Effect: Special
 Saving Throw: Neg.

This spell causes a 10'-radius circle of sand under the caster's feet (or those of a touched being; only unwilling beings get a saving throw) to rise up. This spell is only useful in a sandy area; the rising level, stable circle of sand draws surrounding sand up underneath it to create a cylindrical pillar. The pillar rises as high as available sand allows, or as high as the caster desires, to a maximum of 10' per level of the caster. Beings atop the pillar can see a long way, reach high things, and possibly escape spells cast at "ground-level." The pillar rises or sinks up to 10' per round, as the caster wills. If physical attacks on the pillar

"kill" it (it has 50 hp at any one spot, and is AC5), or a dispel magic or dig spell are used on it, it will collapse. Beings atop the pillar can fall if winds are high (and they fail a Dexterity Check) or the pillar collapses; normal failing damage applies.

Beings atop a pillar can leave it and return to it (e.g. stepping onto a castle wall, moving inside the castle, and then returning to the pillar) without affecting its continued existence. The caster can collapse the pillar at any time by deliberate act of will, and it will fall when the spell expires—but even the caster's death won't cause an early collapse, if no mental choice to destroy the pillar is made.

Sand Shadow (Illusion/Phantasm)

Range: Touch
 Components: V, S, M
 Duration: Special
 Casting Time: 2
 Area of Effect: One creature
 Saving Throw: None

This spell renders one living being (usually the caster) invisible to all non-magical detection so long as the being is wholly or partially in any shadow. If the being moves from shadow to shadow across an unshaded area, the "invisibility" will vanish and reappear-and can do this repeatedly, until a dispel magic is cast on the protected being, or 3 hours elapse. Attacks do not affect this invisibility; attack rolls against the invisible being are at -4. The protected being's vision is not altered by the spell, which can't be ended prematurely by will of the caster or protected being. The casting of this spell includes tossing a pinch of sand into the air.

Third-Level Spells

Find Water (Greater Divination)

Range: 20 miles + 1d8 miles/level
 Components: V, S, M

Duration: 1d12 turns + 1 turn/level
Casting Time: 1 round
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

This magic involves the spittle of the caster, in an involved incantation that empowers the caster (or a touched recipient being) to “feel” the presence of water within range, sensing direction (includes down), approximate distance, and amount.

Whispering Sand (Alteration, Phantasm)

Range: 0
Components: V, S, M
Duration: Special
Casting Time: 3
Area of Effect: 2-foot radius
Saving Throw: None

This magic allows a caster to leave a message at a particular desert location, or (choose during casting) on a particular volume of sand (e.g. in an urn). When conditions set during casting are fulfilled (these are identical to those governing a magic mouth spell; q.v., DMG), the sand “speaks,” uttering the message to all within hearing (typically, all beings within 20’. The message may be one word long for each year of the caster’s age, and is voiced with the pronunciations and tone used by the caster, during casting.

Wind Shadow (Alteration)

Range: Touch
Components: V, S, M
Duration: 9 rounds
Casting Time: 3
Area of Effect: One creature
Saving Throw: None

This spell changes the caster or a touched recipient being (and all worn or carried, non-living items) into a translucent, almost weightless image. The affected being floats, moving as directed by its will, gliding on a magical wind.

The image flies just above the ground, silent and translucent, leaving no tracks or any magical path. It is 65% undetectable to creatures not expecting or watching for it (75% to creatures lacking an acute sense of smell, such as humans), but is only 40% likely to escape the notice of alert, watchful beings (chance drops to 10% if the image enters a guarded area or opening). This spell is typically used to cross small distances undetected, from “cover” to “cover,” or to cross crevasses or chasms. The wind generated by the spell trails behind the image, sending no betraying breeze or smell ahead. It is strong enough to make headway against strong natural or magical gales (at half move rate).

The image normally “glides” at the being’s usual movement rate afoot, but the being can also ascend or descend 70’ per round, by force of will. The movement is not stable enough to permit spellcasting in transit; aimed magical items and missile weapons are discharged by the gliding being at - 1 to hit. The spell can be ended prematurely by the caster.

Fourth-Level Spells

At’ar’s Fire (Evocation)

Range: 10 yards + 10 yards/level
Components: V, S, M
Duration: Instantaneous
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: 20-foot radius sphere
Saving Throw: 1/2

By means of an incantation and a ball of sticky gum, this spell creates an explosive ball of flame, equal in effects to a fireball (q.v., PHB). Creatures slain by this spell are typically turned to ash, and the spell consumes or melts flammable items in its area of effect—but unlike a fireball spell, the caster (and all worn or carried non-living items) are immune to the spell effects; the spell can even be centered on the caster without the caster suffering any harm.

Conjure Sand Lion (Conjuration/Summoning)

Range: 10 yards
Components: V, S, M
Duration: 1d4 rounds + 1 round/level
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

This spell transforms a handful of sand into a female spotted lion (detailed in Volume 1 of the Monstrous Compendium, under "Cats, Great"). The beast is AC6, MV 12 (and can leap 30'), 6 +2 HD, THAC0 15, and attacks with a 1d12 bite and two 1d3 foreclaws (rear claws rake for 2d4 damage each, only if both foreclaws hit). It roars and attacks only at the caster's direction, and the caster can "see" through its eyes, but need not maintain concentration to keep it in existence. The sand lion fights until slain or dismissed by the caster, and can be ridden as a steed at MV 10) or used as a pack animal. Enchantment/charm and necromancy wizard spells do not affect it; nor do priest spells of the animal, healing, and necromantic spheres. It can, however, be affected by those spells which affect creatures from the Elemental Plane of Earth (such as phase door).

Sand Healing (Necromancy)

Range: Touch
Components: V, S, M
Duration: Permanent
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: One creature
Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the caster to use a handful sand, a drop of water, spittle, or tears, and a drop of blood or sap, to heal wounds. Applied to the wounds, the components cure 2d4 points of damage, but can't heal blindness, disease, insanity, or ongoing poison effects: only physical hurts.

Wind Blade (Evocation)

Range: Touch
Components: V, S
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

This spell creates an invisible "sword" of solidified wind, extending from one of the caster's hands (which need not grasp it, and can hold something else). The blade can be heard as roaring wind (but does not disturb the air around), and is aimed by the caster's wrist. A wind blade vanishes if the caster wills it to, or begins spellcasting (not magical item activations). It batters and flays targets instead of cutting, dealing 4d4 points of damage per round-and strikes all visible, non-flying targets as if the caster is attacking a target of armor class 10. (Invisible or flying targets are attacked as if with a normal weapon.)

Fifth-Level Spells

Death Smoke (Evocation)

Range: 30 yards
Components: V, S, M
Duration: 1d4 + 1 rounds
Casting Time: 5
Area of Effect: 20 foot-radius sphere
Saving Throw: 1/2

This spell uses a crushed insect or arachnid, a pinch of sand, and a drop of blood to create a billowing, opaque cloud of heavy vapors that can't burn or be blown away (fighting in darkness rules apply). Creatures in the cloud take 6d4 points of damage for each round of contact, unless they have no need to breathe (e.g. undead or non-living things) or are protected against poisons. When the spell expires, the smoke fades harmlessly away. Cast underwater; this spell causes a harmless "burst" of vapor that rolls water away for 1 round.

Fist of Sand (Evocation)

Range: 20 yards
 Components: V, S, M
 Duration: 1 round/level
 Casting Time: 5
 Area of Effect: Special
 Saving Throw: None

This spell causes sand to rise up and strike at a single chosen target, once per round. The "fist" or sandy tentacle smashes for 1 point of damage per level of the caster, and forces struck items to make saving throws against "crushing blows." It smites at THAC0 4, and does not cause any heaving or shifting of the surrounding sand (i.e. it cannot form a barrier, or throw a charging foe off its feet).

Flesh Mirage (Necromancy)

Range: Touch
 Components: V, S, M
 Duration: 1 round/level
 Casting Time: 5
 Area of Effect: Special
 Saving Throw: None

This spell allows the caster to "switch faces" with another creature (who need not be alive). The creature to be copied must be touched by the caster, who must also see the features to be copied. An area of the creature equal in surface to the caster's face is perfectly copied. This spell is often used to disguise the caster as another being, or even to wipe out all features by copying a featureless area. In such cases, the caster can only see by magical means (i.e. by an infravision spell or link to another creature's vision), but reduces water needs, by eliminating some water-emitting organs (breathing occurs through all exposed skin).

Sixth-Level Spells

Sand Shroud (Evocation)

Range: 10 yards/level
 Components: V, S, M
 Duration: Instantaneous
 Casting Time: 6
 Area of Effect: 1 creature or object
 Saving Throw: None

This specialized spell uses a lump of mud, clay, dried dung, or other powdery substance, which is crushed during spellcasting. It causes sand or loose earth that is present (for example, in a desert setting or barren field, but not cultivated land or solid rock) to open up under a target and swallow it up instantly.

The target must be dead, undead, or never living, and of L size or less. It is buried 60' deep, without any mark or trace on the surface of its grave. Intelligent undead, animated magical items, and those creatures able to assume gaseous form, are imprisoned for only 2d8 rounds by use of this spell. The spell is typically used to quickly hide treasure or the evidence of a fatal fight.

Seventh-Level Spells

Sand Gems (Alteration)

Range: Touch
 Components: V, S, M
 Duration: Permanent
 Casting Time: 1 round
 Area of Effect: Special
 Saving Throw: Special

This rare spell turns a handful of sand into 1d12 real, permanent, cut and polished gems. They are always amber or red in hue, and of any type and size visualized by caster, so long as they are small enough to all fit in caster's closed fist. Their value is equal to 1d6 X 1000 gp, regardless of size. Each time this spell is cast, the caster must make three saving throws against a spell. Each time one of these saving throws fails, the caster permanently loses 1 hp.

Sun Stones (Evocation)

Range: 5 yards/level

Components: V, S, M

Duration: 2 round

Casting Time: 7

Area of Effect: One or more creatures within 10 yd × 10 yd area

Saving Throw: 1/2

This spell uses a handful of small stones, held in sunlight by the caster as he utters an incantation. One stone per three levels of the caster is heated by the magic. These heated sun stones glow fiery red, but can be handled by the caster without harm. Thrown at an opponent, they streak through the air to strike at THAC0 9. Each burns its way into whatever it strikes, setting flammable substances afire. Beings take 4d4 damage from each stone (beings who touch "missed" stones in the round after casting take half damage, or 1 hp per stone if they save; after that, the stones become harmless). Sun stones can be thrown at multiple targets, and will swoop around corners to follow moving targets.

Eighth-Level Spells

Cleanse Water (Abjuration)

Range: Touch

Components: V, S, M

Duration: Permanent

Casting Time: 1 round

Area of Effect: 20-foot cube per level

Saving Throw: None

This spell uses a handful of sand and a drop of the caster's spittle, and temporarily drains the caster of 1d6 hp. When the sand is cast into water, it cleanses the water of any poison, saltiness, unpleasant taste, and so on, rendering it safe to drink and refreshing (cool even in full desert sun). The water is permanently transformed, although future events can poison it or make it salty again. This spell can be used to remove alcohol (and dissolved drugs) from drinks, and to turn magical potions into pure water.

Sand Worm (Necromancy)

Range: Touch

Components: V, S, M

Duration: 6 turns/level

Casting Time: 8

Area of Effect: One creature

Saving Throw: Neg.

This spell turns the caster or another touched creature (only unwilling ones are allowed a saving throw) into the form of a sand worm: a mouthless, mute, AC6 mottled thing that is MV 9, Br 15. It can burrow beneath the sands to hide or sleep, can feel temperature changes (i.e. the coming of cooler night, above it), does not need to breathe, drink, eat or eliminate, and is not harmed by temperature extremes.

Transformation into sand worm-form heals a being of 2d4 points of damage (if any exists; the passage of time in sand worm form also allows normal 1-point-a-day healing). A sand worm can carry things up to the size and weight of an armored man, if the burden is tied to it by another being who has the limbs to tie, and the means to tie with. A sand worm can fight only by rolling over or slapping at an opponent with its bulk, doing 3d4 crushing damage per round, and striking at THAC0 17. The spell recipient's intellect and senses are unchanged, but it cannot speak, and can escape worm-form before spell expiration only at the will of the caster, or upon application of a dispel magic.

Ninth-Level Spells

Create Water (Evocation)

Range: Touch
Components: V, S, M
Duration: Permanent
Casting Time: 1 round
Area of Effect: 20-foot cube/level
Saving Throw: None

Using a drop of the caster's spittle or tears, this magic creates pure, cool, safe water: fresh or salt, as the caster desires. The water pours from the caster's hand, and will run away and be lost without available container(s) to hold it (although beings can drink from the hand as if from a spout, or bathe in the flow). Once begun, the spell continues until the caster's maximum volume has been created; the caster cannot "turn off the flow" and then turn it back on again, or save any for later emission. (The caster can move about to fill various containers and water various plants, or to avoid flooding a specific area, without affecting the flow). The flow of water is not powerful enough to disturb the caster's movement or to cause damage as a weapon. Although the water thus created is permanent, it can evaporate as all water does in desert conditions, and sink into the sand and be lost.

Life Water (Alteration/Necromancy)

Range: Touch
Components: V, S, M
Duration: Permanent
Casting Time: 9
Area of Effect: 1 cubic foot
Saving Throw: None

This spell transforms existing liquid (which may have been created by another spell) into a sweet-smelling serum that heals wounds, blindness, disease, feble-mindedness (but not insanity), poisoning, rotting (even "mummy rot"), and fungal growth (such as the transformation of flesh into green slime). Ellen serious wounds (lost limbs and organs) will regenerate at the application of life water: a one-foot cube of the serum entirely cures one man-sized being; a waterskin of average size will cure one condition, or restore 3d8 hp of physical damage. Usage actually causes life water to vanish; a pool can be left dry by several healings. Immersing even a partial body in life water will restore the complete form, but this magic cannot restore life, or change a magically-transformed creature back to a previous form.

Sandswallow (Evocation)

Range: 1 yard/level
Components: V, S, M
Duration: Instantaneous
Casting Time: 9
Area of Effect: 20-foot radius
Saving Throw: Special

This spell can only be used in an area of sand, quicksand, mud, or bog. It causes a circular area of the surface to suddenly collapse 30' downward, so the surrounding sand or mud rushes in to fill the hole. Any creatures in the affected area must save versus spell to "swim" and avoid being buried (they end up atop the morass, reduced to half movement rate and lacking any items they were holding; these are buried).

Buried beings can dig traveling upwards 6' in each round in which they make a successful Dexterity Check. After the second round of imprisonment, any creature without a magical source of air, or the natural ability to exist in rock (e.g. an umber hulk) suffers 1d4 suffocation damage per round. This continues until death occurs or the creature digs its way free. In the round in which they emerge, creatures cannot move from the spot in which they come up, and all attacks against them automatically hit.

NPCS OF ANAUROCH

This chapter notes a few beings PCs exploring Anauroch may encounter.

The Black Shadow Band: A band of adventurers based in a cave in the Tethyamar Mountains, this group is chaotic neutral in general alignment. They will make temporary alliances and non-aggression pacts, but are best described as “always aggressive, always dangerous.” Cold-blooded treachery is not in their nature, but a love of violence and a heedlessness for consequences is. These are true ‘social misfits,’ who can’t abide the rule of any law and order.

The Black Shadows are human unless otherwise noted, and are: Tamaerl (female warrior leader); Jesslinn (female warrior); Barrin (male thief); Thurndas (male priest); Kyllyrd (half-elven male wizard); and Durve (half-elven female mage/thief). Their statistics, current alliances, and treasure are left to the DM, to tailor to best challenge PCs.

The Black Shadows have a powerful magical item (an Orcward Stone?), hidden in their cave, that seems to keep orcs away. It was recovered from one of the ruins of Anauria (and its true nature is left to the DM).

Individuals

The desert becomes home to many outlaws and loners, but most don’t live long. Here are a handful of exceptions.

Belarchass the Slaver, a notorious slave-dealer who captures humans and demi-humans at swordpoint to sell them into slavery in the South. Captives are drugged asleep with treated needles and weapons wielded by Belarchass’s Band (of twelve warriors, three priests, and two mages).

Belarchass keeps his(?) true identity secret, but is known to have powerful magical items. Slaves are taken by an ancient, secret gate linking a certain spot in Anauroch with a certain cellar in Westgate, to the holds of ships, which sail to Chessenta and beyond.

Mavreen Mawklistyr, a half-elven female “bounty hunter” active in Anauroch, the Dales, and the Stonelands. She attacks at night, using wings of flying (q.v., DMG), snares, sleep-poisoned darts, and smother-hoods. She can call on two trained, fiercely loyal gargoyles: AL CE; AC 5; MV 9, Fl 15; HD 4+4; hp 30, 29; THAC0 17; #AT 4; Dmg 1-3 x 2/1-6/1-4; SD +1 or better weapon to hit; SZ M (6’ tall); ML 11; XP 650; MC2.

Mavreen Mawklistyr is AL CN; AC 0; MV 12; F12; hp 76; THAC0 9; #AT 3/2 rounds; Dmg by weapon: long sword 1d8, dagger 1d4, or 16 darts (specialty weapon: 5 dart-throw attacks/round, at +1 to hit); darts do 1d3+2 hp dmg plus save vs. poison at -1 or fall asleep for 1d3 turns, onset time 1d6 rounds); S 14, D 18, C 16, I 14, W 14, Ch 14; ML 18; carries a pouch of 2 pp, 22 gp, 2 ep, 5 sp, and 3 cp; wears leather armor and a ring of protection +4 on AC, +2 to saving throws.

“Tracker” of the Harpers, who aids “good” travelers and folk against orcs, lamia, and other dangers of the desert, is a mysterious individual much given to disguises, who lives in a cellar in a nameless ruined community south of Ascore. When not in disguise, he (actually, Tracker is a woman, but conceals this from all but close friends by magic and dress) appears as a wild-haired, grim man in the rotting remnants of much-patched armor. Tracker’s wry nature can be summed up by “his” cesspit, near his cellar home, which bears a sign: “Last Dungeon Before Waterdeep.”

Tracker (Alisheen Starnshield) is AL CG; AC 4; MC 12; R14; hp 99; THAC0 7; #AT 2 (fights with two weapons); Dmg by weapon: 1d8 long sword or 1d4 per dagger, 2 carried: S 14, D 18, C 16, I 14, W 14, Ch 12 (16 when undisguised); ML 18; HIS 93%, MS 99%; Spells: as 7th level priest: 3,2,2 (usually animal friendship, entangle, in invisibility to animals goodberry speak with animals/hold animal, tree; carries a pouch of 4 pp, 9 gp, 7 ep, 7 sp, and 4 cp, and wears leather armor.

NEWS AND RUMORS OF ANAUROCH

News tends to be old and poor in remote Anauroch, with Bedine tribes avoiding each other as much as possible (unless bent on killing each other; which is not likely to present good opportunities for chatter and gossip).

Whenever the PCs have peaceful encounters (e.g. with traveling merchants), the DM may pass on some of the following rumors. Role-playing should be encouraged; NPC merchants won't simply babble all the latest news whenever they see an unfamiliar face. If Bedine are passing on these bits of "news," the DM should alter the wording in light of Bedine knowledge of the Realms outside Anauroch. Some of these rumors could mask DM-prepared adventures: others can be simply wild fancies.

- Belarchass the Slaver, a notorious slave-dealer who captures humans and demi-humans at swordpoint to sell them into slavery in the cruel South, is hunting people again. He is somewhere north and east of Mabel, with "at least twenty" warriors.
- There is powerful magic awake in the desert: beware old stone pillars, and archways that lead to nowhere! Some who step wrongly, near such, have vanished in an instant, stolen away—by magic!
- Strange whirlwinds, seen in calm conditions, not just in storms, are growing more common everywhere on the sands. They are evil things, "Wind Walkers," who serve an evil Elder Race That Dwells Below, under the sands. The ancient evils must be awakening again!
- There is an oasis, somewhere deep in the Quarter of Emptiness, that is hidden by magic. Only women dwell there: cruel women, who use magic and can change their heads to take the forms of fanged, hissing serpents! They are ruled by a queen whose lower body is like that of a huge snake, but whose upper form is that of a beautiful woman. She eats all men who fall into the hands of her subjects—after they have been forced to breed, to swell the ranks of the women of the hidden Oasis of the Serpent. All male babies are eaten; all females must master magic or be cast out into the desert.

- Certain stone pillars in the northern sands move about by themselves, when the nights are dark! They sometimes move as far in a night as a fast, driven camel does, by day—and they cry out to each other at times; horrible deep, groaning sounds that make one's teeth itch, to hear them! One is moving steadily toward The Oasis of Vipers!
- A great spiralling pit, like a sucking mouth, has been seen somewhere nearby, west of here. It moves along, in the sand, and things that tumble into it vanish, and are never seen again. It must eat them! A gazelle has been seen to disappear into the mouth, and so did a hunting dog that got too close!
- An oasis has been found where there has never been one before! It looks old, and well established, with several trees and a deep pool. It is no mirage—and camels who drank from the pool were well sated. Fresh-gnawed bones were found under one of the trees, though—human bones.
- In the sky, a few nights back, a ghostly camel and rider were seen, white against the velvet blackness, riding east. The rider wore a turban, and waved a naked scimitar. In his other hand, he carried a globe of spinning lights, like tiny stars, that whirled endlessly around. He rode on the air, but quite low down, and soon vanished below the horizon, to the east. No one knows who or what this apparition was; none can recall having seen it before.

ANAURIAN ADVENTURES

This chapter presents adventure ideas that use or lead Player Characters into Anauroch.

OLD BONES, OLD MAGIC

In an Anaurian locale where featureless dunes rise around an unimpressive rocky ridge, PCs find a gleaming, like-new metal door in the side of a dune. No tracks lead to it. It is locked. The door radiates magic (spells to prevent rust and windscur, and under them, a trap activation: a dispel magic cast on the door will remove the protective spells first; a second dispel must be used to deactivate the trap).

If the trap is not removed, seventy-odd jagged glass shards spray out in all directions when the door is opened. This is a magical effect; the trap only fires once, and leaves no trace or apparatus behind. All beings in a 180° field in front of the door, and within 30', must make two Dexterity Checks.

If both succeed, no damage is taken. If one fails, 2d4 points of damage are taken. If both fail, the being suffers 3d4 damage, and must save against breath weapon or be blinded by the flying glass (this "minor" blindness may repair itself in 1d12 days, and can be cured by a cure light wounds spell).

The door opens into a room lined with stone blocks, that is the head of a staircase. The stair descends below the sands, into a room carved out of the solid rock.

This chamber is a cool refuge from the desert heat, but the well it holds is now dry. (If PCs climb or fall down the shaft, it is 112' deep.) There is nothing in the room except dust, a dropped (normal) dagger, and a passage in the far wall, which runs 200 to another stair.

This second stair leads upward, into the interior of the nearby rocky ridge. There it ends in a 20' × 20' chamber, which contains only an ornate, closed stone coffin. The lid bears Thorass runes that read: "Here Sleeps Velror, Sultan of Rhentria." (Where or what Rhentria was is now lost in time; it was most likely one of the short-lived kingdoms that followed the fall of Anauria before the advancing desert sands.) If the coffin is opened, PCs see the bones of a human stretched out within, hands on a scimitar, lying in a bed of loose, winking gems, including one ruby that's as large as a small man's head! The lid then levitates forcefully to the ceiling, and the bones in the casket rise up slowly, floating individually upwards to form a sitting skeleton. (This is a triggered spell effect, not an undead; PCs can bash the bones apart in all directions, but can't turn or dispel the forming skeleton.) Even if some are missing, or hurled far away, the bones drift back into their correct alignment, and the skeletal figure points a bony finger at the PCs.

A magic mouth inside the coffin then says: "Thieves! Vandals! Despoilers of tombs! Go from this place—or perish!" Once this warning is uttered, the bones fall back (if PCs have attacked or scattered them, they fall wherever they have ended up).

In the casket are 56 citrines, 33 amethysts, 244 aquamarines, 9 jacinths, 16 emeralds, and 21 rubies (all of average value; consult the DMG), plus the huge ruby (its apparent value is 95,000 gp). The sword is not magical or adorned with gems.

If any treasure is taken out of the coffin, something appears at the exit from the sultan's tomb (where the stair enters). It looks like a black, leathery bat standing upright on clawed, panther-like rear feet. It has a long, barb-ended tail, fangs, barbed forearms, clawed hands, and glowing red eyes that lack pupils. It silently winks into view, and just as silently blocks the way out of the tomb, fighting any PCs who try to leave, unless or until it is destroyed, or the treasure is returned to the tomb.

This horrific apparition is a "Least" Guardian Daemon, which can breathe fire three times a day (30' cone, with a 10' base diameter; it does 3d6 damage, 2d6 if a target saves vs. breath weapon). The barbs on its arms are harmless fleshy adornments.

The Daemon is AL N; AC 3; MV 9; HD 6; 48 hp; THAC0 13; #AT 3; Dmg 1-411-10 x 2; SA fire breath; SD immune to any sort of fire damage (but not heat or electrical); SZ L (11' tall); ML 14; XP 2,000; MC2. It wears a brooch of shielding (detailed in the DMG) that can still absorb 92 hp of magic missile damage.

By the use of a now-forgotten magic, the daemon's life force has been placed in the huge ruby (which is AC3 and has 12 hp; destroying it kills the daemon, which will wail and vanish in a shower of sparks, leaving the brooch behind).

If the gem is not attacked, the daemon can fight to a loss of all hp, and then vanish-only to reappear a day later, completely healed (it can only emerge from the gem once every 144 turns). The daemon will fight any beings who move any treasure out of the tomb, until it is destroyed, they perish, or the gem is returned to the sultan's tomb.

Dispel magic spells cannot harm or hamper the daemon, and will not prevent its appearance from, or vanishing into, the gem. This process is a blink up to 90' distant, circumventing physical and magical barriers, and causing the gem to flash and sparkle with temporary light.

The Oasis of Handless Men

PCs reaching an oasis (guided by hastening vultures, perhaps) discover it strewn with the bodies of twenty recently-slain male Bedine warriors; a war-party of some sort. Some of these bodies hang from trees, some lie huddled half-buried in the sands, some have been torn apart by jackals and reduced to gnawed bones, and desert snakes slither through the eyesockets of the picked-clean skulls of others.

There are no camels, weapons, food, coins, or waterskins to be found anywhere in the oasis. There has also been a more grisly theft: ever; corpse has had both its hands cut off, and none of them are to be found, either.

PCs who search the area will come upon a trail (or see a glowing light over the dunes, by night, which can lead them in the same direction), and eventually reach an old stone tower, hidden among tall dunes.

The tower is half-buried in sand, and observant PCs will see that it has tiny slit-windows in its upper regions, and out of these come intermittent puffs of sand, for all the Realms as if someone was repeatedly throwing out handfuls of sand.

That is, of course, exactly what's happening. Inside the tower is an adventuring party of agents of The Cult of the Dragon, led by a wizard who's trying to find a lost, ancient magical item that he believes (from reading an old wizard's diary) to be there: a rod that can "heal" or regenerate undead, and can therefore be used to knit broken dracolich bones, or even replace bones that have been destroyed or gone missing! The strength of the wizard, Elphraun, and those who accompany him, and even the presence of the coveted rod, are matters left to the DM. If the PCs are fairly powerful, the Cult party can be too, perhaps armed with poisoned weapons, magical rings of spell turning and the ram, and potions of healing and invisibility.

Elphraun's spells and equipage should also be tailored to challenge the party; a suggested item for him to wield is an eye of shooting stars. This has powers identical to the ring, except that it works in daylight, and has the form of a single large, dark cabochon-cut gem (the "Eye") worn as a pendant. When Elphraun releases it, it can float by itself, turning to emit its powers from the gem, under his "remote control" silent mental direction—something he can do in any round in which he uses a spell that doesn't require the entire round to cast, or does something else. One must be magically attuned to an eye; PCs who seize it won't be able to turn it on its master during the fray.

The Cult party has more practical treasure, too: all of the captured food, water, and camels. The latter will be recognizable to other Bedine, and PCs using them later may be attacked merely for possessing them (on the mistaken belief that the PCs slew the handless men).

Elphraun seized the hand so that he could create crawling claws to dig sand out of the buried tower. The Bedine yielded forty claws, and he can direct these to attack intruding PCs. These 40 Crawling Claws are AL N; AC 7; MV 9 (leap: 15'); HD 1/2; 4 hp each; THAC0 20; #AT 1; Dmg 1-4 vs. armored foes, 1-6 vs. unarmored; SD undead spell immunities, cannot be turned, edged weapons do them only half damage; SZ T (human hand); ML 20; XP 35; MC3.

The Weeping Maiden

The Stushan, an influential D'tarig trader, contacts PCs with a business proposition. He has learned (from an old wizard's letter that has fallen into his hands) of a valuable statuette,

The Weeping Maiden, that is hidden beneath a certain oasis (of the DM's choice).

This statuette is in a spider-haunted tunnel complex, with "considerable other treasure"—and as long as the Maiden is brought back to the Stushan intact, the PCs can keep all that other treasure. In addition, the Stushan will pay each PC a 2,000 gold piece fee for their trouble (200 in advance), and give each two potions of healing.

If the PCs agree, the Stushan reveals which oasis, and provides a rough map to there, which also shows how to get into the tunnels. (If the PC party is strong, the DM may want to locate this adventure in a dangerous oasis, with lamia or Zhentarim inhabitants.) He warns them of the spiders, and not to touch, remove, or look into the tears of the Maiden, or they may be trapped by the deadly curse the tears carry! (He will not elaborate further.) The tunnels are in the form of three linked squares, with a side-tunnel branching off at right angles from the center of each side of every square. One of these branches is the entry; others form the linkages between the squares. The seven remaining branches are all dead-ends, with identical treasure-chests sitting in each.

One chest contains 600 gp; another holds ivory tusks, worth about 7,000 gp in all if sold in the right market; a third holds the Maiden.

All of the other chests are trapped. Touching two of the chests triggers falling block traps, and the last two contain poisoned darts that spring forth when the chest is opened.

Traps: Falling blocks come down just in front of the chests, to be drawn back up later on massive chains. They are large enough to strike down two PCs, hitting at THAC0 8 for 4d6 crushing damage. PCs who are hit are allowed a Dexterity Check; success means only "glancing blow" damage of 1d8 points is taken. These traps can be detected, but not deactivated: to avoid them, one must shift the chest with ropes or polearms, let the block fall, and then examine the (empty, locked) chest.

Poisoned dart traps can be detected and jammed, but if the chest is then unlocked, PCs will find only the darts inside. Trying to move them, or take one, will cause them to fire (even if earlier “deactivated”). The darts strike at THAC0 10, spraying out in random directions because their firing-springs are equipped with bent wooden “whips” whose recoils can slap the emerging darts in odd directions (such as down over the lip of the chest, at someone crouching below). They can reach up to 20’ distant, and do 1d4 damage plus Type C poison effects (refer to the DMG). The poison lasts for only one strike; if the dart misses, PCs may salvage it, but the poison will dry out and become forever ineffective in 2d12 rounds.

The tunnels, too, are also trapped. For every 10’ x 10’ floor-area explored by the PCs, roll 1d4. A result of 3 means that a “Kissing Maiden” trap springs up when the area is stepped into. The stone block tilts up and slides down with lighting speed, to reveal a stone bar that smites the PCs, driving the iron points it is studded with into the unfortunate victims. These Maidens do 2d8 damage, and strike once per entry of their trigger area. PCs expecting a Maiden attack are allowed a Dexterity Check, to take only 2d4 damage. Leaping over a known trigger area will avoid the Maiden-but can land one right on top of the next Maiden!

The tunnels also have, as advertised, spider inhabitants: 16 Huge Spiders in all. They are AL LN; AC 6; MV 18 (leap 30’); HD 2 + 2; 14 hp each; THAC0 19; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (bite); SA leap, bite poison (Type A, + 1 bonus allowed on saving throw); SZ M (6’ diameter); ML 8; XP 270; MC1. These cannot surprise PCs unless an unsuspecting character rounds a corner and gets leaped on. They will swarm; if one fights PCs, others will leap to join in, scattering only if fire or lightning are unleashed.

The Stushan is planning to double-cross the PCs. One of each pair of healing potions he gave them is actually a delayed-action poison (Type A, its effects detailed in the DMG), and one coin of the 200 gp given to each PC is equipped with a Shandaril’s tracer spell. (This magic, detailed in the sourcebook FR4/The Magister, allows him to know the distance and direction of each coin from him, when concentrated on, and also the race, alignment, and presence of magical ability of any creature touching the coin.) This allows the Stushan to follow PCs’ movements.

He hopes the PCs will get The Weeping Maiden out of the complex and then all perish, somewhere in the desert-or that only a few will survive, and bring the Maiden to him. They should be weak and easily dealt with; the first thing the Stushan (who is a 10th level wizard, though he won’t advertise this to the PCs) will do is to telekinese the Maiden into an underground area guarded by a Death Tyrant (an undead beholder that serves him with absolute loyalty). It is AL LE; AC 0/2/7; MV Fl 2 (C); 75 hp; THAC0 5; #AT 1; Dmg 2-8 (bite); SA eye powers (nine eyestalks, but three have lost their powers): telekinese 250 pound weight, flesh to stone ray (30 yard range), fear (as wand), slow, cause serious wounds (50 yard range), death ray (40 yard range); SD anti-magic ray (140 yard range, 90° arc, from central eye), “standard” undead spell immunities; SZ M (6’ diameter); ML 18; XP 13,000; SJR1/Lost Ships. This awesome foe appears as a rotting, mold-encrusted beholder. White film covers its three dead eyes, and here and there it has body plates missing (and is AC7 in those areas).

The Stushan will then dimension door to The Weeping Maiden, leaving D’tarig servants (some armed with one-shot magical wands) and the Death Tyrant to slay or drive off the PCs.

The Weeping Maiden is a beautifully-sculpted statuette about a foot high, of a long-haired, weeping maiden. From between her hands, which cover her face, spills a line of tears. The statuette is of solid jet, and is worth around 2,400 gp. The seven tears are not cursed (that was merely the Stushan’s deception, to keep the PCs from taking any), and are clear, crystal-like teardrop-shaped stones: king's tears (detailed fully in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Adventures hardcover source-book).

These tears are worth 7,000 gp each, for captured in the depths of every one is a clear, detailed image. These scenes show rich treasures, hidden long ago, in their resting-places. PCs who examine the scenes and do a bit of guesswork can learn where the riches lie (for example: one scene may show treasure lying in the interior of a hollowed-out stone block of a merlon (the upthrust "block" of parapet between two embrasures) on the crenellated battlements of the East Torchtower, on the walls of the City of Waterdeep).

The locations, type and amount of treasures is left to the DM; it is suggested that magical items be some of them. They need not be unguarded, and the DM can use these scenes to lead PCs into as many side-adventures as desired (or that the PCs decide to follow up on). In some cases, of course, the treasures can be gone-swept away by the ravages of time, or taken already the hand of another.

Spindleskull's Tomb

When PCs climb up or over a dune, they discover a hole in its top. The hole is the top of a shaft descending into the earth, filled by a spiral stair. Some magical force field keeps sand out (and warns those below of the arrival of intruders), but lets the PCs through.

The stair leads down into a large cavern, where PCs will see 2d4 mind flayers, clad in rich robes. They advance soundlessly as a voice from the darkness beyond asks, "Who comes to Spindleskull's Tomb? Speak, or join the great adventurer in his eternal rest!" The voice is that of Spindleskull, who has become a Watchghost: AL LN; AC 1; MV 9, Fl 9 (C); HD 7 + 2; 46 hp; THAC0 13; #AT 1; Dmg 2-16 (chill touch); SA chill ray (12 times/day: 90' range, passes 4th level or less magical barriers, target must save vs. death magic or take 2d12 damage, and save vs. petrification or be slowed for 2d12 rounds); SD cannot be turned, has undead spell immunities plus proof against poison, insubstantial, can pass through stone; MR 25%; SZ M (6' tall); ML 20; XP 4,000; detailed fully in The Ruins of Undermountain.

Spindleskull appears as a scimitar-wielding, bearded man with a bald, pointed head. His weapon is a scimitar + 1 with a special power: once a day it can bring forth 2d4 illusory images of mind flayers, which remain for 1 turn, and are silent but very lifelike (they levitate, and have flowing robes and undulating mouth-tentacles). Only dispel magic spells will destroy these illusions, not physical contact.

Spindleskull will fight if attacked, but is not hostile to intruders. Rather, he is lonely and curious, and warns PCs sternly away from the door at the back of the cavern: "Please-don't go in there! Great evil lurks beyond!" Spindleskull will not leave the room; his task is to guard the door, not allowing what is inside to break out. (If PCs go in after his warning, that's their decision.) If questioned about what's beyond the door, Spindleskull says, "The well" (of drinking water), "my gold, and something with many eyes, that swings a shining axe-it came by magic. There're traps, too. Don't go in!" If the PCs don't, Spindleskull is chatty, and proves a friendly source of information about Anauroch and the rest of the Realms (the DM can use him to point the way to other adventures), but can't remember anything more about his treasure, the traps, or the dangerous "something." Whoever made him a watchghost (he can't remember who, either) blocked his memories of these things.

The door opens into a 10'-wide, 10'-high corridor, its floor solid stone but the walls and ceiling made of stone blocks. Whenever the walls or ceiling are touched, rusty scimitar blades appear from the nearest seam between stones, thrusting out suddenly (make a Dexterity Check per weapon to avoid being struck; normal weapon damages apply).

Once the door closes, it cannot be opened from the corridor side, and must be shattered (it is AC4, has 146 hp, and will reflect any spells cast at it back at the caster, completely and without fail).

After PCs have advanced 90' down the corridor, they notice that the floor, from this point onward, is covered with a slick, clear liquid. The liquid is tasteless, won't burn, and is very slippery.

If the PCs continue to advance, nothing occurs until they have traversed 60' of slippery corridor-whereupon the entire slippery area begins to tilt under their weight, dipping down to propel them helplessly forward in a slide, down and forward another 60', into a 10' drop into a room whose walls and floor are a rusty forest of old spear-points, swords, and other edged weapons, wired into place.

PCs unable to fly or levitate take damage as follows. Roll 1d12 for each PC; the result is the number of blades struck, each doing 2d4 damage in this initial fall.

Thereafter, as PCs clamber about in the forest of sharp blades, they must make a successful Dexterity Check each round or suffer 1d6 additional damage.

Anyone ending up in this forest of rusty steel is attacked immediately, from above. The ceiling of the room, 14' above the blade-adorned floor, is of stone tiles, held up on a massive iron grating. Two tiles are missing, and down through the gap will reach two fang-mouthed tentacles, one mouth wielding a battle axe (1d8 damage), and the other a halberd (1d10).

The pseudopods belong to an Argos: AL NE; AC 0; MV 9, Fl 3 (B); HD 10; 77 hp; THAC0 11; #AT 3 (weapons), or 3 per victim (pseudopods); Dmg by weapon or 1-4 (pseudopod mouth); SA eyes, swallows whole on a 20 attack roll (2d8 digestive damage/round), do 8 points to cut free; MR 25%; SZ G; ML 16; XP 6,000; MC7.

It has 96 eyes, and can bring 1d10 of them to bear on a single target (while attacking through the ceiling, it will hide its central eye and only expose 1d10 eyes at a time). All of the eyes cast magic, as a 10th level wizard.

The large central eye can alter self cast a color spray, or cast a ray of enfeeblement each round. For all the other eyes, roll d20: 1: blindness; 2: burning hands (by eye gaze); 3: charm monster; 4: clairvoyance; 5: confusion; 6: darkness, 15' radius; 7: dispel magic; 8: emotion; 9: ESP; 10: fumble; 11: gaze reflection; 12: heat metal; 13: hold monster; 14: improved phantasmal force; 15: irritation; 16: light; 17: slow; 18: suggestion; 19: tongues; 20: turn flesh to stone.

This awesome monster is a huge, amorphous mass studded with many eyes and mouths. It can exude up to three pseudopods ending in fanged maws that can grasp items and wield weapons.

The argos was brought here by the magic of Baergil (CE hm W12), a deranged Zhentarim who plans treachery against his fellows. He set Spindleskull up as a guardian, to keep the argos free from molestation, and is quietly working his way here and there among the Zhentarim, trying to catch fellow wizards alone. When he manages it, he contrives to brush against them-and whispers the casting word of a special teleport variant spell he has devised. The spell hurls the unsuspecting wizard across the Realms to here: into the corridor, with Spindleskull's door closed behind them.

The argos provides the death-trap; it is up to the DM how much magic it has gained from Zhentarim victims already (and secreted inside its body). After initial annoyance at its imprisonment, the creature has come to enjoy slaying wizards, but is beginning to get restless again, and will co-operate in any PC breakout attempt-after trying to kill most of them, of course.

The argos can readily slide aside more ceiling tiles to gaze down at PCs, who must climb up to reach it. It can crash down on PCs who get up into its upper chamber, and even fly back above the corridor, to tear off its roof and exude itself downward to block off any attempted retreat.

The “upper room” that the argos occupies overlies most of the corridor, and has a side-alcove that contains a few broken ceiling tiles and a well of good drinking water. The well’s bucket-rope currently holds a heavy cargo suspended in the well: Spindleskull’s treasure chest (which holds whatever treasure the DM desires).

Adventure Hooks

These are small encounters or intriguing events that can lead into larger adventures, as follows:

- PCs find a body in the sand—or rather, they find a pair of sprawled boots, leather armor, an empty helm, a sword and belt, gauntlets, and all-laid out as if a warrior had fallen on his face. There is no trace of the man who wore this gear: not a scrap of flesh or bone fragment, only the empty clothing. If PCs examine the belt-pouch, they find several gems DM’s choice of type and value), two brass keys (to unknown locks), and two scraps of parchment, bearing writing (in Thorass):

The Brotherhood will send a woman to meet you at the Lion’s Rest festhall in Mirabar. Go late; ask for the Emerald Whip. The words are ‘five black moons.’ Do not tell her of Taura’s death.

Ulbara is my daughter; she you may trust. Beware all others; both the shape-shifters and the Harpers seek the scepter, and they know it has been taken from Gauntulgrym to the Secret Place in the Sands. Most dangerous of those who seek it is the witch Elsura, who often walks in the shape of a mincing black cat with eyes of gold-green hue. She knows the scepter by sight, and visited Gauntulgrym when it was a living city, at least once. There is also a man called Baelam, who has a metal hand. He commands strange magics; fight him from afar if you must face him. The Wizard of Waterdeep knows the way. Blood Creek is the place where Nerim is most often found. Let no one see you go.

- PCs come upon a snake (a giant cobra, perhaps) in the sand, striking repeatedly at something small and thin: a sword that moves by itself! The sword is animated by a glyptar (a gem-monster detailed in Volume 3 of the Monstrous Compendium, under “Maedar”), and if the PCs seize the sword, it will try (subtly) to manipulate one PC against another.

Alternatively, PCs reaching a tranquil oasis could come upon a scimitar floating motionless above the oasis pool. It does nothing until touched, whereupon it will “go with” the PC touching it until it has been carried into a good position to slay many PCs (in a tent with sleeping PCs is a “good position,” for example). This scimitar was magical before the glyptar possessed it, and has the following powers (which the glyptar can use): it is a +1 weapon and can fly (MC’ Fl 16 (A)), and can also charm person by touch, once a day; dimension door (self and if it wishes, one creature touching it, thrice per day); invisibility (self only, thrice per day).

- Any time the PCs use a spell of 5th level or greater while in the Sword that is not instantaneous, and does not duplicate a natural desert effect, they risk attracting the attention of a Phaerimm.

An alerted Phaerimm may send a servant creature to investigate. It will arrive in 2d12 turns, and may be anything that the Phaerimm has mentally controlled (usually a laerti, stingtail, or illithid). It will try to destroy PCs, or capture them and bring them underground for Phaerimm examination. An intelligent creature will try to seize and carry below a valuable PC, knowing the others will follow in attempts to rescue their companion.

- A dying camel comes staggering into view over the dunes-exhausted, emaciated, swollen-tongued and unsteady. It is dragging heavy, battered packsacks, still strapped to it.

If they investigate, PCs discover (the hard way) that the “camel” is really a doppelganger, and the “packsacks” are another one. There is a real cargo carried by the “packsack,” however: that doppelganger will let fall an ivory coffer.

Inside the coffer is a wand, coated with some sort of paralyzing poison. Both doppelgangers wear tiny vials of the antidote, hanging from rings that pierce their ears.

- PCs come upon a slaughtered Bedine tribe, amid flapping vultures. If they examine the bodies closely, they see that all valuables have been taken, and that the nomads were all slain by magic.

Shortly afterwards (probably when they are next encamped), they meet a mysterious, black-robed, severe woman, who walks alone out of the desert to confront them, offering them water (if they seem in need of it) or gems and gold (which she is carrying large amounts of, hidden in her robes or in a Leomund's secret chest) in return for spell scrolls (or magical items . . .).

This woman is a desert witch, Shiluan, of some power (adjust her actual level, above or below 9th, to best challenge PCs). Her spells are almost exclusively those given in the “Wind and Sand Magic” chapter of this book. She battles PCs who attack or try to capture her, but need not be aggressive or evil. If rebuffed, she may stealthily follow the PC party, hoping to find a way out of the desert or to win their aid through gratitude by rescuing them from foes, later.

It is up to the DM whether Shiluan slew the tribe (and if so, why), or used her magic to flee from Zhentarim or other wizardly attackers who slaughtered her people (or perhaps she has no connection with the slain Bedine at all). If the PCs are already engaged in running fights with Zhentarim agents, Shiluan could prove a temporary PC ally against the Brotherhood.

- Vultures begin to follow the PCs, nearer attacking or even dropping down within reach, but always there. Their escort begins to draw the attention of desert predators (such as lions, laerti, or if this occurs in the Plain, even giants).

Most of the vultures are simply vultures, but at least two of them, the leaders of the flock, are polymorphed Zhentarim magelings, spying on the PCs and hoping to see them destroyed, so that they can rob the PCs of any magic or valuables they carry, and claim the defeat of “dangerous foes of the Brotherhood” for their own advancement.

The “false vultures” may abandon their disguises if directly attacked, or if the PCs are beset by powerful foes, and the Zhentarim think that their spells can bring certain defeat to the PCs.

Called "asabis" by the Bedine, these desert-dwelling reptiles are superficially similar to the "lizard men" of the swamplands. Laertis tend to be brown or grey in hue, with dun or light green underbellies; their larger cousins, stingtails, tend to be brown or dark reddish-brown.

Laertis and stingtails both have yellow, egg-shaped eyes so bright that they flash in darkness, with horizontal slit pupils. They wear only leather armor, speak their own sharp, chattering language, and their sexes appear identical to human eyes. Laertis can run on all fours or stand upright, but their tails are not prehensile; those of stingtails are prehensile. Both laertis and stingtails closely resemble the tiny lizards of the sands: unlike "lizard men," their limbs protrude from their sinuous bodies at right angles, and they move with quick, ungainly gestures.

Their narrow skulls have sloping foreheads that end in a protruding brow, and swing from side to side atop a thin, awkward neck. They touch and smell partially with their flicking tongues, and have rough, pebbly skin, with gashes for ears and noses.

Combat: Laertis hire themselves out as mercenaries to surface beings, or hunt surface-dwelling Bedine and less intelligent creatures on their own, using any sort of one-handed sword they can fashion or capture, and crude crossbows (equal to "light crossbows") which they carry slung on their backs. Laertis are quite cunning, and enjoy ambushing prey. By strict rule, they do not fight among themselves.

Laertis can readily burrow into and out of the sand, rising silently from buried concealment to strike down foes. They can run swiftly on all fours, their serpentine tails twitching behind (increasing their effective armor class to 4 vs. opponents who are using missile weapons against them). At will they can rise upright on their rear legs to fight, or leap up to 20' horizontally or 16' upwards.

Habitat/Society: On the surface of desert lands, laertis are only encountered at night. They must spend the day hiding from the sun, either burrowed a few feet beneath the sand, or in a cave, or huddled in a rock crevice. Their body temperatures prohibit them from activity in the hot sun: more than 2-5 turns of enforced marching or carrying in the sun will cause a laerti to collapse.

Left to themselves, laertis dwell in tribes, under the rule of a council of elders and a war-leader. They may ally themselves with dark nagas and other co-operative evil creatures for mutual gain, or even adopt these as members of the tribe. Every laerti tribe has at least 2d8 stingtail members. They have tunnels everywhere under the desert, and often emerge by night to raid surface locales.

Most laertis of Anauroch are controlled by the Phaerimm, and live in war-bands or other groups at the whim of their masters.

Ecology: Laertis eat the internal organs ("soft parts") of humans, camels, and other prey, tearing open the bodies and leaving the rest for vultures. They also eat certain subterranean fungi, such as lichens, mushrooms, and myconids, and certain taproofs that enter the depths from the surface world, above.

The same poisons affect laerti and stingtails as affect humans, except that both are immune to stingtail tail poison.

Stingtail: A rarer, related laerti variety, stingtails live peacefully with laerti brethren: the two species are cross-fertile, 10% of the young being stingtails and the rest laertis. Stingtails are less intelligent than laertis, but larger and stronger, and are usually content to follow the orders and aims of laertis.

Stingtails employ the same sorts of weapons in battle as laertis, but can also use their tails for 2d4 damage slaps or coil them around melee weapons, wielding them for normal damage. At will (to a maximum of six times/day), a stingtail making a successful hit with its tail (when not holding a weapon or using the tail to hang onto a ledge or branch) on an opponent can elect to release a spray of liquid poison through skin pores. This caustic, vinegar-scented secretion causes victims hit by it to be confused for the round of striking and the round that follows, and forces a save vs. poison to avoid Type M contact poison effects (see DMG).

Stingtails are of little use to Phaerimm and wizards seeking slaves, because they are immune to the effects of all known magics of the enchantment/charm school.

Dark nagas are fey creatures who have human-like faces (with fanged mouths) on leathery, snake-like bodies. They usually work with other evil beings for mutual gain or survival. Dark nagas tend to be black, purplish-black, or very dark blue in hue, and their crested heads and smooth, almost invisible scales make them look like gigantic eels more than snakes.

Combat: Dark nagas have natural ESP powers (80' range), and use this ability constantly.

Dark nagas have a (non-poisonous) bite and a poisonous tail-sting; the barbed stinger does physical damage, and any struck being must save vs. poison or take 1-2 hp additional damage and fall into a drugged sleep (onset time 1 round, sleep lasts 2d4 rounds).

The most feared ability of dark nagas is their power to wield magic. A dark naga casts spells as a 6th level wizard (4,2,2), and employs verbal-only spells. It may learn these spells from dragons, Phaerimm, or other creatures who can cast spells with but a word or thought (act-of-will spells, as opposed to spell-like natural powers, can easily be altered into verbal-release magics . . . but the devising of a verbal-only version of a spell that normally has somatic and material components is not nearly so simple a matter). It may devise new spells, or verbal-only spell versions, itself by means of experimentation. Either means of acquiring new magics is slow and expensive, and this can often force dark nagas into servitude to a stronger evil creature or anyone who hires them, or into the life of an adventurer.

Dark nagas are immune to the effects of all known (normal and magical) acids, venoms, and poisons. Some have been known to swallow poisons and act as a courier, spitting up the dangerous liquid when they deliver it to its destination. They can spit poison that they are so carrying up to 10' distant at any opponent; this requires a successful attack roll, and takes the place of their bite, though a naga can elect to bite and then release the poison as it does so, combining the damage.

In battle, a dark naga may use its sting and either a spell or a bite in the same round. If space permits, the naga can direct its sting and bite against the same foe, but it is quite intelligent enough to direct attacks at multiple opponents, even attacking foes in front of and behind it, simultaneously, if caught between them in a narrow passage.

Dark nagas cannot be mind-read; their ESP ability somehow renders them immune to the ESP-like probes of others. They are subject but resistant to charm, sleep, hold and similar enchantment/charm spells, receiving a +2 bonus to all saving throws against this school of magic.

Habitat/Society: Dark nagas lair in rocky places, such as caverns or ruins; they like to have a home where they can hide things (such as treasures and spellbooks), that has more than one entry or exit, and at least one place narrow enough that they can block it with their body, and singlehandedly fight off intruders. Dark nagas are fond of traps, and will devise these (or hire other creatures to install them) whenever possible.

Dark nagas tend to be loners, but can form stable family groups of two or three; they are bisexual, and give birth to a squirming mass of many wormlike young which they promptly abandon to fend for themselves. Intelligent enough to know they can prevail against few creatures in the Realms alone, dark nagas work with other evil creatures, such as orcs, hobgoblins, drow, phaerimm, beholders, and the like. They like to fill a "commander and magical strike force" role, perhaps in a sergeant-like intermediary rank, under a more powerful ruler—but they are wise enough to adopt the faith, beliefs, and rules of whatever group they join.

Ecology: Dark nagas do not willingly eat other dark nagas, but they will eat just about anything else, both alive and dead. They eat a few lichens and the occasional green plant, but their main diet is meat. They especially prize hot, still-fresh blood.

Dark nagas spend their lives outwardly working with, or serving, others. Whenever possible, however, they also pursue private goals, which may be as whimsical and odd as some human goals ("cover this desert valley with trees," for instance), but always include increasing their personal power by acquiring new spells and magical items. Dark nagas are quick to plunder fallen foe, swallowing items, scrolls, and spellbooks to spit forth later—for all dark nagas have a bag-like internal organ that they can use to carry things. This organ has thick, rubbery air-sac walls to protect the naga against harp points and the like, but it also protects the cargo against digestive juices, and has the unusual side-effect of shielding magic from all detection spells.

X.P. VALUE:	420

Orpsu, also known as "night stirges," are flying predators who feed on fresh blood. They are unrelated to the more common stirge, and do not grip victims to feed. An orpsu is a hairless, rat-tailed flying beast equipped with raking fangs and four bony, wing-like projecting "horns." Orpsu are mottled crimson, purple, mauve, or cinnamon-brown in hue, and have veined, leathery skin.

Orpsu are common in Kara-Tur and the steppes, plains, and deserts that lie west of the Eastern Realms.

Combat: Orpsu have 150 infravision, and hunt in darkness to avoid attacks from larger predators when flying in the open. Once per day, an orpsu can use a weak form of hold monster (as the fifth-level wizard spell, except that only a single living being within 60' can be attacked). If the target successfully saves (at +2) against this power, it is affected as if by a slow spell. Orpsu catch and overcome most of their prey by this means. They are relatively clumsy in flight, and usually swoop down on prey only after it has been held or slowed.

Orpsu have stout, razor-sharp fangs, but no lower jaws, and cannot bite, using their fangs instead to slash or rake. Orpsu also have prehensile tails, too weak to hold struggling prey or a weapon, but able to drag small objects or coil around a tree limb when the creature is at rest. Orpsu have no legs or feet, and can only move on the ground by clumsily undulating their bodies.

The most distinctive features of an orpsu are its razor-sharp, blade-like bone "horns," which project out of its body like two back-to-back crescents, the ends of one pair of horns curling forward on either side of the raking fangs, and the other two projecting backwards like wings on either side of the tail. An orpsu is at a disadvantage if knocked out of the air, and therefore instinctively swoops down to strike targets at an angle, as it passes—so only one side of its body menaces prey, and only one horn (either the front horn—or, if it misses, the angled, dragging rear horn) can strike an intended target per swoop (in addition to the orpsu's fangs). A horn attack does 1d4 + 3 damage.

Any wound caused by one continues to bleed (the victim losing 1 hp/round thereafter) until the wound is bound up (and the victim refrains from combat or other strenuous activity for at least 1 turn), or curative magic is applied.

Orpsu only attempt to drain blood from victims who are held, asleep, or who have collapsed. Up to a dozen soft, flexible white tentacles emerge from slits in an orpsu's belly (into which they retract when not needed). Orpsu have no barbs or claws to grip victims, and instead glide down to a flapping halt above chosen prey, onto which they settle heavily. The tentacles penetrate the victim's skin, providing some holding power, and the orpsu usually wraps its tail around the victim's body, limb or extremity. On the round after settling, the orpsu's blood drain begins. It takes 1-2 hit points of blood per round, until the victim dies or the orpsu is knocked off (this is not difficult if the victim is conscious and able to move). A physical attack by another being usually causes a draining orpsu to bound into the air with a powerful coiling and whipping of its tail, and fly away). Orpsu have no known blood-satiation point. They remain alert when draining, and will abandon a victim rather than face certain death by remaining.

Orpsu fly by natural levitation, propelling themselves forward by flailing and wriggling their tails, and steering by angling the membrane "wings" of their horns as they tilt their bodies.

Habitat/Society: Orpsu lair in rocky places, such as caverns or ruins, and hunt in open, rolling scrubland or plains—or dwell and hunt entirely beneath the surface, in the endless caverns of the Underdark.

Orpsu emit no calls or noises, and can communicate only with others of their kind, employing a limited, 20'-range telepathy that is incomprehensible to other beings employing magic or natural powers to mentally eavesdrop. Their peculiar mental activity renders them immune to charm, suggestion, domination, and hold magic and similar mental powers and spells.

Orpsu live in mated pairs, producing litters of 1-4 live, instantly-active and hungry young (1-1 HD, attacks: 2-5/1-2) every three summers. Offspring remain with their parents to form a family "swarm," which grows with the passing years and litters until the swarm numbers more than a dozen—whereupon 1-4 of the oldest, original offspring form mated pairs and fly off to find new (orpsu-less) hunting territory, and there found a swarm of their own.

Ecology: Surface-dwelling orpsu prey on sheep, cattle, many small creatures (having a particular fondness for badgers, foxes, and otters), large birds, and men. Subterranean orpsu prefer the blood of drow and duergar to all else.

Phaerimm are powerful magic-using beings that move by natural levitation. They resemble upright cones, the widest part uppermost, and the point ending in a barbed stinger-tail.

Combat: Phaerimm have 160'-range infravision, and can see into the astral and ethereal planes up to 90' distant. Their normal vision also operates to this range, and functions as a constant detect magic. Phaerimm also have natural magic resistance: 44% vs. all magic except petrification and polymorph attacks (to which they are 77% resistant). Any magical attack on them that their resistance overcomes can be used by Phaerimm as healing (the hp damage the spell would have done are gained as "replacement" hp; excess gained points can be carried for 12 rounds as energy, and used to offset later damage) or reflected back 100% at the source. (Spells that do no damage absorbed by a Phaerimm as healing yield 1 hp per spell level.) Spell reflections are a defensive reflex and do not take the place of a Phaerimm's spell attack in the round they occur. No upward limit to the number of magical attacks a Phaerimm can reflect or absorb in a single round has yet been found.

Phaerimm also command more magic than most human mages. For every fifty years of life, a Phaerimm increases one level as a wizard; most of this long-lived race are the equivalents of 22nd to 27th level mages. Phaerimm experiment with, research, and memorize spells much as human wizards do, but can also adopt a single chosen spell of each level as "natural." The spell (which can never be changed, once chosen) is retained in their brain structure. Phaerimm regain chosen "natural" spells innately, without study, every day.

Most Phaerimm have devised some unique spells. All Phaerimm spells are cast by silent act of will—most Phaerimm magical study is time spent altering captured human spells into will-force magical energy manipulations.

In addition to a spell attack (and any reflected magics) in a round, a Phaerimm can make up to six physical attacks, if targets are within reach. Its powerful jaws, located in the open "top" of its cone, bite for 3d4 damage. The rim of the cone contains four evenly-spaced, fully-retractable arms. These arms look startlingly human, but the hands have three central fingers and two outside, opposed thumbs. They can punch for 1d4 damage, wield weapons (up to and including polearms) for normal weapon damage, or grasp opponents to hold them for automatically-striking bites (each round, roll a d20 each for Phaerimm and grasped victim; higher total prevails: either the grasp holds for the round, or the victim breaks free).

Phaerimm also have powerful tails that can smite for 2d4 damage; if a tail attack roll is 16 or better on a d20, its sting impales the victim: the victim takes the usual 2d4 damage, plus 1d6 more as the hollow bone sting stabs deep into them, injecting a milky fluid. The victim must save against poison three times: to see if the injected venom paralyzes the victim; to determine if it causes the victim to levitate (rising above any "floor" surface, and hanging a few feet off the ground, powerless to move except by grasping or pushing against solid objects within reach); and to see if the Phaerimm egg injected into the victim is fertile. If it isn't, it dissolves harmlessly. If it is, it begins to grow in 1d6 days, eating the victim internally for a loss of 1 hp/day thereafter, until death occurs or a cure disease spell kills the Phaerimm larva. During this time, the victim's attack, armor class, and ability scores are all penalized by 4 points, due to debilitating, gnawing pain. An egg or larva can be cut out of a victim, who must survive a system shock roll, and typically suffers 2d4 points of damage during the process.

Habitat/Society: The Phaerimm like to live near others of their own kind (for mutual protection, and for the social satisfaction of vying with each other in devious plans), but operate alone or surround themselves with magically-controlled slave creatures to carry out their bidding. In Faerun, the mightiest magic of the Sharn presently limits Phaerimm to under Anauroch, but they work through agents to affect the world beyond the desert, using certain Bedine tribesmen and some Red Wizards who came to Anauroch long ago to try to establish a base or recover the fabled magic of The Lost Kingdoms. They have also subverted a few Zhentarim, but are being very careful not to reveal themselves to the Brotherhood—yet.

Ecology: Phaerimm eat all reptiles and mammals, keeping them as slaves until their turn as dinner. They especially hate tomb tappers, who seem immune to Phaerimm mind-controlling magics.

Thaalud appear as tall, naked, sexless and hairless humanoids with very hard, smooth blue-gray skin, claws that can dig through solid rock, and great toothed mouths in their bellies. Their smooth, featureless heads have earned them the nickname "the Faceless."

Combat: Thaalud attack with iron-hard, long-fingered hands (4d6 damage each), and bend over or hurl themselves atop opponents to bite with their abdominal mouths (which crush and tear armor, rock, flesh and bone alike, one bite doing 1d12 + 9 damage). If they lack the room for such maneuvers, or don't want to close with opponents, they swing great hammers (see below) for 1d12 + 6 damage. Tappers can wield these weapons one-handed (- 2 on attack rolls), and throw them with great accuracy (+ 2 to hit).

Thaalud "see" by sonar (they emit inaudibly high sound waves, which bounce back) accurate up to 440', and require no light. This sense enables them to locate invisible creatures and objects, and makes them immune to illusions and other vision-related spells (such as color spray and hypnotic pattern). They communicate by means of humming sounds created by skin vibration (this language is partially understood by mind flayers), and by a limited (120'-range, no mind-reading or attacks possible from either end) telepathy. Tappers can detect magic at will, and can animate rock (as the seventh-level priest spell, affecting up to 9 cubic feet of rock, for 1d4 + 2 rounds; determine duration randomly each time used) once every 12 turns.

Tomb tappers are immune to enchantment/charm spells and fire- and cold-based attacks of all sorts. Electrical attacks do them half (or, if save is made, no) damage. They save versus petrification at -2, and when killed, turn to stone in 1-2 rounds.

Habitat/Society: Tomb tappers get their name from their habit of burrowing up from the depths to plunder tombs, temples, and wizards' towers, in search of magical items, which they bear off. They usually try to seize magical items from encountered beings.

Magic is sacred to thaalud; they never use any magical items gained, but protect and venerate them. Tappers spend their long lives in an eternal search for the Source of All Magic, which they believe lies hidden somewhere deep in the earth. They are somewhat in awe of earth elementals, believing them to be created at this mysterious source, and are reluctant to attack them.

Thaalud keep as common treasure (owned by the clan as a whole) all magical items, and guard these watchfully. As personal treasure, they keep pretty rocks (i.e. not gems that are dull when uncut), such as quartz, jade, agate, and amethyst. These are stored in caverns of glowrock, in the utter depths. (Glowrock is a stone that gives off a natural amber or lime-green faerie fire. It is harmless, and useful as a light source, but too soft to carve. It is often present in radiation-strong areas of the IJnderdark, glowing brightly when exposed to such radiation-but is not itself a radiation source.)

Ecology: Several prominent sages believe thaalud are created beings, originally humans altered by magic in fallen Netheril. This view is supported by their faceless heads (arguing they have been changed from a humanoid norm), and by their spell immunities (suggesting they were created to fight the Phaerimm). Tapper beliefs indicate they know magic has power over them. Some, including Elminster, think thaalud were originally made from rock, animated in human form. This view is supported by their turning to stone at death.

Thaalud skin varies in porosity at will; through it, tappers take in needed water. Their gigantic jaws can crush rock, from which thaalud extract mineral sustenance. They also digest iron from blood and bone marrow, if such become available—but do not hunt to eat.

Thaalud customarily wield great hammers of arenite, an alloy (exact composition secret) derived from magma. These hammers are 10' long or more, heavy, harder than most rock, and very durable. Tappers can dig through rock with their claws, but use their hammers to split rock when a smooth surface is desired.

Thaalud are naturally long-lived, and form regional clans. It is not known if they have young or give birth; no children or pregnant thaalud have ever been seen. Even who leads a clan is not known, although thaalud make and keep deals with other beings, and hence are assumed to respect rules and authority.

Thaalud will aid svirfnebli and dwarves, whose magic they leave unmolested. They have no interest in drow clothing and other items that act magical due to Underdark radiations and not true dweomers. Thaalud hate umber hulks (sometimes enslaving them from birth), mutually ignore xorn, dislike duergar and drow, and are bitter foes of illithids and Phaerimm, who have slain more than a few thaalud.

The Most Wicked and Corrupt Land in the Realms

The exciting Harpers series continues!

The Red Wizards rule Thay, perhaps the most sinister land in all the Forgotten Realms. As one of their number, Zulkir Malligor, builds a net of treachery and deceit to control the fate of the land, the good-aligned secret organization known as the Harpers seeks to uncover his vile schemes.

So a small band of agents, posing as slaves and traders, are sent by the Harpers to foil the malevolent plottings. Once inside Thay, they discover the undead minions of the Red Wizards, and a fate far worse than death — becoming soulless puppets of one of the wizards!

Don't miss a single book in the thrilling Harpers series. All three of these exciting FORGOTTEN REALMS® novels are now available!

(A reminder to DMs: PCs who cast comprehend languages, tongues or other obvious spells in order to converse with Bedine are likely to be attacked on the spot—or, if the PCs appear to be a strong party, fled from instantly.)

DANGERS OF THE DESERT

The worst hazard to visitors in the Sword of Anauroch is lack of water. Travelers often carry in or magically create it; seeking it at rare oases, by digging, or by melting ice in cold regions all lure predators.

Winds carry scent a long way. This can confuse both hunter and hunted, but hunters are alerted to edible life, and its direction. In the Sword, sand can cloak scent (e.g. a being buried to the neck in a dune), this can aid lurking predators as well as fleeing prey. Whenever one can see a long way, one can also be seen from afar. Standing on a dune puts one on display and causes a patter of sand down its slip-face, to alert those below.

Anauroch is a land of extreme conditions that can harm beings attempting things that are simple and harmless elsewhere in Faerun. DMs with access to the Wilderness Survival Guide can treat desert hazards in detail, beyond the suggestions given here.

Anauroch is either very cold or very hot, and almost always windy. When rare rain does fall, flooding results, and wild electrical storms (with many stray lightning bolts).

Most storms bring not rain, but blown sand. A storm begins as a gray haze on the horizon. It streaks the sky with finger-like gray tendrils as it sweeps nearer. A hot wind blows before it, coating everything with gray dust.

When the storm hits, roaring wind carries a pale cloud of blowing sand streaming along only a few feet above the dunes. The sand shoots from dune crests in great plumes that roll down leeward slopes in roiling billows. In the troughs between dunes, creeps along a whitish stream that scours bare flesh raw, but only fills the bottom six feet or so of air (the heads of a camel and a rider—even one as short as a dwarf—will project above the streaming sand). The sky—and everything else—is obliterated in thick darkness, and vision is reduced to only feet (“darkness” fighting rules apply). Blown sand can blind travelers, hide approaching predators, even bury gear or travelers who can't move fast or often enough. To keep sand out, tents should be pitched with entry openings downwind. (Winter sleet storms and blizzards bring the same dangers—plus ice buildup, slipping, and the possibility of being soaked and then freezing to death.) By day, the hot sun is the greatest hazard in the Sword. For humans, minimizing water loss to avoid dehydration must be paramount. The best way to travel is at night, sitting quietly in shade by day—but most animals (both those that a man might eat, and those that might eat him), are also active at night.

Dehydrated humans collapse. Salt imbalance also causes circulatory failure, fatigue, and severe arm, leg, and abdominal cramps. Sunburn and longterm sweating may make sweat glands fail, bringing fever and delirium.

A man stranded in full, shadeless desert heat can survive for a day if he does not do any heavy work. By nightfall, his mouth will be dry and bitter, and his lips, tongue, and throat swollen. He will live through the night and into daybreak—but without shade or water, he will surely die the next day. Death may come from choking, as the through swells shut, or may be “explosive heat death”: as water is lost, blood becomes more viscous, straining the heart. When blood cannot move fast enough to carry metabolic heat away to the skin, internal body heat rises suddenly, and death occurs (“blood boils”).

In random areas of the Sword, ever-present spells of the Phaerimm “drink” water carried by travelers, and make detect magic spells useless (magic is “all around”).

Non-sandy Anaurian landscapes also offer hazards: the northern ice glaciers have suddenly-opening crevasses, many chances to slip and silde helplessly into jagged spears of ice or rock, avalanches of ice and snow, and exposure to the biting cold. The rocky central “Plain” is a land of rockslides, with little cover on the heights, but all too much cover in the ravines, pinnacles, and rock scree.

Official Game Accessory

Anauroch

by Ed Greenwood

The Great Desert. Where The Winds Wail. Grave of The Lost Princes. The Great Sand Sea. Not a place many sane folk in the Forgotten Realms want to visit. But there are plenty of the other sort, who come hence to find wonders both beautiful and dangerous.

The deadly, shifting sands of Anauroch hide—and occasionally, tantalizingly reveal—the riches and strange treasures of The Lost Kingdoms, swallowed long ago. The legendary wealth of The Cities of Gold lies somewhere in its sandy depths.

So, too, do worse things: fell monsters, famous in adventurers' tales (and listeners' nightmares) across the Realms. Evil, crawling magic whose counterspells have been long forgotten, whose death slumbers lightly, ever-ready to awaken and strike down the unwary intruder.

In the pages of this sourcebook, Anauroch comes to life. Its dark, innermost secrets are revealed, and the colorful cultures of the Bedine—and beings far worse—are explored. This guide to the most important "forgotten" land of the Forgotten Realms presents new rules galore: new spells, new adventures, new monsters—and much, much more.

Introduction

"Survival is a war, but it is a war that can be won, so long as we struggle against nature instead of each other."

— Inum, Iulutiu philosopher

The Great Glacier—ominous, forboding, mysterious. Perhaps no other region of the Forgotten Realms is as misunderstood. Many, for instance, believe it to be nothing more than a featureless mass of solid ice.

They are wrong.

Others believe it to be utterly devoid of life, that neither man nor beast could long survive its bitter weather and bleak terrain.

They are wrong.

And they say that whatever else may be true or untrue about the Great Glacier! it is most certainly a place of great danger, a land where death comes suddenly, unexpectedly, brutally.

About that, they are right.

About This Book

This book may be used by the DUNGEON MASTER™ either as a source of ideas for campaigns of her own design, or as a sourcebook to broaden her understanding of one of the Forgotten Realms' least-documented regions. The book is divided into several sections, each detailing a particular aspect of the Great Glacier:

The Introduction begins with a general overview of the region, along with a few pointers for staging adventures.

Part One features a brief history of the Great Glacier, including speculations as to its origin and the rise of its people, and a look at the relationship between the Great Glacier and its neighbors.

Part Two examines the Great Glacier's geography, weather, and special physical features. The region's natural hazards are described in detail, as are survival tips for first-time explorers.

Part Three is the largest section of the book, describing in detail the natives of the Great Glacier, collectively known as the Ulutium.

Part Four focuses on the flora and fauna of the Great Glacier—vegetation, animals, and monsters.

Part Five lists places of interest, all of which can be found on the enclosed color map. For convenience, locations are listed in alphabetical order.

Part Six presents some notable personalities of the Great Glacier, including statistics, background information, and personality notes. Among those listed are the great Iulutium philosopher Inum and the legendary human explorer Palus Frohm of Damara. Words of wisdom from Inum begin each section of the book, while advice from Palus can be found at the end.

Part Seven features an introductory adventure, "Snow Baby," designed to introduce player-characters to the Great Glacier.

The Appendix describes a number of monsters unique to the Great Glacier. The inner cover panels feature a glossary of terms relevant to the Ulutiums. Boxed material found throughout the text features gaming notes, historical details, and other information for the DM's edification.

Campaign Notes

As the DM peruses this book, and particularly when she develops her own Great Glacier adventures, she is advised to keep the following points in mind:

Think Cold

Close your eyes and imagine a cold winter's day. Not a chilly day or a brisk day, but a day of freezing, bitter cold so intense that it turns your fingers blue and your breath to frost. A day of biting, numbing cold that penetrates your clothes like icy needles, making your eyelids stiffen and your nostril linings freeze.

You have just imagined a warm day in the Great Glacier.

Think Hungry

Survival in the Great Glacier centers on the search for something to eat. Animal life is scarce, and vegetation is virtually non-existent. Natives of the Great Glacier are not inclined to share their precious food with strangers

Think Isolated

Though pockets of civilization exist throughout the Great Glacier, they are few and far between. The Ulutiums are wise to the region's dangers and seldom stray far from home; explorers counting on assistance from natives may be sadly—and fatally—disappointed.

Ulutium settlements are primitive by Realms standards. Spell components are hard to find, most magical items are unheard of and no amount of money can buy such exotic items as mirrors, spyglasses, or chicken eggs.

Think Lost

The terrain of the Great Glacier gives new meaning to the word "bleak." Flat, white plains stretch for miles in every direction, utterly devoid of landmarks to help travelers find their way. The sky is cloudless, the wind often still. Days pass in silence—not the howl of a wolf, nor the gurgle of a stream. Only the distant rumble of an avalanche, or the muffled screams of a lost, snowblind explorer occasionally break the endless silence of the Great Glacier.

"The traveler in the Great Glacier must be constantly alert. So bright is the day and so gleaming the snow that it is difficult to tell where the land ends and the sky begins. To eyes growing weary from squinting, the terrain becomes a blur of indistinguishable images. The mountain ten miles distant appears as close as the snow bank ten feet away; the stretch of solid ground ahead may in fact be a gaping crevasse, ready to swallow the explorer whose eyes have betrayed him.

"Three rules of survival:

"1. Rest frequently.

"2. Move carefully.

"3. Don't trust your senses."

—from Blood and Ice: Survival in the Great Glacier by Palus Frohm

Part One: History

"Again and again, the pattern of history reveals a simple truth—that history has no pattern."

-Inum

Birth of The Great Glacier

In the beginning, there was an ocean.

A millennium ago, when the Realms were barren, a vast ocean filled the area now known as the Great Glacier, spilling south to the lands that would eventually become Vaasa, Damara, and Narfell. The ocean was still and uninviting; even if seafaring vessels had existed then, explorers would have found little of interest in its icy waters.

Ulutiu, however, found the ocean irresistible. It isn't known if it was the solitude that attracted him, or if its bitter temperatures invigorated him. Perhaps he felt an affinity with the aquatic creatures that thrived in its depths. Whatever the reason, once Ulutiu discovered the ocean, he never left it.

As for Ulutiu himself, he remains a mystery. From the writings he left behind, it's clear that he wasn't human, at least not in the accepted sense. He may have been an avatar of the gods, or an entity from another world seeking refuge in the Realms for reasons unknown. In any case, he wielded powerful magic—stronger perhaps, than any magic wielded by the most skilled wizards of the Realm before or since.

By all accounts, Ulutiu enjoyed a life of peaceful reflection, avoiding involvement in the affairs of men or gods. He spent his days in a magically-constructed barge of ice, endlessly drifting in the waters he adored.

When the end of his life approached, it was no surprise that Ulutiu chose the ocean as his final resting place. To prepare for his death, he fashioned a necklace of enchanted ice, a delicate chain of glistening blue crystals that would ensure a peaceful afterlife on the ocean floor.

On his last day, Ulutiu lay down on his barge, then donned the necklace, activating its magic. As life ebbed from his body, the necklace began to glow, covering Ulutiu in a frosty glaze that expanded and grew, encasing the entire barge in a tomb of magical ice. The barge sank under the weight of the ice, coming to rest on the ocean floor thousands of feet below.

Unfortunately, the magic of the necklace worked too well. The ice tomb continued to grow, chilling the waters around it, creating huge mountains of ice that towered above the hardening surface to pierce the clouds. Many years later, when the magic had reached its limit, the vast ocean was no more. In its place was a sprawling arctic wasteland. The Great Glacier was born.

Beneath it all, buried below tons of ice and snow, lay the corpse of Ulutiu, the glowing necklace still draped around his neck. He lies there today, undisturbed, forgotten. For the sake of the peoples of the Great Glacier, as well as those in the lands to the south, it is hoped that his rest continues. If the necklace of Ulutiu were removed, the enchantment would be broken, and the Great Glacier would surely begin to melt.

Timeline of The Great Glacier

The dates below are taken from the Ulutian calendar, which is measured from the year of Ulutiu's death. The current year, 3909, corresponds to the Year of the Serpent (1359 DR) in the dating system used elsewhere in the Realms.

0. Ulutiu dies, his ice barge sinks, and the necklace of Ulutiu begins to freeze the ocean, giving birth to the Great Glacier.

75. The Great Glacier continues to grow, expanding south to cover the lands that will eventually be known as Vaasa and Damara.

276. A clan of dwarves from the Tortured Land refuse to participate in a dwarven war party preparing to raid peaceful settlements in the Border Forest. Convicted as traitors, the clan is exiled to the Great Glacier. The clan begins a year-long trek to the Novularond; all but four die along the way. The survivors are the forebears of a new race of arctic dwarves called the Innu-gaalikurit (EE-nu-GA-ka-LEE-ku-rit).

902. Hunters skilled in winter survival migrate west from Sossal to search for new species of game in the Great Glacier. Shortly thereafter, a tirichik (see the “New Monsters” section at the end of this book for details) ambushes the party and kills the leader.

The survivors panic and become lost, inadvertently moving deeper into the Great Glacier. Eventually, they reach the shores of the Lugalpgotak Sea. They renounce their faith in the gods, whom they hold responsible for their misfortune. Permanent settlements are established, and the hunters become the precursors of the Ulutiuns.

1188. Descendents of the hunters expand north from Alpuk, discovering the Glacier of Ulutiu near the Uppuk River. Carved in the glacier are mysterious and extensive writings, some of which the hunters manage to translate. Ulutiu is revealed to be the author of the writings, and the being responsible for the creation of the Great Glacier.

Some of the hunters are so impressed with this discovery that they declare themselves disciples of Ulutiu, who they presume is a god. The group decides to migrate further north and establish their own settlements dedicated to the worship of Ulutiu; these become the forebears of the Nakulutiu tribes. The remaining hunters return to their homes in Alpuk, thereafter calling themselves Iulutiuuns (EE-oo-LOO-shee-uns).

1364. Lured by the abundance of caribou, an Iulutiuun faction moves to Angalpak. The faction are the first of the nomadic Angulutiuuns.

1587. In the wake of a particularly harsh winter, several Iulutiuun settlements unite to wage war on their Angulutiuun neighbors in Angalpak, coveting the sizeable Angulutiuun caribou herds. The raid triggers the fifty-year Keryjek Wars, named for the mountain range in which most of the fighting occurred.

1637. The Keryjek Wars end with a treaty between the Iulutiuun and Angulutiuun leaders. To encourage communication and promote good will, the leaders inaugurate the first koatulit, where guests are exchanged for a week-long festival of games and banquets. Koatulit have been held every year since; as a result, there have been few serious conflicts between the Iulutiuuns and the Angulutiuuns.

1649. Iulutiuun representatives from Gronne attempt to establish formal relations with the Innugaalikurit in Novularond by inviting them to participate in the koatulit. The Innugaalikurit decline, but the invitation marks the beginning of a long and cordial relationship between the Innugaalikurit and the Ulutiuns.

1790. The Year of the Great Flood. An unusually warm summer causes the waters of the Nakalpgotak and Lugalpgotak Seas to rise and engulf Ulutiuun villages near the shore line. Hundreds of Ulutiuns drown when their villages are washed away.

1952. A party of Innugaalikurit discovers a crude catapult on a high peak in Novularond. The Innugaalikurit disassemble the device and take the parts home with them. A day later, an enraged group of frost giants tracks down the Innugaalikurit and demands the return of the weapon. The Innugaalikurit refuse. The frost giants respond by attacking and destroying an Innugaalikurit village.

To avoid an all-out war, the elders of Gronne intervene, volunteering to negotiate a settlement. The Gronne elders ultimately find the Innugaalikurit guilty of theft; the frost giants are awarded custody of the dwarven thieves. The frost giants make slaves of the prisoners; descendents of the prisoners remain enslaved today.

2338. Rumbles from the depths of the Olyniak Crevasse attract the attention of curious Nakulutiuuns. The Nakulutiuuns inadvertently awaken a slumbering monster in the crevasse, described by a survivor as “a grotesque blend of a tirichik and a white dragon, as large a mountain, with fangs of gold and wings of ice.” The monster devours dozens of shrieking Nakulutiuuns before returning to the crevasse. The monster, named Ufloq by the Nakulutiuuns, has not been seen since.

3010. Treasure hunters from Sossal enter Angalpak, bringing with them a rare disease that doesn’t affect the hunters, but proves deadly to both Angulutiuuns and caribou. Hundreds of Angulutiuuns and caribou succumb to the sickness, before the carriers are isolated and exiled to the Ibelgrak Valley in the southeastern corner of Angalpuk. A few caribou and Angalpuk in the Ibelgrak Valley are believed to still carry the dormant disease.

3588. A rotational shift of Toril causes a slight but permanent change in the world's climatic patterns. Global temperatures rise, causing the Great Glacier to melt and recede; the lands of Vaasa, Damara, and Narfell become free of ice.

3691. A contingent of evil wizards from Vaasa employ their powerful magic to construct a castle of ice at the base of Mount Okk, one of the tallest peaks of the Lugsaa's Chain. The wizards use the castle as a base to develop a new type of cold-based magic with which they plan to conquer their homeland. They amass a sizeable cache of gems and precious metals for use in their magical research, stored in a labyrinth beneath the castle, guarded by a small army of magically-generated ice monsters.

3698. A massive earthquake rocks the Lugsaa's Chain. A fissure opens near the base of Mount Okk, swallowing the ice castle of the Vaasan wizards. An avalanche dumps tons of snow and ice on the fissure, burying the castle and its occupants. The wizards are presumed dead.

3777. Palus Frohm, one of Vaasa's greatest explorers, begins his twenty-year trek through the Great Glacier, culminating in the writing of Blood and Ice: Survival in the Great Glacier, the definitive arctic survival guide.

3889. Sharra Frohm, the great-great-great granddaughter of Palus Frohm, decides to continue her grandfather's work, planning to focus Volume Two of Blood and Ice on the treacherous Nakvaligach region, an area of the Great Glacier that Palus was unable to fully explore. Traveling alone, Sharra enters the Great Glacier about 100 miles northeast of the Frozen Forest. She is never heard from again.

3909. Current year.

Relationship with Other Lands

Because the Great Glacier is commonly perceived as an uninhabitable, useless ice field, there has been little contact between the Ulutiuns and their outlying neighbors. Most explorers entering the Great Glacier region never return, falling victim to the extreme weather, ravenous creatures, and other deadly hazards. The few that do come back spin tales of extreme hardship and suffering, describing a wasteland of nothing but ice, snow, and misery. The tales do little to inspire others to mount new expeditions.

Likewise, the few Ulutiuns who have made contact with outsiders haven't been particularly impressed. Outsiders destroy caribou and seals for trophies and furs, introduce debilitating diseases for which the Ulutiuns have no natural defenses, and have even attempted to recruit Ulutiuns as soldiers for their wars. As far as the Ulutiuns are concerned, outsiders mean trouble—the less contact, the better.

Still, a region as huge as the Great Glacier is hard for the rest of the world to ignore, and interaction is inevitable. Here's a rundown of the current state of affairs between the Great Glacier and some of her neighbors.

Vaasa

Following the defeat of the Witch-King (see FR 9 The Bloodstone Lands for details), Vaasa has returned to its original state as a loose collection of ragtag settlements. A group of barbarians called the White Worm Tribe lives on the edge of the Great Glacier, and has attracted the attention of many of Vaasa's would-be leaders. The White Worm warriors are as independent as they are fierce; persuading them to fight for any particular Vaasan faction is all but impossible.

Of late, it has occurred to a few Vaasan leaders that more warriors of the calibre of the White Worm Tribe may live deeper within the Great Glacier. These warriors, the leaders believe, may be easier to recruit than the White Worms. The leaders intend to hire mercenaries to scout the Great Glacier for such warriors and bring back a report—or more preferably, the warriors themselves.

Castle Perilous

Flights of red, blue, and black dragons have been seen heading toward the ruins of Castle Perilous, the stronghold of the fallen Witch-King. A large number of white dragons from the Great Glacier are rumored to be on their way to join them. Allegedly, the dragons are gathering to seek revenge on a band of Bloodstone warriors who destroyed Tiamat, the evil dragon queen (see FR 9 The Bloodstone Lands).

Galena Mountains

Gold, silver, and other precious metals fill these mountains, but mining is made difficult by the bitter winds blowing year-long from the Great Glacier. Entrepreneurs would pay a pretty penny to anyone able to figure out a way to shield the mountains from these winds, or better yet, devise a way to permanently increase the temperatures in the Great Glacier.

Galena Snake

Every spring, melting ice from the Great Glacier causes this winding river to overflow. Area farmers could make better use of the water if it weren't so icy cold; the farmers would gladly entertain ideas to warm up the Great Glacier.

Palischuk

Gold fever is sweeping this small community of half-orcs. An explorer recently claimed he discovered huge chunks of gold buried in the snow in the Great Glacier. Strangely, the chunks melted in his hands as soon as he returned to Vaasa. He's looking for recruits to make a return visit.

Part Two: Geography, Weather, and Hazards

"In the scheme of all things we are small, pitiful things. If mountains could walk, why should we presume they would even bother to step over us?"

—Inum

The Lay of The Land

When Ulutiu died, the powerful magic of the necklace wrought nearly a century of havoc. Mountains swelled from the shore lines of the frozen ocean, pushing their way to the sky, only to collapse under their own weight before rising again. The ocean floor, cracked and split, releasing salts and minerals from deep inside the earth to create new seas of icy waters that refused to freeze. Glaciers of staggering size ripped the landscape. Jagged rivers froze and melted, sculpting steep valleys through plains of frost.

Eventually, the turmoil came to an end. The result was a land mass that has remained unchanged for thousands of years, nearly all of it buried beneath thick layers of ice and snow.

Chains of towering mountains completely enclose the Great Glacier, isolating it from the rest of the Realms. The chains are many miles wide at their narrowest point, and rise thousands of feet high.

So effective are these mountains in discouraging contact with the outside world that the Ulutiuns refer to them as saas, meaning "shields." The Southern Shield (Lugsaa) is the longest and tallest of these protective chains, separating the Great Glacier from Vaasa and Damara over a length of 1,200 miles. The Lugsaa Chain merges with the sheer slopes of the Western Shield (Tuutsaa) about 100 miles northeast of the Tortured Land, while on the opposite border, the Eastern Shield (Angsaas) rises between the Great Glacier and the plains of Sossal.

There are a few passes through the shields, mainly in the lower elevations of the Lugsaa and Tuutsaas Chains, but because the passes are so narrow and treacherous, they are suitable for only the most determined—or foolhardy—explorers.

Natural boundaries within the Great Glacier divide it into three general regions, each with its own distinct terrain. The largest region, Alpuk (the Central Basin) stretches between the Keryjek River and the Tuutsaas Chain, with the Uppuk River to the north and the Lugsaa Chain to the south. The land is relatively low, and rough, distinguished by rolling hills and a cluster of high, snowless mountains (Novularond). Two sprawling seas, the Lugalpgotak and the Nakalpgotak, are also found here. They are bound by sheer glacial walls and filled with drifting icebergs that range in size from a few yards in diameter to island-like chunks large enough to hold an entire human community.

To the east is Angalpuk (the Eastern Basin), a broad plain filling an area resembling a shallow, inverted dome. Aside from a few clusters of tall mountains and the occasional lake, the terrain is flat. Vegetation is more prevalent here than anywhere else in the Great Glacier.

The smallest and most forbidding region lies to the north. Nakvaligach (the Northern Barrens), cleanly separated from the rest of the Great Glacier by the Uppuk River, is dense with rugged mountains and deep crevasses. Water is scarce, and temperatures are bitterly cold. No region of the Great Glacier is more hostile to life than Nakvaligach.

Climate

Temperatures in the Great Glacier have been known to drop as low as -150 degrees Fahrenheit in the northernmost mountains of Nakvaligach, and soar to a relatively warm 60 degrees during the sunniest weeks of the summer in central Alpuk. These readings, however, are rare extremes. For the most part, temperatures hover between zero and -30 degrees the year round.

Why so cold? Two reasons:

1. Though the sun shines brightly on the Great Glacier, most of the solar energy bounces back into the sky, reflected by the ice and snow.

2. Cold winds continually blow in from the icy Southern, Western, and Eastern Shields, creating a constant circulation of icy air. The mountains also prevent warm air originating outside the Great Glacier from reaching the interior.

The following table shows average seasonal temperatures for Alpuk. To determine averages for Angalpuk, subtract 10 degrees from the listed temperatures; for Nakvaligach, subtract 20 degrees. Winds tend to be calmer in the center of the region, accounting for the relatively lower temperatures in Alpuk; likewise, the Nakalpgotak and Lugalpgotak Seas retain a certain amount of heat, which also boosts the temperatures a bit. In contrast, frigid northern winds high altitudes, and distance from the seas drive Nakvaligach temperatures to nearly unendurable depths. (Temperatures are given in degrees Fahrenheit.)

Alpuk Average Temperatures

Season	High	Low	Daytime Nighttime
			Avg.	Avg.
Winter	-10	-75	-35	-55
Spring	35	-30	15	-15
Summer	50	0	30	10
Fall	20	-35	10	-20

Strong winds make life even more miserable for the arctic traveler driving the effective temperature down dramatically. The following table lists the effective temperatures when wind chill factors are considered; to find the effective temperature, cross-index the actual temperature with the prevailing wind velocity.

For actual temperatures lower than those listed, lower the effective temperature by 10 degrees for each 10 degree drop in the actual temperature (for instance, at a wind velocity of 30 and an actual temperature of -50 the effective temperature becomes -120.) Wind velocities exceeding 40 miles per hour don't cause significantly lower wind chills past this point

Effective Temperatures Resulting from Wind Chill

Actual Temp	Wind Velocity (mph)
	10	20	30	40
30	15	5	0	- 5
20	0	-10	-20	-25
10	- 10	- 25	-35	-40
0	- 20	-40	-50	-55
- 10	- 30	- 50	-60	- 70
-20	- 45	-70	-80	-90

Changes in season are marked by dramatic shifts in weather patterns.

Winter is the longest and most brutal season, beginning in Nightal (December) and continuing through Tarsakh (April), with temperatures dipping to their lowest levels in Hammer (January). High winds, clear skies, and sporadic bursts of heavy precipitation mark this season.

Spring arrives in Mirul (May) and continues through Kythorn (June). Some melting and thawing occurs during the later weeks of spring. Skies are generally bright, precipitation is light but frequent.

Summer consists of only the month of Flamerule (July). Winds remain calm, but the air is often humid and dense with fog. Ice thaws, snow melts, and the moist ground allows for a brief growing season.

Fall comprises Eleasis (August) through uktar (November). It's a season of turbulence, with wide temperature swings and violent weather shifts. Usually, the ground re-freezes by Eleint (September). Frigid, blistering winds begin in Marpenoth (October) and increase in intensity through Uktar (November).

In strict terms, the Great Glacier is a desert, as it receives very little precipitation over the course of a year. A total of about 5-8 inches of snow and rain fall in Alpuk, slightly more in Angalpuk, a little less in Nakvaligach. Whatever falls, however, tends to stick, replacing whatever ice and snow melted off in the summer. The total amount of ice and snow throughout the Great Glacier remains fairly constant because: (1) the solid ground inhibits drainage; and (2), not much evaporation occurs, since most sunlight is reflected back into atmosphere.

Physical Features

There are no forests or jungles in the Great Glacier. Its dismal plains are flat and vacant. Mountains and hills are blanketed in white, providing no landmarks for lost travellers. Nevertheless, the Great Glacier boasts an abundance of extraordinary physical features unlike those found anywhere else in the world. Some of these features are described here.

Ice

A permanent layer of ice covers more than 95 percent of the land surface of the Great Glacier. The ice layer, called permafrost, averages 200-500 feet thick, thinning to as little as 5-10 feet in parts of Alpuk and central Nakvaligach. It is believed to reach a depth of 5,000 feet and more in the northernmost mountains of Nakvaligach. Permafrost covers the Western, Southern, and Eastern Shields to a depth of at least 2,000 feet. For all practical purposes, most mountains of the Great Glacier can be considered to be solid ice.

Vast walls of sheer ice border much of the coast lines, particularly along the northern shores of the Nakalpgotal Sea. These walls—called barrier ice—tower 500 feet in places. Occasionally, huge chunks break or “calve” from the barrier ice, toppling into the water to become icebergs. Drifting icebergs, ranging in size from modest-sized cakes to mile-wide ice mountains, cover as much as 75% of the seas.

A special type of ice, called platform ice, covers the surfaces of a few smaller lakes, and can also be found along the edges of the larger seas. Platform ice, ranging in thickness from 5-20 feet, is particularly rich with salts that inhibit thorough freezing. Depending on the season, platform ice can be quite fragile; it doesn't take much pressure to crack the surface, as careless travelers have discovered the hard way. “Young” platform ice, formed relatively recently, is thinner and more delicate than “old” platform ice. The following table shows the densities-and dangers-of platform ice throughout the year.

Platform Ice Densities

Season	Young Ice	Old Ice
Winter	Solid	Solid
Spring	Semi-Solid	Solid
Summer	Melted	Semi-Solid
Fall	Solid	Solid

Solid = Frozen all the way through.

Semi-Solid = Partially frozen, may break under pressure. For every 100 pounds of weight, there is a 10% cumulative chance that the ice will break (for instance, there is a 40% chance that the ice breaks under the weight of 400 pounds). Make a check for breakage for every 10 yards.

Melted = Completely liquid; no solid surface.

Glossary of Ice Terms

The terms below are commonly used to describe ice formations in the Great Glacier.

Stationary Ice

Shore Ice. A jagged wall of ice along the edge of a sea or other body of water, consisting of cakes, slush, and other other pack ice fragments that have been washed ashore. Shore ice is usually about 50-100 feet high.

Pressure Ice. An ice wall formed by subsurface pressures, or by strong winds blowing together piles of ice fragments. Pressure ice resembles shore ice, except that it may be found anywhere in the Great Glacier. Pressure ice walls can be a few yards or hundreds of feet in height.

Hummock. A wall of pressure ice up to several hundred yards long.

Pressure Ridge. An unbroken wall of pressure ice many miles long.

Needle Ice. A plain of crystalline icicles, rising from the ground like daggers. Needle ice ranges in length from a few inches to several yards. The needles are often sharp enough to pierce boots or thick layers of clothing.

Candled Ice. Small ridges of crystals, seldom more than 5 feet high, but winding for hundreds of yards, sometimes miles. The ridges look like stacks of 10-foot-long candles lying on their sides.

Barrier Ice. High, sheer walls of solid ice hugging the shore lines of seas.

Platform Ice. Ice layers of varying thickness covering bodies of water. Platform ice is susceptible to cracking under pressure.

Permafrost. Permanent ice layers covering almost all ground surfaces of the Great Glacier.

Floating Ice

Pack Ice. A general term describing masses of floating ice.

Field. A large area of pack ice, upwards of several square miles.

Floe. An area of pack ice smaller than a field, usually at least a few hundred square yards.

Iceberg. An immense chunk of floating ice, which can be several hundred feet thick and 1-2 miles (or more) wide.

Cake. A general term describing a small block of floating ice, anywhere from a few square feet to several hundred square yards in area.

Slush. A collection of small ice chunks. Also called mush or brash.

Flaw. The area between the pack ice and the shore.

Breakages

Crack. A narrow break, from a few inches to a few feet wide, easily traversed.

Lane. A break in the ice wider than a crack, anywhere from 5-100 feet across.

Lead. A term describing all breaks wider than lanes, from 100 feet to several miles across (pronounced "lead").

Bodies of Water

For most of the year, the seas, lakes, and streams of the Great Glacier are either completely frozen over, or—in the case of the Nakalopgotak and Lugalpgotak—choked with pack ice. Only the hardiest marine life survives in the Great Glacier waters. Not only is the water very cold, but surface ice impedes the penetration of sunlight, limiting the amount of algae and plankton necessary for a flourishing food chain.

The great seas are combinations of salt water, and fresh water, from rain and melted snow. The churning seas continually expel salt in the form of brine, keeping the salinity of the waters relatively low; ice that's a year or so old is pure enough to drink. Water temperatures average about 25-32 degrees F. Considering their size, the seas are unusually shallow; depths of the smaller seas—the Igotak, Ahtahqugotak, and the Lugotak—range between 100-200 feet, while the Nakalpgotak and Lugalpgotak average 500-800 feet deep.

There are hundreds of lakes and ponds throughout the Great Glacier, most of them no more than a few acres in area. Lakes and ponds are shallow, rarely exceeding 50 feet in depth. Many of them are only a couple of yards deep; it's possible, for instance, to wade across the sprawling Umaylu Lake. Knee-deep, slush-clogged streams link most of the Great Glacier's lakes and seas. The Uppuk River, about a mile wide and 100 feet deep, is the area's only truly deep river.

Pingos

Pingos form when trapped pockets of water freeze beneath the ground, then burst through the surface like giant bubbles. Pingos are solid ice and resemble smooth glass domes, from 100 yards to a mile or more in diameter. Pingo clusters are common near the eastern border of the Tuutsaas Chain.

Crevasse

These permanent ground openings are typically found near the feet of mountains. They range in width from 10-60 feet and are sometimes concealed by drifting or blowing snow. Depths range from a few yards to hundreds of feet. Solid ice—some of it needle ice—lines almost all crevasse floors.

Stone Rings

On plains of thin permafrost—such as sections of southern Angalpuk—temperature fluctuations force layers of rocks through the surface to form rings of stone. The walls of a ring typically slope upward at a 45 degree angle, about 50-60 feet high. Diameters average 100 feet, though some are 10 feet or less across. Though the interior of stone rings are usually hollow, some are filled with frozen lakes or fairy snow (see below). Fields of 100-200 stone rings are not uncommon.

Sled Trails

Aside from an occasional abandoned campsite or fishing hole, sled trails are the only man-made terrain features that visitors to the Great Glacier are likely to encounter. Created by the sleds of dog and kupuk (see the “New Monsters” section at the end of this book for details), these trails appear as shallow indentations in the snow, seldom more than a few feet wide. Their surfaces of rough ice provide better than average traction. Following a trail usually leads the traveler to an Ulutiun village.

Hazards

Nature is cruel in the Great Glacier. Below are some of the most common—and most hazardous—environmental threats, along with DM tips for adjudicating their effects.

Freezing

Not surprisingly, the frigid temperatures of the Great Glacier present the most insidious threat to travelers. Thanks to their unique physiology and survival techniques, Ulutiuns rarely suffer from exposure. But visitors to the region may freeze to death any time and anywhere; the bitter winds of upper Nakvaligach can freeze a man solid in mid-step. A character's Constitution helps some, common sense measures such as wearing the right clothing help a lot, but ultimately, travelers are at the mercy of the thermometer's whims.

One way to adjudicate the effects of freezing is the use of Arctic Endurance Ratings (AER). A character's base AER is 100%, modified as follows:

Prevailing temperature, including effects of wind chill (apply one of the following):

Very cold (30 to 0 degrees) No modifier

Bitterly cold (- 1 to - 30 degrees) - 20
 Intensely cold (- 31 degrees and below) - 50

Character's protection (apply one of the following):

Well-protected (wearing thick furs or bulky woolen clothes, insulated boots and gloves sheltered in a warm cave or insulated building) +25

Moderately protected (wearing typical winter clothes but taking no exceptional precautions; sheltered in a drafty cave or poorly constructed building) - 20

Poorly protected (thick garments, but no special precautions for frigid weather; no protective shelter) - 40

Character's Constitution (apply one of the following):

Each point of Constitution above 14 +5
 Each point of Constitution below 11 - 5

Character's activity level (apply one of the following):

Stationary or inactive (sleeping) +10
 Normal activity (hiking with regular rest periods) No modifier
 Strenuous activity (brisk hiking, no rest) - 10
 Fatigued, but not at rest - 20

Character is wet -20

(Example: A character with a Constitution of 10 who's well-protected, and is undergoing strenuous activity in bitterly cold weather has an AER of 90.)

No AER can be less than 5. An AER above 100 is treated as 100.

For every two hours that a character is exposed to temperatures of 30 degrees or less, an AER check should be made by rolling percentile dice. If the roll is less than or equal to the AER, the character suffers no damage. If the roll is greater than the AER, the character suffers 1-4 points of damage from exposure. Characters with AERs of 100 or more aren't required to make checks.

Note that these aren't rigid rules but general suggestions, and the DM is encouraged to modify them as she wishes. For instance, she may require AER rolls only a couple of times per day, and may double or triple the amount of damage to account for the fewer number of checks. She may increase the amount of damage or the frequency of checks in especially harsh weather, or do away with them temporarily if the weather is nice and the characters are prudent.

Characters recover from exposure damage a bit differently from normal damage (presuming, of course, that the character hasn't yet died from exposure). If such a character rests in an area where the temperature is above 30 degrees (such as beside a fire inside an insulated building, or in a land south of the Great Glacier with a warmer climate), he recovers hit points lost to exposure at a rate of one point per hour. Otherwise, he recovers damage normally.

Frostbite

If a character suffers at least 6 points of damage from exposure to the cold, he also risks frostbite, a condition where the flesh actually freezes. Ordinarily, only areas of exposed flesh are susceptible to frostbite, such as the face or wrists (when there's a gap between gloves and coat), though feet and hands can become frostbitten if snow gets inside and melts.

After suffering 6 points or more of exposure damage, the affected character must make a normal Constitution check whenever he's required to make an AES check. Regardless of whether his AES check is successful, a failed Constitution check means he's frostbitten, and suffers an additional 1-2 points of damage. This damage should be counted as additional exposure damage. When the character's exposure damage total falls below 6 points, he no longer has to check for frostbite.

Frostbite damage heals like exposure damage. Contrary to popular belief, rubbing snow on a frostbitten area doesn't help in the least; in fact, friction may actually worsen the damage (at the discretion of the DM, a character rubbing snow on a frostbitten area or applying any other type of friction increases the amount of damage by 1 point).

Snowstorms

Though snowstorms sound dangerous, they only threaten travelers who insist on forging ahead when they can't see where they are going. Heavy snowstorms restrict normal vision to 25 feet during the day and 10 feet at night.

Strong winds, blowing up to 40 miles per hour, sometimes accompany a heavy snowstorm, increasing the dangers from wind chill. However, such winds seldom last for more than an hour, subsequently dropping to 10 miles per hour or less. Snowstorms in the Great Glacier tend to be brief (rarely more than 5 hours) and light (a maximum of about 1 inch of snow per hour). In exceptionally heavy snowstorms, travelers have a chance of becoming lost (as described in the "Whiteout" section below).

Fog

Moisture clouds form when there's a great temperature differential between water and air, much as steam rises from boiling water. At temperatures below -30, fog banks are almost inevitable, especially near bodies of water. Fog banks can persist for days and may extend over dozens of square miles. Such fogs typically reduce normal vision to 50 feet during the day and 10 feet at night. Travelers have a chance of becoming lost in dense fog (as described in the "Whiteout" section).

Avalanches

Any mountain in the Great Glacier has the potential for avalanches at any time, but they usually occur in the spring and summer when the sun softens the snow. A round or two of rumbling often precedes an avalanche, which may alert attentive characters. Even so, large avalanches—which may comprise hundreds of tons of snow—are hard to avoid. A character in the path of an avalanche typically suffers 6-60 (6d10) points of damage (more in an exceptionally large avalanche). Additionally, characters have a 70% chance of being buried beneath 1-20 feet of snow. A buried character can dig himself free at the rate of 1-2 feet per round, but this isn't much help unless he knows which way is up (a successful Intelligence check means he's digging in the right direction). Otherwise, a companion can dig out a buried character at the rate of 1-2 feet per round. Again, this presumes that the companion is able to locate his buried friend (a successful Intelligence check locates the right spot, but the DM should only allow a check if the companion already has a general idea of where to look).

A buried character risks suffocation much as a drowning victim (see the swimming rules in Chapter Fourteen of the Player's Handbook for details).

Fairy Ice

A phenomenon unique to the Great Glacier, fairy ice is a form of precipitation consisting of tiny, slushy ice spheres. Fairy ice resembles ordinary snow, except that it sparkles like a rainbow in bright sunlight.

Because of its granular density, fairy ice accumulating in stone rings, crevasses, and valleys may pose a risk to unwary travelers. Stepping in fairy ice is like stepping in quicksand; characters sink in fairy ice at the rate of 2 feet per round. A sinking character making a successful Dexterity check grabs a solid surface and can pull himself free with a successful Strength check. A companion can pull a sinking character free if she rolls a successful Strength check. Any two characters working together can automatically pull a sinking companion free.

If a character sinks below the surface, she can still be rescued if a companion feels around and finds her. Otherwise, she continues to sink, risking suffocation (see the swimming rules in Chapter Fourteen of the Player's Handbook).

Sunburn

Powerful sun rays reflecting off the white surfaces of ice and snow may subject travelers to painful sunburns. On sunny days, particularly in the spring and summer, characters automatically suffer 1 point of sunburn damage per day unless they take precautions such as covering areas of exposed flesh with masks, scarves, or salves. Facial hair is not a good way to ward off sunburn. In fact, it is a tremendous liability, as is stated in Blood and Ice:

"In the Great Glacier beards and moustaches pose a significant risk to one's well-being. Exhaled breath freezes in facial hair, gradually turning the hair into solid ice. Should the skin beneath the hair freeze—an inevitability if the hair remains caked with ice—prudent treatment of the affected skin is difficult, as breaking away the ice also tears out chunks of flesh. Meanwhile, as more breath is exhaled, the ice encasing the facial hair grows larger and bulkier. It is possible in such cases for the victim's mouth and nose to seal shut, causing suffocation. For these reasons, shaving razors are as vital to arctic survival as warm clothes."

—Palus Frohm

Snowblindness

In addition to sunburn, travelers also risk snowblindness on bright days. Characters exposed to particularly bright sunlight must check once per day for snowblindness (the DM decides when). Roll 1d10. On a roll of 1, the character's eyes become swollen and irritated for the next 4-24 (4d6) hours, reducing her vision to half its normal range, and causing her to make all attack rolls at a -1 penalty. On a roll of 2, the character becomes blind for 2-8 (2d4) hours, suffering a -

4 penalty to her attack rolls (opponents gain a +4 bonus to their attack rolls.)

There are three ways a traveler can prevent snowblindness:

- Rest the eyes by keeping them closed for 10-15 minutes every two hours or so.
- Wear goggles with colored lenses; amber or green are a good colors. Disadvantage: such goggles tend to frost over, requiring frequent cleanings.
- Wear wooden or bone goggles, as do some Ulutiun tribes. These goggles are solid wood (or bone from caribou antlers) with narrow slits to see through. Disadvantage: such goggles reduce the field of vision; the wearer can't see above or below herself without shifting her head.

Food and Water

It takes a lot of energy to stay warm in the Great Glacier. This means that travelers must eat more than normal, preferably a diet high in fat (which is why Ulutiun diets consist almost exclusively of animal products). As a rule of thumb, travelers who normally eat two meals a day should eat three times a day in the Great Glacier to fulfill their nutritional requirements. The amount of food may be lessened if at least one of the meals includes sizeable portions of animal muscle, organs, or fat.

Because individuals vary greatly in body fat, endurance levels, and metabolism, it's hard to say at what point the effects of starvation would be felt. In general, however, it's safe to assume that characters who regularly miss meals or consistently eat low-fat diets begins to suffer within a few days, requiring a -1 penalty on their attack rolls and ability checks. If a substandard diet continues, regular Constitution checks (perhaps twice per day) are necessary to determine if the character is losing hit points (1-2 points lost per failed check). A typical character in the Great Glacier begins to starve if she goes without food for two or three days; make Constitution checks with substantial penalties (a -4 penalty is about right) at least twice a day, with a loss of 1-4 points of damage per failed check.

It's next to impossible to die of thirst in the Great Glacier, because fresh water is everywhere—that is, if you know where to look.

- In summer and spring, young platform ice melts to form pools of fresh water. Fresh water can also be found in cavities in old platform ice.
- In fall, fresh water collects in shallow pools beneath deep snowdrifts. The drifts act as insulation to prevent evaporation and freezing.
- In winter, a hole can be cut in the surface of a lake or stream; the water below the frozen surface is almost always fresh. However, it takes a while to get to the water, as the frozen surface may be several feet thick.
- Usually, the top 5-10 feet of water in leads is fresh.
- If all else fails, snow can be eaten; the more granular the snow, the fresher it is.

Natural Illusions

Extreme temperatures combined with the reflection of sunlight between the sky and ice can create illusions of startling clarity and variety. In general, these natural illusions don't pose a threat to travelers, although looming or whiteouts may cause a party to become lost, and the inexperienced may perceive particularly vivid light wheels or sundogs to be dangerous supernatural phenomena.

As with magically-generated illusions, viewers tend to accept natural illusions as reality unless they have reason to believe otherwise. The guidelines in Chapter Seven of the Player's Handbook apply to the believability of natural as well as magical illusions. Identifying a natural illusion requires a successful Wisdom check, with penalties or bonuses to the check as determined by the DM (for instance, an especially vivid mirage might be identified at a penalty of -4). Note that identifying a natural illusion doesn't make the illusion "disappear;" instead, the viewer simply recognizes the illusion for what it is (which isn't always helpful; a character who identifies a whiteout still suffers its effects).

Here's a rundown of the Great Glacier's most common natural illusions. They are most likely to appear on days of dry air and extremely low temperatures. Natural illusions usually persist for the entire day, or until the weather changes (overcast skies or precipitation usually obliterate them).

Whiteout. This is potentially the most dangerous illusion, where the horizon vanishes and all landmarks blur together in a field of solid white. Travelers have little or no depth perception; all missile weapon attacks are made at a -4 penalty. Unless the party has access to find the path, the Direction Sense proficiency, or similar spells or skills, there is a 50% chance that they become lost, heading in a random direction for the rest of the day (to determine the direction, roll 1d8, where 1 = N, 2 = NE, 3 = E, and so on).

Looming. This effect causes a physical landmark—such as a mountain range—to appear closer than it actually is; a peak that’s really 100 miles distant may appear to be as close as a few hundred yards away. In some instances of looming, light rays are bent to make the object appear upside down; a mountain might look like it’s standing on its peak.

Mirage. This is an image of an object that isn’t really there, such as a mountain range or a lake. Unlike mirages that appear in the desert, Great Glacier mirages rarely shimmer; they look real.

Halo. A ring of brilliant light surrounding the sun, caused by high altitude ice crystals. Halos may be red, orange, yellow, or white; they may also appear as a series of concentric rings, each a different color.

Sundog. Sundogs are spots of light also caused by high altitude ice crystals. They are sometimes seen in close proximity to the sun, occasionally in conjunction with halos.

Light Wheel. A light wheel is similar to a halo, except the halo is spoked and may appear to spin and dance through the sky.

Sound

Under certain conditions, sound travels farther in the Great Glacier, which is one of the few benefits of frigid temperatures. When temperatures drop to -50 or lower, and the air is still and clear, ordinary speech can be heard up to a half-mile away. A shout travels a mile or more, and a howling wolf can be heard up to 10 miles distant.

“On overcast days when the air is dry and no precipitation is falling, the terrain may reflect upward onto the clouds to create a sky map. Lakes and ponds appear as black splotches, areas of heavy snow appear white, and areas of light snow appear pink or beige. Vegetation appears yellow or brown. If you use a mirror to draw what you see, and a lodestone to find north, a fairly accurate map can be made.”

The Ulutiuns

To outsiders, no place in the world seems less hospitable to human habitation than the Great Glacier. Yet, the Ulutiuns (the collective name referring to the Iulutiuns, the Angulutiuns, and the Nakulutiuns, the three major tribes of the Great Glacier) have thrived here for thousands of years, a testament not only to their adaptability, but their perseverance in the face of extreme adversity. They are a robust, virtuous people, keenly in tune with nature. Their lives are simple but rich. Few other races of the Realms are as satisfied with their lot in life.

The total number of Ulutiuns is uncertain; the Ulutiuns don't keep count, and no outsider has ever attempted a census. Compounding the difficulty are the many small, unnamed settlements in inaccessible pockets of the Great Glacier, each containing an indeterminate number of Ulutiuns. Still, the best estimates place the total population between 50,000-75,000. About 85% live in central Alpuk; these are known as Iulutiuns. Another 10% comprise the nomadic Angulutiuns of the Angulpuk plains, while the remaining 5% comprise the mysterious and reclusive Nakulutiun tribes of Nakvaligach.

Despite their differences in philosophy and lifestyle, the Iulutiuns, Angulutiuns, and Nakulutiuns are remarkably similar in appearances, personality, and culture. Stand an Iulutiun next to an Angulutiun, and an outsider would have difficulty telling them apart. An Iulutiun's fishing techniques aren't radically different from those of his Angulutiun neighbor. A Nakulutiun would feel right at home in an Iulutiu snowhouse.

Ulutians are stockier and shorter than most humans, seldom more than 5 feet tall. Their arms and legs are short and thick, their fingers and toes look like plump sausages. They have light yellow skin, and black hair. Ulutiu faces are round with dark brown eyes, flat noses, and tiny ears pressed flat against their heads. Their teeth are blunt and wide, about twice as large as a typical human's.

Ulutiu physiology includes a number of adaptations that make them resistant to the effects of cold:

- An inch-thick layer of fat beneath the skin provides natural insulation.
- Extra blood vessels in the hands and feet increase circulation, making their extremities less likely to freeze.
- Ulutiu males don't grow facial hair. Unlike male visitors from other lands, Ulutians suffer no risk of ice collecting in beards or moustaches.

Though tribal dialects vary, all Ulutians speak essentially the same language; Iulutians, Angulutians, and Nakulutians have minimal trouble understanding each other. Because Ulutians trace their ancestry to human communities outside of the Great Glacier, most visitors to the region are able to communicate with the natives.

Ulutiu Class and Ability Restrictions

There are no formal class restrictions for Ulutiu characters, but because of the necessity for strong survival skills, the vast majority of Ulutians are warriors, comprising at least 90% of any given tribe. The lack of good teachers and the scarcity of time necessary for study limits the number of wizards to a scant few; no more than 2 or 3% of a village of 200 or more residents are wizards, and fewer than 1% are higher than 2nd level. Likewise, no more than 1% of a tribe qualify as priests of any level, as Ulutians devote little time to religious pursuits; Ulutiu priests higher than 1st level are hard to find (the Nakvaligach are the exception; as many as 5% of a Nakvaligach tribe are priests, of which 1% are 4th level or higher). Thieves aren't tolerated in Ulutiu society.

Ulutians share all of the general characteristics of humans as described in the Player's Handbook. However, because of their thick bodies and short legs, their base movement is 9. Additionally, their initial ability scores are modified by a -1 penalty to Charisma and Dexterity, and a +1 bonus to Strength and Constitution. The minimum and maximum ability scores for Ulutians are as follows:

Ability	Minimum	Maximum
Strength	6	18
Dexterity	3	16
Constitution	9	18
Intelligence	3	18
Wisdom	3	18
Charisma	3	15

The Iulutians

Peace-loving, cheerful, and gentle, the Iulutians are the friendliest of the Great Glacier races, and also boast the richest culture and most sophisticated society. By far the most numerous of the Ulutiu tribes, the Iulutians occupy all corners of Alpuk, concentrating mainly on the areas in and around the Nakalpgotak and Lugalpgotak Seas where hunting and fishing are especially good. There are hundreds of Iulutiu communities, most of which are unnamed. These settlements resemble camps more than formal villages. Populations of these unnamed communities usually number fewer than 100, with residents drifting freely from one community to the next. These groupings continually break apart, usually as a result of depleted game, only to reform a few miles away, often in combination with residents from another community.

Most Iulutians, however, live in permanent settlements, usually consisting of a few hundred residents. Jukum, just south of the Lugalpgotak, and Lililnuk, on the western shore of the Nakalpgotak, are the largest Iulutiu settlements, consisting of about 1,200 and 1,500 residents respectively.

Social Order

Iulutians have no formal governments, neither in individual settlements nor for the nation as a whole. Each settlement is a self-contained unit, consisting of a variable number of families, who are responsible for maintaining discipline and order among themselves.

Larger settlements—those consisting of at least 200 members—maintain loosely organized governing groups called iquemelum. The iquemelum function as advisors rather than rulers, though residents usually follow their recommendations. An iquemelum consists of five or six members called kiam, chosen by consensus of all adult members of the settlement. As a symbol of their status, kiam wear tiny earrings made of the skulls of immature fish: these earrings are called uwa.

A kiam must meet four qualifications: 1. The proposed kiam must be an adult. Preference is given to women whose child-bearing years are behind them (women are generally believed to have more common sense than men), though males may also be kiam.

2. The candidate must demonstrate exceptional hunting skills, speaking skills, healing skills, intuition, physical strength, cleverness, and/or humor; at least two of these traits are preferred.

3. The proposed kiam must already have some type of strong relationship with the other members of the iquemelum. For instance, the proposed kiam could be a relative of the other kiam, a close friend, a student, or a hunting partner.

4. He or she must want the job.

Since the kiam have no real power, there's no need to establish a formal method for stripping them of authority. When a kiam no longer functions up to par, the other kiam and the rest of the settlement simply ignore her. After a month or so of inattention, the kiam gets the message and quietly "resigns" by tossing her uwa into the sea.

The main function of the iquemelum is to keep peace among all Iulutian settlements. To this end, the Iulutians have established a set of ceremonies designed to encourage communication and promote tribal harmony. The Iulutians take these ceremonies quite seriously—and with good reason. Thanks to these practices, the Iulutians have avoided war for centuries.

Koatulit. The koatulit is the oldest and most significant Iulutian social tradition. It was established in 1637 to bring an end to the Keryjek Wars and has been held annually in every Iulutian settlement ever since. At the beginning of spring, the iquemelum select a young man or woman of character and strength to be their ahtkoat (courier). The ahtkoat travels to a designated village (chosen at the end of the previous year's koatulit) and extends a formal invitation to the designated village's iquemelum. From 6-12 residents of the designated village accompany the ahtkoat back to that worthy's village, where they live as honored guests for a week. The host village holds a nightly feast in honor of the guests, featuring games, dancing, story-telling, and plenty of gossip. At the end of the week, the guests return to their own homes, with good will between the villages affirmed and renewed.

Sukkiruchit. The sukkiruchit is an annual trade fair, emphasizing shop talk more than recreation. The sukkiruchit is open to all who wish to attend, and usually attracts upwards of a thousand or more hunters, artisans, and kiam from all over Alpuk. Participants exchange hunting techniques, barter for goods, and—a key element of any Iulutian get-together—swap gossip. A trade board (called the ahtsukk) comprised of kiam from several of the participating villages is available to arbitrate disputes, which occasionally arise over prices or quality of merchandise. Because of the number of attendees, the sukkiruchit is always held in either Jukum or Lulinuk, where easy access to the seas provides plenty of fish and game.

Tupa. This term refers to marriages between partners from different villages, a practice actively encouraged by all Iulutians in the belief that family bonds are the strongest social controls. It's a rare Iulutian who doesn't have a sibling, cousin, or grandparent in every neighboring village, thanks to the prevalence of tupa.

There are two categories of tupa. The most common is kotupa, which refers to the voluntary union of a man and woman from two different villages. Koatulit and sukkiruchit help encourage kotupa by bringing together young people who wouldn't otherwise have a chance to meet. Though marriages between members of the same village do occur, meddling grandparents do what they can to discourage such unions, usually by speaking disparagingly of their grandchild's hometown sweetheart. Kotupa is always preferred.

Occasionally, parents from neighboring villages arrange marriages between their offspring without the children's knowledge or permission. These marriages are called ekotupa. They are unions of last resort, usually between unattractive or otherwise unappealing young adults. Though the children aren't required to go through with an arranged marriage, they almost always do; an unmarried middle-aged adult tends to embarrass the entire village.

Laws

Though the Iulutians have no written laws, they observe a strict set of social customs, regulations, and taboos to maintain order. Enforcement of these taboos is the family's responsibility. The rest of the village rarely gets involved in a family's problems unless the opinion of the iquemelum is required, which rarely occurs.

Since Iulutian society centers on the family, the most rigidly enforced regulations pertain to the preservation and continuity of the family unit. Married partners are obliged to provide food for their families, maintain their homes, and care for their children. Though husbands tend to do most of the hunting and wives most of the child rearing, gender roles aren't fixed; families are encouraged to assign jobs as they see fit. Should either partner fail to perform his or her familial duties, a friend or relative takes custody of their children. From that day onward, the children belong to the friend or relative—the biological parents don't get a second chance.

Iulutians firmly believe that it takes two parents to raise children. If the mother dies, her parents (the children's grandparents) assume custody of her children, and the father returns to live with his own parents. If the father dies, his parents assume custody, and the mother goes home to her family. Aging parents become the responsibility of their adult married children. The first choice is usually their first-born son, but parents are allowed to choose which child they want to live with.

Iulutians don't recognize land ownership—land belongs to everybody. More specifically, whoever builds a home on a particular piece of land assumes custody of the land until she dies or moves away. Should someone else covet the land—which might happen if it's near a fresh water supply or good fishing hole—they are free to offer the custodian food or other goods to move out. They can also challenge the custodian to a duel; the survivor takes possession of the land.

When an Iulutian dies, any valuables become the property of the village, distributed according to need or by the decision of the iquemelum. Clothes and other personal items are either destroyed or placed in the grave. Only the following items are included in the estate of the deceased:

- Harpoon (or other personal weapons)
- Sled
- Dogs (or kupuk—see "New Monsters")
- Kayak (or other boat)
- Cooking pots and other utensils.

The oldest child still living with the parent at the time of death inherits the estate. Grown children with families of their own aren't considered suitable heirs, nor is the surviving spouse. If there isn't a qualified heir, the village claims the estate.

A form of voluntary slavery exists in some villages. These slaves are called ukeu, and consist of the elderly, the infirm, the abandoned, and others without family who are incapable of caring for themselves. Such people offer themselves as ukeu to any family who agrees to take them in. Ukeu must care for children, assist with household or hunting, and perform other menial chores for their adopted families in return for food, shelter, and companionship. Though ukeu are treated with dignity and respect, they are by no means accepted as equals. Still, considering the alternatives, most Iuklu are quite content with this arrangement.

Hunters have specific rights and obligations, which are rigorously observed:

- A fish or a bird belongs to whoever catches it.
- A seal belongs to all who participate in the hunt. The carcass is cut up and divided equally among the participants. Whoever struck the first blow earns the skin.
- A bear or caribou belongs to whoever first sees it, regardless of who actually kills it. Although each participant in the hunt is entitled to a share of the meat, the spotter decides how to divide the carcass. The skin and fur belong to the spotter.
- In times of scarce food, game must be shared with the entire village. Those participating in a hunt handle the distribution. When food is plentiful, game belongs to the hunters (within the above guidelines), but they are obligated to make sure that all members of their immediate families get a share.
- If a lost weapon is found, it must be returned to its owner. However, if a weapon is lost with an animal (for instance, if a spear is imbedded in a seal, and the seal escapes; or if a fish swims away with a net) both the weapon and the animal belong to whoever recover them.

So how are violations punished? Simple—the violators are put to death. The punishment is the same regardless of the crime; thieves are executed along with frauds and murderers. Executions generally take the form of drownings, stonings, or beheadings. Occasionally, criminals are buried alive, or stripped of all protective clothing and left to die of exposure. There are no trials or appeals, no second chances.

The system sounds brutal, but it's effective. Crime is rare in Iuklu society, and executions occur so seldom that most Iukluts can't remember one ever occurring. Why? Two reasons:

First, unlike elsewhere in the Realms, the threat of execution serves as an excellent deterrent to crime. Punishment is so swift and certain that most Iukluts are afraid to even contemplate a serious offense.

Second—and more importantly—there is a fear that an execution may set off a chain of retaliation; the criminal's family may feel compelled to even the score by murdering one of the executioners, which may compel the executioner's family to retaliate against the criminal's family, and on and on in an ever-expanding circle. Murder begets murder; Iukluts realize that it's a lot easier to start a blood war than stop one, so they think twice before committing crimes.

Two forms of murder are culturally acceptable:

Wijikak. This "honor murder" occurs when one Iuklut offends the dignity of another, typically by insulting his children or spouse, or spreading lies about him. The dishonored person is fully within his rights to murder the offender. However, the offender's family may then feel obligated to murder the dishonored person, whose family in turn may retaliate against the offender's family, thus beginning a blood feud that can last for generations.

The iqumelum may attempt to intervene before a blood feud gets too far out of hand, but as a general policy, the village stays at arm's length, allowing the families to work out their differences themselves. It may take decades and dozens of deaths before feuding families call a truce; until then, woe to those who show favoritism to one side or the other.

Yijikak. If an Iuklut citizen feels he's been wronged by another, he may petition the iqumelum for permission to murder the offender; this type of murder is called yijikak. The iqumelum debate the request among themselves for several months, allowing time for rumors to thoroughly circulate among the populace. As often as not, the intended victim leaves the village when he hears of the charges against him, and no murder occurs.

The Iukluts have other, less violent methods of maintaining order, among them:

Wrestling Contests. Public wrestling contests are used to resolve minor conflicts, presuming both parties are agreeable. Weapons are not allowed, nor are techniques that may physically harm the participants. A kiam typically serves as referee.

Huuk. Another method of resolving minor disputes, the huuk (or singdown) involves an exchange of insults performed as short songs. Audience reaction determines the winner.

Public Ridicule. The simplest and most popular method of reprimand, this takes the form of imaginative taunts and insults directed against the violator. It seldom requires more than a week or so of humiliation before the violator issues an apology, makes restitution, or gives up and leaves the village.

Staging Singdowns

Here's an easy—and fun—way to stage a singdown between a non-Ilutium player character and an Ilutium NPC. Singdowns can be used to resolve conflicts between characters, or an NPC might insist on a singdown before he's willing to share supplies or information.

1. Explain the concept of the singdown, as described above.

2. Determine if the Ilutium NPC has the advantage. If adventurer has the Singing proficiency and/or a Charisma score of 15 or higher, neither character has the advantage. Otherwise, the NPC has the advantage. (Unless the NPC is exceptionally inept or inexperienced, a non-Ilutium character never has the advantage.)

3. The characters take turns exchanging insults, beginning with the NPC. (It's not necessary for the player to actually sing, though he's free to do so if he likes.)

The only insults that Ilutiums take seriously are those comparing the victim to bad food, or those that make fun of the victim's temper. Additionally, a properly-phrased insult begins with the words, "My friend." Don't tell the players any of this—let them figure it out themselves. The first few insults from the Ilutium opponent may tip them off.

Here's a list of appropriate insults the NPC can use; feel free to make up your own, structured along the same lines:

- "My friend, your breath smells worse than year-old seal blubber."
- "My friend, your skin has the fair texture of tirichik stew."
- "My friend, I ate some caribou meat last night that made my stomach ache. I thought of you."
- "My friend here gets angry at his shadow if it doesn't listen to his orders."
- "My friend here believes that you can melt snow by screaming at it."
- "My friend here has a temper so bad that it makes dragons cower in their caves."

4. A singdown should last at least three or four rounds, long enough for the characters to have a fair chance at figuring out what constitutes an acceptable Ilutium insult. The singdown continues until one of the following conditions occur:

- The character gives up.
- One opponent or the other is the obvious winner.
- The players are getting tired of the game.

5. The DM determines the winner by subjectively evaluating the adventurer's performance. If the character came up with two or three insults as good as those listed above and presented in the proper form (the insults must begin with "My friend" and must compare the opponent to bad food or make fun of her temper), and neither side has an advantage, give the player the benefit of the doubt and declare her the winner. If the NPC has the advantage, then the player must come up with two or three exceptionally imaginative or clever insults, presented in proper form (such as, “My friend, I found a moldy bread crust in the bottom of my knapsack that reminds me of your teeth-have you checked your mouth to see if any are missing?”).

The Family

The family is the primary social unit of the Iulutians. Tribal customs and taboos are designed to preserve and promote family life. Families, in turn, are expected to maintain order among their own members.

An Iulutian family includes not just the parents and children, but also grandparents, in-laws, and other relatives. Family ties may also extend beyond blood lines to include close friends and ukeu. There is no meaningful difference in a family hierarchy between an adopted child and a biological child, or between a natural uncle and a friend whom the family has designated as an uncle.

In general, an Iulutian family consists of all those living under the same roof. Typically, the parents and children live in one section of the house, an in-law and his family in another section, and an adopted uncle and his family in yet another. If the family adopts new members, new rooms are added to the house. Family members who move away, whether they are natural or adopted, gradually lose their ties to the original family. For example, parents feel less close to a biological son who lives across town than to an adopted uncle who still lives with them.

The eldest male and female children have special responsibilities in the family, essentially serving as surrogates for the parents. Their special titles reflect these roles; the oldest son is called the gazanga (little father) and the oldest daughter is known as the kazanga (little mother). If the gazanga or kazanga dies or moves away, the next oldest child assumes the role.

Family members operate under a strict status ranking, which not only designates the priority of family relationships, but also the strength of personal bonds; a father is closer to his son than his wife, a brother is closer to his sister than his grandparents. Each relationship has a specific name; the following table lists the relationships from highest to lowest priority.

Iulutian Relationship Rankings

Rank	Relationship	Name
1	father to gazanga	giik
2	mother to kazanga	erngiik
3	parent to sibling other than gazanga or kazanga	tigugiik
4	all other family relationships (including spouse to spouse)	aigiik
5	family member to ukeu	sangiik

Iulutians also use the above terms as general expressions of affection and loyalty to indicate the depth of feeling for a friend, an animal, a place, or even an experience. If a fisherman describes a lake as sangiik, his friends know it isn't nearly as good a place to catch fish as the local aigiik lake. An erngiik feast is much more memorable than one that's merely tigugiik, and a giik sled dog is the best companion a man could want.

More About Marriage

Males and females are expected to be married by the time they reach their early twenties. Unmarried children in their late twenties are candidates for ekotupa.

Men of honesty and humor are considered the best husband material, though good hunting skills help, too. A potential wife is also valued for her character, as well as her fertility (a guess based on the number of her siblings' children). Parents encourage their children to minimize physical attractiveness when choosing mates (“Beauty is deceitful; its promise of happiness is as false as its guarantee of permanence,” says Inum). Except in cases of ekotupa, mates are presumed to be in love.

Courtship seldom lasts longer than a few months. A man shows he's serious about a woman by giving her a small gift, such as a hand-made necklace or other trinket, and the woman reciprocates by giving him a similar gift. Both the man and the woman must ask permission to get married from each other's family. If permission is granted, the couple is considered married—there are no formal ceremonies, though the families may host a feast in the couple's honor.

A young married couple moves in with either the wife's parents or the husband's parents, depending on which family has the most room. After the birth of their first child, the couple may move into their own home, though many live with their parents indefinitely. Childless couples are allowed to divorce by mutual consent; the spouse simply moves out of the home of his or her in-laws.

Naming the Baby

The Iulutians' most cherished tradition involves the naming of newborns. The tradition has no religious implications—Iulutians don't put much stock in religion—but is intended to foster security and continuity by connecting the baby with two adults other than the parents.

Iulutians have single names only. All names consist of exactly two syllables. The first syllable links the baby to the past, the second syllable to the present. A baby is named as soon as possible after birth.

The first syllable of a name is called the kiirik, derived from either the first or second syllable of the name of a dead relative. The parents choose the relative, based on physical or behavioral similarities between the relative and the baby (he's bald like his grandfather, she has a bad temper like her aunt).

The second syllable of a name is called the anarkiirik, derived from either the first or second syllable of the name of a close family friend. This family friend, called the ariak, dresses the baby in his or her first clothes. This act, known as anariak (roughly, "building the newborn"), serves to permanently bond the friend with the child. At that moment, the ariak abandons his true birthday, and from then on celebrates his birthday on the same day as the anariak baby. In the years to come, the bond between the ariak and the child expresses itself in a number of ways:

- In conjunction with the child's parents, the ariak assumes responsibility for the care, safety, and education of the child. As the friend grows old, the child reciprocates.

- The child presents the first animal he or she kills to the ariak. The female child also presents her first baby to the ariak for his or her approval.

- The ariak is obligated to give any needed food, weapons, or other goods to the child that his or her family is unable to provide.

Growing Up

The Iulutians raise their children with affection and respect. Physical punishment of any kind, even a mild pat on the rump, is unheard of. Mothers carry infants in their parkas until they are about two years old, then the children spend their days playing among themselves. Favorite toys include caribou skin balls, jump ropes and cat's cradle strings made from animal sinews, tops of wood or ice, and dolls of sealskin scraps.

When children reach puberty, they receive tattoos on their wrists (for boys) or between their lips and chins (for girls). Simple patterns of thin parallel lines, the tattoos are almost imperceptible; still, boys and girls strut proudly for days after receiving them.

Reaching puberty also makes boys and girls eligible for ear and nose piercing. This adornment is usually performed by a grandparent or other family elder. Girls' ears are pierced large enough to hold thick hoops, boys' piercings are somewhat smaller. Piercing the nasal septum allows the wearing of beaded rings carved from seal bone, a custom more common for girls than boys.

Both boys and girls undergo a series of rituals marking their passage into adulthood. The main ritual, called jukikewquka, occurs after the child's first kill of a bird or other small animal. A feast is held, the father and ariak share the child's kill, and songs are sung in the child's honor. The awakewquka involves a similar celebration, taking place after the child's first seal kill. At the end of the feast, the child presents the seal skin to his or her mother. The most prestigious ritual is the nukiewquak, marking the child's first polar bear kill. The bear's head is mounted on a pole outside the family home where it remains for a week. At the end of the week, a representative from each family in the village samples the bear meat, and during the feast, the child performs a song that he or she has composed about the hunt. At the end of the feast, the child is considered an adult.

Girls have the option of skipping the jukikewquka-awakewquaka-nukiewquak cycle if they wish. In less enlightened villages, girls' passage into adulthood is less formalized; a girl is considered to be an adult when she's old enough to give birth and care for her children.

A Day in the Life

Tikqu, a young Iulutun mother of two, rises at the crack of dawn to nurse her babies and prepare breakfast for her husband, Hitok, who is sleeping late. Hitok went to bed late and weary after working long into the night repairing the family kayak, sewing patches of seal skin to cover rips in the hull.

Stretching and yawning, Hitok rises at last, lured by the aroma of fresh fish stew. He gobbles two bowlfuls, bites off a chunk of seal blubber; then rubs the heads of his wife and children to bid them farewell for the day.

Hitok removes the block of snow that serves as a door to his snowhouse, then greets the morning by whistling his favorite tune. He tosses meat scraps to his sled dogs, and while they are eating, he greases his sled with seal oil. He is traveling to a distant lake to investigate a caribou sighting; it's a long trip, and he will be gone all day. He hitches his clogs to the sled. They bark and paw the snow, eager to get going. His spear strapped to his back and his snow goggles in place, Hitok secures the dogs to the sled, and a moment later, he's off.

Meanwhile, Tikqu busies herself with household chores, mending clothes, checking the house for leaks (and making repairs with snow where necessary), preparing a seal skin for a new parka, and tending to a sick puppy. Mid-afternoon, a neighbor drops by and presents Tikqu with a chunk of polar bear meat in honor of her son's nukiewquak. Later, Tikqu boils the meat to serve for dinner.

The day passes quickly. As the sun sets, Tikqu hears the crunch of the family sled and runs outside to greet her husband. Good news—Hitok says the rumors of caribou were true. Tomorrow, he and some friends plan to return to the area with their bows. With luck, he says, they will have caribou meat for the rest of the month.

Recreation

Though Iulutians spend most of their time hunting, keeping house, and raising children, they reserve a few hours every day for relaxation. Visiting is the most common recreation, where neighbors gather for hours to chew the fat (both figuratively and literally), but Iulutians also enjoy a variety of other activities.

Jokitarpo. In this game, a group of up to 30 men and women sit in a circle around a large pot of soup. One of the players dips a leather cup of soup from the pot, takes a sip, then passes the cup around the circle for everyone to take a drink. The player taking the last drink becomes the jokitarpo—he must stand in middle of the circle and make hideous faces by grimacing, tying straps around his head, and drawing his lips into his mouth. The other players cheer when the jokitarpo makes an especially impressive face, then his turn ends. He dips a new cup of soup from the pot, and play resumes.

Keri-Keri. This game, favored by women, requires two face-to-face opponents. One opponent randomly points at her forehead, chest, elbows, and knees, each gesture accompanied by a nonsense word, such as subatiruitikak or talujquifredikit. The second opponent then tries to duplicate the first's action and words exactly. If she fails, the first opponent wins. Otherwise, play continues with the second opponent taking a turn.

Lukitaqutu. One player juggles three seal-skin balls while an opponent tries to knock them out of the air with a leather whip. The longer the whip, the more challenging the game.

Jegaung. A series of small holes are drilled into the skull of a wolf, seal, or similarly sized animal. The skull is placed on the ground, and a sliver of bone is tossed into the air. Players wager on which hole the sliver will land in.

Tingaung. Another gambling game, tingaung uses a dozen small replicas of birds carved from bone or ice. One player tosses the bird replicas into the air and the others wager on how many of the birds land on their feet.

Yakakilat. The yakalilaut, or drum feast, is an elaborate Iulutian celebration staged whenever hunters slay a white dragon, tirichik, or other large creature. The villagers surround the carcass in two large circles, women on the inner circle, men on the outer. The women dress in their most colorful clothes and wrap their hair in long braids, tying foot-long wooden sticks on the ends. Each man prepares a kilat drum, made from seal skin stretched over a hoop of wood or bone, played by slapping it against the thigh or chest. Accompanied by the kilat of the men and the songs of the women, the hunters strip to the waist and dance around the carcass, taunting the dead beast with insults. At the end of the dance, the beast is butchered and the meat distributed among the villagers.

Architecture

Snowhouses: Since wood, mud, stone, and other traditional building materials are scarce in Alpuuk, Iulutians must make do with what's available—and that means snow and ice. Over the centuries, the Iulutians have become quite adept at building snowhouses; if summer temperatures remain low enough to keep it frozen, a well-constructed snowhouse lasts two or three years.

Snowhouses are made of blocks of snow that are cut to size and stacked to form domes. Snowhouses are dome-shaped for two reasons: (1) they are easier to build that way, since old rows of blocks support the new rows above them, keeping the walls solid while construction proceeds, and (2) Iulutians have no suitable roofing materials; snow blocks won't work as they can't be cut large enough, and there's no practical way to support them.

Preparation. It takes a team of four workers to build a snowhouse, though in a pinch, as few as two can complete the job. In a crew of four, each worker has a specific assignment:

- The Cutter carves blocks from snow banks.
- The Carrier takes the blocks to the builder.
- The Builder stacks the blocks.
- The Packer smooths snow between the cracks of the blocks.

With two-worker crews, all blocks are cut and carried, then stacked and packed. This method takes a lot longer, since the crew has to guess how many blocks they need. They are invariably wrong, which requires a number of return trips to cut and carry more blocks.

Regardless of the size of the team, they need the same equipment:

- A pole or staff (bone or wood, about 4 feet long, used to test snow texture.
- A knife to cut snow blocks; the blade should be one to two feet long.
- A shovel for heaping snow on the finished house.

The first step in building a house is to find a supply of suitable snow, hard enough to stack but soft enough to cut. The best snow is found on flat terrain, where drifts rise at least 4 feet high. Ideally, the drifts should have accumulated within the last few weeks. Old snow, subjected to blasts of freezing wind, tends to be as solid as ice and extremely difficult to cut. Fresh snow, especially that which has fallen during relatively high temperatures and calm winds, can be as grainy as sugar and impossible to cut.

The easiest way to identify a suitable snow bank is to step in it. If steps don't leave footprints, the snow's too hard. If the prints sink more than an inch or so, the snow's too soft. If steps leave slight impressions, the snow's just right.

After locating a suitable drift, the worker must test its consistency by inserting a rod or staff. The rod should sink smoothly to a depth of about 4 feet. If the rod encounters resistance, the drift consists of layers of old and new snow; it's useless, and they must look for another drift.

Construction. To cut a snow block, the worker makes two sets of parallel cuts in the drift to form a rectangle about 3 feet long, about a foot or so wide, and about a foot and a half deep. The blade is inserted at an angle to make a series of horizontal cuts, and is then used to lift the block free. A typical block weighs anywhere from 50-100 pounds; if it isn't strong enough to stand on its side and be carried without crumbling, it's no good; the worker has to start over. The block must be reasonably flat on all surfaces; uneven sides can be shaved with the blade.

The first tier of blocks is set in a circle, and should be laid on an area of level snow. If necessary, the worker can stick a pole in the snow, tie a string to it, pull the string tight, then use it as a guide to make a circle. The Builder props the blocks against each other by leaning the bottom edge of a new block against the top edge of the previous block. A one-block opening is left to serve as a temporary door. The Packer seals the holes between blocks with snow. The snow freezes in about ten minutes, creating a solid wall of blocks.

When the first tier is finished, the second tier stacks atop the first like a spiral. As the stacking proceeds, the higher tiers lean in slightly, gradually forming a dome. The blocks continue to spiral until the dome is complete, except for a small opening in the top. Two blocks are wedged in the hole, then the workers shovel fresh snow over the top. The snow slides down the walls to evenly surround the entire dome. The workers stop shoveling when the bottom two feet or so of the dome is about three feet thick (including the thickness of the snow blocks).

To create the entry way, one worker enters the snowhouse by wiggling his way through the temporary door. He then digs a trench about 5 feet wide and 5 feet deep extending inward from the doorway. Outside, another worker digs a similar trench leading to the doorway, meeting the interior trench. The workers plug the temporary door with a snow block, then build an archway of snow blocks over the outside trench. When it's finished, the entry resembles a tunnel about 2 feet below ground level, which helps to keep frigid air and blowing snow out of the snowhouse.

To complete the house, a worker builds a fire inside the main room, strong enough to thaw the walls. When the walls are soft and slushy, the fire is extinguished, and the walls are allowed to refreeze. The result is a glaze of ice that makes the walls stronger and adds insulation.

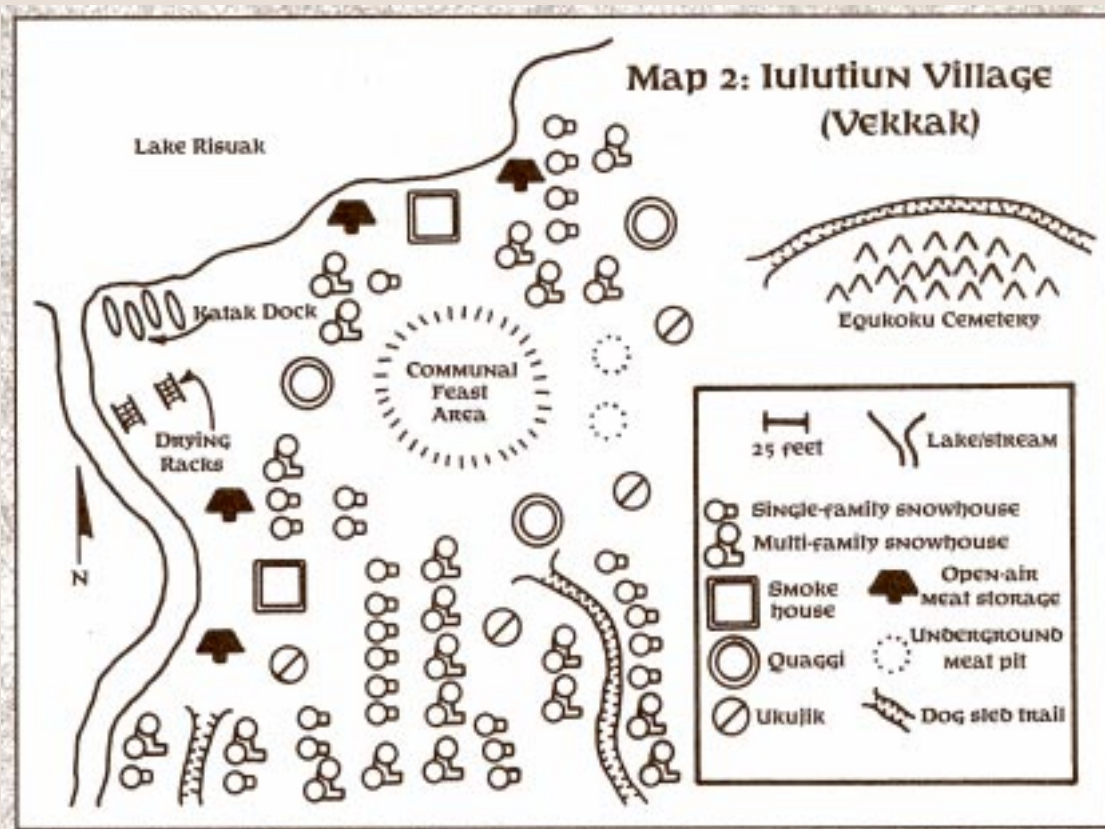

Floor Plans: The simplest Iulutiun snowhouse is a dome with a single entry. A 10-foot-diameter house sleeps four or five and takes a four-person crew about three hours to build. This simple snowhouse is a good temporary structure. It is useful as a guest house for overnight visitors, or for hunters spending the night in the wilderness.

Most Iulutiuns, however, prefer more elaborate snowhouses. Figure 1 shows the type of snowhouse typically found in Iulutiun settlements. A single-family house includes the following sections:

Toqsung. This is the name given to the three-sectioned entry passage, designed to give the main living space maximum protection from the cold. The outermost, open section of the toqsung is the kaquling, angled away from the prevailing wind (in Alpuk, prevailing winds usually blow, from the north or south, so the kaquling opens to the east or west). Beyond the kaquling is the uadiling, a 6-foot-tall dome with a door about 2 or 3 feet high. Next is a long passage, the igdluling, also about 6 feet high, which ends with another 3-foot door.

Lulik. The main living space, linked by a door to the igdluling. It's about 12 feet in diameter, large enough for a family of six.

Sircdloang. A small room used to store clothing and harnesses. Though attached to the uadling and igdluling, it has no door; instead, one of the blocks is removed from the outside to give access.

Igdluarn. Another room similar in size to the sirdloang, except that this one is accessible from the lulik by a 2-foot opening. Fresh meat and blubber are kept here.

Andlitiving. A large room attached to the lulik, linked by a 2-foot opening. It's used for long-term meat storage.

Several families can share the same snowhouse by building additional luliks; Diagram 1 also shows a two-family house. If more families wish to move in, the two-family house can be expanded by adding new igdluling-lulik units, radiating from the uadling like spokes from a wheel.

Furnishings

Wall Lining. Also called the ilupiquan, this is a lining of seal or caribou skin fastened to the interior walls of a snowhouse. Sharp bones are punched through the shins to fasten them to the walls; a knot of leather tied to the bones protruding outside the house holds the skins tight. The ilupiquan provides further insulation and also prevents candles and stoves from melting the interior walls.

Bed Platform. A comfortable sleeping area is made by piling fragments of snow blocks over an area large enough to hold a man. The pile should be about a foot or two high, enough to keep the sleeper well above the top of the entry way, which helps keep him warm. Two deer or caribou shins are placed over the pile, fur-side down to prevent the sleeper's body heat from melting the ice. Thick blankets of laced deer or caribou skin, called quipiqu, cover the sleeper. A bundle of clothing serves as a pillow.

Ventilation Plug. This 2-inch-diameter hole, also called a quangirin, ventilates the house when lamps or stoves are burned. After cutting a hole in the roof with a knife, a worker ties a length of leather or sinew strap to a fur plug, then pushes the strap through the hole. A worker on the roof secures the outer end of the strap to a cross-piece of bone or wood. The quangirin can then be opened or closed as needed.

Lighting. Since the glazed interior of a snowhouse is a continuous reflective surface, it doesn't take much light for illumination. Even in a windowless house, enough sunlight seeps through the walls (presuming the ilupiquan is let down) to provide sufficient illumination, even on cloudy days. At night, the light of a full moon penetrates the walls, enabling occupants to see well enough to prepare food and locate small objects. Otherwise, a single small candle or lamp provides all the light necessary to fully illuminate a 12-foot-diameter room.

Windows. If the occupants of a snowhouse desire more interior lighting, they cut holes in the walls, then wedge in pieces of fresh ice from a lake, packing snow around the ice to hold it tight. The ice should be about 2 inches thick, which is thick enough to provide insulation yet thin enough to be easily cut and shaped. Spare ice windows can be stored in the sirdloang.

Fireplace. A fireplace, also called a quidlirin is the ultimate Iulutiu luxury, owing to the the scarcity of stones required to build one (stones sometimes turn up in avalanches, or they can occasionally be recovered in a stream or sea). A quidlirin consists of a stone stove and a framework of wood or bone. Blubber fills the stove, with a wick of animal hair greased with blubber to make it burn. Kettles and pots, made of stone or bone, are hung from the framework and suspended over the stove. A bone hoop laced with leather straps, called an intang, lies on top of the framework and is used for drying wet clothes.

Temperatures in a Snowhouse

In a well-constructed snowhouse with glazed walls, a small fireplace, and ilupiquan in place, temperatures remain remarkably comfortable. The temperature difference between the interior and exterior averages about 50-60 degrees; if the outside temperature is 30 degrees below, the interior temperature may be about 20-30 above. Just below the ceiling, the temperature may be up to 80-100 degrees warmer than the exterior of the snowhouse (if the outside is 30 below, it may be 50-60 degrees a foot or so under the ceiling). The frigid outside temperatures prevent the ceiling from melting.

Other Structures

Though Iulutiu villages consist primarily of snowhouses, most villages of 100 residents or more also include the following buildings:

Quaggi. Normally, *Iulutiu*s hold communal feasts and celebrations outside. But when the weather's bad, they use a quaggi (feast house). A quaggi is a large dome, 15-20 feet tall and at least 20 feet in diameter. A large quidlirin is centered on the floor of the dome. Two ledges of snow serve as seats; one ledge, about 6 feet tall, hugs the interior wall, while just below is a second ledge about 2 feet tall. Typically, a village has about one quaggi for every 100 adults.

Ukujik. Also known as a cutting house, the ukujik is a 10-foot diameter dome used to butcher animals. A snow partition, rising about 7 feet from the floor, divides the dome in half. Two 5-foot-deep pits fill half of the room. The section of the room with the pits is called the ijukujik, the section without pits is called the akukujik. A doorway opens into each section. Hunters butcher game in the akukujik, and toss organs and blubber over the partition into the ijukujik; organs go in one pit, blubber in the other. Villagers are free to help themselves to the surplus in the ijukujik pits.

Clothing

The *Iulutiu*s have mastered the art of dressing for frigid weather. Wearing layered clothes of caribou and seal skin, an Iulutiu can comfortably tolerate temperatures as low as -50 degrees F. Both sexes dress similarly, wearing the same wardrobe the year-round, removing an outer layer of trousers and mittens in the warmer days of summer.

Though caribou and seal skin are the preferred materials, the furs of polar bear, wolf, deer, and beaver are also used. To prepare a skin for clothes, it's first scraped free of flesh, then hung on a rack or spread on the ground to dry. The skin is then scraped and dried again. After repeating this process two or three times, the skin becomes as soft as velvet and can be cut and sewn to size. Drying and scraping usually leaves skins white or light gray, but hanging them in a smokehouse for about a week darkens the skins to brown or dark gray.

An Iulutium suit consists of the following:

- Underwear to cover the legs, arms and torso, made of the skin of deer or caribou no more than a year old (such skin is especially soft).
- Two pair of socks; the inner socks are worn fur-side in. The outer socks, which resemble slippers, are made of the same material as underwear.
- A parka, which is a single-piece jacket and hood that slips over the head like a sweater and hangs just below the waist. The lining is seal skin, the outer layer is fur. The rounded hood hangs loosely over the head and doesn't cover the face; a tight hood encourages the formation of frost where fur meets the flesh. Though frost tends to form on an uncovered face, it's usually as light as powder, and easily brushed away; a layer of hard ice can form on a face that's completely covered. The parka's sleeves are long and wide, enabling the wearer to draw cold hands inside and warm them against her chest.
- Two pair of trousers. Like socks, the inner pair is young deer or caribou skin, the outer pair is worn fur-side out.
- Waterproof boots, made of hide from a caribou's leg, the sole covered with an extra layer of tirichik, caribou or seal skin. Because of its superb insulation and traction, tirichik hide makes excellent soles for boots, but such creatures are hard to come by and most Iulutians have to settle for caribou. Trousers are tucked inside the boots, which are then tightened with a leather drawstring.

- Two pair of mittens. Again, the inner pair is young deer or caribou, the outer pair is fur. Parka sleeves are tucked inside the outer mittens and tightened with drawstrings. Outer mittens have two thumbs, so there's a spare if one gets wet. The palm and thumbs are shaved smooth to facilitate gripping and grasping.

Both males and females part their hair in the middle. Females grow their hair longer than men, winding it in knots behind their heads, sometimes tying it in short braids secured by bone rings.

Iulutians prefer simple clothes, and don't use much decoration. Occasionally, they adorn parkas with strips of white deer or wolf skin, or attach short strings to hang bone beads, teeth, and animal ears.

Transportation

Forget horses, donkeys, and anything with wheels. Land animals unused to the freezing climate of the Great Glacier won't last a day, and neither the hooves of pack animals, the feet of men, nor wooden wheels are designed to traverse snow drifts and slippery ice. Likewise, water travel in the Great Glacier requires vessels capable of navigating the often shallow waters and withstanding damaging buffets from pack ice.

Transportation on Land

Dog Sled. The easiest and quickest way to get around the snowy plains of the Great Glacier the Iulutium dog sled consists of a wooden or bone frame (for carrying goods and supplies), a small wooden platform on one end (on which a person stands), and a wooden lattice on the other end (to which the dog team is attached). Runners of wood or bone, greased with blubber, are secured to the bottom of the sled. Sled sizes average 8-12 feet long and about 2-3 feet wide. A dog team, consisting of 6-10 animals, can easily pull 1,000 pounds (see Part Four for information about lolutium sled dogs).

Kupuk Sled. A little wider (3-4 feet) and shorter (5-7 feet), a kupuk sled is otherwise identical to a dog sled. A single kupuk pulls the sled, which can carry up to 1,000 pounds.

Bikik. The bikik resembles a normal dog sled with a square sail, 4 feet per side, attached to a mast near the center of the frame. The sail, made of caribou hide or seal skin, catches the wind and boosts the sled's speed.

Hiuchupuk. A hiuchupuk is a type of water sled. It is essentially a kupuk sled with inflated seal skins attached to the runners. A hiuchupuk has a limited life span, as battering from pack ice eventually deflates the seal skins. Battered skins are usually fed to the kupuk.

Ikaap. This simple sled can be made quickly in emergencies by stacking three or four caribou skins atop each other, then soaking them with water. While the water freezes, two holes are cut near one end of the stack, and a pair of dog reins are inserted. A paste is made of mushy snow and animal hair (any type will do) which is applied to both sides of the skin pile, doused with water, and allowed to freeze. Two dogs are secured to the reins, the rider sits on the skins, and off he goes.

Snowshoes. Snowshoes look like oval frames of wood, 3 feet long and 1 foot wide, laced with leather webs. They enable the wearer to walk on the surface of snow without sinking. With a little practice, a person wearing snowshoes can move at her normal movement rate.

Transportation on Water

Umiak. The umiak is a large, easy to maintain cargo boat, designed to travel in water only a few feet deep. About 40 feet long, it's capable of holding 20 passengers, their hunting equipment, and a few caribou carcasses without sinking. To make an umiak, seal or walrus skins are sewn together, then stretched over a frame of wood or bone, creating a dish-like vessel with a broad, flat bottom. As the skins dry, they shrink, creating a tight surface with the texture of canvas. Three coats of oil from seal or walrus blubber are applied to the craft. Each coat dries for about a week. At the end of three weeks, the umiak is water-tight and ready to go.

Although the umiak weighs about one-fourth as much as a conventional wooden ship of comparable size, it can carry half-again as much weight. Its flexible walls enable it to bounce harmlessly off most obstructions. If the craft suffers a tear, it can be easily repaired by sewing on a seal skin patch. In rough waters, inflated seal skins are secured to the sides to provide additional buoyancy.

On the downside, the umiak's flat bottom and high sides make it hard to paddle in strong winds. To compensate, kupuk can be used to pull them; a pair of kupuk in the water can easily pull a 40-foot umiak with a full cargo. Alternately, a team of about 12-15 dogs on shore can pull an umiak with tracking lines: the lines should be at least 50 feet long and attached to a single mast.

Kayak. The kayak is a single-person vessel, fast-moving and easy to maneuver. Its construction is similar to that of an umiak, with oiled and dried seal skins attached to a bone or wood frame. A completed kayak is about 10 feet long and 2 feet wide, completely covered by skin except for a circular opening in the top. The operator squeezes into this hole then sits up, her legs extending into the front section, the rest of her body protruding upwards. She then stuffs caribou or wolf skin around the opening, sealing herself in.

A single oar with a paddle on each end is used to propel a kayak. Controlling a kayak requires a keen sense of balance; it's just about impossible to remain upright if the craft isn't moving. Operators learn to constantly paddle their kayak with one hand, while simultaneously using their free hand to spear game or set fishing nets. Getting in and out of a kayak without capsizing requires hours of practice, and even the most experienced operators can't avoid an occasional dunking. When a kayak flips, the operator shifts his body weight to twist the craft completely around; the operator suffers a brief dunking, but the vessel rights itself almost instantly.

Because kayaks aren't particularly comfortable, they are best suited for short journeys, though experienced operators have been known to make kayak trips of a hundred miles or more. Kayaks sometimes accompany umiaks on hunting expeditions. The umiak carries the gear and most of the hunting party, while the faster kayaks scout ahead, periodically returning to the umiak to report game sightings or obstacles.

HUNTING

Hunting is no mere sport for the Iulutiuns—it's a matter of life and death. All able-bodied villagers are expected to participate in hunts, which occur daily. In fact, the main reason why the Iulutiuns haven't developed much of a culture is that they simply don't have time for arts and crafts—they are too busy hunting.

Hunts involve either groups of 4-24 (for larger game, such as caribou and polar bear) or single hunters (seal, fish, and birds). Occasionally, a few dozen of the best hunters from several villages band together to hunt tirichik or white dragons, splitting the spoils equally among the survivors.

Weapons In addition to such conventional weapons as bows, spears, and nets, Iulutiun hunters employ a variety of exotic weapons, some of which are described below. Though designed for hunting, these weapons can also be used in combat.

Unungak. A large (5-foot) harpoon with a wooden shaft and needle-sharp bone point. Leather cords are wound around the front of the shaft and secured lengthwise along the body of the shaft to increase the weapon's durability.

Artengak. More slender than an unungak but with a similar bone point, the artengak is the main weapon used to hunt seal. A long cord attaches to the shaft, ending in a loop which the hunter places around his wrist. The cord helps prevent game from escaping with the weapon.

Naulagak. Another type of harpoon, the naulagak is a wood or bone shaft shaped like a wishbone at one end. A separate blade of bone, razor-sharp on all sides, is fixed between the shafts of the wishbone, held so that the blade can toggle back and forth. A long cord attaches to the other end of the naulagak. When the shaft pierces an animal, the hunter jerks the cord, which causes the blade to toggle. Not only does this increase the damage, it also secures the animal to the shaft, making it much harder for the animal to get away.

Ritiik. This is a 6-foot-long bone shaft with a point and hook on one end used to attack polar bear and other large animals. When the shaft pierces, the point is jerked back so that the hook digs in.

Garnok. A foot-long bone rod with a leather thong on one end and a small cup on the other. It's used to hurl small (3-inch or less) bone darts.

Luqu. A long (7 feet or more) thin (about an inch in diameter) trident of lashed segments of bone or wood. Each tine is covered with hooked barbs. The luqu is used to spear fish.

Iuak. A bone blade resembling a machete, about 2 feet long and 6 inches wide. The end of the blade is flat, not pointed. Mainly used to cut blocks to make snowhouses, the iuak also makes a good offensive weapon.

Ekaa. A type of arrow used to hunt caribou and other herd animals. An arrowhead carved from a caribou or deer antler is attached to a shaft of bone. Hooked barbs cover both the arrowhead and the shaft.

Trukaa. An arrow of bone with a blunt head, used to kill small game without damaging the fur.

A typical Iulutiun hunting party is armed as follows: 30% bows (with a supply of both ekaa and trukaa), 20% spears, 20% harpoons (assortment of unungak, artengak, and naulagak), 10% ritiik, 10% garnok, and 10% luqu. Each hunter also carries an iuak.

Techniques

Seal Hunting. Because seals are the Iulutiuns' primary food source, youngsters are encouraged to master the techniques of seal hunting as soon as they can handle a harpoon. Though seals live beneath the frozen surfaces of seas and lakes, they are air breathers. Periodically, seals surface to scratch breathing holes in the ice. Hunters crouch by these holes, sometimes for hours on end, waiting for a seal to poke his nose through. When it does, the hunter thrusts his harpoon as hard as he can. Though seals can also be found basking on icebergs or lounging on the shore, they are too alert and too quick for hunters to sneak up on them; as soon as they sniff a hunter or hear the crunch of his boot, they dive back into the water. As tedious as it is, waiting by their breathing holes is far and away the easiest way to hunt seals.

Caribou Hunting. Caribou are mainly hunted by parties of two dozen or more hunters armed with bows. When a party spots a grazing herd, they quietly create an inuksuk a line of snowmen about 2 feet tall, spaced about 3 feet apart. When complete, the inuksuk forms a V-shape, with each shaft of the V about 100 yards long. Most of the hunters wait at the point of the V, while a handful sneaks to the open end of the V. When everyone's in position, the hunters at the open end shriek and scream, driving the caribou into the point of the V where they are met by a volley of arrows.

Wolf Trap. The Iulutiens catch wolf and fox by building a special pit trap called a dinjik, a dome-shaped snowhouse about 10 feet tall. A square hole is cut into the top, then covered with thin branches and a layer of snow. Fresh seal meat or some other tempting bait is placed inside the house. Lured by the bait, a wolf or fox steps on the covered hole, then falls into the snowhouse. The animal can't jump out—the hole is too high nor can it scale the curved walls to climb out.

Food

Iulutiens eat almost nothing but meat, the fatter the better. Meat is relatively abundant (compared to the scarcity of vegetation) and fatty game provides blubber and oil used for cooking, heating, and lighting.

Seal is the staple of the Iulutian diet. It's plentiful, fatty, easy to hunt, and easy to prepare. The entire carcass is edible including the organs. Seal can be cooked, eaten raw, or frozen and stored. However, seal isn't particularly appetizing, tasting like gritty fish, and somewhat bitter.

Iulutiens agree that the best tasting meat comes from caribou, though it's harder to find than seal. Caribou is rich in flavor, juicy and filling, whether eaten raw or cooked. The ribs, backbone, and legs are delectable, though the head is the sweetest part of the animal. Caribou organs can be eaten but usually aren't. Iulutiens find them sour. Instead, the organs are usually fed to sled dogs and kupuk.

Other foods include:

Musk Oxen. Comparable to caribou, but not as sweet and juicy. Some Iulutiens raise Oxen for their milk, which tastes like thick cream.

Polar Bear. Edible, but barely. The meat is stringy, tough, and hard to digest.

Fish. Iulutiens eat whatever they catch, and consume the whole body, including the head, fins, and scales. Fish are boiled, frozen and preserved, or eaten raw. Some fish are left in the sun to rot; many Iulutiens consider partially decayed fish to be a delicacy.

Deer. Like caribou, but not as succulent (though better than musk oxen). Shoulders, legs, and ribs are preferred, especially after they have been cut into strips and dried.

Birds. Among the favorites are penguins, terns, gulls, and puffins. Eaten raw.

Dragon and Tirichik. Sweet but chewy, difficult to digest but protein-rich. Dragon organs are edible by the strong of stomach, but tirichik organs are poisonous, particularly the liver. Iulutiens experimented with tirichik liver as a coating for arrows, but game killed by such arrows also became contaminated with poison and was inedible. The practice has since been abandoned.

Vegetation and Fungi. Iulutiens occasionally indulge in mosses, grasses, and lichen, usually to add flavor in soups and stews. Algae can be scraped off pack ice, while black lichen—a particular favorite that tastes like mint—can be found on the bottoms of stones.

Cooking Iulutiens prefer boiling to all other methods of cooking meat. It's easy, quick, and the left-over water makes good soup stock. The usual way to boil food is to fill a pot about half-way to the top with ice, then pile bite-size meat chunks on top. Two spark stones—resembling iron pyrite, available mainly in the Novularond—are struck together, igniting a pile of blubber, oil-soaked hide, or tinder. The ice melts, and the water is allowed to come to a boil while the chef feeds the fire with more blubber or tinder. It takes about 20 minutes of boiling to cook a pot of meat. To make soup, chunks of blubber and meat scraps are tossed in the cooking pot and allowed to simmer for the rest of the day.

Animal heads can be boiled, but they taste better if slow-roasted. Caribou heads are too big to roast on spits, so they are usually hung over a fire by a feather strap threaded through the nostrils. The chef constantly turns the head to ensure thorough cooking. It takes about 3-4 hours to roast a caribou head.

During communal meals, individual diners don't have their own utensils. Everyone sips from the same soup cup, then passes it on to his neighbor. Large pieces of meat are circulated the same way, with everyone taking big bites and passing them on. Melted sea ice is available to add flavor. Flasks of fresh water wash down the meal.

Storage Meat that isn't eaten immediately can be stored outside for up to six months during fall and winter. It requires no special preparation and can be left under the open sky, usually atop platforms 10 feet tall or higher to discourage scavengers. Snow can be brushed off or left alone. Aside from some minor drying, the meat remains perfectly preserved. Since frozen meat has no scent, scavengers do not pose a problem.

For long-term storage, meat is buried in 15-foot pits and covered with snow blocks. Temperatures remain at least -20 degrees in the bottom of these pits. About once every six months, the meat must be checked for mold (the combination of darkness and bitter temperatures is irresistible to a few arctic molds). Meat can be preserved in this way for about a year.

Economics

Iulutians don't use currency of any kind. Gold pieces might make interesting fishing lures, but they won't buy much in Alpuk. Though there are plenty of gemstones to be found in the Great Glacier, particularly in the depths of Novularond, Iulutians regard them as mildly attractive, somewhat gaudy trinkets of no particular value.

The economy of the Iulutians is based entirely on trade. Villages engage in regular barter for food, weapons, dogs, and sleds, particularly during the annual sukkiruchit. Since the end of the Keryjek Wars, the Angulutians have become strong trading partners, swapping caribou meat and skins for weapons, seal oil, blubber, and furs.

Iulutians also barter for services. A new snow knife might be the asking price for a day's worth of snow block cutting, while a pound of seal meat might buy an evening's worth of babysitting. Convincing a reluctant warrior to join the hunt for a tirichik might require a guarantee of an extra share or two of the meat (presuming, of course, that the hunt's successful).

Iulutians are shrewd negotiators. Most Iulutian traders follow a policy of pioquak-ik-wokquak, which means that it's better to walk away from something you want than to give more than it's worth. Generally, though, Iulutians do their best to make sure everyone's happy with a trade, assuming all parties negotiate honestly and fairly.

Negotiating with Iulutians

Visitors from elsewhere in the Realms quickly learn that their money is no good in the Great Glacier. As a rule, however, Iulutians barter with anyone, and it's likely that strangers carry an item or two that the Iulutians will trade for.

For instance, Iulutians trade for any type of food (except vegetables or grain, which they don't have the stomach for); spices and exotic varieties of meat, such as ham and beef, are certain to make their mouths water, or at least arouse their curiosity. Useful weapons, such as knives and bows, are always needed, as are well-made boots and mittens designed for frigid climates.

Other desirable items include oil, lamps, candles, rope, and sewing needles. Among the items useless to Iulutians are paper and ink (they don't write), thieves' tools (there's nowhere to use them), saddles and halters (no horses), armor (too clumsy, though a clever salesman might talk an Iulutian into using chest plates for trays and helmets for pots), and perfume (too foul-smelling).

Remember that Iulutians have limited interest in gold pieces or gems. All trades must be for merchandise of equivalent value, negotiated upwards or downwards as the situation dictates. For reference, here's a list of various Iulutian goods and the value in currency.

Item	Value
1 small fish	5 cp
1 lb. seal meat	1 sp
1 lb. caribou meat	2 sp
1 lb. tirichik meat	5 gp
caribou hide	20 gp
parka	15 gp
kayak	50 gp
dog sled	70 gp
sled dog	200 gp
kupuk	1,000 gp

Religion

The Iulutians have no formal religion. Preoccupation with survival has made them a pragmatic people, so they have a hard time believing anything they can't experience directly. Though they honor the memory of their dead, they don't believe in life after death ("What would you do for a body?"). They have no interest in creation theories ("The world was always here. Where else would it be?"), nor do they believe in the existence of gods ("Where do they live? In the sky like birds? In the sea like fish? This is nonsense."). A few priests exist among the Iulutians, including believers in Chauntea (called Pahluruk by Iulutian priests), Ilmater (called Ayuruk), and even Auril (called Saukuruk). But such folk are few and far between, tolerated as eccentrics by the general populace.

The Nature of Qukoku Virtually all Iulutians, however, adhere to an animistic philosophy called qukoku. Though qukoku is not a religion—it has no supernatural basis—it functions like one, in that it provides moral guidelines and suggests an order to the universe. Basically, qukoku says that all living creatures share an essence of life called eaas, that disappears when the creature dies. Eaas makes all creatures individuals in life, but identical in death.

A number of basic principles derive from this philosophy, which Iulutians use as standards of personal conduct:

- Since no one's eaas can truly be known, no person can truly be said to be the superior of another.
- Animals share the same emotions, thoughts, and morals as people, but their eaas compels them to express these characteristics differently.
- Since people and animals all share eaas, people are the emotional, intellectual, and moral equivalent of animals. Animals therefore deserve the same respect as people.
- Animals can be killed and used by people only because the eaas of animals dictates their roles in the natural order; just as seals eat fish, men eat seals. Wanton or disrespectful killing, however, promotes disruption; nature rebalances itself by diminishing the amount of human eaas through disease and natural disasters.

Qukoku Rituals Since qukoku is a philosophy and not a religion, there are no formal services. However, Iulutians observe a number of qukoku rituals intended to celebrate the unity of nature and reinforce respect for life.

Utqukoku. An adult friend of the parents presents the child a small charm carved from bone or wood in the form of an animal, such as a seal or polar bear. The charm has no supernatural or magical properties; rather, it symbolizes a trait associated with the animal that the friend and the parents hope the child will embody when he or she grows up. The following are some typical charms and the traits they represent.

Utqukoku Charms

Charm	Trait
Kupuk	Loyalty
Polar Bear	Courage
Seal	Playfulness
Dragon	Strength
Caribou	Serenity
Fox	Patience

The child keeps his utqukoqu charm pinned inside of his parka sleeve or clipped to his belt at all times. As the child grows up, the friend who gave him the charm teaches him special songs associated with the utqukoqu animal and offers behavioral guidance associated with the represented trait. For instance, if the child received a seal charm, the friend shows the child how seals alternate periods of hunting with periods of play, demonstrating that both work and recreation are vital to a balanced life. A child with a fox charm is taken into the wilderness and shown how a fox waits quietly for hours on end for its prey to appear, demonstrating the benefits of patience.

Liqukoku. In the qukoku philosophy, the new year begins on the first day of spring. A liqukoku ritual is held to honor the killing of the first caribou, the first seal, and the first polar bear of the year; each species merits its own liqukoku. A liqukoku consists of the following elements:

- The hunter hangs the animal skin on the liqukoku pole (a 10-foot-pole of bone or wood in the center of the village). The skin hangs for a week. During that time, all adult villagers pay their respects by bowing to the skin.
- The hunter makes a mask of animal hide (any animal will do; seal and caribou hides make the best masks) representing the animal she killed. She wears the mask for a week.
- The hunter is not allowed to eat that particular type of meat for a month if the animal was male; if the animal was female, the hunter can't eat that type of meat for two months.

Opoqukoku. Iulutians believe that the eaa resides inside the skull. The opoqukoku ritual involves the respectful disposal of skulls. Animal skulls that aren't used for practical purposes, such as bowls or cups, must be buried in a deep pit or thrown into the sea. Opoqukoku applies not just to domestic or butchered animals; should an Iulutian discover an animal corpse in the wilderness, she is required to properly dispose of the skull. Iulutians take this ritual seriously; in some villages, opoqukoku violations are punished by execution.

Equkoku. This ritual honors dead people, but can also be staged to honor animals that aren't eaten, including loyal pack animals, pets, and even game animals that earn an Iulutian's respect (for instance, a hunter may choose to stage an equkoku for a polar bear that put up an exceptionally courageous struggle, or for a seal who died giving birth to a large litter).

Equkoku involves a feast where the deceased is the guest of honor. Only the immediate family attends the feast; in the case of a game animal equkoku, the hunter and a handful of invited friends attend. The body is placed on a slab of ice blocks, then covered with skins (for warmth). A lamp is placed near the head (so the deceased can see), and a bowl and cup laid at his side (so the deceased can eat). It's understood that these are symbolic gestures—the family doesn't really believe that the deceased needs warmth, or can see or eat—but they help comfort the family in their time of loss.

Interment customs vary from village to village. Some villages bury their dead, some burn the corpses, some tie the bodies to weighted rafts and sink them to the bottom of the sea. All villages, however, maintain cemeteries filled with equkoku totems. When a person (or honored animal) dies, a family member (or hunter) carves a totem from a 3-foot length of wood or bone. The totem is a cylindrical shaft with a knob on the top, shaped to look like the deceased's head. Since not all Iulutians are skilled sculptors, some totem heads are understandably crude, but each features an identifiable detail such as braided hair, a scar, or chubby cheeks. Totems are arranged in even lines, spaced about a foot apart. Equkoku cemeteries contain no bodies.

Magic

As is the case with priests, wizards are in short supply in the Great Glacier. Because Iulutians devote most of their energy to survival, they don't have time to spare for academic pursuits, including the study of magic. Teachers are scarce, as are spell components.

Still, a few Iulutians manage to master the art of magic, and most villages of 200 or more have a wizard or two in residence. But since Iulutian wizards seldom achieve a level higher than 1st, they are not particularly powerful and their status is correspondingly low. Most function as entertainers and fortune tellers, though the rare higher-level wizards make valuable additions to hunting parties.

Iulutian wizards tend not to specialize, but those that do concentrate in the schools of abjuration, enchantment/charm, invocation/evocation, and greater divination. Few specialize in illusion or necromancy, since illusion spells are of limited use in the harsh climate of the Great Glacier and necromancy spells violate the spirit of qukoku.

The Anagakok The anagakok is a type of wizard unique to the Great Glacier whose innate survival skills are especially useful to the Iulutians. Soft-spoken and reserved, anagakok seldom achieve leadership status, but they are excellent advisors and explorers; a hunting party undertaking a long expedition isn't complete without an anagakok.

An anagakok begins life as an ordinary mage or specialist. When the supplicant reaches middle age, the wizard petitions an elder anagakok to share her secrets. The elder assigns the wizard a task to test her character, such as locating a reclusive animal or fetching a sample of a rare plant. If the wizard completes the task, the elder takes her on as an apprentice, spending the next month instructing her in the ways of the anagakok. At the end of the month, the elder takes the wizard into the wilderness on an especially cold night. They sit in the snow and lock eyes until sunrise. If the wizard makes it through the entire night without freezing to death (about half don't survive), an inch of soft white hair sprouts from her entire body, indicating that she has become an anagakok.

A new anagakok retains all the spell-casting ability she had previously, and also acquires all of the following special abilities and penalties:

- Regardless of terrain, she can locate enough food to feed herself and a number of companions equal to her level (a 3rd-level anagakok can find food to feed herself and three others). She can use this ability once per day.
- The anagakok can cast a special good fortune spell on herself and a number of companions equal to her level, causing all opponents of those under the spell's effect to suffer a -1 penalty to their attack rolls. The anagakok can cast this once per week by concentrating for one round and pointing at the recipients; the spell is innate and doesn't have to be memorized, nor does it count against her normal spell limit. The spell lasts for a number of turns equal to the anagakok's level.
- Her fur gives her total immunity to the effects of cold. She no longer must wear clothes designed for arctic weather (most anagakok wear loose leather tunics). However, she suffers normal damage from cold-based spells and other magically-generated cold effects (such as a white dragon's breath weapon).
- In environments of 100 degrees F. or above, she suffers a -1 penalty to all attack rolls, damage rolls, ability checks, and saving throws.
- Because of their unusual appearance, anagakoks suffer a -2 reaction penalty from all non-Iulutians (Iulutians, Nakulutians, and Angulutians react normally). Shaving the fur does no good: it all grows back within a day.

Player Character Anagakok

With the DM's consent, player character mages and specialist wizards can attempt to become anagakok. But it isn't easy.

The would-be anagakok must meet the following requirements:

- He must be human.

- He must be at least 40 years old.
- He must have a Constitution of at least 13.

A qualified wizard must seek out an instructor anagakok in an Iulutiu village (assume every village with a population over 200 has one). If he finds one, and the instructor agrees to take him on as an apprentice (that is, if the DM™ agrees), his training includes the following steps:

1. The instructor gives the wizard a task to complete; for instance, he might ask the wizard to bring back a few pounds of spark stones from the Novularond, or count the number of eggs in a white dragon's lair.

2. If the character completes the task, he must spend an uninterrupted month in the village, listening to the instructor's lectures. If the adventurer abandons the village for even a day, he must begin his training again.

3. After a month of lectures, the instructor waits for an evening when the temperature falls to at least -50 degrees F. He takes the character into the wilderness, where he must remove his winter clothing (he can keep on a light shirt and one pair of trousers, but winter boots, gloves, and coats aren't allowed). The character sits in the snow, holding the instructor's hands, and staring into his eyes. The instructor's gaze and touch provides some-but not complete—protection from the cold. The adventurer must remain in this position for 10 hours.

Every two hours, the wizard must make both an Intelligence check and a Constitution check. If he fails an Intelligence check, he's lost his concentration; the training is over. If he still wants to be an anagakok, he must start again with Step 1. If he fails a Constitution check, he takes 2-12 (2d6) hit points of damage. Raining can be abandoned at any point (for instance, he might abandon it if he thinks one more failed Constitution check will kill him); if he does, he must start again at Step 1 if he still wants to be an anagakok.

4. If the character passes all of his Intelligence checks and doesn't die from failed Constitution checks, he sprouts fur and acquires the abilities and limitations of an anagakok. Lost hit points are recovered normally.

The Angulutians

The Angulutians are a nomadic people whose fate is inexorably linked to that of their caribou herds. The caribou supply all the needs of the Angulutians, including meat to eat, milk to drink, and hides to wear. When the caribou flourish, so do the Angulutians. When the herds suffer, Angulutians die.

Angulutian tribes seldom exceed a few hundred members, the largest being the Hupiik Angulutians with a population of 800. All tribes maintain their own caribou herds, which range in number from a few dozen head for the smaller tribes, to the Hupiik herd of nearly 3,000. The larger tribes—those with at least 200 members—maintain permanent villages, mainly in the northern and eastern sections of Angalpuk where the forests are thickest. These villages are called skotuk, a term referring to both the human residents of the villages and their caribou. A migrating herd and their human herders is called the iskotuk; the group of humans and animals left behind when the iskotuk migrates is called the aiskotuk.

Angulutians spend the winter in their villages, when freezing temperatures and layers of thick permafrost make it difficult for caribou to graze. During that time, the herds remain in the woods, surviving on whatever vegetation they can scrape from beneath the snow.

Migration begins in the spring and continues throughout the rest of the year; one complete migration—that is, the period from early spring through late fall when the herd is away from the skotuk—is called an ikili. During an ikili, the herd wanders across the plains of Angalpuk, grazing on weeds and lichen, moving about 10-20 miles per day. Meanwhile, the skotuk is nearly deserted, except for mothers with young children, the elderly, and the infirm. Most able-bodied men and women travel with the herds, fending off predators and steering the caribou to plains and hills where the permafrost is relatively thin. Calves are born in summer, requiring more work from the herders, who must care for the new animals (for instance, force-feeding calves that won't nurse) and brand them (by clipping patterns in the ear, or carving grooves in the hooves). In the fall, the herds begin the long journey home. Breeders are sorted from the meat animals. The meat animals are slaughtered, the breeders retire to the woods, and another cycle of seasons comes to an end.

Physically, the Angulutians are indistinguishable from the Iulutians, except their skin is slightly darker. The Angulutians aren't as trusting as the Iulutians, most likely because of lingering memories of the Keryjek Wars, which started with a surprise Iulutian invasion. Still, strangers who are friendly and patient with the Angulutians find them to be honest, dependable, and virtuous.

Social Order

Like the Iulutians, Angulutians have no formal governments. Each skotuk is a self-contained unit responsible for regulating the behavior of its members. Larger shotuk maintain five-kiam iqumelum chosen by consensus. During an ikili, three kiam travel with the iskotuk, while two kiam remain with the aiskotuk.

There are two officials unique to the Angulutians:

Pimataung. This is an elderly man or woman who's participated in at least 20 ikili. The pimataung travels with the iskotuk and makes all decisions regarding herd maintenance and management. She decides the route, when it's time to move out in the morning and stop for the night, and whether an injured caribou must be destroyed. The most respected member of a skotuk, the pimataung is nominated by the iqumelum, then approved by a voice vote of all adult villagers. A pimataung holds the office for life, or until illness or injury forces retirement.

Iniagok. The Angulutian equivalent of a morale officer, the iniagok is responsible for organizing recreational activities, composing songs and stories, and generally keeping spirits high. Most skotuk have two iniagok; one travels with the iskotuk, the other remains with the aiskotuk. The iqumelum selects the most outgoing, creative, and optimistic villagers to be iniagok.

Angulutians promote communication and peaceful relations by observing koatulit, sukkiruchit, and tupa, much like their Iulutian neighbors. Koatulit guests are invited to travel with the iskotuk, though some opt to stay with the aiskotuk. Iniagok are popular koatulit guests, since they are sources of new stories and dances. In recognition of the Keryjek Wars, many koatulit involve the exchange of residents between Iulutian and Angulutian villages. Sukkiruchit, on the other hand, are held exclusively in Alpuk; there aren't any skotuk large enough to host such elaborate festivals.

Laws Angulutians maintain order by honoring custom, not written law. Customs are intended to promote families and minimize conflict. Angulutian customs regarding child care, marriage, inheritance, ukeu, and hunting are similar to those of the Iulutians.

Unlike the Iulutians, Angulutians observe strict social rankings, and they are expected to honor and defer to those of higher status. Status rankings follow a rigid order:

1. Pimataung
2. Kiam
3. Tuiskotuk (adults who have participated in more than one ikili)
4. Ituiskotuk (adults who have participated in more than one ikili, but who are unable to participate in any more; ituiskotuk includes mothers with infants, the elderly, and the infirm).
5. Aituiskotuk (adults who have participated in only a single ikili)
6. Iniagok (if the iniagok has participated in a single ikili, his status is increased to aituiskotuk; if the iniagok has participated in more than one ikili, his status is increased to tuiskotuk)
7. Kaituiskotuk (those who have yet to participate in an ikili, including children)
8. Ukeu

Angulutians consider status violations extremely offensive, on par with theft or assault. Status violations, directed at a person of higher rank by a person of lower rank, include insults, failure to comply with requests, and failure to offer assistance. Persons guilty of status violations may make appeals to the iqumelum, but in absence of overwhelming evidence in favor of the accused, the iqumelum almost always rules for the person of higher status.

Other customs provide ethical guidelines specifically for iskotuk. For instance:

- All members of an iskotuk must obey the orders of the pimataung even those from different iskotuk.
- Each iskotuk has its own brand, called a wakiak. All caribou must wear their iskotuk's wakiak on their hooves or ears. Once applied, no one may alter or otherwise tamper with a caribou's wakiak.
- Wild caribou encountered during an ikili must be checked for wakiak. Caribou with a wakiak must be returned to the iskotuk from which they wandered. If the iskotuk of a lost caribou can't be located, the finder must care for the caribou until the next sukkiruchit, where he is to inform the ahtsukk. If the true owner fails to claim the lost caribou at the sukkiruchit, the finder may keep it.
- Each iskotuk is allowed a favored pasture, called an ujju an area of roughly 10 square miles. Pimataung inform one another during the annual sukkiruchit of their ujju intentions for the coming year. Iskotuk claim their ujju by marking old horns (which caribou shed annually) with their wakiak and scattering them over the pasture area of their choice at the beginning of a new ikili. The claim is valid for one full year.

Other iskotuk may pass over an ujju but may not graze there. Exceptions are made for emergency grazing and honest mistakes.

Angulutians guilty of any violation—including assault, theft, and hunting and status violations—are punished by death, usually by stoning or drowning. Iskotuk violators are left to die of exposure. Because punishment is certain, crime is minimal; the thought of being abandoned on a freezing plain in the middle of nowhere is enough to make an iskotuk herder think twice before tampering with a wakiak. Innocent parties are occasionally executed, but it's a price the Angulutians are willing to pay to keep the peace.

Architecture

Angulutian villages consist of clusters of single-family snowhouses, a few multiple-family snowhouses, quaggi for feasts, and ukujik for butchering animals. The iskotuk build temporary snowhouses during ikili, but snow of sufficient density isn't always available; the permafrost plains that make for good grazing aren't always thick enough to make snow blocks.

For that reason, the iskotuk carry folding tents called rissik. A rissik consists of from four to eight ribs, 3-5 feet long. Leather cords secure skins to the ribs. The rissik opens like an umbrella, the ribs imbedded in the ground, forming a dome-like tent with a flat roof. When not in use, the rissik collapses into a bundle. A bundled rissik is relatively light in weight; an adult caribou can easily carry a half-dozen.

Rissik ribs are made of thin, flexible lengths of wood or bone. The covering consists of two layers of caribou skin. The skins are arranged so that the furry sides touch each other, creating a pocket of air; the pocket of air stays warm to provide extra insulation. The skins are stretched as tightly as possible over the ribs to make sure the air pocket remains open.

Pitching a rissik involves the following steps:

1. Select a campsite. The worst sites are those in areas of freshly fallen snow, or next to hills or mountains. Snow can drift from a bank or blow off a mountain to completely bury the rissik during the night. At best, the camper must spend the morning digging himself out; at worst, he risks suffocation. The best sites are in forests or on thick ice, where drifting isn't as much of a problem.

2. Dig rib holes. These should be about four to 6 inches deep, slightly wider than the diameter of a rib. Usually, a knife or hukek (a spike made of bone) is sufficient to dig holes, but if the ground is especially hard, the tool may have to be heated first. Some Angulutians carry a tool called a tihukek, a hollow bone which is placed upright on the ground where the rib hole is to be dug. The camper pours a little boiling water into the tihukek which thaws the ground, making it easier to dig.

3. Secure the ribs. Unfold the rissik, insert the ribs in the rib holes, and smooth out the covering. Pack the holes with snow, then pour water over the packing. The water freezes the ribs in place.

4. Build a windbreak. Even on open plains, campers risk being buried by drifts, especially if it snows during the night. To prevent this, the camper should build a windbreak about 6 feet away from his rissik, facing the direction of the wind. The windbreak should be a wall of snow or ice about 2-3 feet tall, forming a 180 degree arc. The windbreak is doused with water to freeze and strengthen it.

5. Check the roof. A separate section of skin, called a sarissik, serves as the roof of a rissik. The sarissik must be secured to the top edge of the rissik with leather cord, leaving an opening a few inches wide for ventilation.

6. Construct a bed platform. Rissik bed platforms, made of ice blocks and covered with skins, are identical to those in snowhouses. If ice blocks aren't available, snow or branches can be used.

7. Light a lamp. Light a small lamp or cooking pot of blubber inside the rissik to warm the air. To prevent sparks from igniting the walls, the fire must be covered with a uliririssik, a bowl-shaped lid of bone or stone perforated with holes.

Though rissik aren't as warm as snowhouses, the interior of a well-constructed rissik can be as much as 30 degrees warmer than the outside.

Other Structures

Minikitak. In areas of thin permafrost and plentiful vegetation, iskotuk construct temporary houses of wood and earth called minikitak using many of the principles of snowhouse design. Construction begins by securing four wooden poles in the ground to form a square, then placing branches across the top. More branches are leaned against the frame to make walls, and balanced on the top to form a roof. The camper then digs a tunnel outside the house that leads into the interior. Finally, snow, loose dirt, and ice chunks are piled against all four sides until it forms a layer about 5 feet thick at the bottom and a foot thick near the top. If the roof is strong enough, the camper piles dirt and snow on top to a depth of about 6 inches; if the roof is weak, he must make do with more branches and a thinner layer of snow. He leaves a small opening on the roof for ventilation, then enters the minikitak by crawling through the tunnel.

Viit. This is a type of make-shift rissik, used for emergencies or when there aren't enough regular rissik to go around. To construct a viit, the camper locates a pair of flexible branches about 7 or 8 feet long. He secures both ends of one branch in the ground to form an arc, then secures the second branch perpendicular to the first, forming the frame of a dome. He wraps a long cord around the bottom of the frame so the branches don't snap up, then covers the frame with whatever skins and blankets are available. He piles a few inches of snow around and on top of the frame (not too much; this type of frame can't support much weight), leaving an open space for a doorway and a hole near the top for ventilation.

Clothing

Angulutians wear layered snow suits similar to those of the Iulutians, made almost exclusively of caribou hide. Because the iskotuk spend a lot of time on foot, they pay special attention to the design of their boots, lining them an extra layer of soft fur (usually rabbit or fox) and covering the bottom with a scraped and notched layer of caribou hide for extra traction. Where Iulutian parkas are rounded, Angulutian parkas come to a point on top; this is a cultural preference with no particular significance.

Transportation

Angulutians don't travel much by water—there are few sizeable lakes or streams—but travel extensively on land; an Angulutian may journey more than 1,000 miles during an ikili. Special sleds facilitate land travel; a few sleds use dogs and kupuk, but most are pulled by caribou.

Jakerek. The most common type of caribou sled, the jakerek is designed for one caribou and a single passenger. Comparable to an Iulutiu ikaap, the jakerek is a 5-foot-long platform of wood or layers of dried skins with a long cord connecting the platform with the caribou. The rider sits on the platform with his legs extended. A vertical board covered with fur provides a backrest.

Uhkerek. This transport sled is similar to a jakerek, but about twice as large, using two caribou as pullers. The platform is box-shaped, the sides about 3 feet high. Seal skins cover the bottom of the platform, greased with blubber to reduce friction. Uhkerek usually haul supplies, but can also be used to carry up to three passengers.

Lakerek. The fastest caribou sled, a lakerek resembles a kayak with reins. One passenger squeezes herself in the opening in the top of the sled, which is made of dried skin stretched over a wooden frame. The passenger holds a long pole called a pilakerek to provide balance.

All caribou sleds use the same type of harness, consisting of a hide collar around the animal's neck connected to a leather cord that runs beneath its stomach. The cord loops through a hole in the front of the sled, where it's secured in a tight knot. A leather rein attaches to the antlers. Some sleds have an extra caribou or two tied behind them. The extra caribou are used to relieve the lead caribou and also to prevent the sled from getting ahead of the lead caribou when going down inclines.

Caribou don't make good pack animals because they won't tolerate heavy loads on their backs; pile on more than 100 pounds, and a caribou refuses to move. Still, caribou make themselves useful in villages by transporting small amounts of food and other supplies from house to house, giving rides to children, and even serving as babysitters; babies rest in fur-lined baskets secured across a caribou's back with leather straps. They are gently rocked to sleep while the caribou wanders around the village.

HUNTING

Because Angulutians get most of their food from animals they raise themselves, they don't do as much hunting as the Iulutians, and consequently their hunting skills aren't as sharp. The Iulutian inuksuk technique for hunting caribou was originally developed by the Angulutians, though the Angulutians rarely use it themselves. Many Angulutians, however, are reasonably good marksmen, using bows and spears to hunt birds, fox, and other small game.

A typical Angulutian hunting party is armed as follows: 50% bows (used mainly with ekaa), 25% spears, 15% ritik, 5% luqu and harpoons (assortment of unungak, artengak, and naulagak), and 5% garnok. About 50% of the hunters also carry iuak.

Food

Virtually every day of their lives, Angulutians eat caribou meat-boiled, stewed, smoked, dried, or raw. Fish, birds, deer, and other game sometimes supplement the meals, but caribou remains the staple. Angulutian chefs soak caribou hide in boiling water to make broth, and crack open bones to get the marrow, which is eaten raw or added to soups. Caribou milk, thick as cream and sour-tasting, is drunk directly, made into cheese, or mixed with snow to make a treat for children.

Economics

Gold and gems aren't valued by the Angulutians, whose economy is based on trade. Caribou effectively function as currency: a caribou calf has a value of about 100 gp, a mature caribou about 200 gp, and a proven male breeder is worth 2,000 gp or more. Caribou trade is brisk among skotuk, as is trade in clothing, sleds, and tents. Trade with the Iulutians usually takes place during sukkiruchit, as business meetings are hard to arrange during ikili.

Religion and Magic

Angulutians adhere to the principles of qukoku, but with so much time devoted to raising caribou, they place less emphasis on qukoku rituals than the Iulutians. For instance, liqukoku feasts are seldom held, while fewer than half of Angulutian children receive the utqukoku ritual. Opoqukoku and equkoku, however, are observed meticulously, as the Angulutians share the Iulutians' respect for the dead.

A ritual unique to the Angulutians is the taatquoko, a celebration held at the beginning of each new ikili. All adults gather with the herd outside the skotuk, clapping and singing as the tuiskotuk don taatquoko masks and perform a special dance. The taatquoko masks have two faces connected by hinges; the outer face resembles a caribou, the inner face, that of a human. Flipping the masks back and forth symbolizes the bond between caribou and humans.

Anagakok are scarce among the Angulutians; there may be one or two in skotuk of 200 or more residents. Anagakok usually accompany the iskotuk on ikili. The few Angulutian priests tend to be devotees of Ilmater (called Itishikopak by the Angulutians).

The Nakulutians

The Nakulutians are the smallest and most reclusive of the Ulutian races, living in tiny, isolated settlements in the most rugged areas of Nakvaligach. There are only a few thousand Nakulutians in all, and settlements of more than 100 are rare; Kresttet, with a population of about 300, is by far the largest.

The Nakulutian distrust of strangers borders on paranoia. They keep to themselves, remaining within a few miles of their settlements and seldom venturing out of Nakvaligach. Not only are the Nakvaligach suspicious of outsiders, they are distrustful of each other. Though conflicts between villages sometimes flare into violence, such incidents are rare and brief. Living in the harshest region of the Great Glacier, the Nakulutians must devote all of their time and resources to survival; even war is a luxury.

Nakulutian villages are miserable places. With chronic shortages of skins and building materials, the people look shabby, the homes dilapidated. Food is always at a premium. Villagers fall prey to starvation, disease, and predators. White dragons and frost giants who share the Nakvaligach mountains terrorize villages with periodic raids. Compared to the Nakulutians, Iulutians and Angulutians live lives of privilege and comfort.

Unlike the Iulutians and Angulutians, the Nakulutians are deeply religious. Their devotion, however, is directed to a god that the Iulutians and Angulutians don't believe exists. The ancestors of the Nakulutians interpreted the writings of Ulutiu as sacred truth; their faith is based on the belief that Ulutiu will someday rise from the depths of the Great Glacier to reclaim the faithful and punish the heathens. Beyond this basic tenet, however, the Nakulutians haven't been able to agree about much else; each settlement has its own prayers and its own interpretation of Ulutiu's holy commandments, which accounts for much of the Nakulutians' distrust of each other.

Physically, Nakulutians are identical to other Ulutians, though because of their squalid living conditions, they tend to be hollow-eyed and thin.

Nakulutians are sullen, withdrawn, and soft-spoken. Their first inclination when encountering strangers is to run; their second is to attack and kill, especially those whom the Nakulutians consider to be unredeemable blasphemers. Nakulutians have no interest in proselytizing—that's up to Ulutiu himself—but they demand respect for their beliefs.

Social Order

Nakulutian villages are autocratic. Each has its own ruler called the urit whose word is law. Two or three lieutenants, called yaaurjt, enforce the urit's orders. A urit can be either male or female, but is always a priest of 2nd level or higher (in smaller villages, 1st level priests sometimes serve as urits). A urit selects her own successor when she reaches the age of 50, usually—but not always—one of her yaaurit. Should the urit die before she turns 50, the oldest yaaurit automatically becomes the new urit.

Though her edicts are often harsh, even cruel, the urit is rarely motivated by self-interest. She sees herself as a humble servant of Ulutiu, doing her best to interpret Ulutiu's will and carry it out. Since residents believe that the urit receives guidance directly from Ulutiu, they are compliant and uncomplaining, which makes for an orderly—if somewhat staid—society.

As interpreted by most urit, the edicts of Ulutiu comply closely with the social customs elsewhere in the Great Glacier. Rules of conduct regarding family life, personal property, and hunting rights are similar to those of the Iulutians. The Nakulutians maintain rigid social rankings like the Angulutians, and status violations are considered punishable offenses. Nakulutian status rankings, from best to worst, are as follows:

1. Urit
2. Yaarurit
3. Married or widowed adults (men and women have equal status)
4. Unmarried adults
5. Children
6. Ukeu

The Nakulutians also have a special set of edicts called kaiurit that vary from village to village and change from year to year. On the first day of spring, the urit calls an assembly of the entire village (called an iurit) and declares that the kaiurit for the previous year are no longer valid. He then announces the coming year's kaiurit, consisting of two or three new rules of conduct that the villagers are expected to follow,

Exactly how a urit determines the year's new kaiurit remains a matter of speculation. It's known, however, that for a month prior to the iurit, the urit spends each evening in isolation, praying and meditating. Whether kaiurit come to the urit in dreams or visions, or whether he makes them up himself based on his best guesses of Ulutiu's desires, the kaiurit are understood to have a divine basis. To outsiders, kaiurit seem baffling and arbitrary, but to the Nakulutians, they are sacred and indisputable.

Here's a list of typical kaiurit. The last two are especially disruptive:

- Citizens are forbidden to eat fish.

- No fires can be lit outside.

- The status ranking changes; for instance, ukeu are ranked just above married adults, or married women are ranked higher than married men.

- A certain species of animal, such as polar bears or ice toads, can't be hunted or killed for any reason. One of these animals is kept in a pit in the center of the village. Villagers are required to keep it fed and happy, and must bow as they pass.

- All adults must wear a painted symbol, such as a moon or a bird, on their foreheads at all times.

- Citizens are forbidden to wear a particular fur, such as fox or wolf.

- At sundown, each adult must toss a handful of meat into a crevasse as an offering to Ulutiu.

- Citizens are forbidden to look at the urit.

- Citizens are forbidden to cut down trees within a 5-mile radius of the village.

- A policy of jyykach takes effect; all heathens are to be killed on sight. According to jyykach, heathens are defined as all non-Nakulutians.

- A policy of vaakach takes effect, where a particular syllable of a name is declared sacrilegious. All residents with the vaakach syllable must undergo ykulutik (trial by ordeal, see below), as must all strangers with the syllable. (For instance, if the vaakach is "um," those named Ekum, Umpak, and Rinum Starshaker all must undergo ykulutik.) As with the Iulutians and Angulutians, punishment is swift and certain in Nakulutian villages, but it isn't necessary fatal. All Nakulutian crimes—including status and kaiurit violations—are subject to ykulutik, a form of punishment where Ulutiu determines guilt or innocence. Simply put, if the accused survives the ykulutik, it's assumed that Ulutiu found him innocent; if he dies, he must have been guilty.

Ykulutik varies from village to village, but the most common forms include:

Akykulutik. The accused is sealed in a cave with a polar bear, wolf, or other predator. If the accused kills the predator or escapes, he's innocent.

Huykulutik. The accused is tied to a tree. The village's best archer, as determined by the urit, paces off a number of steps equal to the number of vertebrae in a fish (caught by a yaaurit). The archer gets one shot; if he misses, the accused is innocent.

Reykulutik. The accused is placed in a 10-foot-deep pit. A small bird in a cage is placed beside the pit. The cage door is opened. Five men pelt the accused with rocks or ice chunks until the bird flies away; if the accused survives, he's innocent.

Ipiykulutik. The accused's hands are tied behind his back and a long cord is tied to his feet. The cord is secured to the edge of a crevasse, and the accused is dangled inside the crevasse, head first for a full day. If the accused escapes or survives, he's innocent.

Nakulutians don't participate in koatulit or sukkiruchit, nor do they practice tupa.

Architecture

Most Nakulutians live in snowhouses similar to those of the Iulutians. In some mountainous sections of Nakvaligach where the permafrost is thin enough to give easy access to the rocks below, Nakulutians build houses of stone called ceenach. Ceenach are constructed like snowhouses, except that stones are used instead of ice blocks. Stones aren't cut to shape; builders use whatever stones they can find, stacking them to form walls and using snow to fill the cracks.

The floor plan of a ceenach resembles that of a snowhouse, complete with a tunnel entrance, bed platforms, and wall linings (the corners of skins are poked between the rocks and plugged with snow). The roof, however, is flat, not dome-shaped, covered with branches and a layer of snow. Windows are usually made of stretched skin instead of ice; seal intestines, translucent and durable, make good window panes.

In villages with ample supplies of stone, Nakulutians construct stone quaggi and ukujik, along with two other structures unique to Nakulutian culture:

Biknach. Used for meat storage, a biknach consists of four stone pillars, a wooden platform resting atop the pillars, and stone walls forming a square building atop the platform. The elevated biknach discourages animals from getting to the stored food.

Ugunach. The ugunach is a 1-foot-wide stone stairway of five steps, ending at an open square platform about 3 feet per side. Nakulutians stand on the platform to offer prayers to Ulutiu. Ugunach are usually constructed near the perimeter of a Nakulutian village, but may be as much as a mile away. Travelers discovering a ugunach can be sure that a Nakulutian village is nearby.

Clothing

Nakulutian parkas, trousers, mittens, and boots resemble Iulutian clothing, except that fox, wolf, and bear skin are used instead of seal or caribou. Nakulutian parkas are rounded like Iulutian parkas.

Transportation

Since Nakulutians seldom stray far from home, they don't have much use for land or water vessels; when they want to go somewhere, they walk. Larger Nakulutian settlements have a few dog and kupuk sleds, and kayaks aren't unusual for settlements near the Uppuk River. Because of Nakvaligach's rough terrain, caribou sleds are impractical.

Hunting and Food

Nakulutians must hunt constantly for food, which is always in short supply in the barren mountains of Nakvaligach. There are no seals, and caribou are hard to come by, forcing Nakulutians to make do with what's available. Deer, birds, fish, and polar bear are eaten boiled, dried, or raw.

By necessity, Nakulutians have become skilled hunters, particularly with bows and garnok, the weapons of choice for bringing down birds and fleet-footed deer.

A typical Angulutium hunting party carries the following weapons: 40% bows (using a mix of ekaa and trukaa), 40% garnok, 10% spears, 5% ritik, and 5% iuak.

Economics

Nakulutiums don't use currency, and with few exceptions, trade is confined to residents of the same village. Certain kaiurit allow trade with outsiders, though on occasion, an urit overrides an existing kaiurit that prohibits trade with strangers if the strangers carry goods that the village needs.

Magic and Religion

All Nakulutiums are followers of Ulutiu. Their ethos encompasses principles similar to those of qukoku, with a few differences:

- No person is the superior of another, with the exception of the urit and yaaurit, who are Ulutiu's representatives in this world.

- By decree of Ulutiu, animals share the same emotions, thoughts, and morals as people. For reasons of his own, Ulutiu compels animals to express these characteristics differently. Because animals are children of Ulutiu, they must be respected. Disrespect of animals risks the wrath of Ulutiu.

- People and animals have a life essence called pokulu. When they die, their pokulu passes on to Ulutiu and becomes part of him.

Nakulutiums don't follow the Iulutium qukoku rituals, with the exception of opoqukoku (which the Nakulutiums call wypokulu) and equkoku (called yupokulu) to ensure safe passage of the pokulu.

To remain faithful to Ulutiu, his followers are required to observe the following tenets:

- Obey the urit and yaaurit.
- Follow the kaiurit.
- Offer a silent prayer to Ulutiu three times per day (usually at dawn, midday, and sunset: the prayer-giver covers her eyes with her hands and turns his head to the sky, remaining silent for about a minute).

Villages of 100 members or less have two or three priests, rarely higher than second level. In villages of 100 or more, as many as 5% of the population are priests; about half are second level or higher. Nakulutium priests are similar to normal clerics, except they have major access to all spheres other than elemental, necromantic, plant, and sun; they may not cast spells from these spheres. All Nakulutium priests are followers of Ulutiu; no other faith is tolerated.

Urit are always fourth level or higher priests; yaaurit are at least second level. Urit have the following granted powers:

- Total immunity to the effects of cold, including cold-based spells and other magically-generated cold effects (unlike the hair-covered anagakok, the urit retains his normal appearance).

- Laying of hands, similar to the paladin ability, except the urit's touch causes damage instead of healing (2 points per level; victims who successfully save vs. spells suffer half damage). The ability may be used once per day.

Wizards are considered blasphemous; the few wizards existing in Nakulutium villages keep their abilities to themselves. Anagakok are unknown in Nakulutium society.

"If a traveler becomes wet, he should dry himself immediately near a fire to prevent chilling. If a fire is not available, he can dry his clothes by wearing them; his body heat dries the clothes in about two or three days, providing he remains indoors and stays standing as much as possible. Contact between clothing and another surface, such as the ground, inhibits drying. If removed and not exposed to fire, wet clothing can take up to three weeks to dry."

Part Four: Flora and Fauna

"The young of most animals are indifferent to men. It is experience that teaches them fear."

—Inum

Compared to the rest of the Realms, the animal and plant life of the Great Glacier is extremely limited due to the frigid temperatures and the sameness of the habitats. There are no reptiles or amphibians, no insects to speak of (aside from some tiny aquatic spiders and a few robust types of cockroach), and a limited variety of birds and fish. Elves, gnomes, and halflings are unknown.

Only the hardiest species have been able to adapt to the hostile environments of the Great Glacier; some of the more common are discussed below. Statistics are given for creatures not included in the Monstrous Compendium.

Caribou

The caribou is a type of wild deer found mainly in the plains of Angalpuk. Angulutians maintain herds of a thousand or more caribou, which provide nearly all of a tribe's food and clothing. Wild caribou also roam the hills and mountains of Alpuk and Nakvaligach, but these herds seldom exceed a hundred head. Caribou meat is a favorite among all Ulutiuns, as is caribou hide, a versatile material for making parkas, tents, and sleds.

A caribou resembles a cross between a reindeer and a moose, with arching antlers, wide hooves, a long snout, and a thick coat. Caribou of the Great Glacier are usually brown or gray, but white caribou have been seen grazing near the southern mountains of the Angsaas Chain. An adult caribou weighs 600 pounds or more, and stands about six feet high from hoof to head.

Caribou eat lichen, shrubbery, and any other type of vegetation they can scrape from beneath the snow and ice. They are among the favorite game of wolves, tirichik, white dragons, and other predators. Docile and skittish, caribou defend themselves with their antlers only when cornered or their young are threatened. (Caribou: Int animal; AL N; AC 7; MV 21; HD 4; #AT 2; Dmg 1-4/1-4; THAC0 17; SZ L; ML 3; XP 120.)

Frost Giants

Several small colonies of frost giants exist in the Novularond, a typical colony seldom consisting of one or two dozen giants. Hateful and suspicious, the giants are hostile to all other races, and are especially belligerent towards anyone trespassing on a colony's territory; unfortunately, a colony's territorial boundaries shift from year to year, subject to the whims of the colony's current jarl or shaman. Certain colonies have been known to claim the entirety of Novularond as their own, a claim inevitably challenged by rival colonies, resulting in territorial wars that can last for decades.

The frost giants have a long-standing feud with the Innugaalikurit stemming from a 1952 weapon theft by the dwarves. The conflict was settled when a contingent of Innugaalikurit agreed to become the slaves of the giants (descendants of these dwarves are slaves today) but tensions remain high, and occasionally erupt into all-out wars that spill over into Iulutiu settlements in Alpuk.

In times of scarce game, frost giants mount expeditions into Alpuk to hunt for tirichik, their favorite meat. If the hunting is poor, the giants raid Alpuk and Nakiialigach villages to steal food and whatever else catches their fancy.

Innugaalikurit

Aside from the Ulutiuns, the Innugaalikurit (arctic dwarves) are the only humanoid race native to the Great Glacier. Amiable and peace-loving, the Innugaalikurit live in modest villages in the Novularond, though a few Innugaalikurit settlements are scattered through out the Keryjek Ridge and in the highlands of Alpuk. Unlike their cousins elsewhere in the Realms, the Innugaalikurit have little interest in mining or crafts, instead devoting themselves to hunting, raising children, and—most importantly—leisure. Innugaalikurit enjoy long vacations spent roaming the plains and mountains of the Great Glacier in search of new places to sunbathe. (See the Appendix for details.)

Kupuk

The loyal pack animals of the Great Glacier kupuk (also called walrus dogs) are raised domestically in Ulutiun villages, but packs of wild kupuk are occasionally encountered on the plains of Alpuk and the lowlands of the Lugsaa Chain. Kupuk are valued for their skills as sled pullers and hunters, as well as their affinity for human children.

Though wild kupuk defend themselves viciously if attacked, they usually approach strangers with curiosity and openness. Strangers may earn the trust of wild kupuk by feeding them or tickling their tails; befriended kupuk may accompany the strangers for the duration of their journey providing companionship and protection. (See the Appendix for details.)

Remorhaz

The tunnels of remorhaz (polar worms) penetrate the entirety of the Tuutsaas, Lugsaa, and Angsaas Chains, a testament to their dominance of the mountain ranges separating the Great Glacier from the rest of the world. Since the remorhaz are eager to feast on trespassers, they serve as unofficial gatekeepers, discouraging natives from leaving the Great Glacier and outsiders from entering.

A species of remorhaz unique to the Great Glacier is the Opoboquo remorhaz, found only in the Opoboquo Valley of the Keryjek Ridge. The Opoboquo remorhaz is 10 feet long and light green in color. It isn't big enough to swallow victims whole, nor is its body heat strong enough to melt weapons (though creatures touching its back protrusions suffer 2-20 points of heat damage). Otherwise, it's identical to the normal remorhaz.

Angulutiuns hunt Opoboquo remorhaz to make jakerek. The creature's chitinous shell remains warm indefinitely after its death: though the shell isn't warm enough to start fires or heat a snowhouse, it makes a superb frame for a jakerek, as it melts the snow below it, enabling the sled to scoot along a thin layer of water. A jakerek made from a opoboquo shell moves 50% faster than a normal jakerek. (Opoboquo remorhaz: Int animal: AL N; AC overall 0, head 2, underbelly 4; MV 12; HD 5; #AT 1; Dmg 2-12 (bite); SD touching its back protrusions cause 2-20 points of damage; THAC0 15; SZ L; ML 13; MR 75%; XP 650).

Seals

Seals thrive in the icy waters of the Lugalpgotak and Nakalpgotak Seas. In any season, they can be seen chasing birds and fish, diving from snow banks, and languishing on icebergs. Seals are the primary game animal for the Iulutiuins, providing meat, blubber, and skins.

Great Glacier seals have thick brown fur, small cat-like heads, powerful flippers, and sharp teeth. They live in colonies of 10-100, usually located in coves surrounded by protective walls of ice. Females tend to remain in the coves with their young, while bull seals do most of the hunting for their families. Though playful and passive, angered seals can be quite vicious, attacking ferociously with their sharp teeth.

Three unusual species of Great Glacier seal are the scoop seal, the chatter seal, and the fanged seal. The scoop seal has long shovel-like appendages extending from its fins, enabling it to burrow in the snow to hide from predators. The chatter seal, recognizable from the sprinkle of white dots along its back, can perfectly mimic the sound of a human voice. The chatter seal has no conception of the words it says; it randomly repeats overheard phrases. The fanged seal resembles a normal seal, except that it is slightly larger and has a mouthful of razor-sharp fangs. It also has a nasty disposition, ruthlessly attacking any creature entering its waters. Fanged seals are found only in the Lugotak Sea. (Normal seal, scoop seal, chatter seal: Int animal; AL N; AC 6; MV 3, Sw 24; HD 2; #AT 1; Dmg 1-4; THAC0 19; SZ M; ML 8; XP 35. Fanged seal: Int animal; AL CE; AC 6; MV 3, Sw 24; HD 2 +2; #AT 1; Dmg 2d4; THAC0 19; SZ M; ML 10; XP 65.)

Sled Dogs

Sled dogs are valued companions of the Ulutiuns, second only to kupuk as quality pack animals and hunters. Thousands of sled dogs are scattered across the Great Glacier, most of them in Ulutiun villages, with a few living in wild packs of 6-24.

There are three types of sled dogs, distinguished by fur color and size. The largest and most common type is the white sled dog, or heteff weighing 100-150 pounds and found mainly in Alpuk. The black sled dog, the okteff, is native to Angalpuk; weighing about 60 pounds, okteff are often trained by the Angulutiuns to herd caribou. The rarest sled dog is the golden-furred mukteff of Nakvaligach, which weighs 80-100 pounds.

All sled dogs have short muzzles, bright eyes, and broad black feet. Their fur is several inches thick, enabling them to comfortably withstand the coldest temperatures. They are friendly, brave, and attentive. They are also quite strong; a team of six heteff can pull a sled carrying 1,000 pounds all day long, with only occasional stops to eat and rest.

Sled dogs eat any type of animal products, including organs, bones, and fat. Excellent hunters, sled dogs can sniff prey up to 10 miles distant, indicating the type of prey to their human companions by making distinct sounds; a series of short barks indicates small game (wolf or fox), a high, sustained howl indicates larger game (caribou or bear), and low, barely audible growls indicate exceptionally dangerous game (tirichik or white dragons). Sled dogs fight to the death to defend their human companions or protect their pups, attacking with their sharp teeth. (Sled dog: Int semi-; AL N; AC 7; MV 15; HD 2 + 2; #AT 1; Dmg 1-4; THAC0 19; SZ M; ML 10; XP 65.)

Tirichik

Next to white dragons, these immense centipede-like monstrosities are the most feared predators in the Great Glacier. They are mainly confined to the most desolate regions of Alpuk and Nakvaligach, lurking inside deep crevasses where they wait to ambush bear, wolves, wild kupuk and human travelers. (See the Appendix for details.)

White Dragons

The white dragon is the only type of dragon native to the Great Glacier. They occupy caves in the region's highest mountains, particularly in Nakvaligach and the southern portions of the Tuutsaas and Angsaas Chains. The scourge of the arctic, white dragons prey indiscriminately on men and beasts alike, favoring polar bears, caribou, and human travelers. They often terrorize Ulutiun villages, particularly in Nakvaligach, by attacking in flights of three or more, gobbling up villagers by the dozens and leveling snowhouses with violent slaps of their tails. When white dragons reach the end of their days, many of them cast themselves into the Shakkak Pit, a deep valley of fairy ice in northern Nakvaligach rumored to contain hundreds of white dragon corpses.

Yeti

Hundreds of years ago, yeti thrived in the Novularond, but incessant assaults from the frost giants eventually drove them out. Today, it's rare to encounter yeti in Novularond. Most of them now live in Nakvaligach, wandering the mountains in groups of six or less. Always on the verge of starvation, thanks to the scarcity of game in Nakvali-gach, yeti feed on any creatures they can catch, including humans, tirichik, and each other.

In the upper regions of Nakvaligach, a cadre of white dragons has formed an alliance with the local yeti. The dragons provide food for the yeti in exchange for their servitude. The dragons and yeti often engage in joint hunting expeditions and terror sprees; there is no sight more dreaded by the Nakulutians than a flight of white dragons with screeching yeti astride their backs.

A clan of gargantua yeti live in the easternmost peaks of the Tuutsaas Chain. These giant yeti stand 20 feet tall and have sky blue fur. They are fiercely territorial, preying on remorhaz and all other trespassing creatures. (Gargantua yeti: Int average; AL CE; XC 5; MV 12; HD 8 + 4; #AT 2; Dmg 2-12/2-12; THAC0 11; SZ H; ML 13 XP 975.)

Vegetation

Because of the short growing season, lack of precipitation, and frozen soil, the Great Glacier isn't a particularly fertile environment for plant life. Vegetation is confined to a few varieties of flowering weeds in the plains (timothy, chickweed, catspaw), occasional patches of ferns and shrubs, and lichens and mosses capable of growing on rocks in thin areas of permafrost. Small forests of willow, evergreen, and birch exist in Angalpuk (and to a lesser degree in Nakvaligach); these trees seldom exceed 10 feet in height.

Following are some of the more interesting types of vegetation unique to the Great Glacier:

Mikka. This is a black lichen found on the bottoms of stones near Alpuk streams. The crunchy lichen tastes like mint; Iulutians use it to flavor soups and stews.

Seal Berries. Found near the shores of the Lugalpgotak Sea, these are magical pea-sized berries the color and texture of seal shin. Though inedible, the berries make useful preservatives; a handful of berries scattered over 10 pounds of meat preserves the meat indefinitely, even through the warmest months of spring and summer.

Ring Moss. This rare silvery moss grows in tiny rings inside crevasses near the Lugsaaas Chain. When ground to a soft paste, the moss can be used to coat arrows or other weapons to subdue tirichik. (A tirichik successfully attacked with a weapon coated with ring moss must save vs. poison or lapse into unconsciousness for 2d4 rounds.) Ring moss paste retains its potency for 1-4 days after the moss is harvested.

Flame Heather. Found only in the mountains of Nakvaligach, this plant resembles a cluster of yellow and red feathers. Flame heather is highly flammable; one cluster (consisting of 2-4 plants, each about a foot tall) burns all night long, providing heat for a medium-sized snowhouse.

"(It is not necessary for the driver of a sled to determine when his dogs need to rest. Sled dogs seem to instinctively know when they have reached the limits of their endurance, or when poor weather, such as a bitter wind or an ice storm, poses risks to their health. In such situations, the dogs stop, curl up in the snow, and go to sleep. Until the dogs are finished resting or the weather changes, no amount of coercion will convince them to continue."

Part Five: Places

*"A village is only as livable as its surroundings.
We are caretakers not only of our homes, but of our world."*

—Inum

Visitors to the Great Glacier are invariably impressed with its eerie beauty and startling contrasts. Endless stretches of barren plains abruptly give way to towering mountain ranges, sliced by gaping crevasses and ice-clogged rivers. Sheer walls of ice snake for miles across the landscape like immense fences. Majestic swirls of drifting snow twist past monolithic glaciers, sparkling like diamonds in the cool light of the winter sun. Desolate, stark, timeless, the Great Glacier is like another world.

Ahtahqugotak Sea

Nearly 70 miles across at its widest point, the Ahtahqugotak is the largest body of water in Angalpuk. The Ahtahqugotak is about 75 feet deep, covered by a thick layer of ice in the winter, changing to platform ice in the spring, and nearly ice-free in the summer.

The Ahtahqugotak is perhaps the most scenic sea in the Great Glacier, its waters clear and calm, its shores thick with white birches and lush evergreens. Game fish thrive here, particularly polar cod, bloatfish, and black burners. The area is nearly predator-free, making it a haven for wild caribou, musk oxen, and birds of all varieties. Despite the abundance of game, most Angulutiuns shun the Ahtahqugotak, owing to its location in the Ibelgrak Valley, which is associated with a fever virus that claimed thousands of victims in the year 3010. There is no hard evidence, however, that either the waters of the Ahtahqogotak or its animal life are contaminated with the virus.

AHTITLAK

Race: Nakulutium Population: 170

About a thousand years ago, a small Nakulutium community in the foothills of Nakvaligach received a kaiurit from their urit commanding them to migrate south. According to the kaiurit, the journey would lead them to physical manifestations of Ulutiu, whom the Nakulutiums were directed to serve.

The Nakulutiums traveled all the way to the Lugsass Chain, where they discovered a lair of remorhaz in a vast cave near the base of a tall mountain of ice. Having never seen remorhaz before, the Nakulutiums presumed that the creatures were the manifestations described by the kaiurit. The Nakulutiums set up camp in the remorhaz lair. The remorhaz killed about half of the Nakulutiums, but the Nakulutiums persevered, offering food to the remorhaz and defending them against tirichik and other predators. Eventually, the remorhaz came to trust the Nakulutiums and allowed them to share their cave.

Over the following centuries, the bond between the Nakulutiums and the remorhaz continued to strengthen. The remorhaz accepted the Nakulutiums as companions, even risking their lives to protect them. In turn, the Nakulutiums provided food and water, built fires to keep their eggs warm, and applied poultices to their wounds. The Nakulutiums have also fashioned leather saddles that enabled them to ride the remorhaz. The bond remains strong to this day.

The Ahtitlak Nakulutiums don't build snowhouses or minikitak, instead living in the remorhaz cave, sleeping on wolf skin blankets circled around a communal fire. The brutish and distrustful Ahtitlak Nakulutiums feel no kinship with other Ulutiums or any other race. They patrol the area constantly, riding their remorhaz, ever alert for trespassers whom they attack without mercy.

Eghagu

Race: Iulutium/Angulutium Population: 180

A notorious village of outcasts and bandits, Eghagu is located about 30 miles northeast of the Shistak Pass in the Keryjek Ridge inside a 200-foot diameter stone ring, which provides concealment and protection. The walls of the ring are about 30 feet high; an opening in the northern section gives access.

Eghagu was established about 100 years ago when a group of Iulutiums from Lilinuk were banished for conspiring to assassinate the iquemelum. The group wandered east, where they encountered a band of Angulutiums exiled from Hupiik for tampering with a caribou herd's wakiak. The groups joined forces and built a small settlement of crude snowhouses which they used as a base for banditry, caribou rustling, and other crimes.

About ten years ago, a powerful anagakok named Dygah took over as leader of Eghagu. Exiled from Jukum for conducting magical research that inadvertently poisoned the village's water system, Dygah has vowed revenge on all Iulutium people. Thanks to Dygah, the crimes of the Eghagu have become much more ambitious. They pillage entire villages now, and they have trained kupuk and winter wolves as vicious attack animals, using them to ambush unwary travelers. Meanwhile, Dugah continues to plot against the Iulutiums.

Glacier of Ulutiu

This is a sheer wall of ice, rising 1,000 feet in height along the northern shore of the Uppuk River. Thousands of years ago, the glacier was about 300 yards long, but time has taken its toll, and only about 100 yards remain, the rest having broken off into the Uppuk and washed away. Intricate symbols are etched in the glacier, covering the entire surface. The symbols emit a dull red glow. The glacier radiates magic and is completely resistant to all types of natural and magical heat.

Ulutiu is responsible for the symbols and the enchantment. He used the glacier to record his thoughts, the history of the region, and details of his magical research. Any character using comprehend language or its equivalent can translate the symbols to learn the origin of the Great Glacier (paraphrase the information in the “Birth of the Great Glacier” section in Part One of this book).

Unfortunately, the most interesting sections of glacier have broken off and washed away; these sections are rumored to contain formulas for powerful spells, the location of Ulutiu’s treasure, and instructions for bringing Ulutiu back to life. The location of these missing sections is anybody’s guess; they may be buried beneath deep layers of snow further west along the Uppuk, they may have been collected by curious frost giants, or they may currently serve as walls of Innugaalikurit snowhouses.

Gomwemk

Race: Innugaalikurit Population: 450

Wedged in a narrow valley surrounded by towering mountains, Gomwemk has the most sizable Innugaalikurit population in the Great Glacier. It is also the site of the brutal Innugaalikurit-Frost Giant War of 1952.

Gomwemk is a modest collection of unadorned ceenach and snowhouses. A 10-foot-tall stone wall encloses the village to keep out frost giants, who despise the Innugaalikurit. As an additional deterrent, a 20-foot-wide trench surrounds the stone wall, filled with fairy ice to a depth of 30 feet.

The village is in fact a facade, a collection of empty buildings. Gomwemk residents are so fearful of frost giants that they long ago abandoned the village proper to live in caverns deep beneath the valley. Snowhouses near the perimeter of the village contain tunnels leading to the caverns below; ice blocks conceal the entrances to the tunnels. The tunnel system also winds beneath the stone wall and the fairy ice trench, opening to the surface several miles away from the valley. When the Innugaalikurit are low on food, bored, or in need of a sun bath, they use the tunnels to take them to distant locations in the Novularond, far from the threat of the frost giants.

A growing faction of the Gomwemk Innugaalikurit, who call themselves Surfacers, are getting fed up with their covert existence. The Surfacers are attempting to drum up support for abandoning the caverns and returning to the surface. If the frost giants attack, then so be it; the Surfacers are confident that they can defeat the frost giants if they can convince their Lulutiu friends in Gronne to help them. So far, Gronne has been less than receptive.

GRONNE

Race: Lulutiu Population: 550

Established nearly 2,500 years ago, Gronne is one of the oldest Lulutiu settlements. Located about 30 miles east of the Novularond, Gronne is a neatly kept village with orderly circles of snowhouses surrounding a cluster of quaggi. Many families maintain elaborate rock gardens near their snowhouses, featuring colorful stones collected from the Novularond.

Gronne residents are noted for their wisdom and insight. Representatives from other Lulutiu villages often petition the Gronne iquemelum to help settle disputes and evaluate civic proposals. The Gronne iquemelum refuse payment for their services, but graciously accept gifts of unusual stones to add to their rock gardens.

Gronne maintains a close relationship with the Innugaalikurit of Gomwemk. Even though the Gronne elders decided in favor of the frost giants when negotiating an end to the Innugaalikurit-Frost Giant War of 1952, the Innugaalikurit respect them for their integrity and honesty, and trade flourishes between the two communities. The elders of Gronne are among the few Lulutius who know that the Gomwemk dwarves have abandoned their village and now live underground.

Recently, a faction of Gomwemk Innugaalikurit approached the Gronne elders to ask for their support in standing against the frost giants, should a war between the dwarves and giants erupt again. The elders have so far declined, fearing that such a war could spill over into Angalpuk. A recent frost giant raid into Gronne, however, has changed a few minds; the elders may yet decide to ally with their dwarven friends to rid the area of frost giants once and for all.

Hupiik

Race: Angulutiu

Population: 800

Hupiik boasts the largest caribou herd in Angalpuk, and the residents are the Great Glacier's most skilled herdsman. From their cozy skotuk located about 50 miles west of the Angsaas Chain, bordered by a dense forest of willows and birch to the north and a clear stream of fresh water to the south, residents drive a herd of 3,000 caribou to Isenghak and back during an ikili.

Hupiik herdsman have developed sophisticated animal-handling techniques that have been copied by villages throughout Angalpuk. The Hupiik herd is divided into units called jiji, each consisting of 100-200 animals. A chief herder, called the ujiji, is responsible for each jiji, while the pima-taung oversees the ujiji. Six assistants, kaujiji, are assigned to an ujiji, along with as many additional herdsman necessary to control the herd. The ujiji rides an uhkerek behind the herd, and three kaujiji ride jakerek on either side of the herd.

A team of trained okteff (black sled dogs) keep the herd together and chase down strays. The herdsman use lassos to restrain wandering caribou and tie feed bags around the animals' necks to supplement their diets in sparse pastures.

The Hupiik wakiak is a series of three parallel lines notched in the animal's ear.

Hupiik residents are tight-lipped, serious-minded, and somewhat arrogant. They maintain friendly relations with other Angulutiu villages, though they seldom associate with them except during sukkiruchit.

Ibelgrak Valley

Low hills surround this shallow valley in the southeastern corner of Angalpuk, bordered to the south by the Lugsaa Chain and the east by the Angsaas Chain. Covered by only a few inches of permafrost, vegetation flourishes in the Ibelgrak like nowhere else in the Great Glacier, with thick forests of evergreen and willow trees, and lush meadows of timothy and chickweed. There is an abundance of game animals, especially polar hares, silver foxes, and musk oxen.

Though the Ibelgrak is a fertile hunting ground and an ideal pasture for grazing caribou Angulutiu shun the area, believing it to be disease-ridden. In 2010, hunters from outside the Great Glacier introduced a fever that proved deadly to Angulutiu and caribou, claiming thousands of victims before the carriers were isolated and destroyed. A few infected Angulutiu fled with their herds to Ibelgrak, where their descendents remain today.

Both the Angulutiu and caribou descendents still retain the dormant virus, evidenced by the dark warts that grow on their skin (the warts grow on the faces and hands of human carriers, and on the backs and legs of caribou carriers). Aside from the disfiguring warts, the virus has no other ill effects; over the centuries, the virus has become harmless. Other Angulutiu, however, don't believe this, destroying on sight any human or caribou carriers who stray from the Ibelgrak Valley. Consequently, the carriers (numbering about 75 humans and their herd of 200 caribou) are confined to the Ibelgrak, as they risk their lives if they leave. The carriers have no permanent settlement in the Ibelgrak, endlessly wandering the lush pastures and forests, longing for a cure to rid them of their disfigurement so they can become accepted members of Angulutiu society.

Igotak Sea

The largest body of water in Nakvaligach, the triangular-shaped Igotak Sea is frozen solid almost all year round. The surface of the Igotak is thick with fog, rising hundreds of feet in the air, completely obscuring the sea even in the brightest daylight. During exceptionally cold winter months, the fog rolling off the sea extends up to 50 miles in all directions, posing a serious hazard to travelers.

Ice covers the surface of the lake to about 10 feet; beneath the ice is about 40 feet of murky water; drinkable but bitter. The sea teems with crystal nippers, their corpses littering the shores like grains of blue sand.

Imajuvisik

Race: Iulutium

Population: 250

Located midway between the Umaylu Lake and the Lugsaa Chain, Imajuvisik is a small village of courageous hunters, specializing in tracking and destroying white dragons and tirichik. The residents pride themselves on their fitness, spending several hours each day engaged in rigorous physical training; adults have average Strength scores of 15 and average Constitution scores of 16.

Bands of Imajuvisik hunters roam across Al-puk, offering their services to Iulutium villages who hire them to get rid of troublesome predators; isolated communities, such as Puttak, are particularly eager clients. In times of scarce game, the hunters charge no fee, asking only for possession of the creature's carcass. Otherwise, to exterminate a tirichik, the hunters might ask for a pair of mated kupuk, 300 pounds of choice caribou meat, or a dozen seal skin clothing sets.

Imajuvisik hunters ambush white dragons and tirichik by tying a caribou or other game animal to a stake in the center of a small valley surrounded by high peaks. The hunters hide in the peaks until the creature is lured by the bait, then attack with a volley of spears, arrows, and garnok (sometimes using poisoned chips from the Umaulu Lake ice as ammunition; not only do these chips inflict 1-3 points of damage, the victim must save vs. poison, suffering an additional 2d4 points of damage if the check fails, and suffering half damage if the check succeeds; tirichik, however, are immune to Umaulu poison).

Because the Imajuvisik hunters spend much of their time traveling from place to place, they are privy to many of the secrets of the Great Glacier, including its dangers, its treasures, and the safest routes. They often share this information with strangers willing to participate in a tirichih or white dragon hunt, providing the strangers demonstrate their courage and skill to the hunters' satisfaction.

The village of Imajuvisik is a collection of small snowhouses, their walls reinforced with stones gathered from the Lugsaa Chain. Adjacent to the village is a large crevasse, about a mile long and nearly 100 yards wide. The Imajuvisik hunters dispose of the skulls of their kills in this crevasse to observe the opoqukoku ritual; regardless of where in the Great Glacier the hunters kill their prey, the skulls are always brought back to this crevasse. Hunters who fail to observe opoqukoku are confined to the village for six months.

Jukum

Race: Iulutium

Population: 1,200

Nestled on the southern shore of the Lugalpgotak Sea, Jukum is the second largest Iulutium settlement. Its people are pleasant and outgoing, eager to welcome friendly strangers.

The village is laid out in neat rows of snowhouses, surrounded by a circle of a dozen quaggi. The perimeter of the village is divided into four districts of approximately equal size. The north district contains a large pool of fresh water, which the villagers refill every week. Trenches lead from the pool and run parallel to each row of snowhouses, giving families easy access to clean water. The south district is reserved for gaming and open-air feasts, the west district for butchering animals (which includes a dozen ukujik), and the east district for sukkiruchit.

Unlike most Iulutium villages, Jukum actively encourages fine arts, particularly sculpture, poetry, and music. Elaborate ice sculptures of frolicking seals, harpoon-wielding hunters, and roaring dragons are found throughout the village. Children practice soothing tunes on bone flutes, and adult choirs perform lengthy story-songs at the end of communal meals. At the beginning of each month, the village holds a special poetry festival, open to residents of Jukum as well as other area villages: the Jukum iqemelum awards seal skin mittens, smoked meats, and other valuable prizes to the best poets.

Keryjek Ridge

The Keryjek Ridge is the longest continuous mountain range in the interior of the Great Glacier, stretching north from the Lugsaa Chain to completely separate Alpuk from Angalpuk. The peaks average 8,000-10,000 feet high, though some of the central peaks top 15,000 feet.

The Keryjek Ridge is perhaps the most beautiful natural feature of the Great Glacier. Fairy ice dusts the highest peaks, making them shimmer like rainbows on sunny days. Frozen lakes, as shiny as silver mirrors, fill the valleys, while ribbons of lush evergreens make delicate loops around the mountainsides.

Key features include:

Shistak Pass. The towering peaks of the Keryjek present a formidable barrier for those traveling between Angalpuk and Alpuk. To facilitate travel, representatives from Hupiik and Isenghack decided to construct a pass to link the two nations. Construction of the pass began 75 years ago and is only about 50% complete. The pass extends 10 miles from the west side and 10 miles from the east side, leaving about 20 miles of packed snow and ice in between. Travelers unfamiliar with the project are often surprised when the pass reaches a dead end, forcing them to go back the way they came. Bandits from Eghagu sometimes take advantage of the unfinished pass to ambush the unwary.

Makkitt Pass. The only natural pass in the Keryjek Ridge, the Makkitt is about 100 feet wide, winding through the mountains for about 50 miles. Its gentle slopes make it suitable for foot travelers, as well as dog and caribou sleds. Avalanches are common in the Makkitt, as are attacks from winter wolves.

Mt. Morrowikik. From a distance, the snow covering this 10,000-foot-high peak appears to be flecked with blue. As travelers move closer to the mountain, they may notice that patches of snow appear to be moving, undulating across the face of the mountain in random directions.

The peak of Mt. Morrowikik is made of solid turquoise, accounting for the blue flecks. The moving snow drifts are actually white puddings, which flourish on the mountaintop and number in the hundreds. It's rumored that some of the Mt. Morrowikik puddings are as big as icebergs, though there has been no reliable confirmation.

Ertyky Valley. This expansive valley is where the final clash between the Iulutians and Angulutians occurred in 1637, marking the end of the Keryjek Wars. Hundreds of warriors from each side died in the battle. To honor the fallen soldiers, the valley was made into an immense equkoku cemetery, filled with row after row of equkoku totems.

Opoboquo Valley. This narrow valley is the only known habitat of a rare and dangerous creature called the opoboquo remorhaz. (See the "Remorhaz" entry in Part Four for details.)

Kresttet

Race: Nakulutian

Population: 300

Kresttet is by far the most populous Nakulutian village, comprising dozens of crude ceenach haphazardly arranged in a barren valley of thick permafrost and rocky projections. Webs of crevasses lace the Kresttet valley, many of them 10-20 feet wide. Tremors regularly shake the valley, creating new crevasses and widening the old ones. Though the crevasses pose a constant hazard to the residents, the Kresttet kaiurit forbids filling in the crevasses or relocating ceenach to safer areas. As a safety measure, planks have been placed over the smaller crevasses, and makeshift bridges have been constructed over the larger ones; from a distance, the village resembles a patchwork of planks and cracks.

Except for polar hares, a few caribou, and patches of edible lichen, food is scarce in Kresttet. The nearest source of fresh water is a stream 10 miles to the north. Adding to Kresttet's misery are the periodic raids by frost giants and white dragons (who live in the mountains to the east and terrorize Kresttet for amusement more than food), and infestations of ice toads that surface from newly-formed crevasses.

The residents view Ulutiu as a vengeful, angry god, quick to punish his followers for lapses in faith. Pahjikok, the Kresttet urit, struggles to divine Ulutiu's intentions, resulting in a constantly changing set of kaiurit. A kaiurit requiring all residents to stay indoors during the daylight hours may be abruptly revoked a week later, replaced by a new kaiurit requiring them to stay indoors at night. The eating of particular foods may be sanctioned one day, forbidden the next. Among the few constants is a policy of jyykach; Kresttet residents attack and kill strangers on sight, tossing their bodies into deep crevasses. The policy is suspended only if the village has reached their jyykach quota for the month (which varies according to Pahjikok's latest proclamation).

Lilinuk

Race: Iulutiu

Population: 1,500

Lilinuk is not only the largest Iulutiu settlement, it's the largest human settlement in all of the Great Glacier. Located south of the Nakalpgotak Sea, Lilinuk is built on top of a broad plateau, about 150 feet high. Ramps of ice spiral around the plateau, giving access to the village from below. Because of its altitude, Lilinuk was spared by the Great Flood of 1790.

The industrious villagers of Lilinuk are perhaps the hardest working people in the Great Glacier. Snowhouses are replaced yearly. Kayaks and dog sleds are maintained in immaculate condition. Storage pits are kept filled with a year's supply of meat. Sled dogs and kupuk live in their own comfortable houses, called jtitip. A fleet of kayak and umiak are docked in an ice-free harbor near the northern foot of the plateau. Just outside the village, herds of musk oxen and caribou are raised in pens enclosed by ice block walls.

The villagers actively promote trade, and Lilinuk is noted for its well-organized and hospitable sukkiruchit. A large central section of the village is reserved for sukkiruchit, featuring five quaggi that always contain ample supplies of roasting meat to feed visitors, and a large double-domed building called a rewqugi filled with pits of burning blubber for visitors to warm themselves. Lilinuk is noted for its fine kayaks, sleds, and clothing, and Iulutiu flock from all corners of Alpuk to trade for these goods.

Lugalpgotak Sea

The Lugalpgotak is the largest body of water in the Great Glacier and the most hospitable to life. Nearly 200 miles wide and 800 feet deep, the Lugalpgotak is home to a wide variety of animals and fish, including thousands of seals and dozens of species of fish. The southern and western shores are flat and even, perfectly suited for the construction of snowhouses.

Numerous streams link the Lugalpgotak with most of the other major seas and lakes. Pack ice covers about 50% of the surface, with especially dense clusters near the center. In the winter, it's possible to cross the narrowest sections of the sea by jumping from floe to floe. Walls of barrier ice, hundreds of feet high, rise from the northern and eastern shores, acting as natural windbreaks to keep the waters calm and the temperatures steady. The Nakalpgotak's mineral salts are concentrated in the sea's eastern floor; for that reason, fresh water predominates in the western portion of the Nakalpgotak, while most of the eastern portion is salt water.

At the bottom of the Lugalpgotak is a 100-foot layer of rocks and debris. Beneath the rocks and debris is a layer of ice, 500 yards thick. Imbedded deep within this ice layer is the body of Ulutiu. The location of Ulutiu's body is not generally known by the Ulutiu, though some suspect that the body is somewhere beneath one of the Great Glacier's seas.

Lugotak Sea

Also known as the "Secret Sea," the Lugotak is one of the Great Glacier's most dangerous areas, and has claimed the lives of countless travelers. Located about 50 miles from the eastern border of the Tuutsaas Chain, and lying in the direct path of the Tuutsaas's only major pass, the Lugotak is totally concealed by a foot-deep layer of snow that continually blows off the mountains; even from a few yards' distance, the Lugotak is indistinguishable from the surrounding terrain. All year long, semi-solid platform ice comprises the surface of the Lugotak, which tends to crack under the slightest pressure. The sea is 10-12 to the bottom at the deepest point, and only 3-5 feet deep near the western and southern shores. Jagged spears of needle ice line the bottom of the sea, some of which rise about a foot from the surface. Travelers who fall through the platform ice risk impalement on the needle ice; those fortunate enough to avoid the needle ice often fall prey to the fanged seals thriving in the Lugotak's icy waters.

Mt. Akka

This is a 1,000-foot tall mountain of ice with a double peak, located at the southern tip of the Surykyk Range. The mountains of the Surykyk are thick with wild kupuk, who make nests and lay eggs in Surykyk caves and valleys. Mt. Akka is a favorite nesting place, as it consists of a number of caverns connected by winding passages that provide protection from predators. Though kupuk are careful to remove all traces of their nests after their pups are born, diligent explorers may discover shell fragments and infertile eggs buried in the snow.

Mt. Okk

At 12,000 feet, Mt. Okk is one of the tallest peaks of the Lugsaaas Chain. In 3691, a faction of evil wizards from Vaasa built a massive castle of ice near the northern foot of Mt. Okk, intending to use it as a base to develop powerful spells and bizarre monsters. Seven years later, a fissure opened and swallowed the castle. The fissure subsequently closed, and an avalanche buried it under tons of snow and ice.

Little would be known of the ice castle had it not been for a hunting team from Lilinuk who discovered the remains of a human explorer near Mt. Okk about 20 years ago. The human's body had been transformed into solid ice and his head removed. A journal identified him as a treasure hunter from Damara. The journal also revealed the following information about the castle:

- The castle is a labyrinth of corridors made from ice that resists all forms of heat. Blizzards, ice storms, and chilling winds blow up in the corridors at random intervals, from no apparent source.

- The wizards were devising a new type of cold-based magic. Details of the spells are kept in a vault of glowing ice somewhere in the depths of the castle.

- The bodies of the wizards are encased in giant icicles suspended from the ceiling of a circular chamber in the center of the castle. Their spirits roam the corridors to attack trespassers.

- Among the castle's guardians are headless ice zombies with their eyes in their chests and mobile snow drifts that swallow men alive.

After reading the journal, the Lilinuk hunters declined to investigate. To date, the journal information has yet to be verified.

Nakalpgotak Sea

The Nakalpgotak is an immense, hostile sea, bordered on the north and east by the mountains of Nakvaligach and the Keryjek Ridge, and linked to the Lugalpgotak Sea by a web of shallow streams. About 120 miles long, the Nakalpgotak is shaped like a bowl, the shores sloping at a 45 degree angle to the 700-foot-deep center.

About 75% of the surface is clogged with pack ice, including mile-wide icebergs as tall as mountains. Slush collects along the shores in patches hundreds of yards wide. Walls of barrier ice border the sea at irregular intervals, averaging about 100-200 feet tall.

In the summer and spring, melting snow from the adjacent mountains causes the Nakalpgotak to rise several feet. The unusually warm summer of 1790 resulted in massive floods, wiping out dozens of Iulutiu villages near the northern and eastern shores. Though the flood affected a few Lugalpgotak settlements as well, it decimated the Nakalpgotak villages. The Iulutians rebuilt most of the destroyed Lugalpgotak villages, while survivors of the Nakalpgotak migrated elsewhere. Only a few Nakalpgotak villages remain today, as the Iulutians are afraid of another Great Flood.

Because there are few humans competing for food, the Nakalpgotak thrives with polar bears, winter wolves, and other predators that feast on the abundant fish, seal, and game birds. Water near the shores is mostly fresh, and pools of fresh water can also be found in hollows of icebergs.

The Novularond

The Novularond is a cluster of towering mountains in the center of the Great Glacier. The range is about 250 miles long at its widest point, and interior peaks average 20,000 feet high. A honeycomb of passages winds through the mountains, which contain scattered deposits of gold, diamonds, spark stones (used to start fires), and other valuable gems and minerals.

The Novularond is relatively free of permafrost. Only about 20% of the mountains are covered with snow and ice. The rest are bare granite, except for a few sparse patches of evergreens and shrubbery. Most of the surface rock of the Novularond remains about 40 degrees, regardless of the air temperature. In the mountains' deepest recesses, it's rumored that the stone is as hot as fire. The entirety of the Novularond faintly radiates magic, though there is no obvious source of the enchantment. Aside from their temperature, the rocks have no special properties. Stones removed from the Novularond lose their warmth within 24 hours, becoming normal stones. However, if the stones are returned to the Novularond area, they become warm again.

The Ulutians have no explanation for the warm rocks of the Novularond, but there are several theories. Some believe the the core of the Novularond contains liquid fire, while others think that fire-breathing monsters live in the bowels of the mountains. In any case, the Ulutians have declined to build settlements in the Novularond, confining their visits to occasional hunting expeditions. The frost giants and the Innugaalikurit, who don't particularly care why the rocks are warm, are the only sentient races making their homes in the Novularond.

Unknown to the races of the Great Glacier, the deepest passage of the Novularond snakes east, ending at Ulutiu's ice barge, buried hundreds of yards beneath the Lugalpgotak Sea. When Ulutiu died, the necklace of Ulutiu transformed the passage into a magical conduit, absorbing heat from the area that was to become the Great Glacier and funnelling it to the Novularond, permanently warming the stones.

There are three distinct regions of the Novularond, each of which is described below.

Ipinovularond. This outer ring of mountains, about 15 miles wide, consists of peaks no higher than 5,000 feet. Fewer than 10% of the mountains are ice-covered. Wild life consists of musk oxen, caribou, and wild kupuk, though none are found in great number.

Esenovularond. This central ring is the broadest section of the Novularond. Its peaks tower 5,000-10,000 feet high and are 20% ice-covered. Rugged valleys and deep crevasses slice the terrain, and avalanches and rock slides are common. Frost giants and Innugaalikurit make their homes among these peaks, as do ice toads, yeti, and a few winter wolves.

Akanovularond. This central region is the most desolate region of the Novularond. The peaks of the Akanovularond rise to 20,000 feet, most of which are 30-40% ice-covered. White dragons lair in the highest peaks.

Olyniak Crevasse

Nearly 60 miles long at its widest point and dozens of miles deep, the Olyniak is the largest crevasse in the Great Glacier. Centered among the highest peaks in Nakvaligach, the Nakulutians revere the crevasse as a sacred landmark of Ulutiu, regularly tossing in offerings of meat and gems. A dim green light shines from the crevasse, visible only at night, which the Nakulutians take as proof of the crevasse's supernatural significance. (In fact, the light is natural, not magical, radiating from fluorescent minerals lining the walls about 200 feet down.)

Following an earthquake in 2338, a monster emerged from the Olyniak and consumed dozens of Nakulutiu worshippers before disappearing back into the crevasse. The survivors named the creature Ulfoq, and described it as a combination of a tirichik and a white dragon, hundreds of feet long, with golden fangs and wings of ice. The Nakulutiu presume that Ulfoq is an emissary of Ulutiu. It hasn't been seen since.

A long passage near the bottom of the Olyniak connects with a vast subterranean cavern network, linking it with the hollows inside the Novularond and Ulutiu's buried ice barge beneath the Lugalpgotak Sea. Ulfoq is indeed associated with Ulutiu, though the relationship remains a mystery; Ulfoq may be a guardian or an emissary, or a manifestation of Ulutiu himself. It's also possible that Ulfoq is only an illusion created by Ulutiu. The earthquake of 2338 might have caused the Nakulutiu to fall into the crevasse, leading the panicking survivors to mistakenly believe that their companions were eaten.

Puttak

Race: Iulutiu

Population: 350

Puttak is an isolated Iulutiu community located about 40 miles north of the Lugaas Chain, noted for its domesticated kupuk. Villagers capture wild kupuk in the Lugaas Chain and in the mountains about 50 miles west of the village, then bring them to the village for training. Kupuk are treated like equal members of the community, sharing food and living quarters with Puttak families, even meriting their own equoku cemetery on the east side of the village. Puttak kupuk are well-behaved, loyal, and healthy. They are highly prized by Ulutiu elsewhere in the Great Glacier who regularly make the long pilgrimage to Puttak just to trade for these animals.

To warn of approaching predators, the villagers have built a series of signal stations called obii, spaced around the village in concentric circles about 50 yards apart. The obii resemble ice towers 20-50 feet high, each containing a villager (called an ejobii) armed with a bell made of bone and wood (called a jakobii). When an ejobii spots a predator, he rings his jakobii, alerting the other ejobii who then begin to ring their own jakobii. The villagers respond by herding the kupuk mothers and pups into caves and underground tunnels. For additional protection, the villagers pay retainers to Imajuvisik hunters, who visit Puttak two or three times a year, exterminating any predators they can find (retainers are paid in kupuk).

Puttak villagers observe a birth ritual that acknowledges their special relationship with kupuk. When the oldest daughter of a family is within a week of giving birth (Puttak midwives are able to determine dates of birth with uncanny accuracy), she, her mother, and a few close friends journey to Mt. Akka. The woman gives birth in the Mt. Akka caverns, a favorite kupuk nesting area. Should a kupuk hatch in the caverns on the same day that the baby is born, the villagers take the kupuk pup back to Puttak and raise it with the baby as a member of the family.

Shakkak Pit

This is a 300-foot-deep valley surrounded by jagged mountains in northern Nakvaligach, filled to the top with fairy ice. White dragons use the Shakkak Pit as a graveyard. The dragons are born with an instinctive knowledge of the Shakkak Pit and fly here when death is imminent. The pit contains hundreds of white dragon skeletons, along with a variety of treasure items the dying dragons have brought with them.

Three centuries ago, an evil anagakok attempted to animate the dragon skeletons, which he intended to use to steal treasure from the living white dragons of Nakvaligach. The plan backfired, and the animated skeletons killed him. Several animated skeletons are rumored to still exist in the depths of the pit.

Umaylu Lake

The sprawling Umaylu is only a few feet deep, more closely resembling a vast puddle than a lake. The water is dirty and stagnant, due to the prevalence of bacteria and decaying organic matter (animals who drink from the Umaylu often die on the spot and drop into the water). Dissolved minerals, which seep from cracks in the lake floor, keep the water odorless but enhance its toxicity.

Characters or creatures who drink the Umaylu water must save vs. poison. A successful save means the victim loses 2-12 (2d6) hit points. Victims who fail their saving throws die within 1-2 days unless neutralize poison or a similar treatment is administered. Additionally, those who fail their saving throws automatically lose 1 hit point per hour until the poison is negated. Characters wading across the Umaylu or otherwise coming in contact with it lose 2-8 (2d4) points of damage; a successful save vs. poison results in half damage.

The Umaylu is dotted with pingos, 10-100 feet in height. The dull green pingos are made of frozen lake water, which acts as a contact poison. Characters who touch an Umaylu pingo suffer the same poisoning effect as if they had drunk the Umaylu water. The hunters of Imajuvisik use ice chips from the Umaylu Lake as ammunition for their garnok.

The Umaylu is poisonous to all creatures except tirichik, who find it quite refreshing. Tirichik often lounge in the Umaylu, rolling in its water to soak their entire bodies. Tirichik that spend three or more hours soaking in the Umaylu absorb the lake's poison into their flesh. The resulting contact-poison effect lasts for the next 24 hours. Poisoned tirichik are identifiable by the slight greenish tinge covering their bodies.

Uppuk River

This is the mightiest river of the Great Glacier. It spans hundreds of miles and serves as a natural barrier between the plains of Alpuk and the mountains of Nakvaligach. The Uppuk runs from the Nakalpgotak Sea, and snakes west; major tributaries link the river with the Lugotak Sea to the south and the Igotak Sea to the north.

The Uppuk River averages 1-10 miles wide and 20-100 feet deep. Pack ice clogs about 50% of the surface, increasing up to 75% in the winter, and decreasing to 20% in the summer. Its sloping banks, piled high with slush, cut deeply into the permafrost, angling about 45 degrees in some places and creating nearly vertical walls in others. Occasionally, pack ice collects in bends in the river to form temporary dams, causing slushy water to spill over the Uppuk's banks. At two points on the Uppuk, natural bridges of ice arc from the south bank to the north, allowing travelers to cross the river without entering the icy water. The ice bridges average about 100 feet wide, and rise about 20 feet from the surface of the river.

The river teems with fish, among them spiny sleepers, icetails, and whitefish. Fish are particularly abundant in the spring and summer, when many schools migrate from the Lugalpgotak to spawn.

Utui

Race: Angulutium

Population: 600

Located in an area of dense pine forests and rolling hills in eastern Angalpuk, Utui is a sprawling community of herders and craftsmen. The Utui herd numbers about 1,500 caribou; the ikili follows a route west to Emequ, north to Hupiik, then home. The Utui wakiak is a small circle with a dot in the center, carved into the animal's hoof.

Utui families are quite clannish, and don't associate much with one another, except as required to care for the community caribou herd. Each family lives in its own large minikitak. Minikitak of different families are separated by at least 100 feet. Though tupa is encouraged, each marriage is mourned for weeks by the family of the bride (married couples live with the groom's family). Violent clashes between Utui families are rare, but they compete ferociously in the creation of craft items. Not surprisingly, Utui boasts some of the finest clothing, weapons, rissik, and jakerek in all of the Great Glacier. Visitors can win the hearts of an Utui family by praising their craftsmanship (a sufficiently flattered family will often lower the price of their goods), but this tactic invariably offends the other families in the village, who snub the visitors for the duration of their stay.

Some Smaller Villages...

Following are some of the Great Glacier's smaller villages, sorted according to race. None of these villages have populations exceeding 200.

Angulutiun

–Emequ: Following a poor caribou season, residents are experimenting with musk oxen herds.

–Isenghack: Village of skilled healers, specializing in the care of animals.

–Yiggat: Disease recently wiped out most of their herd. Leaders are planning to steal caribou from migrating herds or other villages.

Innugaakalikurit

–Patatak: Lazy, sluggish dwarves who do little but sunbathe and sleep; they raise rabbits for food so they don't have to hunt.

–Snokkok: Unlike most Innugaakalikurit, the residents love hunting and combat, and are eager to hire on as mercenaries for any purpose.

Iulutiun

–Ebyuluich: Noted for monthly gaming festivals, featuring tinguang and other gambling games.

–Fudok: A small village of skilled fishermen built on an iceberg.

–Gotokok: The site of an annual sukkiruchit exclusively for trading weapons. It always attracts a sizable number of Innugaakalikurit.

–Hykopgruk: Skilled boatmakers, specializing in kayak. They are currently working on a new type of boat made entirely of ice.

–Koyoss: The villagers raise quality sled dogs, including heteff, okteff, and mukteff.

–Saichik: A venerable white dragon with a star-shaped birthmark on its forehead recently killed the son of a kiam. The village has vowed revenge.

–Tukk: Poor hunters, desperate to trade clothing and weapons for meat; travelers can often get good bargains.

–Vekkak: The iquemelum has developed techniques for predicting the weather with uncanny accuracy.

–Yinntut: A village of ukeu who migrated from Lilinuk and Alpuk after receiving permission from their respective iquemelum to establish their own community. Old prejudices persist, however, and other villages are reluctant to trade or associate with Yinntut.

Nakulutiun

–Jajam: Their minikitak are made of turquoise slabs; by kaiurit decree, residents are ordered to kill anyone who tampers with the minikitak.

–Siksuv: Both the urit and yaaurit recently died from eating tainted meat; the citizens are desperate for leadership.

–Ukurewok: A ghost town. Citizens abandoned the village as directed by a kaiurit; it's now occupied by ice toads and other vermin.

–Wertikak: A hostile, violent village led by the egomaniacal Tukurshuk, who believes himself to be the son of Ulutiu.

...And Some Smaller Lakes

These lakes average five to 20 feet deep. Excessive mineral concentrations in the salt water lakes make the water unpotable.

Fresh Water

–Nukqup Lake: Dissolved minerals make the lake appear pitch black. The waters are bitter, but harmless; there are no fish.

–Risvak Lake: Abundant with all varieties of fish; characters have twice their normal chances of catching some.

–Taak Lake: Only 10 feet deep, frozen solid most of the year.

–Ullu Lake: Favorite fishing spot for polar bear.

Salt Water

–Akpahlurik Lake: Oil seeps from cracks near the southern shore, which may be collected from the surface of the lake and burned as furl.

–Nyu Lake: Bordered by ring moss, the only place outside the Lugsass Chain where this moss grows.

"When traveling in the Great Glacier; it is better to eat the food of the natives than food from home. Native food is filling, better prepared, and best suited for the nutritional requirements for life in extreme climates."

–Palus Frohm

Part Six: Personalities

"What distinguishes a good man from a bad one may be something as simple as a circumstance of birth, or as complex as a lifetime of thoughtless choices."

—Inum

The following are several of the Great Glacier's more interesting personalities, intended for the DM to use as NPC encounters with player characters. The NPCs may be used as sources of clues and information, adversaries, guides, or springboards for adventures.

Character races are listed after their names, along with the villages or areas in which they are most likely to be encountered.

Armor? What Armor?

Though a few Iulutians have experimented with armor made of remorhaz shell and tirichik hide, the vast majority forego armor altogether, finding it bulky and impractical in the harsh environments of the Great Glacier. Instead, they wear layers thick fur that provide them with an AC of 8 (hunters and explorers) or 9 (nearly everyone else).

Player characters may wish to think twice about wearing heavy armor when visiting the Great Glacier. Not only is there a risk of rusting (it's hard to keep snow and ice out of armor, which then may melt from body heat), it may also be awkward (for instance, walking through deep snow drifts could be difficult).

Dygan

9th-level human male wizard (Iulutian anagakok): Str 6, Dex 9, Con 14, Int 16, Wis 16, Cha 14; AL NE; AC 9; MV 9; hp 33; THAC0 18; #AT 1; Dmg

1-4 (staff); SA and SD as for anagakok; SZ M; ML 11, Spells: 4/3/3/2/1

Where Found: Eghagu

The brooding, bitter Dygah is perhaps the most powerful anagakok in the entirety of the Great Glacier. Exiled from his native Jukum 10 years ago for poisoning the village water system, Dygah is now the absolute ruler of the thuggish people of Eghagu. Though he masterminds kidnappings, robberies, and other crimes for his adopted community, he considers such activities trivial and barely worth his time; he cooperates only to ensure the loyalty of his followers.

Dygah seeks revenge for his curt dismissal from Jukum; the poisoning of the water system, he maintains, was an accident (though in fact, Dygah was experimenting with hypnotic additives that he hoped would force the villagers to appoint him to the iqumelum). When his pleas for justice in neighboring Iulutiu villages fell on deaf ears, his bitterness grew to encompass all the Iulutiuans of Alpuk. He intends to decimate Alpuk, though so far a viable plan has eluded him.

Recently, Dygah came in possession of a chunk of the Glacier of Ulutiu which not only described the origin of the Great Glacier, but also indicated the location of Ulutiu's body. According to the chunk, a subterranean passage in Novularond leads to the body, which is located in an ice cavern hundreds of yards beneath the Lugalpgotak Sea. Dygah is now making plans to journey to Novularond and search for the passage. If he finds the passage, he plans to follow it to Ulutiu's body and remove the magical necklace, which will cause the Great Glacier to melt, destroying the hated Ulutiuans. While the flood waters wash over the Iulutiu villages, Dygah intends to remain safe in the highlands of the Novularond.

Dygah is grotesquely fat, with beady green eyes, a perpetual sneer, and soft white fur covering his entire body. He rides in a jakerek stolen from a band of Angulutiu hunters, pulled by a team of four loyal winter wolves that obey his every command (Dygah rescued the wolves as pups from the jaws of a tirichik). He carries a birch staff, which he believes gives him good luck (it has no actual magical properties), and wears a white loincloth made from yeti skin.

Commonly Used Spells

Following are some of the spells favored by Great Glacier magic-users.

Anagakok:

- 1st Level: change self, feather fall, jump, light, magic missile, sleep, unseen servant
- 2nd Level: deppockets, levitate, scare, strength, whispering wind
- 3rd Level: fly, gust of wind, haste, invisibility 10' radius, water breathing
- 4th Level: charm monster, enchanted weapon, polymorph self
- 5th Level: airy water, fabricate, hold monster

Nakulutiu Priests of Ulutiu:

- 1st Level: cure light wounds, detect poison, endure cold, locate animals or plants, invisibility to animals, purify food and drink
- 2nd Level: charm person or mammal, enthrall, hold person, resist cold, slow poison, speak with animals
- 3rd Level: create food and water, locate object, prayer
- 4th Level: cure serious wounds, control temperature 10' radius, divination
- 5th Level: animal summoning, commune, commune with nature, control winds, cure critical wounds

Sharra Frohm

5th-level human female warrior: Str 12, Dex 11, Con 15, Int 13, Wis 16, Cha 11; AL LG; AC 8; MV 12; hp 45; THAC0 16; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (iuak); SZ M; ML 11.

Where Found: Mountains of Nakvaligach

A robust, solidly-built woman about 40 years old, Sharra Frohm is the great-great-great granddaughter of Palus Frohm, the author of Blood and Ice, the definitive Great Glacier survival guide. Twenty years ago, Sharra left her home in Bluestone, a small village near the Frozen Forest, embarking on an expedition into the Great Glacier to continue her ancestor's work. She plans to write Volume Two of Blood and Ice, focusing on the treacherous Nakvaligach region, an area that Palus was unable to finish studying before his death. Sharra has just begun her third decade of research on the book, a project that she expects will take the rest of her life to complete.

Sharra has bright blue eyes, plump cheeks, and an easy smile. A pair of loyal hetteff, named Mom and Pop, pull Sharra's dog sled, which is loaded with thick bundles of notes and frozen slabs of wolf meat, Sharra's favorite food.

Always on the move, Sharra may be encountered anywhere, though she spends most of her time in or near the mountains of Nakvaligach. Strangers find Sharra to be open and friendly, with a dark sense of humor (spotting a frost giant corpse with a spear in his belly, she might remark, "Now what do you suppose got into him?"). Her knowledge of the Great Glacier is vast; she knows the customs of most villages, where to find fresh water, and which crevasses are likely to contain tirichik. She freely shares this information, but only with those she trusts; the quickest way to earn her confidence is to help her gather new data for her book (for instance, Sharra might share information with strangers who help her map an unexplored cavern system, or assist her in measuring the skull of a sleeping yeti).

Inum

5th-level human male warrior (Iulutium): Str 8, Dex 7, Con 9, Int 17, Wis 15, Cha 15; AL LG; AC 9; MV 6 (reduced due to injury); hp 38; THAC0 16; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (iuak); SZ M; ML 12.

Where Found: Gronne

A revered kiam of Gronne, Inum is among the wisest men in all of Alpkuk, known for his judiciousness, perception, and intellectual acumen. Iulutians from hundreds of miles away travel to Gronne for the express purpose of listening to Inum's lectures, which cover everything from kayak design to poetry technique to the components of a successful marriage; there seem to be few topics for which Inum lacks an insight or opinion. He is a compelling storyteller, a compassionate counselor, and a devout believer in the principles of qukoku.

Inum is nearly 70 years old, and is becoming increasingly feeble with every passing year. He has few teeth, and his face is etched with deep wrinkles. Bouts with disease have left him with rattling lungs and rubbery muscles, and a run-in with a polar bear resulted in a crippled left leg. Despite his handicaps, Inum remains high-spirited and optimistic, though he tires easily and is prone to coughing fits.

Inum has a deep faith in the innate goodness of all creatures, a belief that cynics consider to be hopelessly naive. For instance, aware of the growing tension between the Gomwemk Innugaalikurit and the frost giants, Inum wants to meet with the frost giants and appeal to their sense of fairness to leave the dwarves alone. The other Gronne kiam have pleaded with Inum to abandon this plan, insisting that the frost giants can't be trusted; they fear that Inum may be taken hostage—or worse. Inum stubbornly intends to approach the frost giants with or without his fellow kiam's permission.

Johmm

4th-level dwarf (Innugaalikurit) male warrior: Str 16, Dex 9, Con 16, Int 9, Wis 11, Cha 14; AL LG; AC 8; MV 6; hp 36; THAC0 17; #AT 1; Dmg 1-8 (eyklak bow); SA +2 to hit when using eyklak; SD immune to all natural and magical forms of cold; SZ S; ML 15.

Where Found: Gomwemk

Johmm is the leader of the Surfacers, a faction of Innugaalikurit in the subterranean community of Gomwemk who believe their fellow villagers should put aside their fear of the frost giants and move back to their homes on the surface. Not only is Johmm willing to confront the frost giants, he seems to relish the opportunity.

Johmm's hatred of the frost giant borders on the obsessive. Members of his family were among the dwarven slaves given to the frost giants as a condition of the 1952 peace treaty, and their descendents remain enslaved today. Johmm has solved to liberate the slaves, regardless of the cost.

Johmm is about 30 years old, bald, firm-jawed, and fair-skinned; he seldom indulges in sunbathing, which he considers to be a frivolous waste of time. Unlike most easygoing Innugaalikurit, Johmm is humorless and grim. Though Johmm's followers admire him as a dwarf of integrity and courage, the majority of Gomwemk villagers view him as a dangerous radical, who may draw them into a long and bloody war with the frost giants.

Kallak

3rd-level human female warrior (Iulutiu): Str 9, Dex 14, Con 14, Int 12, Wis 16, Cha 5; AL LG; AC 9; MV 9; HP 28; THAC0 18; #AT 1; Dmg 1d3 (garnok); SZ M; ML 11.

Where Found: Alpuk wilderness or Keryjek Range

Kallak is the 30-year-old daughter of Joqui, one of the kiam of Jukum. She is sensitive, affectionate, and personable. Despite these attributes, she is shunned by other Iulutians because of her appearance: her face is horribly scarred, the result of falling into a cooking fire when she was a toddler. Much to the consternation of her family, Kallak has been unable to attract a mate. With reluctance, Joqui has attempted ekotupa with neighboring villages, but there have been no takers so far.

Kallak feels degraded by Joqui's efforts to get her married. She sees no shame in living without a mate and has pleaded with her mother to leave her alone, but Joqui ignores her.

Six months ago, Joqui announced that a dowry of two kupuk, a new kupuk sled, and 200 pounds of seal meat would be given to anyone who would marry her daughter. The humiliated Kallak responded by stealing the family dog sled and leaving home in the middle of the night. Joqui has since sent out a number of search parties, but they have found no trace of her. Joqui promises a sizeable reward for anyone who returns Kallak; she remains determined that her daughter will take a husband.

Unknown to her mother, Kallak is on her way to the Ibelgrak Valley, a land rumored to be hospitable to outcasts. Kallak has heard that the valley is riddled with disease, but she prefers to take her chances there rather than continue living a life of degradation in Jukum. The resourceful Kallak continues to resist the efforts of her mother to bring her home; Jukum scouts recently tracked her to the Keryjek Ridge, but her exact whereabouts remain a mystery.

Luftuk

3rd-level human male warrior (Iulutiu): Str 9, Dex 10, Con 13, Int 11, Wis 12, Cha 13; AL, LN; AC 9; MV 9; hp 25; THAC0 18; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 + 1 (ritiik); SZ M; ML 10.

Where Found: Lilinuk

Luftuk is the best businessman in Lilinuk, perhaps in all of Alpuk. He is a skilled, no-nonsense negotiator with an uncanny ability to judge the quality of goods and the integrity of his trading partners. If there's profit to be made, Luftuk's sure to be involved—he organizes the Lilinuk sukkiruchit, arranges koatulit and ekotupa, finds work for kayak builders and tirichik hunters, and even compiles and distributes soup recipes. Luftuk is honest and straightforward, but he does nothing for free: he won't give directions to the nearest sea without asking for a pound of seal meat, and rumor has it that he refused to rescue a hunter sinking in a fairy ice pit because the hunter wouldn't give him his unungak.

Luftuk's only vice is his weakness for gambling. Wherever he goes, Luftuk carries a bag of tinguang dice, carved from dragon bone. After Luftuk strikes a deal, he often offers his trading partner a chance to gamble for the price. If Luftuk loses the tinguang toss, the item or service in question is free, but if he wins, the trading partner must pay twice the normal price. Luftuk has six muscular Iulutiu hunters on retainer to murder any business partners who refuse to honor their agreements and gambling debts.

Luftuk is about 50 years old, with a square jaw and oversized nose that looks like a bird's beak. He takes pride in his appearance, wearing spotless clothing of the finest quality. He is polite but blunt, his words flat and colorless. He taps his ritiik lightly on the ground when he wishes to emphasize a point.

Mafwik

3rd-level human male wizard (Iulutiu anagakok): Str 6, Dex 10, Con 14, Int 14, Wis 8, Cha 10; XL, LG; AC 9; MV 9; hp 11; THAC0 20; #AT 1; Dmg 1-3 (garnok); SA and SD as for anagakok; SZ M; ML 10. Spells: 2/1

Where Found: Jukum

Amiable, outgoing, and cheerful, Mafwik is a middle-aged anagakok with a restless mind and an eagerness to learn. He wears a tattered seal parka that has been patched and repatched countless times, and carries a leather bag of mikka from which he continuously munches.

One of the few anagakok with an interest in magical research, Mafwik's experiments seldom work out the way he planned. Among his creations are a magically-guided ice arrow (that tends to melt before it reaches its target), a magical parka guaranteed to keep the wearer warm in the coldest weather (except that the garment weighs about 200 pounds and radiates a stench that attracts predators), and a self-propelled kayak (good for about 10 minutes of use before it falls to pieces).

At last year's sukkiruchit, Mafwik traded a quiver of ice arrows to an Innugaakalikurit collector for a chunk of the Glacier of Ulutiu containing instructions for animating ice sculptures. Though the secrets for controlling the sculptures weren't included on the chunk—apparently, they were engraved on a section that had been broken off and lost—Mafwik figured he'd give it a try anyway and hope for the best.

A few weeks ago, Mafwik secretly attempted to animate an ice sculpture display on the outskirts of his village, an elaborate life-sized replica of two white dragons attacking a pair of tirichik. Mafwik completed the enchantment as best he could, but nothing happened. The disappointed Mafwik re-examined the instructions on the chunk and discovered that the enchanted sculptures would only become active when the temperature fell to -100 degrees. Jukum has not experienced temperatures that low in some time, but the iquemelum predicts an exceptionally harsh winter within the next year or two.

Mistukqu

3rd-level human male priest (Nakulutiu): Str 10, Dex 9, Con 13, Int 12, Wis 15, Cha 11; AL LG; AC 9; MV 9; hp 33; THAC0 18; #AT 1; Dmg 1-2 (tru-kaa); SZ M; ML 12. Spells: 2/1

Where Found: Isenghack

Mistukqu was originally a priest of Ulutiu in Wetikak until Tukurshuk, the village urit, announced a policy of vaakach, condemning all villagers with the syllable "tuk" in their names to be executed as heretics. Mistukqu renounced his faith in Ulutiu and fled east, eventually making his way to Lilinuk. During a sukkiruchit, Mistukqu met some Angulutiu representatives from Isenghack who were impressed with his knowledge of animal medicine, and promised him sanctuary in exchange for taking care of their caribou herd. Mistukqu gratefully accepted their offer.

Mistukqu now makes his home in Isenghack where he treats ill and injured animals not only for his adopted village, but for villages throughout Angalpuk. He is familiar with the anatomy, physiology, and behavior of nearly every animal native to the Great Glacier, and has developed an impressive number of potions, poultices, and salves to treat them. There is a 50% chance that Mistukqu has a treatment for any ailment or trauma that's caused damage to a particular animal (the treatments work as potions of healing, specific to a particular species). If no treatments are available, animals who heal naturally under Mistukqu's care regain hit points at the rate of 3-6 (1d4 + 2) per day.

Animals belonging to Isenghack residents are treated for free; the Isenghack iqemelum sets prices for treating animals of outsiders. The charge for a treatment might be several dozen pounds of meat, a bundle of seal skins, or a day's work constructing rissik.

Mistukqu is a shy, sad-faced man about 40 years old. He is uncomfortable around people, preferring the company of animals. He lives in a cluttered minikitak with an ever-changing menagerie of pets, which usually includes a wolf cub, a caribou calf or two, and a few sled dog puppies.

Najass

7th-level human female warrior (Iulutiun): Str 17, Dex 15, Con 16, Int 10, Wis 10, Cha 9; AL LG; AC 8; MV 9; hp 66; THAC0 14; #AT 1; Dmg 2d6 (two-handed iuak; see below); SZ M; ML 16.

Where Found: Imajuvisik

Najass is a master hunter, shrewd, strong, and fierce. Her wiry body ripples with taut muscles, and her hooded eyes are constantly alert. Adept with all types of weapons, she carries a ritiik and unungak strapped to her back, a quiver of ekaa slung over her shoulder, and a garnok tucked in her belt. Her preferred weapon is an oversized iuak carved from the backbone of a tirichik. Its point is covered with razor-sharp barbs, capable of inflicting 2-12 (2d6) points of damage.

Najass leads a group of forty Imajuvisik hunters called the White Claw. The group is in much demand by settlements all across Alpuk to exterminate troublesome predators. A determined, fearless fighter, Najass has an impressive number of kills to her record. She single-handedly killed a pack of winter wolves, and has been known to leap onto the backs of tirichik, wrap her legs around the writhing creatures necks, and stab them to death with her iuak.

Despite her success as a hunter, Najass lives in the shadow of her deceased father, Tarrik, who taught Najass her hunting skills and led the White Claw before he was killed in an avalanche. In the eyes of the White Claw, Najass can never match the prowess of her father; "She's good," they whisper, "but Tarrik was better." Najass is aware of the White Claw's opinion, and struggles constantly to prove herself. She's heard rumors of a venerable white dragon plaguing the village of Saichik and intends to track it down. Though he tried, Tarrik never managed to kill a dragon of that age: Najass is determined to succeed where her father failed.

Tukurshuk

4th-level human male priest (Nakulutiun): Str 17, Dex 15, Con 18, Int 15, Wis 14, Cha 15; AL CE; AC 8; MV 9; hp 33; THAC0 18; #AT 1; Dmg 1-3 (garnok); SZ M; ML 14. Spells: 3/2.

Where Found: Wetikak

Tukurshuk is the imposing, arrogant urit of Wetikak who claims to be the son of Ulutiun, a revelation he says came to him in a dream (although some suspect he manufactured the "revelation" to further his own ambitions). His kaiurit are designed to eliminate the weak (sickly and aged villagers are thrown into crevasses), encourage hatred of other races (extra meat is awarded for killing outsiders), and promote himself as a deity (all villagers are required to fall to their knees when he passes).

Tukurshuk plans to transform the Wetikak residents into an army of fierce warriors, then lead them on a conquest of Nakvaligach, slaughtering those who refuse to join him. When he completes his Nakvaligach campaign, he plans to attend to the eastern heretics—the Alpuk Iulutiuns—who must also be converted or exterminated.

At nearly six feet in height, Tukurshuk is unusually tall for a Nakulutiun, which he says is further proof of his divinity. He has narrow eyes, thin lips, and ringlets of black hair. He exercises daily by carrying ice blocks up steep mountain sides, which has made his body rock-hard and given him exceptional endurance.

Uhokkaki

6th-level human female warrior (Angulutiu): Str 14, Dex 12, Con 14, Int 12, Wis 16, Cha 14; AL LG; AC 8; MV 9; hp 50; THAC0 15; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 + 1 (ritiik); SZ M; ML 15.

Where Found: Hupiik or Angalpuk wilderness

Soft-spoken, kind, and compassionate, Uhokkaki is the highly-regarded pimataung of Hupiik, a position she's held for almost 30 years. Though in her late sixties, her face is wrinkle-free, her body strong and straight: only her head of thinning gray hair betrays her age. She has three fingers on her left hand, the result of a childhood encounter with a wolf pack that was terrorizing a caribou calf. Uhokkaki drove off the wolves and rescued the calf, but not before a wolf nipped off two of her fingers. In honor of her courage, the Hupiik adapted a wakiak of three parallel lines, representing Uhokkaki's wounded hand.

Unknown to her fellow villagers, Uhokkaki is going blind, the side-effect of a fall from a high cliff when she was scouting for stray caribou. Uhokkaki has kept her condition secret for fear that she will be ousted as pimataung and replaced by a younger tuiskotuk named Atatkiki. Though Atatkiki means well, Uhokkaki knows him to be incompetent; she believes his inevitable mismanagement of the herd will result in disaster for the village. Unfortunately, Atatkiki's appointment is virtually assured, as his father and two uncles are members of the iqumelum. Meanwhile, Uhokkaki desperately seeks a treatment to restore her vision.

Common Non-Weapon Proficiencies

If you are using the optional non-weapon proficiency rules, here's a list of the most common proficiencies of Great Glacier NPCs. The proficiencies are arranged alphabetically, not by character class, and are sorted according to race.

Angulutiu

- animal handling, animal lore, animal training, direction sense, endurance, fire-building, hunting, rope use, survival

Innugaalikurit

- appraising, bowyer/fletcher, endurance, local history, mountaineering, survival

Iulutiu

- dancing, direction sense, endurance, fire-building, fishing, gaming, healing, hunting, survival, tracking

Nakulutiu

- astrology, endurance, fire-building, herbalism, hunting, religion, survival

"If an Ulutiun makes the same comment two times in the course of a conversation, you can be sure he is trying to convey something of profound importance. If he says it three times, you can be sure that he believes he is speaking to an idiot."

—Palus Frohm

Part Seven: Snow Baby (An Introductory Adventure)

"Above all things priceless is the value of a single child."

—Inum

Snow Baby is an adventure for 3-5 player characters of level 5-7, with a total of about 20-25 levels for the entire party. The adventure is intended for first-time visitors to the Great Glacier, but it's okay if the adventurers have been there before—it will just be a little less challenging. Likewise, it's assumed that they know nothing about kupuk, but again, it's okay if they do—it will just be a little less fun.

Use Map 3 (Mt. Akka Area) for reference.

DM Notes

Movement. The adventure takes place in a region of the Great Glacier that is relatively clear and flat. As a rule of thumb, a typical character who is dressed for arctic weather and moderately encumbered can travel about 15 miles per day on foot; this allows for a few hours of light at the end of the day for building snowhouses or securing other suitable accommodations for the night.

Weather. The adventure begins near the end of spring. Except where indicated in the text, daytime temperatures average about 10 degrees F., and nighttime temperatures average -10 degrees. The sky is clear, and there is no wind.

Freezing. To determine freezing damage, the adventure uses the Arctic Endurance Ratings described in Part Two of this book. If the party takes common sense precautions, such as wearing warm clothing and staying indoors at night, they won't risk freezing damage, except where specifically indicated in the text. However, if our heroes do something stupid—for instance, if they refuse to wear the appropriate clothing or decide to take a dip in a freezing pond—penalize them ruthlessly until they wise up (consult the Arctic Endurance Ratings section in Part Two for specific penalties).

Time. Keep track of the passage of time on a piece of scrap paper. While it's seldom important to know the precise hour of the day, you need to know when night falls (and the temperature drops). For convenience, assume that day lasts 14 hours (from 6 a.m. to 8 p.m. and night lasts 10 hours (from 8 p.m. to 6 a.m.)

Incentive. If the characters drag their feet once they enter the Great Glacier, use any of the following as often as necessary to keep them going:

- Imply that the temperature is dropping; for instance, their faces may grow numb, their breath may turn to frost, or a frigid wind may begin to blow. Remind them that the colder it gets, the more danger they are in.
- They hear the howl of a wolf (or is it something else?) behind them. The more they linger, the closer the sound.
- Remind them of their mission (see the Player's Background section below); if they don't hurry, their friend may die.

Setting. The adventure begins in a dilapidated inn called the Frozen Finger, located in Ishe, a village of about 200 people a few miles south of the Great Glacier.

Player's Background

When you are ready to start, read the following to the players.

What are you doing here?

The walls are so rotten that the wind howls right through them. The ale's so foul that it tastes like it was dipped from a mud puddle. Surely the Frozen Finger must be the most dismal inn in all the Realms, though it's perfectly suited, you admit, for this dismal village. Who in their right mind would live in a place like Ishe, only a few miles from the Great Glacier? You shiver against the bitter cold and glance at the low-lives around you. At one end of the main room, a motley collection of grizzled trappers and drunken derelicts place bets on which of the dozen icicles hanging from the ceiling will fall first. Get me out of here, you think. I want to go home.

And then you remember why you came.

A few weeks ago, you received the terrible news that Jervin Wesselitt, a beloved family friend, had succumbed to a rare strain of fever plague. His doctors could do nothing but make him comfortable. The prognosis is bad, they said, shaking their heads. He hasn't much longer, maybe a year if he's lucky.

For the next month, you scoured the countryside, vainly searching for a remedy, until at last you found an elderly wizard in Bloodstone Village who said, yes, he'd heard of the plague, and yes, he thought he could cure it, but he'd need some kupuk eggs.

Kupuk eggs?

The wizard explained that the kupuk is a monstrous beast found only in the Great Glacier. It resembles a cross between a dog and a walrus and lays golden eggs. The wizard had never actually seen one; a colleague, now long dead, told him about the creature.

The wizard said that an explorer named Kahil Brogman might be able to help you find a kupuk. Kahil lives in Ishe, he said, a tiny village near the border of the Great Glacier. "He was an assistant to the great Palus Frohm. You have heard of him?"

Who hadn't? Palus Frohm was one of the greatest explorers who'd ever lived, the author of the legendary arctic survival guide Blood and Ice. If Kahil Brogman was half as knowledgeable as Frohm, you'd never find a better guide.

Last night, you arrived in Ishe and headed directly to the Frozen Finger, the village's only inn. Yes, Brogman lives here, said the innkeeper, but no, he's not around today. Out trapping, he said, back tomorrow. "I'll get the word to him. He'll meet you here in the morning."

Morning has since come and gone, and your patience is wearing thin. As you contemplate making the trip into the Great Glacier alone, the door swings open. In steps a stocky man about 50 years old, clean shaven and steely-eyed, with ruddy cheeks and a broad grin. He wears a bulky parka made of dirty polar bear fur, and carries a half-dozen dead weasels under his arm.

The man tosses the weasels on the bar.

"Here you go, Vurl," he says to the innkeeper. "Skin 'em up and keep a couple for your trouble." The innkeeper nods in your direction. "So them's the great explorers?" snorts the man. "Kinda scrawny, don't ya think? Looks like a stiff wind might blow 'em away."

The man roars with laughter, then makes his way to your table. "Nothin' personal, pals," he says, pulling up a seat. "Laughin' keeps you warm." He calls back to the innkeeper. "Vurl, fry up one of them weasels and bring it over here for my pals." He turns back to you. "Name's Kahil Brogman. What can I do for ya?"

The gruff and loud-mouthed Kahil Brogman tends to exaggerate his skills, but he has a solid reputation as a hunter and guide. If the party is skeptical about Kahil, assure them that they have used their own resources to verify his trustworthiness.

Kahil Brogman (4th-level fighter): Str 14, Dex 11, Con 15, Int 9, Wis 10, Cha 9; AL LG; AC 8 (thick furs); MV 12; hp 33; THAC0 17; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (iuak); SZ M; ML 14.

Kahil listens carefully to the party's story. When they have finished, he says, "You did the right thing by coming to me. I think I know where we can find you some kupuk eggs." If they ask him about kupuk, he says, "They're as big as horses, as mean as dragons. Nasty critters." (Kahil's information is second-hand; he hasn't actually seen one, though he pretends he has. Likewise, he has only heard rumors about the location of kupuk eggs; he hasn't actually been there himself.)

If they ask about his relationship with Palus Frohm, Kahil says his father helped Frohm write his book. "I heard it all when I was growin' up. Better than goin' to school." (This isn't true. Kahil's father didn't know Frohm. Kahil has never even read Frohm's book, but he pretends otherwise because it's good for business; whatever knowledge Kahil has about the Great Glacier has been learned from his own experience).

If the adventurers suggest recruiting a few Ishe residents to go with them, Kahil laughs, "Good luck, pals! There ain't a bigger collection of cowards anywhere in the Realms!" (All recruitment attempts are futile. Some residents are cowardly, the rest think the party are crazy for risking their lives in the Great Glacier and refuse to join them for any amount of money.)

Before their plans go any further, Kahil suggests they get the matter of his fee out of the way. "I want 100 gp," he says. "Payable in advance." The fee is non-negotiable, though Kahil accepts goods of equivalent value (he's particularly fond of weapons). If the group doesn't have the money, Kahil reluctantly gives them a break (he's sympathetic to their situation. "My grandpa died of a fever plague," he says, wiping a tear from his eye). He takes what they have, then says they can owe them the rest. "Don't let it get around. Bad for my reputation.")

When the fee is settled, Kahil says they should relax for the rest of the day, then meet here in the morning to go over their route. "In the meantime, you better scrounge up some better clothes. You don't wanna freeze to death your first day out." Kahil tells the group to talk to Vurl the innkeeper, who fixes them up with suitable clothing. "Stay in the Finger tonight," he says, "it's as good as you're gonna get in Ishe. Besides," he whispers, "I'll see that you get a good deal." (Kahil calls in a factor from Vurl so that the group gets room and board at the Finger for free.)

Kahil bids the party farewell, then leaves the Finger. Kahil spends the rest of the day shooting the breeze with his friends, setting traps near a stream outside of town, and relaxing. He's always available for questions, but has nothing much in the way of answers. "We'll be seeing enough of each other in the next couple of weeks," he says. "Go back to the Finger and relax."

Unless the party already has clothing suitable for frigid climates, they need to consult with Vurl, who sells them complete arctic outfits (insulated parka, gloves, boots, underwear, and trousers) for 75 gp per character. As part of the package, Vurl throws in a sleeping bag, a fishing line and fishhook, a pair of snow goggles, and a face razor.

The party can talk him down to 50 gp each, but no more. If characters can't afford to pay, they can trade goods of equivalent value, or work for Vurl the rest of the day skinning weasels and other game animals to work off 10 gp of the debt; Vurl gives credit for the rest. (If the characters use Vurl's arctic outfits, they are well-protected for the purposes of determining Arctic Endurance Ratings, as explained in Part Two of this book. Otherwise, the DM must use her own judgement to determine how protected they are; presumably, they are at least moderately protected, or they wouldn't be able to tolerate the weather in Ishe.)

Final Preparations

The night passes uneventfully. The following morning, Kahil meets them as promised. He checks their outfits, admonishing any who aren't dressed appropriately ("You wanna die young, son? Has your brain froze up on you already?"). If a character insists on wearing less-than-ideal clothing, Kahil shrugs, "It's your funeral, pal." (Poorly dressed adventurers will pay the price later.)

Kahil has a portable cooking stove and enough utensils for everyone. He also has several gallons of cooking oil, which he distributes among the party. "We'll just take enough food for the first day or two," he says, making sure everyone has a few pounds of biscuits and dried fruit. "We'll hunt and fish along the way. You gotta have fresh meat if you wanna stay alive."

"Be sure to take your weapons," Kahil says. "We'll need 'em for hunting." He carries an iuak himself, and gives a spare to a random character "for cutting ice blocks," he says. Kahil also carries a shovel and a 4-foot wooden rod. "This here's for testing snow to make ice blocks—you'll see."

"You can stow the rest of yer junk with Vurl—it'll only slow you down. You won't need tents either. Nowheres to pitch 'em. We're gonna build snowhouses instead. Git that stupid look off yer face, I'll teach you how. It's a snap."

"And before you ask, we're gonna walk it; pack animals wouldn't last a day where we're going." If the party doesn't follow Kahil's suggestions, Kahil refuses to go with them. "I ain't gonna risk my life for anybody who's too stupid to listen to common sense."

Kahil then sits at a table and removes a blank piece of parchment from his parka. He sketches a rough map, showing the party the route they will be taking. (Sketch a map for the players, based on Map 3. Include the mountain ranges, the area 1 pass, the area 3 and 7 streams, and the area 11 double-peaked mountain. Mark an × where area 2 is indicated. Do not include areas 5, 6, 8, or 10, or the village of Puttak; Kahil doesn't know about them.)

Kahil says they will begin in Ishe, then take the pass (1) though the mountains. He figures they can travel about 15 miles per day, which puts them at the × (2) by the end of the first day. They will continue due north, crossing two streams (3 and 7), then follow the northern stream (7) west until they reach Mt. Akka (11). "That's where the kupuk are supposed to live," he says. "The trip to the kupuk mountain shouldn't take more than five days. We've got enough food for the first half of the trip. The southern stream (3) ain't much for fishing, but in this stream (he points to area 7), fish practically jump in your lap. We should be able to catch enough there to last us the rest of the way."

Kahil folds up the map and puts it in his pocket. "Just a couple of tips before we get started," he says. "First, we gotta always stop early enough in the day to make us a snowhouse. If we get caught outside at night, we'll freeze our fannies off.

"Second, we'll be crossing two streams, but we gotta stay out of the water. If you get wet out there, you freeze to death a lot faster. We gotta find us some solid ice to get across."

Kahil rises. "That's it, pals. Let's go get some snow on our shoes."

Proceed to the Trip to Mt. Akka section below.

Note to the DM. Once the party learns the route to Mt. Akka, they may decide they don't want Kahil to go with them. If so, he's offended, but accepts their wishes. "You'll never find your way without me," he says. "I'll be right here waitin' for you to crawl back. And when you do, my price doubles." (He does what he says; if the characters change their minds and come back for him, he demands 200 gp for his services. Of course, they are free to make the trip without him; if so, ignore all subsequent references to Kahil. But note that if the characters don't know how to make snowhouses and don't have access to some other type of suitable protection, they suffer brutal-and possibly fatal-effects from sleeping outside at night in the bitter cold.)

The Trip To Mt. Akka

If the group follows Kahil's route, it should take them five days to reach Mt. Akka. Events for each day are described below. However, if they lose their way or are otherwise delayed, it may be necessary to make adjustments; for instance, if they don't reach area 7 until Day Four, then stage the Day Three events on Day Four. If it takes the party more than five days to reach Mt. Akka (area 11), assume that nothing special happens to them until they complete the trip (at which time, proceed to the Caverns of Mt. Akka section).

The adventure presumes that the party builds and sleeps in snowhouses along the way (as explained in the "Building a House" section below). Characters protected in a snowhouse are safe from the effects of cold (they don't have to make AER checks). If the party comes up with an alternative to snowhouses, that's fine, but remember that there are no building materials other than snow and ice in this section of the Great Glacier. There are no caves, and sleeping around a camp fire or other heat source does little to prevent the effects of freezing, so long as the characters are exposed to the open air.

Before the party leaves Ishe, determine Arctic Endurance Ratings for each adventurer. If they have suitable arctic clothing, their AERs should all be 100 or above. Don't make AER checks except where directed in the text (even if characters with an exceptionally low Constitution have an AER less than 100, give them a break for now).

Don't worry about an AER for Kahil; as will be seen, he won't need it.

Day One

The first ten miles of the trip takes the party through a narrow pass bordered by mountains of ice, hundreds of feet tall. The air is clear and dry, and there is no wind. The sun glares brightly against the sheer white surfaces, causing the adventurers to squint, even with their snow goggles in place. Except for the sound of boots crunching in the snow, all is silent. The temperatures are bitterly cold, but the party quickly adjusts; aside from numb faces and cracked lips, they suffer no ill effects. Occasionally, Kahil asks them how they are doing; otherwise, he discourages small talk. "Save your energy for walking," he says.

Events

The following events occur before the party leaves the pass, in the order indicated; the exact time is up to the DM.

Event One. Kahil comments on the absence of game. "Good thing we brought enough food for a while. Take my word for it—there ain't no animals in these mountains."

Event Two. A long howl, like that of a wolf, echoes through the pass, joined a moment later by a cacophony of similar howls. The howls originate from somewhere in the mountains above, but it's difficult to pinpoint the source. The howls continue for a minute, then stop. If confronted with his earlier assurance about the absence of animals, Kahil mutters, "Sounded like the wind to me. Didn't sound like no animals." (He's lying, not because of any sinister motive, but because he hates to be wrong. The sounds came from a pack of winter wolves who are tracking the party.)

Event Three. The party hears a rumble high above them that sounds like thunder. The rumble lasts only for a moment. Any character making a successful Intelligence check realizes that the rumble is similar to the sound that precedes avalanche. If the party mentions this to Kahil, he laughs. "You're just nervous, pal. I know the sound of an avalanche, and that ain't it."

Two rounds later, the rumble begins again, this time louder. Small pebbles cascade down the mountainside, raining on the party. The rumble rises in intensity, continuing for the next three rounds; those who spend at least one of these three rounds running away, flying, or otherwise vacating the area in either direction (north or south) are safe from the coming avalanche. Any who stay where they are, or move no faster than their normal movement rate are caught in the avalanche's path. If half of the party vacates the area, Kahil gets the message and runs away too.

The avalanche is a small one by Great Glacier standards, dumping only a few feet of snow and debris into the pass. There is no chance of characters being buried in the avalanche, but any who don't vacate the area suffer 2-8 (2d4) points of damage from the debris.

If the characters confront Kahil about his poor judgement, he grudgingly admits he was wrong about the rumble. "So I messed up. Anybody can be wrong. Now let's keep movin'."

Kahil Comes Clean

After their experiences in the pass, some may begin to question Kahil's capabilities. If pressed, Kahil admits that his father had no association with Palus Frohm. "Okay, so I made that part up," he confesses. "But I've read his book. I know it inside and out." If the characters continue to press him, he admits with exasperation, "All right! All right! So I never got around to reading the book. But I know what I'm doing." Kahil apologizes for exaggerating his expertise, but says he needs the work (which is true). If the party wants to send Kahil back to Ishe, he goes, but they are on their own (and unless they know how to build snowhouses, they may be in trouble when night falls). If they agree to let him stay on as their guide, Kahil promises to be up front with them and do as good a job as he can (he will keep his word).

Building a House

When the party reaches area 2, Kahil says it's time to stop for the day. They have about four hours left of sunlight, enough to build a snowhouse.

Kahil leads the party through the construction of a simple 10-foot-diameter snowhouse as described in the Ilutiu Architecture section in Part Three of this book. It isn't necessary to role-play the entire process, but impress upon the players the following points:

- If the party doesn't sleep indoors at night, they risk freezing to death.
- Snowhouse blocks must be made from suitable snow; test for even consistency with a 4-foot wooden rod (which Kahil brought with him). If the snow isn't consistent-if the rod doesn't sink evenly for a depth of 4 feet-it can still be used for snow blocks, but the house won't be as strong. (The snow near area 2 is consistent to 4 feet.)
- A snowhouse consists of a spiral of stacked blocks, a tunnel entrance, and a fire inside to keep the air warm.
- It takes about four hours to build a simple snowhouse (assuming a team of about four workers).

When the snowhouse is finished, the party may settle down for the night. The interior of the house is quite warm; Kahil is clearly proud of his accomplishment. "See?" he crows. "I told you I know what I'm doin'." When night falls, the temperature outside falls to -10 degrees; those who venture outside suffer a -20 penalty to their AERs.

Goodbye, Kahil

In the middle of the night, a chorus of howls startles the party from their sleep. The wolf-like howls resemble those heard earlier in the pass, but they are much closer, possibly within a few yards of the snowhouse. Kahil says he will investigate. He discourages the party from joining him, saying, "You'll be safer in here. I'll let you know if I need you." If they insist, one or more of the characters can come with him.

The howling stops as soon as Kahil (and any accompanying party members) leave the snowhouse. The night is pitch black—those who go with Kahil notice nothing unusual. If any adventurers are with Kahil, he suggests they spread out and search the area carefully; if they try to stay with Kahil, he bolts out on his own, determined to get to the bottom of the disturbance.

As soon as Kahil separates from the group (or shortly after he leaves the snowhouse, if they stay inside), a pack of three winter wolves leap at Kahil from behind a snowdrift, snarling and clawing, blasting their frost breath.

Winter wolves (3): Int average: AL NE; AC 5; MV 18; HD 6; hp 36 each; THAC0 15; SA exhale stream of frost once every 10 rounds at any target within 10 feet, causing 6-24 points of damage; SD immune to cold-based attacks, fire-based attacks cause an extra +1 point per die of damage; MR 13; SZ L; XP 975.

The wolves rip and tear at Kahil, who screams, then falls silently into the snow. A moment later, the attack is over, and the wolves race into the darkness; they plan to finish off the rest of the party another time. The ambush occurs so quickly that any outside the snowhouse have little time to react (however, if any character manages to catch up with the pack, the wolves attack viciously, escaping at the earliest opportunity). Those inside the snowhouse hear snarls, screams, then silence.

Kahil is dead, his body covered with deep slashes and caked with frost. The rest of the night is without incident.

Day Two

The party must decide whether to forge ahead or return to Ishe. If they return to Ishe, they are unable to find another guide and must either go back to the Great Glacier by themselves, or give up (in which case, the adventure is over; proceed to the Resolution section). If the party decides to continue, they may take all of Kahil's equipment with them; if they like, they may bury him in the snow.

The terrain between Kahil's campsite (2) and the southern stream (3) is flat and bleak. The trip is uneventful until they reach the stream.

Crossing the Stream

The southern stream (3) ranges in width from 30-100 yards and 4-8 feet in depth. When the party approaches the stream they see puddles of standing water spotting the surface. The ice is translucent, almost clear in spots, and laced with tiny cracks. If anyone steps on the ice, it gives slightly under their weight, threatening to break.

Unless the characters can (F)ly, teleport, or otherwise cross the stream without actually setting foot on it, they have several options:

Cross Here. The entire stream, except for a small section east (see below) is covered with young (semi-solid) platform ice. If they attempt to cross, check for breakage. For every 100 pounds of weight, there is a 10% cumulative chance that the ice will break (estimate each character's weight, rounding up to the nearest 100 pounds; for example, a 150 lb. adventurer has a 20% chance of breaking the ice; if in doubt about a character's weight, assume the chance is 20%). Make a check for breakage for every 10 yards; presumably, the party attempts to cross at the narrowest (30 yards) point.

If an adventurer falls through the ice, there's not much of a chance of drowning in the shallow waters, but he's likely to get drenched. A wet character suffers a -10 penalty to his AES; if this puts his AES below 100, he must make AES checks until he dries out. A wet character can dry himself by spending 2-6 (1d4 + 2) hours near a fire or other heat source. Otherwise, it takes two full days for his body heat to dry his clothing.

Go West. The stream ends at an immense valley filled with tiny spherical crystals that sparkle like rainbows (5). Tall mountains of ice border the valley on the west and south.

The crystals are fairy ice, filling the valley to a depth of 100 feet (variously-sized ice chunks line the bottom 10 feet of the valley). The fairy ice has the texture of quicksand. Anyone stepping in the fairy ice sinks at the rate of 2 feet per round; to adjudicate the results of sinking in the fairy ice, see the Fairy Ice section in Part Two.

Go East. About 15 miles east of the fairy ice valley (5) is a section of the stream made of opaque ice (4), free of standing water. The section is about 20 yards wide and extends completely across the stream (a length of 30 yards). The ice is rock-solid and easily supports the weight of the entire party.

On the north shore, a polar bear sits beside a hole in the ice bridge. The bear waits for fish to swim by the hole, then scoops them up and eats them. There haven't been many fish, however, and he's hungry. He eyes the party curiously, but doesn't move.

Polar bear: Int semi-: AL N; AC 6; MV 12, Sw 9; HD 8 + 8; hp 64; THAC0 13; #AT 3; Dmg 1-10/1-10/2-12; SA a paw hit of 18 or better indicates a hug that inflicts an additional 3- 18 points of damage; SD fights for 2-3 rounds after being brought to 0 to - 12 hit points; SZ H; ML 10; XP 2,000.

The heroes have several options for dealing with the bear:

- If they wait and do nothing, the bear wanders away in 3-4 hours. The party can safely cross the stream; the bear won't return.

- If the adventurers attack the bear from a distance, such as with a missile weapon, the bear gets mad. He lifts his head and roars, then scampers across the ice bridge in their direction. If they stay put, the bear fights to the death with his claws and teeth. If they run, he pursues the party for at least a mile, then returns to his hole. (The bear avoids the platform ice, though he automatically falls through if he steps on it. However, the bear can swim and suffers no ill effects from immersion in the water.)

- If the party crosses the bridge, the bear rises to attack when they get halfway across. He attacks and pursues as described above.

Lake Taak. The lake (6) is solid ice 10 feet thick, and can support the entire party without breaking. However, the tributary linking the lake with the northern stream (7) is completely covered by platform ice, just like the southern stream (3).

Fishing

Fishing is poor in the southern stream (2); characters have a 5% chance per hour of catching fish big enough to feed them. Those with the Fishing proficiency may make a proficiency check only once every three hours.

Wild Night

At the end of the day, the party may wish to build a snowhouse to protect themselves against the freezing night. Assume it takes the party four hours to build a snowhouse; if they start too late in the day, begin making AES checks as soon as the sun goes down (the temperature falls to -10, causing a -20 penalty to AES checks).

All of the snow within 5 miles of either shore of the southern stream (3) is of uneven consistency; that is, a 4-foot-rod won't sink evenly all the way through. Snow blocks can be cut from this snow, but the snowhouse won't be quite as strong as one built from consistent snow.

The party must decide whether to build their house from the weak snow adjacent to the southern stream (3) or travel north or south to find strong snow (all snow more than 5 miles away from either shore of the stream is strong snow). Note that if the party searches for strong snow, they may be doing so in the dark (depending on what time of the day they begin the search), suffering the appropriate AES penalty. Regardless of whether the adventurers choose strong or weak snow, the snowhouse is constructed as described in the Building a House section above. Either type of house offers full protection from the cold.

The night passes quietly, until about three hours before dawn when the party is awakened by wolf howls similar to those heard the night before; the howls belong to the winter wolves (see the "Goodbye Kahil" section above) who have returned to finish off the party.

Shortly after the howls begin, the wolves batter and claw at the sides of the snowhouse. What happens next depends whether the house is made of strong or weak snow.

Strong Snow. The wolves claw at the house for an hour, but won't be able to get in. If the party wishes to leave the snowhouse and battle the wolves, they are free to do so; the wolves attack ferociously with their frost breath and teeth, fighting to the death. Otherwise, if the party remains inside, the wolves give up after an hour and withdraw: they won't bother the party again.

Weak Snow. The wolves batter the house for an hour; chunks of snow fall from the walls, and the house threatens to collapse. During that hour, the party is free to go outside and fight the wolves as described above. Otherwise, after an hour of battering, the house collapses in a pile of rubble. The wolves charge and attack the exposed characters, fighting to the death. The band takes no damage from the collapsing house, but after they deal with the wolves (assuming the wolves don't kill them), they suffer a -20 penalty to their AERs as long as they are exposed to the open air. (It's unlikely that the heroes are able to avoid spending the rest of the night outside. There isn't enough time to build another snowhouse, there are no caves for shelter, and an open-air fire or spells such as resist cold won't help much.)

Day Three and Beyond

The terrain north of the southern stream (3) is similar to that south of the stream—flat, empty, and bleak. For six hours during the daylight hours of Day Three (the exact time is up to the DM), a 10 mile-per-hour wind blows from the south, creating a wind chill that lowers the daylight temperature to -10 degrees and inflicts a -20 penalty to the party's AERs; make AER checks as appropriate.

The Northern Stream

The northern stream (7) is 10-30 yards wide and 5-8 feet deep. Unlike the southern stream, there's no platform ice; instead, most of the surface is clogged with variously-sized ice chunks. Characters can traverse the stream by hopping across ice chunks; this requires one successful Dexterity check per 10 yards of stream (presumably, the party crosses at a narrow point, requiring only a single check). If the check fails, the hapless soul falls in the water and suffers the drenching effects described in the "Crossing the Stream" section above (if the victim is still drenched from falling in the southern stream, a second drenching causes no additional penalties).

Fishing is excellent here. Characters have a 25% chance per hour of catching fish big enough to make a meal. Those with the Fishing proficiency may make a proficiency check twice per hour.

(If the DM wants to make the party's fishing experience more interesting, she can stock the stream with some or all of the fish described in the "Fish of the Great Glacier" entry in the Appendix.)

Strange Sights

If the party follows the northern stream, they may notice the following on their way to Mt. Akka:

Crevasses. These two crevasses (8 and 11) are 100 feet wide and several hundred feet deep. Anyone coming within 5 feet of the edge of a crevasse must make a successful Dexterity check, or slip and fall. If the character falls, a second Dexterity check determines if he grabs the side; if the check fails, he plummets to his doom, never to be seen again.

Deep claw marks in the snow surround crevasse 8. The marks appear to have been made by a huge creature, but the neither party nor Brokk is able to identify it. (A deep passage links the area 8 and 11 crevasses, and also goes to crevasses 2 and 4 in the Mt. Akka Caverns map. A tirichik lives in the passage; currently, the tirichik is in the bottom of crevasse 4 in the Mt. Akka Caverns map.)

Wreckage. A wrecked vessel lies near the north shore of the stream (area 9); all that's left of it are fragments of a wooden frame and shredded seal skins. The vessel is unsalvageable. There are no bodies, nor is there anything of interest among the debris. (The vessel was a small umiak. About a week ago, a pregnant woman, her mother, and four friends left Puttak for Mt. Akka to perform a special birth ritual. When the umiak reached area 9, a tirichik attacked, killing three of the woman's friends and dragging their bodies back to crevasse 8. The terrified pregnant woman, along with her mother and surviving friend, fled to the safety of Mt. Akka to await the birth of the woman's child, hoping that a Puttak rescue party is on the way.)

Brokk can't explain the wreckage, but it clearly spooks him. He points in the direction of Mt. Akka, wishes the party good luck, and heads in the opposite direction; the party won't be able to convince him to change his mind and continue with them.

The Caverns of Mt. Akka

Mt. Akka is a double-peaked mountain of solid ice, about 1,000 feet tall. A 10-foot-diameter cave opens near the foot on the south side. There are no footprints or any other signs of life near the cave (blowing snow has covered the footprints of the Puttak women).

Refer to the inset map of the Mt. Akka Caverns.

1. Main Cavern. Long icicles hang from the 60-foot-high ceiling of this otherwise empty cavern. If the party listens carefully, they hear the sounds of human female sobbing drifting from area 5.

2. Crevasse. This is identical to areas 8 and 10 on the main map. An underground passage, 100 feet deep, links this crevasse with area 4 (as well as with areas 8 and 10 on the Mt. Akka Area map).

3. Tirichik Cavern. Another cavern of solid ice. There are two 1-foot-diameter holes in the west wall, about 5 feet from the floor, leading to area 5. The sobbing sounds originating in area 5 are quite audible here. If the characters peer through one of the holes, they see the women in the adjacent cavern (see area 5). If they call out to the women or otherwise draw attention to themselves, one of the women (Jira—see area 5) screams for them to leave the area 3 cavern: "There's a monster in there! Get out!"

4. Crevasse. This crevasse is similar to the area 2 crevasse, except that it's surrounded by deep claw marks in the snow. The claw marks resemble those near the northern stream crevasse (area 8 on the Mt. Akka Area map).

A tirichik lurks in the bottom of the crevasse. The tirichik won't attack the party while they are in area 3, as there's not enough room for it to maneuver.

5. Ritual Cavern. Wisps of steam rise from stone pots of burning blubber spaced evenly about the floor of this cavern, filling the air with the aroma of mint and hot oil. Intricate patterns of circles and triangles are carved in the icy walls. Huddled against the north wall are three women wearing seal skin parkas and bulky trousers. The women have yellow skin, black hair, and round faces with flat noses and tiny ears.

One of the women is dead, slumped against the wall; her body looks as if it has been slashed with razors. Another woman (Kerut), who appears to be in her early twenties, lies on her back on a blanket of polar bear fur. She's obviously pregnant, moaning in pain, her eyes squeezed shut. A third woman (Jira) in her late thirties, hovers over Kerut; she's struggling to control herself, muttering soothing words to the Kerut and caressing her brow. When Jira sees the party, she brightens for a moment, then becomes anxious again. "Hurry and come in!" she gasps. "The tirichik can get you there!"

Kerut (1st-level Iulutiu fighter): Str 9, Dex 15, Con 16, Int 14, Wis 12, Cha 13; AL LG; AC 9; MV 9; hp 4; THAC0 20; #AT 1; Dmg 2-8 (unungak); SZ M; ML 9.

Jira (2nd-level Iulutiu fighter): Str 8, Dex 9, Con 15, Int 13, Wis 10, Cha 10; AL LG; AC 9; MV 9; hp 12; THAC0 19; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (iuak); SZ M; ML 10.

Adventurer's who examine Kerut and make a successful Intelligence check confirm that she's near the end of her term. Jira explains that she's been feverish for days. "I fear for her. And for the child. Can you help us?" Characters with the Healing proficiency, potion of healing, or healing spells can reduce Kerut's fever and make her comfortable, but she remains weak and tired.

Breathlessly, Jira explains that Kerut is her daughter, about to give birth to her first child. They are Iulutiu from the village of Puttak who came to Mt Akka to perform a special birth ritual. "But a tirichik ambushed our umiak and killed three of our friends. It's followed us here. It killed Frikik already! (She gestures to the dead woman.) "It will kill us too!"

Before the party has a chance to ask for details, a pair of white metallic tentacles ending in needle-like points thrusts through the holes in the west wall, thrashing like whips. Jira screams. The tentacles begin to strike at the heroes. (Since the tirichik is too big to enter the passage leading to area 5, it's been poking its tentacles through the holes in the walls in an attempt to kill the women; it's killed one so far.)

The 20-foot-long tentacles attack as HD 13 monsters with AC 1, each successful attack inflicting 1-8 points of damage. The tentacles have 5 hit points each (which don't count against the tirichik's normal number of hit points). Because the tentacles are in constant motion, opponents suffer a -2 penalty when attacking them.

Jira comforts her daughter during the attack and doesn't help the party fight the tentacles. If the party severs one of the tentacles (by inflicting 5 points of damage), the other tentacle withdraws (the tirichik scuttles back into crevasse 4; the tirichik also retreats into the crevasse if characters leave area 5 and enter area 3, or if they manage to attack it through one of the holes in the wall.)

At the end of the tentacle attack, all is calm again. If they hurry, the group can now leave the caverns and escape the tirichik, but Jira refuses to go with them; she won't leave her daughter, who's too weak to move. (If the party flees, assume the tirichik resumes his tentacle attacks against Jira and Kerut; eventually, the tirichik kills them both. The tirichik remains in the crevasse; it surfaces to attack the party if they return to the caverns.)

Five rounds after the tentacle attack ends, the tirichik emerges from crevasse 2 and charges towards the passage leading to area 5.

Tirichik: Int semi-; AL CE; AC 1; MV 12, Br 3; HD 13; hp 73; THAC0 7; #AT 1 or 2; Dmg 3-24 (3d8) or 1-8/1-8; SA strike at target 5 feet distance, giving a +2 bonus to attack roll (every other round: can't attack in round following strike attack), tentacles (see text); SD opponent suffer -5 to surprise roll if creature is concealed, immune to all forms of natural and magical cold; SZ G; ML 16; XP 5,000.

Though the tirichik can't squeeze through the passage leading to area 5, it batters against the walls of the passage, as if trying to smash its way through (it can't, but it's okay to let the party think it might). If they make missile attacks against it, the tirichik withdraws, either hiding around the corner or inside crevasse 2—in any case, it won't be a passive target for long-range attacks. If any characters enter area 1, the tirichik attacks with its teeth and its intact tentacle (note that if its tentacles are gone, it can only make bite attacks). The tirichik varies its attacks according to the situation:

- It may wait near the south end of the passage leading to area 5, then attack with its neck strike at anyone moving through the passage from area 5.
- It may hide in crevasse 2 and spring out to surprise the party as they move through area 1.
- It may move to area 3 and poke its intact tentacle into area 5 to drive the party into area 1.
- It may claw its way to the ceiling of area 1, wait for the party to enter, then drop to the floor to attack.

The tirichik fights to the death, intending to kill the party and the two Iulutiu women. If the party won't leave area 5 to fight the tirichik, the creature continues to batter the walls of the passage. The walls of area 5 begin to crack, snow and ice falls from the ceiling, and an ominous rumble comes from above (let the party believe that if the tirichik continues to batter the passage, the entire cavern system may collapse, burying them alive under tons of debris. This actually won't happen, but it gives them something to worry about and encourages them to take action against the tirichik).

If the heroes defeat the tirichik, proceed to the Aftermath section.

6. Kupuk Cavern. Kupuk often come here to lay eggs, but currently, the caverns deserted. Bones of wolves, deer, and rabbits are scattered near the north wall, remnants of kupuk meals.

7. Fairy Ice Pit. This is a 10-foot-deep pit filled with tiny ice spheres, similar to the fairy ice valley in area 5. The characters have the same risk of sinking here as in area 5, but because the pit is fairly shallow, there's less chance of suffocating.

Kupuk sometimes use the pit to deposit infertile eggs. At this time, there are a dozen eggs at the bottom. Unless the adventurers have learned this from the women in area 5, they are not likely to discover the eggs themselves. But if they do, they are free to take them and leave the cavern, avoiding the confrontation with the tirichik (of course, this requires them to ignore the cries from area 5, which true heroes surely wouldn't do).

Aftermath

If the party deals with the tirichik, Jira thanks them, then offers to help them any way she can. She provides them with details of the birth ritual (as explained in the "Puttak" and "Mt. Akka" entries in Part Five of this book) and give them general information about tirichik and kupuk (as explained in the Appendix). If the party asks about kupuk eggs, she tells them that kupuk use Mt. Akka as a nesting area; the adventurers may be able to find infertile eggs in the fairy ice pit (area 7), which they are free to take.

Jira says that Kerut is likely to have her baby within the next 24 hours. The heroes may go on their way, or they can stay and give Jira a hand. If they leave, proceed to the Resolution section

If they stay, Kerut goes into labor that evening. (The characters don't have to assist with the birth—Kerut takes care of that—but they can provide moral support.) After a few hours of labor, Kerut delivers a healthy baby girl. Kerut's fever breaks shortly after; she's fine.

Jira tells Kerut that without the heroic efforts of the group, they all would have died. Kerut is so grateful for the party's help that she asks them to honor her by participating in the Iulutiu naming ceremony (as explained in the "Naming the Baby" section of Part Three of this book). The first syllable of the child's name will be "Ki," after the baby's aunt (who shares the infant's curly hair). Kerut asks the party to choose one character to be the ariak (the party may choose whoever they wish). The ariak offers the baby one syllable of his name; for instance, if the character's name is Irit Stonehand, he may offer "Ir" as the second syllable, forming the name Kiir.) The character then dresses the baby in her first clothes (a seal skin blanket is available), completing the act of anariak. (Since the adventurer is an honorary ariak, he's not obligated to give up his birthday or fulfill any of the other duties associated with an Iulutiu ariak.)

A few hours later, a scouting party of eight Iulutians arrives from Puttak to check on the birth. Jira and Kerut tell them all about the party's heroics; the impressed Iulutians graciously thank the party. The Iulutians offer to guide the party out of the Great Glacier, back to the pass that leads to Ishe (1); if the party accepts, the Iulutians provide all necessary food, build the snowhouses, and scare off predators, ensuring a safe and easy trip home.

Resolution

If the party fails to recover any kupuk eggs, Jervin Wesselitt quietly passes away in his sleep. Jervin's family thanks the party for their efforts but are clearly disappointed. When word gets around, it may be a while before the group is offered another mission.

If the heroes recovered the kupuk eggs, they notice the eggs beginning to melt as soon as they leave the Great Glacier; however, the melted eggs can be kept safe in any container. Not only do the liquid eggs serve to cure Jervin, an eccentric collector offers to buy the leftover eggs for the handsome sum of 10,000 gp.

"Because sound travels farther in arctic climates, the crying of an infant presents a special problem, as it can draw the attention of predators. The Iulutians silence unhappy babies by giving them to the family kupuk. The kupuk encircles the baby with its tail, then allows the child to suckle its paw. Both the infant and the kupuk seem to enjoy this arrangement."

Squat, hardy, and eccentric, the Innugaakalikurit are the only dwarven race native to the Great Glacier region.

With blocky bodies, pinched faces, and stubby legs, Innugaakalikurit resemble normal dwarves who have been squashed. They seldom exceed 3 feet in height, and are nearly as broad as they are tall. Their eyes are bright blue, their cheeks as ruddy as apples. Normally, their skin is white, almost bluish, but because of their fondness for basking under the bright sun, many Innugaakalikurit are sunburned red from head to toe, a condition that causes no discomfort or other ill effects.

Their fingers and toes are thick and blunt, their feet flat and wide, enabling them to walk on the snow without sinking. Curly white hair covers their heads and tumbles down their backs nearly to their waists. Males sport short beards and twisting moustaches. Both sexes favor simple tunics of polar bear fur. Innugaakalikurit are always barefoot.

Innugaakalikurit speak a dialect similar to that of the Ulutiuns. They also speak the languages of white dragons, yeti, frost giants, and selkie. Their high, gentle voices are particularly suited for singing.

Combat: Though peaceful at heart, Innugaakalikurit relish recreational combat; a group of arctic dwarves can pleasantly pass an afternoon by pounding each another into unconsciousness. They are also excellent hunters and fishers. However, Innugaakalikurit studiously avoid war and won't engage in combat except to defend themselves or their families. An Innugaakalikurit isn't likely to risk his life to defend a principle or acquire treasure, considering such actions to be the height of stupidity.

Innugaakalikurit are extremely strong; a pair of Innugaakalikurit can carry a full-grown polar bear, and a single Innugaakalikurit can effortlessly lift an adult human off his feet. Their preferred weapon is a bulky bow called an eyklak that fires thick arrows with sharp barbs, capable of inflicting 1-8 points of damage. Innugaakalikurit gain a +2 bonus to hit when using an eyklak, but because of the weapon's awkward shape, non-Innugaakalikurits suffer a -2 penalty using it. On occasion, they employ battle axes and spears.

Arctic dwarves don't wear armor, but the thick layers of fur worn by hunters and scouts give a protection of AC 8.

In addition to all of the special abilities of dwarves listed in the 2nd Edition Player's Handbook, Innugaakalikurit suffer no ill effects of cold temperatures. They are also immune to cold-based spells and other magically-generated forms of cold (such as a white dragon's breath).

Habitat/Society: Though a few Innugaakalikurit settlements are found in the ice-covered mountains in the northern reaches of the Great Glacier, most live in small villages in the highest peaks of Novularond. A typical clan consists of about 100 members. Of the able-bodied adults, about 80% are 1st-level fighters, 10% are 2nd- to 4th-level fighters, 5% are 5th-level or higher fighters, and the rest are rangers and thieves of various levels. The eldest male serves as clan leader, though opinions of all adults are freely solicited. Homes are caves or simple structures of snow blocks.

Innugaakalikurit life focuses on hunting, gathering, and raising children. Singing, storytelling, and contact sports (such as boxing and wrestling) occupy their leisure time.

Innugaakalikurit are fascinated by weapons of all types. When coming across an unusual weapon—which for the Innugaakalikurit can be anything from a scimitar to a trident to a blowgun—they may spend hours turning it over in their hands, admiring its craftsmanship and discussing its merits. A few Innugaakalikurit maintain sizeable collections of odd weapons.

Ecology: Curious and outgoing, the Innugaakalikurit are quite sociable and maintain friendly, if distant, relationships with other races. They despise frost giants, with whom they have long-standing territorial conflicts in Novularond. Favorite foods include fish, caribou, and polar bear.

Innugaakalikurit Class and Ability Limits

Innugaakalikurit can be fighters of unlimited level, rangers up to 8th level, and thieves up to 8th level. They are forbidden to be paladins, wizards, priests, and bards.

Their initial ability scores are modified by a -1 penalty to Charisma and Dexterity, and a +1 bonus to Strength and Constitution. The minimum and maximum ability scores for Innugaakalikurit are as follows:

Ability	Minimum	Maximum
Strength	14	18
Dexterity	3	16
Constitution	13	18
Intelligence	3	18
Wisdom	3	18
Charisma	3	14

Trustworthy, dependable, and easily domesticated, the dog-like kupuk is one of the most valuable creatures to the tribes of the Great Glacier, both as a pack animal and loyal companion.

The kupuk has a thick body and the hairless, leathery hide of a walrus, colored tan, dull yellow, or light gray. Its round head resembles that of a husky, with a long muzzle, black eyes and nose, and upright ears. Soft fur, the same color as its body, covers its head, and two six-inch-long tusks protrude from its mouth. It has four strong legs with broad flat feet and sharp claws, enabling it to move easily in the snow and on icy surfaces. An able swimmer, the kupuk uses its flat feet to propel it in the water.

The kupuk's most unusual feature is its long tail, a snake-like appendage about six inches thick and five feet long, covered with fur and typically coiled on the creature's back so as not to drag in the snow. Powerfully muscled, the tail functions as both a weapon and a tool; for instance, the kupuk can uproot a small tree by wrapping its tail around the trunk, or smooth a snowy surface by sweeping its tail from side to side.

The kupuk's mournful howl is easily mistaken for that of a wolf. It can understand simple commands from human companions, and can distinguish scents from up to 100 yards away.

Combat: Kupuk are as vicious towards their enemies as they are loving to their friends. They can attack with their claws and bite, but prefer to lash at opponents with their tails, inflicting 1-12 hit points of damage with the retractable spike in their tail tip, assuming they can maneuver to position their opponents behind them. A successful tail-lash is followed by a loud howl, with the kupuk raising its muzzle triumphantly towards the sky.

Kupuk are particularly fierce when protecting their eggs or pups. In such situations, the kupuk whips itself into a frenzy, gaining a +1 to its attack and damage rolls. The bonus remains in effect until the opponent is killed or withdraws.

Kupuk are immune to all ill effects of cold, including cold-based spells and magically-generated cold effects (such as white dragon's breath).

Habitat/Society: In the wilderness, kupuk make no permanent lairs, instead roaming in packs in search of food. A typical pack consists of about 12 adults and half as many pups. The largest female serves as leader; she's usually the one with the strongest sense of smell, and the most able to locate prey.

More commonly, kupuk live among Ulutiuns, with whom they share a mutually beneficial relationship; the kupuk serve as workers and protectors, while the humans furnish food, shelter, and medical care. Though Ulutiuns typically raise their own kupuk, wild kupuk are easily tamed. An offer of food and a few gentle words are usually all it takes to earn their friendship. Once a bond of trust is established, a kupuk remains fiercely loyal to its human companions, willingly sacrificing its own life to protect them.

Kupuk make excellent pack animals, easily carrying up to 500 pounds of weight on their backs, though they balk at carrying human passengers. A single kupuk can pull a sled of up to 1,000 pounds for an entire day without tiring. With a natural affinity for human children, kupuk are superb babysitters. Once a kupuk gently encoils its tail around an infant, parents can rest assured that their child is safe and comfortable.

A kupuk reproduces about once a year by digging a shallow hole in the snow, laying from 1-4 eggs, then covering them with a layer of snow about 3 feet deep. The eggs resemble lumps of gold, each about a foot across, with the texture of soft metal. Explorers unfamiliar with kupuk sometimes mistake kupuk eggs for real gold; their excitement at their discovery disappears when they find themselves suddenly faced with a snarling kupuk mother, tail erect, crouched to kill the interloper who dared disturb her nest.

Ecology: Kupuk are meat-eaters, preferring a diet of fish and seal. In turn, kupuk count white dragons and tirichik among their natural enemies. Though kupuk eggs are not, in fact, made of gold or any other precious metal, egg fragments are highly prized by collectors in lands south of the Great Glacier, fetching as much as 500 gp each. Transport problems, however, prevent kupuk eggs from reaching many collectors, since the egg fragments melt into liquid at temperatures above freezing.

Vicious, stealthy, and with an insatiable appetite for human flesh, the tirichik is one of the most feared predators in the Great Glacier.

The tirichik resembles a cross between a dragon and an immense centipede. Both its dragon-like head and long, tubular body are covered with white scales. A bony ridge extends from the back of its neck, along its spine, and across its stumpy tail. It has eight thick legs ending in flat, saucer-shaped feet, each with a dozen hooked claws. Its sunken eyes are dull pink, the only part of its body not colored white. A pair of short horns grow behind its eyes, curving upward into the air, their tips indented into shallow cups. The horns serve as hearing organs and are useless in combat. Likewise, the claws on its feet are too short to be useful in attacks, and instead are used for climbing and clinging.

The tirichik has a mouthful of long teeth that protrude over its lips even when its mouth is closed. On either side of its mouth is a 3-inch-diameter opening. The tirichik can extend snaky tentacles from these holes at will, up to a length of 20 feet. The tentacles are also white, as tough as metal cable, and end in needle-sharp points. Though the tentacles are primarily used as sense organs, capable of sensing motion, scents, and body heat, they can also be used as piercing weapons.

The tirichik's claws enable it to scuttle across snow and ice, scale sheer cliffs, and cling to any solid surface. It can also burrow through snow (but not rock, frozen ground, or similarly hard surfaces) at a movement rate of 3.

The tirichik is utterly silent.

Combat: The tirichik prefers to ambush its prey by lurking inside a crevasse, hiding among hills of snow, or otherwise concealing itself. Its tentacles enable it to sense prey up to 100 yards away when the prey approaches, the tirichik reveals itself, scuttling from its crevasse or charging from the snow. Because of the tirichik's color and stealth, opponents suffer a -5 penalty to their surprise roll if encountering a concealed tirichik.

When prey is scarce, the tirichik goes hunting. It uses its tentacles to probe into caves, beneath rocks, and even under the doors of houses to look for food. When it locates something to eat, it strikes, lunging into the cave or battering down the door to commence its attacks.

The tirichik has special elastic tendons in its neck that allow it to temporarily detach its skull from its spinal column. The creature can strike like a snake by suddenly elongating its neck, stretching itself an additional 5 feet. When making a stretch attack, the tirichik gains a +2 bonus to its attack roll. It is unable to make any attacks in the following round, as it must spend that round withdrawing its neck and re-attaching its skull to its spinal column. Therefore, the tirichik can make a stretching attack only once every other round.

Instead of its bite, the tirichik can also use its tentacles to attack, thrusting them like daggers. The tentacles have an AC of 1, but because the tentacles constantly wave and writhe, attacks directed against the tentacles are made at a -2 penalty. If a tentacle suffers 5 points of damage (this damage is in addition to the tirichik's normal number of hit points, in effect giving the tirichik 10 hit points beyond that of its 13 Hit Dice), it is severed. The tirichik grows a new tentacle in about a month.

The tirichik suffers no ill effects from cold temperatures, and is also immune to all cold-based spells and magically-generated cold, including white dragon's breath.

Habitat/Terrain: A tirichik has no permanent lair. When not hunting, it rests inside a crevasse, clinging motionless to the crevasse's inner wall.

The tirichik has a life span of about a century. Mid-point in its life, the asexual tirichik burrows deep into the snow and gives birth to 1-4 spawn. The foot-long spawn remain beneath the surface until they reach maturity, which takes about a year.

Ecology: By far, the tirichik's favorite food is human flesh, and there seems to be no end to the number of humans a hungry tirichik may devour in a the same meal; rumor has it that a single tirichik is capable of eating an entire village. The tirichik also enjoys polar bears, kupuk, and young white dragons. The lulutians of the Great Glacier prize the tirichik's leathery hide for waterproof boots.

The oceans and rivers of the Great Glacier teem with a wide variety of aquatic life, including several unique species of fish.

The species discussed below are all 2 feet or less in length; the tiny crystal nipper rarely exceeds a quarter of an inch. All thrive in the icy waters of the Great Glacier.

Combat: None of these fish are aggressive; all swim from danger as fast as possible. Even the deadly crystal nipper and spiny sleeper are passive, posing a threat only to the careless or unlucky.

Habitat/Society: All of these fish tend to organize themselves into schools of various size. None are particularly territorial, swimming freely throughout the rivers and seas of the Great Glacier. All reproduce by laying thousands of tiny eggs.

Ecology: The fish subsist on waste matter, plankton, or whatever other organic matter they can scavenge. All are edible by humans and quite delicious, though some, such as the spiny sleeper, must be handled with caution.

Blootfish

The blootfish resembles a white manta ray with a balloon-like organ swelling from its belly. The diameter of the balloon organ is equal to or slightly larger than the length of the fish. The balloon organ is always filled with water, and because of the fish's unique body chemistry, the water is always fresh. Fishers lucky enough to catch a blootfish sometimes carry the frozen corpse with them, sipping fresh water from its balloon organ by puncturing a hole in the side of the fish. When the balloon organ is empty, the fish makes a satisfying meal.

Black Burner

The black burner is not a fish. It is actually a small marine mammal. With its chubby black body, puckered blowhole, and wide mouth, the black burner looks exactly like a miniature whale. The black burner has skin instead of scales, and secretes oil through tiny pores. Oil covers the entire surface of the black burner, preventing it from freezing when removed from the water. If the corpse of the black burner is ignited, it burns steadily for 3-12 (3d4) hours, providing light and warmth equivalent to a small camp fire. Alternately, about a cup of oil, which can be burned later as fuel, can be drained from a black burner corpse.

Spiny Sleeper

Tiny silver spines cover the body of this plump fish, which has a white belly and long whiskers like a catfish. If a character (or creature) handles the sleeper carelessly (for instance if a character not wearing gloves or other protection fails a Dexterity check), a spine may pierce his flesh, injecting him with a powerful toxin. If the affected character (or creature) fails to save vs. poison, he immediately suffers the effects similar to a temporal stasis spell, and an ice-like glaze forms over his body. Neutralize poison or a similar spell negates the effect, as does certain herbal treatments known by some Ulutian healers.

Icetail

To the casual observer, the icetail doesn't look like a live fish at all, but a fish skeleton with a few shreds of bluish tissue hanging from its ribs. Closer inspection, however, reveals the creature to have an actual body, complete with head, fins, and tail, all as transparent as glass. The icetail is also cold to the touch--so cold, in fact, that if a character touches a still-living icetail with his bare flesh, he suffers 1 point of damage. A dead icetail acquires the temperature of the immediate environment. Icetail may be cooked and eaten (or eaten raw, though their uncooked flesh is extremely bitter), but if they aren't thoroughly cooked for at least six hours, the eater risks extreme indigestion (the eater must make a successful Constitution check or suffer stomach cramps for the next 24 hours, making all attack rolls and ability checks at a -2 penalty; movement rates are also reduced by half).

Crystal Nipper

A distant cousin of the rot grub, the crystal nipper looks like a tiny eel made of blue crystal. It is instinctively drawn to warm bodies and attempts to burrow into any area of exposed flesh; a victim has the same risk of death as if attacked by a rot grub (death in 1-3 turns unless flame is applied to the wound, causing 1-6 points of damage, or cure disease is cast). The biggest danger from the nipper results from its ability to survive out of the water for short periods of time. At night, nippers sometimes surface and crawl onto the shore, advancing towards any nearby warm bodies (such as sleeping campers) at a movement rate of 1. Because of the nipper's anesthetizing secretions, sleeping victims may not realize they have been attacked by a nipper until it's too late. Fortunately, nippers can only survive out of water for an hour, so campers sleeping some distance away from a body of water where nippers are thought to exist are usually safe. Tiny blue worm corpses scattered near the shore of a river or lake is a sure sign of nippers in the area.

The Most Wicked and Corrupt Land in the Realms

The exciting Harpers series continues!

The Red Wizards rule Thay, perhaps the most sinister land in all the Forgotten Realms. As one of their number, Zulkir Maligor, builds a net of treachery and deceit to control the fate of the land, the good-aligned secret organization known as the Harpers seeks to uncover his vile schemes.

So a small band of agents, posing as slaves and traders, are sent by the Harpers to foil the malevolent plottings. Once inside Thay, they discover the undead minions of the Red Wizards, and a fate far worse than death — becoming soulless puppets of one of the wizards!

The Great Glacier

"A village is only as livable as its surroundings. We are caretakers not only of our homes, but of our world."

—Inum

Strange sentiments, perhaps, from one who lives in what many perceive as a frozen wasteland, but the philosopher Inum speaks for the Ulutiun people of the Great Glacier. Their tribes share that icy landscape with arctic dwarves who enjoy sunbathing, sled-animals that are hardier than dogs, and fierce monsters that live nowhere else—and thrive in the freezing air.

The Great Glacier is the first supplement for the FORGOTTEN REALMS[®] campaign setting to detail an Inuit-based culture. In this booklet is fact-based information on building a snow-house, surviving in sub-zero temperatures for extended periods of time, and more ideas for fantasy campaigning in an arctic setting. For those who are tired of the normal, temperate, "you-meet-in-the-tavern-and-proceed-to-go-adventuring" games, here's something completely different.

Make sure your characters dress warmly—it gets nippy at night on the Great Glacier.

Introduction

When the call to war goes out, many people answer. Some are patriots fighting for a cause; others are professional soldiers lured by the sound of gold pieces. Whether they are motivated by avarice or altruism, all these people have a price of some kind.

Sword for hire. Sellsword. Man at arms. Myrmidon. Legionnaire. Soldier of fortune. Hiresword. Mercenary. All these terms—and several unprintable terms as well—identify those men and women who hire themselves out to fight other peoples' battles. Gold & Glory describes these professionals and the groups in which they operate.

The information provided applies chiefly to the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Campaign Setting, primarily the continent of Faerun, but the basic information could be used with most campaigns for the AD&D® game.

Chapter 1 of Gold & Glory describes mercenary companies in general terms: their history, how they are formed, methods of operation, and so forth.

Later chapters detail many of the better-known standing mercenary companies in the Realms.

Chapter 7 offers descriptions of several Non Player Characters (NPCs) who recruit mercenaries for specific tasks. A number of special groups are mentioned in Chapters 8 and 9, which tell how adventuring companies and other groups sometimes interact with mercenary companies.

The final few pages of the book offer an index of mercenary companies and where in the Realms they might be found, as well as statistics that can be used in BATTLESYSTEM™ scenarios.

How to Use This Information

There are several ways for a Dungeon Master (DM) to use mercenary companies in the campaign. DMs should feel free to use any of the ones presented here, to make up new ones, or to allow player characters (PCs) to start a company.

The DM could use the provided mercenary companies as enemies or allies for the player characters. The PCs might join a company for a time—many of the companies herein recruit “local talent” when they have a job in a given area. Some recruit through advertisement, others by coercion.

If the PCs choose to join a mercenary company, they must follow the orders of their superiors; this gives a DM a great mechanism for setting up adventures. A wise DM will be careful not to force too much on the player characters, however.

PCs should probably be treated as a squad of elite troubleshooters. The DM can offer two or three missions for them to choose from, but might sometimes insist that the PCs are the only ones who can handle a specific task.

The PCs may at some time wish to form their own band as well. They could recruit soldiers and lead them into large conflicts. If their fame grows, kingdoms might try to hire the PCs to lead armies of invasion or defense.

Mercenary companies might also be used to inspire small adventures or epic quests. Perhaps a friend to the PCs has been forced to join a mercenary group; maybe a group has been infiltrated by a spy whom the PCs must capture; the possibilities are almost endless.

There are also a few ideas “hidden” in the following text, such as hooks to space adventures, the growth of lizard man power in the south, and so forth.

Chapter 1: Mercenaries in the Realms

Some professional soldiers are loners, choosing when and where they fight, adhering to individual codes of honor, and following whatever clarion draws them to battle. They might be motivated by bloodlust, desire for adventure, or a cause. Many of these lone mercenaries can be found throughout the Realms.

Some mercenaries band together, forming regular companies and operating along military or paramilitary lines. It is these mercenary companies that are the subject of Gold & Glory.

There are two basic types of mercenary corps: standing and recruited. Members of standing companies are always together, often have no other occupations, will do things that won't keep them from leaving on short notice, and are professional adventurers on the side.

In the case of recruited companies, an employer will hire an individual or group to go and quickly build an army.

Some companies are part standing and part recruited, such as standing companies that recruit locals wherever they go. Other companies are recruited, but always from the same group of veterans, sometimes with a few new faces. These latter groups are essentially standing companies without permanent headquarters.

Within the two basic types of companies, there are a number of variations. Some specialize by race, social class, type of weapon, or type of job; others try to have members with a variety of abilities. Some of the more versatile mercenary companies have wizards, thieves, rangers, and priests, in addition to fighters.

General History

Mercenaries have existed for a very long time, from the first time someone asked "What do I get if I fight this war for you?" Military leaders have always had to offer some kind of pay, with land, gold, glory, prestige, or power. True mercenaries travel to any place where there is armed conflict, often caring little on whose side they fight. Others have principles or standards, and will fight only on the "correct" side.

Mercenary forces have changed the outcome of many battles. Over the course of the last century or so, mercenary groups have become more formal, choosing colorful names and advertising their locations. Like many other institutions, they have become a normal aspect of life in the Realms.

Mercenary Companies

Chapters later on in this book offer specific details on several mercenary companies. It may be useful, however, to cover some general principles that apply to all or most mercenary groups.

Formation

Most mercenary groups are formed by the actions of a single, charismatic leader, though a group of leaders is also likely. These people gather veterans of battles, train likely prospects, and organize the company. Some corps are formed by or from adventuring groups.

Recruited companies operate a little differently, as they are formed anew each time one is needed. The employers contact a recruiter or recruiting group, offering a fee for an army. Word is spread for interested parties to meet at a certain place, at which time the recruiter reviews the applicants and decides who may join the corps.

Leadership and Organization

Most mercenary corps operate along military lines, with leaders and their assistants taking military titles. Other companies work more informally, with the leader being essentially a dictator, perhaps with a few counselors or assistants. Some companies are democracies in which members elect their officers, and still others are run like a business.

Strategies and Operations

All companies choose which jobs they will accept based on individual codes and desires. Most are hired for a specific task and left to their own devices to fulfill their assignment. Most companies are responsible for their own transportation to and from the job.

Retiring a Company

A mercenary company stops being a mercenary company when certain events occur. Obviously, the death of all members would eliminate a group. Other corps might break up because of age, while some might achieve the legitimacy of a permanent job. Several examples of "retired" companies are offered in Chapter 6.

Other Sources

Several other products in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Campaign line offer information on mercenary companies. An index of sources appears on the last page of this book.

The Entries

Most of the following descriptions of mercenary companies are done in a standard format, using these headers.

Type: A standing company is one that is together at all times. A recruited company is built by recruiters when the call goes out for an army. Standing/recruits indicates a standing company that recruits locals as well. A company with recruited veterans is one with consistent and loyal members, but without a permanent headquarters, so the company must be called together whenever there is a job. A fixed company has a permanent headquarters.

A company that is roaming has either no particular headquarters, or has several.

Base: This indicates the place (or region) that the company calls home.

Current Sphere(s) of Operation: This lists where the group is currently active.

Leader: This lists the group's leader.

Government: This indicates how the corps operates internally.

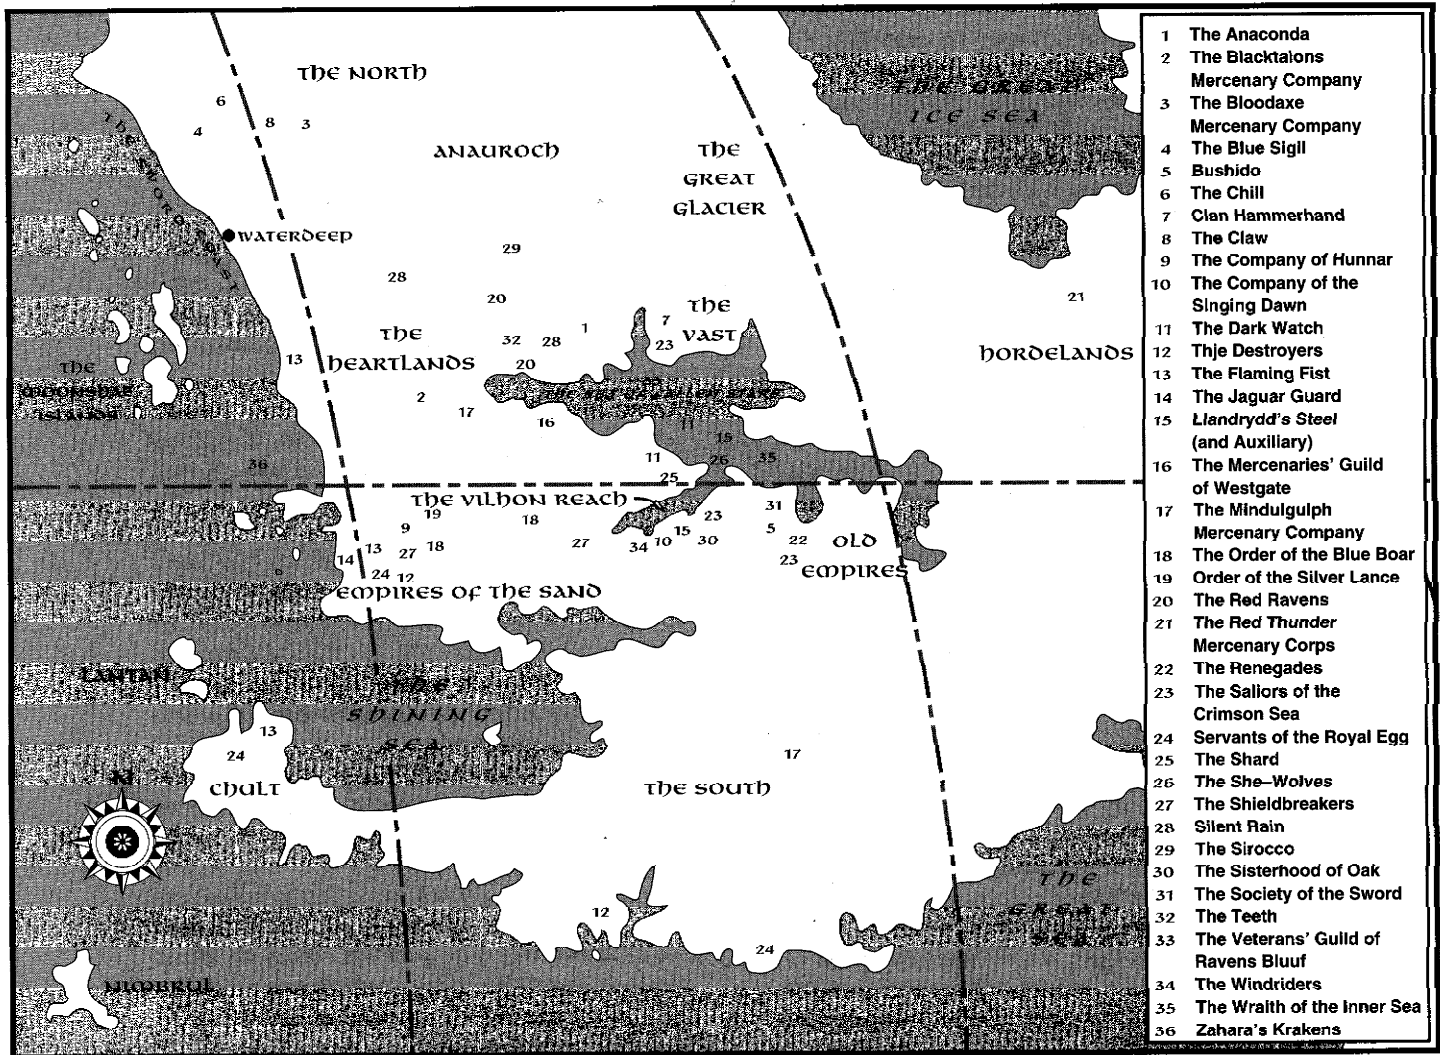

Number of Members: If a range is given, the lowest number is the number of people who always serve; the highest number is the core, plus semi-regulars who might be called in for specific jobs. This number does not include any people who might be recruited locally.

General Alignment: This indicates the basic morals and ethics of the group; individuals may vary.

Larger entries have these headings as well: History describes the group's formation, composition, and past activities; Strategy and Tactics tells how the company chooses and completes jobs; Personality details the group's motivations, code of honor, and friends and enemies; and Logistics describes the group's equipment, requirements, and price.

MERCENARY ACTIVITIES IN THE REALMS

Chapter 2: Standing Companies

This chapter offers details about several of the better-known standing mercenary corps in the Realms. Standing companies are the “standard,” but in the Realms, “standard” can mean many things.

In most cases, standing companies have a single leader; this way, there is no question about who is in charge.

Standing companies generally have a headquarters of some kind, whether it be a castle they have built themselves, or a town where all the members live. Standing companies without permanent headquarters will almost always have a means of transportation, and when they arrive at the location of their job, they usually find lodgings together or set up a large camp.

Standing companies can be worked into an adventuring campaign in several ways. These groups might be recruiting, testing people who want to join by sending them on a mission. Alternately, enemies of a mercenary corps might mislead a group of PCs into raiding the mercenary company’s headquarters.

The Companies

Information about many of the companies can be found in other sources. These entries provide updates on status and activities of these mercenary groups.

The map on page 5 shows where many of the groups operate, while the index on page 64 lists the groups by region and also lists the other sources where information might be found.

The Blacktalons Mercenary Company

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Blacktalon Citadel in Iriaebor

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Traderoutes near Iriaebor

Leader: Taugosz “Tenhammer” Khosann

Government: Councilled dictatorship

Number of Members: 120

General Alignment: Neutral

History: This group formed less than a decade ago, when Taugosz Khosann earned his “Tenhammer” nickname by slaying 10 people with a single swing of his huge warhammer, thus wresting leadership of his bandit gang from the former leader. Tenhammer has led the Blacktalons to a more legal occupation.

Tenhammer, an 11th-level fighter, stands over 7’ tall and weighs about 350 pounds. His size and great strength (18/94) allow him to wield some two-handed weapons with just one hand; his favorite weapon is his great hammer, which causes damage as a battle axe. Tenhammer is an absolute dictator, but has a small council of trusted aides to whom he listens.

The Blacktalons consist of 80 3rd-level fighters, both male and female. In addition, there are 20 1st-level fighters and 20 thieves of levels 3-6. If The Complete Thief’s Handbook is used, give the thieves the scout and bandit kits (in approximately equal numbers).

The Blacktalon sigil is a black, three-taloned claw on a blood red field. It is worn on the breast or helmet, but is never flown from a banner.

Strategies and Tactics: This group prefers jobs guarding caravans, but will also raid caravans for a price. True to their bandit heritage, they sometimes raid unguarded caravans to encourage them to seek protection.

They have on occasion hired themselves out as irregular cavalry, and they act as city defenders in times of trouble—which helps maintain good relations with the local government.

Personality: The Blacktalons are relatively unscrupulous, but have never been known to renege on a contract. They are very vengeful when cheated.

The Blacktalons seldom come into conflict with other mercenary corps, though they have earned the enmity of the Sirocco, the Mindulgulph Company, and several adventuring companies.

Logistics: The Blacktalons have their own mounts, mostly medium warhorses. They prefer to use these mounts, but will ride animals appropriate to the caravan they are guarding. Since Iriaebor is known for fine mounts, the Blacktalons always have fine horses.

They wear a variety of armors and carry a variety of weapons. They often darken their armor with mud or paint, so they do not stand out.

The Blacktalons charge 1 gp per person per day for guard duty. A raid costs an employer 300 gp, in advance.

The Bloodaxe Mercenary Company

Type: Recruited veterans, fixed

Base: Sundabar, in the North

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The North

Leader: Velkor "of the Valiant Arm"
Minairr

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 60-80

General Alignment: Chaotic good

History: The Bloodaxe Mercenary Company was founded by a dwarven adventurer, Deldagg Huldgrym, more than 40 years ago. Most of its original members were dwarven outcasts.

Under Deldagg's leadership, the group fought several bandit bands, an army of orcs, and raiders from Luskan. Many of the original members were slain, and new warriors (mostly humans from the Sword Coast, the North, and the Vilhon Reach) were added to the ranks.

Deldagg died of black lung fever in 1331 DR (1306 by Cormyrian reckoning), and the group's leadership fell to his second in command, Velkor Minairr, a human fighter (11th level). Only four of the original dwarven Bloodaxes remain with the company.

The group—mounted spearmen (30), slingers (10), and axe-men (20)—is largely inactive at present, but occasionally hire themselves out to fight orcish hordes in the North.

To avoid recognition, the Bloodaxes often elect not to display their sigil, a gray axe on a dark red background.

Strategies and Tactics: The Bloodaxes are skilled and versatile, willing to take almost any job, from gladiators to bodyguards. Not overly prideful or crude, their strategies and tactics vary as widely as the types of jobs they take.

Personality: The Bloodaxes are motivated largely by hatred of humanoids, though they do enjoy being paid for killing the creatures. They have few enemies other than humanoids, the Blue Sigil ogres, and the Chill.

Logistics: Their equipment varies widely, though the battle axe is the weapon of choice for most. The group maintains several small bases in the North, where they can replace equipment as needed.

The Bloodaxes may be hired at a cost of but 10 gp per day, since they are currently "down on their luck."

The Company of the Singing Dawn

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Arrabar in Chondath

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Vilhon Reach

Leader: Solara

Government: Council

Number of Members: 250

General Alignment: Neutral good

Note: The Company of the Singing Dawn and its components are described in I14, Swords of the Iron Legion.

History: This group was formed in Chondath about 15 years ago, and was first known as Solara's Elite. Solara trained her people well, and eventually added more units to the company.

The company consists of five 50-member units: Solara's Elite, handpicked 4th-level fighters from the Fields of Nun; the Spears of Dawn, 1st-level fighters; the Forester Guards of Nun, charismatic and chivalrous 3rd-level warriors from the Chondalwood; the Lightblades, 4th-level paladins mounted on pegasi; and the Sunshafts, 7th-level Pegasus-riding elven archers.

The Elite are led by Taran, 6th-level female human fighter; Randwulf Doorbane, a grizzled 8th-level fighter, leads the Spears; the Foresters are led by a 7th-level elven ranger, Miebhailar; Justin Ironedge, a 9th-level human paladin, leads the Lightblades; and the Sunshafts are led by Lotharius Goldentree, a 9th-level elven fighter. These leaders advise Solara, 10th-level ranger and undisputed leader of the Company of the Singing Dawn.

The company's most famous battle was against the forces of Yrkhetep, an arcana-loth who tried to conquer Chondath and Turmish.

The company's symbol is a rose-colored phoenix, with a green key below, to the right, and to the left, all on a field of silver. All members of the company wear some red, pink, or yellow, and many wear sunburst emblems.

Strategies and Tactics: The Singing Dawn prefers to fight evil and is known to do charity work, especially when it involves fighting undead or otherwise promotes worship of the group's patron deity, Lathander. They will not take any job that is antithetical to the worship of the Morninglord.

Solara and her councilors are great tacticians, and they work well together coordinating aerial and ground assaults.

Personality: The Company of the Singing Dawn has a very strict code of honor and chivalry. They are motivated by a wish to do good, though they realize that they need gold to maintain their effectiveness. Their only enemies are the evil and unscrupulous.

Logistics: Each unit has distinctive arms and armor. The Elite uses scale mail, shields with the company's symbol, and long swords with dusky pink stones in the hilt. The Spears wear chain mail and carry silver-tipped spears. The Foresters wear studded leather and carry wooden shields and long swords. The Lightblades wear scale mail and attack with medium lances or long swords +1. The Sunshafts wear scale mail and attack with long bows or long swords. Solara and the unit leaders carry a number of magical items.

The Company of the Singing Dawn is somewhat expensive, requiring 1,000 gp per day, though they will cut that price by 50-75% when asked to fight undead or creatures from the nether planes. They also do some work for free, with council members using personal funds to pay the regular members.

The Flaming Fist

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Baldur's Gate

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Anchorome, Tethyr, Chult, Sword Coast

Leader: Duke Eltan

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 1,600

General Alignment: Lawful neutral

Note: The Flaming Fist Mercenary Company is fully described in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Campaign Set. What follows is a summary of statistics and recent history.

History: Despite recent setbacks, the Flaming Fist is the largest and most powerful mercenary corps in Faerun. Eltan, a Duke of Baldur's Gate, founded the group almost 30 years ago, building it into one of the most effective fighting forces in the Realms.

The Flaming Fist has been very active during the last few years. Recently, 300 members were hired with Sembian funds to participate in the Horde Wars. They acquitted themselves well and reported back with some casualties.

At the same time as the Horde Wars, the Flaming Fist took action against the pirates of the Sword Coast (the same "war" in which the Golden Legion destroyed Akbet-Khrul's forces in Amn). The Fist was able to provide the pirates with a setback they will not soon forget.

Also, Duke Eltan noticed an opportunity in leaderless Tethyr. He has been cautiously scouting the region, hiring out small bands for reduced fees in Tethyr. Wise observers speculate that Eltan wishes to be invited into Tethyr, so he may set up a puppet government.

Because of the Horde Wars and the discovery of Maztica, Duke Eltan has been taken by an urge to explore. He has not yet sent an expedition to the Hordelands and Kara-Tur, though he has recently funded expeditions to Chult and the New World.

The founder of Baldur's Gate (home to the Fist) was a sea captain called Balduran. Long ago, he sailed west past Evermeet, to the fabled islands of Anchorome, returning with great wealth that was used to build the wall around what became Baldur's Gate.

Eltan had always been taken by the tale of Balduran, and wondered about the man's final fate. When word reached Eltan that the Golden Legion had discovered and conquered Maztica, Eltan's curiosity was piqued, and he decided to find Anchorome.

Eltan bought a fleet of ships and sent several hundred men and women across the seas. The ships stopped in Lantan, where the company split, three ships heading to Chult.

The Chult expedition (150 people led by Beluarion and Nenon) recruited an experienced group of six elven mercenaries to act as guides in Chult. The expedition lost roughly half of its number (including Beluarion) in Chult, but was somewhat successful.

The Anchorome expedition was not as successful, however. This group consisted of four leaders (Scar, Bellan, Desedrak, and Yulimtul) and more than 500 mercenaries. The ships also carried 200 horses and a great deal of equipment.

After the 20-ship fleet left Lantan, it was beset by problems ranging from disease to storms. The company clerics were able to keep disease from taking more than a handful of lives, but three ships were completely lost to storms with no survivors. Unfortunately, one of those ships had been designated a hospital ship and was carrying most of the priests when it went down.

When the ships finally reached the Maztican port of Helmsport/Ulatos, they recruited to replace some of their losses, hiring 60 Eagle Knights who wished to fight for glory and land.

Again, the expedition split, with 225 heading northwest overland into the desert, hoping to find the fabled City of Gold. This group, led by Desedrak and Yulimtul, has not been heard from since, and all attempts at magical and psionic contact have failed.

The rest of the group (roughly 340 people and 150 horses) took 15 ships up the coast from Maztica to explore the coast of Anchorome. Again, the group met with disaster.

The Flaming Fist discovered Itzcali, Realm of the Sea People, when sahuagin from that undersea nation attacked and wrecked a third of their ships, which lay anchored several yards off shore. Some people were rescued, and a number of horses were seen swimming to shore. Scar led the Fist in a brilliant counterattack, driving the sahuagin forces away so the ships could escape the area.

When the expedition moved farther north, they discovered a lush and fertile land devoid of civilization. Moving along the coast, they eventually came to the ruined remains of a small fort with a wooden palisade. Broken weapons, rusted armor, and an old ship's log indicated that this was the probable final resting place of Balduran and his crew.

The members of the Flaming Fist soon discovered the likely cause of Balduran's death when they were attacked by a tribe of savage elves sporting odd haircuts and wearing feathers and paints. At the same time—possibly a coincidence—large whale-like beasts attacked the company's ships and sank them. The members of the company performed a fighting retreat until they escaped the territory of the savages.

Less than 100 members of the expedition survived the retreat; these set up Fort

The Expedition of The Flaming Fist

Flame at the mouth of a river that opens into a large bay, which they have named Balduran's Bay.

Scar and a small group of men and women left the encampment, and miraculously made it back to Helmsport, and thence to Baldur's Gate. Eltan may see fit to send reinforcements to the colony, now under Bellan's leadership, and communications have been established through arcane means.

The Flaming Fist's main base is Baldur's Gate, but the company has established secondary bases in Chult and Anchorome, and has an unspecified number of operatives in Tethyr.

Fort Flame holds its leader Bellan (a 10th-level fighter), two rangers, a wizard, five clerics, three thieves (one an assassin), four 6th-level fighters, 17 5th-level fighters, 53 4th-level fighters, and 13 5th-level Eagle Knights (who can change into eagles at will).

Fort Beluarian, on the northern coast of Chult, is supervised by Nenon; she oversees a garrison of three rangers, three wizards (one an assassin), seven priests, two thieves, and 80 fighters (10 6th-level, 20 5th-level, and 50 4th-level).

The main forces in Baldur's Gate are led by Duke Eltan (a 22nd-level fighter), and his assistants Moruene (a 20th-level wizard) and Scar (a 16th-level fighter). All their lieutenants except Koruelve (a 10th-level fighter) are dead or on semi-permanent assignment, so they have recruited the following new unit leaders, all 9th-level fighters: Lendali Firehair, Hercules the Hammer, Delandria, Morgan Redwing, Skot-sar of Berdusk, and Kalvis-talk the Hunter.

The forces in Baldur's Gate include 10 rangers, 10 wizards, 150 priests, 10 assassins (the best of which are a pair of elven wizard-thieves), 15 thieves, and 1,200 fighters (550 3rd-level, 400 4th-level, 150 5th-level, and 50 6th-level).

The Flaming Fist seldom recruits locals for a battle (they hardly need to!), but sometimes hires advisers or guides.

The company is organized along strict military lines. Their symbol is a flaming red fist; it is worn on a white tabard.

Strategies and Tactics: The Flaming Fist always leaves part of its number to defend Baldur's Gate, but will accept almost any job that pays enough. They seldom disappoint their clients.

The Flaming Fist is almost unstoppable on a battlefield, and they should make any would-be conquerors pause and consider.

Personality: The Flaming Fist is motivated by both gold and glory, though Duke Eltan does prefer to stem chaos rather than promote it.

The Fist negotiates contracts wisely and adheres to them stringently; woe to the employer who tries to cheat them.

The Flaming Fist has a number of powerful enemies, including other mercenary companies, the Zhentarim, and the Cult of the Dragon. Assassination attempts on Eltan and the other leaders are fairly common.

Logistics: The Flaming Fist has spent years collecting items both magical and mundane. Each member has two heavy warhorses, and the company owns several wagons, thousands of mules, and a plethora of magical items.

Hiring the entire Flaming Fist costs 10,000 gp per day, with smaller divisions costing a proportionate amount. The mobilization of the company can bankrupt an area.

The Golden Legion

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Helmsport in Maztica

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Maztica

Leader: Alanza DaNosta

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 600

General Alignment: Neutral

Note: The Golden Legion and its exploits are covered in the Maztica Campaign Set; FMA1, Fires of Zatal; and the novels Ironhelm, Viperhand, and Feathered Dragon. What follows is a summary of the company's history.

History: The Golden Legion was formed almost two decades ago by a man named Cordell after the destruction of his previous mercenary corps. Learning from past mistakes, Cordell built slowly, devoting much attention to training.

The Golden Legion, consisting of units of crossbowmen, swordsmen, cavalry, spearmen, and longbowmen, won fame along the Sword Coast. Cordell's legion broke the power of one of the most vicious buccaneers of the Pirate Isles, Akbet-Khrul, who was killed by legion crossbowmen in a great battle in Amn. This earned the gratitude of the Council of Amn, who sponsored the Golden Legion's expedition to Maztica.

Cordell used diplomacy, military strength, and magic to conquer the Nexala, the most powerful political entity in Maztica. Many battles took their toll on the Legion, which was almost destroyed in this campaign.

Cordell became Governor-General of the area, which Amn has claimed as a colony. Alanza DaNosta, a greedy and unsavory sort, has been given command of the Golden Legion, which is now the military garrison in Helmsport, the center of commerce with Faerun.

The group now consists of 100 cavalry, 250 swordsmen, 100 spearmen, 100 bowmen, and 50 crossbowmen.

The Legion's symbol, which is used on its banners, is a golden eagle outlined in black on a field of gold. Some units, particularly cavalry, also have their own symbols.

Strategies and Tactics: The Golden Legion is rapidly losing the elements that make it a mercenary company, instead becoming the legitimate military force of the government of New Amn. Thus, they have little choice in jobs, as they are required to perform guard duty, keep the natives quiet, and so forth.

Though most of the old veterans are now gone, the company still uses good tactics. They will generally soften the enemy with bows and crossbows, then attack with swordsmen and cavalry. Some magic is used as well.

Personality: Though motivated largely by greed, the old Golden Legion had a sense of family to it. As it stands now, the Legion is motivated primarily by a sense of duty toward New Amn. In general, the leadership of the group is corrupt, but many individuals tend to be honest, serious, and honorable. Most still revere Cordell as a great hero.

Most natives in Helmsport/Ulatos dislike the Legion, though many elsewhere remember the Legion's activities in defending both themselves and the Maztican refugees against the beast hordes of Nexala.

Logistics: The Golden Legion is armed with typical, non-magical weapons and armor. Because the region is warm, most have abandoned any steel armor other than breastplates.

The Legion is on retainer to the colonial government of New Amn and is paid by them. They are usually allowed to plunder when used in the field.

Llandrydd's Steel

Type: Standing/recruits, roaming

Base: The Vilhon Reach

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Vilhon Reach, Sea of Fallen Stars

Leader: Llandrydd Wyvernheart

Government: Business

Number of Members: 233-300

General Alignment: Neutral

Note: Additional information on Llandrydd's group can be found in I14, Swords of the Iron Legion.

History: Llandrydd began as a recruiter, but formed a standing company after an extended period of action.

Llandrydd's band has two units, the Steel (150 men led by the charismatic Llandrydd, a 6th-level fighter), and the Auxiliary (80 pike wielders led by Lonth, a 4th-level fighter). Llandrydd almost always recruits locals to expand his company's ranks before a battle.

Each squad of 10 elects a sergeant; these form a board that is chaired by Llandrydd (Lonth is vice-chairman). The board discusses prospective jobs.

Like the Singing Dawn, Llandrydd's group fought against Yrkhetepe.

The corps' sigil is a sword between draped sleeves on a green field.

Strategies and Tactics: In battle, the Steel often wraps around the Auxiliary, whose pikes can attack from the second or third rank. The group is skilled, but does not adapt well to odd situations.

Personality: This corps chooses jobs by profit and contracts for specific time periods. If the job runs long, they will renegotiate and may refuse to renew.

Llandrydd's band is on good terms with the Company of the Singing Dawn and will not fight against them.

Logistics: The men of the Steel wear green chain mail and use both short sword and dagger. The people of the Auxiliary wear leather and carry pikes.

Llandrydd's band charges 500 gp per week, half in advance.

The Mindulgulph Mercenary Company

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Mindulgulph Castle near Priapurl

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Eastern Shaar and the Great Rift

Leader: Gayrlana "Lady Bloodsword"

Government: COUNCELED dictatorship

Number of Members: About 200

General Alignment: Neutral

History: The Mindulgulph Company was formed almost 20 years ago by Gayrlana, "Lady Bloodsword," a 12th-level fighter with psionic talents, including contact and mindlink. She has dusky skin and white hair, and rumors persist that she is part drow.

Gayrlana and her adventuring band raided Mindulgulph Castle in their youth and discovered intelligent monsters inside; rather than wiping them out, they recruited most of the creatures and started a mercenary corps.

Most of the company's non-monstrous members are former adventurers who are specialists of some type. There are currently 80 "normal" members, human and near-human warriors of levels 2-5.

The Mindulgulph Company also has around 120 "monster" members. All have at least low intelligence and are non-evil. None are enslaved in any way, but some unintelligent monsters (notably burbur, golems, and rust monsters) are kept as guards and pets.

The company prefers members who can function in human society with a minimum of disruption, though they also have a number of specialists.

Some notable non-humanoid units include squads of blink dogs, centaurs, giff, grippli, kenku, thri-kreen, and wemics. The Company is known to have members from the following races: beholder, belabra, cave fisher, cildabrin, cloaker, githzerai, hengeyokai, loxo, mimic, plasmoid, q'nidar, shambling mound, shocker, sull, tabaxi, treant, and triton. Many others are possible as well.

Human and near-human members are organized into squads of 10, each with a sergeant; the more monstrous members answer directly to Gayrlana.

The Mindulgulph Company is currently employed by the dwarves of the Great Rift to study the likelihood of a war in the Underdark.

Though most of the company is currently several hundred miles from home, its castle is well-guarded by several of the more monstrous members.

Strategies and Tactics: Gayrlana's company prefers unusual, difficult jobs. They are capable in any environment.

Company tactics vary widely, depending on which members are present, but almost always involve subterfuge and ambush if possible. Gayrlana is a tactical genius as well as a telepath, so is very adept at exploiting the strengths of her troops.

Personality: The corps is trustworthy as a whole. On occasions, individual members have caused problems, but Gayrlana takes pains to set things right when such events transpire.

The Company is friendly with most other mercenary corps, though they consider the Blacktalons enemies.

Logistics: The company possesses and uses a wide array of equipment. They have no standard armor or weapons.

Gayrlana uses a special whipsting sword, which does 1d6 damage and may be used as a whip as well. She has a suit of dress plate, but usually wears lighter armor under a gown or cloak.

A mission performed by the company costs a minimum of 500 gp per day, more if large numbers are required.

The Red Raven Mercenary Company

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Arabel in Cormyr

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Cormyr, the Stonelands, Anauroch

Leader: Rayanna the Rose

Government: Democratic council

Number of Members: 110

General Alignment: Lawful neutral

History: The Red Ravens were formed by several people who fought in the Horde Wars. After the wars, a few of those who would eventually lead the group pooled their funds to get a royal charter in Cormyr, then asked several friends to join.

The company operates on a system of "one person, one vote." They meet annually to elect an overall leader, and then to choose sergeants for each group of 10. Rayanna the Rose has been leader for over two years now, and her policies are generally well-received.

The group works mostly for the Cormyrian government or for Cormyrian merchants. They have recently worked to "clean up" the Stonelands, and have seen some action in Anauroch and against the Zhentarim.

The company's symbol is an amulet showing a red raven.

Strategies and Tactics: The Red Ravens prefer government jobs, such as fighting bandits or goblinoids.

Their battlefield tactics are fairly simple and straightforward, though they will engage in an occasional ambush.

Personality: As one of the few groups in Cormyr with a "license to pillage," the Red Ravens are very careful to not do anything to lose their charter. They never cheat clients.

Logistics: Most Red Ravens carry swords and wear studded leather. They charge 200 gp per week.

The Renegades

Type: Standing, roaming

Base: Chessenta

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Chessenta

Leader: Helyos

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 200

General Alignment: Neutral (evil)

History: The Renegades are human males from Akanax, city of soldiers. They chose exile from their home so they could earn gold as well as glory.

The Renegades' leader, Helyos, a 14th-level fighter, is considered one of the toughest and meanest fighters in Chessenta. In a recent tournament, he nearly won the throne of Mourktar. The company comprises 70 cavalry (3rd-level fighters led by the 10th-level Pyrimestes), 20 infantry (2nd-level fighters led by the 7th-level Themis), and 90 archers (1st-level fighters led by the 9th-level Hamilcar). There are also six scouts and 10 low-level mages in the company.

Strategies and Tactics: The corps will take any job if the price is right.

On the battlefield, the Renegades will do whatever it takes to win. The mages and archers generally soften the enemy before the infantry engages, which allows the cavalry to sweep in for the kill.

Personality: The Renegades are known for ruthlessness and excessive pillaging. They are unscrupulous and will twist the spirit of agreements with employers. They have many enemies, but are on good terms with several pirate bands.

Logistics: The infantry uses chain mail, shield, and long sword, while the archers use leather armor, long bow, and broadsword. Cavalry uses heavy warhorses, plate mail, lance, and shield.

The corps charges 200 gp per week.

The Sailors of the Crimson Sea

Type: Standing, roaming

Base: Chessenta

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Chessenta, Chondath

Leader: Lhrek Jarsyn

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 185

General Alignment: Lawful neutral

History: This group's name is a metaphor: "the crimson sea" is a bloody battlefield, and "sailors" are soldiers.

Formed only a few years ago by a man named Bendix, the Sailors of the Crimson Sea have seen many hardships. In the recent battle of Thurgabanteth in Chondath, the company lost many of its fighters, including Bendix.

After a political fight for leadership between Lhrek Jarsyn (7th-level fighter) and Iurnan Chall (7th-level wizard), Lhrek became leader, Chall his top adviser. They have three lieutenants.

Chard leads the cavalry (60 2nd-level warriors); Masoth leads the infantry (20 2nd-level fighters and 60 4th-level fighters); and Vidad leads the archers (40 1st-level warriors).

Strategies and Tactics: The Sailors prefer to be on the right side of a conflict, but never work for free.

Once in combat, the company employs good tactics, though morale has a tendency to be low because of the politics among the leaders.

Personality: The Sailors always hold up their end of a bargain. They have a few enemies, mostly evil groups. They are careful in forests because of a past encounter with treants in the Chondalwood.

Logistics: Cavalry uses plate mail, shield, and lance; infantry, plate or chain mail, shield, and long sword; and archers, leather armor and long bows.

The sailors ask 250 gp per week.

The Society of the Sword

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Cimbar in Chessenta

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Chessenta, the Vilhon Reach

Leader: Stilmus

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 1,020

General Alignment: Lawful neutral

History: The Society of the Sword is the largest and oldest mercenary group in Chessenta. Formed nearly a century ago, the company's leadership has passed through many hands.

The current leader is Stilmus, 15th-level fighter and scarred veteran of many conflicts. His lieutenants are Belvorides, a 12th-level mage, who leads five 5th-level and 10 3rd-level mages; Aronidas, an 8th-level elven fighter/mage, who leads the archer unit (200 2nd-level warriors); Artema, female 9th-level half-elven fighter, who leads the infantry corps (100 4th-level fighters and 500 2nd-level fighters); and Marcellus, 8th-level fighter, who leads the cavalry unit (200 4th-level warriors).

Within each unit, each squad of 10 has a sergeant, and each platoon of five squads has a captain. These leaders are chosen by Stilmus and his lieutenants from the best leaders in each unit. The Society of the Sword has gained fame for its activities in Chessenta and its neighboring areas. They have often been called upon to break the strength of one pirate clan or another.

Strategies and Tactics: The Society prefers high-prestige jobs. They will not fight against weak opponents.

Stilmus and his lieutenants are great tacticians, and the company is deadly on the battlefield. Stilmus is also a fine strategist, and tries to engage the enemy in advantageous situations.

The Society of the Sword never indulges in looting; any individual caught doing so is permanently expelled from the company.

Personality: The Society of the Sword believes that good mercenaries should be worth twice the price they charge. The members of this group are proud warriors, but are less interested in glory than in doing a good job. They practice constantly to hone their skills, and all members specialize in the use of the long sword.

Stilmus is obsessed with honor. Once an agreement is made, he will uphold it, both in letter and in spirit. If another party tries to cheat him or his company, he considers this a challenge to his honor, something he takes very seriously. Stilmus has fought many duels to defend his honor, and on occasion has dragged his company along on a quest for vengeance.

Stilmus hates Helyos, leader of the Renegades, because Helyos tried to kill him to gain control of a mercenary company in which they both served. Stilmus looks forward to a time when the Society of the Sword can eliminate the Renegades and Helyos.

Logistics: All members of the Society carry long swords. Members of the cavalry and infantry units wear plate mail and carry shields. The archers wear studded leather and carry long bows in addition to their long swords. The cavalry unit uses heavy warhorses.

The company charges 1,500 gp per week, or 300 gp per day for shorter jobs. Employers are also expected to pay any expenses for transportation, food, and additional equipment.

The Society keeps wills for its members, paying shares to the beneficiaries of slain members.

The Veterans' Guild of Ravens Bluff

Type: Standing/recruits, fixed

Base: Ravens Bluff

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Sea of Fallen Stars, the Vast

Leader: Giovanni the Drake

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 300-500

General Alignment: Neutral

History: Giovanni the Drake is a human 5th-level fighter/8th-level bard who started a guild in Ravens Bluff for the veterans of the Horde wars.

Giovanni is assisted by a four-person staff: Borg Doon, his second-in-command; Dag Silverbrow, tactician; Nyssa, strategist; and Mario the Axe, logistics officer. There are also five unit commanders who were chosen by their units.

Standard fighting units are infantry (100 1st-level warriors); archers (100 3rd-level fighters); cavalry (50 2nd-level fighters); wizards (20 mages, levels 2-5). The fifth unit consists of 15 priests (mainly healers) and 10 bards who form a musical corps to inspire the troops before they enter battle.

The Veterans are employed mostly to keep the free cities safe from pirates.

Strategies and Tactics: The Veterans prefer to work for local governments and merchants. While the Drake himself is not an expert in military matters, he has gathered a staff which is.

Personality: This company is motivated primarily by a desire for enough gold to live on. They never betray clients and have not been in existence long enough to make enemies.

Logistics: The Veterans have a variety of arms and equipment, though their standard is scale mail and long sword.

The company charges 1 gp per person per day when on a job.

Chapter 3: Nonhuman Companies

Though not yet “standard” in the Realms, nonhuman companies in general are becoming more common as more races become curious about the world around them.

In contrast, elven and dwarven mercenaries have existed for centuries, but are becoming less common as the population of those races dwindles. Most elves and dwarves would rather not be paid for ending their lives early.

Most nonhuman companies are made up of ogres or goblinoids. Some groups form spontaneously when an entire tribe decides to hire itself out as a mercenary corps; these groups are usually led by their chieftains or shamans. They might be motivated by greed, or lack of food and other necessities may drive them to seek employment.

Other nonhuman mercenary corps are founded by powerful human wizards or monstrous leaders, inspired by greed, a need for revenge, or some similar motivation. These leaders usually dominate the company completely, holding its members almost as slaves.

Nonhuman mercenary companies can serve as wonderful antagonists in campaign situations.

The Companies

Most of the entries in this section appear in a somewhat abbreviated format.

The map on page 5 shows where many of the groups operate, while the index on page 64 lists the groups by region and also lists the other sources where information might be found.

The Blue Sigil

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Mog’s Keep near Longsaddle

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The North

Leader: Mog the Fist

Government: Dictatorship

Number of Members: 450

General Alignment: Neutral evil

History: The Blue Sigil ogres became a mercenary company about 15 years ago, when imminent starvation drove their leader, Thorog, to find a way to support his tribe. Thorog’s tribe had been raided several times by adventurers, some with unique symbols, some paid by nearby towns to kill ogres.

Thorog, a rather smart ogre, reasoned that if other people could get paid to kill ogres, ogres could get paid to kill other people. He created the company’s sigil and required all members to wear it for unity. The symbol, a blue circle crossed by a crescent moon and a lightning strike, is also displayed on armor and the back of helmets (so the ogres know not to stab other members in the back).

The savage Blue Sigil had problems getting hired at first, but they have gained a reputation for living up to their agreements. They charge 500 gp per week and enjoy looting.

Thorog and the leaders who followed him (Mog is the eighth) have used some of the company’s funds to purchase special arms and armor for the ogres and ogresses of the Blue Sigil. The group keeps these in good condition.

Thorog and his successors have accepted lone ogres into their group if they undergo an initiation, and the corps maintains a fairly large population.

The Blue Sigil is enemy to the Bloodaxes and the Chill.

The Chill

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Chill Tower in the Lurkwood

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The North

Leader: Ardenor Crush

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 650

General Alignment: Lawful evil

History: Though he appears to be a normal hobgoblin, Ardenor Crush is a reincarnated evil warrior and should be treated as a 10th-level fighter. After he found himself in a hobgoblin body, Ardenor formed a band to exact revenge on those who had slain him.

He found his friend Grangor (the 13th-level wizard who reincarnated him) and gathered most of the goblinoid troops who survived the Second Battle of Urml (see I14, Swords of the Iron Legion). With these allies, he hunted and killed the group of adventurers who thought they had ended his evil ways.

Ardenor led his band into the North, gathering a large, well-trained force with five units: the Frost Riders, 100 hobgoblins armed with battle axes and mounted on heavy warhorses; the Winter Wolves, 100 goblins armed with spears and mounted on winter wolves; the Cold Steel, 150 orcish swordsmen; the Frigid Fists, 50 ogrish shock troops; and the Icicles, 200 kobold archers specializing in ambushes. The group is well-equipped and very dangerous. They charge 500 gp per week.

Ardenor has several magical items, including gauntlets of ogre power and an amulet that allows him to summon a nightmare for up to eight hours each day. Grangor does not accompany the corps on missions, but instead usually remains in Chill Tower to defend it. Each unit is headed by a lieutenant of the same type, but with maximum hit points.

The company's symbol, worn on the upper arm, is the brand of a fist around which is the tattoo of a white nimbus.

The Chill has a number of enemies, including the Bloodaxes and the Blue Sigil ogres. Though on poor terms with most of the orcish tribes in the region, they are sometimes hired by them.

Clan Hammerhand

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Ravens Bluff

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Bloodstone Lands, the Vast

Leader: Garren Hammerhand

Government: Clan

Number of Members: 200

General Alignment: Lawful good

History: Clan Hammerhand is a long-lived dwarven clan that was established in Earthfast and in Ravens Bluff when it was still Sarbreen.

After the Horde Wars—in which several Hammerhands participated—the entire clan determined to resettle in Earthfast, which would involve removing a number of the goblinoids there. To support the clan and gain battle experience, several Hammerhands hire themselves out as mercenaries.

The mercenaries maintain offices in Ravens Bluff, Tantras, and Telflamm. To distinguish themselves, they wear beads (ranging from simple stone to jeweled gold) in their beards and hair.

All of Clan Hammerhand's mercenaries are infantry, wielding a variety of weapons; hammers are the most popular by far, but there are a number of battle axes and footman's picks as well. They are excellent at underground maneuvers and quite good at sieges. They charge 5 gp per member per week or portion thereof.

The Claw

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: The Trollmoors in the North

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The North, the Underdark

Leader: Killithor the Alhoon

Government: Dictatorship

Number of Members: 100

General Alignment: Lawful evil

History: The Claw is a company of trolls. The members of the Claw wear no symbols, and are directed in battlefield action by hidden masters, presumed by most to be the wizards who are contacted when somebody wishes to hire the mercenary company.

The real leader of the Claw is Killithor the Alhoon, an "illithilich" as described in the Menzoberranzan boxed set. Alhoon are undead, psionic mind flayers who can cast spells as 9th-level wizards. Killithor has a council of four normal mind flayers under his control. These in turn communicate with the four human wizards who direct commerce for the Claw, demanding a flat fee of 1,000 gp for any job lasting up to one month.

The Alhoon and his officers are very secretive and seldom seen. They participate in Claw battles, but never risk their secrecy. Killithor has never been known to participate in a battle directly, and has been seen only by his illithid council.

The Claw was formed to spread destruction and may eventually act as a body of shock troops for some nefarious plan of Killithor's.

The trolls of the Claw have no choice on the jobs they take. Their tactics are very basic, though mental commands from the leaders direct them. With their regenerative ability and attacks, the trolls are very effective troops.

The Red Thunder Mercenary Corps

Type: Standing, roaming

Base: The Hordelands

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Hordelands

Leader: Glory Black-hoof

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 150

General Alignment: Neutral

History: The Red Thunder was formed primarily by centaurs from the Chondalwood after they participated in the Battle of Five Crowns in the war against the arcanaloth Yrkhete (see I14, Swords of the Iron Legion).

Glory Black-hoof was a minor officer in the centaur forces; meeting and fighting aside members of other races piqued her curiosity, as well as that of other centaurs. After the wars, she and about 30 other centaurs formed a small mercenary company.

The Red Thunder saw action in the Shaar, along the Vilhon Reach, and in the Bloodstone Lands. More centaurs were recruited into the band, which moved its operation into the Hordelands after the Horde Wars. There, they came in contact with the nomadic centaurs of the steppes (see the Horde boxed set), a tribe of which joined the Red Thunder. Though the nomads were not used to female leadership, they have learned that Glory is a masterful tactician.

The company consists of three units of 50 archers each; one unit also carries nets and long swords, another sabres, and the third lances. The company prefers to attack with bows, and will retreat to lead opponents into ambush.

The Red Thunder Corps works primarily as caravan guards, for which they charge a reasonable fee of 150 gp per week.

Servants of the Royal Egg

Type: Standing/recruits, roaming

Base: Rethild

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Chult, Tethyr

Leader: Sladdis (Ghassis)

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 200-500

General Alignment: Neutral

History: These spear-wielding lizardmen are unusual among mercenary corps because they are slaves. This group is “rented out” to whomever offers the lizard king Ghassis sufficient gold. The group’s normal cost is 10 sp per member per week, to which Ghassis adds up to 1 gp per slave per week for hazardous jobs (those in which he expects 25% or greater casualties). As long as the gold is right, Ghassis has no qualms about sending the company on even the most dangerous missions, but expects payment in advance.

Ghassis is a shrewd, well-traveled individual. It is rumored he has connections to spelljamming lizard men who supply him with large numbers of strong and intelligent slaves.

Wise employers provide strong leadership and explicit instructions for the corps because the Servants show little initiative. Their field leader Sladdis is intelligent, but is trained to follow orders rather than give them.

The Servants will follow simple, direct tactical orders with single-minded determination. These mercenaries are known for their intense sense of group identity, and few of these implacable reptiles have the imagination to truly fear much of anything. If an employer is interested in hiring a mercenary company for a dangerous, thankless, yet straightforward task, the Servants of the Royal Egg should be considered.

The Shard

Type: Standing, roaming

Base: The Orsraun Mountains

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Unknown

Leader: Londa Ironhead

Government: Clan

Number of Members: ? (less than 50)

General Alignment: Neutral evil

History: The Shards may exist only in memory now. Two seasons ago, a party of adventurers stumbled upon a scene of carnage, noting three red dragon corpses and a large number of charred ogre bodies with the distinctive obsidian-edged weapons that marked members of the Shard. Eagerly searching for treasure, the adventurers found only scorched ground and a few stray coins, leading them to believe that at least some of the ogres had escaped.

The Shieldbreakers

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Shieldbreaker Citadel south of the Deepwash

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Tethyr (?)

Leader: Koranan Splitoak

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 320

General Alignment: Lawful evil

History: The Shieldbreakers are ogres named for their action upon refusing to support their chief’s slaughter of a human village. They still refuse to use shields in battle, but instead wield two-handed weapons, especially bardiches.

Led by the veteran mercenary Koranan Splitoak, the Shieldbreakers accept any job save one calling for the murder of unarmed foes (which they consider dishonorable). This corps is one of the most respected in the Realms.

They ask 50 gp per day of action.

Silent Rain

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Evereska

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The North, the Stonelands

Leader: Nightshade

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 100 (?)

General Alignment: Chaotic good

History: Little is known of this mysterious group of elven archers, for few have survived their "deadly rain" of arrows. Of those few, none have seen even one of the infamous mercenaries. The company is recognized by their arrows, which use red-striped black fletching and uniquely shaped heads.

Consisting solely of elves, the Silent Rain is one of the most exclusive of mercenary corps. Caring little for gold and fame (they ask only 100 gp per week), Silent Rain will agree only to jobs that either promote elven causes or involve destroying humanoids.

Prospective employers must leave written word (in elvish) near Evereska, and the Silent Rain will send a representative if interested. Little is known of their leader, but she is supposedly as deadly and as beautiful as her namesake.

The Teeth

Type: Standing

Base: The Stonelands

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Stonelands, the Goblin Marches

Leader: Jadron the Fang

Government: Dictatorship

Number of Members: 100-200

General Alignment: Chaotic evil

History: These ogres are led by one of the cruelest mercenary captains known, Jadron the Fang. Jadron is utterly ruthless and is as much feared and respected by his own warriors as by his enemies. Over the course of his short and bloody career, Jadron has made many enemies and no friends. Nightshade, leader of the Silent Rain, is particularly vehement in her hatred of Jadron and the Teeth.

To join the Teeth, an ogre must go through a rigorous initiation, including filing all teeth to sharp points. The only way to leave the Teeth is by dying.

The Teeth are loosely organized into units of 19 warriors and a sergeant who reports directly to Jadron. These units can be employed separately or combined to form a larger force. The Teeth favor quick, decisive combat and favor striking from several directions at once to confuse and frighten their foes. The Teeth are especially fond of biting their opponents, leaving distinctive marks on their victims.

This company hires itself out for any job for 2 gp per warrior per week.

Chapter 4: Regional Companies

This chapter covers mercenary companies that originated in areas other than Faerun, or in little-known and culturally unique areas of the continent. None of the corps presented in the next few pages are medieval and western European in feel.

The corps in this chapter offer DMs an opportunity to introduce other cultures to players, but be warned: these entries are very brief. To give the players a real feel for an encounter with members of another culture, DMs will need to do some independent research.

One difference is especially notable in the companies of this chapter: the motivations for formation. Some companies formed for a specific task, while others began as an exploratory mission, and still others became mercenary groups and traveled to Faerun because of the promise of better conditions than they faced at home.

Whatever the reason, these companies are generally less concerned with the primary motivations of gold and glory. This is not to say that companies from other regions are never inspired by such things; these samples are simply presented as a contrast to the standard companies of the Realms.

The Companies

Several of the entries in this chapter appear in abbreviated format.

The map on page 5 shows where many of the groups operate, while the index on page 64 lists the groups by region and also lists the other sources where information might be found.

The Anaconda

Type: Standing, roaming

Base: the Elven Wood near Elmwood

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Dalelands and the Stonelands

Leaders: Nkonzi and Kwanza

Government: Brotherhood

Number of Members: 90

General Alignment: Neutral

History: This company of black men and women is a brotherhood of warriors sworn to defend one another to the death. Membership is open only to fighting couples; man and wife join at the same time and fight in pairs. Two small rows of diamond-shaped ritual scars on the scalp signify initiation.

The current leaders are Nkonzi Maru, an 11th-level ranger specialized in the spear, and her husband Kwanza Maru, a 9th-level priest of the snake god that is the Anaconda's patron deity. The troops are mostly 3rd-level warriors with concealment and tracking skills.

The origins of the Anaconda warrior society are lost, even to Nkonzi. Their culture is sophisticated but insular, and their language and rituals are never shared with outsiders. Their homeland is an island far to the southwest. Persistent rumors of weretigers among the Anaconda ranks have never been confirmed or denied.

They use poison when outnumbered, but only under a strict code. Only missile weapons may be poisoned, and only one member of a pair may use them.

Strategies and Tactics: The Anaconda take any paying job, but their pay scale always reflects the amount of trouble they expect. Rumors place them as taking jobs both protecting and looting caravans in the Dalelands as well as fighting both with and against the goblinoids of the Stonelands. Their enemies claim they occasionally work for the Zhentarim; as on many subjects, they have no comment.

The Anaconda excel as irregular troops and advance scouts, harassing and withdrawing or setting ambushes. Their ambushes frequently take place by night and involve poisoned blowgun darts. Kwanza can mix a potion that mimics infravision, allowing the Anaconda to operate at night.

In large battles or when on caravan duty they employ Blanka, their elephant mascot, as a rallying point. Nkonzi sometimes has other animal companions as well, including a brace of hawks and a white tiger. The Anaconda's ability to speak an obscure language makes the use of codes unnecessary in battle.

Personality: The Anaconda is a closed group, unwilling to admit outsiders into their confidence. They have a calculating approach to their work; they resent every loss they take, and employers who seek to place them in unnecessary jeopardy often find themselves facing a blood feud carried on by the entire company. However, they never back out of a contract; even if it costs them a dozen pairs of fighters, they finish the job. As soon as their contract expires, however, their employer had better have hired some new help—the Anaconda will destroy everything they just finished defending if their services were underappreciated.

Logistics: The Anaconda travels light; members use scimitars, spears, hand axes, and javelins, and a third of them carry blowguns. They wear hides or leather armor and carry shields.

The basic cost to retain the Anaconda is 120 gp per week but can go to as much as 400 gp for night raids and long-range reconnaissance.

Bushido

Type: Standing, roaming

Base: Chessenta

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Chessenta

Leader: Noro Amoto

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 181

General Alignment: Lawful neutral

History: Inspired by western contact during the Horde Wars, this corps is learning about Realms cultures and hopes to report back to Kara-Tur. It contains 60 heavy infantry, 60 medium cavalry, and 60 mounted archers.

The samurai Noro Amoto, a 10th-level fighter, raised the Bushido to defend the lands of Kara-Tur against the Horde. After fighting well, his men kept marching west.

Noro is choosy about commissions and accepts only honorable work. In battle, Noro prefers to deploy his footmen in strong set positions for foes to break themselves against while the archers harry them. The cavalry are saved for the final blow or to cover a withdrawal. Hard-riding messengers convey orders from Noro to his three lieutenants.

Noro rules with a firm hand; all decisions are his. The company always abides by the code of bushido. They never loot the dead. Transient, they make few attachments, and are curious about both customs and military skill. They have had two inconclusive run-ins with the Renegades.

Bushido is well armed. The archers carry short composite bows and short swords, and wear leather armor. The footmen bear spears and wear brigandine armor. The cavalry has katanas, lances, and banded mail.

The cost of the corps is 700 gp a week.

The Jaguar Guard

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Myratma in Tethyr

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:
Tethyr

Leader: Miquiztl Manik

Government: Brotherhood

Number of Members: 72

General Alignment: Neutral

History: The Jaguar Guards are from Maztica (see the Golden Legion entry).

Each member of the company is a Jaguar Knight from the city-state of Kultaka. Jaguar Knights are part of an elite order, a brotherhood that served as leaders for Maztican armies. They are recognizable by their distinctive jaguar skin armor.

Kultakan warriors helped the Golden Legion conquer the great nation of Nexal. Many of them did not realize their entire continent had been opened to the people of Faerun. Later, when things quieted a bit, the leaders of Kultaka decided to learn about the newcomers by sending a group across the seas to Faerun.

The decision was aided by the presence of a merchant from Myratma, a port city in Tethyr. This fellow, Gar Hollan, offered transportation to Faerun and glorious battle when they arrived.

The Jaguar Guard has been active in skirmishes in Tethyr, where they have lost a few men. They will probably become more active in the future, either as elite skirmishers or as leaders of other military units.

Each Jaguar Guard is a 5th-level warrior, except their leader, who is a 10th-level fighter. Miquiztl Manik has hopes that he and his company can claim some land in Faerun, to which they can bring family and friends.

The Jaguar Knight kit is fully described in the Maztica boxed set. If that reference is unavailable, use the following abilities for these characters: they can transform into jaguars at will and may cast one spell per day, talonblade, which allows them to give a stone weapon a +3 enchantment for a period of one hour.

Strategies and Tactics: The Jaguar Guard currently has an exclusive contract with the council of Myratma, and accepts almost any combat duty. They will not engage in needless slaughter, and they understand honor.

In battle, the Jaguar Guards often act as skirmishers, their ability to change into jaguars giving them some advantages in surprise and stealth. When not using guerrilla tactics, the Jaguar Guard will offer opposing units the chance to become prisoners (a compromise between their style of battle, in which taking prisoners was important, and the style of Faerun).

Miquiztl Manik (roughly translatable as “hand of death”) is a master tactician, as are most of his warriors. They follow orders explicitly.

Personality: The Jaguar Guards were raised as warriors. As Jaguar Knights, they were nobles in their homeland. In Faerun, they have not received treatment befitting nobles because most people regard them as ignorant savages. Savages they may be, but they are intelligent ones with a sense of honor.

The Jaguar Guards have few enemies in Faerun, though it is only a matter of time before they earn the enmity of other forces in Tethyr.

Logistics: The Jaguar Guards are armed with knife, spear, and maca (treat the latter as a battle axe). They charge 50 gp per week, plus food, lodging, and any steel weapons used by their defeated enemies.

The Realmspace Companies

If the SPELLJAMMER® boxed set is used (or even acknowledged), the DM should consider the companies detailed in SJR2, Realmspace. Though these companies act primarily in wildspace and on the other planets of the Toril system, they occasionally interact with the peoples of Toril.

This chapter briefly discusses the four major Realmspace companies and their operations on Toril. If the DM wishes, these companies could be used as adventure hooks to move the player characters into a wildspace adventure.

In particular, if the players happened to stumble upon a neogi or illithid slaving operation, they may come in contact with one or more of the following groups. Alternatively, if someone were able to contact one of the groups, their services might be purchased—provided they were hired to do something basically good.

Code Helm

This large group (more than 300 people) resides near the sixth planet of the Toril system, Glyth. They conduct raids against mind flayer “ranches” to free the humanoids held as slaves and cattle by the illithids.

Most members of Code Helm are paladins (including their leader, 21st-level Easel Gifford of Amn), though many are specialty priests of Helm. The company is ruled in a military fashion.

If illithid activities increased on Toril, or if word reached Code Helm of a mind flayer “ranch” in the Realms, they would very likely arrange a large raid.

If contacted and offered both money and a chance to kill mind flayers, Code Helm would probably operate much like a mercenary company.

Emerald Brotherhood

This group started out as adventurers in the Realms, operating in Amn, Tethyr, the Thornwood, and the Snowflake Mountains. They were taken into wildspace by illithid slavers.

The Emerald Brotherhood has pledged itself to fight neogi and mind flayers. They may follow individuals of these type to Toril—or may be followed to Toril by neogi, who have offered a high bounty for their deaths. Though the Brotherhood has only four members, it is possible they would recruit an army if a neogi or illithid slaving operation were discovered on Toril.

The Enforcers

The Enforcers consist of 11 people who are active against pirates and mind flayers in the Toril system. The group is led by a lizard man ranger (8th level Frollth) and a good frost giant (Murray Coldstare). There are also mages, priests, and fighters in the crew.

Members of the Enforcers are vigilantes who have a tendency to ignore established laws when pursuing justice. Like the Emerald Brotherhood, they are potential mercenary recruiters.

The Gauntlet

This is another group devoted to ending neogi and illithid slaving operations. They consider themselves the police force of the Tears of Selune, the small group of asteroids that orbit Toril in the wake of the moon Selune.

The 14 members of the Gauntlet include high-level mages, priests, and paladins. As with the Emerald Brotherhood and the Enforcers, if a neogi or illithid operation were discovered on Toril, the Gauntlet could become mercenary recruiters.

The She-Wolves

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Ixinos, Vilhon Reach

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Vilhon Reach, the Sea of Fallen Stars

Leader: Theia Heithalata

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 240

General Alignment: Lawful neutral

History: The She-Wolves are female warriors from a small island in the mouth of the Vilhon Reach. Their society is an amazon-style culture, and the women of Ixinos are trained for battle almost from their birth.

The She-Wolves mercenary company was formed nearly a century ago to allow amazons with wanderlust the opportunity to travel while helping to support their homeland.

Though the membership of the She-Wolves rotates, the company always has two units of infantry (each with 50 3rd-level warriors), one of cavalry (50 4th-level warriors), and one of archers (50 5th-level warriors). There are also 10 scouts (rangers, levels 4-7), 10 sorceresses (levels 2-5), and 20 priestesses (levels 3-8). Each unit has a leader of like abilities, chosen from members of the unit. The group's current overall leader, Theia, is a 9th-level paladin.

If possible, the DM should use the amazon kits from The Complete Fighter's Handbook, The Complete Priest's Handbook, and The Complete Wizard's Handbook.

Strategies and Tactics: The amazons will take almost any military job, though they greatly prefer to be on the "good" side of a conflict. They will not accept employment from men who look down on women. In times of need, the She-Wolves also defend the shores of Ixinos and neighboring islands from pirate incursions.

The She-Wolves' tactics vary with the terrain. Since the She-Wolves have trained all their lives to be warriors, they can work together without the usual confusion inherent in battle. They have developed a rapid code that allows them to change tactics for the entire company with only a few sharp commands. Their shifting lines and contrasting tactics often throw enough confusion into their enemies that these foes do not last long on the battlefield.

Personality: By nature, the She-Wolves are a reclusive and strongly matriarchal society, and feel no debt to men whatsoever. However, they will help any woman in trouble.

They also have a well-defined code of honor, and will not betray their contracts. Wise employers should be wary, however, of cheating the She-Wolves. If they suspect that they are being taken advantage of in some way, their vengeance is deadly and quick.

The She-Wolves have few enemies, except for the pirates of the Fallen Stars, who cannot remember a time without the amazons. The She-Wolves have disrupted piracy near their isles for their entire history and have earned the wrath of the pirates.

Logistics: The She-Wolves are generally well-equipped: one infantry unit carries short swords, the other spears, and both wear bronze plate mail; the cavalry wears scale mail and carries lances and shortswords; archers, scouts, wizards, and priests carry long bows and daggers, with all but the wizards wearing leather armor.

The basic cost to retain the She-Wolves is 500 gp per week.

The Sirocco

Type: Standing, roaming

Base: Anauroch

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Anauroch

Leader: Hajima sitt-Nasir

Government: Clan

Number of Members: 80

General Alignment: Neutral good

History: There are rumors of a land in the far, far south, where there exist civilizations of great glory and might, and where the people live and have always lived in peace and prosperity.

The Sirocco claim to be from the far southern lands, beyond even the Great Sea south of Halruaa. Little is known of their past, except that they entered the north a dozen years ago.

After accepting mercenary jobs in the Shaar and in the Old Empires, they eventually arrived in Anauroch, where they quickly carved a life from the hostile sands.

The Sirocco have none of the strange prejudices that mark many of the tribes of Anauroch; all races are welcome as long as they pay due homage to the true gods. None are turned away on their appearance alone. Their commander is a fiery 10th-level female elven fighter, and she leads a mixed band of human, elven, and dwarven fighters. If the Arabian Adventures book is available, use the Desert Rider kit to define every member of the Sirocco.

Strategies and Tactics: The Sirocco see their job as protecting caravans crossing the dangerous desert, as well as patrolling the sands to defend against hostile creatures. Although they have, on occasion, been known to take jobs outside the desert, they do so only when absolutely necessary. The desert may be inhospitable, but it is their home.

Their tactics are simple: waving their scimitars over their heads and shrieking out a ululant war cry, they trample their enemies into the dusty desert.

Many of their enemies have come to expect the charge of the desert riders, and prepare themselves accordingly. However, they often find themselves surprised by a different maneuver, for the Sirocco's scouts are legendary among the peoples of the great desert.

Personality: The members of the Sirocco live by their word. They take their oaths very seriously, and members of their group who knowingly break their word to a client are ejected, without water, into the searing sands.

Employers, even those who break their word with the Sirocco, can expect the desert riders to keep their end of the bargain. However, betrayers of oaths will earn themselves a tireless enemy, one that will not hesitate to offer complete and passionate destruction.

The Sirocco maintain good relations with most of the tribes of Anauroch, and have made an enemy of the Zhentarim. However, their knowledge of desert ways has thus far kept them from the terrible wrath of the evil ones, and with any luck this will continue.

Logistics: Members of the Sirocco are light cavalry armed with scimitars and light lances. Approximately 30 use short bows to harry their opponents from a distance, to fell lone scouts, or to send warnings to their comrades.

The cost of hiring the Sirocco is 120 gp per week. In addition, Hajima sitt-Nasir expects news of the outside world, and appreciates a few luxury items to make life easier for her people. When one considers the dangers in crossing the treacherous wastes of Anauroch, this is a small price to pay for security.

Chapter 5: Specialists

This chapter details several mercenary bands that specialize in some way, either by task or by weapon. These companies sometimes form when units split off from armies or larger corps. Others are created by charismatic individuals who are expert at some task. Whatever the case, there are several specialist companies in the Realms.

Certain corps can be found on maneuvers with larger bands that require their services; specialists are sometimes hired by other mercenary corps for a given task. Some operate only independently.

Like other groups, the specialist companies can be used in adventures. The PCs will run across a group or one of its members, or a group might try to recruit one of the PCs.

The Companies

Some of the entries in this section appear in abbreviated format.

The map on page 5 shows where many of the groups operate, while the index on page 64 lists the groups by region and also lists the other sources where information might be found.

The Company of Hunnar

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Riatavin in Amn

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

Tethyr

Leader: Hunnar

Government: Business

Number of Members: 200

General Alignment: Neutral

History: At the market in Riatavin, where almost anything can be bought and sold, there is a small booth where the wealthy can purchase a way past the walls of cities and castles.

The Company of Hunnar specializes in sieges and almost always works in concert with an army or other mercenary group. Its members are split into three units: 100 0-level men-at-arms to operate siege weaponry, such as catapults, ballistae, rams, and bores; 50 1st-level fighters and thieves adept at getting over castle walls, with ladders, siege towers, and other means; and 50 0-level sappers who dig underneath.

The company charges by the type of job: 200 gp for a keep, 500 gp for a castle, and 1,000-2,000 gp for a city. For a consulting fee of 500 gp, one or two company experts will advise castle owners and city councils on ways to protect themselves from siege warfare.

The Dark Watch

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: The Orsraun Mountains

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Sea of Fallen Stars

Leader: Lothar Pelamar

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 20

General Alignment: Neutral evil

History: The Dark Watch is a group of human archers mounted on hippogriffs. They participated on the losing side in the wars of Yrkhetepe detailed in I14, Swords of the Iron Legion. The original leader of the group, Lothar's brother Thurindar, was slain in the Battle of Five Crowns by a member of the Sunshafts (see the Company of the Singing Dawn).

The Dark Watch is an unscrupulous corps that earns 100 gp per day attacking pirate bands at the behest of rival pirates.

The Destroyers

Type: Standing, roaming
Base: Halabar in Halruaa
Current Sphere(s) of Operation:
 Tethyr

Leader: Daltim Flamefist

Government: Oligarchic council

Number of Members: 50

General Alignment: Lawful neutral

History: The Destroyers are an artillery company that uses magic as well as normal weaponry.

There are 30 wizards and psionicists (levels 2-9) in the corps, each specialized in destructive disciplines. The company's leader, Daltim Flamefist, is a 14th level fire mage with wild psionic talents.

The remaining 20 members of the Destroyers are 1st-level fighters who man catapults and other large weapons.

Strategies and Tactics: This corps usually acts as artillery support for other armies. They take some jobs as besiegers, but prefer to be in the field.

The mages and psionicists of the Destroyers use their extranatural abilities to eliminate their foes from a distance, or to soften them for the attacks of the main body.

Personality: The Destroyers will honor any contract they have made. However, once the contract has expired, they have been known to accept contracts calling for them to attack former employers. The Destroyers have a special hatred for the Red Wizards of Thay, though the reasons are not known to the public. The Destroyers will accept any contract against Thay for as low as half-price.

Logistics: The Destroyers are armed with a variety of weapons, including catapults and ballistae. Most of their elite carry magical or psionically endowed items as well.

The company charges 750 gp per day.

The Masquerade

Type: Standing, fixed
Base: Waterdeep
Current Sphere(s) of Operation:
 All of Faerun

Leader: Aquila Gerallin

Government: Cell structure (each member knows only two others and the immediate superior)

Number of Members: ? (100 +)

General Alignment: Neutral

History: The Masquerade is a company of professional spies and infiltrators. It employs a large number of informants who remain isolated from the rest of the company; the true members of the Masquerade work undercover. All are prevented from accidental exposure by mental blocks implanted by a high-level psionist.

Their leader is a doppelganger who seldom wears the same face twice.

Little is known about this shady group. Their workings were first uncovered about 25 years ago. The company's true numbers are unknown, but they have a hand in many major events in Faerun.

Most company members are human thieves and wizards, but there is a fair mix of every character class and race.

The members of the Masquerade have a universal set of five (or more?) signs by which they may recognize one another while on jobs.

Strategies and Tactics: This corps takes only missions that require infiltration and spying. Many poisonings are attributed to the Masquerade.

The only time they are involved in battle is to break sieges; they are expert at opening castles.

The members of the Masquerade go to great lengths to protect their identities, using poison or stun gas when cornered.

Personality: The Masquerade are primarily information gatherers, and will record any knowledge gained. They are perhaps the best spy ring on Toril, and will not betray any contract, unless they themselves are betrayed.

The Masquerade are reasonably honorable and seem to have no dark, hidden motives. They have few enemies, only those who have started hostilities with them.

The Masquerade has apparently infiltrated many governments and several other mercenary companies in preparation for potential future jobs.

Logistics: The services of the Masquerade cost 100 gp per day, adjusted for the difficulty of the mission, and are well worth the price.

The Order of the Silver Lance

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Ormath in the Shining Plains

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Shining Plains, Amn, Tethyr

Leader: Thorivald the Grey

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 100

General Alignment: Lawful neutral

History: The Order of the Silver Lance is a corps of medium cavalry. They carry distinctive, silver-tipped lance and fly a silver banner with a black charger on it.

The company acts independently or with other mercenary companies, generally guarding trade routes in and around Amn.

The Order's leader, Thorivald, is a 10th-level paladin, and most of his riders are 5th-level fighters, rangers, and paladins. They are very trustworthy and will not work for evil employers. They prefer jobs with honor and glory.

The Order charges 100 gp per day.

The Sisterhood of the Oaks

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: The Chondalwood

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Chondalwood, the Vilhon Reach

Leader: Adriennedar Valgarien

Government: Sisterhood

Number of Members: 60

General Alignment: Neutral good

History: The Sisterhood is a group of 5th-level female rangers that participated in the Yrkhetep wars detailed in I14, Swords of the Iron Legion. These humans, elves, and half-elves are all expert trackers, scouts, and archers. They use long bows and long swords, and all carry amethyst dragon scales, or teyastones, for luck and to symbolize their love for one another.

The Sisters are vegetarians who refuse to harm fish, birds, and other "children of nature."

Adriennedar is a 7th-level ranger, as are her closest assistants, Rebecca, Jacinda, Aleesa, and Anwyn. The group lives in tents in the Chondalwood. For 1 gp per person per week, the Sisters will hire themselves out as escorts, scouts, or a special attack force.

The Windriders

Type: Standing, fixed

Base: Arrabar in Chondath

Current Sphere(s) of Operation: None

Leader: Bren Wingblade

Government: Military hierarchy

Number of Members: 20

General Alignment: Lawful good

History: This group of griffon-mounted cavalry has all but retired after traveling to Hades to fight the forces of the arcanaloth Yrkhetep. They are a distinguished group, proud and honorable. They now fight only for glory.

The Wraith of the Inner Sea

Type: Standing, roaming

Base: The Sea of Fallen Stars

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Sea of Fallen Stars

Leader: Kreodo the "Sea Queen"

Government: Naval hierarchy

Number of Members: 751

General Alignment: Neutral

Note: The Wraith and its leader are described in FR10, Old Empires. What follows is an update of statistics and recent history.

History: The Wraith of the Inner Sea is a long-standing fleet of privateers. They ply the Sea of Fallen Stars in their huge dromonds, fighting pirates or raiding shipping for the highest bidder.

The Wraith fleet consists of three ships: the Sea Queen, the Sea Horse, and the SeaQuest. A fourth ship, the Sea Jewel, was scuttled with the loss of all hands by the former mercenary unit now known as the Agency. Each ship holds 200 crew members, 50 marines, and seven wizards (levels 3-9). The Sea Queen is Kreodo's flagship.

Kreodo is a half-orc 9th-level fighter, 6th-level thief. Her officers include several mid- to high-level fighters and thieves. If kits are used, the pirate and swashbuckler kits are most appropriate.

Kreodo is a vicious opponent, but if foes surrender, she treats them with courtesy until they can be returned home (hopefully in exchange for a good ransom). Her officers are generally unscrupulous, but are devoted to Kreodo and follow her orders to the letter.

The Wraith charges 250 gp per ship per week of activity and expects her employers to repair any damage. She is still waiting for Turmish to replace her lost ship.

Zahara's Krakens

Type: Standing, roaming

Base: The Sword Coast

Current Sphere(s) of Operation:

The Sword Coast

Leader: Zahara the Shark

Government: Naval hierarchy

Number of Members: 250

General Alignment: Chaotic good

History: Zahara's Krakens have a lucrative business protecting shipping along the Sword Coast, attacking pirate bands, and occasionally raiding a port in Tethyr. They ask 500 gp per week or any portion thereof, half in advance, and they demand land-based assistance when attacking a port.

When raiding a port, the Krakens keep destruction and killing to a minimum, and they will not even loot unless they are convinced they are somehow serving a good purpose, such as ending the reign of an evil lord.

The Krakens have a fleet of five small, fast ships. Each has a crew of 15 and carries 30 marines (3rd-level fighters or fighter-thieves) and five spellcasters (wizards or priests of level 3-8). If kits are used in the game, all Zahara's crew use the swashbuckler kit.

One of Zahara's ships is equipped with a spelljamming helm, a fact not known to the general public. If the Krakens get into trouble, the ship will launch into the air, allowing an aerial assault or a quick escape, at least for a few of the mercenaries.

The Krakens are mercenaries for glory, travel, and the thrill of adventure. They enjoy high-risk missions because of the stories they can tell later.

Many members of Zahara's crew are considered folk heroes by the people in the port cities of the Sword Coast, a reputation the crew goes to great lengths to protect.

Chapter 6: Retired Companies

There are three basic reasons for retiring a mercenary company: death, legitimacy, and age. The first is common enough, and many mercenary corps have had short lifespans.

Legitimacy is attained by relatively few groups. For it, the company must have a desire to settle down, and someone must be willing to give them a permanent position of some kind.

Retirement because of age is very rare among mercenary groups. Most prefer to go out with a blaze of glory.

The Companies

Details of retired companies are offered in a very abbreviated format. References for one, the Midnight Men, appears on the map and in the index.

The Company of the Wolf

The last two decades saw the rise and fall of the Company of the Wolf, which bears no relation to the later adventuring band of the same name.

Led by Baron Wulfgar the Gray, the Company operated from the Inner Sea to the Sword Coast, guarding merchants, fighting humanoids, and occasionally choosing a side in one political conflict or another.

The Company's last action was what most would call a fool's quest—an assault on Zhentil Keep. The company's wizards and thieves managed to place someone inside the keep, but they were uncovered before capitalizing on that advantage. Orcs and other humanoids employed by the Zhentarim swarmed the Company of the Wolf, eradicating them completely.

The Gray Doom

In its early career, the Gray Doom operated in several skirmishes along the Sword Coast. They gained a reputation for speed and skill.

Later, the Gray Doom was one of the companies that fought on the side of good in the battles against Yrkhetep detailed in I14, Swords of the Iron Legion. Under the leadership of Olway Lezard, they distinguished themselves in the Battle of Thurgabanteth in Chondath. In that fateful battle, they earned the eternal enmity of several of the evil groups in the area.

Two years after the battle, they were set upon by members of the Chill, some of whom were survivors of the Battle of Thurgabanteth. The skirmish quickly escalated into a large engagement, and the 50 infantry and 20 archers of the Gray Doom found themselves badly outnumbered. Though they fought valiantly (delaying the growth of the Chill for more than a year), the Gray Doom was wiped out to a man.

Clan Obarskyr

Clan Obarskyr acted as mercenaries nearly 12 centuries ago. Operating in the Heartlands, they eventually decided to settle in what would become Cormyr.

They formed the dynasty that has ruled Cormyr since then, but have been largely sublimated into the other noble houses they displaced.

Remembering its mercenary background has caused the Cormyrian royal family to be wary of mercenary activity. This is partly responsible for the Cormyrian policies regarding mercenaries: companies must buy an expensive charter or prove legitimate employment if they expect to be able to gather together and carry weapons.

The Iron Legion

The Iron Legion was the name chosen by those who joined together to invade Hades, the climactic battle of the war against the forces of Yrkhetep.

Despite the inexperience of its many raw recruits, the Iron Legion did quite well. Most of the troops were killed; those who survived still tell the tales of when they went to the lower planes.

Of the groups who traveled to Hades, only two, the Windriders and the Sisterhood of the Oaks, still operate as mercenaries. The Windriders are on the verge of retirement (due to age, unless they can find one last, glorious battle). The Sisterhood maintains its membership, constantly initiating new members whom they deem worthy.

The Iron Legion is an example of a corps that retired because they outlived their purpose.

The Midnight Men

The Midnight Men gained fame in operations from Waterdeep to Thay. They were thought to have disbanded for other pursuits as long as 20 years ago. Supposedly, they were still in existence as a shadowy brotherhood, rather than a battle force.

Recently, however, the symbols of the Midnight Men have been seen on undead creatures in the Stonelands. It seems that someone or something has been hunting down former members of the Midnight Men, making them (as well as other unlucky victims) into undead abominations, and marking them as Midnight Men. Whether this is intended as a pun, or as an insidious plot for revenge, is unknown.

The group now consists of more than 100 undead, ranging from skeletons and zombies to wights and vampires.

The Moonlight Men

The Moonlight Men were one of the most famous mercenary groups, though they were active for less than 10 years.

Though they operated throughout the Realms, the Moonlight Men spent much of their time guarding caravan travel in the North, especially around Sundabar, Silverymoon, and Everlund. Detractors intimate they were smugglers as well.

Their leader was Mintiper Moonsilver (called Mintiper Silverhand by some), a bard of some renown. Mintiper had been a member of several other bands before he formed the Moonlight Men and led them to fame.

The final and most famous battle of the Moonlight Men was their defense of Turnstone Pass against orcish hordes headed toward Everlund and Silverymoon. The 200-person company slew more than 4,000 orcs in the hours-long battle. However, only six Moonlight Men survived the battle.

The whereabouts of those six survivors are unknown. Mintiper wandered in the southern lands for a while, and others are thought to now serve with Silverymoon's militia.

Red Plumes of Hillsfar

The Red Plumes were a somewhat unscrupulous band that operated in the area around the Moonsea. They were put on permanent retainer a few years ago by Maalthiir, First Lord of Hillsfar. They now lead a force of more than 10,000 fighters, levels 1-8.

Hillsfar sent a unit of 600 Red Plumes, mostly cavalry, with the Army of the Alliance during the Horde Wars.

Since the coming of the Horde, the Red Plumes have gone back to their normal activities, protecting Hillsfar and extorting passersby.

The Shining Steel Mercenary Company

The Shining Steel Mercenary Company formed when a band of adventurers (also called the Shining Steel) was asked to recruit a corps large enough to defend Spandeliyon from the pirates of the Fallen Stars.

After the pirates were turned away, much of the company stayed together under the leadership of the adventurers, a mixed group of wizards, warriors, and bards. The group operated under democratic principles, accepting several jobs around the Sea of Fallen Stars.

They paid little attention to real problems, seeing most jobs as a lark, or a romantic and glorious adventure—at least until the coming of the Horde.

The leaders of the mercenary corps held a council to discuss politics, and decided the Horde presented too great a threat to ignore. They were hired with Sembian funds (one of many companies to serve in such a way).

Though they distinguished themselves in battle, the Shining Steel was almost completely wiped out. A few of the survivors have reformed the old Shining Steel adventuring company, which now operates on the Sword Coast.

The Skykillers

The Skykillers were a short-lived mercenary group, cavalry mounted on hippogriffs. Their leader, Sir Lehakin, was a mortal enemy of Bren Wingblade, company leader of the Windriders.

Lehakin's band joined the forces of Yrkhetep when the arcanaloth moved to take over Chondath (detailed in Swords of the Iron Legion). The Skykillers met the Windriders at the Battle of Five Crowns, and Lehakin's forces were destroyed.

Chapter 7: Recruiters

As mentioned earlier, only some companies stay together at all times; others are formed only when the need arises. This chapter offers information on several of the better-known mercenary recruiters in the Realms.

Some recruiters are simply agents, who put mercenaries into contact with prospective employers, either in small numbers or in large groups. Other recruiters build a mercenary band which they lead into battle.

Recruiters are likely to interact with adventurers. When building a company, they often have a certain composition in mind for the corps; if a PC in the campaign meets the requirements, a mercenary recruiter may try to hire the PC. Other recruiters may simply need as many people as they can get, quick.

Not all recruiters are scrupulous. Though most of the individuals covered in this chapter try to hire mercenaries by honest and legal means, there are others who recruit by kidnaping.

The Famous and the Infamous

Though the famed recruiters of the Realms have preferred operating areas, those who actually lead companies into battle will usually travel to almost any location. For this reason, recruiters are not mentioned in the index or placed on the reference map. They and their bands can show up almost anywhere.

Since these are not companies in the sense used elsewhere in this book, the format for presentation differs, focusing on the personalities of the individual recruiters and leaders.

Blazidon One-Eye

The secret owner of the Bowels of the Earth Tavern in Waterdeep, Blazidon One-Eye acts as an agent for sellswords in Waterdeep. For a small fee, he will help individual mercenaries (or small groups) contact prospective employers.

It has been a number of years since Blazidon went into the field, and he does not recruit large groups. However, he keeps an eye on the happenings in Waterdeep, and he knows where to find mercenaries. Blazidon may be able to put employers in touch with many individuals, or find employment for a group of adventurers.

Further description of Blazidon can be found in FR1, Waterdeep and the North.

Daria the Hammer

A half-elven 10th-level mage/9th-level fighter, Daria is also a moderately wealthy merchant in Waterdeep. Suspected by some to be one of the mysterious Lords of Waterdeep, she is the best-known mercenary recruiter in the City of Splendors.

Once hired for a job, Daria contacts her regulars and puts out word that she is building a company. She often works with Blazidon One-Eye and Filiare (see individual entries) to find mercenaries of a certain type, when special units are desired by her employer.

Daria prefers to lead her company in the field, and she is quite good at strategies and tactics. She is capable of supervising almost any type of unit, from underwater cavalry to normal pikemen to magical artillery.

Daria is known for gaining lucrative deals for her recruits, who receive shares according to experience. Unless the employer wishes otherwise, recruits must bring their own equipment.

Enhanen

This cunning and charismatic fighter (8th-level) recruits from his home in Arrabar, Chondath. He employs a number of messengers who spread the word when he is hired for a job.

Most of the people he recruits come from a body of faithful veterans, but he is always willing to look at new recruits as well. He forms recruits into a company he calls the Will of Enhanen.

Enhanen can raise a body of 100-200 warriors (all infantry) within a day or two of being contacted. Though recruits are asked to bring their own equipment, Enhanen does keep a rather large arsenal that holds several of the more commonly used weapons.

Enhanen used to be more interested in glory and fame than anything else, and he traveled for a time with a semi-permanent company. After too many battles, the thrill has mostly worn off, and Enhanen sees warfare as simply a job at which he happens to be good.

Filiare

Another Waterdhavian tavern owner, Filiare is Blazidon's major competitor in the recruitment of individual hireswords or small groups.

This jovial former mercenary welcomes mercenaries in his tavern. If an employer needs a few mercenaries in a hurry, Filiare can usually recruit 20-30 within a few minutes.

Like Blazidon, Filiare never leads a force into the field. However, Filiare happily takes part in strategy sessions for a small fee (10 gp per session).

Most of Filiare's recruits have their own weapons, but Filiare does keep a large stockpile of used weapons at his tavern, the Dripping Dagger.

Filiare is quite friendly with Blazidon.

Goran of Tethyr

One of the best-known recruiters in Tethyr, Goran is a 12th-level fighter. He has a small permanent staff of six fighters and thieves who help him build mercenary units.

When an employer contracts Goran to build a mercenary company (for a fee of 1 gp per recruit), the warrior starts by advertising (posting bills, hiring criers, and so forth). If the response is not quick enough, Goran has been known to send his assistants out on a special mission in the waterfront taverns of Zazesspur and other ports along the coast of Tethyr, Calimshan, and Amn. Though he treats conscripts well and even pays them, Goran is very adamant about keeping them with the company. Those who escape earn Goran's anger, and if he has his way, his revenge.

Goran is mostly apolitical, caring little about who eventually runs Tethyr. He does, however, bear ill-will toward some of the cities of Tethyr (notably Ithmong) for failing to pay him promptly.

Goran will form three types of units for his employers: infantry, cavalry, and archers. Goran's infantry is generally irregular and somewhat disorganized, though if time permits, he will train them—a little. The cavalry tends to be more disciplined, not because of Goran's efforts, but because of some qualified officers who work as mercenaries in Tethyr. Archer units vary widely in quality; Goran knows nothing about them other than where they should go and whom they should shoot, so the quality of the unit is totally dependent on the quality of the recruits.

There are very few veterans who feel loyalty to Goran, so his companies tend to be fairly inexperienced.

Marius the Valiant

Marius, a 15th-level fighter, was a gladiator in arenas in the Old Empires and around the Vilhon Reach. He eventually led a slave revolt on an obscure island in the southern Sea of Fallen Stars. He and many of the slaves who revolted with him formed a mercenary band, the Free.

The Free operated along the coasts of the Sea of Fallen Stars for many years until they found a small city-state that offered them a home as well as a job.

All but Marius settled down at that time. He felt he should remain fighting, doing what he could to free other slaves in the region. Now, Marius maintains a headquarters in Alaghon, Turmish.

For a fee of 100 gp, Marius will recruit a corps of infantry for an employer with whom he agrees about politics. He gathers the recruits at a prearranged meeting spot of the employer's choice, reviews them, and selects the best among them.

Marius is an expert tactician, a master of many weapons, and a magnificent trainer. Within a month of being contacted (he refuses to work quicker), Marius will build a crack unit for his employer.

Though Marius is best with light infantry units (particularly swords), he is also quite adept at building, training, and supervising units of scouts, ambushers, pikes, and archers. He will gather a cavalry unit if the employer will provide good, trained horses.

Marius has never lost a battle, either in the arena or on the battlefield. Though he has a stringent code of honor and expects his employers to follow it as well, and despite his fighting to free any slaves he happens to see, he is well worth any inconvenience.

The Mercenaries' Guild of Westgate

The Guild is a group of recruiters led by three men and two women, all of whom sometimes take the field. For troops, the Guild recruits mostly warriors, levels 2-4. The Guild also locates duelists for private quarrels.

In a city full of mercenaries, the Mercenaries' Guild thrives by recruiting primarily from the proud merchant families. Locally famous as a group of ne'er-do-wells and wastrels, the Guild is also known for its brave and skillful recruits. Though the company has a core of veteran recruits, new members are added with every job.

The Guild operates exclusively in the Heartlands of the Realms. It began by rooting out pirates along the coast of the Sea of Fallen Stars. Later, it fought orcish bandits in the Hullack Forest between Highmoon and Arabel. Later, they fought with the Dalefolk when Lashan made his bid for hegemony.

The guild leader and founder, Palla the Light, is a 14th-level enchantress who began the operation as a way to cajole bored and disaffected members of the Guldar merchant family out of the city so they could make a name for themselves. Detractors claim she uses magic to recruit her troops so quickly, but, in fact, the Guild's lieutenants and their skillful propaganda deserve the credit (or blame) for filling the ranks.

Varen Malavhan, a 9th-level bard, is the guild's chief recruiting and propaganda officer and its treasurer; he makes offers and distributes shares from the payroll. His flair for selling the glory of the company (and his shameless compositions extolling its triumphs) are largely responsible for the company's reputation. He is a slender, blond fellow who carries a long rapier, and he sports a very neat small beard. His family has long since given up apologizing for his unmerchantlike behavior.

Varen always joins the recruits in the field; his songs and exhortations have helped the Guild carry the day more than once. His saga of “The Battle of the Yellow Eye Orcs” was a triumph of propaganda in the taverns and made the company’s name, but it also annoyed the Urdo family, whose symbol is a yellow eye; they took his song as a personal slight. Varen rarely sings publicly in Westgate anymore; he uses a network of bards, fighters, and priests to help him recruit, in exchange for a bounty on each person they enlist.

Sehlmari “the Lucky” Ssemm, a 5th level priestess of Tymora, is the morale officer and quartermaster. She generally travels a day ahead of the troops with a platoon to buy, gather, or commandeer food, drink, and other necessities. Her ability to haggle—and her knack for scrounging up enough to get by—are legendary among the troops, as is her sense of humor and her talent with loaded dice. She is always with the recruits, but rarely leads them.

Mannin the Stout and Losifan Urdo are the field commanders, both 7th-level fighters specialized in their weapons and scarred from their days as duelists. They started as Guild recruits, but impressed Palla enough to be taken on permanently. Mannin has craggy, clean-shaven features and carries a huge double-bitted axe. He is very muscular, with short black hair. Mannin is a pragmatic and harsh commander.

Losifan is a bit of a dandy, with his small goatee, long blond hair, loose, flowing clothes, and his tastefully decorated longsword, a family heirloom. He is a member of the Urdo trading family. Mannin and Losifan are responsible for discipline and training.

Duelling among the troops is discouraged and punished, but is linked to the rivalries between the merchant families that many of the Guild’s recruits come from.

The Mercenaries Guild of Westgate is very proud of its independence from any particular merchant’s interests. They are active against bandits who loot caravans, but, for reasons of professional pride and propaganda, they refuse to raise troops for caravan guard contracts. This drives their families to distraction.

The Guild prefers to lead cavalry attacks, riding to the fore where danger and glory abound. Their charges are generally carried by their elan and prowess. When a charge collapses, it is usually due to poor discipline, high spirits, and insufficient coordination; many Guild charges have been premature. Given enough time to train their recruits, the Guild curbs this tendency to charge first and think later.

The Guild recruiters provide light warhorses, swords, and light lances for the recruits. Armor varies from plate mail to studded leather; the Guild requires volunteers to bring their own.

The Guild uniform is a dark gray cloak, generally worn off the shoulder, a violet shirt with open collar, and dark blue trousers. Fashion counts, since recruits are often younger sons and daughters of the merchant nobility. Veteran recruits, male and female alike, soon affect a long braid of hair hanging from their left temples.

A troop of 100 2nd level dragoons costs 250 gp a week; costs go up from there, and if Palla’s help is needed, the cost doubles.

The Order of the Blue Boar

It is said that anything can be purchased in Amn, and that includes mercenaries. The best and most famous mercenary recruiters in Amn belong to the Order of the Blue Boar.

The Blue Boars were once headquartered at Castle Spulzeer, but moved out several years ago when the Spulzeer family began to fall apart (see FR3, Empires of the Sands for more information). The leaders of the Order—the seven “Boar’s Heads”—now operate from the sprawling Castle Blue just outside of Riatavin.

The Boar’s Heads approve the membership of “Swords” in the Order; they can also expel them at will for unprofessional conduct. About 400 Swords—all wealthy, experienced veterans—belong to the Order, spread throughout the cities of Amn, Calimshan, Tethyr, and the Sword Coast. Though all the Boar’s Heads are male, a few of the Swords are women.

Employers seeking the aid of the Blue Boars must apply in person at their Amnish headquarters. The council of Boar’s Heads decides whether or not to accept the job. If they do accept, they inform the Swords, who may then apply to take part in the operation.

Based on the employer’s offer, the Boar’s Heads determine how many soldiers and leaders are needed for a job, then review the applicants from the Swords. If there are too many applicants for a given job, membership seniority determines who gets the job.

Each participating member receives a share of the bounty. They can take part in the mission alone, or involve as many assistants or substitutes as they want, including non-member wizards, warriors, and even monsters, though they are responsible for the actions of their hirelings. Some members always use hirelings, being disabled or too old to participate in battle themselves.

The Order will take almost any job that they do not find morally repugnant. They ask for relatively high fees (5 gp per Sword per day, plus a finder's fee of 700 gp initially, payable to the council of Boar's Heads).

The Order of the Blue Boar has considered retaking Castle Spulzeer, and they have complete plans ready for implementation the moment someone offers to pay them for doing it.

The badge of the Order, worn only by the Boar's Heads and the Swords, is a grizzled, razorback boar, rampant on a red, russet, or silver field. The standard uniform of the Order of the Blue Boar is a dark blue shirt with gold buttons and a stiff collar, dark blue trousers, and black, calf-high boots.

What follows are descriptions of the Boar's Heads and their functions in order of seniority. All these men are lawful neutral human fighters. Kits are given for those DMs who use The Complete Fighter's Handbook.

Ristamar Rhaal is a 10th-level noble warrior, a distinguished-looking man in his 40s. He is the chairman of the council of Boar's Heads and the owner of Castle Blue. Ristamar is very dignified, but is not without a sense of humor.

Besides leading the council, Ristamar negotiates contracts with major governments, because his noble heritage gives him an advantage in dealing with other leaders. He is a charismatic warrior known for the tournaments and parties he regularly sponsors.

Lord Rhaal occasionally dons a suit of full plate armor and leads a company of cavalry into battle.

Ghont Tavvas, a 10th-level noble warrior, is the oldest Boar's Head, almost 90 years old. Once a great warrior, he led infantry companies into major engagements. Now, he sits on the council and offers strategic advice, but always hires substitutes to lead his recruits in the field.

Ghont is very dignified and is rarely seen out of uniform. Though he is now frail and well past his prime, his mind is sharp and he is quite proud.

Lord Tavvas is distantly related to the former ruling family of Tethyr, a secret known only to a few. He was exiled from that country, and mostly forgotten, nearly 70 years ago after participating in one of the brief wars of succession.

Sinmom Thul, a 10th-level myrmidon, is a large man with brown hair and a bushy mustache. The third son of a wealthy Amnish merchant, Sinmon had to make his own fortune.

Sinmon became a mercenary, leading a company of cavalry that gained fame along the Sword Coast. Since making his fortune and joining the Order, Sinmon has put on some weight. A tactical genius, he sometimes supervises field operations, but he rarely leads a cavalry charge any more.

Sinmon is uncomfortable with the trappings of nobility and rarely wears a uniform. He sees the bureaucracy of the council as an unnecessary waste of time.

Bromdurr Tathen is a 13th-level peasant hero. Now in his early 40s, Bromdurr gained fame in his youth by helping defend his home of Memnon (in Calimshan) from pirates. He later helped start Calimshan's navy.

Bromdurr is an expert at both naval operations and anti-naval defenses. He still owns a ship and will happily take to the sea in any naval assault.

As a "hero of the common man," Bromdurr is also very adept at turning peas-

Chapter 8: Adventuring Companies

ants, farmers, and urban mobs into effective fighting forces.

Thantan Rhyrdyl, a 13th-level cavalier, is the consummate battlefield leader. This charismatic fellow is an experienced cavalry officer, but is able to get the best effort from any unit.

Off the field, Thantan comes across as somewhat stiff and arrogant. From another wealthy Amnish merchant family, Thantan formed a well-armed and armored cavalry company in his youth and left to seek thrills and fame. Though disappointed in him, his family still acknowledges him as a member.

Samoth Dier, an 11th-level myrmidon, is tall, muscular, and dark-complected. A recent addition to the Boar's Heads, he replaced Gaurundur Thasz after that fighter died fighting in Tethyr.

This Waterdhavian is a master artilleryist and an expert at leading missile units. He prefers to take part in field actions, and usually dresses in his field gear. First and foremost a soldier, Samoth is very confident in his abilities.

Samoth serves as chief logistics officer for the Order. He constantly keeps track of supplies and soldiers, and establishes caches and supply lines for most of the Order's operations.

Cullen Salgoud, the swashbuckler of the group, is an 11th-level fighter. He joined the Boar's Heads to replace for Dstar Klathor, slain in the Horde Wars.

Cullen is charismatic and sarcastic, the most flamboyant of the Boar's Heads. He wears his hair, goatee, and mustache very neat, and usually refuses to wear the Order's uniform.

Cullen is an authority on scouting and spying missions, and he directs overall intelligence gathering for the Order. He is secretly a member of the Masquerade.

Cullen has an uncanny sense for whether someone is lying or not, as well as their strengths and weaknesses.

As mentioned earlier, adventuring companies often interact with mercenary companies. Many are actually smaller versions of true mercenary groups, the real difference being that mercenary companies tend to be larger and better organized.

Large mercenary forces might sometimes recruit smaller adventuring bands for special missions, perhaps even keeping them on retainer for an extended period of time.

In addition, adventuring groups can serve as "seeds" for mercenary companies, either growing by adding permanent members, or recruiting temporary forces.

In order to provide examples for DMs, a few special cases are covered briefly in this chapter.

Companies in Other Sources

Many other products in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® game line describe adventuring companies. Especially notable are the Campaign Set, the Adventures hardcover, and this book's predecessors in the "FR" line. If DMs wish to use those companies with mercenary groups, or as allies or adversaries for the PCs in a campaign, those sources should be consulted.

Where Are They Now?

The adventuring groups of the Realms are constantly growing, changing, moving, and ceasing to exist. DMs should feel free to use adventuring groups anywhere they fit.

Transitional Companies

There are a few companies in the Realms that are in a transitional state, not quite mercenary corps, and not quite adventuring companies. A few samples are offered here.

The Agency

This adventuring group consists of eight rather unique members: three elves, including a blade bard, a bladesinger fighter/mage, and a wilderness ranger; a tabaxi, an aarakocra, and a hengeyokai cat; a gnomish priest with mechanical parts; and a human militant wizard.

Most of the members worked with mercenary companies, primarily the Mindulgulph corps. Because they understand the operations of mercenary units, they are trusted by several corps and often hired for special missions.

The Knights of Myth Drannor

This famous group is described in the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Campaign Set and in FR7, Hall of Heroes.

Though still known for their adventuring, the Knights of Myth Drannor have produced two very skilled mercenary recruiters in priests Jelde Asturien and Dust Sulwood.

Dust lives in Arabel and has a Cormyrian royal charter for a mercenary corps. He usually recruits individuals for special missions, rather than for full companies. He prefers not to take the field, but would possibly do so in case of a great emergency.

Jelde is a prominent member of the clergy of Lathander in Eveningstar. On occasion, however, he has been known to work with the Company of the Singing Dawn, or to gather a band himself and venture into the Stonelands.

The Knights of the Unicorn

This group, headquartered in Baldur's Gate (see the FORGOTTEN REALMS Adventures hardcover) has recently begun leading a mercenary corps.

The Knights recently had the opportunity to ferret out a group of bandits that operated along the Sword Coast. When the time came for the final assault on the bandit stronghold, the Knights gathered a small corps of mercenary infantry, including a number of rangers and rogues. After the successful raid, the Knights kept much of the band together (perhaps 50 people).

Like the adventuring group for which it is named, the Knights of the Unicorn mercenary company is dedicated to helping the needy and rescuing all in need of aid. Most worship, or at least revere, Lurae, queen of talking beasts and intelligent creatures.

Though the group continues to do good deeds, the wanderlust, desire for adventure, and whimsical nature of the original Knights may cause the corps to fragment before too long.

The Purple Flame

This company, described in the FORGOTTEN REALMS Campaign Set, seems to be growing into a mercenary company.

The Purple Flame, based near Soubar, which is between Scornubel and Waterdeep, has made a living for several seasons by guarding caravans. The group has always been primarily warriors, with some magical support.

They have recruited new members recently, and they now number more than 100 mounted warriors. They are on the verge of creating a mercenary charter, because the group has outgrown its previous form of government.

Chapter 9: Current Events

Throughout the Realms, time marches on and things constantly change. This section offers an update of recent events in the Realms, specifically in reference to mercenaries.

Special Groups

Several special groups in the Realms interact with mercenaries. Some are subtle manipulators, while others will blatantly hire mercenary corps to do their bidding. The Realms Campaign Set and the Adventures hardcover provide details on several of the groups mentioned in the following text.

The Harpers, the Cult of the Dragon, and the Lords of Waterdeep all are careful to not expose themselves. They seldom hire mercenary bands to do their bidding and never do so directly. Mercenary bands hired by members of these groups will seldom be aware of their true masters.

The Zhentarim often acts in subtle ways using individual operatives, but agents have been known to hire large groups of mercenaries for large jobs.

Similarly, the Red Wizards of Thay sometimes hire mercenary corps for specific purposes. More often, however, they dominate humanoids or monsters, or raise an army of undead, to do their bidding in large scale action.

Other, less influential groups, like the Shadowcloaks of Calaunt or Twilight Hall in Berdusk, might hire mercenary groups to perform tasks that would endanger their operation.

Each group has its own interests, which will create unique experiences for mercenaries and adventurers.

Other Events

Many opportunities for the adventure-some have come with the opening of the Hordelands, Kara-Tur, and Maztica to the people of Faerun. There is currently a drain on the fighting forces of Faerun as people succumb to the urge to travel and explore. As other exotic areas are discovered by travelers from Faerun, this trend will continue, with individuals and governments exploring or trying to establish colonies.

There is also an influx of veterans from these areas. These people have explored the strange lands and fought in the wars, and are now ready for adventure in Faerun.

In Faerun itself, there are a number of “hot spots.” There are many minor powers in these areas, and they may have trouble paying mercenaries.

In the North, orcs are building hordes, while barbarians are fighting or leaving their tribes to make their ways in civilization. In Tethyr, the loss of the royal family has thrown things into chaos. In Chessenta and along the Vilhon Reach, political instability causes almost constant warfare.

Because of the Pirate Isles off the Sword Coast and in the Sea of Fallen Stars, coastal powers will always need protection, or wish to “end the pirate menace once and for all.”

Chult is being explored; there are rumors of a coming war in the Underdark gates to the nether planes allow invasions; and there are petty merchant wars throughout the Realms.

All these events, plus the existence of ruined keeps and lost treasures throughout the Realms, should provide enough excitement to keep mercenaries and adventurers quite busy.

BATTLESYSTEM™ Game

Statistics

This chapter provides statistics for several of the mercenary companies and leaders presented in Gold & Glory. These are for use with the BATTLESYSTEM™ Miniatures Rules.

The basic listing for each troop type includes the five principal ratings: attack dice, armor rating, hits, morale rating, and movement allowance. Following those statistics is any additional information that applies, such as range of missile weapons.

The statistics given are typical for the companies listed. Individual units may vary somewhat.

² Numbers in square brackets are AD for charging attacks. If two numbers are listed, separated by an asterisk; the first number is the AD for a missile attack, the second for a melee attack.

³ CD ratings are listed in inches.

⁴ MV ratings are listed in inches. If two numbers are listed separated by a slash, the second number is the flying movement rate; such entries are followed by a letter in parentheses, the maneuverability class. If numbers are separated by a double slash, the second number is the swimming movement rate.

⁵ Ranges are listed in inches, in the order short/medium/long range.

⁶ These are Eagle and Jaguar Knights in their respective animal forms.

⁷ The Mindulgulph Giff carry arquebuses, which can be fired once every three rounds; they generally rotate fire so 1/3 of the units fire each round.

⁸ This unit has spellcasting or special abilities, such as breath weapons, regeneration, or unusual weapons. See individual descriptions for details.

Gold & Glory

by Tim Beach

The jingle of gold and the chance to earn glory in the battlefield motivate many people to answer a call to arms. These men and women are mercenaries, willing to fight someone else's battle for the chance to earn a few coins or lasting fame. Gold & Glory describes the mercenary companies of the FORGOTTEN REALMS® Campaign Setting. The famous and the infamous are detailed within: the Flaming Fist, possibly the most powerful private army on Toril; The Mindulgulph Mercenary Company, certainly the most bizarre; the honorable Bushido, the sly Masquerade, the snobbish Order of the Blue Boar, the hard-fighting She-Wolves, and many more. Many of the companies are brought to life in the 16 full-page full color portraits in this sourcebook. Gaming information, including statistics for BATTLESYSTEM™ Game scenarios, is offered as well. Player characters can adventure with these mercenary corps, earning gold and glory for themselves!

2nd Edition

The Shining South

by Tom Prasa

Durparian Specialty Priests

Lucha (She Who Guides)

Lesser Power of the Seven Heavens, LG
Portfolio: Those who wander or seek something.
Requirements: Wisdom 15
Weapons Allowed: All bludgeoning weapons, nets, lassos, and anything that allows capture without harming the victim. The first weapon learned must always be a staff.
Armor Allowed: Any
Major Spheres: All, Astral, Charm, Divination, Healing, Necromantic, Protection, Plant.
Minor Spheres: Guardian, Sun, Elemental.
Magical Items Allowed: Same as clerics.

Granted Powers

Specialty priests of Lucha can turn undead, as can their clerical counterparts. They also receive the navigation proficiency for free at first level. At third level, specialty priests of Lucha can locate object, once per day. At 10th level, they receive one find the path spell that may only be used to find something that has been lost.

Other Notes

Lucha is worshipped by nearly everyone in Durpar. Her worshippers believe that she will guide them to the most profitable customers. She oversees connections and relationships, guiding herdsmen to good pastures, blessing marriages, helping lost ships at sea, and insuring safe births. It is widely believed that Lucha herself watches over all marriages performed by her clergy. Nearly all marriages in Durpar are performed by priests of Lucha. Her priests work ceaselessly against those of Mask and other evil gods.

Ceremonial dress consists of a circlet woven of vines or flowers and white robes. No shoes are worn at ceremonies. The only other symbol of office is a staff wound about with vines and flowers.

Curna (The Wise One)

Greater Power of Nirvana, LN
Portfolio: Wisdom, knowledge
Requirements: Wisdom 13, Intelligence 13
Weapons Allowed: Bludgeoning weapons
Armor Allowed: Any non-metal armor or shields
Major Spheres: All, Charm, Creation, Divination, Healing, Protection, Summoning
Minor Spheres: Guardian, Sun, Weather
Magical Items Allowed: Any usable by clerics, plus any that are used to enhance knowledge (crystal balls, wands of magic detection, etc.)

Granted Powers

Specialty priests of Curna turn undead normally. They have a 3% chance per level to recognize any given magical item for what it is. This power does not bestow exact knowledge; it works as much as the bard ability. At 10th level specialty priests of Curna may call upon a blinding flash once per day. This is a beam of light that erupts from the priest's holy symbol, affecting a single target. The target must make a successful saving throw versus spells or be blinded. This blindness lasts until it is magically dispelled, or until the priest lifts it by silent act of will.

Other Notes

Most Durparians pay tribute to Curna before making an important business deal, or before embarking on a new venture. Rich merchants may have a priest of Curna on their personal payroll. Such priests are considered to be very wise, and are consulted frequently. There is a huge temple of Curna in the mountains that bear her name, a complex that is home to a library nearly the rival of Candlekeep on the Sword Coast. The contents of the Curna library differs from that of Candlekeep in that it has fewer historical documents, and more information on the world as it is now. Teams of explorers and sages constantly update this information.

INTRODUCTION

"First time out of Halruaa, isn't it?" The old mage turned to his apprentice. The young man nodded nervously as he watched the sea far below the ship.

"You already know that Halruaa is the best and most civilized land in the Realms. Only there is magic truly utilized to its fullest potential. The other lands of the Shining South differ greatly from Halruaa. You must learn carefully, if you would survive to become a wizard.

"The first country we come to is Dambrath, the land where the Crintri rule. The Crintri are half-elves descended from the drow. The women of that race rule the country with an iron hand. A young man like you would end up working in the mines or herding rothe, provided that they didn't discover you had been trained in magic. It is a hanging offense for a male to use magic in Dambrath.

"Dambrath has only one real thing of beauty, the Dance of the Dolphins." The apprentice glanced at the sea below, trying to hide the excited gleam in his eyes.

"Oh, you've heard of it," the old man chuckled. "I hope that we'll pass over the Bay at dusk so we can see the dance. It's an experience you'll never forget. Thousands of dolphins move in unity and harmony. We really should avoid Dambrath altogether, but I wish to see the dance once more."

The old mage looked off into the sky, lost in his memories. The apprentice cleared his throat. His master was always drifting off like this. If he were left undisturbed, the old man would stare off for an hour or more.

"Where was I? Oh, yes, the lands of the Shining South. After Halruaa, we'll stop in the land of Luiren. Don't expect to find a bed big enough to fit you, though. The halflings don't have many spaces for someone of your size. The Luiren stout and the bouqthi make up for any lack in physical accommodations. Stout is a type of ale, not a type of halfling," the old mage explained. "Bouqthi is a delicious pastry made in Luiren. My mouth waters every time I think about it. The people are a friendly bunch in Luiren. You can have a grand time there, as long as you keep your hand on your purse.

"After Luiren we'll come to the Shining Lands, as the countries of Estagund, Var the Golden, and Durpar are known. Heldapan in Durpar is our destination. You'll need to be on your best behavior there." The apprentice's eyes grew wide with alarm. The old man smiled. "There's no danger, but a Durparian trader would buy the shirt off your back so fast it would make your head spin. And of course you'd come away feeling you'd gotten a fair deal. Durparian traders have to be seen to be believed. Be wary, Durparians hate fraud and theft more than almost anything else. So keep your hands in your pockets and out of mischief.

"On the other hand, Durpar does get goods from all over the world. It's about the only place in the Shining South where we should be able to get the rare feathers from Maztica I need to complete my new spell. After we get through at Heldapan, we will fly over to Orvytlar, in Ulgarth, to see my good friend King Drasna the Fortunate. Ulgarth is also the only place in the world where mingari is blended. I intend to bring back several jars." The apprentice frowned, remembering what the old mage had said about Durpar.

"What?" The old man had spotted the questioning frown. "Yes, we could buy it in Durpar, but Drasna will probably make it a gift. I enchanted the ballistas in his harbor, you know."

Welcome to the Shining South, where living is good, and the lands are abundant. This product is for use by DMs, but players may also find much of interest here. To quote the great Satama, founder of the cult of Adama in Durpar, "All is part of the one, but this is the best part."

Halruaa

General Description

A rich, reclusive realm, Halruaa is famous for its electrum mines, its fiery Haerlu wine, and, most of all, for its magic.

Halruaa is almost encircled by the Walls of Halruaa, a mountain range that forms the east, north, and west borders of the country. From the south, where the Great Sea beckons, come both trade and trouble. Halruaa's reputation has spread the world over, causing the Halruans to be warlike out of necessity. They have, too often, faced invaders trying to conquer the "vile mages," or fought off someone attempting to steal the magical spells or items that are unique in Halruaa.

Geography and Climate

The "Walls of Halruaa" are several mountain ranges that almost entirely encircle the nation. Lhairghal is the name given the range that makes up the west wall. Muaraghal is the range to the east, and Nathaghal is to the north. The "High Aluar" is the name of the narrow hilly strip that leads through the mountains to the north, the only natural land entrance to Halruaa. There are several other entrances. The Talath Pass is the largest on the western side of Halruaa, and the Azhal pass south of Lake Maeru is the only one on the east side.

The summers are hot. Magical cooling devices and spells are coveted and expensive. In the winter many of the mountain temples receive snow, while the plains receive rains for about four months. The temperature ranges from the 100's in the summer to the 80's in the winter. The winds blow off the mountains until they meet over Lake Halruaa, making the lake a tricky place to sail. The winds help make the life on the land more bearable. Halruaa is not nearly as humid as some of the other countries in the Shining South.

Rains are frequent, so the farms around Lake Maeru and north of Lake Halruaa produce most of the food the country needs. The Nath, the basin in the northeast corner of Halruaa, is filled with herds of wild rothe and auroch, which are cultivated for food. This area is almost 500 feet higher than the rest of the country. Here the temperatures rarely reach 100, and the rains are not nearly as frequent or severe.

History

Halruaa was settled centuries ago by wizards fleeing the Phaerimm in what was to become the Anauroch desert. The first wizards came in unique flying ships invented by the Netheril. The wizards found a beautiful and rich country, settled only by shepherds and large herds of aurochs and wild rothe. It was here that the wizards decided to make a stand, should the Phaerimm follow. The Phaerimm never did, but Halruaa has had to defend itself from attacks by all of its neighbors since then.

Over the centuries Dambrath has attacked and raided Halruaa's ports and borders. Once, led by a magic resistant Barbarian, the Dambraii occupied all of the country south of Lake Halruaa. They were defeated in battle by the great archmage Mycontil, who slew their barbarian leader. Forty-thousand Dambraii attacked, and were stopped by 500 Halruans. More than 200 Halruan wizards, including Mycontil, died in the battle.

The latest attack was less than 100 years ago. The attack was made through the Talath Pass by the power hungry king of Lapaliya. He had allied with bandits from the wastes. This time the Halruans were able to field a larger force, including fighting men as well as wizards in their skyships.

The attackers were easily routed.

Halruaa also suffered through a civil war about five centuries ago. A number of mages advocated beginning new experiments in magic, ones which even the Netheril didn't approve of. The renegades were driven from the region. The surviving renegades left to found the land of Thay, or so it is said in Halruaa.

Since then Halruaa has been at peace (they have had no declared wars). Halruaa still suffers raids from Dambraii pirates, bandits of the wastes, savages from the Mhair Jungles, and any other pirate, raider, or hungry wizard who thinks that magic and wealth grow on trees in Halruaa.

This constant raiding has made the Halruans very defensive, warlike and traditional. The people say that since wizards have always led them, wizards always will.

Government and Politics

Halruaa is ruled by the Council of Elders, a tumultuous body of independent thinkers who somehow manage to get things done. The leader of the council and king of Halruaa is Zalathorm, a 29th-level diviner, who is rumored to be several centuries old. He rules from his tower in Halarahh, an ornate place with many magical guardians and defenses.

When the Elders meet, Zalathorm uses a crystal orb, through which all of the Elders can be contacted at once. There are almost 400 Elders, but fewer than half usually respond. Currently, only 39 wizards need to respond to achieve a quorum.

To become an Elder, a mage must be of at least 16th level. Not all eligible mages accept the post. Those that don't accept say they don't want the hassles of being part of the council.

When the wizard-king dies, or steps down, his successor is chosen from among the ranks of the Elders. The Elders pick the most powerful of their number to lead. A complicated system involving level of power, ranking of specialization, and opinions expressed by the Elders, is used to determine the new leader. The last three leaders have all been divination specialists. It is thought that these are the most powerful of the wizards. "Knowledge is power, great knowledge is great power."

Since most Halruans worship Mystra, the church plays a key role in the government. Priests of the Lady of Mysteries serve as judges for the state. The large temple complex of Mystra in the city of Halarahh houses Zalathorm's tower. The largest temple of Mystra, however, is at Mt. Talath, an ancient stronghold of caverns, passages, and mountaintop turrets.

Halruaa also has its mundane authorities. Patrols, city guards, and, occasionally, military forces are common sights on the streets. A saying in Halruaa, "if everyone was a mage, who would do the cooking" applies to all of the non-magical professions. Magic is an accepted part of peoples' lives. All patrols and military units have a priest or mage in their ranks.

Laws in Halruaa are strict and justice is swiftly meted out. For any serious offense, the offender may not be convicted without magical proof to back it up. Justice in Halruaa is swift. Someone convicted of murder by his own testimony may expect to be disintegrated before the day is out.

Intent is also studied magically, especially in capital crimes. A defense of "he pointed something at me that looked like a wand, so I slew him," is an acceptable defense, provided the defendant really thought his life was in danger.

People and Customs

Halruaa is predominantly a human nation. The descendants of the Netheril, mixed with some Arkaiun blood from the western plains of Dambrath, make up over 90% of the population.

The remainder are mostly dwarves, concerned with working the electrum mines east of Lake Maeru. Halfling traders from Luiren can be found near the coast. There are a few elves and half-elves whose fascination and talent with magic is strong enough to grant them a seat on the council of Elders.

Languages

Halruans speak Halruan, a version of Netherese, brought with them from the far north. It is a complicated language, not easily learned by a foreigner. Nearly all mages, traders and anyone who must deal with folk from the outside speak the common language of the Realms.

Social Customs

"It's the most paranoid country I was ever in," a Durparian merchant once remarked. "I couldn't walk three feet without some sort of divination spell being cast on me. It made me nervous, let me tell you. Sold my entire load of mandrake root, though, for a nice profit."

Since anyone, even a beggar on the street, could be hiding a wand of fireballs, most people are polite and make no sudden moves around strangers. Courtesy and politeness have become so ritualized that people are uncomfortable without them.

The high degree of courtesy has created several customs that are staunchly observed in daily life. Before one enters another's dwelling, one should identify oneself and pledge no magic or malice to those inside. It is considered an insult to use magic inside a dwelling without permission from the host. Depending on one's host's identity, it can also be quite dangerous.

All Halruan children are schooled until the age of 13. Halruan children are expected to learn reading and writing, history and a productive trade. When a child reaches the age of five, he is tested for potential for the Art. If the student is capable, he is also taught spells such as cantrips, dancing lights, or audible glamer. A group of adolescents following several bobbing clusters of glowing lights down the street is a common sight in any Halruan town. This is a popular game called Dueling Globes by the youngsters. The participants must match the movements of their lights from the dancing light spells.

Wizards are not a gregarious lot by nature. This is shown in the organization of Halruaa.

Halruaa

There are many small villages and towns, but few large cities. Halarahh, the largest city, boasts fewer than 8,000 people. Most villages are far smaller. Even along the coast, where most military troops are based, the numerous villages are still small.

The four largest cities after Halarahh are located along the coast, but none of these have populations greater than 7,000. Such a solitary and defensive attitude, insures that the average Halruan learns to defend himself.

As with any small country, the social order is pronounced, although it does not make a huge difference in a Halruan's daily life. At the bottom of the social ladder are those who can use little if any magic, such as a common miner or farmer. Next are those who defend Halruaa, the soldiers and the sailors of the military. The higher levels are all spellcasters.

The lowest group of spell casters in society is the small sect of priests of Azuth.

Above them are the mages, and the priests of Mystra. The order, from least respected to most respected is: necromancers, conjurers, abjurers, clerics of Mystra, enchanters, transmuters, specialty priests of Mystra, generalist mages, invokers, illusionists, and diviners.

This ranking reflects the recent past. After the era of the great Mycontil, an invoker of high level, invokers were felt to be the most powerful mages. Later, the second invasion from the bandit wastes was defeated in large part by many masterful illusions, including a horde of skyships raining fire on the enemy.

Recent years have shifted attention to the diviners, for Zalathorm has predicted many of the raids on Halruaa. This has enabled the border guards to win many battles with few casualties. About one third of Halruans have some ability with magic, and can cast at least one first level spell. The vast majority of these folks can cast no more than that. This means that in a patrol of 20 men, six of them, plus their leader, can cast a light, cantrip, or other common first level spell. Cantrip is especially popular. It is useful for lighting fires quickly, driving insects away from the steeds, or adding a bit of flavor to the stew. When it comes to cleaning up armor, a clean cantrip works wonders.

The same can be said for the average household. The housewife who can cast one spell has magical help with the housework for an hour. Such people are considered to be a special form of dual classed characters. They have the abilities of 1st-level mages along with whatever class they have chosen.

For example, the spell-casting members of a guard patrol start off with only a four-sided Hit Die, instead of the ten-sided die they normally would have. Once they reach 2nd level in the fighter class, they gain additional Hit Dice as a fighter. Such people should have an average of 3 hit points less than their non-spell-using companions.

Halruans are intensely interested in magic, and a gathering is often the place to show off a new magical effect. One of the reasons that the normally reclusive wizards have social gatherings is to show off new magical effects or items. These events are not limited to mages. Rich traders, important generals and electrum mine owners all desire and collect magical items. A new or unknown item is cause for much talk in the villages.

Nearly every Halruan, however, has his life affected by magic. Continual light spells are used to light almost all of the streets in the various villages. The richer villages have cyclical light spells to provide the lighting on their streets. Lamps with continual light spells are also common and affordable, as low as only 100 gold pieces in the towns of the Nath and near Mt. Talath.

Even many who do not cast spells are concerned with magic. Adventurers roam the Realms, searching for new spellbooks or items, to bring them fame and fortune in Halruaa. Many mages also wander the Realms to learn and bring back new magics.

Halruans are fiercely jealous of their own magic. Even though Halruan mages frequently travel the realms, they are expected to guard the secrets of Halruan magic. Spellbooks containing unique Halruan spells are extensively trapped and well guarded by the mages when they are taken from the country. The most common protection is a version of the fire trap. Since this spell effectively destroys the book, it is favored by Halruan mages to keep the Halruan spells from unfriendly hands. A traveling Halruan mage may end up with no traveling spellbooks, but this is considered a small price to pay for security.

Magical combat is frowned on among common folk. Most villages have a dueling field situated well away from any buildings, to accommodate mages who insist on settling disagreements by magical combat.

Dueling is not officially accepted. In fact it is opposed by the priests of Mystra, for such duels are frequently fatal. Such duels most frequently occur between two mages who have claimed the same new spell or item as their invention. Nothing matters as much to a young wizard as gaining credit for a new spell or item.

Invention of spells and items is a sure way to fame and fortune in Halruaa. A mage who invents a new spell is quick to advertise it. Just as quickly he'll be getting requests for copies of it, at a good fee, of course. The process of making magical items is even more expensive and is considerably more difficult than inventing a spell. Still, there are many unique items in Halruaa. Some duplicate or combine effects of other items, while others do things no other item does. For example, Zalathorm, the wizard-king, has a floating carriage that radiates a globe of invulnerability around it on command. No one else has been able to duplicate the effect, since a globe is normally stationary. Zalathorm has not revealed the secret yet. It is assumed that whoever takes over as king will inherit it.

Each Elder receives a skyship, and the secret of recharging it. This makes the position of Elder greatly desired among the lesser mages. Every family hopes for a son or daughter to become an archmage.

Twenty years ago, the necromancer Random ignited the latest influx of magic. This strange wizard had finally cracked the Southern Magic puzzle. He returned to Halruaa with a copy of the spell read Southern Magic. Over the next five years he made and sold numerous copies of the spell before he abruptly dropped out of sight. Most people believe Random is mad, and the country is better off without him. There is, however, concern that he may reveal secret and powerful Halruan magic. A team of mages has been dispatched by the Council of Elders to either fetch him back, or silence him forever.

Religion

The majority of Halruans worship one of two powers: Mystra or Azuth. The Halruans were very shaken by the Time of Troubles. Elders of Mystra's church believe either that Midnight has taken over Mystra's duties, or that Mystra has been restored. This split in belief has caused some elders to lose their faith in Mystra. These elders and some of the laity have begun to worship Azuth, infusing that faith with new popularity.

There is only one temple stronghold dedicated to Azuth. It is in the mountains near Lhair in western Halruaa. There are eight temples to Mystra in the mountains around the Nath, each one dedicated to one of the major schools of magic. The largest temple, under Mt. Talath, is dedicated to all forms of magic.

Money and Commerce

Although the wizards of Halruaa are protective of their magic and their privacy they have developed a taste for the finer things that other nations can provide. Durparian merchants dock at the ports of Zalasuu, Mithel, Halagard, and Khaerbaal. Goods from all over the Realms flow north into Halruaa.

Among the chief imports are; foodstuffs from Luiren (Luiren Stout is very popular in Halruaa), silks from Durpar, coffee from Ulgarth, and metal goods and weapons from Durpar. The chief export is electrum, which is found in almost pure deposits in the mountains east of Lake Maeru.

Halruaa is the home of two large lakes, Lake Maeru and Lake Halruaa. Lake Maeru has good fishing. It provides many a meal for the electrum miners and the farmers of the valley. Lake Halruaa yields little. The constant churning winds over the fresh water lake make sailing difficult. It is joined to the Great Sea by the Halagard Channel, a three-mile-wide channel which connects to the Bay of Halruaa.

Although Halruaa is larger and more powerful than her neighbors, it is somewhat sparsely populated. The population does not exceed 100,000. There are plenty of wide open spaces.

Traders are always welcome, but are watched with suspicion. Adventurers are seen as busybodies and thieves come to steal Halruan secrets. No Halruan is allowed to teach a non-native any of the unique Halruan spells, under pain of being feebleminded. Non-natives who learn such spells are hunted down and exterminated, for the good of the nation.

Within this stricture, there are still many spells and magical items that are available to outsiders. Someone with a new spell may be able to trade it for a spellbook with many of the common spells of the Realms.

The common currency of Halruaa is the Skie. This electrum coin is produced at the Royal Mint in Aluarim, in the center of the country. The coins bear the image of the current wizard-king, so most of the coins in use have Zalathorm's image. The Durpar Vellim, and the Dambraii Crint and Shebs are also widely used.

Halruaa

Cities on Halruaa

Halruaa has numerous villages, too many to detail here. Instead, the four most important are listed, followed by a description of a typical village that outlines what a group of characters might find there.

Halarahh

The home of the wizard-king, Halarahh has a population of 8,000, which makes it the largest city, in Halruaa. It is a comfortable city on the northern banks of Lake Halruaa, at the mouth of the river Halar. Halarahh is a wide sprawling town; the area of the city is twice what one would expect from the population.

The town is dotted with wizard's towers, for almost half of the citizenry are spellcasters. There are, however, actually only about 300 practicing mages in the town. Much of the town has magical lighting and other conveniences. Many of the buildings are kept magically cool in the heat of the summer by use of the cooling breeze spell, and by means of large blocks of ice created by enterprising mages on a daily basis.

Halarahh is home to no less than 17 members of the Council of Elders; therefore, the sight of a skyship is not at all uncommon. There are a number of ships that ply Lake Halruaa, but they stay near the shore. The winds on the lake are too dangerous for sailing, even for skyships.

Khaerbaal

Khaerbaal is located along the southern coast, sheltered in the bay of Taertal. It is one of two bases of the small Halruan navy. The entire navy consists of only 50 sailing ships and 20 skyships. In times of need, another 40 or 50 skyships, along with the archmages who own them, can be raised from the cities along the coast.

Khaerbaal is governed by the leading Elder of the city Grozalum, an illusionist of 19th level. It has a population of about 7,000. Most of that group is concerned with shipping and trading.

The navy's principal fortified base and construction docks are on the outlying isle of Rulasuu. Since there is no real city on Rulasuu, most of the military men based there take shore leave in Khaerbaal. This makes it a rather wild town, with a large number of inns and taverns.

Zalasuu

Zalasuu is located on the Bay of Azuth, and is the other base of the Halruan navy. It is ruled by Lailuu, a 19th level priestess of Mystra. Lailuu is more concerned with defending Halruaa than in ruling the city. The day to day administration is left up to clerks and officials, who have little or no skill in magic.

Only 5,000 people call Zalasuu home. In addition, 2,000 additional military troops are stationed in a large fort located just outside of town.

The presence of the Kilmaruu swamp to the east of the city make a defense force necessary. It is the site of a ruined city, with many undead inhabiting the broken buildings. In spite of the danger, mages and other adventurers keep searching the ruins. To quote a common Zalasuu expression, "The swamp helps keep the number of fools in town low."

Halagard

Halagard was once the capital of Halruaa. It lost that honor a century ago, when the current wizard-king moved north to Halarahh. It is nearly as large as Halarahh, with a population of 7,500. Halagard is situated at the mouth of the Halagard Channel, on the Bay of Halruaa. It is from here that the fishing fleets sail. The Bay of Halruaa is both a safe harbor and very fertile fishing ground.

The chief Elder in Halagard is Basel Indoulur, a conjurer specialist mage of 20th level. Basel is a rarity amongst Halruan mages; he likes apprentices. The lives of Basel's apprentices are not easy. He works them very hard. Since he is one of the most powerful conjurers in the land, he never lacks for applicants.

Halruaa

Other Halruan Cities

There are a number of other cities of note. Maeruhul is closest to the electrum mines, and boasts five skyships, all belonging to Elders. The city's regiment of guards includes two companies of dwarven fighters. Aluarim is the site of the Royal Mint, and also the home of the most powerful invoker in the country, Rhodea Firehair. Talathgard, which has a force of 200 trained mountain men, guards the entrance to the vast temple complex under Mt. Talath. Galdel lies on the south side of Lake Halruaa. It has several dozen electrum-smiths fashioning fine art objects and rings, wands, and weapons to be enchanted. The dwarf Boronuil Ironfist, the best craftsman in Halruaa, lives here. If one can afford it, Boronuil will craft items for enchantment. He charges quadruple standard rates, and has a waiting list of two years or more.

A Halruan Village

The average Halruan village has from 100 to 500 people, usually concerned with a single type of magic or craft. Most villages have a mage of at least 11th level. The highest ranking mage, whether an Elder or not, is considered the village elder, and makes decisions on most things.

The village also has a militia. If it is a very small village, the militia may consist of every able bodied adult in town. All mages and priests are expected to help defend the town. Since even the smallest towns have at least three or four mages, most Halruan villages have little to fear from the occasional marauding beast or raiding bandits. A full 60% of the towns have a member of the Council of Elders in residence. Given the nature of high level wizards, this is easy to understand. Many of the villages were founded around a wizard's tower, both for protection and service.

Cyclical light spells are common, as are continual light, cooling breeze, cantrip, and unseen servant. Other magical effects are also common. The people of Halruaa know about magic, and what it can do for them. Many an innkeeper has obtained a rare magic book or spell component, then traded it to the local archmage for a valuable magic guard. The Astral Inn, located in the farming community of Eichul, boasts fine wine, good food, and an iron golem for a bouncer. Though that may seem extreme, it is not unusual.

Nearly every town has an inn or hostelry. Travelers, at least Halruan travelers, are common. Strangers stand out. If they appear dangerous or powerful they're watched every second, either openly or magically.

Places of Interest

The Walls of Halruaa

The mountains surrounding Halruaa are known collectively as the walls of Halruaa. The mountains on the west side of the country, south of Mt. Talath, are known as Lhairghal, the West Wall. The northern mountains, including those surrounding the Nath, are called the North Wall, or Nathaghal. The East Wall is known as the Muaraghal. These mountain are high, towering 20,000 feet or more. There are three passes through the Walls: Talath Pass on the northwest, Achelar Pass on the east, and The High Aluar on the north.

The mountains, particularly surrounding the Nath, are homes to the temples of magic. The mountains are not usually dangerous. At least, not on the Halruaa side of the mountains. Monsters, including cyclopskin, manticores, rocs, cockatrices, and medusae make their homes on the slopes facing away from Halruaa. The Muaraghal is the site of some of the purest electrum deposits in the Realms. Halruans have been mining near Lake Maeru for hundreds of years. The deposits show no sign of running out. This is well, since a good part of the wealth of Halruaa is connected to the electrum mines.

Lake Halruaa

Lake Halruaa is a large body of water in the center of the country. It is connected to the Great

Halruaa

Sea via the Halagard Channel, which is used by many ships to reach Halarahh. The ever present winds make the center of the lake extremely choppy and difficult to navigate. Ships that must sail to Sulaziir or Nishtul usually hug the coast, or risk being lost forever.

Swamp Of Akhlaur

Akhlaur was a 30th-level conjurer in Halruaa 200 years ago. Akhlaur's only interest was to increase his power through magical research. Finally he delved too deep and summoned fiends too powerful for even him to control. He was seized by one of the fiends and dragged back to its home plane. A gateway was left open to the elemental plane of water when Akhlaur was lost, and, since then, the Swamp of Akhlaur has been growing. It is currently an oblong, 95 miles by 30 miles, and it grows about a hundred feet every year.

Akhlaur was rumored to have magical items that other mages have only dreamt of. Many mages have entered the swamps attempting to recover the treasures of Akhlaur. Others have tried to learn the reason for the swamp's continuing growth. None of them succeeded in locating the tower of Akhlaur. It is believed that the tower lies buried in the swamp, waiting for the mage who can penetrate its secrets.

The swamp is typical of most southern swamps, filled with cypress trees, heavy moss, snakes, crocodiles, piranha, and other swamp monsters. There are a fair number of undead, ghouls and wights abound. There is also a unique type of monster, the one responsible for the death of Akhlaur. The laraken, or magic drainer lives in the swamp. The laraken, which is almost totally immune to magic, feeds on magical energy. Few laraken exist, but those that do exist are almost certain death to any mage they meet. They rarely, if ever, leave the swamp.

The swamp is slowly growing. The small gate allows a constant stream of enchanted water into the tower. If left unchecked, it could someday threaten the entire country. It is also responsible for keeping the laraken from invading the rest of Halruaa. The laraken feed off the enchanted water, draining some of its magic. By the time the water moves beyond the swamp, it no longer radiates magic. Only a few of the mages in the council of Elders, including Zalathorm, know this.

Mount Talath

The center of magic in Halruaa, Mt. Talath is the home of the largest temple to Mystra in the Realms. It occupies an entire cavern complex. Vast storerooms of old tomes, scrolls of knowledge, and long forgotten magical items are kept here. It is here that many mages and priests prefer to come for training. The leader of the temple is Greila Sontoin, a priestess of 20th level. She is said to have unearthly wisdom (22), gained both through magic and the favor of the Mystra. Greila is very old and seldom leaves the temple anymore. She is still capable of powerful magic. The temple is not an easy place to enter. One must pass a rigorous magical screening. Of course, such a large complex has its holes. Thieves and spies do occasionally gain entrance. Such intruders are dealt with summarily — they are fried, frosted, or disintegrated. Those with good intentions who attempt to enter may be admitted. A native of Halruaa is allowed access to almost everywhere; a non-native may be charged a horrendous fee to be admitted to certain “safe” libraries and halls. Outsiders often speak of the wondrous libraries in the temple, not realizing that they have seen less than a third of its treasures.

There is also a grand temple, which anyone may enter for the purpose of worship. If characters come here expecting to get their hands on unique spells, or magical items, they will be disappointed.

Halruan NPCs

Zalathorm, The Wizard King

29th-level human male diviner: Str 10, Des 14, Con 10, Int 19, Wis 17, Cha 14; AI, LG; XC -2; MV 12; hp 52; THAC0 11; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (staff); SZ M; ML 18. Spells 8/8/8/8/7/7/7/7/7

Where Found: Halarahh

Zalathorm is one of the most powerful mages in a nation of powerful mages. He possesses a vast assortment of magical items, and he won't hesitate to use them. His most impressive possession is his crystal orb. This item allows him to communicate with all of the Elders in the Council simultaneously. It is detailed in the new magical items section at the end of this chapter.

Halruaa has resisted many raids from Dambrath and the Jungles of Chult during his long reign. Some say that Zalathorm possesses powers beyond magic. They are correct. He possesses several psionic powers useful for predicting the future. These powers, used in concert with his awesome divination skills, make Zalathorm a very hard man to surprise. He has correctly predicted every major raid into Halruaa in the last 50 years. With that kind of knowledge, the border guards have little trouble keeping the land safe.

The PCs may encounter Zalathorm if they visit Halarahh. He keeps an eye on the city, as well as on the country. He is interested in powerful adventurers, although his main interest may be getting them out of the country.

Halruaa

Rhodea Firehair

24th-level human female invoker: Str 9, Dex 12, Con 17, Int 18, Wis 12, Cha 13; AL LG; AC 0; MV 13; hp 42; THAC0 13; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (staff): SZ M; ML 15. Spells 6/6/6/6/6/6 /6/5

Where found: Aluarim

Rhodea is an exception to the rule that says mages should cower in the back of a party. She is absolutely fearless, and has led troops into combat. With her awesome array of destructive magic, she is very effective. Rhodea is probably the most conscientious mage in Halruaa. She has never missed a council call. She also sees to it that the mint is run fairly.

Rym Windwalker

5th-level half-elven male mage: Str 9, Dex 11, Con 10, Int 17, Wis 9, Cha 14; AL CG; AC 5; MV 12; hp 15; THAC0 19; #AT 1; Dmg 1-4 (dagger): SZ M; ML 12. Spells: 4/2/1

Where Found: Halruaa

Rym Windwalker is a typical young mage. If a PC party encounters him, he is looking for adventure. Whatever they propose, he's up for it. Unfortunately, while Rym has a high intelligence, his wisdom is low. He is likely to foolishly charge into danger at the first sign of trouble. His power, however, does not match his enthusiasm. If he is allowed to travel with a party, he is loyal, friendly, and rather inept.

Ramael The Reader

18th-level human male mage: Str 13, Dex 16, Con 10, Int 19, Wis 13, Cha 17; AL LN; AC 2; MV 12; hp 40; THAC0 15; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (staff): SZ RI; ML 14. Spells 5/5/5/5/3/3/1

Where Found: Wanders, currently the Dales

Ramael is called the Reader because of his fondness for ESP spells. He is a powerful mage, smart enough to have invented the spells he claimed. He escaped from Halruaa after being accused of spell theft, losing an eye in the process. He currently roams the Dales, always looking over his shoulder. He is currently masquerading as a bard, with the help of a harp of Myth Drannor. Ramael possesses a number of magical items, most notably an amulet of proof against detection and location and a ring of mind shielding. He is being hunted by Halruan mages, for he left the country with many unique spells in his spellbooks. He possesses all of the spells listed in the New Spell section, as well as quite a few others. When he encounters someone next, he is distrustful. He will attempt to keep up his act as a bard at all times. Once he has a chance to check out the PCs' intentions telepathically, he can be reasoned with. Ramael will teach PC mages new spells, but the price is sure to be very high.

Random Riellor

19th-level human male necromancer: Str 11, Dex 14, Con 9, Int 19, Wis 17, Cha 9; AL CN; AC 2; MV 12; hp 48; THAC0 14; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (staff); SZ M; ML 18. Spells 6/6/6/6/6/4/4/2

Where Found: Almost anywhere in the Realms

Random is credited with cracking the puzzle of Southern Magic. He is brilliant, but very erratic. He possesses a ring of teleportation that allows him to teleport up to three times a day. He can be used as a recurring "mad wizard," showing up at anytime and at any place. He is just as likely to hinder characters as help them. Random's personality changes from day to day; the only thing that is constant is his brilliance. He is not interested in fiery magic, claiming that his magic is more subtle. He has fitted his skyship (currently in orbit above Faerun) with a spelljamming helm. He has left the Realms several times, but has always returned. The ship makes a convenient place to teleport to when he has finished his business. Random helps only those who further his research.

Halruaa

Adventurers in Halruaa

Halruaa is home to many adventurers, but non-Halruan adventurers are seldom welcome. Venturing into the forest of Mhair, the Swagdar, or even the swamp of Akhlaur can be good training and profitable if one survives. Outsiders can find many other places to adventure as well, but the suspicion and watchfulness never end. Fighters may find work with patrols. Mages may be able to pay or trade for training. Priests are welcome, if they worship Mystra or Azuth. Priests of other deities and thieves, should they draw attention to themselves, are politely asked to leave.

Halruan Adventurers in The Realms

Halruan mages travel all over the Realms, searching for new magic. If a new spell gains popularity, a Halruan mage will eventually show up to learn the spell.

One prominent group from Halruaa, and the only one which claims Halruaa as its home, is the Destroyers. This is a highly specialized mercenary company, led by Daltim Flamefist, a 14th-level fire mage. There are 30 wizards and psionicists in the group, and Daltim is known to have wild psionic talents himself. They are a strictly Lawful group, honoring any contract they have made.

Some travelers have chosen not to return to Halruaa. Among the more prominent of these fugitives are: Omen, whose adventures have been chronicled in The FORGOTTEN REALMS™ comic books; Darsson, a powerful mage now thought to be somewhere near Raven's Bluff or Tantras; Ramael the Reader, an Elder who was exposed as a spell thief; and Random, an erratic mage who many believe is incurably insane.

New Halruan Magic

Old Empires (FR10) introduced a type of magic called Southern Magic. When these spells were introduced, they could not be used by normal mages. Because they were written in a different magical language, a normal read magic spell would not reveal this writing. Therefore, mages could neither transfer them to their spellbooks, nor could they learn to use them. Two decades ago, the erratic Random learned the read Southern Magic spell. It is now available in Halruaa.

This is a small selection of the new wizard spells and magical items available in Halruaa. If DMs wish to introduce new spells from other accessory books, they will find Halruaa an excellent setting in which to do so.

First Level Spell

Insulation (Abjuration/Alteration)

Range: Touch

Components: V,S,M

Duration: 2 rounds/level

Casting Time: 1

Area of Effect: Creature touched

Saving Throw: None

This spell provides the caster with a temporary resistance to all electrical spells or effects. The recipient of the spell gains a bonus of +3 to saving throws against such attack forms, and all damage sustained is reduced by 50%. If the saving throw is failed, the protected creature sustains one-half damage. If the saving throw is successful, only one-quarter damage is sustained.

The material component of this spell is a 1" square piece of rubber. This must be placed between the recipient's foot (shod or unshod) and the ground. It must be touched by the recipient at all times or the spell is ineffective. If conditions are wet, i.e. the recipient is standing in water, or in a thunderstorm, the bonus on the saving throw is reduced to +1. The resistance to damage is unchanged.

Halruaa

Second Level Spells

Protection From Birds (Abjuration)

Range: 0

Components: V,S,M

Duration: 5 rounds +5 rounds/level

Casting Time: 5

Area of Effect: One Creature

Saving Throw: Negates

This spell provides protection against most types of birds (any with feathers). Any bird with less than two hit dice is prevented from attacking the caster at a distance of one foot. Birds with 2 to 9 hit dice attack the caster at a -2, while birds of 10 hit dice or greater are not affected by the spell. The material component is a feather from any bird. If a feather from a roc or giant eagle is used, the duration of the spell is doubled. The protection from birds spell was invented by an obscure abjuration specialist who was tired of having protection from cantrips as his only second level Abjuration spell.

Darsson's Cooling Breeze

(Alteration/Evocation)

Range: 0

Components: V,S,M

Duration: 4 hours/level

Casting Time: 2

Area of effect: 3 foot radius/level

Saving Throw: None

This spell is a less powerful but longer lasting version of the gust of wind spell. It allows the caster to place the spell on an object, or at a specific point if he wishes. When cast, the air about this point moves slowly in a circle around the center. The air movement is slow. It won't move faster than 5 mph (about the same as a ceiling fan). This spell is widely used, since it keeps the air moving in an enclosed place. This spell serves almost no purpose except to make a stifling room more comfortable. Richer citizens of Halruaa often cool their homes by means of this spell. It works well when combined with large blocks of ice, that can be purchased from enterprising mages who use the wall of ice spell.

Halruaa

The material component of the spell is a dried legume.

Darsson's Fiery Cube (Evocation)

Range: 5 yards/level

Components: V,S,M

Duration: Instantaneous

Casting Time: 2

Area of Effect: 10-foot cube

Saving Throw: 1/2

The fiery cube is an explosive burst of flame that covers an area no larger than a 10' cube. It detonates with a low roar creating a cube of fire. The fire inflicts 1d4 points of damage per level of the caster, to a maximum of 10d4. The fiery cube will fill any open space in its area of effect, but will not expand beyond that area. Thus, if it were cast in a corridor 5' wide and 7' high, it would fill a volume of 10' x 7' x 5'.

Besides causing damage, the spell ignites all combustibles in its area of effect and melts soft metals. Exposed items requires a saving throw versus magical fire to determine if they are affected. Items in the possession of a creature which makes its saving throw are unaffected.

The caster points his finger and speaks the range (distance and height) at which he wishes to place the spell's center. A streak of orange light flashes from the pointing finger, detonating in cube shape at the prescribed place, unless it strikes a solid object before reaching that place (early impact indicates an early detonation).

Creatures who fail their saves take full damage. Those who save successfully are assumed to have leaped part way out of the cube and take only half damage.

The material component of this spell is a tiny cube of bat guano, a small amount of sulfur, and a flake of phosphorus.

Third Level Spell

Scintillating Sphere (Evocation)

Range: 15 yards + 10 yards/level

Components: V,S,M

Duration: Instantaneous

Casting Time: 3

Area of Effect: 10-foot radius

Saving Throw: 1/2

This spell causes a grape-sized sphere to appear near the caster. The sphere then travels in a straight line at high speed to a position in sight of the spellcaster.

Upon reaching this position, the sphere pulses outward twice and then disappears. Damage is caused by the second pulse only, and is electrical in nature. Damage caused is 1d6 for every level of the caster, to a maximum of 10d6. A successful save versus spell reduces the damage by half. The position is chosen by pointing at the spot and speaking the distance for the sphere to travel. Saving throws for items are as per a lightning bolt spell.

The material components are a small glass sphere and a pinch of iron oxide. The components are consumed in the casting.

Halruaa

Fourth Level Spell

Ramael's Cyclical Light (Alteration)

Range: 90 yards
Components: V,S,M
Duration: Permanent
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: 60-foot radius
Saving Throw: None

This spell is similar to the continual light spell, except that it fades and glows in response to the outside light. It can only be cast on an object. It may not be cast into thin air or on a living creature. It can, however, be cast on non-living creatures.

When the spell is cast on an object, it is immediately bound to the object. If the object is in full daylight at the time the spell is cast, no effect will be noticed. When the object is taken into a dark place the value of the spell is noticed, for it begins to brighten immediately. When in total darkness, it shines as brightly as full daylight. The effect requires from 2-5 (1d4+1) rounds to adjust to changes in outside light. If some light is present, the glow is no brighter than necessary to place the object in the equivalent of full daylight.

A stone with this spell, placed deep in a backpack, or wrapped with black silk, glows with full brightness when unwrapped, even in torchlight or the presence of other light spells. Other light must fall upon the enchanted object before the light begins to dim.

The material components of this spell are optional. If cast with no material component, the light resembles a normal continual light spell. If a small gem, worth at least 10 gold pieces, is used in the casting, the light will be the same color as the gem.

This spell is very popular in Halruaa. Most mages actually give credit to Ramael for it, considering it the one spell he truly invented. Some mages theorize that a cyclical darkness spell is possible, but no one has yet spent the time or energy to research it.

Fifth Level Spells

Damson's Music Box (Enchantment)

Range: 10 yards Components: V,S,M
Duration: Permanent
Casting Time: variable
Area of Effect: 1 object
Saving Throw: None

Using this spell, a wizard may enchant an inanimate object, usually a seashell or small box, to play a magically recorded message or song. The caster may use the spell to save a special song; to play dramatic music when anyone enters his dwelling; or to create a fancy doorbell.

The message recorded may last for up to one turn. To record, the wizard casts the spell and mentally commands the recording to begin any time in the next round. Likewise, the caster may end the recording by mental command before the maximum one turn duration has expired. Any sound made within a radius determined by the caster (up to 30') will be recorded. Recordings of spellcasting and command words may be made, but may not be used to actually cast spells or cause magical items to function. A recording may be used to trigger a magic mouth or other spell that requires a specific condition to be met, provided the condition specifies a recorded message as a trigger.

Recorded material is played back when specific conditions are fulfilled, according to the spellcaster's instructions. Playback may be at any non-damaging volume, determined at the original casting time. Two recordings made of the same musical piece, made at the same time on two different objects, may be made to respond to the same condition, producing a stereo effect. Most of Darsson's music boxes are set to respond when the name of a recorded piece is spoken, but they may be set with any trigger, general or specific. Some examples are, "when anyone knocks on this door," or "when the king enters the throne room." Another possibility is "when one or more halflings enter the larder." The trigger cannot distinguish invisible creatures, alignments, level, Hit Dice, or class, except by external garb.

The material component for the spell is a pearl or a small cube of brass which is placed inside the ornately carved box, polished seashell, or other fine object on which the dweomer is to be placed.

Rapid Reflexive Response (Alteration)

Range: 0

Components: V,S,M Duration: 1 round/level

Casting Time: 5

Area of Effect: Caster

Saving Throw: None

This spell was claimed by the infamous Ramael the Reader, but most Halruans give credit to the famous Mycontil. When cast, this spell enables the caster to grab hurled or projected missiles, such as arrows, axes, bolts, javelins, small stones, or similar objects that weigh less than 7 pounds, out of the air and immediately hurl them back at the attacker with a +4 bonus on the attack roll. The caster may grab one object with each hand each round and return them the same round. An attack roll with the stated bonus is required for each attack. The spell expires at the end of the stated duration, or as soon as the caster performs another action other than the reflexive response. This spell actually speeds up the caster's reflexes to a superhuman level, so in order to perform a normal action, such as casting a spell, the caster must end the spell.

The material components are a glove once worn by a thrown weapon specialist or a halfling, a shaving of licorice root, and a frog's tongue. The caster must consume the latter two components as part of the casting. The glove remains and may be reused.

Sixth Level Spells

Ring of Disintegration (Alteration)

Range: 30 yards

Components: V,S,M

Duration: Instantaneous

Casting Time: 6

Saving Throw: Special

Area: 1 creature

Another of the "stolen spells of Mycontil", this one is also falsely claimed by Ramael the Reader. When cast, a tiny bit of annihilating matter is brought into existence, growing to the form of a six-inch circlet at impact. A successful attack roll must be made by the caster, as a fighter of his her level. The target creature is entitled to a saving throw versus petrification. Affected creatures suffer 1d6 points of damage per level of the caster, and also lose an appendage. Creatures who successfully save suffer half damage, and no appendage is lost. Creatures of size L, or larger are not subject to the loss of a limb, since the sphere is too small to affect them in that way. For purposes of determining which appendage is lost, roll at random. The head does count as an appendage.

The material component for this spell is a specially prepared silver bracelet worth at least 100 gp, with 1 gram of mithril worked into it. It is consumed in the casting.

This spell can be very dangerous. On an attack roll of a natural 1, the caster must make a saving throw vs. spell or fumble the throw, and lose his own hand as a result of the fumble.

Suspension (Alteration)

Range: 20 yds/level

Components: V,S,M

Duration: 1-4 days +1 day/level

Casting Time: 1 round

Area of Effect: 1 creature or object

Saving Throw: Neg.

Halruaa

This is a powerful, long lasting version of the levitate spell, thought to have been brought south by the original Netherese. This spell is known to be one of the magics necessary to power the fabled skyships.

It functions in all ways as does the levitate spell. It can be cast on the mage's person, on an object, or upon a single creature. The weight limit, 1000 pounds per level of the caster, is greater than that of the levitate spell. Unwilling creatures are allowed a saving throw versus spells to avoid the effects.

Concentration is only required when changing height. The movement rate for this spell is 120 feet per round. Smashing someone into a rock ceiling at that rate causes only 1d6 points of damage, with a saving throw versus paralyzation to avoid any damage. Once the desired height is reached, the levitated object or person remains at that height for the spell duration, or until the height is changed again. The material component is a small leather loop suspended from a bent golden wire. Both are consumed in the casting.

Seventh Level Spell

Nerve Dance (Necromancy)

Range: 10 yards/level (120 yd. maximum)

Components: V,S,M

Duration: 3 rounds +1 round/5 levels

Casting Time: 7

Area of Effect: 1 to 3 creatures Saving Throw: Special

This is another spell from the books of Random the Mad. Casting this spell causes one to three glowing, red streamers to shoot from the caster's hand. Each of these streamers pursue the intended target or targets for the stated duration, or until they strike and wrap around the target. Targeted creatures are allowed a saving throw versus spells each round; failure means they are struck by the streamers. The save must be made each round until the spell expires.

Those who fail their saving throw take 2d6 points of damage per round, and fall to the ground in excruciating pain. Those who make their saves must continue to dodge and weave, and are incapable of spellcasting or similar actions. Targeting multiple streamers at the same target has no additional effect. The caster must concentrate on the streamers to direct them. If his concentration is broken the spell ends immediately. The streamers may be destroyed before they hit. They are AC 0, and any hit from a magical weapon destroys them. They take no damage from normal weapons.

The material components are a 6-inch strand of red spider silk, and a glass rod with continual light cast upon it. The rod is used to direct the streamers. The spider silk is consumed in the casting, as is the continual light spell.

Ninth Level Spells

Power Word: Banishment (Abjuration/Conjuration)

Range: 5 yards level

Components: V

Duration: Instantaneous

Casting Time: 1

Area of Effect: 1 creature

Saving Throw: None

By means of this spell, the caster can banish one extra-planar creature, forcing it to return to its home plane. The effect is instantaneous. The subject cannot return without a special summoning, or some means of egress from its home to the plane from which it was banished. This spell closely resembles the 7th-level spell banishment, but it is more powerful and more dangerous. The caster need merely look at the extra-planar creature and speak the name of its home plane. The effect happens immediately. Of course, any magic resistance that the creature possesses must be overcome for the spell to function.

Halruaa

If the caster has correctly named the home plane of the subject, and if the creature currently has 70 hit points or fewer, it is banished. If not, the caster is in a large amount of trouble.

If a caster fails to overcome a creature's magic resistance, the spell merely fails. However, if he has named the wrong plane, or if the creature is too powerful to be affected, the caster must immediately make a saving throw versus death magic at -4. Failure means he is banished to that plane himself. If he succeeds, he is dazed and shaken by the brush with disaster, and can take no actions other than defense for the next two rounds. Even if the spell is entirely successful, the force of the spell is such that the mage cannot concentrate enough to cast another spell until at least 1 full round has passed.

This spell cannot be cast on oneself. The caster must be able to see the creature he is casting it on. Clever mages who cast the spell into a mirror might succeed in returning the mirror to its own plane, but it certainly wouldn't do anything for the caster.

Mycontil's Last Resort (Alteration/Evocation)

Range: 10 yards per level

Components: V,S,M

Duration: Instantaneous

Casting Time: 1 (see below)

Area of Effect: 30' radius

Saving Throw: 1/2

This is the spell that most mages claim Mycontil used in his climactic battle against the Dambraii. The spell was claimed by Ramael, and is one of the chief arguments his foes used to discredit him.

When cast, this spell converts all remaining spells in the caster's memory to magical energy, in much the same way that a staff of power's final strike does. All creatures in a 30' radius take 1d4 points of damage per spell level memorized; creatures farther away than 10' may save versus death magic for half damage.

This spell works even against magic resistant creatures. A creature who is 65% magic resistant can resist only 65% of the damage, he takes the rest normally. If he is farther than 10' away, he still gets a saving throw to evade half of the damage that would affect him.

The effects on the mage can be devastating. When the spell is cast, the caster must immediately make a system shock roll. If he fails, he dies immediately, consumed in the casting. If he succeeds, he permanently loses one point of constitution, and is in a coma for 1-4 weeks. A heal spell will shorten the length of coma to 1-4 days from the time the heal spell was cast.

The material component is the finger bone of an archmage, which must be prepared in a ritual which takes from 1-4 days. The material for the ritual is costly as well, involving diamond dust worth at least 5000 gold pieces, and a pure platinum ring on the finger. When the ritual is complete, the caster intones all but the final word of the spell, which he mentally commands at the time of the casting. After all is prepared, the caster can activate the spell merely by speaking the final word and breaking the finger bone. After the initial casting the caster does not have to keep this spell in memory. Once the ritual is completed, the caster may memorize another ninth-level spell to replace the last resort.

For obvious reasons, this spell is not used frequently. In the history of Halruaa, only Mycontil is thought to have cast this spell.

New Magical Items of Halruaa

A few of the magical items from Halruaa are presented here. These are but a small sampling of a wide variety of unique items.

Girdle of Priestly Might

XP Value 3000

This girdle first appeared after the Time of Troubles. Priests of Mystra took it to be a sign that the goddess had regained her power. This item is one of the reasons that Azuth has not gained more supporters in Halruaa.

These girdles actually come in three versions. The basic girdle allows the wearer an 18/99 strength and a +2 armor class bonus. The second type, called a girdle of priestly warding, grants the above powers, plus a protection from evil (or good). The third girdle, the girdle of holy might, grants the preceding powers, plus the ability to use a word of recall spell once per month.

Percentile Roll	Type of Girdle Found
01-70	Priestly Might
71-95	Priestly Warding
96-00	Holy Might

The girdle bears the symbol of the power to which it is bonded on the front. However, any priest or cleric of the same alignment as the power whose symbol appears on a given girdle may use it. (One need not be a priest of that particular power, only be of the same alignment.) The girdles are not aligned with respect to Chaos or Law, being vessels either of good, neutrality, or evil. A priest who tries on a girdle of an opposing alignment is cursed, and will receive no spells above 2nd level until he receives an atonement spell. A quest of the power's choosing may also be necessary. A neutral cleric who tries on either a good or evil girdle suffers the same effect.

It is not known exactly how many other girdles have appeared in the Realms. Given the new, more active stance that powers have been forced to take in the Realms, it is thought that there may be more than a few of these items. It is highly unlikely that these will be found in treasure hoards. The girdles that are known to exist are all carefully guarded. It is doubtful that such a girdle will be found on anyone who has not been a high priest for quite some time.

The priests of Mystra are known to have at least one of each type in the temple fortress at Mt. Talath. There are also rumors that the secret of constructing more of these items has been discovered. If so, it is sure to be a long and expensive process.

Crystal Orb

XP Value 10,000

This orb is thought to have been crafted by the great wizard Halruaa himself. The reigning wizard-kings have had this orb for as long as Halruaa has existed. It has the unique power of being able to contact up to 500 beings at once. Zalathorm (or another wizard using it) may contact as many beings as he wants. It takes but one round to activate the orb. In order for the orb to function, however, it must be attuned to those it will be used to contact. This is as simple as having the owner speak a command word while touching the intended recipient. Having used the same command word for each mage, Zalathorm can contact every Elder mage by speaking a single command word. Mages may refuse the contact. If the intended contact is deep in concentration (casting a spell or enchanting a magical item), she does not feel the contact until she relaxes her concentration.

The orb also has the property of highlighting in the orb, and in the minds of all in the group contact, the image of whoever is speaking. It has the additional advantage of only allowing one person to "speak" at a time. It thus acts as a sort of "meeting organizer" for the tumultuous wizards who form the Eiders of Halruaa. Zalathorm can break in at any time by touching the orb, giving the wizard-king complete control of all meetings of the Council of Elders.

The only known orb of this type is stored in a special room in Zalathorm's tower. It is thought to be one of the most heavily guarded magical items in all of the Realms. Among other protections, Zalathorm has cast a variant of a contingency spell on the orb, that should it be stolen or taken out of the room by someone who is not attuned to it, it immediately teleports to the hands of the high priestess of Mystra, in Mt. Talath.

Halruan Skyships

XP Value: 8,000

The Halruan skyships are famed all through the Shining South. Even Elminster has described such vessels in his writings. Skyships are not to be confused with ships capable of spelljamming, although it is known that one can be outfitted with a spelljamming helm.

The ships were originally invented in far off Netheril, by the ancestors of the Halruans. The Red Wizards of Thay have claimed the credit for the invention, but Halruans know the truth. A skyship is a sailing vessel, broad-beamed so as to be able to rest easily on the ground. Its material tends to be light and flexible, to give and flow with the winds. The standard ship of Halruaa has three masts of flexible wood, and two panels that can be swung out for steering and guidance.

While undamaged, the vessel can never be sunk beneath the sea, for the same power that holds the ship aloft affects the water that surrounds it. The ship's hull is studded with polished plates taken from the species of giant turtle found in the waters off the coast.

The ship is at the mercy of the winds. The leeward panels do allow it some control, so that it can run before the winds and not be buffeted by them.

The control of the ship is tied to a special magical rod. This rod has three parts: a central shaft usually made of silver, and two hollow cylinders of gold, one over each end. The cylinders may be moved towards the center of the rod, exposing the ends. One end dampens the levitation fields of the ship, the other augments it. This allows the ship to climb or dive, at a rate of 120' per round. The cylinders are usually carved so that one can tell the difference, even in the dark.

Obviously this is no safe and steady fighting platform, although mages may cast spells from its deck. It is a large and clumsy target in aerial combat (maneuverability class E). It has a great degree of variability in speed and stability due to the chance of the wind and the turbulence created by other aerial bodies. Nonetheless, it is very effective in dropping solid missiles, flaming oil, or other things upon hostile forces.

A skyship has its greatest buoyancy near the ground. At an altitude of 100' a standard skyship has a cargo displacement of 10 to 15 tons, a fraction of what a sea-going vessel can lift. This drops as the vessel climbs, until at 3600 feet it can lift little more than its own weight, and that of the crew. A standard crew is 20 to 30 men. If the ship is operating with a short crew, it can carry a bit more cargo. Since the Walls of Halruaa are much higher than 3600', such ships can only leave Halruaa through one of the mountain passes, by sea, or via the High Aluar.

The control rod needs continual recharging, and the levitation spells on the ship itself must be renewed once per year. The rod can be recharged by the casting of suspension or levitate spells. The secret of renewing the ship is known only to the council of Elders.

These ships are relatively common in Halruaa, but are rare anywhere else. Of all of their secrets, the mages guard that of their skyships the most zealously.

Dambrath

General Description

Dambrath is bordered on the south by the Great Sea and on the north by the Forest of Amtar. To the west lie the semi-mountainous region known as the Walls of Halruaa and the great Kethid Swamp. For hundreds of years, the horder on the east has been the Trader's Way and the River Ammath. The Dambraii do not claim or want any part of the Eastern Shaar or the Granuin Forest. The proper term for a Dambrath citizen is a Damhraii, the plural and possessive form of this is Damhraii. Damhrathian or Damhrather are used only by foreigners.

Geography and Climate

Dambrath is an open land, with miles of range-land, and hundreds of miles of safe coastline. The Bay of Dancing Dolphins has not suffered a had storm in five hundred years.

The fields of the ranchos grow a tall (3' to 4') grass called arkas. The grass is exceptionally good feed for livestock.

To the north, the Grollwatch mountains are not a particularly impressive mountain range. Mount Hazail, the tallest peak, only reaches 11,500 feet. Most of the mountains average only 9,000 feet. To the west the mountains give way to the Hills of the Dead Kind which are alive with streams, grassy knolls, of seasonal groves of fruit trees, and many other signs of life. The river

Dambrath

Ammath is the largest river in Dambrath, flowing southeast around the Hills of the Dead Kings. The Keless river is much busier, affording a fast road between the mines in the mountains and the Bay of the Dancing Dolphins.

The Bay of Dancing Dolphins is truly a treasure of Dambrath. Not only is it a safe harbor, but it is rich in swordfish, red snapper, mahi-mahi, and sea bass. It produces a decent crop of pearls each year, and draws many schools of friendly dolphins. The ever-present dolphins won't let a human drown. Dolphins have been a protected species in Dambrath, ever since one saved queen Melanith over 300 years ago. Fishermen follow dolphins to the good schools of fish, and sailors know that when the bay gets crowded with dolphins, a major storm is heading north on the Great Sea.

Most Dambraii have never seen snow. The summers are hot, but the breezes off the sea cool the nights. The temperature usually passes 100 during the day, but drops quickly after dark to lows around 60 degrees. North of the Gnollwatch mountains the temperature is even hotter, and the nights aren't as cool as nights near the coast.

The rainy season begins in Uktar (November), and lasts two to three months. There have only been 12 actual frosts recorded in the last 500 years. This occurrence is always taken as a sign of extreme displeasure from Loviatar herself.

History

The nation of Dambrath was formed out of a barbarian kingdom almost a half-millennium ago by a powerful alliance of priestesses of Loviatar and drow from the city of T'lindhet.

In 211 DR four tribes of barbarians, fleeing from the destruction of the homeland by the then-great kingdoms of Unther and Muhlorand, entered Dambrath. They found a coast where the dolphins danced and plains where the grass was long. They roamed from the borders of the Walls of Halruaa as far east as the current borders of Estagund. They soon became known as the Arkaiun, or "people of the wind."

Then in 545 DR a great warchief, Reinhar, arose to lead the tribes. The halfings of Luiren were quickly enslaved, and several of the coastal cities of Durpar were captured or razed. Estagund fell to his rule. Finally Reinhar turned his attention to Halruaa.

An army of 40,000 horsemen and a fleet of 50 ships mounted a coordinated attack on Halruaa. Even though Reinhar was able to get beyond the Walls of Halruaa and occupy the cities of Mithel, Galdel, and Zalasuu, the wizards proved to be more than a match for Reinhar's army. Reinhar was finally defeated in a great battle at Sulaziir by the arch mage Mycontil and his troop of wizards.

Reinhar's son, Reinhar II, took command of the army and set out in an overland march for the Walls of Halruaa. Two months later, with a thousand fighting men and no shaman, he arrived home. Reinhar II proved to be as good a ruler in defeat as his father was in war. He consolidated his forces, pulling home almost all his troops. He knew that the defeat made them tempting prey for raiders and encroaching monsters. By the time Reinhar IX was king, in 802 DR the Arkaiuns were fat and lazy. But Reinhar IX, of Reinhar the Foolish as he is more commonly known, insisted on expanding his nation to gain more money to finance his military campaigns. He ordered the mining of many rich lodes of silver and electrum in the Gnollwatch mountains. Before his plans of expansion could begin, the miners encountered the drow of T'lindhet. The drow were outraged and began a steady series of raids and attacks on the Arkaiun strongholds. Whole villages were destroyed overnight. No trace of the invaders could be found.

Reinhar committed the foolhardy action of attacking the drow. The Arkaiuns succeeded in getting a force into the drow city. This action united the normally chaotic drow, and for once the full power of a drow city was turned against an enemy.

The battle quickly moved back to the surface. Reinhar's raiders were wiped out, leaving Reinhar with only a small portion of his original military. This was not enough for the drow, who demanded total enslavement of the entire surface nation. The Arkaiuns resisted valiantly. The war went on for three decades, at a tremendous cost in life to the Arkaiuns and to the drow.

Finally, the drow had the Arkaiun forces cornered at Malduir. The defenders were overjoyed when a group of half-elven pilgrims entered the city. The high priestess, Cathtyr Shintar, offered the aid of her clerics to help defend the city. Reinhar took this to be an omen from the gods, and placed a priestess with almost every company.

Within the week, the drow struck. The priestesses did indeed prove to be a great aid—to the drow. Every priestess turned on the Arkaiuns, and Cathtyr herself slew Reinhar. The drow were still weakened by the battle. Only the presence of the priestesses enabled them to win. Cathtyr realized that she had a unique advantage over the drow. She made a deal that even the suspicious drow embraced. Her priestesses would rule the land. In exchange, they would provide access to the surface for the drow, trading weapons, slaves, and surface supplies.

The drow were delighted with this brazen offer from surface dweller. Reinhar had been slain and the insult avenged. After 30 years of war the drow were not particularly interested in Dambrath. They did insist, however, on taking the best captured males as slaves. Cathtyr quickly agreed to this, seeing the males as an obstacle to her own power.

Cathtyr ruled for 205 years. She fulfilled her promise to make Dambrath, or “The Nation of Pain,” a bastion of evil in the Realms. In her time, Cathtyr saw the priesthood of Loviatar expand to thousands. Faith in the Beastlords previously worshiped by the Arkaiuns was nearly eradicated. Many of the Arkaiuns were able to escape their new mistresses, and flee to the Swagdar. There they resumed their almost forgotten nomadic life,

The priestesses of Loviatar continued to enjoy good relations with the drow. Some of them mated with the drow, creating a race of drow half-elves. These half-elves became known as the Crintri, or “noble ones.” Most are priestesses of Loviatar, and many are mages as well. They consolidated their power, learning much of the area from the Shebali, or “lower ones,” as the Arkaiuns are now called.

The capital of Dambrath was established at Cathtyr, a city built after Cathtyr’s death, and named in her honor. Her death came at the hands of her daughter, Filina, who had grown tired of waiting for her mother to die. Filina ruled for only five years before her own daughter, Cathakay, assumed the throne in the same fashion. Cathakay ruled for 54 years, dying in a battle against a gold dragon. She died childless, and her niece Melanith assumed the throne.

Melanith faced an increasing population, and unrest among the males who enjoyed far less power under female rule. Melanith did not return their previous status, but she did make use of them. Fearing that the great nations of Mulhorand and Unther might rise again, she decided that unimportant tasks such as defense of the kingdom would be handled by men. She was the first to name a male to the post of warchief. Sadalar, a Crintri, became the queen’s consort. His term as warchief was characterized by widespread bribery and corruption. He was, however, responsible for getting many privileges returned to the Arkaiuns. After Melanith’s rule, the Shebali were considered second class citizens, rather than slaves.

It was during Melanith’s reign that the split between the sexes solidified. While the rulers of Dambrath had been females for over two centuries, it was more because of competence than gender. Melanith decreed that men could have no authority except over other men. The female-led hierarchy of Loviatar was quick to back this move.

Many of the bravest and best men of the kingdom perished in raids on Estagund, Durpar, the bandit tribes of Veldorn, and against the gnolls that had returned to the Gnollwatch mountains. Some even fought at the side of the drow, in their battle with the svirfneblin city Aventine. The deep gnomes were destroyed, but so were the Shebali. The drow and the Crintri were largely unharmed. For their aid, the Crintri were rewarded with a number of draw males to breed into their race. Melanith took a drow male as her consort to replace Sadalar, who had perished in the conflict. The drow, Nym Inthigg, fathered three daughters and a son. It was at this time that Melanith began the isolationist policy that Dambrath still follows today.

Melanith ruled for 156 years, her daughter Ausitil for 125. The current queen of Dambrath, Yenandra, who is known in Dambrath as the "Pirate Queen," is said to have sailed as far south as Zakhara, raiding and pillaging. Yenandra has been ruling for 71 years, and is beginning to show signs of age. She remains extremely popular, especially to the Crintri. Indeed, the Dambraii have enjoyed prosperity during Yenandra's reign. She has three ambitious daughters, Luatharyn, Meltruil, and Hasafir. Hasafir is deep in magical studies, while the other two are currently sailing as pirates.

Government and Politics

Dambrath is ruled by the queen, who is also the high priestess of Loviatar. Her word is law. The current queen, Yenandra, is both loved and feared by the common people.

Day to day life in Dambrath is common and ordinary. The matriarchy is much more pronounced at the top levels than it is at the working woman's level. Men and women labor together, or train for the army together. Promotions come faster to women than to men, and to Crintri faster than to Shebali. Only at the higher levels must one be a female Crintri to advance.

Law in Dambrath is very structured, and justice is harsh and swift. The judges, called "Honglath," which is drow for "clear-thinkers," are Crintri females. They hear cases, and decide on punishments. Punishments for Crinti of both genders usually consist of fines, while Shebali males may well be turned over to the priestesses of Loviatar for slow torture. Shebali females will usually be given more lenient sentences than Shebali males receive.

The decisions of the Honglath can be appealed, but unless one is a Crintri, the appeal is seldom even heard. Appeals are heard by the local "Greater Pain", the highest ranking specialty priestess of Loviatar. There are 12 Greater Pains. A greater pain is usually a priestess/mage of at least 12th/6th level. Above them are four Duchesses.

Land can only be owned by the Crintri. For legal purposes, a person must be able to prove themselves at least 1/32 drow or half-elf to be considered a Crintri. Physical signs are important; the pointed ears and dark skin that indicate drow blood are usually taken as sufficient proof of nobility. On the other hand, a half-elf who appears almost completely human is relegated to a lesser role in both politics and society.

Inheritance is passed down to the females, but does not automatically go to the oldest. Priestly and magical power are considered first, as is appearance. The female who is the most powerful as a multi-classed priestess/mage will inherit. Failing that, first priestly power, then mage ability, then appearance prevails. The decision is made by the local Honglath, after the death of the ruling mother. If there are no daughters, the eldest son is expected to take a wife immediately. His wife will then own the land. If the mother dies without arranging for this, the local Honglath usually attempts to arrange a marriage with a drow female. Of course, the lady of the manor is the absolute ruler of her house and lands.

The Honglath jealously guard their roles as justices. More than one imperious landowner has been stripped of her title and lands for meting out justice on her own. This is not usually a problem, for seldom does a Honglath rule against a Crintri landowner.

It is absolutely forbidden to teach a male any type of magic. The penalty for the teacher is usually death by torture, while the student is feeble-minded and used as a galley or mine slave for the rest of his life.

The worst crime a Dambraii can commit is horse theft. The theft of a woman's horse is considered much worse than murder. Should such a criminal live long enough to be tried, he can be assured of the worst punishments that the priestesses of pain have to offer.

People and Customs

Dambrath is a rarity in that it is a society ruled by half-elves. Approximately 15% of the population is to some degree half-elven. Almost 90% of those trace their non-human heritage to a drow elf. The other 10% are the true nobles, those that can trace their heritage back to one of the original 112 half-elves that accompanied Cathyr on her journey into Dambrath.

Another 70% of the population are the fair-skinned Arkaiuns, although many of those now have darker skin and hair. A pureblood Arkaiun is, according to Crinti expression, "as rare as clear thought in a man."

The remainder of the population consists of halflings and demihumans. Gnolls are seen frequently as guards for manor estates. Half-orcs and orcs are also used, though their chaotic ways make them the choice of only the poorer Crintri.

Elves are not seen in Dambrath, Dwarves are not native to Dambrath, although a few dwarven traders do make their way south along the Trader's Way. They are almost exclusively confined to Ammathtar and Hezuth.

Dambrath

Languages

Most of the people in Dambrath speak Akalan, the original tongue of the Akaiuns. The "high" language of Dambrath is drow. The priestesses of Loviatar are all taught the "maidens' tongue", a language said to be sacred to Loviatar. Actually, it is a degenerate version of Thorass, the trading tongue of Amn and much of the Sword Coast. Someone who speaks Thorass can't make himself understood in the maiden's tongue. About 20% of the population, mostly those who deal with outsiders, also speak a bit of the common tongue.

Social Customs

The influence of the Loviatar, the Maiden of Pain, is felt all through Dambrath. Amusements tend to be rough and dangerous. The officials of the government and the temples allow this, believing it keeps the masses happy. Day to day life, however, is much different.

A proper gentleman of Dambrath always holds the door for a lady, and she should always precede him down the street. In the wilds or on the road, the gentleman rides up front, to better shield his lady should trouble start. Since only females are allowed to be spellcasters, they usually need to be out of the immediate melee to be truly effective.

Priestess/mages and descendants of the 112 compatriots of Cathtyr form the upper crust of Dambrath society. It is considered a mark of honor for a female to have served in the army or with the fleet, and both are acceptable reasons for not being able to perform both wizard and clerical magic.

Although the society has much contact with the drow, it is not a carbon copy of drow society. On the ranges, every family member is important; a male is just as valued as a female. In the day to day work, men and women operate almost as equals. Of course, women are usually in charge. At religious and government ceremonies, the men fade into the background as the women take over. Parties on the range tend to be loud and wild affairs lasting two or three days. In "society", a dinner is usually a competition to see which lady can wear the finest jewels, carry the best wands, or sport the most handsome consort. One drow-inspired custom is that one should never arrive at a party or dinner before sundown. Another custom in Dambrath is the habit of holding both hands out with the palms up when meeting a person of higher social status. This custom probably developed as low-ranking people held out their empty hands to show they carried no weapons.

Fair-skinned female half-elves are readily accepted, since their appearance could make them one of the "daughters of the first," as the descendants of the original 112 are called. Of course in 500 years, even half-elves can produce many offspring. There are 5,000 or more true daughters of the first, and twice that many who claim such heritage.

The most important custom of Dambrath traces back not to the drow or the half-elves of Loviatar, but to the original Arkaiuns. Every Dambraii citizen can ride by the time she is 5 years old. Males learn to ride by the age of 10. Roping and firing a shortbow from horseback are also learned at an early age.

Religion

The official state religion is the worship of Loviatar, the Maiden of Pain. There are temples in all the cities, and shrines at most ranchos. The clergy preach that pain must come into all lives, and only through the knowledge of pain can pleasure be felt. Most Dambraii accept this stoically, enduring pain and savoring pleasure. The drow queen Lolth is also worshipped. The followers of the two have a grudging respect for one another. On the plains, there are still many Arkaiuns who call upon Malar the Beastlord, particularly in the Swagdar, where outlaws rule. There is a small, very determined sect of drow who worship Eilistraee, the goddess of good drow.

Dambrath

Money and Commence

Dambrath uses state minted money. The government mints two types of coins, silver shebs and electrum crints. Other types of money are accepted cheerfully, usually at face value. With the pirate fleets going out, Dambraii merchants often see foreign currency.

Trade is allowed, as long as it is good for both the people and the country. Horse trading is a fine art in Dambrath. Few are the Durparians who get the better of a Dambrai in a horse trade. The fact that Dambraii horses are the envy of the southern coast helps considerably. Other than raise horses, the Dambraii fish and dive for pearls in the bay. They also raise large herds of wilde rothe. The bluish wood from the Forest of Amtar makes excellent cabinets and decent arrow shafts.

Goods leave Dambrath on ships, and on wagons traveling the Trader's Way to Underhome and points beyond. Dambraii sailors ply their wares in Durpar, Estagund, Ulgarth, Luiren, Halruaa, and some even venture across the Great Sea to Zakhara. Such journeys are fraught with danger, but Dambraii horses fetch an unbelievable price in Zakhara.

It should be noted that Dambraii merchants are not foolish. Drow and dark-skinned half-elves do not accompany caravans leaving Dambrath.

Most of the country is settled in small ranchos, each held by one clan. A rancho can have as many as 100 people living and working together. Rancho families are led by the matriarch of the clan. A rancho may claim as many as 1,000 square miles of land, on which its herds roam.

Most ranchos have their own smithy, armory, and religious shrine. All ranchos have a horse-master. The responsibility for taking care of the garden, which provides the family with vegetables and fruits, usually falls to the children. Dambraii soil is wonderfully fertile, plants usually grow at an accelerated rate. One variety of white grapes grows particularly well. Dambraii are partial to Moktessa, the wine made from these grapes. It is palatable to both humans and drow, and the demand always exceeds the supply. Thus, while Moktessa is a very good wine, it is virtually unknown outside of Dambrath.

Cities of Dambrath

Cathtyr

Cathtyr, the nation's largest city, is also the capital. Its location along Trader's Way, and the protection of the Melanith Bay make it the trading center of Dambrath. With a population of 50,000, Cathtyr may seem small when compared to some of the larger cities of Halruaa and Durpar. But the Dambraii consider it a metropolis. Anything in Dambrath can probably be had in Cathtyr, if the buyer has the money.

The trading fair is located on the northern outskirts of town. The city is walled, but the gates are wide, and seldom closed. The fair is actually outside of town, since the number of horses that are traded make it impractical to have the fair anywhere else.

South of the city are many miles of land that have been taken over by poor families, whose farming provides much of the food for Cathtyr.

The inner city is a crowded, aromatic place. Horses of nobles are stabled all over the city. This guarantees that perfumes are a popular import in Cathtyr.

There are numerous temples to Loviatar scattered about the city. The largest temple is part of the central palace complex. There is also a temple to Lolth. It is a large building with buttresses carved to resemble spider legs, and a pair of glass "eyes" in front. The palace is huge, with a three-block-square, open-air park in the center, where the queen exercises and trains her horses.

A well maintained garrison of 2,000 troops is based at Cathtyr. Two-thirds of these are cavalry, and can move very swiftly to deal with trouble. There are also five heavily armed clippers, with spellcasters aboard, that patrol the waters in the bay. If the city is ever attacked, up to 1,000 lesser priests and mages can respond to the threat. It is this force, more than anything, that keeps Cathtyr safe and peaceful.

The average Crintri of Cathtyr has a nice home, with several magical conveniences. One of the signs of wealth is to be able to afford to have faerie fires cast each night to light the grounds and entrances. The poorer families must make do with continual light globes.

Hazuth

Hazuth is situated to the north of the Melanith Bay, at the mouth of the River Ammath. It is a drop-off point for bluewood, and other goods from the northern half of Dambrath. It is not a huge town. The population only reaches 20,000 during the winter, when many boats put in for the winter rainy season.

Winter is the time the herds are brought down from the north, and trading is at its peak. Traders from as far away as Westgate and Chondath come, almost all for the purpose of buying horses. The city has large, well-protected docks, and many ships lie in Melanith Bay during the rainy season. The town has a fair population of halflings, mostly tradesmen and craftsmen. They don't like the conditions in Dambrath, but there is profit to be made. No halfling ever let a bit of persecution stand in the way of profit.

Ammathar

This city of 10,000 individuals is located west of the Granuin forest, along the Trader's Way. The duchess of the North, Tralia Falrith, rules here. Her influence is felt over much of the north of Dambrath. The city is much more tolerant than the rest of Dambrath. This is due to the influence of the traders from the north and the halflings in Luiren to the east. It is a popular stop-over for adventurers on their way to the Granuin Forest.

Shops featuring nearly all types of adventuring equipment are present, including an alchemist who sells magical potions. All items are three times the listed price in the Players Handbook, unless the purchaser is a Crintri noble. In that case the prices are half of listed price. A cut of all the inflated prices reaches the city coffers. Ammathtar is thus able to field a decent army (1,000 heavy cavalry, and up to 50 spellcasters). It is one of the cleanest cities in Dambrath. The ever-present horses do make themselves known but sanitation crews vigilantly work multiple shifts.

The duchess, a third cousin to the current queen, has designs on the throne. Even though she is only sixth in the line of succession, she has every intention of achieving the throne. She recently sent a group of adventurers to assassinate Duchess Luenath. Only powerful magic prevented her involvement from being discovered when they failed.

Duchess Falrith is a mage priest of 15th/16th level. She is said to have recently sent her consort, a drow male named Skield, to his death against a pair of beholders in Veldorn. Others say that Skield just got out while the getting was good. She has taken a new consort, a half-elf named Bristar Risingsun, a 10th-level lawful evil mage, who is not even a native. Whether he becomes a power in Ammathtar, or goes the way of Skield remains to be seen.

Ammathtar remains a peaceful trading city at least on the surface. It boasts the largest horse pens in the nation, which are located north of the city nest to the Traders Way. The pens can contain up to 5,000 horses. They are often full during the height of the trading season. Traders come with many types of goods. Ammathtar supplies the rest of the country with many hard to get goods, such as metal weapons from Underhome and tropical fruits from Luiren.

Ammathtar is also the northern defensive border of Dambrath. While anyone is permitted into the city patrols make sure that only authorized foreigners travel farther into Dambrath. Authorization for individuals usually, requires a bribe of 100 gold pieces to the official in charge of such passes. A party of adventurers is likely to be referred to the Duchess herself. Since no one is allowed into Dambrath simplex to "see the country," she is very persistent with her questions. Such parties are either turned to her own uses, or sent east to the Granuin Forest, "where the monsters and treasure literally grow on trees."

Guilmarl

Guilmarl, located along the coast, is the southernmost city in Dambrath. The city is lashed by storms during the three-month rainy season. The population, which averages around 5,000, tends to decline during the rainy season. Wealthier residents spend the winters in Luenath or Prastuil.

When the rains subside, Guilmarl is a safe haven for pirates and merchant ships. They can sail south to Zakhara and the islands of the North, or west to Halruaa. These areas, however, are not the favorite targets of either the merchants or the raiders, so Guilmarl is a small city that shows every likelihood of growing smaller. The presence of Kethid, the Great Swamp only 45 miles to the west, makes the air humid and even worse smelling than in other Dambrath cities. The prevailing west winds bring an odor of decay on the worst days. With all of this, many non-residents wonder why the city still exists. There is a simple answer; Guilmarl is situated on the banks of some of the finest pearl beds in the Realms. Over one half the population makes their living diving for, polishing, or marketing pearls.

There are fewer Crintri in this city than any other. Only about 300 Crintri nobles live in the city. As the Great Swamp continues to get closer, more and more leave the city for good.

Dambrath

Herath

Herath is located along the headwaters of the Dolphin's Climb river, along the south ridge of the Gnollwatch mountains. It boasts a population of 18,000, and has the largest infantry in Dambrath. Herath is perhaps the wealthiest city in Dambrath, since the state mints for the electrum crints and silver shebs are here. Most of the metalworking shops in Dambrath are also located here.

Nearly all of the dwarves in Dambrath live here, and it is every clanleader's hope to get a dwarf-trained smith for her rancho. Most of the dwarves are occupied with smithing, and have all of the apprentices they can use. It is not at all unusual for a houseleader to pay up to 1,000 gold pieces to a dwarf to secure a place for one of her sons or servants as an apprentice.

The city has many skilled armorers and smiths. The best known non-dwarves are the Yamack brothers, two pureblood Arkaiuns. They have the largest shop in town. They employ up to 35 smiths and 100 apprentices at a time. The brothers specialize in horseshoes, barding, and other supplies for the cavalry. They and their staff are always busy. They can usually find room for special requests, provided the client is willing to pay extra. Armor or weapons can be had for standard price. The purchaser must be willing to wait for up to two months. Speedier deliveries require higher payments in proportion to the time saved.

Herath's army consists of 500 cavalry troops and 2,500 footmen. The bulk of them are occupied with guarding the silver and copper trains coming from the mines. Duchess Selanith, ruler of Herath, also employs shock troops of 1,000 gnolls, and 40 hill giants. These special troops are loyal to her.

The duchess takes her cut of all trade in the area, and is one of the wealthiest persons in Dambrath. Her estate is vast. She is said to own 10,000 horses and a dozen ranchos. She is ambitious, shrewd and powerful, but not foolish. She intends to be queen someday, but her heritage is against her. She is only 1/32 drow and resembles a human more than a half-elf. She has taken a drow consort, Rualn, so her heirs are safely Crintri.

Selanith is a cruel duchess, and is extremely fond of contests wherein the loser dies. Jousting, mounted archery, and other contests of equestrian nature are as popular here as they are elsewhere. In Herath, however, the contests are to the death. Selanith's favorite game is one in which two mounted archers circle the arena and fire at each other until one can no longer ride. The horses always receive protection from normal missile spells, while the contestants do not.

Prastuil

Prastuil is situated at the mouth of the Dolphin's Climb River, at the headwaters of the Bay of Dancing Dolphins. Originally just a trading spot, Prastuil is the oldest city in Dambrath. It has a population of 30,000, which swells to 50,000 during the winter rainy season. Many ships put in here for the winter for refitting. Fishing boats and pearl-divers can still go out, for the storms of the Great Sea never reach the city or the bay.

Prastuil has the most mixed population of all of the cities of Dambrath. One can find gnolls, halflings, Crintri, Arkaiuns, dwarves, drow, and even an occasional swarthy Zakharan. Prastuil is also the most beautiful city of Dambrath. Long ago the nobles took up the custom of having estates outside of town, where their prized horses are stabled. Most nobles also have manor houses in the city proper. These conditions, plus some of the lowest trading taxes in the country make Prastuil a popular place for trade and residence.

The city can field a force of 1,000 elite cavalry, several dozen spellcasters, and 10 to 40 ships, depending on the time of year. The warchief and effective leader of the city is Herald Markin. He is completely loyal to Duchess Luenath, who is responsible for Prastuil and Luenath.

About a quarter of the raw ore from the nearby mines comes here. The smithies, though they are active, aren't nearly as large as Herath's. In addition, the city's proximity to some of the country's largest tracts of rangeland insures that horse trading is active here. The city has one the nation's largest facility for handling horses. They are second only to the huge horse fair of Ammathtar.

Entertainment is also at its finest in Prastuil. Bards can be found singing on the street corners almost every night. Wild parties lasting days are common during the short winter season. Many of the entertainments are cruel and disgusting, but the Crintri, who are in abundance in this city, have a taste for such entertainments.

Luenath

Luenath is located on the north shore of the Bay of Dancing Dolphins, at the mouth of the rivet Caraguir. It is the second largest city in Dambrath. Its Duchess, Merial of the clan Luenath, is the second most powerful woman in Dambrath.

Luenath is the home of the largest fleet in the Dambrath navy, though many of the ships act as pirates and privateers. The constant stream of booty and plunder coming in from the privateers makes Luenath a good place to get many hard to find goods. Unlike many of the other cities of Dambrath, the trading fair is located within a few blocks of the docks. Merchandise is usually sold as it is brought off the ships. The priestesses of Loviatar are always present. They insure that Luenath and Loviatar get their cut. The taxes, however, are not outrageous. Depending on the type of plunder, as well as the nationality and sex of the captain the taxes range from 5 to 25% of the total take. Privateers who are sworn to the service of the crown are allowed to keep half of all the booty they recover, which makes these sailors some of the wealthiest people in Dambrath. Many a rancho, fallen on hard financial times, has sent a daughter to sea. The booty she brings back can save the rancho.

Luenath has the traditional large estates within the city. The streets are wide and open, and no walls encircle the city in order to better to accommodate a sweeping cavalry charge. The forces of Luenath include 2,000 cavalry, and 10 warships that patrol the bay around Luenath. The warchief is Grenai Markin, younger brother to the warchief of Prastuil. Grenai is the more charismatic of the two brothers, although Herald is the better commander. Grenai is also the consort of the duchess Luenath. He is likely to either rise quickly or fall just as quickly, for the duchess is one of the harsher nobles of Dambrath.

Many Crintri winter in Luenath, which is the best place to see the dance of the dolphins. At dusk, the dolphins in the bay gather for their dance. The dance is a complicated game that the dolphins have developed over the years. The intricate jumping and weaving together seems to trigger a response deep within an observer, eliciting pleasure just from watching. Up to a thousand dolphins may be seen at one time. The bay teems with the fish that they like. Spearing dolphins is a crime punishable by slow torture in Luenath, as in most other places in Dambrath. Anyone who has watched the wondrous, hour-long event understands why.

Hethar

Hethar is located on the south coast of the Bay of Dancing Dolphins, in the center of the Hethar Peninsula. It is the most combat-ready city in all Dambrath, since it has the responsibility of protecting the nation's entire southern coastline.

Hethar's forces number 5,000 warriors. At any time half of them are on patrol or on duty at the southern ramparts of the peninsula. Hethar has a few warships. Their main task is to defend the coast against a landing.

The warchief of Hethar is Fiella Markin, the third member of her family to have reached the rank of warchief. Fiella, like her brothers, is loyal to the duchess Luenath. She is also fiercely loyal to queen Yenandra. Fiella is a fighter/mage of 10th/12th level. She has overcome her lack of wisdom and priestly skills with a driving determination to be the best Crintri she can. This makes her both brilliant and cruel, a risk-taker who succeeds.

Hethar is first and foremost a military city.

Dambrath

Shops for armor and weapon repair, smithies, and leather workers abound. Hethar possesses the only active field artillery smiths in all of Dambrath.

The city has responsibility for defending the southern shores, and it does so by stationing troops along the series of sharp cliffs along the southern shore, called the Ramparts of Dambrath. The Ramparts run in two strips. The longest one, to the west of the narrowest part, or the neck, is almost 150 miles long. The shorter, to the east, is just over 100 miles in length. Swift-moving mounted women patrol the length of the cliffs. From atop the cliffs they can see several miles out to sea. When incoming ships are spotted, messengers are dispatched to the nearest signalling station. These stations are located every ten miles along the coast. Every station has some method of communicating magically with the patrol outposts. Within six hours, at least 300 mounted troops, armed with shortbows and short swords, can be in place on top of the cliffs. Within twelve hours, ballistas and catapults can be brought in. By the time a fleet of ships can land and unload a force of invaders, they can be met by several thousand well-armed, well situated defenders. The neck is the weak point in this defense. Fallia has solved this problem by concentrating most of her outposts in this relatively narrow area.

This active defense is the main reason that Dambrath has only had to defend against one invasion. This occurred 190 years ago, when Ulgarth tried to invade in order to steal as many Dambraii horses as possible. The invaders were decimated, and the few prisoners were turned over to the priestesses of Loviatar.

Elveswatch

Elveswatch, a small city of 5,000, is located at the southeastern tip of the Forest of Amtar. It is through this city that most of the famed bluewood of Amtar moves. The ranchos of the northern half of Dambrath purchase metal goods and other supplies from this town. Elveswatch is a city of transients. No one actually wants to live in Elveswatch because of the near-constant rain, and numerous attacks by the wild elves of the Forest of Amtar.

The city has been plagued by these attacks throughout all of its history. The attacks have not stopped the felling of trees. The forest is so vast that in over 400 years of logging, they have not made any substantial inroads into the forest. In fact, the forest has expanded. The city now sits between two arms of the forest.

It rains nearly every day of the year in Elveswatch. Since horses don't do well in the rain forest, all patrols must go on foot. The threat of being posted to Elveswatch has been used on many a soldier, with great effectiveness.

Elveswatch has a troop of 1,000 infantrymen and 500 cavalry, augmented by 500 hired gnomish mercenaries. Almost every season, a patrol is lost to the elves of the forest. The city itself is frequently attacked by a small army of these wild elves. The attacks of the elves have brought many drow to the city. More are present in Elveswatch than any other place. The largest temple in Elveswatch is dedicated, not to Loviatar, but to Lolth. Of course, the high population of drow insures more attacks by the wild elves.

The high profit from the bluewood keeps the city thriving. There is no official intention to abandon the city, however much the military residents might wish it. Quite a few halflings live in Elveswatch. Most of them are skilled woodcarvers and carpenters. Bluewood furniture is considered a mark of wealth, and the demand always exceeds the supply. There is plenty of raw bluewood, but there are never enough skilled woodcarvers and carpenters to keep up with the demand. More information on bluewood can be found under the entry on the Forest of Amtar.

Villages and Ranchos

There are a number of small villages and trading outposts in Dambrath. Most are merely wide spots in the road, a place where wine is served and horses shod. The largest such outpost is Far

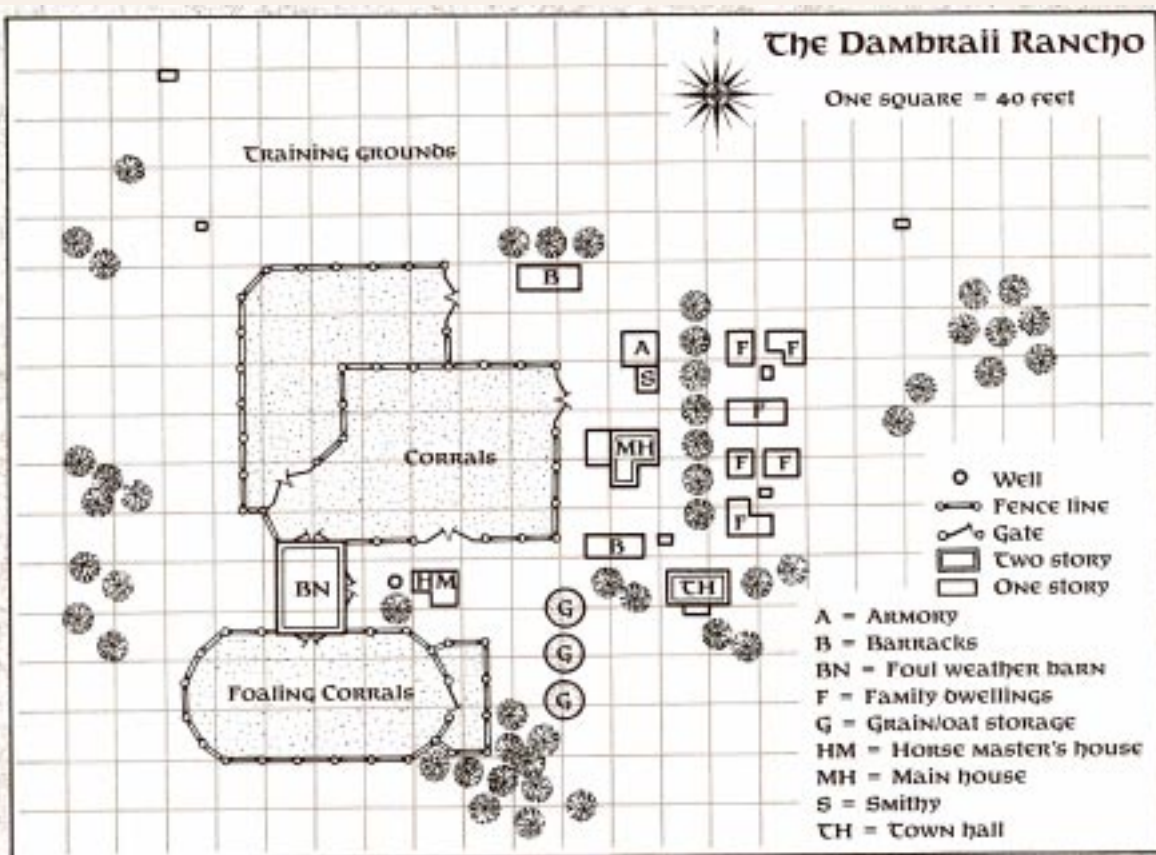

Dambraith

Outpost, on the tip of the entrance to the Bay of Dancing Dolphins. This outpost has 500 cavalry and 20 warships. It is charged with defending the bay from incoming attackers. Ships are boarded and searched. As long as they are legitimate traders, they are allowed passage. Since all warships carry a spellcaster, the captain may be questioned magically. If he fails the test, his ship will be confiscated. Such spoils end up in Lueth, further enriching the Duchess.

The standard rancho is home to up to 100 members of a clan. It boasts a smithy, a stable for the nursing of sick or injured horses, a barracks for the men, private cottages for married couples and single women, and a large manor house for the Crintri owners. Everyone on a rancho, from the youngest walking child to the eldest resident, can ride. Everyone over the age of 10 can use a bow or other weapon. If bandits or raiders attack, the rancho can be mobilized in mere minutes. They either respond to the attack, or ride for aid if the bandits are too numerous. Most ranchos are located within a few miles of another rancho. They long ago learned to help defend each other against raiders. A group of bandits, intent on plundering a deserted rancho, may find themselves facing the combined forces of three or four ranchos. This may be as many as five hundred determined horsewomen, men, and children, all willing to fight to the death to protect their homes.

Dambrath

Places of Interest

The Forest of Amtar

The Forest of Amtar is a huge place, nearly half as large as all of Dambrath. It forms almost the entire northern border of Dambrath. The Forest is a lush, tropical place, where the temperature rarely falls below 90, even at night. Humidity is high, and insects and plant life abound. The most striking feature of the forest is the trees. Over half of the trees in the forest are the fast growing mathiri trees, more commonly known as bluewood. The wood is actually ivory colored with faint blue streaks, but, with polishing, it has a deep luster that resembles the glow of a polished gem. It is prized for making furniture because it is easy to cut, yet durable. A skilled woodworker is required to bring out the true beauty of the wood. The demand for such furniture always exceeds the supply.

Amtar is filled with life. All normal tropical animals of the forest can be found here: jaguars, tigers, gorillas, wild boars, and parrots, macaws and other tropical birds. It also supports a large population of carnivorous apes. The apes are abundant in the northern part of the forest, but can be found elsewhere. Choke creepers and giant snakes are common and the rhino beetle is also present.

On the east edge of the forest, three bandit bands have their hideouts. They prey upon travelers along the Trader's Way, which runs along the forest for a distance of several hundred miles. One of these bandit groups consists of almost one hundred orcs, led by an ogre magi called Tandi Earsgone. Another is a small group of outcast Arkaiuns, intent on bettering themselves through theft. Neither is much of a threat, leaving well-guarded caravans alone. Of more concern are Dracil's Raiders, a group of 10 evil adventurers, all of at least 8th level. Dracil is himself an outcast NE dwarven fighter/priest of 9th/10th level. The party boasts two mages, and another priest. The Raiders also have a number of magical items that aid them in their raids. Half of the band wears elven boots. Dracil himself carries a short sword of speed, which is intelligent and allows him to fly for up to one hour a day. The Raiders pick their tights carefully. Large well-defended caravans are left alone. Smaller, poorer caravans, such as one carrying grain or leather goods, may be stopped and a tariff exacted. The raiders understand that if they shut off trade entirely, the "easy pickings" would dry up.

The south center of the forest, almost to the southern edge, is the domain of the wild elves. This large tribe of elves has successfully raided the Dambraii for hundreds of years. They are never a big enough nuisance for the city to spend much effort to eradicate them. The problems with finding them in the forest have also prevented any major military undertakings in this regard. It has long been a hobby of the Crintri and the drow to go out at night from Elveswatch, hunting the wild elves. The hunters often find themselves to be the hunted. The ancient enmity between the elves and the drow insures that neither side will ever call a truce.

The wild elves call themselves the Trunalor, or "star people". They have a legend that they were set down in this forest by the hands of the gods themselves. They are led by Ferla Tree-climber, a shaman (priest mage of 6th/7th level), who has been their leader for over 300 years. The total population of the tribe is small, not more than 500. Ferla knows that he can never mount a direct attack against the hated drow and their allies. Any party entering the forest (particularly from the south) without at least one true elf among its number is likely to be attacked. The wild elves seem to have the motto "Attack now, and don't ask questions later."

On the southwestern edge of the forest lies a citadel known as the Gate of Iron Fangs. It is a place of ruins, many times entered and pillaged. There are still plenty of monsters here, ruled by a glabrezu named Quinix, who is detailed more fully in the "Gate to Elsewhere" adventure in Chapter 6.

Dambrath

Kethid, The Great Swamp

Kethid is a large swamp on the southwestern corner of Dambrath. It is a sweltering place of cypress and thick moss. Except in the rainy season, temperatures frequently hit 110 and the humidity never drops below 90%. During the rainy season, the humidity rises to 100% while the temperature averages only 90. The place is a nightmare of giant leeches, giant toads, snakes, lizardmen, shambling mounds, tasloi, and bully-wugs. There are rumors of a great green dragon who has hidden his lair underwater, deep in the swamp. The wyrm, Latovenomer, has been sleeping for the past sixty years, and is due to awaken soon.

Many myths surround Kethid. One of the most popular claims that lights from the sky descending into the swamp. Some claim that these lights are aid from the heavens called by the the dragon. Others say that beings not of this world live in the swamp. This is closer to the truth than they know. The lights from the sky are spelljamming ships.

The swamp is also the home of one of the most prolific mercenary companies of the realms. The Servants of the Royal Egg, a company of lizardmen, contracts soldiers to anyone with the money to pay. The field commander is Sladis, while the tribe is led by the Lizard King Ghassis. Ghassis is willing to rent his soldiers to anyone. His contacts allow him to get replacements from the egg ships of space almost at will. He doesn't care if the lizardmen come back; there are plenty more where they came from. There is however, a slightly higher fee if they don't come back. Commanders wanting "ballista fodder" are advised to say so up front, so a better price can be negotiated. More on the Servants of the Royal Egg can be found in the "Gold & Glory" publication from TSR.

Hills of The Dead Kings

The Hills of the Dead Kings is the name given to the range of hills which connect to the Gnollwatch mountains. Together they bisect Dambrath. It was formerly known as The Hills of the Kings, but that was changed when the priestesses of Loviatar came. It is a relatively safe place in spite of its name, many halflings live in the eastern part of the hills. There are plenty of streams and grassy knolls. Deep within the hills are the tombs of the Reinhar. Eight of the Reinhar, all but Reinhar the Foolish, are buried here. The tombs have never been found, according to popular knowledge. Actually, all but two of the tombs have been found and plundered by Crintri adventurers. They were wise enough to keep this silent, knowing how upset the Shebali would become. The two unplundered tombs are those of Reinhar I, and Reinhar V, an unimpressive king with a taste for silver jewelry.

Reinhar I is not buried in his tomb. His body was lost in Halruaa. The tomb that was erected in his memory is said to be defended by several deadly guardians, including a stone and iron golem. Legends say that Malar the Beastlord himself granted the protection to the tomb of his greatest hero. The guardians are actually a stone lion and an iron tiger, with all of the normal powers of golems.

The Swagdar (Outlaw Waste)

The Swagdar is the last free place in Dambrath, so say the nomads who roam this 150-mile stretch of tall grasses and hidden valleys. The bandits who live in the region claim that the original Arakaiun way of life is preserved in the Swagdar.

The area is home to numerous small bands of raiders who eke out a living raiding the ranchos of the western Fornaluil range and the northern Conaluil range. They also raid the mountain outposts of Halruaa, and even venture after caravans leaving the Gnollwatch mountains. These bandits, all inveterate horse thieves, are reviled by the common Dambraii. Such bandits know the consequences if they are caught, so battles are fierce and lethal. Little quarter is asked or given, although bandits do not kill children. Rather, youngsters are carried off to be raised in the true Arkaiun way. The bandits are quite numerous. In fact, the total bandit population nearly matches the forces of the largest cities of Dambrath. As yet, no single leader has been able to unite them, although many self-proclaimed leaders have died trying. The bandits have returned to the worship of the Beastlord.

The Gnollwatch Mountains

The Gnollwatch mountains are a small range that bisects Dambrath. The southern slopes have several rich silver and electrum veins. More veins are discovered every year. In spite of the conflicts with monsters and outlaws, the area is actively mined. The peaks of the Gnollwatch are also the coolest places in Dambrath. They are the only area in the country to receive snowfall.

The mountain is home to numerous tribes of gnolls. Some of the tribes have friendly relations with the Dambraii, others do not. A few giants make their homes in this range. Rumors abound of a great and terrible silver dragon that makes its lair somewhere in the mountains. The rumors of the dragon are false, but there are plenty of other monsters to keep unwary adventurers on their toes. A colony of flinds makes its home deep in the mountains.

The drow city of T'lindet is located several miles under the center of the gnollwatch mountains. Due to the open trade with Dambrath above, there are many roads from the drow city to the surface. The largest road begins in a large cave ten miles north of the city of Herath. It is clearly marked by hundreds of years of usage.

The Bay of Dancing Dolphins

The "treasure of Dambrath," as it was called by the Arkaiuns, is a wondrous sight. Numerous dolphins swim with grace and poise through the bay's clear waters. Because of their large numbers, normal sea menaces like sharks and sahuagin are almost nonexistent.

Since the waters are crystal clear, the floor of the sea, even if it is hundreds of feet down is visible from the surface. The dolphins are pampered by the citizens of Dambrath. This is a strange love for people who worship the Maiden of Pain. Dolphins were originally protected three centuries ago by order of Queen Melanith. Such an order would not normally remain popular for so long a time, but many of the citizens have had a relative saved by actions of helpful dolphins. Another source of the Dambraii's deep affection for the sea mammals is the Dance of the Dolphins.

At dusk, the tens of thousands of dolphins in the bay gather for their dance. This is not a real dance, but a complicated game that the dolphins have developed over the years. If seen from overhead, the dance all fits together, over the whole of the bay. The few sages who have studied it theorize that the dolphins are performing some sort of ritual. Others say they are actually attempting to communicate with someone, perhaps the deity of the dolphins. Most people don't worry about the reasons for the dance; they just enjoy watching the dolphins.

The grace and beauty of the dance is pleasing to viewers of all ages. Many people believe that watching the dolphins every night wards off depression and other mental illnesses. Some even speak of catatonic people cured by watching the dolphins. This is not likely, but watching the dance does instill a feeling of well-being in the watcher. It is one of the most beautiful sights in the Realms, and few but the Dambraii have ever seen it.

Dambrath

NPCs of Dambrath

Queen Yenandra

Great Pain of Loviatar, and Sovereign of Dambrath.

Half-drow female 18th-level mage, 19th-level specialty priestess (Loviatar): Str 11, Dex 12, Con 15, Int 17, Wis 18, Cha 17: AL LE; AC 2; MV 12; hp 102; THAC0 8; #AT 1; Dmg 1d4+2 (scourge +2): SZ M; ML 18. Spells: Wizard 5/5/5/5/5/3/3/2, Priest 11/11/9/9/6/4/2

Where Found: Cathtyr

Queen Yenandra is the high priestess of her religion, as well as the ruler of the country. She is the fifth queen of her line to rule, and traces her origin back to Cathtyr, the founder. She has been ruling for 70 years, and her edge is beginning to leave her. She knows that before long one of her daughters will challenge her for the crown, and will probably defeat her. She will take no action against her daughters to head off this challenge; this is how she came to rule. She feels that it is fitting that the crown be passed this way. Yenandra will fight as best she can when the challenge is finally issued, but until then she is proud of her daughters. She ruthlessly puts down any attempt to weaken either Dambrath or her family's hold on it.

Merial

Duchess of Clan Luenath

Half-elf female (1/16th drow) 15th-level mage/-12th-level priest (Loviatar): Str 9, Des 12, Con 15, Int 17, Wis 36, Cha 14; AL NE; AC 4; MV 12; hp 85; THAC0 14; #AT 1; Dmg 1-2 (whip): SZ M; ML 16. Spells: Wizard 5/5/5/5/5/2/1, Priest 8/7/5/3/2.

Where Found: Luenath

Merial, formally referred to as Luenath, is said to be the second most powerful women in Dam-brath. She controls three large cities in her domain with an eye on the masses. She understands both pain and pleasure. For her, they are often the same. Luenath has always felt that she should be the queen instead of Cathtyr. Right now, however, she is too concerned with the daily pleasures and pressures of managing for three cities to have much time for plotting against the throne.

Merial works constantly, sleeping only one hour each night. Her servants are convinced her low need for sleep is magical; they are correct. She wears a ring of sleeplessness that allows her to maintain this grueling schedule.

The affairs of three cities are too vast for even one as driven as Merial. She has begun to trust tasks to her daughters, who do not share their mother's love of work. They in turn designate the work to lesser nobles in order to spend their days swimming with the dolphins, or riding the ranges.

Recently Luenath thwarted an assassination attempt. A group of young males presented as a gift from the Duchess of Herath attempted to slay her in her own bed. Her loyal acolyte, fatally wounded by the assassins, was able to warn her seconds before the deed. Luenath froze the intruders with her mightiest spell, only to see them mysteriously die before her eyes. She attempted to contact their spirits, but failed. Someone had destroyed the spirits already.

Luenath is too wise to immediately suspect the Duchess of Herath. She is conducting both magical and mundane investigations, but has gained little information so far. When she finally discovers the real culprit (Duchess Falrith of Ammathtar), her vengeance will be terrible.

Tralia Falrith

Duchess of Ammathtar

Half-elf female (1/8th drow) 15th-level mage/16th level priest (Loviatar): Str 8, Dex 10, Con 12, Int 16, Wis 15, Cha 15; AL LE; AC 3; MV 12; hp 96; THAC0 10; #AT 1; Dmg 1d4+2 (Dagger +2): SZ M; ML 15. Spells: Wizard 5/5/5/5/2/1, Priest 8/7/6/6/4

Dambrath

Where Found: Ammathtar

Tralia Falrith is ambitious and powerful, with delusions of grandeur. She is intent on becoming the queen, and will stop at nothing to achieve her end. She can be kind and charming until her desires are thwarted. Then, her rage is terrible and murderous.

She is a fervent believer in Loviatar's destiny: the idea that women should rule the world. She thinks of all other cultures (except for that of the drow, for which she has great respect) as barbaric.

This belief does not stop her from dealing with outsiders. She is often mistaken for a kindly leader, a perception she encourages. If the PCs pass through Ammathluir, they have a chance of meeting Falrith. She has observers who do nothing but watch for powerful adventurers. If the party contains someone of 6th level or higher, she has a base 50% chance of hearing about them. This chance is modified by the party's actions. Ostentatiously displaying magical power, or exhibiting trophies of powerful monsters they have slain raises the chance to 90% or even higher. Depending on their power and alignment, she will attempt to enlist them in her service either openly or through trickery.

Selanith

Duchess of Herath

Half-elf female (1/32 draw) 12th-level mage/ 15th-level priestess (Loviatar): Str 12, Dex 11, Con 11, Int 16, Wis 16, Cha 14; AL LE; AC 4; MV 12; hp 80; THAC0 12; #AT 1; Dmg 1d2 (whip); SZ M; ML 15. Spells: Wizard 4/4/4/4/1, Priest 8/8/6/6/4.

Where Found: Herath

Selanith is the richest woman in Dambrath. Her control of the mines combined with her ownership of many ranchos and horses make her very wealthy indeed. Although she is ambitious, she keeps the welfare of her country close to heart. She realizes that trickery and deceit may be discovered. Therefore, she makes open, obvious moves to cement her power.

Selanith is both cruel and lavish. Her favorite sports are those in which the loser dies, and she sponsors many of these deadly tournaments each year. There is never a shortage of entrants for the games, since the duchess rewards the winners lavishly with wealth and power. Many an army commander has gotten her first break after winning in the games of Herath.

Catharyn

Half-elf female (1/4 draw) 7th-level mage/10th-level priestess (Loviatar): Str 30, Dex 14, Con 15, Int 16, Wis 15, Cha 16; AL LE; AC 6; MV 12; hp 50; THAC0 14; #AT 1; Dmg 1-2 (whip); SZ M; ML 16. Spells: Wizard 4/3/2/1, Priest 6/5/3/3/2.

Where Found: The Great Sea

Catharyn is the eldest daughter of Yenandra. She currently commands the Queen's Fury, the proudest ship in the fleet. Catharyn has been away from Dambrath for almost a year. She is currently returning to Dambrath, leading four ships laden with booty. Her ships have been raiding as far west as Nimbral, out on the trackless sea. Catharyn is her mother's pride, as cruel and ruthless a daughter as a priestess of Loviatar could want. Catharyn's proudest boast is that she's never taken a prisoner. Her flag, a dolphin leaping over a ship, is enough to strike terror into the heart of any ship captain in the Great Sea.

Baltor

12th-level human male druid (Silvanus): Str 12, Dex 15, Con 13, Int 14, Wis 17, Cha 15; AL N; AC 5; MV 12 (swim 30 in dolphin form); hp 60; THAC0 14; #AT 1; Dmg 2-8 (bite as dolphin); SZ M; ML 14. Spells: 8/7/6/3/2/2

Where Found: The Bay of Dancing Dolphins

Dambrath

Baltor is the only druid currently living in Dambrath. He was born in Cormyr, and studied under the druids in the Hullack Forest. Upon gaining his shapeshifting ability, he resolved to fly to the ends of Faerun. While passing over Dambrath, he witnessed the dance of the dolphins. It entranced and intrigued him. He returned to his superiors, asking to be assigned to watch over this natural wonder.

Baltor has spent the majority of the last 30 years as a dolphin. He has been attempting to decipher the meaning and the purpose of the dance. Although he has been unsuccessful so far, he is confident that another 20 or 30 years should bring success.

Baltor keeps a careful watch on activity in the bay. If the PCs run afoul of weather or pirates, he may come to their aid. Baltor will be more inclined to aid PCs who are priests of a nature power. Naturally, a fellow druid is almost guaranteed a visit. Baltor rarely goes ashore, and has little information about the workings of Dambrath society. He does, however, know quite a bit about their pirate activity, which he has been watching since he arrived.

Dambrath's Horses

No mention of Dambrath would be complete if some attention was not paid to the prize of Dambrath, her horses. A Dambraii steed is prized, with good reason, all through the Shining South. Most Dambraii horses that leave the country are considered the equal of any to be found elsewhere. In truth, player characters who manage to get their hands on a Dambraii horse will find it tough (1's or 2's on Hit Dice count as 3's), fast (add 1 to its movement rate), and easy to train (subtract from 1d4 weeks from any trick or maneuver to be taught to it).

Only the poorest horseflesh actually leaves Dambrath. Someone facing a troop of Dambraii cavalry quickly learns that the best horses stay in Dambrath. A cavalry troop on Dambraii horses can move at a speed that is unheard of by any other cavalry troop. A troop can be packed and mounted in less than a minute. The horses all average at least 6 hit points per die, and add 25% to the normal movement rate. They are all battle-trained, and very dependable in combat. Dambraii riders are almost never thrown at least while their horses still live.

The horses of Dambrath are smaller than usual. Large warhorses don't do well in the heat. A Dambraii horse is always spotted, generally white on black, or black on white. Browns and grays do exist, but are rare.

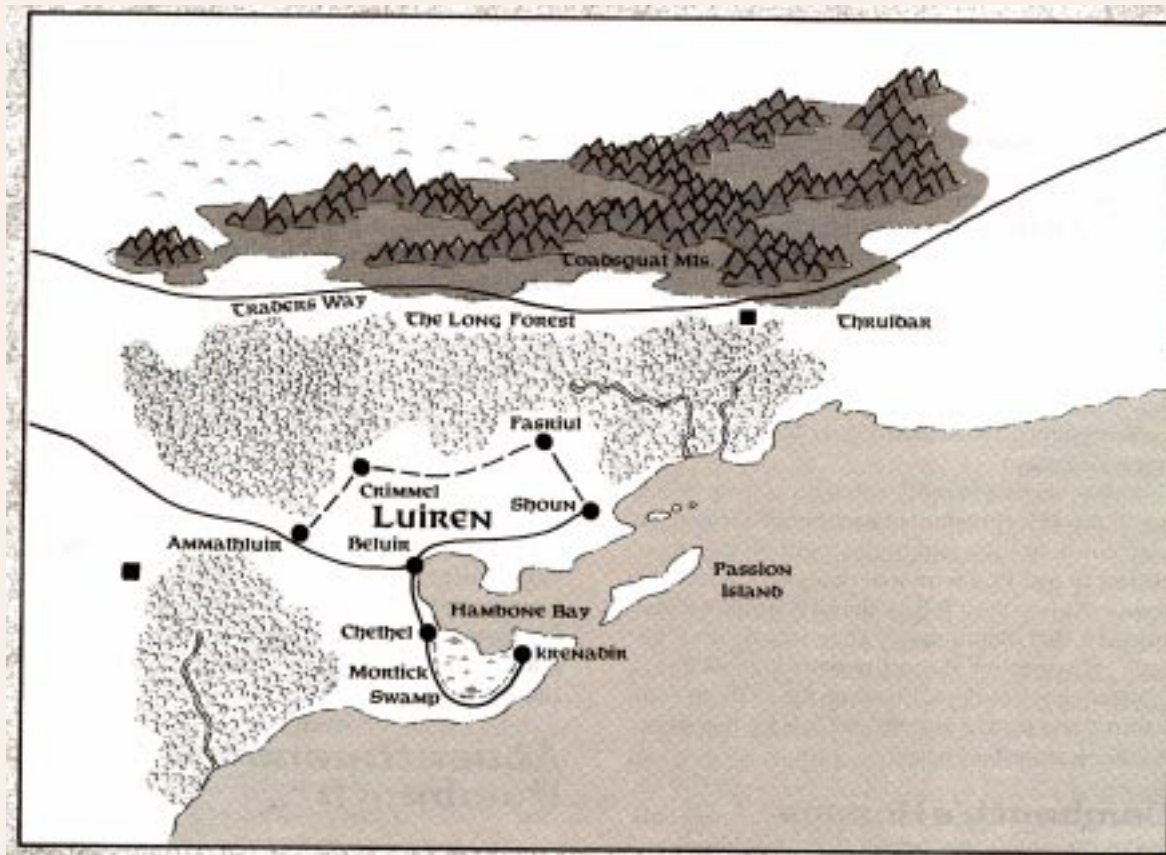

It is interesting to note that the superior qualities of Dambraii horses do not last outside their land. Perhaps this is proof that the arkas grass (which grows only in Dambrath) was indeed created for horses. The horses bred from a Dambraii steed are excellent animals, but do not have the special abilities of a Dambraii horse. Apparently, the grass is the key to developing a superior animal. Horses fed the arkas grass during the first years of their lives become superior animals. This is a little known secret outside of Dambrath.

Adventurers in Dambrath

Dambrath has many places for adventurers to explore, provided they can get into the country. The Gnollwatch Mountains, the Great Swamp, and the Forest of Amtar ail provide many exciting adventures for the brave or the foolhardy. Getting back out of the country may be even more of an adventure. Dambraii are very resentful of anyone "robbing from their culture." Needless to say, elves have a very short life expectancy in Dambrath. All other races are tolerated. A dwarf may have trouble if he claims to be an adventurer. If, however, he says he is a smith, he is welcomed with open arms.

Luiren, The Land of The Halflings

General Description

Luiren is a small, heavily wooded land between the matriarchy of Dambrath, and the trading country of Estagund. The land is bordered on the north by the Toadsquat mountains, and on the south by the Great Sea. Populated almost entirely by halflings, Luiren is famous for many things: its foodstuffs, its brewing, and its intricate woodcarving. It is a rich country, and one capable of defending itself against invaders and pirates.

Geography and Climate

Luiren is located on the coast of the Great Sea, just south of the Toadsquat mountains. The northern half of the country is covered by the Long Forest, a 90-mile-wide band of trees that runs east to west for over 300 miles. To the west, the Long Forest is filled with monsters. On the east it is a vibrant jungle, inhabited by normal jungle animals. The summer heat is intense. The temperatures often rise to 100 or higher; only the ever-present breezes from the sea keep the country livable. During the winter the rains bring trade and land travel to a standstill. The roads become sink-holes after three months of daily rain. This weather is excellent for the fruits that are grown in the plains south of the Long Forest.

Luiren, The Land of The Halflings

History of Luiren

The halflings of Luiren claim that it is the original homeland of halflings in the Realms. Although other halflings may disagree, it is true that halflings have lived in Luiren for hundreds, perhaps thousands, of years.

Luiren's history is one of conquerors. Throughout the centuries the halflings have been conquered by the barbarians who used to inhabit Dambrath, by the kingdom of Estagund, and even once by the monsters of Veldorn. In every case, the invaders were eventually defeated because they made the mistake of underestimating the halflings due to their small stature. A good bit of mischief, mayhem, and general trouble-making by the halflings also helped end the occupations.

For example, when the barbarians of Dambrath invaded, many halflings were carried off as slaves. The rest of them merely ducked into their holes, and avoided the barbarians as much as possible. Within a few years, the priestesses of Loviatar had seized control of Dambrath. When the barbarians withdrew to help their homeland, the halflings went back to their normal lives. Many of the slaves escaped and returned to their homeland. Others stayed in Dambrath to live and work.

Currently the halflings of Luiren are enjoying unprecedented prosperity. The trading nation of Durpar is their biggest customer, and their biggest competitor. The halflings of Luiren are bright enough to play on this relationship. Luiren, through its close ties with Durpar, has protected itself against another Dambrath invasion. The rulers of Dambrath know that if they begin to expand to the east, they will arouse the ire of Durpar, Var and Estagund. The threat of a trade embargo and/or military consequences have kept this aggressive nation away from the Luirenens.

Government and Politics

"As important as the Prince of Luiren," is a common saying in Luiren. Since there has never been a prince of Luiren, this means that whatever is being referred to is not very important. Luiren is, in effect, a peaceful anarchy. There are no organized government agencies. The halflings not only wouldn't stand for it, none of them would want to serve on such an agency. All government functions are handled on a town by town basis. Wide variation is possible, but most of the towns are run by a mayor, a number of warders, and a council of Elders. The elders, anyone of at least 90 winters, make the decisions for the town. These consist chiefly of hiring new warders. They also elect the mayor from among their own number.

Laws are loosely interpreted, and only capital crimes are actively prosecuted. A thief may be stripped of goods and turned out into the wilderness with nothing but the clothes on his back. A con artist or fraud often finds that his confidence game or scam has been turned against him. The halflings of Luiren are used to dealing with Durparian merchants. A cheat or fraud has little chance of bettering them at trade.

Someone who kills a halfling had better flee immediately or he'll find that halflings are not as helpless as they appear. Such criminals are dealt with summarily. A rope in a lonely tree is all they can expect.

Warders are responsible for keeping the peace, and defending the town from monsters and bandits. A warder is usually a fighter/thief of 3rd/3rd level. Larger towns have more powerful warders. Warders usually wear no uniforms. A brown cap with a feather in it signifies a warder in most villages. Warders are not too concerned with honor and forthrightness. They are very concerned with not getting hurt while fulfilling the duties of their office. Not surprisingly, most warders are proficient with short bows, slings, darts, or other missile weapons. With the bonus halflings receive for thrown weapons, and their intimate knowledge of their home terrain, these troops of warders can be very hard to overcome.

Luren, The Land of The Halflings

People and Customs

Halflings make up 95% of the population. The rest are almost all humans. Since Luiren halflings think of gnomes as busybodies; not many are found in Luiren.

There are a few small tribes of dwarves in the Toadsquat mountains. Elves live in the Long Forest, but they have little to do with the halflings.

Humanoids do not exist in Luiren in any great numbers, except for the ogres of the Toadsquat mountains. Their relationship with the halflings is not a friendly one.

Social Customs

The halflings of Luiren have few laws, hut many customs. A halfling is expected to feed his invited or uninvited guests, and feed them well. Many of the richer halflings keep a first class cook on the payroll at all times. Some even take the time to learn how to be a gourmet cook themselves. One of the most sought after claims to fame is the invention a new taste sensation that sweeps the country. The recipe alone can make the inventor rich. He is much in demand at festivals and parties. "Only the baker makes the bread right," is an expression that carries a lot of weight in Luiren. It is widely believed that only the inventor can truly do justice to his invention.

The small folk of Luiren are always polite, even to someone they may have to shoot in the back later. It's just simple logic. If a huge brute is pushing around halflings, they'll call him by whatever title he wants. It doesn't make his armor any tougher, or make his back a less tempting target.

Other customs include the spring and fall festivals. After the rainy season ends, the halflings have the spring festival. In the fall, after the harvest is all in, a huge three day festival is held. Many halflings have observed that at this festival, "The food and drink fall from the sky." Most visitors have come to believe that this is one of the wildest festivals in the Realms.

The small folk of Luiren are small only in stature. They are not afraid to compete with the traders of Durpar, and ship their goods to a wide area. Although they do not possess the infrastructure to ship all over the Realms, Luiren stout is popular all along the Shining South. Luiren spring cheese has been heard of as far away as Waterdeep.

When in Luiren, if a person is open, friendly, and not too attached to his money, he'll get along just fine. The Luireners treat others as they are treated. Since most of the big folk are trying to take advantage of them they do the same.

"Big folk" in Luiren often have a difficult time finding lodgings. Along the Great Trade Way, inns which cater to both folk are common. Away from the Trade Way, almost everything is halfling sized. This makes it tough for "big folk" to find a good inn with beds over four feet long. Most visiting "big folk" sleep in the stables.

Luireners have a number of popular expressions which sum up their outlook on life. Some are in use in the other countries of the Shining South as well. The words "vellam" and "bouqtha" are used to represent money and food. "Vellam" is obviously a derivation of the Durparian Vellim, or trade bar. "Bouqthi" (pronounced book-thi) is a fruit pastry. Its derivative, "bouqtha," refers to good food of any type.

Some common halfling expressions include:

"Once the bouqtha is on the table, the rest is just keeping score" - halfling view of money.

"Stew's ready, shall I give it to the dogs?" - means that supper is ready, usually followed by a stam-pede toward the dining room.

"The dogs are finished, do you want what's left?" - to a halfling who was late for supper. This expression doesn't get used much.

"I've got a deal for you that even a Dambraii noble couldn't turn down." - Halflings think of Dambraii nobles as incredibly arrogant and stupid. This expression is used to represent a deal that even an idiot wouldn't refuse.

"The vellam is on the table" - This phrase is used to indicate that the halfling has offered all he's going to for an item, or that he is telling the truth. Neither use indicates that the halfling really means it, but it is used frequently.

Luren, The Land of The Halflings

"As smart as a human" - an extreme insult.

"Brought home the vellam" - made an extremely profitable deal, or was extremely lucky.

"When in Durpar, keep your hand on your pouch. When in Halruua, sell them dirt and call it a spell component. When in Dambrath, leave." - old saying that represents the Luireners' view of the three nearby countries.

Another custom of Luiren concerns names. Many halflings take names representing either their trade, or types of food. The Baker family is widespread. There is even a very successful branch of the family in Durpar. Other common names are Carver, Alemaker, Brewer, Vintner, Forestkin, Sandwich, Pastrri, and Clambake.

Religion

There are several gods that are popular with Luireners. Tymora, greater power of luck, is the most prominent deity in the land. She's closely followed by Silvanus, the Oak Father, and Yondalla, the protector of halflings. Since most Luiren halflings are not very religious, none of the revered deities expect severe piety from the halflings. Of the small number of halfling priests in the land, the most powerful is only 10th level.

Following the coming of the avatars, new specialty priests of several halfling deities appeared in Luiren. Two of these new priests are presented on the inside cover of this book. These specialty priests are native to the Luiren area only. Once the number of such priests increases, some may begin to adventure. For now, though, these new priests should only be found in Luiren.

Luiren, The Land of The Halflings

Money and Commerce

Luiren is a busy place. Crafts and foods are shipped out of the country to cities all along the Shining South. The goods that leave Luiren by sea are usually sold to Durparian merchants. The Durparians are happy to pick up loads of Luiren stout, salcakes, and an occasional wheel of spring cheese (also known as “cheeese”).

Luiren has no currency of its own. The most widespread currency is the Durparian vellim. Dambraii shebs and crints are also common, as is the Halruan electrum skie. Bartering is widespread; some of the more rural citizens of Luiren may go years without ever seeing a single coin. Others in the cities, have accumulated wealth to compare with some of the lesser chakas of Durpar. One prominent merchant, Gildmak Sholapur, leader of the famous brewers of Luiren Stout, owns the largest brewery in the Shining South.

The halflings of Luiren show an inventive bent, particularly with respect to food and drink. Luiren stout is a dark thick ale, popular all over the Shining South. It is even popular, though rare, in the dwarven city of Underhome. Bouqthi is a very popular pastry in Luiren, but little is exported since pastries do not travel well. Bouqthi is made by using a sugared dough, filled with the stalks of the red rhubarb plant that grows well along the south edge of the Long Forest. There are perhaps a hundred different recipes for this popular pastry. Discussions on which bouqthi recipe is better commonly escalate into brawls, especially if both recipes’ creators are present.

Salbread is another taste treat from the inventive folk of Luiren. It was invented for sale to the sailors and other travelers. It is a crusty travel bread that stays edible for weeks. It is more flavorful than the average journeybread, and is particularly popular with Durparian merchants. It is baked in square pans, and packs easily and conveniently. One of the reasons it is popular with sailors is that the recipe involves a touch of lemon or orange peel. This bit of added nutrition means that the bread can actually help sailors to fight off scurvy, or at least help to prevent its development. This also gives it a tart flavor that does not grow as tiresome to the taste buds as that of ordinary journeybread.

Fruit is another Luiren export. The lands between Beluir and Chethel have many tropical fruit plantations. They grow bananas, papayas, pineapple, oranges, passion fruits, lemons, and a myriad of other fruits. Most are consumed in Luiren, but ships from Durpar and Halruaa take on loads of green bananas and other fruits.

Perhaps the most notable invention of Luiren, at least among halflings, is Luiren spring cheese. Also known as mind cheese, or cheeese (yes, there are four e’s in the spelling), this hard cheese is excellent when melted into a fondue or sauce. When consumed in its raw form, cheeese is intoxicating and habit forming to halflings.

Whenever a halfling consumes more than four ounces of raw cheeese, he suffers a -2 penalty on all proficiency checks and combat rolls and a -20% to all thief abilities. If eight or more ounces are consumed, the halfling must make a saving throw vs. death magic or pass out for 1d10 turns. Whenever it is consumed in its raw form, the halfling must make a Constitution check or crave more cheeese within the next 24 hours. Failure to get it causes the halfling to lose half his hit points, and suffer from severe pain and cramps for the next 24 hours. Heated cheeese loses its intoxicating effects and is safe to consume. Luiren spring cheese is also a vital ingredient in the special recipes used in the medicinal cooking proficiency detailed at the end of this chapter.

Cities of Luiren

Most halflings of Luiren live in comfortable caves, with small (halfling-sized) doors and windows. The underground location helps keep the temperature comfortable. Over three-quarters of all dwellings in the Luiren cities are of this type.

Luiren, The Land of The Halflings

Inns and meeting houses, as well as dwellings for the "big folk," are above ground. So are most stores, bakeries and other businesses. A dwelling below ground is called a "halfole." All rich halflings live in halfoles.

Nearly every small village or hamlet has its own halfling whistler. This is a halfling bard who can summon animals, and control weather and plants by means of the songs he whistles. In the last few years priests of Yondalla have been increasingly evident in the land, working to defend Luiren from outside interference.

Beluir

The largest town in Luiren, Beluir is a sprawling collection of buildings, halfoles, and inns. The population is a bit over 15,000, which includes residents of the nearby plantations and farms. Beluir is located on the west end of the Hambone Bay.

The mayor is Calcitro Burrow, a halfling fighter of 8th level. Calcitro carries a dagger of severing (similar to a sword of sharpness). He is a fighting legend in Beluir, having single-handedly slain two raiding giants. The Burrows family owns the largest fruit plantation in the area. They also own the town's best inns: the Friendly Burrow, the Red Burrow, and the Cold Duck.

The town is well-defended. The Warde's troop in Beluir consists of more than 400 warriors. These stealthy wardens are all specialists with slings. An invading group of monsters or bandits may be subject to a withering cross-fire before they ever know that they have been surrounded.

Ammathluir

Ammathluir is located south of the Long Forest, on the western edge of Luiren. Some of the best woodcarvers and craftsmen in the Shining South live in Ammathluir. Caravans make their way down the southern fork of the Great Trade Way, bringing metal goods and leather from Dambrath. They return with loads of Salbread, crafted wood items, and Luiren Stout.

Most of the residences in this border town are halfoles. Fewer than 50 buildings are above ground. This makes travelers believe they have entered a very small town, when the population is actually over 10,000. The halflings here are very active traders and craftsmen.

Ammathluir is the home of more than a dozen halfling whistlers, and at least one 7th-level specialty priest of Yondalla. Because whistlers can influence animals, they are credited with protecting the city from the frequent wild animal attacks. There is a small temple to Yondalla in town built into the side of a hill.

Chethel

This town is located in the hills above the Mortick Swamp, at the west end of Hambone Bay. It has a population of 8,000 or so, mostly grain and fruit traders. Chethel also has several large docks. Of all cities in Luiren, this is the most comfortable for the big folk. Almost 10% of the population is human or half-elven. Most of the ships in Luiren sail from here. The trading is fast and furious in the market of Chethel. On a typical day characters may meet merchants from Ulgarth and Durpar, or even a Halruaan trader. Many goods enter and leave the country here. The most prominent export is Luiren Stout, for the famous Sholapur family has its main breweries in Chethel. They employ almost a thousand workers. In fact, grain must be imported from Durpar to keep up with the demand. Inns are common. Some inns are sized for all races, but others are sized for halflings only. Due to the proximity of the dangerous Mortick swamp, PCs may meet many of the adventuring halflings of Luiren in this city.

Tymora and Yondalla both have shrines in Chethel. The leader of the Tymora congregation is a 10th-level halfling priestess, Janalea Baker.

Fasriul

Fasriul is north of Shoun, near the Long Forest, and north of some of the best farmlands in

Luren, The Land of The Halflings

Luiren. Its chief claim to fame is the fields of red rhubarb that grow here, a vegetable that is traded all over Luiren. The city can claim only 3,000 residents, most involved with farming and baking. A small group of 40 warders watches the forest to the north. The mayor is Silari Carver, a wealthy landowner and farmer. Silari is an 8th level priestess of Yondalla, who no longer practices in the faith. She has found that she is far too busy with her farms and businesses. Fasriul is a growing town, the population used to be less than 2,000. The increased exports of foodstuffs to Durpar and Halruaa are responsible for this growth.

Krenalir

Krenalir is located on the east end of the Mortick swamp, served by a loop in the Great Trade Way. It has adequate docks, but most traders sail for Beluir or Chethel. The Krenalir Peninsula, as the narrow land east of the swamp is called, is a fertile citrus area, and many fruits are grown here. In the winter, the rain-lashed peninsula is almost deserted.

The population ranges from 5,000 during harvest time, to only about 1,500 during the winter. All of the halflings who can afford to, generally winter with relatives in other cities for the rainy season.

The mayor of Krenalir is Hudkin Moadi, a halfling who despises adventurers. He has sent more than one group to their deaths in the Mortick swamp. Hudkin attempted to become an adventurer, but found that life on the trail was not for him. His burrow is extensive, since his family is one of the largest in Krenalir.

The warders of Krenalir are used to the distrust of Hudkin; they ignore it because he pays well. There are 100 warders active during the harvest season, but most are laid off during the winter, and spend their winters patrolling the Long Forest for the cities of Fasriul and Crimel.

Shoun

This city is located on the eastern coast of Luiren, and is the closest port to Passion Island. From here cogs sail to the Passion island, returning with many citrus fruits. There are many bakeries in Shoun, and all are well frequented by the locals. The expression "as fat as a Shounite" has come to symbolize the average resident.

Shoun is home to some of the great dairies. Herds of goats are kept north of the city. It is legend that a Shounite invented Luiren spring cheese.

The mayor of Shoun is also the richest merchant in the city. Melino Richtoes is a fabulously wealthy dairy owner. Although he owns almost 10% of the businesses in town, he is a generous sort. He is also a rogue of 14th level, who has turned to the lawful good teachings of Yondalla. He uses his rogue skills to defeat the enemies of his chosen power. Residents say that Melino is a much better mayor since he found religion, and that Shoun is more successful than ever.

Crimel

Crimel is a small city of 1,000, located under the eaves of the Long Forest. Its residents are mainly concerned with harvesting wood from the forest under the watchful eyes of the priests of Yondalla, who are there to see that the logging is done in accordance with nature. The priests also help defend the village from the frequent raids by marauding monsters and bandits.

The leader of Crimel is Silvo Carver, a well-to-do merchant who owns many of the herds of cattle and sheep which graze south of town. There is a small garrison of warders here. It consists of 50 woodcrafty halflings, with several priests of Tymora and Yondalla assisting. A halfling priestess of Sheela Peryroyl lives in the Long Forest not far from Crimel. Nola Treestump is a priestess of 8th level. She is responsible for keeping the nearby forest clear of evil influences.

Luren, The Land of The Halflings

Places of Interest

The Long Forest

Stretching over 300 miles, the Long Forest covers almost half of Luiren. Its east end is particularly dangerous, filled with bandits, stirges, huge spiders, flying snakes, rhino beetles, and other jungle monsters. The forest gets safer the farther west one travels. Nola Treestump, a halfling priestess, has the western end of the forest under her protection. Several bands of monsters have begun to infiltrate her domain, however.

The Long Forest is on a ridge below the Toad-squat Mountains, which makes it a bit more temperate than the normal woods of the Shining South. Oaks, maples, rowans, and other northern trees can be found here, although not in great numbers. The majority of plant life is typical of the Shining South. Kudzu trails over everything, while cypress and fruit trees abound.

Granuin Forest

The Granuin Forest is completely untamed. It is the home of at least one tribe of yuan-ti, as well as a beholder that lurks deep in a forest stronghold. Dark trees also make their home here, having migrated from the Wood of Dark Trees in Durpar.

The Granuin Forest is a gloomy, mysterious place, and the inhabitants prefer to keep it that way. Various traps line the trails, placed to kill or capture the unwary. If the characters meet an intelligent monster, there is an 80% chance he serves either Siliss, the yuan-ti leader, or Xianthrope, the beholder.

Mortick Swamp

The Mortick Swamp was aptly named. It is full of giant ticks, spiders, wasps and other insects. There are also many giant frogs which prey on the insects in the swamp. Rumors abound about ruins filled with treasure which leads adventurers to continually enter the swamp. There are no such ruins, but there are plenty of monsters to keep treasure hunters busy.

Luiren NPCs

8th-level halfling male fighter: SW 12, Dex 12, Con 13, Int 11, Wis 13, Cha 10; AL LG; AC 4; MV 6; hp 62; THAC0 13; #AT 3/2; Dmg 1d4+1 (dagger of severing +1); SZ S; ML 14.

Where Found: Beluir

Calcitro is a fighting legend in Beluir. Almost 20 years ago, a pair of raiding hill giants attacked a caravan where Calcitro was a guard. All of the other guards were slain. Calcitro and the caravan drivers were able to kill the giants and deliver their wagons. He is a staunch defender of his town, and his family.

The Burrows family owns a number of inns, as well as the largest fruit plantation in the area. He takes it upon himself to oversee the establishments personally.

Calcitro is often encountered in inns and cafes; his thirst and appetite are almost as legendary as his fighting prowess. Unsuspecting opponents by be fooled by his size and weight. He looks like anything but an effective fighter. Calcitro cultivates this look. It has given him a bit of an edge in many fights. He is an extremely effective fighter, and always looks for a winning edge.

His prized possession is a dagger of severing which has the special abilities of a sword of sharpness.

Melino RichToes

14th-level halfling male thief: Str 10, Dex 14, Con 8, Int 13, Wis 12, Cha 11; AL LG; AC 5; MV 6; hp 51; THAC0 14; #AT 1; Dmg 1d4+2 (dagger +2); SZ S; ML 12.

Where Found: Shoun

Luren, The Land of The Halflings

Melino has recently found religion, apparently having experienced a calling from Yondalla. Prior to his change, he was one of the greediest halflings in Shoun, as well as a very successful merchant. Now he uses his rogue skills to help protect his town. All of the inhabitants of Shoun are pleased with the change.

Melino frequently adventures these days, which has helped him lose some of the roundness so typical of halflings. A party with news of a threat to the city of Shoun is sure to find in him an eager volunteer.

Brac Bristletoes

8th-level halfling male fighter: Str 10 (24 with girdle of storm giant strength), Dex 15, Con 14, Int 12, Wis 9, Cha 12; AL CG; AC 4; MV 6; hp 65; THAC0 13; #AT 24; Dmg 1d6 (throwing axe): SZ S; ML 13. Specialized in throwing axe.

Where Found: The Realms

Originally from Beluir, Brac is now a well traveled halfling. He still returns to his homeland on occasion, although he claims he comes back only to get a well cooked meal. Brac is an exceptional chef, with a double proficiency in cooking. Brac is a carefree halfling, just out to see the world. Seldom caring where his next meal will come from, Brac will cheerfully head down an unfamiliar road without a copper in his purse. He readily trusts folk, but over the past several years he has learned a small amount of caution. Once he gives his trust, he is fiercely loyal to his friends, eager to repay any injustices done to them.

Brac began his travels at an early age. After arriving in Waterdeep without a copper to his name, he agreed to participate in a halfling-tossing contest to earn enough money for his room and board that night. Two burly fighters paid him to toss him from one end of the barroom to the other. One of the observers decided to get in on the action. He easily tossed Brac through the wall of the Inn.

By the time Brac regained his senses and stumbled back to the inn, a full-scale bar brawl had erupted. Brac, seeking to repay the fellow who had forced his ungraceful exit, had a perfect opportunity. As the human fighter was fending off the attacks of a party of adventurers while holding a struggling barmaid under one arm, Brac climbed atop a table and walloped him from behind. Brac and the adventurers agreed to split the fighter's goods with each other. Brac took the fellow's girdle of storm giant strength, while the adventurers divided the rest of the loot. Brac traveled with these adventurers for several years following the incident.

Several months after he had acquired the girdle, it was stolen from him. Brac eventually traced it back to its original owner. Brac and his companions pursued him, and eventually found what Brac believed was his girdle. Unfortunately, it was a girdle of masculinity/femininity. "Brackette" was able to later recover his (her?) original girdle. After several years of adventuring as "Brackette," he was able to acquire a wish from an archmage, which returned him to his original gender.

Brac currently travels the Realms attempting to see as much of the continent as possible. While traveling, he often hires himself out as a chef to various inns and finer restaurants, but he never stays more than a week in any town. Brac has recently acquired an ancient tome entitled The Fine Art of Cooking and Seasoning Red Dragon. He is currently seeking a band of (fool) hardy adventurers to help him gather the main ingredient for this new recipe.

Flynagin Nightshabow

13th-level halfling female thief (swashbuckler): Str 13, Dex 18, Con 10, Int 13, Wis 11, Cha 16; AL CG; AC 0; MV 6; hp 49; THAC0 14; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6+2 (rapier +1): SZ S; ML 15. Thief skills: PP 95, OL 75, FT 60, MS 95, HS 95, DN 95, CW 80, RL 15.

Where Found: The Shining South

Luren, The Land of The Halflings

A true swashbuckler at heart, Flynagin, or Flyn to her friends, is a happy-go-lucky sort who always seems to find more trouble than she expected.

A proud daughter of a proud family, she left home to adventure after running rampant through her home village. She loves to play (mostly) harmless practical jokes on anyone she sees. This is one of the reasons she decided to leave her home town quickly.

While she was adventuring, she traveled several years in the company of a female half-elven ranger who was a Harper. Developing a good friendship with her, Flyn soon became a trusted ally of the Harpers. They occasionally send her into various locales in the Shining South to glean information or recover stolen articles.

She possesses several magical items including a rapier +1 that was especially created by dwarves at the request of the Harpers. In the hands of a halfling it functions as a short sword in regard to weight and speed. Flyn received this sword as a gift from the Harpers for past deeds. Flyn thinks that either Khelben Blackstaff or Elminster himself might have enchanted the blade. She also possesses bracers of defense AC 4, a ring of invisibility, and boots of speed.

Flyn enjoys causing confusion that leads to barroom brawls. She uses her tumbling ability to avoid most of the fights as she takes advantage of the bedlam to gather a few valuables for herself. One of her favorite tactics is to hide in shadows and use her ring of invisibility to sneak up behind a burly character, then slug him. She then either dodges back into the shadows, or reactivates her ring of invisibility. She usually gets her victim to blame a bystander for the attack. If she does get caught, she can usually charm her way out of the "silly misunderstanding."

She is fiercely loyal to her few friends. She treats any insult to them as an insult to herself. She will calmly calculate a way to pay any transgressors back for what they have done. The pay-back usually costs the perpetrator extreme embarrassment as well as a great deal of money.

ADVENTURERS IN Luiren

Adventuring in Luiren is virtually unrestricted. Halflings don't really care who comes into their country. As long as visitors don't cause trouble, and have plenty of money to spend, they are welcome. Fighters, bards, thieves, priests (of good or neutral deities) are all welcome. Mages are treated with a bit of reserve; most of the halfling's exposure to magic has come from the illusionists of Durpar and the reclusive mages of Halruaa. The average halfling's attitude toward mages is that they are a bit crazy, and their magic doesn't work nearly as well as they say. Most mages are welcome, at least until they begin to destroy things.

New Non-Weapon Proficiencies

These two proficiencies are native to halfling priests of Luiren. They jealously guard these secrets. Outsiders seeking to learn these proficiencies will have a difficult time finding a mentor to teach them. If the search is successful, the would-be student will pay dearly for the secrets.

Healthy Cooking

Priest, 2 slots, Wisdom 0.

Prerequisites: Herbalism, Healing, Cooking

With the proper training, the cook can create a stew that speeds healing. Those who learn the healthy cooking proficiency may brew a stew in 1 hour that adds +1 to the healing provided by rest. Thus, a PC who has had 24 hours of complete rest recovers four hit points instead of three. A PC who has camped overnight on the trail receives one point instead of none. A successful proficiency check by the priest is necessary for the accelerated healing to occur. If the check is failed, the stew is still edible and nutritious, but it lacks the balance of ingredients necessary for healing.

Luren, The Land of The Halflings

At least one full dose of the stew (about two cups for a man-sized creature) must be consumed each day the creature is to be healed. No more than one hit point per day can be gained, no matter how much stew is consumed.

Healthy cooking is a prerequisite of medicinal cooking, and the two cannot be taken at the same time. At least one level must be gained between learning healthy cooking and medicinal cooking.

Medicinal Cooking

Slots: 2

Class: Priest

Ability: Wisdom

Modifier: -2

Prerequisites: Healthy Cooking.

Medicinal cooking is the fine art of cooking for true healing. The secrets of cooking in this manner are closely guarded by the halfling priests who share them. This proficiency can be found in priests of many religions, but they are always halflings.

One thing that is known by most outsiders is that medicinal cooking involves the use of Luiren spring cheese. When used in this fashion, cheeese does not have the intoxicating or habit-forming effects that the pure cheeese does; it simply acts as a curative. Medicinal cheeese stew affects halflings and non-halflings in the same way, although the latter may find the taste a bit strange.

Since healthy cooking is a prerequisite, and the two cannot be taken at the same time, no halfling priest of less than 3rd level can possibly learn this. Most are 6th level when they do. A mentor must be found to learn this proficiency, and such persons have more students than they desire. Most students need six to eight weeks of daily instruction to master this art.

Medicinal cooking allows the student to prepare recipes that stimulate healing, as well as those that actually cure various diseases (even some of the magically caused ones).

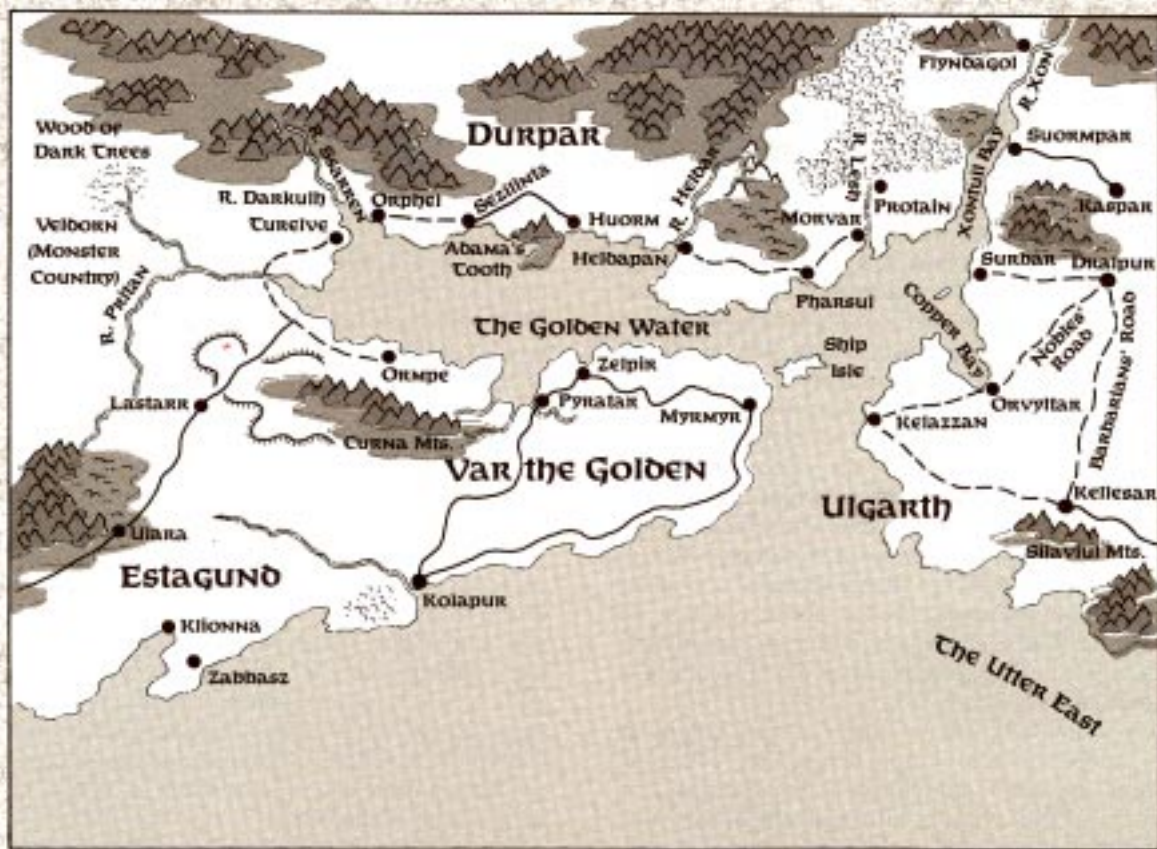

At the time the student gains this proficiency, she or he is able to prepare an improved version of the healthy stew, granting imbibers two extra points of healing from rest.

After advancing two more levels, or in year's time (whichever happens first), the student can make soups that cure normal diseases like measles, mumps, whooping cough, or malaria.

After another year, or two levels, the student can make soups that heal fatal diseases like smallpox, or even the bubonic plague. It can also heal the diseases inflicted by means of a cause disease or harm spell. It cannot cure lycanthropy or mummy rot, but it is effective against almost everything else. The only other disease which has eluded the halfling priests is the one which escapes all other healers as well. The common cold still resists curing, although cheeese soup does relieve the suffering somewhat.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

Durpar, Estagund, and Var the Golden are collectively known as the Shining Lands. Durpar has controlled the other two countries for so long that all share the same way of life. The Council of Merchants located in Heldapan rules over the Shining Lands. In other countries, the term Durparian refers to any of the residents of the three countries. Residents of all three countries have one major trait in common; they can all bargain a person's shoes out from under them.

General Description

Durpar and Var the Golden are the names given the two nations to the north and south (respectively) of the protected sea known as the Golden Water. Estagund lies on the southwest edge of Var, with the halfling lands of Luiren to the west.

The north border is the Dustwall Mountains, and the great Dust Desert, the Raurin. On the east, firmly defended outposts at the river Xon mark the borders with Ulgarth.

Geography and Climate

"Here the Adama has touched. We will abide here. All is part of the one, but this is the best part." — Satama, founder of the cult of the Adama.

The Shining Lands are located at the bottom of the southern-central portion of the continent, at the north shore of the Great Sea. They are the last civilized area before one reaches the Utter East. The lands are hot and fertile. Winter rains are mild, except along the coast of the Great Sea.

Durpar, Estagund and Var The Golden

The inhabitants truly consider it the land of gold.

The dominating feature of the Shining Lands is the huge bay, referred to as the Golden Water, which gave the lands their name. A high content of minerals gives the water a golden sheen at sunrise and sunset. The waters are abundant with fish, both for food and for game, as well as other treasures of the sea such as pearl beds and coral reefs. The reefs are predominantly red and purple, and Durparian coral jewelry is popular in and out of the Shining Lands. The country's most profitable export, however, is the coffee that is grown here and nowhere else.

The northern half of Durpar is dominated by the Dustwall Mountains. They protect Durpar from the howling sandstorms that rage across the Raurin. Legend says these mountains were raised during the cataclysm that destroyed the great Raurin empire. Adama's Wrath, the tallest peak, towers some 22,000 feet above the plains of Durpar. The average height of these mountains is 15,000 feet, making it one of the tallest ranges in the world.

Var the Golden is a country of rural beauty. It is flat for miles, and most of it is filled with millions of acres of golden wheat. Estagund shares some of this terrain, although the Toadsquat mountain range forms the western border with Luiren. These mountains, which average 6,000 feet, are similar to the mountains of Curna, since they have no peaks higher than 7,500 feet.

There are two other features outside of the Shining Land that influence the countries. The Raurin Desert, north of the mountains of Adama, dominates the terrain for hundreds of miles. It forces the Durparians to travel far out of their way to reach the city of Solon and the countries of Murghom and Semphar. The Raurin is a wasteland of sand and dust, inhabited only by wandering tribes of bandits and mongrelmen.

To the south is the Great Sea. In ancient days, this trackless sea was thought to lead to the lower planes. The thought of new lands and new profit led Durparian merchants to discover the land of Zakhara. Thus while most travel in the Great Sea goes west to Halruaa and beyond, more is being learned about the currents and killer storms of the Great Sea.

History

Durpar and Var the Golden

Durpar and Var the Golden share a common history. Over three thousand years ago, these countries were both subject to the great kingdom of Raurin. When Raurin fell in 2488 DR, the countries of Durpar and Var barely survived the destruction.

Rioting, mass destruction, and hatred of nobility were rampant. The country descended into barbarism for over two millennia. Finally, after most of the barbarian tribes were wiped out by the then great empire of Mulhorand, a leader emerged. Satama, a mere trader, experienced a divine revelation. He formulated a new philosophy. All things in the world were connected, and were part of a single creation spirit. All of the gods of the Realms were merely parts of the same entity. Soon all the Shining Lands embraced the teachings of Satama, and the seeds of civilization were laid in what came to be known as the Lands of the One.

Since the Lands of the One had many natural resources, trade with Mulhorand and Luiren became a way of life. Merchants were honored above all. In time, the Maharajah of Durpar and the Rajah of Var were replaced with a Council of Merchants. The leading merchants of the lands each had a voice on the council. During that time the land suffered occasional raiding attacks from the horsewomen of Dambrath, and had many skirmishes with the neighboring countries of Estagund and Ulgarth.

In 1023 DR, after an armed peace had been worked out with Ulgarth, the council of merchants decided that something needed to be done about the raiders from Estagund who were hurting trade with other countries. War was an inconvenience, but interrupting trade was life-threatening!

Jeradeem, the richest merchant in the lands,

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

was given power to negotiate a settlement. During these negotiations he proved, at least in the eyes of the Durparians, that he was the master trader of all time. Estagund had just tried a foolish invasion of Dambrath. The vengeful female leaders of that land wiped out nearly every able-bodied fighting man they sent. The monsters of Veldorn were causing problems, and Estagund was going through a famine.

It was here that Jeradeem showed his fine merchant's instincts. He could not pass up such an advantage. He began bargaining for the most outrageous trade of all time. He met with the leaders of Estagund, a fearful king and his nobles. He explained the advantages of Durparian life, even the philosophy of the Adama, the oneness of all things. He bargained for days, until finally the king made the trade. He purchased the country of Estagund for the countries of Durpar and Var at a price of 24 gems. From Durpar he secured a promise of protection, and help integrating Estagund into the Durparian way of life. Thus were formed the Shining Lands.

Within a hundred years, the three countries shared a common way of life. With the added strength and resources of Estagund, Durparian merchants increased their trading range. They roamed as far east as Kara Tur, as far north as the Sea of Fallen Stars, and west to Dambrath and Halruaa. At the present time, with the newly discovered lands of Maztica and Zakhara beckoning, the future looks bright.

Estagund

Estagund history follows a different path than those of Durpar and Var. The Gunders were conquered in 551 DK by Reinhar I, warchief of the Arkaiuns of Dambrath. It regained its independence when Reinhar was slain by the Halruan archmage Mycontil. After regaining its independence, the country soon degenerated into a group of small independent city states.

Small skirmishes between the city-states, and with Var continued for several centuries, until a king once again united the country. King Bonrial was a skilled ruler, and Estagund began to prosper. His descendants were not as good, and in 1053 DR, King Selkarin was in an ambitious mood. He had failed to conquer Durpar, and Veldorn resisted his challenges. An avowed woman hater, Selkarin turned his attentions to Dambrath. He led a large fleet to attack Dambrath along the southern coast. His forces were beaten back with extreme losses, including his own life. Selkarin died childless. His brother, Seltarir, was crowned king. The new ruler faced a country with most of its young fighting men gone. In addition, he had a new problem to deal with: famine. The famine was caused by a blight that wiped out nearly all the year's crops in Estagund. This made him eager for the trade of Jeradeem. Contrary to popular rumor, he did not trade away the country for 24 pearls. Instead, Seltarir received diamonds worth almost a million gold pieces. The sudden wealth gave him an instant seat on the council of merchants. Chaka Seltarir is still the richest chaka in Estagund. In the years that followed, the Gunders began rebuilding their lives with a vengeance. Now, they compete on equal footing with the merchants of Durpar and Var. (For an explanation of chakas, see "Social Customs," page 58.)

Government and Politics

"All crimes are but one; theft. Stealing a man's money, health, pride, life, or goods are all equal crimes in the eyes of the Adama." — A maxim of Jeradeem.

Durpar, Var, and Estagund are ruled by a council of the eleven richest merchants in the Shining Lands. The decision of who qualifies as the richest is done by simple arithmetic. Whoever acquires the largest fortune is accorded the spot. Due to shifts in wealth, several seats on the council change each year. There are about thirty merchants who jostle for the bottom six rungs of the council.

Kara Jeratma, head of the Jeradea chaka and great-granddaughter of the incomparable Jer-

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

adeem, is the current chief of the council, just as every preceding head of her family has been for nearly two hundred years. The next four rungs of the council are held by Morcin of the Chaka Turamir in Huorm, Galduck of the Chaka Semanra in Pyratar, Halafin of Chaka Seltarir in Estagund, and Blynn the Wild, of the Baroda chaka of Turelve. All are incredibly wealthy, and their families are involved in nearly all of the businesses of the Shining Lands.

The Gemstone chaka, an extremely rich family of dwarves from Ormpe, is the council's first non-human member in almost 30 years. The Gemstone chaka was known as the Ironspur chaka until two years ago. A rich emerald strike in the mountains of Curna raised them from a moderately successful chaka to the eighth richest in the lands.

The business of the Shining Lands is business. Fraud is as serious a crime as murder. Both crimes impinge on the natural order of life in the kingdoms. Criminals are not executed, not even for the most heinous crimes. Capital punishment is seen as a serious offense against the Adama. Fines and forfeiture of goods or freedom are common, and terrible punishments. Those who use force against others are either restrained, or magically prevented from harming others again. Those who cheat or deceive in trade, or, worst of all, steal from others, can be faced with complete financial ruin. Three years ago one of the council members was convicted of selling faulty merchandise. The resulting fine dropped the chaka off the council and into obscurity.

In all cases a person is given only one chance.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

Repeat offenders find themselves restrained. In the case of a capital crime, the restraint lasts the rest of their lives. These depraved individuals are required to work out their lives in the mines, or on farms to offset the expense of their upkeep. A thief convicted a second time faces the loss of a hand. Such a mark usually means exile. "No one trusts a man with one hand."

The local governments are run much the same as the national ones. Each city has its Council of Merchants of the eleven richest merchants. Taxes are low, Durparians see bureaucracies as contrary to profit. Most cities have only the basic services such as police and fire fighting squads, clean up services, and record keepers. If a service can be handled by a private chaka, such services are contracted out. The Taramir chaka, for instance, offers garbage collection in many of the cities. The Chaka Firmstand in Zelpir has been responsible for protecting the city for over 80 years. Such chakas have a very lasting commitment to their jobs. Should the Chaka Firmstand attempt to take over, rather than defend the city, the loss of honor would doom the chaka to instant obscurity.

The leading merchant of a city is called the Nawab. He is responsible for appointing judges, hiring guardsmen, collecting taxes, and managing the other functions of the government. He is not expected to pay for these services himself. The taxes are a percentage of any profits the merchants in the city make. These funds pay for the services mandated by the council. Only the full council can make decisions on tax rates, new laws, and other broad decisions.

As in other lands, the people can make their will felt. If the judges and police are fair and the citizens are comfortable, the change to a new Nawab is accomplished with little upheaval. If the citizenry is unhappy sweeping changes in the council are made. Since profit is a driving force in this land, Nawabs can and do award city contracts to their own chakas. This can backfire. A Nawab needs to be sure his chaka can do at least as good a job as the competitors before he awards the contract, or his business could become the victim of a widespread boycott.

A boycott is the citizens' method of voting. A chaka without customers will soon lose its place on the city council. Of course a large percentage of the local citizens has to be stirred up before such a boycott is effective. The priests of Lucha are particularly effective at organizing such actions. They are always watchful for a chaka abusing its power in such fashion.

Taxes are generally low since they do not promote trade. The only tax that the merchants consider fair is a sales tax. This is commonly one percent on all sales done in the city. All accredited merchants respect this tax. It pays for protection as well as the city services. Out of the taxes collected, 25% goes to the national government. The rest is used at the local level.

People and Customs

"The shape and color of a being's body makes no difference to either the Adama or to the final tally of his gold." — A maxim of Jeradeem.

All races are part of the Adama, and are welcome in Durpar. Since Durparians believe that profit can be made from anyone with money, no Durparian merchant would blink if a dwarf or an orc walked into his shop and began to bargain.

The population is about 70% human, with halflings, dwarves, and half-elves making up the bulk of the rest. Elves are rare, for they do not prefer the competition for wealth that consumes the rest of the Durparians. There is, however, a small tribe of elves in the Ajmer Forest. They are devoted worshippers of the Adama. This tribe includes some of the most powerful priests in the land. Gnomes can be found in increasing numbers. The emerald find by the Gemstone chaka has caused an influx of gnomish gem workers. Two years ago, there were only a few gnomes in the land. Now they are a common sight in Ormpe.

The average Durparian is dark-skinned, almost ebony from exposure to the sun, and is around 5 1/2 feet tall. Other human types are common, since many folk have immigrated to Durpar.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

Languages

“Trading requires communication. Make sure you can speak to him before you show a man your wares.” —A maxim of Jeradeem.

Language is an important part of trade, and Durparian merchants are among the most polylingual of the Realms. For game purposes, assume that any merchant the characters meet speaks common, elvish, Thorass (the trading tongue of Amn), Akalan (the language of Dambrath), Midani (Zakharan common), dwarven, halfling, and at least three others. The other languages known depend on where the merchant does his trading. These could easily include hill giant, orcish or kobold. The “official” tongue of the lands is common, although meetings of the Council of Merchants can be carried out in any of a dozen languages. Most of the council members prefer to speak Thorass, since the council recognizes only the rich merchants of Amn as potential competitors in the world trading market.

Social Customs

“When a man is among his friends, he should enjoy his wealth. When a man is trading, he should trade.” — A maxim of Jeradeem.

Durparians are very enamored of wealth, but this is tempered by the teachings of the Adama. Durparians believe that showing off wealth that one does not possess is inappropriate, as is hiding one’s wealth. Therefore, both men and women are fond of wearing the richest clothes, gems, and accessories that they can afford.

Parties are frequent, lavish affairs which are generally just a front for more business. At these parties a shrewd trader can pick up a tip that could make him a huge profit later. Every sizable merchant chaka has at least two or three such festivals every year. Entertainments tend to be lavish, since they are an indication of how well the merchant chaka is doing. In day to day business, however, the feeling is a bit different. “A comfortable customer is ready to buy” is another maxim of the great Jeradeem. Durparian merchants go far to make their customers comfortable. Many merchants either have some illusion abilities, or employ someone who does, to present an atmosphere likeable to the customer. It would be an extreme offense against both the law, and the Adama, to use illusions to misrepresent the actual items for sale. A merchant that makes his customers comfortable by way of magic is following accepted and expected business practices. A drow who comes into a rich merchant shop may end up doing his business in a darkened room, with illusions of drow sculptures all about. A dwarf would be led to a room appearing to be a beautiful cave, gemstones gleaming from the walls. Whatever a merchant can do to make his customer more pliable will be done.

The basic social unit of the Shining Lands is the chaka. A chaka consists of a single extended family. The larger chakas, however, may have dozens of different families allied to them. The leader of the chaka, whether male or female, is usually the eldest family member. The best traders are usually out on business. If a younger sibling heads the chaka, it is because the older, more experienced sibling is usually off trying to make a huge deal for an immense profit.

Durparians show respect for each other by bowing. Indeed, who bows first and how deeply is a fine art in Durpar. According to strict social custom, the one closer to the Adama, or the richest, should bow first and more shallowly. The poorer, or most unenlightened, should bow last and deeper. The Adama requires respect when a Durparian meets a stranger. At these times, the average Durparian will wait to allow the stranger to bow first. This custom is not used by Durparians outside the Shining Lands. When traveling, a successful Durparian merchant will adopt the common form of greeting for the customer he is dealing with. “No man pays well a stranger, a friend is trusted. Greet all as friends, and you'll soon be on your way home with your pockets full," is a maxim attributed to Jeradeem.

It is seen as a spirit-raising gesture to donate to the truly poor. A few vellims given to the needy, however, may cost the chaka a seat on the Council of Merchants, so most chakas do not give money. Instead, chakas take in at least one or two destitute people each year, and attempt to find productive work for them. This custom helps reduce the number of slums and homeless in the Shining Lands. A surprisingly high number of such unfortunates become productive family members. All are accorded the status of a regular chaka member. An old beggar woman adopted into a chaka won't become head of the chaka, but she may be put in charge of the household.

Another maxim of Jeradeem reads "A thief leaves you with nothing to sell. Be prepared to defend your wares, for there are many who covet them." Most Durparians can defend themselves if need be. The average Durparian merchant away from the Shining Lands is, at least, a 4th-level fighter, a 6th-level thief (trader kit-see "Adventurers in the Shining Lands"), or a 5th-level mage. Most mages from the Shining Lands are illusion specialists. Not only is illusion magic quite effective, it is seen as a lesser offense against the Adama to slay someone with illusion magic, rather than with destructive magic. Victims of illusionary magic do not really die from the spell effect. Rather, they die from their belief in the effect (see PHB p. 82). If a victim dies, that is fate. The Durparian merchant lays claim to all the goods of his attacker, and leaves him lying in the dirt. Such is the way of Adama, to let those who harm others take their own chances.

Religion

"All gods are but part of the Adama. Do you hate your wife because she is a woman and you are a man? Hate not then those who worship a different aspect of the Adama." — From the teachings of Satama.

Durpar is probably the most tolerant of religion of any country in the Realms. Even evil gods can be worshipped, although those that demand human sacrifice are suppressed. The only religion actively opposed is that of worship of Mask, the patron of thieves.

The philosophy of the Adama, or "the One", is a vital part of Durparian life. The Adama is the world spirit that embraces and enfolds the divine essence that is part of all beings; gods, men, animals, plants, rocks, and all of their existence. Therefore everything is a manifestation of the Adama. Adama has no temples or priests in the common sense, for he is worshipped through his manifestations.

The philosophy of the Adama teaches that a man must be born many times before he can truly embrace unity with the Adama. Each reincarnation will reflect the man's previous life. Therefore, he must strive to better and improve himself during his lifetime. This is one of the reasons why killing and theft are considered such serious crimes. Such actions can condemn a person to be reincarnated as an animal in the next life.

Since all deities are considered aspects of the Adama, there are many with large followings in the Shining Lands. The largest are the sects of Lucha, she who guides; Curna, goddess of wisdom; Zionil, patron of inventors, craftsmen and creators; and Torm, the god of duty. Waukeen, god of trade, used to have a significant following. With the uncertainty of the god's fate in the Time of Troubles, most worshippers and even some priests have been accepted in Lucha's temples.

Money and Commence

"Quality goods always sell." — A maxim of Jeradeem.

A fiercely competitive people, the natives of the Shining Lands have channeled their warlike tendencies into a form of competition acceptable to the Adama. They are intent on becoming the best traders in the world.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

At the heart of the Durparian success is the Adama, the belief that one must do one's best. No Durparian would consider selling merchandise that wasn't of the finest quality he could obtain. If an item is less than perfect, he is required to say so. All trades must be conducted under fair conditions for both sides. Of course, different things are valuable to different people. As long as no fraud is involved, a merchant will try to get as much as he can for an item.

Commerce in Durpar is the driving force of the country. Most chakas of the Shining Lands have either a caravan, a trading ship, or several of both. The caravans roam far over the Realms in search of rare items to trade. The merchants believe that "the farther one travels, the higher the profit." In the past 50 years or so, the ships of Durpar have begun to travel far. Five years ago one returned with news of Zakhara, an entire civilized land several thousand miles to the south. Three years ago a fleet of six ships returned with news and goods from the land of Maztica. King Azoun's defeat of the Horde on the Golden Way has opened up trade with the east again. The merchants of Durpar are not letting these new trading fields go untouched.

Since Durparian merchants trade with the farthest corners of the known Realms, almost any item one desires can be found in the markets of the cities of the Shining Lands. Scrimshaw carvings from Icewind Dale, over 5,000 miles away, and exotic feathers from Maztica can be found in Durpar. Of course the price of such items is outrageous.

The average Durparian business is owned by a chaka. All members of the chaka work in some fashion, even in a small business. A large chaka is involved with many businesses. Different families within the chaka are usually responsible for different businesses. Every chaka desires to have a master trader in their folds. A master trader is someone who has returned with ten caravans, all of them profitable. The most notable master trader at the current time is Kara Jeratma, now serving on the council of merchants. She returned from Maztica three years ago, with ships laden with new and exotic goods. As head of the Chaka Jeradea, she is currently the major power in the land. Her daughter, Nadimi Jeratma, recently departed for Zakhara. She took a fleet of twenty trading ships. No word from her has been received yet, but great things are expected.

Merchants in Durpar hate fraud and deceit, and are skilled at recognizing it. Any sort of currency is welcome in the Shining Lands, but it is usually judged at the proper value. A Waterdhavian harbor moon is worth only two gold pieces outside of Waterdeep; that is what it is valued at in Durpar. A coin that appears to be gold but with less than a full gold content will eventually be discovered and honored for what it is worth. Passing counterfeit or gilded currency is a serious crime in the Shining Lands. Beyond that, money is money. Merchants are willing to take gems in trade. Most traders are proficient in appraisal. If not, they know someone who is. Of course, a fee is usually added, since the merchant will have to deal with a gem merchant to get his money.

Many new and previously unheard of products are coming out of Durpar. The Durparians realize that the best way to get control of a new market is to create it. Traders have begun large-scale exporting of the coffee grown in Durpar. This drink, which until recently has only been known in the southeastern lands, is becoming popular throughout the Realms.

The Durparians also make a number of items themselves. In fact, most of what Durpar trades is grown or made in the Shining Lands. Large caravans of grain and soft goods go north to Mulhorand, Unther, and Underhome. The invention of the field glass, a lens ground by gnomish smiths in the city of Ormpe, has given trading ships a huge advantage over pirates. These glasses are being exported for sale to ship captains along the Sea of Fallen Stars and the Sword Coast. Such a device is not magical, but does double the range of normal vision. A ship's lookout with this device can spot an unknown ship long before its lookout can spot them.

Other new products include ketjap, the combination of mingari and fruits of Maztica. Mingari, a potent spice similar to cinnamon (and grown only in Ulgarth), and Curna emeralds, emeralds with a turquoise glow inside, are currently very popular among the rich of Calimshan. The Gemstone chaka of dwarves has sent several caravans on the long dangerous trek. The first has already returned, laden with silks, gems, and other goods from Calimshan.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

Durparian merchants nearly always get the best of any deal. They do so because they always operate from a position of strength. They're superlative bargainers, as well. Every family or chaka has at least one member with a proficiency in bargaining, and usually one with appraisal skill as well.

The ability to read and write is common. Durparians have the highest percentage of literacy of any large nation in the Realms. A master trader can often pick up a new language, including reading and writing, in a very short time. A caravan going to trade with the Dwarves of Underhome may speak nothing but dwarvish the last week of the trip in order to get used to the language. Durparian merchants strongly believe that conversing with a being in his own language is the proper way to trade. This effect is summed up at the end of this section where the new proficiency, Linguistics, is presented. It is the ability to learn to converse in a different language in a short time. Most master traders have this proficiency, as well.

If PCs wish to travel all the way to Durpar to buy something, they can probably find it. Just consider the place of origin and rarity of the item, and increase the price proportionately. A 100 gp scrimshaw carving from Icewind Dale may be priced at 6,000 gold pieces in Heldapan. A dozen exotic feathers from Maztica, worth 5 gold pieces in Helmsport, can cost up to 1000 gold pieces each in Durpar.

Durparian merchants love to bargain. Bargaining is the consuming passion in their life. All of the bargaining tricks used elsewhere in the world are known here. Every trick that does not involve fraud is used. One Amnish merchant said, as he exited a wine shop, "Eight hours of bargaining to buy a single bottle of wine, and still I was bettered. This is a wonderful land."

Cities of Durpar

The cities of the Shining Lands are both numerous and prosperous. While there are few (if any) slums, large, impressive marketplaces abound. Most of the markets have regular stalls, with awnings for shade. The cities are usually well defended, although none have large standing armies. Members of the merchant's guild are obligated to supply guards in the event of an attack on the city. Chakas near the borders usually pool their forces to create a guard force somewhat larger than that of the cities.

Heldapan

Heldapan, the largest city in the Shining Lands, is the capital of the region. This Durparian city, which boasts a population of 50,000, is home to the powerful Council of Merchants. It has the largest trading market to the east of the huge markets of Amn. Literally anything in the world can be found here.

All of the "Chakas of 31," the leading chakas in the Shining Lands, have at least some sort of headquarters in Heldapan. It is here that the decisions of the council are handed down and here that the biggest deals are made.

The town boasts huge docks, capable of handling over a hundred ships at once. The docks are always busy. Ships can sail the Golden Waters, even during the rainy season, so trade continues undiminished.

Pyratar

Pyratar is the capital of Var the Golden and the second largest city in the lands. It has a population of almost 45,000. The city is completely shielded from any of the winter storms, and the fishing is bountiful. The docks in Pyratar are just as large, and just as busy as those of Heldapan.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

The vast wheat farms of Var lie to the south.

The incredibly wealthy Semenra chaka makes its home in Pyratar. They are involved in nearly all of the businesses in the city. They own thousands of acres of wheat fields, and many herds of aurochs and sheep. They are the leading supplier of wool in Durpar. In addition, they have a skilled family of gemcutters in their chaka.

The city is also the home of a growing sect of Mask worshippers, who are trying to take over first the city, and then the entire nation. The sect preys on caravans from Zelpir and Kolapar, since any robberies in the city would certainly bring the attention of the local Council of Merchants. The leader, Kelsipal, of Chaka Turamir, is a master trader, and above suspicion. He is also an 11th level priest of Mask, with every intention of advancing his patron deity and his personal power.

Klionna

Klionna is the old capital of Estagund, and the home of the extremely wealthy Seltarir chaka. It is a large city with over 25,000 residents. The Seltarir chaka got its start when the founder, the former king of Estagund, sold the country to the great Jeradeem. Instead of being hated for it, the Seltarir chaka is seen as having rescued the country from poverty.

The city is situated on the somewhat protected Bay of Kings, away from the brunt of the winter storms on the Great Sea. Many fishing boats go out on the Sea from Klionna. The Seltarir chaka employs ten warships of its own, in addition to the five the city has on patrol, to prevent raids from the pirates of Dambrath. As the port closest to Dambrath, the city is still subject to overland raids almost every year. It has a standing force of 1,000 crossbowmen and 20 illusionists on call at all times. The mages range from 6th to 12th level, so the city is very well defended.

Ormpe

Ormpe is the fastest growing city in the Shining Lands. The city began as merely the location of ironworks, but in the past two years it has nearly doubled its population. Over 20,000 people now reside there. This rapid population growth has far exceeded the merchant council's expectations. Of all cities in the Shining Lands, Ormpe is the only one with large slum areas. The Quarter of No Hope, as the slums are called, are not actually within the city walls at all. Almost 5,000 residents live just outside the stonework. Most eke out a living as migrant grain workers. Many continue to try for a high-paying mining job. Unfortunately for the slum residents, the Gemstone family, the leading chaka in the city prefers to employ dwarven miners and gnomish gemcutters. They and the Finglefall chaka have signed a trade alliance. Anyone who wishes to work with the famous Curna emeralds must have connections with one of these two chakas.

Ormpe has a high population of demihumans, particularly dwarves and gnomes, with many halflings as well. The Baker chaka of halfings has one of its largest outlets in Ormpe. In a rare burst of generosity they have made all of their day-old goods available at no cost to the poor in the Quarter of No Hope.

Myrmyr

The city of Myrmyr is a middling town of about 10,000 residents. Myrmyr is primarily concerned with defending the Golden Waters from pirates, so that they can ship huge loads of grain to other countries in the Shining South. The grain markets in Myrmyr are second in size only to those in great Pyratar. Myrmyr also has the best shipbuilding facilities in the Shining Lands. The wealthy Sholapur chaka owns much of the island of Ships, and has its shipyards located there. Wood from the Ajmer Forest is brought from Morvar. Here the craftsmen of the Sholapurs fashion it into the best merchant ships in the nation.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

The Jaipur chaka, which owns many thousands of acres of farmland, is the most successful sea trading chaka in the Shining Lands. They were one of the first families to cooperate on the expeditions to Maztica, and have been enormously successful. The Jaipur chaka is hoping to challenge the Baroda chaka next year for the fifth seat on the council.

Zelpir

Zelpir is a smallish city with a population of 8,000, situated on the south coast of the Golden Waters. It is known for intricate jewelry, and clever mechanical gadgets which rival the Lantannan works of the Gondsmen. Here one can buy water clocks, wind up toys, and the valuable field glasses. Zelpir also ships much grain north across the Golden Waters, where it is loaded onto caravans bound for Mulhorand and Unther.

Zelpir's location — it's the closest port to Haldapan — makes it the natural place from which landowners ship their grains north. It is a growing city, but the merchants are careful about who gets established there. Anyone wishing to open a business in Zelpir must have a license granted by the city council.

Sezilinta

Sezilinta is a city of 17,000 located on the northern coast of the Golden Waters, southeast of the Giant's Belt mountains. It has many ironworkers and silver smiths, for the mountains yield plenty of raw ore for the craftsmen. Sezilinta is also known for the fine cotton cloths it produces. The farms north of Sezilinta grow mostly cotton and flax, used to produce linen. A large number of weavers live here, producing much of the cloth that is shipped north to Mulhorand and Unther. The clocks of the city are the smallest on the Golden Waters. Ships prefer to make for Huorm to the east, or Turelve to the west. The first is closer to Haldapan, the second is closer to the caravan routes north and west.

Turelve

The jumping off place for the caravans north and west, Turelve is a large city of 30,000. It is a favored trading spot, located on the west end of the Golden Waters, at the mouth of the River Sarren. Through this city flow many of the goods that are exported from the Shining Lands.

The border with the monster-filled lands of Veldorn make this the most precarious place to live in the Shining Lands. The caravans to and from the city are frequently raided. Turelve has the largest standing force in Durpar, almost 2,000 well-armed horsemen. Several companies of halfling slingers man the city walls. This is paid for, in part, by a caravan tax. For five percent of the value of their caravans, merchants can join a city-sponsored caravan, and have guards protect them until they are well past Veldorn.

This tax causes much grumbling, but nearly all sensible merchants pay it. The risk of losing their investment is too great not to pay.

Morvar

Morvar has the broadest racial mix of any city in the Shining Lands. Dwarven and gnomish smiths, halfling craftsmen, elven and half-elven bards and woodworkers, even the occasional orcish guard can be seen mingling with the swarthy Durparians and the lighter Ulgarthians.

The city is large, with a population over 20,000. Morvar has extensive smithies and weaving facilities. It is here that the cotton grown south of the Ajmer forest is brought. The wood from the forest also ends up here, where the great sawmills of the Karakil chaka shape it into boards for shipment to other parts of the Shining Lands. Morvar also has a good trading relationship with merchants in Surbar, in neighboring Ulgarth.

Orpher

Orpher is located on the northwestern coast of the Golden Waters, on the mouth of the River Sarren. Its largest merchant chaka is not actually a chaka at all, but an adventuring company, the Trollslayers. The company has merged with several other smaller families, and has become a powerful trading chaka. Without the continuing treasures recovered from the ruins of the Raurin desert and the lairs of giants in the Giant's Belt mountains, the chaka would not long stay in power. The soirees given by the Trollslayers are some of the most elaborate in all of Durpar.

The current leader of the chaka, and Nawab of the city, is Jekhal Windsinger, a priest of Torm. He runs the city very well, and is also doing his best to diversify and invest their wealth. The other members of the original Trollslayer company don't agree with his policies.

Flyndagol

The northernmost city of Durpar, Flyndagol is the nearest to the Raurin desert, and is the hottest and most uncomfortable city in the Shining Lands. It is also the first line of defense for Durpar against both Ulgarth and the orcs of the Mountains of War. Flyndagol trades with the elves of the Ajmer forest. Many fine woodworkers live in Flyndagol.

The daily heat has given this city a different daily schedule than the rest of the Shining Lands. Most businesses open after the main heat of the day, and stay open through the best part of the night. Streets are lit by continual light spells. Most businesses also have such effects, since even the mild heat given off by a lantern can make a building seem unbearable.

Flyndagol has a standing force of 1,000 troops, most posted along the border. Orc raids are frequent. The elves from the forest have worked out an alliance with the city, providing archers in case of actual attacks on the city. In return, Flyndagol patrols aid the elves with particularly troublesome monsters in the Ajmer forest.

Thruldar

Thruldar lies on the borders with the halfling land of Luiren. As one would imagine, the Baker chaka of halflings does a thriving business in exotic foodstuffs here. The population of Thruldar is almost one-third halfling. Most inns have special facilities, such as lower tables or higher stools.

Thruldar has a thriving business in woodworking, so many halfling craftsmen reside here. Wood from the Long Forest is shipped all over the Shining Lands and Luiren. The forest is vast and, in the east, untamed. Monster's and bandits prey on caravans as they pass along the great Trade Way. Most of Thruldar's standing forces are used to guard caravans along this road. The road runs under the shadows of the forest for only a few dozen miles, after this travel is relatively safe. One-third of the 300 members of Thruldar's guard force are halflings.

The town also has several forest patrols, led by the half-elven ranger Sulima Fastwood. These patrols roam the forest, driving out monsters and hunting down bandits.

The Cochin chaka has their headquarters here. Almost half of this small town of 9,000 are occupied with working for, or with, this chaka. Their huge warehouses dominate the town. Sawmills and woodworking shops abound. The town is a festive place. Tymora, goddess of luck, and Silvanus, god of the forest, have the largest temples here.

Lastarr

Lastarr is a booming town of 10,000, where anyone can come to trade. Of course, most Durparian merchants will deal with anyone whose money is good, but Lastarr takes this to the extreme. There are few other places in the Realms where one might bump into a beholder coming out of a shop, or a vampire requesting a night appointment with a tailor. Such things are commonplace in Lastarr.

Lastarr was once part of Estagund, but when the great trade of Jeradeem took place, Lastarr refused to be part of it. The city seceded from the Shining Lands, and became an independent city. With the philosophy of the Adama so strong in Durpar, the city has never been retaken. It enjoys an open trading status with all nearby cities. It is here that the monstrous inhabitants of Veldorn, to the northwest, come to shop.

Lastarr is open to all, and business must not be hampered by unseemly quarrels between potential customers. Just because a drow elf and a high elf walk into a shop at the same time is no reason for a fight. It's bad for business. Therefore, Lastarr has the most active police force of any in the Shining Lands. Over 20 patrols of 10 men are out at all times. Each group has a mage, usually an illusionist or enchanter, and a priest, usually one of Lucha, for the god of guides is favored in Lastarr. The patrols are also likely to have an ogre or a cyclopskin with them. These creatures tend to impress the wilder customers.

Foods from Luiren, horses from Dambrath, and goods from the caravan raids all find their way here. Most merchants in Lastarr do not ask where a seller obtained his goods, since such inquiries are considered bad form. Doing so might be dangerous to the merchant. Because of this no-questions-asked policy, merchants here buy goods for much less than they would elsewhere in the Shining Lands, and then resell these goods for a very high profit.

Places of Interest

The Golden Waters

This huge lake is a wondrous place, source of many of the riches of Durpar. There are abundant food fish, including one particularly succulent variety of red snapper, which is harvested in large numbers by the fishermen of the cities on the lake. It is home to many other fish, and is protected from the winter storms that hit the Great Sea.

The water has a very high mineral content. At sunrise and sunset, the lake water has a golden glow, which gives the waters their name. The majority of cities in the Shining Lands cluster around the lake. Cooling breezes begin to blow in off the lake about an hour before dusk, and drop the sweltering temperatures in the surrounding cities by 20 degrees or more. The beauty of the lake and mild nights make living along its shores enjoyable.

The lake has a number of small islands. The largest, called Isle of Ships, holds the Sholapur chaka's massive shipyards. Other islands are used as shipbuilding facilities, but none are as large as the Isle of Ships. One of the islands, little Karatol island, is made exclusively of purple coral. It is the source for much of the Durparian coral jewelry that is being shipped out of the country.

Ajmer Forest

Home of the only sizable group of elves in Durpar, the Ajmer Forest is a tropical rain forest. The elves there have adapted to a rough style of life, with only such luxuries as they can trade for with Flyndagol.

The elves embrace the way of the Adama, with especial care for the forest. Trees are not cut down wantonly. Loggers are expected to show some thought in exactly which trees are cut down. In return, the elves condone limited logging. Mahogany, in particular, is a frequent bone of contention between the loggers and the elves. It is the most valuable wood that the loggers can take, but it takes the longest to regrow.

The southern forest is home to many monsters. The forest is home to thousands of monkeys, tigers, ocelots, jaguars, and a couatl that lives on the southeastern edge of the forest. There is even a rumor that a rakshasa noble has headquarters within the Ajmer.

Curna Mountains

The small mountain range of the Curna mountains is the location of the richest emerald find in recent history. The now wealthy Gemstone chaka was once a small chaka of dwarven miners. They discovered tracings of an old map that led them to large clear emeralds. Such emeralds, which have a turquoise light in the center, are known as Curna emeralds, not only because they come from the Curna Mountains, but also because the Gemstone chaka are devout worshippers of Curna. In addition to the emerald mines, the library of the priests of Curna is located in the mountains of their god. The library is a huge complex, since, eventually, all records of all important business transactions in the Shining Lands end up here. There are many scholars lodging in Ormpe, or at the hostels surrounding the library.

The upper mountains are home to leucrotta, manticore, a medusa with a magic fetish, and two very large rocs. Other than the rocs, who prey on the shepherds south of Pyratyr, the monsters keep pretty much to themselves. Most Durparians feel that the mountains are sacred, so mountain climbing in this range is usually frowned upon.

Wood of Dark Trees

The Wood of Dark Trees is not a typical tropical forest. To start with, the forest is infested with flying snakes, a dangerous species with an acid spray. Flying snakes are a danger anywhere in the Shining Lands, but they are thick in the Wood of Dark Trees.

Yet another danger of the wood is the mated pair of chimerae who consider this small wood their own property. The flying snakes have learned to leave them alone. The pair even have snakes guarding their lair.

The trees in the Wood are also strange. The wood is a steamy rain forest, but the trees all have a dark, almost black bark. The wood is normal cypress or palm, but the bark is discolored. Moss does not seem to grow as quickly on these trees as other forests in the Shining South. There are many legends about logging or adventuring companies entering the forest, only to be surrounded by hostile animated trees. Most caravans give the Wood a wide berth. The wood of Dark Trees is thought to be where an evil mage created the Dark Trees, a new monster presented at the end of this book.

The Dustwall Mountains

The Mountains of War, or the Mountains of Adama, as they are also called, are a high range that form a barrier between the Raurin desert and north Durpar. No one has ever climbed Mama's Wrath, the tallest peak in the range.

Orcs are numerous in the Mountains of War. Their total population exceeds that of the Shining Lands. No one is sure what their numbers are, but with these chaotic creatures, a possible attack force of 5,000 orcs is an optimistic guess. They are said to be preparing for a major attack. This is enough to worry the leaders of both Flyndagol in Durpar, and Suormpar in Ulgarth. The two cities are currently hiring mercenaries, in preparation for the attack.

The mountains also have rich iron deposits. There is quite a bit of mining by dwarves who aren't afraid of the orcs. These mines have barely scratched the surface of the mineral potential here, but the orcs control over 95% of the mountains. Even the dwarves are not foolish enough to push into an orcish homeland.

The mountains are also home to vast numbers of ogres, giants, wyerns, and cyclopskin. Several rakshasa, intent on carving out an empire with their orc slaves, have set up residence here.

Toadsquat Mountains

Ogres dominate in the "Little Mountains," as the Toadsquat range is known. Silver mines also abound here. The dwarves who work the mines have cleared the tribes of ogres away from the routes to the mines in the eastern range. These roads are patrolled by dwarves, and have remained safe for fifty years.

An ogre mage named Kalispar has started organizing the ogres on the western side of the range. Since his attacks have been directed at Luiren, the dwarves have not had to deal with him yet.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

Adama's Tooth

Adama's Tooth is the name given to the single high peak that overlooks the city of Huorm. This mountain stands by itself, towering 21,000 feet above the plain, which brings an early dusk to the city of Huorm, some 25 miles away. It has rich iron and copper deposits. Recently, the Salipur chaka has tried two ventures on Adama's Tooth. The first was the opening of copper mines, some ten years ago. That venture has been very successful. The second was an expedition to bring ice back from the peak, and ship it packed in magical containers to other cities in Durpar and Var. That venture proved to be a colossal blunder, and has been dropped.

The upper slopes of Adama's Tooth are home to the only known tribe of yeti for several thousands of miles. They prey on the mountain goats that are common on the upper slopes. Lower down pines trees grow. These are harvested and brought down the mountain with difficulty. The expense of shipping pine from the north makes the troubles seem small by comparison. Even though the yeti snatch a few loggers every season, the logging continues.

Veldorn, Land of Monsters

Veldorn is a land dominated by monsters, and is primarily tribal in organization. It does not have formal boundaries, but, instead, a collection of small city-states stretch west and north to the beginnings of the Shaar, and the Wood of Dark Trees.

The original premise of Veldorn was that any beast-chieftain, as the leaders are known, could set up and run his area as desired. Anyone who incurs the wrath of one beast-chieftain incurs the wrath of all. The chieftains raid the caravans along the great Trade Way, and bring their goods to Lastarr.

The leader of the land is a centuries old vampire named Saed, a psionist of great skill. His primary duty is to settle disputes. There are few other government activities in Veldorn. Saed resides in Vaelan, the capital of Veldorn, a small city filled with undead, orcs, and gnolls. He is respected and feared, even by his chief rivals, Xaoch and Veoyh, a pair of beholder twins who rule Xiltor, a city south of the Wood of Dark Trees. Xiltor is home to several tribes of kobolds, and a large group of ogres. The twins also employ a black dragon as their aerial fighting force. The dragon is Kelpacitus, a young adult who is just hoping to gain treasure.

There are other cities in Veldorn. No one claims to have knowledge of them all, although Saed probably does. It is known that one is ruled by a red dragon, who is served by several pyrolisks. Another is inhabited entirely by yuan-ti. Flying snakes are common throughout the land, and herds of auroch and wild rothe are culled for food. More on Saed's city can be found in the "Dark as Dark" adventure in Chapter 6.

NPCs of Durpar

Kara Jeratma

Leader of the Council of Merchants

14th-level Human female illusionist: Str 7, Dex 16, Con 9, Int 17, Wis 13, Cha 18; AL LG; AC 5; MV 12; hp 39; THAC0 16; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 (staff): SZ M; ML 16. Spells 6/6/6/5/5/3/3

Where Found: Heldapan

Kera is the richest woman in Durpar, and one of the richest in the Realms. Her chaka, the largest in Durpar, is worth tens of millions of gold pieces.

Kera is a vibrant, beautiful woman. She uses this to her advantage. Many traders do not believe that a woman so beautiful can bargain so successfully. They soon learn, usually at great expense, that they are quite wrong.

Before rising to lead her chaka, Kera led over 20 caravans to faraway lands. She is one of the most successful traders in the history of Durpar. Chaka Jeradeem has over 5,000 members, and Kera can call upon any of them. Kera is a staunch supporter of the Adama. Although she never misrepresents anything she is trading, she knows every trading trick in the book. She has even made up a few new ones. The primary reason for her success is that she takes the time to prepare properly. If the PCs are involved in a trade with Kera, she does everything possible to make them comfortable. She will know their preferences in food and drink, and as much as she can learn about their background. The PCs may be amazed at her knowledge, but it is just good business.

Kera speaks over 20 languages, and prides herself on being able to converse with anyone who understands the precepts of trading.

Lata Hisim

4th-level half-elf female thief (trader): SW 11, Dex 14, Con 12, Int 15, Wis 12, Cha 14; AL NC; AC 8; MV 12; hp 20; THAC0 18; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 (short sword); SZ M; ML 12.

Where Found: The Shining Lands

Lata is a tropical trader. She is an expert in all forms of gems and jewels. When encountered she is looking for a deal. She is perfectly willing to buy or sell. She does not lie about the value of gems; she knows exactly what they are worth. She can even identify rare gems from halfway across the world.

Lata is very polite. She has her eye on becoming a master trader. With a little luck, she may someday make it. Lata is a wandering trader, allied to the incredibly wealthy Seltarir chaka. She does not mention her affiliation unless necessary, since she would like to succeed on her own reputation.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

Jromin

7th-level elf male priest (Curna): Str 13, Dex 12, Con 13, Int 14, Wis 17, Cha 15 ; AL LN; AC 6; MV 12; hp 42; THAC0 16; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 (staff): SZ M; ML 18. Spells 5/5/3/1

Where Found: The Ajmer Forest

Jromin is the spiritual leader of the elves of the Ajmer Forest. He is a devout priest of Curna, greater power of wisdom. A saying among the elves is that Jromin is the reason there are no druids in the Ajmer Forest; "He won't stand for anyone that sloppy in his woods." This is a bit extreme, but Jromin does consider the forest his personal responsibility. He can be extremely vicious to defilers of the forest. Anyone who enters the Ajmer Forest is probably being watched by Jromin. He is very crafty in the woods. Unless the party begins to chop down trees or wantonly slaughter wildlife, they'll never see him. Jromin is a sworn enemy of Crimonil, whom he believes to be an evil human mage.

Crimonil

Rakshasa male: Int 12; AL LE; AC -4; MV 15; HD 7, hp 47; THAC0 13; #AT 3; Dmg 1-3/1-3/2-5: SA illusion; SD +1 or better magical weapon to hit; MR special; SZ M; ML 16; XP 4,000; MC 1. Spells: Wizard 4/3/2, Priest 3 first-level.

Where Found: The Ajmer Forest

Crimonil is a typical rakshasa. He is power hungry, cruel, and extremely intelligent. He intends to bring the entire forest under his sway.

Crimonil typically appears as a human mage, an act he has nearly perfected. He has entrapped and killed many a lone human mage. Crimonil is very fond of traps that allow the victims to believe they have a chance to escape. Many of his victims have escaped through superhuman efforts, only to find that those efforts were all in vain.

Bilaska Semenir

12th-level human female thief (trader): Str 12, Dex 16, Con 15, Int 12, Wis 10, Cha 17; AL LN; AC 5; MV 12; hp 50; THAC0 15; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6+1 (short sword +1): SZ M; ML 14.

Where Found: Prastuil

Bilaska is a master trader, and she's quite proud of it. She can be encountered anywhere in the Realms—anywhere that profit can be made. Her latest expedition recently, returned from Mztica. Her next is intended for Zakhara.

Bilaska will go anywhere to trade. Her most famous trade was with beings from the stars. Actually, she encountered a group of elves whose spelljamming ship had crashed. She could not speak their language, nor could they speak hers. Within a week, she had traded them supplies, weapons, food, and whatever else they needed in return from a dozen gems that are completely unknown in the Realms. It is this sort of opportunistic trading that makes a master trader. Bilaska has every intention that her chaka will one day be the most powerful in the Shining Lands. They are currently second, but with traders like Bilaska, they may yet reach their goal.

Hobnap Baker

11th-level halfling male thief (fence): Str 9, Dex 19, Con 12, Int 16, Wis 13, Cha 10; AL CG; AC 4; MV 12; hp 52; THAC0 15; #AT 1; Dmg 1d4+2 (dagger +2); SZ S; ML 16.

Where Found: Heldapan

Hobnap is the head of the only thieves' guild in the Shining Lands. He is not particularly greedy,

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

but he does love a good challenge. In fact, Hobnap cannot resist a challenge or a dare. "They said it couldn't be done," was his only reason for founding such a guild. He has pulled off a number of escapades which are gaining him more notoriety than he wishes. His most famous was sneaking into a meeting of the Council of Merchants two months ago. He came away with some valuable information, which he sold to the right bidder. Since then, the Council of Merchants has figured out that someone spied on them. If Hobnap is caught, he faces the loss of all he owns. Since Hobnap is rich, he has no intention of ever getting caught. He has the skills to pull this off, but not if he keeps up his flair for dangerous jobs.

Hobnap's guild is supposed to be honorable. That is, they do not steal from the poor, only from those who can afford it. While Hobnap sticks to this rule unerringly, some others in the guild have a more liberal attitude. They have taken to pilfering from caravans and entering citizens' homes at night. As soon as the Council of Merchants becomes aware that there is a thieves' guild operating under their very noses, a man-hunt such as Durpar has never seen will ensue. Hobnap is no fool; by then, he'll be safely back in Luiren.

Adventurers in The Shining Lands

The philosophy of the Adama is improving oneself to the fullest until ready for the next step. This means that adventurers are welcome and respected. The ready cash that adventurers usually carry also makes them welcome.

As is to be expected, magic is both accepted and much used in the Shining Lands. The Gathering of Magicians, a school for mages, is located in Heldapan. It is a favored place for illusionists to study. There is a currently a two-year wait for admittance. As in all things in the Shining Lands, "Money can make openings where there were none."

All non-evil religions are tolerated in the Shining Lands. Most priests can find at least a shrine to their deity in most of the major cities.

Fighters and rangers are valued as guards and guides, no chaka can have too many defenders. Rogues are not popular. The only active thieves' guild in the lands is located in Heldapan. Rogues are still common, but nearly all of those rogues native to the Shining Lands prefer to use either the adventurer kit, the investigator kit, or the trader kit, presented here.

New Thief Kit

The Trader

Description: This is the crafty merchant, usually working within the law. The merchant is expert at appraising an item's worth, and knowing exactly how much profit can be made. Few get the better of a trader in a trade.

Role: The trader represents the adventuring storekeeper, the master trader, the individual who is much more than a merchant, given the things she or he's seen. Although she may be a crafty business owner who's never left her hometown, she is more likely to be a world-traveling caravan master, or the master trader representing her chaka in a faraway country. The majority of Durparian merchants one meets in foreign lands are traders.

A successful merchant requires a good mind to negotiate and evaluate goods, merchants must have an intelligence of at least 12.

Secondary Skills: The most useful for the merchant is trader/barterer, although jeweler, leather worker, mason, or teamster are all acceptable.

Weapon Proficiencies: Successful merchants must learn to defend themselves against all types of thieves. A merchant has available the normal range of weapons for thieves, but the light crossbow is the favored weapon of the trader. It can be stowed easily under the counter in one's shop, or under the wagon seat while on caravan. All traders must take either light crossbow, dagger or knife (thrown), or some other small throwing weapon which can be used both indoors and out. Other proficiencies are up to individual choice, but a trader seldom uses a large, ostentatious weapon.

Nonweapon Proficiencies: Bonus proficiencies: (Thief) Appraisal. Recommended proficiencies: Information Gathering, Observation, Languages (as many as possible), Forgery (used to recognize false documents and counterfeit currency), Linguistics and Alertness.

Skill Progression: The trader has little need for many of the thief's skills. The trader concentrates on moving silently and hearing noises. These allow a trader to pick up information from other conversations that may be of aid in later business deals. Time on the trail can teach a trader the value of being able to hide in shadows effectively, and any sort of travel makes the Reading Languages skill very useful.

Equipment: There are two things vital to the trader: something to sell, and a place to sell it. The place may be as basic as the back of a wagon, or a tent in the marketplace. Many traders do not even own a set of lock picks, nor do they go in for fancy devices like climbing boots or grappling arrows. A trader usually is armed with a small weapon, either visible or hidden, depending on the custom of the trader's present location.

Special Benefits: Traders not only receive the Appraisal skill free, but get a +1 bonus to their ability with this skill. Traders can also choose a particular type of merchandise at which their appraisal knowledge is expert, such as jewels, gems, leather goods, spices, or some other broad field. In this field, a trader fails an appraisal only on a natural roll of a 20. The trader knows almost all there is to know about this particular type of merchandise. Identification of a brand new gem from a faraway land may be much more difficult. The DM should assign penalties based on the likelihood of the trader having ever heard of such an item before. Even when dealing with such rare items, the trader's estimate of their worth won't be off by more than 20%. Even without knowing exactly what it is, a trader probably has a good idea of what it should sell for. Traders can choose one field of expertise for every four levels of experience. Note that this modification to the appraisal proficiency does not allow the trader to know all of the properties of a strange item, nor even to identify it; she just knows what it will be worth in this area.

Special Hindrances: A trader cannot resist a bargain. Successful traders would much rather buy something cheaply, than steal something outright. Therefore, any money gained through outright theft is worth only one experience point per gold piece, instead of the two points for normal thieves. This does not include the trader who helps a party fight off bandits, and is rewarded with a share of treasure found on the bandits. The trader receives full experience points, two times the gold pieces earned, for money gathered this way, or in trade.

Wealth Option: All traders start with twice the normal starting gold, 4d6x10. This may be spent any way the player desires.

Races: All races may take the trader kit.

Notes: It is not expected that all your players will immediately clamor to roll up a trader rogue. This kit is presented for those few enterprising characters who wish to try something different, or for the suffering DM. How many times have the players asked "What is he?", and the DM has had to respond; "A merchant. I guess that's a 0 level human, he probably has about 3 hit points, and uh, a longsword."

Durparian merchants have learned to defend themselves and their goods. If the PCs think that they can muscle a poor trader around, they're in for a surprise. The master traders mentioned in the description of commerce are at least 10th-level trader rogues; most are higher.

Durpar, Estagund, and Var The Golden

Linguistics: New nonweapon proficiency

(General)

2 slots: Intelligence, +1 modifier

Recommended: Traders.

This skill is only available to someone who speaks at least three languages. The contrasts of the different styles of languages give the character knowledge to base this skill on. A character with this proficiency is adept at quickly picking up enough of a new language to be understood. Players who choose this proficiency do not select any languages. Instead, there are four open slots in this proficiency. The PC must spend a week in a location where a language she or he does not presently know is spoken. After this week, the PC makes an intelligence check to pick up enough of the language to be understood and carry on daily activities. Spending a week with a tutor also grants this roll. If the roll is failed, the PC can try again the next day, and each subsequent day until the roll succeeds. This allows the PC to converse, albeit with a terrible accent, in the new language. This is not a replacement for the normal language proficiency. Traders with linguistics can make themselves understood, and understand basic dialog.

A character may learn these languages "on the fly," so to speak, but may never have more than four at one time. If a character has used the full allotment for, say, dwarven, Thorass, orcish, and gnomish, and wants to learn to converse in far-off Zakhara, the PC must drop one of the existing languages. It should be the language that the character has not used in the longest amount of time. The dropped language is considered out of practice and forgotten. A player may take this proficiency more than once; each slot subsequent to the first adds two languages to the number of languages the PC can retain.

Ulgarth

General Description

Ulgarth shares a well-defended border with the trading countries of Durpar and Var the Golden. It occupies the east coast of the Golden Water, the bay from which much of its prosperity comes. Ulgarth is a peaceful nation, but it is well prepared to defend itself against either raids by Dambrath and the Horde, or the constant attempts by Durparian traders to control their economy.

Geography and Climate

Ulgarth is located on the Great Sea, with Durpal to its immediate west, and the uncharted vastness of the barbarians to the east. The Great Sea makes up a good part of its borders. The north is bounded by the Dustwall mountains.

Ulgarth is hot, but its proximity to the Great Sea and to the Golden Waters help to make it a livable place. During the day, the temperatures range from 80 to 100. At night, the temperature drops sharply down to 60 or less in the winter rainy season. It rains almost daily in Ulgarth. The crops and fields are very fertile.

Ulgarth is the only country in the Realms, where mingari, its primary export, is grown and blended. Ulgarth trades mingari with the Durparians, who ship it all over the southern Realms.

History

Ulgarth was settled by the great empire of Raurin, in the height of its power. When the empire was destroyed, it endured centuries of barbarism. Warchiefs united the country several times during this period. They fought many skirmishes with other barbarians, particularly those in Durpar and Var the Golden. In DR 202, the barbarian tribes were nearly wiped out by the forces of Mulhorand.

In 348 DR, a group of outlaws, fleeing the justice of the priest-kings of Mulhorand, came to Ulgarth. There they found a fertile, almost unoccupied land. They settled down, and began raising children and crops. This new society in Ulgarth gradually grew in power, while its neighbors Durpar and Var grew apace. But while Durpar grew as a result of its commerce and its philosophy of balance, Ulgarth concentrated on agrarian pursuits. The Ulgarthians developed a highly structured caste system of lords and peasants. In 1002 DR, the centuries long skirmishes between Durpar and Ulgarth came to an end, as the two countries finally reached a balance of power. There were too many centuries of warfare between the countries for them to completely trust each other. With their mutual border well defended on both sides, both countries have given up the idea of conquering the other.

Trade between the Ulgarth and the Shining Lands has become a vital factor to both nations. Ulgarth produces many of the items that Durparians trade throughout the world. In return, Durpar trades many exotic items to Ulgarth. Of course, the Durparian merchants usually get the better of any trade. The current king, Drasna the Fortunate, has continued on his predecessor's policy of non-aggression with the Durparians.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Ulgarth is a monarchy, ruled by King Drasna Bluemantle in Orvyltar. It has a clear border with Durpar, across the river Xon and the Xonaluir Bay. The land is divided into six baronies, with each baron reporting directly to the king. Each baron is also responsible for providing troops for the country's army. The king maintains his own troops as well.

The current general of the Ulgarth forces is Sinveri Trollkin, a renegade female elf from Dambrath. Although she is one-quarter drow, she is a devout worshiper of Tyr, the god of war and justice. She is an intelligent and able leader.

The barons have the option of serving as the ranking officers of their own contingents of troops, or of appointing field officers in their place. Only one baron currently leads his own troops.

Within their baronies, the barons' word is law. The barons are responsible for routine trials and punishments. Any freeman or serf can appeal, however, to representatives of the king, called the king's justices.

The king's justices travel about the kingdom. Even the smallest hamlets can count on seeing an officer of the king's peace at least once a year. Most towns have a king's man visiting once a month on a regular schedule. These officers are also responsible for holding trials and meting out punishments for any crimes against the country such as treason or espionage. Nobles accused of crimes must be tried before a king's justice.

Justice is generally fair and swift. The people are happy with their system, and King Drasna intends to keep it that way. He personally visits all six of the major cities in Ulgarth at least once a year. Anyone who is willing to make an appointment several months in advance can have his case heard by the king. The king's audience is sought by those who believe that they are the victims of unfortunate circumstances. King Drasna is known to temper his decisions with a liberal amount of mercy.

Unlike some of the other countries of the Shining South, Ulgarth does not use priests as justices. While many non-evil religions are tolerated, King Caladorn the Wise laid down the rule that priests were not allowed to be judges of a man's worldly behavior. Most justices are either retired army men, who have seen much of the world, or scholars, specialized in law. All justices, both king's and baron's, are allowed to call on both priests and mages to get to the truth of a case. Any such expenses come out of the king's treasury. This tends to make judgements both quick and fair.

ULGARTh

Ulgarth has a very small prison population. Those who commit capital crimes, such as murder or treason, are sentenced to a quick death. Those who steal are reduced to serfs, serving the local baron. Minor crimes may also be paid for by a short stint in the military. A convicted man is given his choice of joining the army, or serving a prison term. Few choose prison, although the prison squads often end up patrolling the east borders, looking for signs of barbarians.

Once a man's term of servitude is up, his record is clean. No stigma is attached to a ex-convict, particularly if he has spent his sentence protecting Ulgarth. Indeed, several convicted thieves have risen to become nobles, with titles awarded for valor in battle. The current Baron of Suormpar is descended from such a convict. His grandfather was one of the most notorious banditions in the kingdom. He remained in the defense force after serving his sentence for banditry, and quickly rose to become the leader of the entire east defense force. He successfully resisted an attack by over a thousand horde barbarians. For this, the king granted him a barony. This sort of example helps convince convicts to serve a dangerous stint in the army, rather than in a safe, but uncomfortable prison.

People and Customs

Ulgarth is predominantly human, although all good races are welcome. Elves and dwarves do not fit in well with the Ulgarthan feudal system. Halflings find the system restrictive, preferring the wide open trading of Durpar. A gnome or elf can draw attention, especially in the smaller villages and hamlets. There are always a number of dwarves working and prospecting in the Galuil Mountains, although they usually do not stay long.

Goblinoids are not welcome in Ulgarth. Most nobles would rather run an orc through than talk to him. The orcs in the Dustwall Mountains are said to be massing for raids into Ulgarth. The Barons of Suormpar and Kaspar are recruiting troops for the upcoming raids.

Languages

The common tongue of the Realms is the chief language of the kingdom. Common is the only language spoken by most of the population.

Social Customs

Ulgarth has a feudal system. A man is born to his station, be it noble, freeman or serf. A man may, however, better himself; promotions for valor in battle have made freemen out of many serfs.

The country of Ulgarth is afflicted with a severe paranoia, caught between the trading giant of Durpar and the hordes to the east. They are fiercely nationalistic, and even the lowliest peasant believes that the Ulgarthian way of life is the best. If a man wants to improve himself, he can, and his success or failure is strictly a measure of his own ability.

Peasants are treated better in Ulgarth than most feudal lands. The king and his nobles realize that all citizens are important to the country's safety. Unlike many feudal societies, almost everyone is allowed to carry weapons. Many nobles have regular training sessions for their serfs, drilling them in various military skills. Even the nobles who are fiercely class-conscious follow this practice, merely because so many others do. It has the dual effect of keeping the peasants quiet, and providing a well-trained military force for Ulgarth. Many retired adventurers have found posts as weaponmasters for the nobles of Ulgarth. Those who can use and teach the art of swordplay are much in demand.

Ulgarth nobles are used to luxuries, and take them for granted. Fine silks from Calimshan, rare and exotic fruits from Maztica, spirited horses from Dambrath, and many other luxuries make their way to Ulgarth, courtesy of the traders of Durpar. A lady is expected to appear in the finest clothes available. Many noblewomen, in battles to outdo one another, spend fortunes on clothes.

Ulgarthan women streak their hair with a chalky substance, called fiertallin, from the river Xon. The women use the white fiertallin to artfully streak their normally dark hair. This emphasis on hair fashion has made hairdressing one of the highest paying jobs available to common peasants. A master hairdresser is worth his weight in gold to the upper class women of Ulgarthan society.

The men also have a custom relating to hair. Ulgarthian nobles always appear clean shaven. They never sport beards or mustaches. Only those who can't afford to buy shaving equipment wear facial hair. Facial hair is considered the mark of a peasant. This custom is practical as well as social. In the heat of the summer sun, a beard is extremely uncomfortable.

The weather in Ulgarth has created another custom; knights do not wear metal armor. The heat and humidity make it a very uncomfortable experience. Many knights wear no armor at all. Others make do with leather, which is uncomfortable, but not life-threatening.

Religion

As befits a nation where knights are the highest social class, the patron of duty is widely worshipped. All knights pay homage to Torm, and there are many priests of Torm in Ulgarth. The largest temple in the land is Torm's temple in Orvyltar, where the king himself worships.

Other deities are also worshipped; the most popular are Tymora, patron of adventurers, and Lathander, god of renewal and the dawn. Both have temples in most of the large cities. Their clergy get along well with each other and with the clergy of Torm.

UlgarTh

Money and Commerce

UlgarTh has the good fortune to be located next to one of the great trading empires of the Realms. Since UlgarTh is the world's sole producer of mingari (a rare spice only now becoming known to the rest of Faerun), they have a good relationship with Durpar, albeit across a heavily guarded border.

The basic unit of currency is, as in Durpar, the silver vellim. Although very little silver is actually mined in UlgarTh, the constant trading keeps the country well supplied with Durpar vellims. UlgarTh does mint its own gold coins, which are called liekos. A gold lieko is very similar to a standard gold piece, but it has a picture of King Caladorn the Wise on the front, and a mounted knight on the back.

Commerce in UlgarTh consists mainly of trading with the Shining Lands. Mingari is shipped to Durpar. Many other products make their way back to UlgarTh. Danibraii horses are a must for any knight of renown. There is spirited business in the various spices, foodstuffs, and textiles that Durpar produces. Even though there are few, if any, merchants of UlgarTh who can get the best of any Durparian in a trade, the proximity of the Shining Lands cuts down on travel costs and overhead. This helps Ulgarthan merchants to get some of the best prices for Durparian merchandise.

OrvylTar

The capital of UlgarTh, Orvyltar is the home of King Drasna's estates. It is situated on the protected Copper Bay. The Golden Water loses some of its yellow sheen in this bay, and in the setting sun the water appears to have a coppery hue. Warships jealously guard this bay, Ulgarth's safest and largest port.

Ulgarth

With a population of over 20,000, Orvyitar is the largest and most prosperous city in Ulgarth. Trade with the Durparian cities of Morvar and Pharsul is convenient and safe. Few pirates prey in the Golden Waters, and storms seldom threaten shipping.

Orvytlar has a force of about 500 men at arms, and 3 troops of cavalry, all mounted on Dambraii horses (see "Dambraith" page 41 for statistics on their horses). Drasna's father purchased three huge ballistae from the Durparians, which are mounted on towers overlooking the bay. They are lovingly maintained by one of the few dwarven nobles in Ulgarth, Stonemith Hammerhand, chief defender of Orvytlar. Several raiding pirate ships have been sunk by these devices before they sailed within a quarter mile of shore.

The business of Orvytlar is mainly trading. Through this city flows the mingari from eastern Ulgarth, and the iron and gold from the Galuil Mountains. In return, many of the staples and luxuries obtained from Durpar flow back out to the rest of the country.

Kelazzan

Kelazzan is the southernmost city of the Ulgarth coast, and, as such, takes the brunt of the winter storms. It is a small town, and most of its occupants are traders or farmers. The mingari farms to the east provide much of its income. The clocks are large for a town of only 5,000 inhabitants. The Panglassest shipyards are the largest in Ulgarth. The city is well defended; up to 20 warships can put to the sea if necessary. The land force is small. The city is patrolled by 20 troops of 25 guardsmen each. The population of Kelazzan is predominantly human. Demihumans make up a mere 5% of the population. Baron Herokimal, a firm, but just ruler, has his manor in Kelazzan.

Surbar

Surbar is a proud coastal city tucked safely in the coastline of the Golden Waters. It lies to the southeast of the Galuil Mountains. In the spring sunrise, the mountains are a beautiful sight. Surbar is the second largest city in Ulgarth, with a population of almost 15,000. Demihumans are common in Surbar, for much of the iron and gold from the mountains is shipped to the city. Shipping, weapon making, metal crafts, and spices all provide means for the Surbarians to make a living.

The city and surrounding area are ruled by Baron Kasnchil, the most corrupt of the barons of Ulgarth. It is well known that his justice is tempered by greed. The common serf believes his baron has made Surbar the most prosperous city of Ulgarth, and in that respect they are right. The baron's policy of allowing any type of trade to move through Surbar has made it a favored port for ships and trade. Even Dambraii pirates are allowed to make port in Surbar for resupply and refitting.

Suormpar

Suormpar is the northernmost city of Ulgarth, sitting on the Xontuil Bay, in the shadow of the Dustwall Mountains. As with all cities along the coast of the Golden Waters, trade is a major part of their economy. The cosmetic fiertallin, gathered from the river Xon, 20 miles up the bay, is exported from Suormpar.

The baron of Suormpar is Redinald Rascalin, a descendent of one of the most powerful bandits in the kingdom. His grandfather was captured with great trouble, and offered a choice of prison or serving Ulgarth. Maelin Rascalin became one of the greatest generals in Ulgarth history, repeatedly driving back the barbarian hordes from the east. For this service the King awarded him a barony. His family is one of King Bluemantle's most staunch supporters. Baron Rascalin is painfully honest, a devout worshiper of Torm. He is a paladin of 10th level, a strange calling for a grandson of a bandit, but one for which he is well suited.

Currently Suormpar is preparing for an attack from the orc hordes in the Durparian mountains. All signs point to a raid from thousands of orcs. Mercenaries are in demand, as are armorers, weaponsmiths and others who can help the city prepare for an attack. The city is defended by a guard force of 200 archers and 500 footmen. The leader of the city guard is Hespal Nicort, a half-orc, who hates orcs with a passion.

Kaspar

Located on the eastern edge of Ulgarth, Kaspar is responsible for the defense of Ulgarth from the hordes to the east. It has an outstanding military force to do it with. 10,000 residents make Kaspar a thriving city. Although Kasparians prefer to trade with the barbarians to the east, they maintain a vigilant guard against raids from them. Fertile mingari farms surround this city. Kaspar is considered one of the prettiest cities in Ulgarth. The baron, who has taken the name Montar Kaspar (defender of Kaspar), is a half-elven cavalier who loves nothing more than his horses. He has personally brought over enough Dambraii horses to outfit his elite cavalry company. His is the fastest company in the land. The swift Dambraii horses allow them to pursue or escape the barbarian hordes with ease.

Many farms lie west of Kaspar. This farmland, called the "bread basket" of Ulgarth, is also defended by the forces of Kaspar. In addition to the cavalry troops, the city walls are manned by a troop of 500 heavily armed (but lightly armored) soldiers. Many of these troops are criminals sentenced to protect their country. Baron Kaspar maintains a high level of morale with these men. The rate of desertion is less than 10%. He accomplishes this by using a combination of fierce discipline and trust, tempered with a bit of greed. The men are given the pick of the horses captured from the barbarians, and any treasure they might have is split between all the troops fairly. The defenders also like the fact that the baron personally leads them into battle. Baron Kaspar, a 12th-level warrior, rides Firefiex, the fastest horse in Ulgarth.

Dralpur

Dralpur is a mining city, situated on the eastern slopes of the Galuil Mountains (often called the Mountains of Gold).

The baron of Dralpur, Kevin Olwyson, is a retired ranger who used to roam the land of Ulgarth, the Dustwall Mountains, and the Utter East. He is very crafty, and his town has a small but effective guard force. Approximately 500 men serve this town of 8,000. They are a loyal group of talented warriors, for Baron Olwynson pays his men in gold, and he pays them well.

Many craftsmen also make Dralpur their home. Located on the slopes of the mountains, Dralpur is the coolest city of inland Ulgarth. Although the locally produced products are not a match for Durparian silks and textiles, Dralpur does make many of the items needed for Ulgarth daily life. All sorts of farm implements come from the smithies here, for shipment to the eastern mingari farms.

Places of Interest

The Galuil Mountains

The Galuil Mountains are said to be the most beautiful in the Shining South. They have earned this reputation because of their appearance at sunset. The sunlight reflecting off the Golden Waters makes the peaks glow with a yellow sheen, which makes them appear to be made of gold. In reality, they could be called the Iron Mountains, for much iron is mined here. There are gold mines on their eastern slopes. They are not particularly rich, just profitable. Up higher, in the hills and lower slopes, many citizens have settled. They either work in the mines on the eastern slopes, or bring lumber and fruit that can only be grown in the cooler climes down for trade. There are few monsters in the mountains. The Ulgarthi-ans have actively driven them out for the last two hundred years. No organized tribes or groups of monsters remain, although there has always been trouble with griffins raiding the horses of the plains. Little else is known about the mountains. No one has penetrated to the very center. This is just as well, for in the center of this small range, deep under the largest mountain, is a tribe of duergar. These duergar, unaware that the surface is inhabited, are mining the same veins of gold as the Ulgarthians. Unless one party or the other stops, they will meet each other in three years. Since the Ulgarthians employ many dwarves in the mines, this meeting is not likely to be a friendly one.

ULGARTh

NPCs of ULGARTh

Drasna The Fortunate

King of Ulgarth

12th-level human male paladin (Torm): Str 17, Dex 12, Con 10, Int 14, Wis 16, Cha 17; AL LG; AC 2; MV 12; hp 98; THAC0 9; #AT 3/2; Dmg 2d4 (broadsword +1 luckblade): SZ M; ML 18. Spells: Priest 4/2/2

Where Found: Orvyltar

Drasna is called the Fortunate, not because he was born the son of the king, but because of his early adventuring life. He has many times faced monsters that should have easily slain him, but he always seemed to come out victorious. The reason for this is that he carries a luckblade and a stone of good luck.

Drasna is now very serious about being a good king. He visits all of the cities in his realm at least once a year. He holds grand ceremonies where he knights those who have proven themselves worthy. He also passes judgements for those who have requested it. He believes that the king's justice should be denied to no one. Drasna is an extremely popular king, most of his subjects believe firmly in the feudal system, since it produces rulers like Drasna.

Landswith Meilin

Half-elven female 10th-level warrior/8th-level priest (Tyr): Str 17, Dex 17, Con 13, Int 12, Wis 16, Cha 13; AL LG; AC -2; MV 12; hp 70; THAC0 11; #AT 3/2; Dmg 2d4+1 (bastard sword +1, two-handed): SZ M; ML 14. Spells: Priest 5/5/3/2

Where Found: Wanders Ulgarth

Landswith is a typical adventuring knight. She seeks to right wrongs and do good deeds. She is unusual in that very few females are knights and even fewer half-elves.

Landswith always appears in full plate mail, which effectively hides her gender. She wants none of the concern or chivalry that knights must show to females. Her version of chivalry is shown to all she meets, save evil foes.

Landswith roams Ulgarth, looking for noble quests to undertake. She has traveled far to the south, and knows the Utter East better than any man. She fought the barbarian horde in the latest large raid on Kaspar. She is currently traveling north to Suormpar to fight in the coming war with the orcs of the Dustwall Mountains.

ADVENTURES IN ULGARTh

Adventurers are not particularly welcome in Ulgarth. The Ulgarthian feudal system and strong reliance on national pride means that adventurers are usually viewed as common peasants or worse. If the adventurer is a native, or if he aids the country, for instance by fighting against the orcs of the Dustwall Mountains, he is accepted as an equal. Paladins are always welcome, thieves never are, and mages are feared a bit. Priests, particularly priests of Torm, are popular. Priests of other good Realms gods are also accepted.

Adventures in The Shining South

Gateway To Elsewhere

Gateway to Elsewhere is an adventure for 5-8 player characters of levels 9-11, with a total of about 70-90 levels for the entire party. The adventure introduces characters to the Forest of Amtar, near the country of Dambrath.

Set Up

The party has been traveling in Dambrath, or along the Great Trade Way, when they are told a rumor of an ancient ruin, filled with danger and treasure. The ruin is said to be on the southwestern tip of the Forest of Amtar, but little other information is gained.

Alternatively, the party is in Dambrath, and overhears some young nobles talking of the treasure they recovered from the ruins known as the Gate of Iron Fangs. Further checking reveals the approximate location of the Gate. It has an evil reputation, in spite of the fact that a few people have come out with considerable riches.

The Plot

The Gate of Iron Fangs is an ancient ruin, more than 2000 years old. Its three levels are all that is left of a huge tower. On the lowest level is a gate to another plane. The gate is unstable, and operates erratically. It is currently under the control of a powerful fiend named Quinix, a glabrezu of the Abyss. Quinix is intent on securing all of the power possible for his evil master in the Lower Planes. He is also doing his best to secure a bit of power for himself. He has only had control of the gate for a short time. It recently opened next to him in the Abyss, and he entered. Since he arrived, the groups that have come to plunder have rarely returned.

Quinix has captured a number of wild elves from the forest of Amtar. He is attempting to charm or otherwise subvert them to evil. The elves are resistant, and a number of them have already died in the process.

To further complicate matters, a party of Crintri half-elves, with a drow fighter accompanying them, enters the ruins just before the party does. They will meet the party just before facing the glabrezu.

Finding The Lair

The Gate of Iron Fangs boasts a number of ruins and dungeons, most of which have been cleaned out by adventurers over the years. Monsters still lurk in them. There are seven different ruined towers set in a roughly circular pattern. A wandering monster check should be made each time the PCs near one of the ruined towers. If the party has heard the nobles talking, they can follow the most recent tracks, which enter the ruin on the southeast. A successful tracking roll identifies them as the footprints of a troll.

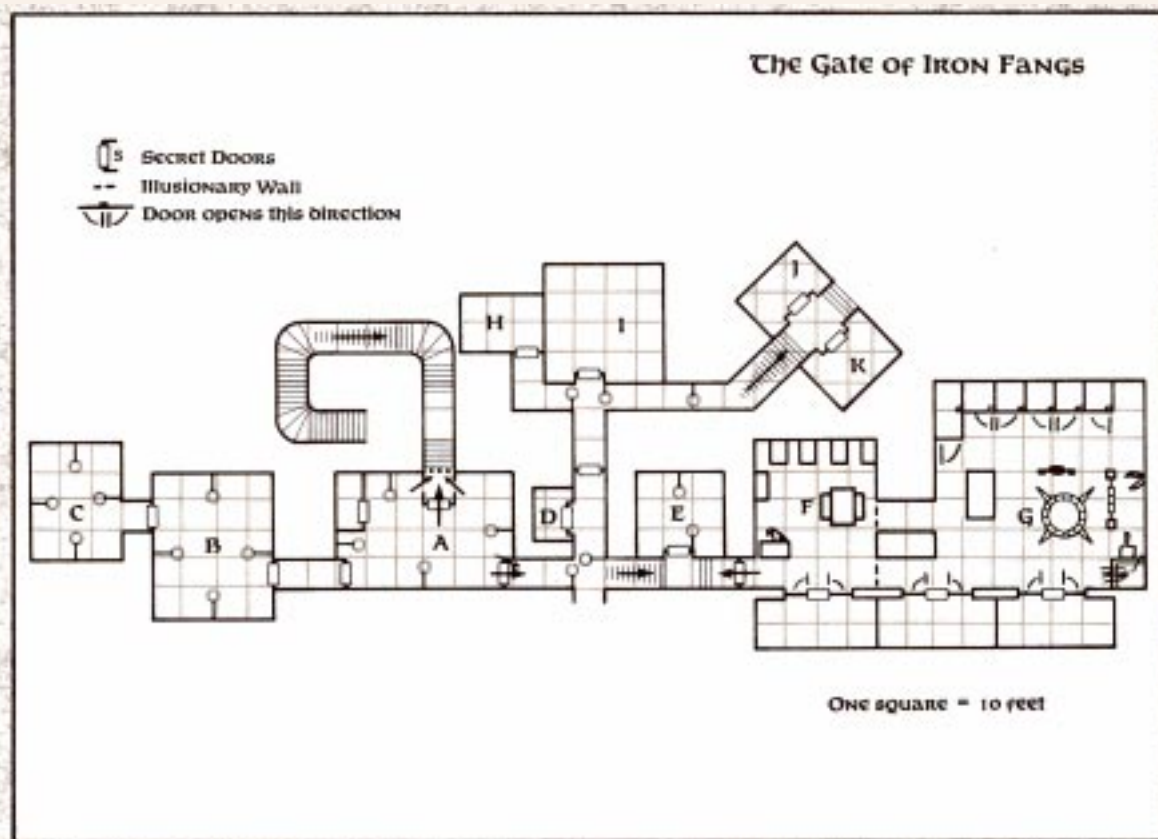

If the party does not search the correct ruin, they find empty rooms and a level or two of abandoned halls. For every turn spent searching there is a 10% chance (cumulative) that the party encounters a band of trolls.

Trolls (4): Int Low; AI, CE; AC 4; MV 12; HD 6+6, hp 40, 35, 28, 27; THAC0 13; #AT 3; Dmg 1d4+4, 1d4+4, /1d8+4; SA attack 3 opponents at once; SD regenerate 3 hit points per round three rounds after being wounded, fire and acid damage is permanent; SZ L; ML 14: XP 1,400 each.

The trolls generally react negatively to the party; only if the PCs claim to have been sent by Quinix are they accepted and left alone. Remember that trolls are not terribly bright. It should be possible for a clever party to trick the name of the master out of the trolls, but they don't just give it away. In combat, the trolls attack and fight to capture, although their natural ferocity usually takes over. Quinix is usually pleased to get one living captive from a band of trolls. If confronted with magical fire, to the extent that it kills one or more of them, the trolls must make a morale check at a +4 penalty to the roll. Failure means that they break off combat and flee back to Quinix to report. Clever parties can use this as a means of finding the correct ruin.

If the PCs search the correct ruin, they still run into a band of trolls, but these do not negotiate. If the party has followed fleeing trolls into this ruin, the trolls stop fleeing and join in the fray, heartened by the reinforcements. Further searching after encountering the trolls leads the party to a stairway descending deeper than the other ruins. Just like the other ruins, the ruin housing Quinix is cleared on the first two levels. The chance of meeting more trolls is again 10% per turn of searching. It takes one hour to thoroughly search a level.

Each hour of searching the party also has a 50% chance of encountering a trap. The glabrezu has set many traps in the ruins. Roll 1d6 to determine the type of trap encountered:

1. Covered pit, fall 10' for 2d6 falling and spike damage. Spikes are tipped with paralyzing poison, save at -2 or paralyzed for 1d4 hours.

2. Pressure plate releases paralyzing gas in a 20' area. Save versus paralyzation or become unconscious for 2d6 turns.

3. Pass by shriekers, who raise the chance for encountering a troll band to 75% while shrieking.

4. Stone blocks drop from ceiling, causing 4d6 points of damage to characters in 10' square area. Dexterity check allowed for 1/2 damage.

5. The party passes a pair of statues in a hall, or at the entrance to a room. The statues are of beautiful, smiling maidens. When a character passes between the maidens, they slam together, doing 8d6 points of damage to the lead character (dexterity check for 1/2 damage). The maidens then draw back, taking 1 round to reset the trap. The party must hurry to make it through. The maidens are activated by a pressure plate. Passing without touching the floor does not activate the trap.

6. A 20' section of passageway is trapped. At the middle, a small, almost invisible trip-wire is located (-20% to find traps chance). If the wire is touched, portcullises slam down at the front and back. Characters caught underneath must roll a dexterity check or take 3d6 points of damage. The portcullises are heavy to lift them and escape requires a bend bars roll at -10% to the chance. If all characters are trapped, four trolls appear in 7- 12 rounds (1d6+6) to attempt to capture the PCs and take them to Quinix.

The Lair

The third level of the ruins is the lair of Quinix and his servants. The winding stair exits at point A on the map, where a dozen trolls await. If the party has been involved in loud combat, or if any trolls escaped the party to warn Quinix, the trolls are ready and waiting. If the party has been silent, they have a normal chance to surprise the trolls.

Four of the trolls are on watch at all times; the others sleep on filthy piles of rags in room B. Room C contains their treasure, and the lair of their leader, the largest troll. If the trolls are alerted, all are present in the entry room; if not, the other eight respond in 1d3 rounds.

Trolls (12): stats same as above, hp 40, 37, 36, 35, 32, 29, 27, 25, 25, 24, 24, 23.

Treasure in room C: 4,000 copper, 2100 silver, 240 gold, 6 skydrop gems worth 75 gold each. The treasure is hidden in sacks under the filthy sleeping pile that the largest troll uses.

More Guards

Having passed the trolls, the party can exit through the other door, to the east. They soon come to a three-way intersection, allowing them to proceed straight ahead, or turn north. Ahead they see a set of 12 stairs that climb up to a passageway. To the north the corridor continues for 50', and ends in a locked door.

Room D and E contain the second line of guards, two vrocks. Quinix expects the vrocks to be able to stop any invading characters. The vrocks were summoned by the glabrezu, and are waiting and watching for intruders. They are also charged with guarding the prisoners, who are located to the north. One vrock is stationed in room D, and one in room E. They are never surprised, so they wait to position themselves for good effect. They prefer to have one vrock step in front of the party and attack for one round. The other then moves in from behind.

Vrocks (2): Int High; AL CE; AC -5; MV 12, FL 18 (C); HD 8, hp 45, 40; THAC0 13; #AT 5; Damage 1-4/1-4/1-8/1-8/1-6 +7 (for strength); SA spores, screech, always attack first; SD +2 or better weapon to hit, never surprised, take 1/2 damage from magical fire, cold, or gas, no damage from normal fire, electricity or poison; MR 70%; SZ L; ML 17; XP 37,000

Vrocks are able to use the following powers, once per round; teleport without error, darkness, detect invisibility, detect magic, dispel magic, mirror image, mass charm, telekinesis. Once over three rounds a vrock is able to eject spores, which affect all in a 5' radius. Anyone in the spores takes 1d8 points of damage, and the spores implant themselves just under the skin and begin to grow. Victims take 1-2 points of damage per round, until at the end of ten rounds they are covered with thick, vine-like growths. Bless, neutralize poison, or holy water kills the spores, slow poison stops the growth.

The first vrock to appear has cast a mirror image; there are nine images of the vrock in front of the party. The second vrock attempts to attack with surprise, rending and tearing at a PC in the back. The vrocks are under the control of the glabrezu; they cannot gate in more tanar'ri, nor can they teleport away to safety. They must fight to the death.

Adventures in The Shining South

The Prisoners

If the PCs proceed north, they discover a pair of locked and barred rooms (T & U). Room T has only a dead body, a wild elf. Room U holds seven living wild elves, all much worse for their experiences here. Three of them have retreated into catatonia, due to the horrors to which Quinix has subjected them.

Wild elf prisoners (7): Int Ave; AL N; AC 10; MV 12 13; HD 1, hp 4 each; THAC0 20; #AT 1; DMG 1-2; SD 90% resistant to sleep and charm; SZ M; ML 8; XP nil.

The prisoners were captured by Quinix, who hopes to win over the elves by means of magical charms. To date, the elves have resisted his efforts, and this has angered him. There were a dozen prisoners, but five of them have perished under Quinix' ministrations.

The prisoners are glad to be freed, but all they wish to do is leave the ruins, and disappear into the forest. If questioned, they can describe the glabrezu, although they don't know exactly what it is. They do know that they were taken up the stairs to the right, where Quinix has a torture room set up. (Room V) They have never been east of room E; they have no idea what lies beyond it.

The torture room contains many items of foul use, but little treasure. If magic is detected for a dagger +1, +2 versus larger creatures can be found. It is covered with dried blood. It was used on the elves, in an attempt to break their spirits with physical torture. The PCs may well believe it to be an evil weapon. Do nothing to discourage this. It is, in fact, merely a minor magical item.

The Crintri Adventurers

Just before the PCs pass the locked door into room F, they can hear voices through the door. The language is drow; only those who speak the language (or use the appropriate magic) can understand the words. Apparently an alliance has been made, between someone speaking in a deep, gravelly voice, referred to as "the most evil one," and a group of humanoids. If the PCs enter, they find themselves facing a group of dark-skinned half-elves, male and female, plus one drow male who is not immediately visible. If they enter while the voices can be heard, they also see Quinix. He screams at the Crintri to destroy these foul thieves who work against the Lady of Pain. Quinix then disappears, actually falling back through the illusionary walls to observe.

The Crintri are seated about a table, although the drow male is in the background, behind the fireplace to the north, out of sight. The room is lit by lanterns, which burn with a reddish light that does not hinder infravision. The crintri do not immediately attack. Their first move is to spread out, while a female wearing a symbol of Loviatar asks them to please pause and speak. This assumes the party does not have an elf with them. If the party has a female half-elf with them, change the word "shebali" (meaning "peasant") in the following sentence to "sister."

"Hold, shebali, for we should speak. Is it not that you would take treasure from this place? Perhaps the treasures may be won much easier than you imagined. I am Grata Silvermane, fifth daughter of Lady Silvermane, and I offer you wealth for taking service with me."

She folds up a sack, and pulls out a handful of blue gems, which sparkle purple in the lantern light. She offers the party riches to join them, for if they have made it this far, they must be tough. If the party has not seen Quinix, she tells them of the deal she has made with a "great power of evil, whose ends are not at cross purposes with ours." One of the drow males speaks up, "A fiend from the abyss, and one not to be taken unawares." He is told to keep quiet, and does so!

Grata wants the PCs to join her on a raid on the wild elves of the Amtar forest. They need to capture two dozen elves. Once they have the two dozen, they can slaughter the rest.

This ought to be about as far as the negotiations go. If the PCs have not objected to anything so far, start giving questioning looks to anyone playing a good character. The characters can, of course, agree in an attempt to catch the Crintri off guard. Such an attempt fails, since one of the other females possesses a magical item that detects lies. Unless the PCs truly intend to go through with the slaughter of unsuspecting elves, they are caught, and the combat begins.

Adventures in The Shining South

Quinix does not intend to fight to the death. He would much rather surrender, and negotiate a deal that he can turn to his profit. If the PCs persist, Quinix teleports out to another location. This can serve as a possible hook for future adventures.

If the party is being overwhelmed, they call flee. Quinix will not pursue them. He is more interested in his research than in chasing any intruders.

The Gate To Elsewhere

If the PCs search they should find the illusionary walls. The drow female was carrying a bag of 48 gems, worth 100 gold pieces each.

The gate is a circle on the floor, a shifting pool of colors that draws one's attention. Currently, the gate is open to the Astral Plane. The PCs can see a cloudy white haze. After an hour it shifts to a peaceful green forest (actually on the plane of Elysium). The gate can open to any plane the DM chooses. This can be used to launch players into an extra-planar adventure. If a DM is not prepared for extra-planar adventures, then the PCs will lack the device needed to activate the gate. Should any PC attempt to use the gate, it either does not affect them, or teleports them to another part of the Realms.

Quinix's Treasure

Quinix's treasure is hidden in the eastern-most small room off the gate room. The door is locked and warded with a glyph of warding (fire damage 10d4, save for 1/2), and a symbol of death. Behind the door the treasure is piled in a heap on the floor. In the room are three flying snakes.

causes no extra damage but the victim's movement rate is lowered by 8, and his armor class is penalized by 6 (movement minimum 1, AC minimum 10). The snake must make a successful attack roll to do so.

Treasure: 3 sacks of 500 gold, 1 Curna emerald worth 5,000 gp, 200 platinum in a money belt, 3 potions of healing clearly marked as poison; 3 vials of poison, type F, marked as healing, extra healing, and flying; bracers of defense AC 4; wand of fire (12 charges); ring of shooting stars; and a wizard scroll with read magic, detect magic, lighting sphere, and rapid reflexive response scribed at 13th level. The last two are new spells found in this book. Check the section on Halruan magic for the spell descriptions.

Dark as Dark

Dark as Dark is an adventure for 5-8 characters of levels 6-8. Total levels in the party should be about 40. This adventure is set in the beast-lands of Veldorn, described in the section on the nation of Ulgarth. Players will be dealing with undead creatures, including a vampire. A cleric or paladin with the ability to turn undead would be helpful, but not necessary. This adventure uses the Saed's city map on the cover of this booklet.

Set Up

The party is in Lastarr, a trading town on the Durpar side of the border with Veldorn. They are approached by a Durparian adventurer, a fighter from the looks of him, who claims to know something that will benefit them. If they are interested, they should meet him at the Scurvy Trader Inn. Or....

As the party is rounding a corner, they see two men scuffling. One of them lurches back, and falls to the ground. The other looks over at the party, and then flees. The man lying dead on the ground is a Durparian merchant, but not a very successful one by his dress. Searching him yields a map to a location in Veldorn. The map is marked Vaelan, with a note that says, "Meet me at the Scurvy Trader Inn at dusk. Pigel." The PCs may keep the appointment in place of the dead merchant.

The Plot

Saed, a vampire lord, is the beast-chieftain of Veldorn. He is going to be gone from his home city for a while, and Pigel has discovered this. In fact, Saed is going to be in Lastarr. This offers a perfect opportunity to sneak into his city and recover an heirloom of Pigel's house that was stolen by Saed over 50 years ago. The PCs meet Pigel and hear his offer. If they agree, they will travel across the monster country of Veldorn to Saed's city. There they can try to sneak in and recover the treasure. Along the way they'll face various creatures native to the Shining South, and have a final showdown with the vampire that Saed has left in charge.

The Scurvy Trader Inn

The Scurvy Trader is a dive of the worst sort. It caters to anyone who has the money for a cheap drink and no concern about the company. If the characters enter at dusk, there are only 10 customers, humans and half-orcs, in the place, but the inn begins to fill up quickly. The bartender doesn't know anyone named Pigel, nor do the customers. Asking anyone about Pigel is enough to alert Pigel that this is the party he is waiting for. He will move over to the PCs' table as soon as they sit down or intercept them at the door if they decide to leave.

He will introduce himself as Pigel Cochin, then say, "I assume you are here because you are willing to accept my offer."

The characters should have no idea what he's talking about. If they say they are willing to accept, he will explain that he has learned that Saed, the vampire who robbed his family of an important heirloom over 50 years ago, is going to be in Lastarr for the next few days. Pigel, who knows the way to Saed's city, believes that, with the party's help he could sneak in, recover his heirloom and be out in only three days. If the PCs want to know what's in it for them, he says only the gratitude of his family, the Cochin family of Thruldar. He will say it as though it should mean something. Any PCs who are familiar with Durpar or Luiren will recognize the name as that of a very rich family.

If this is not enough, he will offer them everything that is recovered except the family heirloom. The heirloom is an ornate scimitar with the hilt carved into the shape of a lion.

If this is still not enough, he can offer them each a potion of healing, and 500 gold marks. The potions will be paid in advance, the money will be paid only if the recovery succeeds.

Move Silently 47%; Hide in Shadows 37%. Items: leather armor, ring of protection +4 to AC, +2 to saves, longsword +1, dagger, longbow, quiver with 20 sheaf arrows, trail rations, brown travel clothes, 25 silver pieces, 2 gold marks, 4 vellims (25 gp trade bars). He also carries 6 potions of healing, and a mage scroll which he can offer to sweeten the deal. The scroll is scribed at 8th level, and has magic missile, locate object, burning hands, and stoneskin.

If the PCs found the merchant's body, and ask Pigel about it, he will tell them that he was attempting to recruit adventurers to accompany him into the city of Vaelen. He has scouted the city before, and knows exactly where it is. He dares not try to penetrate Saed's stronghold without help. The PCs look like just the group he was looking for. The man he had been dealing with before had a decidedly unclean feeling about him, but Pigel is desperate. Actually, he is desperately trying to make a name for himself in his family, but he is afraid to admit it.

If asked about the sword, Pigel will almost explain why the sword is important, but he always stops short. The truth is, the sword is not terribly important to his family. It is an important symbol for Pigel, to prove his worth. It's also a scimitar +1 flame tongue.

If and when the PCs agree, Pigel offers to put them up for the night. He has a safe spot outside of town where the PCs can sleep. If they object, they can stay at the inn overnight. Pigel tells them where to meet him. He plainly considers their decision a foolish one. Let the PCs prepare for being robbed, set watches, whatever they like; nothing happens during the night. Pigel doesn't like sleeping indoors unless he absolutely has to, and thinks anyone who does so is crazy. The inn charges a silver a night for a dirty, bug-infested room. If the PCs have more taste, they can find a better inn up the street. It charges them a gold piece a night, but the rooms are clean. Pigel will suggest that any characters wearing metal armor had better get something lighter, or they won't make it.

In the morning the PCs and Pigel set out. If the PCs spent the night in town, he inquires about their health. He is surprised when the party tells him that they had no encounters during the night. He then remarks, "We had best get moving while our luck holds."

Journey To Vaelen

The PCs have a rough two-day journey across Veldorn. Pigel, however, knows the country very well. He is constantly leading the PCs around obstacles and past homes of various monsters. Once he points to the north and remarks "Xiltor, where the beholders rule. Not a nice place."

About eight hours into the day, in the late afternoon, the party encounters a pack of flying snakes. The snakes swoop up from the left of the party; Pigel missed seeing them. Allow the characters normal surprise rolls. The snakes were in a nest only 15' from the party, and they immediately move to attack.

Flying Snakes (10): Int Low; AL N; AC 5; MV 9, Fl 21 (B); HD 1+4; HP 8 ea; THAC0 19; #AT 1 + special; Damage 1-3; SA acid spray 10' for 1-4 points of damage to flesh, hide, or cloth; SZ S; ML 12; XP 120. This causes no extra damage but the victim's movement rate is lowered by 8, and his armor class is penalized by 6 (movement minimum 1, AC minimum 10). The snake must make a successful attack roll to do so.

The snakes flee when more than half of them are slain. Snakes attempt to attack the face, to blind and confuse the foe. If a flying snake scores a natural 20, he has bitten the PC near an eye; that eye is blinded until a cure light wounds is received.

Towards evening the party comes across a copse amidst the unending hilly grasslands. Pigel offers to scout it out, allowing any PC who wishes to accompany him. Nothing is found by Pigel, at first. Any rangers or druids in the party have a

25% chance of noticing the dark trees, others have but a 10% chance. If the dark trees are not noticed, they bide their time, waiting for all of the party either to pass through, or to settle down for the night.

If the party does not detect them, Pigel suggests making camp here. The PCs can indeed find a ring of trees with a sunken firepit. This place would be somewhat defensible, and out of sight. Pigel has been here before. There are three more trees in the copse than there were before, but Pigel doesn't notice that. Sometime during the night, around 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, the dark trees use confusion on the guards, and move in for the kill.

If the party does detect them, the dark trees attack with their confusion power first, then move in to mop up the PCs.

When the incident with the dark trees is over, the PCs can settle down and try to get more sleep. The combat has awakened another group of flying snakes, and they attack about a half hour after the combat has ended.

Flying Snakes (10): stats same as above; hp 8 ea.

The night finally passes, and the PCs may continue on. The day passes uneventfully, but the pace is grueling. About mid-afternoon, all characters with a constitution of less than 12 must make a constitution check, or be forced to stop for rest.

Pigel chafes at any delay; he had hoped to be at the city by now. He does not wish to enter it by night, and Saed has ways of traveling very quickly. He could be back tomorrow. If the party chooses to continue, all those who failed their constitution check suffer a -1 to hit and a +1 penalty to AC in the upcoming encounters.

The City of Vaelen

About two hours before dusk, Pigel leads the party to the top of a hill. Below lies a sprawling mass of trees and buildings. The city is apparently built into the side of a hill. A huge opening into the hill, large enough to admit two wagons abreast, hill can be seen.

Pigel suggests blending in with the populace. He has brought dirty old rags. With the rags, plenty of mud, and some white makeup, he can transform them into fake zombies. Should any PC be able to cast wraithform, that one could act as a leader. Most of the undead do not like the sunlight, so the party shouldn't be bothered in the outer city. Underground may be different, but the vampires will be resting. It's safer now than it will be in two hours.

Let the PCs disguise themselves as they wish, but Pigel reminds them that most undead are not fooled by invisibility. He recommends the zombie disguise, which is how he got into the city before.

If the PCs agree, have fun with this. Anyone who takes pride in their clothes is a target for Pigel, for the costume must be dirty, ragged, and worthless to satisfy him. Let Pigel have fun tearing sleeves off silk shirts, carving huge rents in cloaks, whatever it takes. Once the disguises are complete, Pigel leads the party towards the city. They have no encounters while in the outer city but you can read or paraphrase the following passages for effect.

"As you pass an intersection, you hear a scream to your left. Several blocks away, you see a goblin run out of a building. He is pursued and quickly dragged down by a pack of ghouls. You hurry along before the ghouls sense you."

"You shuffle down the street, nearing the great passage to the inner city. To your left six skeletons stand idle and unmoving. You feel their eye-holes on you as you pass by, but they make no movement."

Dark as Dark

"You pass what seems to be a park, with many trees growing in it. You look again, and realize that most of the trees are stunted and dead, and that some of the trees resemble the dark trees you fought last night. You stumble along, doing your best to appear to be zombies. The dark trees watch you, but do not follow."

Use the above description to make the players nervous. Throw in other encounters such as a shuffling line of zombies carrying supplies, or a wight drifting across the street in front of them. Finally, they reach the entrance to the Inner City.

The Inner City

The PCs enter from the top of the map. Their first obstacle is at the gate. Since no shipments are expected right now, the gate is closed. If they are masquerading as zombies, they should not be able to speak. On the other hand, they can see only zombies and skeletons on watch. A simple knock opens the gate, or a thief could use his hide in shadows and climbing skills to climb over and open the gate a crack. Failing that, normal zombies would just stand there until the gate is opened. The gate will open in about an hour, when another group of zombies is expected. No one pays any particular attention to the PCs, as long as they make no loud noises and do not draw attention to themselves.

Once inside, the characters see a long street ending in an open area, and an east/west street that leads to many buildings. Pigel tells them (in a whisper) that Saed's palace is beyond the town square.

On the way down the street, the PCs see a group approaching. A vampire, flanked by half a dozen zombies and a pair of wraiths, is approaching. If the PCs shuffle to the side, the entourage passes by with scarcely a notice. The vampire does give the party a piercing glance as he goes by. If they turn off, they can simply march up a side street with no trouble, but the vampire still watches them. Should the party attack the vampire, Pigel will leave them to fend for themselves. If they duck into one of the abandoned buildings, they encounter a wight. This undead is close enough to sense their life force, and immediately attacks.

SZ M; ML 16; XP 3,000. Kessar is wearing a ring of fire resistance, and a ring of shooting stars. He is suspicious of the party, but only attacks if attacked first.

The monsters, except for Kessar, fight to the death. Five rounds after combat starts, another seven zombies and two wraiths join the confrontation. Five rounds later two wights join the fray. Alternate this as long as the party wants to keep fighting. If they have started the battle in the street, Pigel shows up after 15 rounds, with a bundle tucked under his arm. He recommends that the party run for it.

The courtyard contains an altar, where Saed worships his foul deity. The altar is prominent, but is unoccupied at the present time. It radiates a very strong aura of evil. The courtyard is full of zombies, skeletons, wraiths, orcs, and kobolds. Even a pair of yuan-ti make their way across to join in any fights. As long as the PCs shuffle with their heads down, keeping to their zombie disguises, they will not be confronted.

The Palace of Saed

The palace is an ornate, decaying place. Once beautiful, it still has silver worked into the gates, and marble statues in the courtyard, albeit covered with dirt and filth. The party can clearly see a line of zombies carrying boxes, marching around to the side of the palace. They are being commanded by an orc shaman, who orders them to the side entrance. If the PCs wish to follow, the orc shaman doesn't notice that his group of 20 zombies increased by a few. Counting was nearer his strong suit.

Once in the side entrance, the PCs can break off and duck into a storeroom without being noticed. Have them make dexterity checks, but even if they fail, only a zombie notices them, and he doesn't speak.

It is here that Pigel suggests divination magic, if the PCs have some. If not, he offers his scroll with the locate object spell, and a complete description of the scimitar. A scimitar with a lion pommel is probably very rare. If it can be located, the party can proceed in the right direction, at least. If this scroll, clairvoyance, or wizard eye is used, the scimitar is located hanging on the wall, in Saed's main throne room. It is less than 50' from the PCs' current location.

The PCs can make it to the throne room unopposed, for Saed is not present, yet. Pigel rushes over and grabs his family heirloom, setting off a loud clamoring alarm. If he is restrained, and traps are detected magically, the alarm spell can be detected and possibly neutralized. There are a number of other heirlooms on the wall: a spear, a two-handed sword, a shield, a mace, a hand axe, another scimitar, and a halberd. Only three of these radiate magic, should it be detected for. The spear is actually a spear +3, cursed backbiting planted here for just such an occasion by Saed. The mace is +1, +4 vs. good aligned creatures, the hand axe is a throwing axe

+3. All of the weapons have gems worked into the pommels; none is worth fewer than 1000 gold pieces. They may be worth more to collectors, but that kind of research is up to the DM and the players.

Removing any of the weapons from the wall sets off the magical alarm. If Pigel is allowed to grab the scimitar, the rest of the PCs have time to grab something and run as well. As long as they flee the throne room the round after the alarms go off, they can escape. If not, a dozen zombies (stats as above) attack, followed by waves of zombies, wights, and wraiths.

If this is the first disturbance the PCs set off, and they run immediately, they can make it halfway out of the city before the vampire appears before them. He calls twice the number of zombies and wraiths listed above to his side. As soon as the vampire is brought to zero hit points, and turns into a gaseous cloud, Pigel will urge the PCs to run. The PCs should probably agree. More zombies, and other dark shapes can be seen approaching. As the PCs move out of the city after defeating the vampire, they may confront a few zombies, or a wight or two. The opposition shouldn't be anything that the PC priests cannot turn or kill with little effort. Maintain the feeling that the PCs are being pursued by a horde of undead. If they stop, they will discover that they are being followed by most of the city occupants.

Once out into the city, the sun will be a half hour from setting. It keeps most of the darker undead back, and the zombies are too slow to keep up with the PCs. Allow them to escape, but have the PCs attacked again at night by a group of undead. Pigel strongly suggests moving through the night. If the PCs agree, have them make constitution rolls. Those who fail have passed out, and must be carried. Pigel is strong enough to carry someone, and does so if necessary.

After five hours of travel, Pigel calls a halt. The PCs may encounter undead, at the DM's option. This encounter should be just enough to challenge combat. After two days of hiding and running, the PCs return to Lastarr. There Pigel will make arrangements for any payment that is due the PCs, and then leaves for home to present his trophy (which he will still carry). Pigel can return to lead the PCs into other troubles. He knows Luiren, Durpar, Veldorn, and the surrounding country as well as anyone. He is always trying to prove himself in ever more dangerous adventures. For instance, he's heard that a rakshasa noble is hiding out in the Gundar Forest. Anyone interested?

Other Adventures in The Shining South

A rakshasa noble is building a base of power near Kolapar, in the Gundarwood. The rakshasa has allied with a tribe of yuan-ti. They occupy an old tower deep in the forest.

A map purported to be of the tomb of Reinhar I is found. The tomb is guarded by a stone golem shaped like a lion, and an iron golem shaped like a tiger.

A wizard wants to hire adventurers in Halruaa to seek out the treasures of the archmage Akhrual. The tower is guarded by a pair of larakens, or magic drainers. Several unique Halruaan spells could be found, or a new magical item.

Dark trees are native to the Shining South. The earliest reports of dark trees preying on humans begin 200 years ago.

Dark trees resemble cypress trees, but their bark is darker, and little moss grows on them. They have two deep black eyes, which are almost impossible to find unless one knows precisely where to look. They superficially resemble treants, but anyone who sees a dark tree can almost feel the palpable hatred and evil emanating from it.

Combat: Dark trees have a superior Armor Class due to their bark-like skin. They are not especially susceptible to fire, for their bark is wet and slimy, and fire does not easily ignite it.

Dark trees do suffer a -2 penalty to their saving throw versus any magical cold attack.

In melee, dark trees can attack with their two arms, inflicting 3-18 (3d6) points of damage per successful attack. If both arms hit, the dark tree has grabbed the victim. On the next round, the dark tree can attempt to bite the victim, with a +4 bonus to hit. A successful bite causes 4-24 points of damage, as the tree drains blood from the victim. Dark trees have the ability to cause confusion in a target, once per round, in addition to their normal attacks. This ability has a range of 50 feet. The target receives a saving throw versus spell to avoid the effect. During combat this has the same effect as a confusion spell, but is more insidious if cast on an unsuspecting target. It causes the target to completely lose his sense of direction, often becoming hopelessly lost in the jungle.

Dark trees are 90% likely to be taken for small cypress trees when they are not moving. This blending effect is only 75% effective against druids, rangers, and other priests of nature.

Habitat/Society: Dark trees live deep in the jungles, under the forest canopy that keeps the direct sunlight off them. They are solitary creatures, delighting in tormenting an unsuspecting group of adventurers before moving in for the kill.

Dark trees are a failed experiment of a renegade wizard of Halruaa. The mage, Benautil, was intent on creating servants that would serve him as well as treants. He invested a great deal of time and much research into necromancies and other foul magic. He was delighted with the success of his experiments on the trees, until the trees turned against his will and slew him.

The trees have spread and have become common in the Wood of Dark trees, in northwestern Durpar. They have also spread to the Granuin Forest, in Luiren, and the Ajmer Forest, north of Dambratb. No other sightings have been reported to date.

Ecology: Dark trees can exist by photosynthesis, but they prefer the taste of blood. They must feed well on blood, before they can bud. Budding is a process that takes one year. At the end of that time, the original dark tree breaks up into 2-5 (d4+1) identical dark trees.

Laraken

CLIMATE/TERRAIN:	Swamp
FREQUENCY:	Very Rare
ORGANIZATION:	Solitary
ACTIVITY CYCLE:	Any
DIET:	Magic
INTELLIGENCE:	Low (5-7)
TREASURE:	Nil
ALIGNMENT:	Neutral Evil
NO. APPEARING:	1
ARMOR CLASS:	6
MOVEMENT:	12
HIT DICE:	15
THAC0:	5
NO. OF ATTACKS:	1 + absorption
DAMAGE/ATTACK:	2-5 (1d4+1)
SPECIAL ATTACKS:	Drain magic, spell use
SPECIAL DEFENSES:	See below
MAGIC RESISTANCE:	Special
SIZE:	L (10' diameter sphere)
MORALE:	Champion (15-16)
XP VALUE:	15,000

A laraken, also known as a magic-drainer, appears as a shining yellow sphere. It can wink out at will, reappearing elsewhere in a moment. Laraken are distant relatives of nishruu, and are for the most part confined to the swamplands, for their yellow bodies must stay wet or they become very uncomfortable. They have a pair of yellow tentacles which protrude from opposite points on the sphere.

Combat: The laraken is capable of lashing out with one tentacle once per round, which inflicts 1d4+1 points of damage per hit. The hit also drains a spell from any spellcaster, or a charge or a plus from a magical item. As it drains these, it gains the power it has absorbed.

A laraken feeds on magical energy. It is capable of absorbing any spell energy directed at it. It also gains the power of whatever the tentacle has drained. If it hits a magical sword, and drains a plus, it receives a +1 bonus to hit and damage. If it drains a spell from a mage, it is able to cast that spell. The laraken prefers to drain memorized spells, then charges from magical items with spell-like effects, then pluses from magical items. The laraken drains the highest-level spell that a spellcaster has memorized. If the victim possesses two or more spells of the same level, the spell drained is randomly chosen. The spellcaster must make a saving throw versus death magic, adjusted for wisdom, or fall unconscious for 1d10 turns.

The laraken's tentacles can each take ten percent of the total hit points of the creature before being severed. A weapon which hits the tentacle is subject to the effects of the touch. These tentacles can be regenerated. To do so, the laraken redirects one spell level per hit point of the tentacle that it has absorbed. The laraken does not receive any bonuses, or spell effects for the levels it has redirected to regeneration.

Laraken hate all intelligent life, and always attack when they sense a party that possesses spellcasters or magic. They will not follow a party onto dry land.

Habitat/Society: Laraken were brought here when a great conjurer, Akhlaur, summoned them from their alternate prime material plane. On their own plane, they lived in a very wet, swamp country. They are uncomfortable in humidity of less than 95%, so even the Shining South is a very dry place to a laraken. Since the laraken feed off magic, the gate to the elemental plane of water, with its enchanted water gushing through and spreading the Akhlaur swamp, provides perfect food.

Ecology: Laraken feed only on magic. They attack merely because of the intense hatred for those who summoned them, which they consider to be anything of roughly humanoid shape.

Laraken reproduce by absorbing a regenerate spell; this allows them to grow a new laraken from a severed tentacle. It is thought that they had other means of reproducing on their own plane, but those conditions do not exist here. This means, thankfully, that laraken are very rare, and are likely to remain so. Laraken need to absorb the equivalent of three spell levels per day. A laraken can also use these spell levels to regenerate 1 hp of damage.

All that is Powerful and Frightening

The dark drow elves are a magical race living far underground. Coming to the surface world only to make war, they are one of the most feared races in the Realms. They are also the favorite foes of most courageous adventurers.

In The Drow of the Underdark, these dark elves come to life — their culture and powers described fully for the first time.

This 128-page sourcebook contains new rules, spells, magical items, and insight into the mysteries of Lolth and the hideous monsters of the Underdark.

Luiren Specialty Priests

Yondalla, Protector of Halflings

Greater Power of Seven Heavens, LG

Portfolio: Nature, protection, death, and aspects of halfling life, especially birth and fertility

Requirements: Halflings only, Wisdom 13

Weapons Allowed: Any non-edged weapon plus slings, throwing rocks, and short swords

Armor Allowed: Leather or none

Major Spheres: All, Animal, Creation, Divination, Guardian, Law, Necromantic, Protection, Healing, Plant, Weather, Wards

Minor Spheres: Combat, Sun

Magical Items Allowed: Any usable by priests

Granted Powers

Specialty priests of Yondalla are adept at throwing rocks. They receive a +2 bonus to hit, in addition to the normal halfling thrown weapon bonus, when using rocks that they have selected. Thrown rocks do 1d4 points of damage. Priests of Yondalla can throw three rocks per round. At 5th level, specialty priests of Yondalla can cast a magical stone spell, once per level per day.

At 7th level, specialty priests of Yondalla gain the ability to blend into any natural forest or pastoral background, becoming 90% undetectable.

At 10th level, specialty priests of Yondalla gain the druidic shape change ability. Their choice of forms is restricted, however, to burrowing mammals, mammals that live above ground but not in trees, and mammals that live in water. Specialty priests of Yondalla are not allowed to become reptilians or avians, nor do they recover lost hit points when shapechanging.

Other Notes

Specialty priests of Yondalla have no power to turn or control undead.

Specialty priests of Yondalla have only existed in Luiren since the Time of Troubles. This new order seeks to preserve the Luiren way of life. Its adherents also believe in existing with nature rather than subjugating it. They are very comfortable with halfling whistler bards, and the two groups frequently work together. Specialty priests of Yondalla have gained a favorable reputation in Luiren. They often are proficient in Healthy Cooking and Medicinal Cooking.

Specialty priests of Yondalla wear brown and green. Their holy symbol is a wheat stalk crossing a silver tree, representing the meadows and forests.

Arvoreen, The Defender

Intermediate Power of Seven Heavens, LG

Portfolio: Protection, vigilance, war

Requirements: Halflings only, Dexterity 12, Strength 14

Weapons Allowed: Any (short sword first)

Armor Allowed: Chain or worse, no shield

Major Spheres: Combat, Guardian, Healing, Protection, Sun, War, Wards

Minor Spheres: All, Animal, Charm, Divination, Elemental, Plant, Weather

Magical Items Allowed: Any usable by priests or fighters

Granted Powers

Once per day the specialty priest may imbue a character with a strength of 18+, with the exceptional percentage to be rolled by the priest. A specialty priest of fewer than three levels may imbue one character per day with such exceptional strength. The recipient gains the bonus and abilities associated with this strength for one turn per level of the casting specialty priest, to a maximum of six turns (one hour).

At third level, a specialty priest may imbue one character with a strength of 18+, as above, and another character with a strength of 19.

At sixth level and above, the priest can give this exceptional strength to up to three characters, one with a new ability score of 18+ as above, one with 19, and one with 20. A maximum of three characters can be affected. A single character can receive only one magical strength bonus at a time. If the same character is imbued with two or more magical strength bonuses in this manner, the highest score takes effect.

Specialty priests of Arvoreen can turn undead as normal. They can also be multi-classed as fighter/clerics.

Advanced Dungeons & Dragons®
2nd Edition

The Shining South

Far off in the south exist countries of legend. Here live the powerful, reclusive mages of Halruaa, the cheerful halflings of Luiren, and the traders of Durpar and Var the Golden. Come along on a risky visit to Dambrath, a country ruled by an alliance of drow and the priestesses of Loviatar, or to Ulgarth, where the only true coffee in the Realms is grown.

Prepare to shop the fabulous markets of Durpar, break bread at the bakeries of Luiren, or see the horse fairs of Dambrath. The lucky among you might even catch a glimpse of a Halruan skyship, floating through the skies above the Great Sea, or witness the breathtaking, seemingly choreographed Dance of the Dolphins.

This sourcebook contains the necessary gaming information for a FORGOTTEN REALMS® campaign to expand into the countries collectively known as the Shining South.

This accessory is suitable for use by all levels of play.
