Seventh-Level Human Magic-User

S:6 I:16 W:10 D:11 C:10 CH:17

Armor: None.

Languages: Common, Elven, Dwarven.

Possessions: Dagger, staff, spellbooks. Midnight's main spellbook is bound in heavy black leather and is trimmed with a pewter clasp, hinges, and an "M" rune to mark its owner. The book measures 16" by 12" and is 6" thick. Midnight's traveling spellbook matches the larger tome. It is bound in matching black leather and has a similar "M" rune embroidered on its cover. The book measures 8" by 6" and is 1" thick.

Weapons of proficiency: Dagger (1d4/1d31), staff (1d6/1d6).

Experience points: 65,000.

Money: 375 gp.

Spells: Midnight's spellbook includes the following spells. Those marked by an asterisk are ones she most likely retains on a given day:

- First-Level – *Armor, charm person, comprehend languages, feather fall, magic missile, *run, Tensor's floating disk, identify read magic, *shocking grasp, sleep.
- Second-level – *Continual light, darkness (15' radius), deep pockets, detect evil, invisibility, *levitate, locate object, ESP, shutter, scare, wizard lock.
- Third-level – *Clairaudience, clairvoyance, feign death, fly, fireball, haste, hold person, infravision, material, suggestion, water breathing.

Fourth-level – Enchanted weapon, dimension door, fire charm, fire shield, ice storm, Leomund's secure shelter, massmorph, polymorph others, polymorph self.

She is able to use four first-level, three second-level, two third-level, and one fourth-level spell each day. As a gift from Mystra, Midnight possesses a permanently active form of detect magic.

Combat: Because of her low Strength, she is -1 to hit. Midnight is a cautious woman. If she is alone, she will attempt to turn invisible and fly away. If battling alongside companions, she will quietly move to a position that offers her both protection and the maximum ability to use her offensive spells. If she lacks such spells, she will attempt to distract opponents and decrease their ability to defend themselves from her companions.

Appearance: Midnight is a thin woman in her late 20s with tight, wiry muscles. She has jet black hair and deep ebon and scarlet eyes, a sharp contrast to her pale ivory skin. The hair reaches to her waist, but she usually braids it during the day. She prefers black, indigo, or deep violet clothing.

Personality: In her early days, Midnight was a hell-raiser and a hedonist, dedicated to serving her own interests. She was very tough, very capable, and very self-assured.

When she wants to be sociable, she can ignite her sultry beauty and sensuality. In her youth, she was extremely promiscuous and freely traded her favors for magical training. But during the crisis of the gods, she changed. She became a crusader determined to free humanity from the gods who more often preyed upon them than helped them.

Midnight is guarded about her past. She believes she would be taken less seriously if she was revealed to be a merchant's daughter.

Relatives: Theus Manx (father), Paiyse Manx (mother), Rysanna (sister).

Allies: Adon, Cyric, Kelemvor.

Patron deity: Mystra.

Personal history: Midnight was born Ariel Manx, the second child of Theus Manx. Theus was a merchant who was entirely without dreams or imagination. He understood hard work for honest pay; he had no patience for those seeking shortcuts in life. He was a modest man with simple expectations for his future. He would have liked at least one son, but accepted the two daughters Paiyse bore him.

Paiyse wanted nothing but the best for her family. She was very insecure and self-conscious. She constantly worried about finances, the family's relatively low social standing, and her self-perceived faults. She never accepted the truth that she was a very attractive woman and a loving mother.

Rysanna, the oldest daughter, was the daughter every parent dreams of having. Rysanna was always willing to help around the house or assist Theus' business. She assumed the role of the family's demure "princess" whenever wealthy suitors called.

Ariel was a year younger and radically different. What she didn't find in the normal world of her parents, she found in the nocturnal world of the streets. As a teenager, she became a familiar part of the night's populace of bards, thieves, sorcerers, and fighters. She became friends with everyone who appreciated impish beauty and adventurous spirit. Her friends gave her the name "Midnight," one she immediately preferred to Ariel.

A tryst with the conjurer Tar gave her her first taste of magic and set the pattern for her life. She became less interested in hedonistic pursuits and more in the quest for magical knowledge and training. She became obsessed with her new quest.

Rysanna was outwardly repulsed by the havoc induced by her sister's behavior, but inwardly she was intrigued by magic. Rysanna shared her sister's independent spirit; she just hid it better. Rysanna looked to Midnight's magic as proof that there was more to life than following her parents' wishes and allowing suitors to court her.

Rysanna decided to secretly study

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Midnight's magical texts and paraphernalia. One dark night she encountered an intruder. It was Tar, who'd come to profess his undying love for Midnight (whom he thought was with him). He poured out his heart and promised her an endless amount of wealth, adventure, and undying love. Without even seeing his face, Rysanna fell madly in love. The tryst that ensued was interrupted by the intrusion of her parents. When Midnight returned at dawn, she discovered Rysanna and Tar were now engaged, and her parents were trying to figure out how to explain a magician for a son-in-law.

That day Midnight finally moved out. She fell into the worship of Mystra, goddess of magic. She even served in a temple for a time until her natural rambunctiousness made even that life unbearable. Around her 21st year, she began to feel a presence from time to time. She would feel her skin tingle coolly with the certain knowledge that she was somehow being followed or observed. She found the feeling comforted her, especially after she noticed the benefits that resulted. It always happened that, after one of these occurrences, a spell she had been laboring over for weeks on end would suddenly work without any problem.

Midnight suspected that she had been granted the special attention of the goddess Mystra. She also believed that Mystra was watching over her, perhaps even grooming her for the position of Magister.

Sunlar, a high priest in the Deepingdale temple of Mystra, took an interest in Midnight, and, under his supervision, Midnight's knowledge of self-defense (which she had learned previously in the streets) was refined. Her study of magic was encouraged and rewarded, too. Sunlar refused to tell Midnight of his motives for taking her under his wing. This mysterious behavior fueled Midnight's suspicions that she had been singled out for some great destiny.

Midnight spent almost a year in the temple at Deepingdale, and when the time came for her to leave, she was amazed at the amount of time that had passed. It was almost as if some outside force had tampered with her natural restlessness.

For the next three years, Midnight devoted herself to Mystra's worship and pursued every scrap of magic she could. Yet she felt unfulfilled, as if she were going about this in the wrong way. She supported herself by an occasional foray with a mercenary band, or perhaps passing herself off as a carnival fortune teller. She continued to feel restless, confused, and helpless. She saw herself as a pawn waiting for its moment in the game. In her 26th year, the veil lifted. Midnight now knew what she was to do. The crisis of the gods had arrived.

Midnight met her future allies Adon, Kelemvor, and Cyric when they needed a mage for a mission they had planned.

Seventh-Level Human Druid

Commonly remembered spells:

- First Level — Animal friendship, entangle, invisibility to animals, locate animals, speak with animals.
- Second Level — Barkskin, heat metal, locate plants, obscurement, warp wood.
- Third Level — Plant growth, protection from fire, summon insects.
- Fourth Level — Cure serious wounds, cause serious wounds.
- Fifth Level — Animal summoning II, insect plague, wall of fire.
- Sixth Level — Fire seeds, weather summoning.
- Seventh Level — Control weather.

At seventh level, Robyn learned to change her shape as other druids do at that level.

Physical description: Robyn's black hair gleams in the sunlight, and her green eyes sparkle. She is usually clad in practical garb — a linen tunic with green leggings and a cape the color of bright rust. Yet her beauty outshines that of the most daintily dressed maidens.

She has a hearty, feminine laugh. Her black hair flows freely, settling down her back as far as her hips. Her slender waist is supple and strong.

If in combat, Robyn wears leather armor and is armed with a staff. Once she obtained the Staff of the White Well, she used it as a weapon, as is reflected in the game stats above. Robyn also wears a silver torque of the Goddess around her neck.

Equipment: Robyn wears a torque of the Goddess about her neck and carries the Staff of the White Well, which is a druid staff.

The torque of the Goddess is a silver band worn about the neck. It is commonly used by druids and other members of the Ffolk. This torque functions in all respects as a ring of protection +2 (most are +1) and can be used in conjunction with any other magical rings except other rings of protection. Additionally, the torque provides its wearer with immunity to lycanthropy, though not the damage from a lycanthropic attack. The wearer receives a +2 to all attack and damage rolls against a lycanthrope. Although the torque does not allow a weapon that would not normally harm a lycanthrope to harm one, the wearer can harm a lycanthrope with his or her hands or teeth. The leaders of hunting dog packs used to track lycanthropes are often equipped with such collars.

The Staff of the White Well is a superior form of druid staff. It is a long staff of white ash that allows the user to perform several special functions.

Unlike other druid staffs that have an animal likeness carved into them, and can summon animals of all members of the species carved on the staff, this staff can summon animals of any species the bearer chooses. However, the user must be specific as to the species summoned. Robyn cannot summon every species in the forest at once. Each summoning takes two charges. All animals of the called species within 12 miles hasten to the druid as quickly as possible. Once they reach the druid, they act as if under an animal control spell. The staff can also be used to cast animal control at any animal within sight of the staff's user, at a cost of one charge.

The staff is also a magical weapon, with a +2 bonus to hit, inflicting 1d6 + 2 points of damage on a successful hit. The staff also functions as a python staff with the characteristics of the staff of the serpent as detailed in the DUNGEON MASTERS GUIDE. This includes the destruction of the staff if the serpent is killed. Using the staff as a snake costs one charge.

At a cost of two charges, the staff can be used to cast one of the following druidical spells: call lightning, plant growth, dispel magic (as if cast by a 15th-level druid), cure disease, cure serious wounds, speak with plants.

Once per month, with no cost in charges, the staff can perform one of the following greater abilities: wall of fire, insect plague, transmute rock to mud, wall of thorns, weather summoning, conjure fire elemental, conjure earth elemental, fire storm.

After using its greater power once, the staff only regains this ability if it is recharged in the Moonwell beneath a full moon, as explained in FR2 MOON-SHAE.

Use of the spells of the staff by a druid who does not have the experience to normally use the spells drains the energy of the druid. For every such spell used in battle, the druid must rest for 10 minutes after the battle. If more than one such spell is used in a battle, the user must make a Constitution ability check every time he uses the staff after the first time. If the staff is touched by a person or creature of Evil alignment, the toucher takes 3d6 points of damage every round he holds the staff.

The staff can be fully recharged by exposing it to the light of the full moon once a month.

Robyn also has her mother's book of druid spells. It contains all the usual druid spells, plus the unique druid spells of briartangle, smoke ghost, thorn spray, and death chariot. (All of these are described in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ DM'S SOURCEBOOK OF THE REALMS.)

Personality: Robyn is a bright and friendly young woman who is solicitous of her friends and dedicated to the woods and animals that occupy so much of her time. She is much beloved in Corwell for her sunny personality and caring attitude.

However, when she or her friends are threatened, she can turn into a tigress in defense. Unlike many druids, who will wait for later revenge against despoilers of nature, Robyn is ready to attack when the action happens.

Motivations: Robyn is dedicated to the wild woods. Even before she knew of her heritage as a druid, Robyn was good with animals and an excellent tracker. However, she never hunted, though she accompanied her friend Tristan on his hunts. She used the time in the forest to sharpen her woods skills and gather healing herbs.

Once she learned of her heritage as the daughter of one great druid and the niece of another, she dedicated herself to becoming as good a druid as her mother and aunt. When Hobarth attempted to destroy the Moonwell, she fought him with every spell and skill at her command.

The only motivation that matches her devotion to the forest is her love for Tristan.

Background notes: Robyn is the daughter of Brianna Moonsinger, former chief druid (Neutral cleric who worships The Balance of nature) of the Moonshaes, and niece of Genna Moonsinger, the current chief druid.

Her father is unknown. When she was a year old, Brianna brought her daughter to King Bryon for safekeeping while she tried to prevent the growth of Kazgaroth. She failed.

The king raised Robyn as his own, saying that she was the daughter of a favorite guardsman who died in battle. In this way, he tried to keep her and her obvious power from being corrupted by the evil growing in the land.

When Kazgaroth arose, Robyn already had an instinctive knowledge of several druid spells, though she had no idea of how she knew them. By the time of the events of DARKWALKER ON MOONSHAE, she had gained the fourth level of experience as a druid without realizing what she was doing. She first realized her powers when she used an entangle spell to keep the gigantic firbolgs from killing Prince Tristan.

In the initial stages of the battle against Kazgaroth, she found herself capable of many feats of druid magic. When she next saw King Bryon, the king gave her the Staff of the White Well and the magic spellbook that had been her mother's. With these items she gained more expertise rapidly.

In a battle with Kazgaroth, when he turned himself into a winged beast, and she attempted to attack it where it rested in Caer Corwell, using both the staff and her own magic to good effect until her friends could arrive to drive the monster off.

In the climactic moments of the siege of Caer Corwell, Robyn destroyed most of the Bloodriders, then was abducted by the sole survivor, their leader, who attempted to sacrifice her to renew his powers. The intervention of Genna Moonsinger and her friends Newt and Kammryn the Unicorn kept her safe and gave her the knowledge of how to recharge the staff, which she had depleted in the siege. She then used the staff and her own magic to help Tristan and the others slay Kazgaroth.

Once Kazgaroth had been destroyed, Robyn realized that she had to learn more of her heritage and power. She temporarily turned her back on the prince she loved and went to Myrloch Vale with the great druid, her aunt Genna Moonsinger, who taught her more about being a druid and helped her learn to change shape as druids do and gain more spells.

Then Hobarth, the priest of Bhaal, came to Corwell. He had two purposes, sent to him by Bhaal. One was to destroy the power of the druids in Gwynneth, the other was to capture Robyn, the druid who had slain Kazgaroth, and offer her up in sacrifice to Bhaal. Toward these purposes, he found a great and powerful artifact of power.

When Tristan and Robyn slew Kazgaroth, one part of the beast survived, his heart, which turned into a black rock of great malignancy. This rock was found by Trahearn, a druid subverted to Kazgaroth, and it drove him mad. He tried to slay Robyn, but failed. Robyn, detecting the malignancy of the rock but not understanding its true evil, had her friend Newt fly the rock away and drop it in the forest. Hobarth was drawn to the heart and rescued it from the steadily growing circle of dead foliage around it.

Using the heart, Hobarth went to the site of Tristan's first battle with the Northmen a year before, and raised up an army of undead from the mass graves there. He marched this army to the Moonwell, knowing that the druids, masters of nature magic, had no magic that would affect such unnatural creatures.

Robyn fought by her mentor's side in a number of holding actions. When the remaining druids formed their line for the last-ditch defense of the Moonwell, the center of their religion, Genna gave Robyn a rune stick with spells of all the elements — to be used as needed. Robyn fought with her fellow druids until all was lost. But when the Goddess turned all her faithful druids into stone statues to save them from final degradation, Robyn had been drawn away from the fight. Realizing she could do no more against the victorious Hobarth, Robyn shape-shifted and flew to the isle of Alaron, where Tristan was trying to stay alive against the efforts of the high king.

The rune stick and her own magics and staff served them well in Alaron, and the rune stick incidentally helped Tristan fulfill all the requirements of the prophecy of Queen Allisynn.

Together with their other allies, they managed to overcome the machinations of the high king and Cyndre. When that menace was ended, a giant waterspout placed the crown of the high king at their feet, and Robyn carefully placed it on the head of her prince, now the high king of the Moonshaes.

They then turned back to Gwynneth, where they had to defeat Hobarth, or the Goddess would be destroyed.

Throughout this extended final battle, Robyn used her powers to help Tristan and try to maintain the Goddess, but the opposition of the corrupted Genna Moonsinger made this virtually impossible. By the end of the struggle, Myrloch Vale was devastated, without a growing thing anywhere except in specially protected places such as Synnoria. The Goddess' power on the Moonshae was virtually destroyed, and Robyn was the only surviving druid. Now she must somehow make a place for what is left of the Goddess to survive in the face of the new gods coming to the Moonshaes from the Sword Coast and beyond.

Other notes: Robyn has two friends who have not yet been described. One is Newt, the fairy dragon, and the other is Yazilliclik, a wood sprite. Newt is the complete hedonist until confronted with a task that needs to be done to save his friends, then he digs in and does his best. The minute a threat is over, however, Newt is eager to begin another game or play a practical joke on Robyn or some woodland animal.

As might be expected of so flighty a fairy dragon, Newt is a very young member of his race. His spell use is restricted to harmless illusions that do nothing but confuse a foe. He has no effect on reality.

Yazilliclik came to Robyn's attention when he attempted to warn the druids of the undead invasion. The wood sprites are a timid folk, but he stayed to help the druids as best he could with his tiny bow and arrows, and then went with Robyn and Newt to Alaron to join Tristan.

Though small, his abilities of flight and invisibility proved helpful on several occasions, and his unfailing courage when he or his friends were confronted by danger was an inspiration to all who fought alongside him.

Anyone meeting Robyn is likely to find her with an animal of some sort. This does not just mean domestic creatures such as Canthus, but bears, swallows, eagles, and any other woodland creature that might be in her vicinity. This affinity with wild creatures was one of the first signs of Robyn's burgeoning druidic powers.

In a fight, Robyn stays away from edged weapons, preferring first a cudgel, and then the Staff of the White Well. Her spell use is usually constrained to spells that constrict and annoy, rather than kill. However, she is capable of killing in defense of herself or those she holds dear.

As consort to the high king, Robyn makes it her particular duty to try to restore Myrloch Vale to its previous state. She is likely to find adventurers of similar inclination to seek out artifacts of the Goddess, where they may be held by firbolgs or other monsters, and restore them to the vale.

Shandril is a pretty, blonde-haired young woman of 17 winters. She tends to act on the advice of her heart and not her head, and is generally good-natured. She has an unshakable faith in the essential goodness of the world around her, although this does not mean that she is foolishly trusting of strangers. Far too many of the dark forces in the Realms would see her dead or enslaved for her to have that view, for she is the sole recipient of spellfire in this generation.

Her father was Garthond, an apprentice to the mage Jhavanter. The two of them fought several times against the Cult of the Dragon in Sembia. Jhavanter held an old tower on the eastern flanks of the Thunder Peaks, which he called the Tower Tranquil. Garthond dwelt there with him until mages of the cult destroyed his master in battle. Afterward, Garthond continued his studies and his feud with the cult.

He grew in power, and survived many attempts on his life by the cult. In a daring raid upon a cult caravan, Garthond rescued the magic-user Dammasae from cult captivity — they had her drugged, bound, and gagged — in the caravan heading to one of their strongholds.

Dammasae had adventured with Gorstag and others before this. She was known for a natural power she had — a power she wanted to develop, by practice and experiment. Dammasae could absorb spells and use their force of art as raw energy held within her. She could use her power to heal, or to harm in the form of fiery blasts. The cult kidnapped her to learn the secrets of spellfire, as it was called, for their own use, or at least to control her use of it to further their schemes.

Garthond protected and worked magic with Dammasae . . . and they came to love each other. They traveled much, seeking adventure as many fools do, and pledged their troth before the altar of Mystra in Baldur's Gate.

Unbeknown to Garthond, a cult mage, one Erimmator, cursed him in a battle of the art. This curse bound a strange creature called a balhiir, from another plane of existence, in symbiosis with Garthond to drain his magic.

They dwelt quietly in Elturel, and Dammasae bore Garthond a daughter, Shandril Shessair. They did not return to the Tower Tranquil and the dales, for the cult waited in strength, and the danger to their child was great. They waited eight months until she was old enough to travel.

They left Elturel with Gorstag, a burly fighter who favored the battle-ax. East they went, overland, and the cult was waiting for them. Somehow they saw through the disguises, probably by art. The cult attacked them at the Bridge of Fallen Man on the road west of Cormyr. Garthond was thrown down and utterly destroyed, but he won victory for his wife and daughter, and for Gorstag. He took nine cult mages and three swordsmen with him. Dammasae and Gorstag were wounded, and made for Shadowdale. Dammasae did not make it. She is buried on a little knoll on the north side of the road, the first one close to the road west of Toad Knoll, a place holy to Mystra.

Gorstag took the babe Shandril and headed south toward Deepingdale. He intended to leave her with the elves and return to the Tower Tranquil for Garthond's writings and objects of magic which were Shandril's inheritance. The elves brought word to him that the cult had broken into the tower and blasted their way into the cellars below. Then they used the great caverns they'd created as a lair for the dracolich Rauglothgor the Proud, whose hoard had outgrown his own lair.

Gorstag continued on to Deepingdale, where he used some gems from past adventures to buy an inn in Highmoon. Counting on his relative obscurity in the eyes of the cult, he raised Shandril as a servant there. He hid her lineage as long as he could.

At the age of 16, she left the inn, having secured for herself a position with the Company of the Bright Spear as a thief. By Tymora's will, they ran into a large party of the Cult of the Dragon on the banks of the Semberflow. The company was all but destroyed, and Shandril taken captive.

They held her in an old tomb, from which she escaped through magic hidden there. Unfortunately, she was teleported into the devil-infested city of Myth Drannor where she was captured by The Shadowsil, arch-mage of the Cult of the Dragon. The Shadowsil saw an immediate value in the virgin blood of Shandril, a key ingredient in maintaining the undead status of the cult's dracoliches.

The apprentice magic-user Narm saw her kidnapping and enlisted the help of the Knights of Myth Drannor to rescue her. With the aid of the Knights, Elminster, and Narm, she was rescued from the very jaws of the dracolich Rauglothgor.

In the confusion, Narm and Shandril were trapped in a cave-in. The Shadowsil followed them, intent on making their deaths very slow. In desperation, Shandril stuck her on the head with a crystal, releasing a balhiir, a magic absorbing creature feared by all who practice the art, possibly even the very one that had ridden her father. In its presence, The Shadowsil's magic did not work, and they escaped.

Meanwhile, the Knights and Elminster were holding off the dracolich. When Shandril and Narm reappeared, the balhiir followed, foiling all of Elminster's magic. To rid the party of the pesky balhiir, Elminster asked Shandril to try to absorb all of the energy of the balhiir. This awakened the dormant power of spellfire in her, inherited from her mother. Filled to the point of exploding, Shandril released the balhiir's energy as destructive bolts, destroying Rauglothgar, a large party of the cult, and most of the mountain on which they stood.

Elminster quickly realized that this could not be only the work of the balhiir, and deduced that Shandril had the power of spellfire. He took them to Shadowdale, where he tested and refined her ability. Despite several attempts on their lives by the Zhen-tarim and the Cult of the Dragon, Narm and Shandril were married in Shadowdale.

Every mage in the Realms is vying to hold or destroy Shandril. Her spellfire power represents danger to all spellcasters, and a chance for incredible power. They seek to find a way to control her, maybe by holding and threatening the life of Narm, or if that is not possible, to destroy her so that others cannot do the same.

Shandril is unlikely to ever gain more levels as a thief. To do so, she would have to adventure without using the spellfire power, something she is not likely to do. As a wielder of spellfire, she has fifth-level ability, the highest ever known to be held. From this point on, she breaks new ground with spellfire.

LEVEL/X.P. VALUE: IX/15,000

Normally seen as a man-sized, shapeless, softly glowing cloud with diamond like sparks of light inside it, the balhiir can flow and ooze like any gaseous form, never having a distinct outline. It is constrained by solid objects and needs an aperture of at least 1" in diameter to pass through. It has no manipulative organs at all, and it not affected by weather or gusts of wind, even moving through water uninhibited. They are completely unaffected by physical weapons, which just pass through them.

A native of the Negative Material Plane, the balhiir is rarely seen on the Prime Material Plane, as it takes very powerful magic to trap one and remove it from its native plane. It is not known if they are intelligent, though they appear to act on animal instincts rather than reason. If they do possess intelligence, their reasoning processes are so alien that few men could understand them.

The balhiir seems to spend its entire existence in search of energy to feed on and support itself. On its native plane, it can absorb any kind of energy, including experience levels or a being's life force. Some sages think they may be the natural predators of the xeg-yi. If on any other plane, it can only absorb raw magic. Since there is not much energy on the Negative Material Plane, the balhiir is very efficient in its use of energy. It can remain active for months without feeding. For periods longer than that, it enters a state of hibernation which can last indefinitely. Only the presence of life or magical energy will awaken it, which takes a full turn.

This strange creature can sense life forms and magical energy up to 10' away, even through solid rock. It always moves toward the greatest concentration of magic near it. Once in contact with the source of magic, it absorbs spell energy using the spellfire rules (see below) as if it had a constitution of 18. However, it does not use the energy like a spellfire wielder. Instead, one spell level will sustain an active balhiir for one day. It does not suffer damage from holding more than five times its constitution, but does shed those extra spell levels as radiant energy (light and heat) at the rates specified.

It can only "attack" once per round to actively drain magic. However, it can passively drain magic from many sources at once. Any spell or magical effect that is active within 10' of it is absorbed. For example, a mage fires a magic missile at an opponent. If a balhiir is within 10' of the path of the missile, it is absorbed into the creature. However, a wand lying more than 10' from the balhiir is safe, unless the balhiir "attacks" it.

There are only two known ways to destroy a balhiir. Its spell absorbing energy must be overloaded, just like the spellfire ability. This usually takes several mages of high level casting spells simultaneously at it. The other way is related to a strange ritual discovered by a long dead arch-mage. She found a way to bind the balhiir to an object or creature. Once bound, the balhiir can only be bound again by the creature that freed it. Its rescuer must either repeat the ritual to bind it to another object or creature, or can attempt to bind it to his or her own body by sheer force of willpower. This requires a save vs. death (since that is the price of failure). The total spell levels held by the balhiir is divided by the character's Constitution (round up), similar to the spellfire danger rating. A -1 is applied to the roll for each rating above 5. Therefore a 7 (after dividing spell levels by CON) means a -2 on the save. Until the creature's spell levels are used up, that character can use spellfire. Once used, the balhiir is destroyed and the character must make a system shock roll or die.

Spellfire

No sage in the Realms, not even Elminster, knows the origins or complete powers and limitations of spellfire. What is set down in this record, is what they do know.

Spellfire is the ability to absorb raw, chaotic, magical energy. Magic is thought to be the control, shaping and transferring energy from the Positive Material Plane on the Prime Material Plane. Spellfire collects the energy from almost any source and stores it in the person's body. At will, the person can release this energy in a variety of forms. If no control is attempted, it is released as raw chaotic energy of tremendously destructive potential.

The amount of spellfire a person can handle is determined by the person's Constitution. Spellfire is measured in spell levels, since that is the form of energy most likely to be absorbed. In the case of magic items, some translations can be made. Each plus of a weapon is one spell level. Each special ability is one spell level, unless the DM judges it to be of unusual potency, in which case the DM can raise that value. Dormant charges in wands, rods, and staves each represent one spell level, even if the spell being cast is of a higher level. If the effect of the wand is used on the wielder of spellfire, then use the level of the spell effect. Even dragon breath can be absorbed as one spell level per hit die.

The maximum spell levels that can be stored in the body is the Constitution score times 10. So Shandril can hold 140 spell levels worth of spellfire energy. However, the wielder takes risks anytime the amount of spellfire energy goes over five times his or her Constitution score.

Up to 5 × constitution: Completely safe, with no side effects.

Up to 6 × constitution: The wielder can feel the energy inside him or her. The wielder's eyes begin to glow. A touch by any creature or static magic device or spell effect causes 1d6 spell levels to be released at it. Every 24 hours, a Constitution check must be made; failure results in the wielder suffering 1d6 hit points of damage, which release 1 spell level of spellfire.

Up to 7 × constitution: The wielder's skin tingles, the eyes glow brightly. A touch causes 2d6 spell levels to be released. Every hour, a Constitution check must be made; failure results in the wielder suffering 1d6 hit points of damage, which release 1 spell level of spellfire.

Up to 8 × constitution: The wielder's skin has a slight glow, the eyes shine brightly enough to be seen at a distance in bright sunlight. The wielder can feel a destructive burning inside. A touch causes 3d6 spell levels to be released. Every turn a Constitution check must be made; failure results in the wielder suffering 1d6 hit points of damage, which release 1 spell level of spellfire.

Up to 9 × constitution: The wielder's entire body glows, the eyes are like torch lamps. The wielder is in pain, and must save vs. paralyzation to perform any action except randomly releasing great quantities of spellfire. A touch causes 4d6 spell levels to be released.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Every round a Constitution check must be made; failure results in the wielder suffering 1d6 hit points of damage, which release 1 spell level of spellfire.

Up to 10 × constitution: The wielder's body glows brightly and radiates heat from up to 3' away. The pain is great enough that a save vs. paralysis at -2 is needed to perform any action. Every segment a Constitution check must be made; failure results in the wielder suffering 1d6 hit points of damage, which release 1 spell level of spellfire.

The wielder of spellfire can release up to his or her Constitution in spell levels. Shandril can release 14 spell levels of spellfire per round. Spellfire effects that would use less than a spell level (for example, lighting Elminster's pipe) are rounded up to a full spell level. Each spell level contains enough energy to do 1d6 points of damage when directed as destructive blasts. The recipient does get to save vs. spells to take only half damage. When used for healing, each spell level heals 2 hit points.

Control over spellfire comes with experience, just like for other character classes. For the purposes of game play, the wielder of spellfire becomes a split-class character. Actions using the original character class abilities accumulate experience points for that class; adventuring using spellfire accumulates experience points for its control. Experience points for treasure cannot add to spellfire ability. The spellfire levels only determine control over that ability. They do not affect a character's hit points, to hit with weapons, saving throws or any other game function.

Use the magic-user experience point table to determine level of spellfire ability. Below is the table showing how much control the character has for each level.

First Level

The character is only able to use destructive blasts and cannot control the amount of spellfire very well. Add 1d4 -2 to the number of spell levels the character wants to hurl; the minimum is one level, the maximum his total Constitution points expressed as levels. Only one bolt per round is allowed, and it must be hurled in a straight line. Any magic item touched is absorbed, whether or not the wielder wishes it to be.

Second Level

The character can control how many spell levels of spellfire he or she is hurling as destructive bolts. The bolt can be bent every which way if desired. Otherwise, it is the same as the first-level ability. Magic items are only absorbed when using spellfire or when the spellfire wielder wills it.

Third Level

Two blasts per round, one from each hand, can be hurled, or one a round can be emitted from any other part of the body. Even with multiple blasts, the maximum number of spell levels of spellfire a character can discharge in a round is equal to the player's Constitution. The character can react with spellfire, although with only one blast that round, within five segments, minus the dexterity reaction adjustment. For example, a character with a dexterity of 17 has a +2 reaction adjustment and can react with spellfire in just 3 segments.

Fourth Level

Effects using less than one spell level are possible, although a full spell level is still deducted from the total. For example, lighting a candle takes less than one spell level.

Fifth Level

The spellfire wielder now has enough control to heal another person if he or she is in flesh-to-flesh contact. Up to three blasts can be delivered per round, one from each hand and one from the eyes. The total spell levels used in a given round is still limited by the character's Constitution.

Any further levels of ability or refinements of power are not known at the time of this writing. No spellfire wielder has ever shown abilities other than these to any spectator who survived.

Spellfire is always limited by line of sight (at least until the obstruction is destroyed), but not by distance. A to-hit roll is needed to strike anything more than 1" away that is taking defensive action. Immobile objects are automatically hit.

Enchanted creatures, or those that were created or sustained by magic, do not get a saving throw against spellfire. These creatures must always take full damage. Undead that drain life energy (or any Negative Material Plane creature) save at +2, unless, like the lich, they are created by or sustained with magic.

Certain spells, magic items and spell-like effects are immune to spellfire. The exact reasons for this is not known, but there is conjecture. Anything that absorbs magical energy without storing it would also absorb spellfire. It would also be immune to absorption by spellfire. Known examples: Ring of spell turning, rod of cancellation, wand of negation (if the beam hits the spellfire), sphere of annihilation, dispel magic (if cast in the same segment as spellfire is used).

Items or spells that store magical or life energy for future use, will absorb spellfire, but can also be absorbed by the spellfire wielder, as the energy is still available. Known examples: Ring of spell storing, certain ioun stones.

Similarly, spells or items that create barriers to all magic are immune to destruction by spellfire. However, they can be absorbed. Known examples: Scroll of protection from magic, wall of force, anti-magic shell.

Third-Level Human Magic-User

Narm is young man of 22 winters, handsome even in drab clothing. He is dark-haired and slim, with a serious face. His dark brown eyes reveal a lighter side not visible on his face. At times they can twinkle merrily as if sharing a secret joke. Due to his tutelage under Elminster, he is calm under fire. However, any threat to his beloved wife Shandrill will bring forth a fiery passion.

He was born in the city of Silverymoon in the North, of Hargun TamaraiTh, called "The Tall," and Fythuera. He never learned his mother's last name. Narm suspects that his father was a ranger, before he fell ill with the shaking fever. Hargun dealt in weapons and smith work. Fyth, to her husband and child, played the harp and traded as Hargun's equal. They had been wed for some time before Narm's birth. He remembers them as good people. Elminster suspects that they may have been members of the mysterious group known only as the Harpers.

While Narm was still a babe, his parents journeyed to Triboar and thence to Waterdeep. They traveled a great deal, up and down the northern Sword Coast, moving with the trade. They are dead now. While in Baldur's Gate, they became the innocent victims of a wizard's duel.

On the river bank, Algarzel Halfcloak and the Calishite arch-mage Kluennh Tzarr strove by art to destroy one another. Algarzel was in flight over the river when Kluennh Tzarr flung a fireball at him. Algarzel flew out of the way, but a ferry making the river crossing could not. Nearly all on board, including Hargun and Fyth, were killed. Hargun's last action in life was to fling his 11-year-old son into the river. Those watching the duel pulled him out of the water and took him ashore, but then left him to find his own way in the city.

In the years that followed, Narm learned all he could of the mages that duelled and killed his parents. He determined their names and native lands. Algarzel has not been seen since that duel. Narm has heard conflicting reports that he died in the duel, and that he escaped to another plane, never to return.

Kluennh Tzarr left for his Calishite citadel in triumph. Narm's informants say that he is served by dragons and keeps many slaves. Narm has vowed to be his death some day, or if another gets their first, to spit upon his grave.

Even at the tender age of 11, he knew he would need powerful magic to defeat the foreign arch-mage. Just another homeless urchin, in a city where there are dozens like him on every street, Narm set out to gain an apprenticeship with a mage, any mage. Pestering every mage who passed nearly got him turned into a toad or burnt to ashes several times.

Finally, at when Narm was 13, a mage said yes. Mirimmar turned out to be a pompous, sour man. His overwhelming pride made him weak. He never worked to strengthen his art where he lacked spells or technique. He couldn't, or wouldn't, see his weaknesses. Nonetheless, knowing nothing, Narm was able to learn a lot from him. Mirimmar had a temper and little patience. He was one of the laziest men Narm had ever met, so he needed an apprentice to do all the drudge work. From this Narm learned much of spell components and their preparation.

Mirimmar disliked conflict, so he never fought other mages to gain their spells. He was shining proud that no mage had ever challenged him. Those of real power saw him as a posturing know-nothing, with no spells worth seizing. Those of lesser power feared always that he must have something up his sleeve, he seemed so confident and fearless. His confidence killed him, and nearly took Narm as well.

He saw the abandonment of the Elven Court and Myth Drannor as his chance to become a great mage. He was going to walk right in and seize all the magic that he, and many others, thought was just lying around in the ruins. A perfect solution for a lazy wizard.

On the long journey to Myth Drannor, the pair stopped at the Rising Moon in Deepingdale. Narm caught the eye of Shandrill, a servant then, whom he thought quite pretty. Unable to escape from the weary lectures of his master Mirimmar, nothing else came of it.

Deep in the woods of the Elven Court, just outside of Myth Drannor, the hapless duo stumbled into a pair of elves. Representatives of the Knights of Myth Drannor, they were keeping out all intruders and warning innocent travelers that the city was infested with devils. Mirimmar assumed that they were lying to protect their own interests and doubled back with Narm to approach the ruins from another angle. This was no sooner done then they were set upon by bone devils that instantly slew Mirimmar.

While toying with Narm for the sport of it, the bone devils attracted the attention of a pair of the Knights of Myth Drannor, Lanseril and Illistyl. They rescued him and brought him to Shadowdale to heal.

Nightmares of taunting devils drove Narm to seek Myth Drannor once again on his own. He hoped to be able to confront his fears so he could lead a normal life without looking over his shoulder for non-existent devils. Narm watched as The Shadowsil took Shandrill captive. Recalling her from the inn, he quickly convinced the Knights of Myth Drannor that she needed rescuing.

A group of the Knights, Elminster, and Narm invaded the dracolich

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Rauglothgar's cavern home. In the ensuing battle, Narm and Shandril were trapped behind fallen rubble for quite some time. Human nature being what it is, they emerged quite smitten with each other.

It was at this time that spellfire was awakened in Shandril. Narm had to watch, a helpless spectator, as Shandril fought Rauglothgar and a horde of dragon cultists, slaying them all.

After the defeat of Rauglothgar and the Cult of the Dragon under the lower Tranquil, Narm and Shandril journeyed to Shadowdale with Elminster and the Knights of Myth Drannor. There Elminster personally saw to their education in the use of spells and spellfire. Narm did not so much learn to cast new spells from Elminster, as how to learn the art. The old sage taught him to discipline himself for both the learning and casting of spells.

Narm and Shandril were married in Shadowdale. Their honeymoon was short but sweet. The two decided to leave the peaceful community to seek safety through anonymity in the Realms. While in Shadowdale, too many outside factions tried to capture or kill them, not the least of which was the Cult of the Dragon. They could not endanger their friends by remaining in the dale any longer.

They decided to travel to the faraway city of Silverymoon where none would know them. The couple accepted the protection of the Harpers, through their agent Storm Silverhand, for the journey. Shandril wanted to pass through Highmoon to say goodbye to Gorstag and her other friends at the Rising Moon inn. After a series of adventures, they found themselves on the way to Cormyr with Delg, a dwarfish warrior and former companion of Shandril's. From there they passed from knowledge of most of the groups seeking to control Shandril and her spellfire ability.

Narm does not have any single place he considers to be home. At best, Baldur's Gate would be the most familiar city to him, seeing as he spent over 10 years there as a youth. However, there is nothing in the city for him now. His master Mirimmar is dead. All of that mage's possessions were either sold to make the journey to Myth Drannor, or disappeared when he was killed there.

Narm and Shandril are always met together, unless someone or something has forced them apart. Occasionally they are found in the company of powerful friends, such as Elminster or the Knights of Myth Drannor. They will work together as a team to overcome any obstacle that might stand in their way. Each would do anything to safeguard the other. Standing practice for the two is to have Narm keep Shandril safely filled with spellfire energy by casting spells at her every few days, or as needed.

At this point in his career, Narm does not carry any magic items, and only has a dagger for defense. Shandril would merely absorb magic items, and he was never trained to use warrior's gear.

Sixth-Level Barbarian Fighter

Wulfgar, son of Beornegar, has been blessed with the raw potential to become the complete hero. Agile and tough, and possessing strength beyond the range of normal men — to match his great size. Nearly 7' tall and fully 350 pounds — Wulfgar has packed more experience into his young 18 years than most fighters see in their entire careers.

He has experienced the best of both schools of fighting. Growing up on the tundra among the barbarians of Icewind Dale taught him ferocity in battle, an offensive style designed to simply blast through whatever defenses his opponents presented. And then he learned the more subtle skills of true swordsmanship under the tutelage of Drizzt Do'Urden. Drizzt was rough on the young warrior, slapping Wulfgar down with the flat of his weapons and showing him with yet another sting every weakness in his fighting style. And to the young Wulfgar, whose intelligence was sufficient to overcome the anger of his wounded pride, the lessons were effective.

"By the middle of the second week, Wulfgar was in complete control of (his war hammer), twisting its handle and head deftly to block against the two whirring scimitars, and responding with cautiously measured thrusts of his own. Drizzt could see the subtle change taking place as the barbarian stopped reacting after the fact to the scimitars' deft cuts and thrusts and began recognizing his own vulnerable areas and anticipating the next attack.

"The drow knew that his style of offense would not be the most effective mode for Wulfgar. The barbarian could use his unrivalled strength more effectively than deceptive feints and twists. Wulfgar's people were naturally aggressive fighters, and striking came more easily to them than parrying. The mighty barbarian could fell a giant with a single, well-placed blow.

"All that he had to learn was patience."

— from The Crystal Shard

Wulfgar was quick to see the advantages of the drow's lessons and in the short span of their training, he became a multidimensional warrior.

In battle, he wears no armor, but his heavy layers of wolf-skin furs serve as well as studded leather (AC 7). He can take a hit, even from a giant, and with his awesome strength, his opponents usually don't last long enough for a second strike. And if he were not powerful enough on his own, he wields Aegis-fang, possibly the mightiest weapon to be forged in the modern day Realms, a throwback to the times when the greatest dwarven smithies crafted weapons for the gods themselves. An offspring of the Hammer of Thunderbolts, Bruenor crafted Aegis-fang especially for Wulfgar. So wonderful was the result, an effort of the dwarfs considerable skill and his deep love for the boy, that Bruenor knew he had reached the ultimate achievement of his trade, and would never again fire up a forge.

The war hammer is fully +5 and scores double-damage dice (2d4 + 2, 2d4) on a hit, gaining full "to hit" and damage bonuses, including Wulfgar's Strength bonus, even when thrown! Furthermore, Aegis-fang unerringly reappears in Wulfgar's hand (and only in Wulfgar's hand) whenever he desires it, even if it has to disappear from someone else's hand to get there.

The war hammer's magic and power are tuned perfectly to Wulfgar alone, designed especially to match his great size and strength. In the hands of another, Aegis-fang is only +3, loses its special throwing bonuses, and does not score double-damage dice.

A powerful weapon still, but devastating in the hands of the young barbarian.

But there is much more to this man than physical prowess. Intelligent and observant, Wulfgar has learned to think before he speaks or acts, measuring each action against its probable consequences. Unlike his brutal kin, he is introspective, searching his own heart and conscience for the true values of the world. In this, too, Wulfgar looks to Drizzt as his guiding force.

"Wulfgar sat a moment longer in contemplation. The drow lived a hard and materially empty existence, yet he was richer than any man Wulfgar had ever known. Drizzt had clung to his principles against overwhelming circumstances, leaving the familiar world of his own people by choice to remain in a world where he would never be accepted or appreciated.

"He looked at the departing elf, now a mere shadow in the gloom. 'Perhaps we two are not so different,' he mumbled under his breath."

— from The Crystal Shard

A wide world lays open to Wulfgar now, and he is determined to see it. From the spirited Catti-brie he has viewed, for the first time, the true worth of a woman, and from Bruenor and Drizzt he learned to see his enemies as people, as individuals whose lives extend beyond the immediacy of the battlefield.

And Wulfgar understands that there is much more for him to learn, and that each new experience brings him closer to finding the truth about himself, and the meaning of his life.

These revelations would be extraordinary to a person from the everyday civilized world in the Forgotten Realms, but to a youth bred amidst the savagery of the tundra barbarians, they are even more incredible.

Wulfgar was born the son of Beornegar into the Tribe of the Elk, one of the most powerful tribes which followed the caribou migration along the length of Icewind Dale. Living on a thin edge of subsistence, they were a warlike people, and so totally male-dominated that many of the women didn't even have names.

Wulfgar's father was in high standing among the tribe, a personal advisor to the great and cruel King Heafstaag, a battle-scarred veteran of incredible strength. Yet the young Wulfgar sensed that his father, though obedient to his rank and position, did not care for the king. Beornegar was a dreamer and stubbornly believed that there must be a better way for his people to live. When Wulfgar was still a boy, Beornegar went off on a quest that could bring him the power and the wealth to find a new road for his people.

But he never returned.

Still, the young Wulfgar fared well.

Tall and straight, he was well-suited for a society strictly structured in a pecking order according to strength. By the time he had reached adolescence, he had achieved the honorable position of Heafstaag's standard bearer, and many looking upon him — he was already larger than most of the men — envisioned him as a future leader of their people.

Then came the first great battle of Icewind Dale, when all the barbarian tribes united and invaded Ten-Towns. In the fierce battle of Bryn Shander, Wulfgar was cut down by the dwarf, Bruenor. But he was not killed, and when the battle had ended — and the barbarians had been routed — Bruenor found the boy and, seeing some special glimmer in his eye that did not reflect the normal savagery of a barbarian, spared his life, in exchange for five years of servitude in the dwarven mines.

It was the turning point in his life, the one act that allowed the young man to fully find the road to his potential. Here, he met Catti-brie and saw the new dimensions of a woman. Here, he met Drizzt Do'Urden and found a hero for those principles so long sublimated under the limitations of his savage tribe. And here, he came to know Bruenor, so ferocious with his deadly ax, yet preferring the harmony of peaceful coexistence.

"The work paid dividends physically as well. Chopping stone and pounding metal had corded the barbarians muscles, redefining the gangly frame of his youth into a hardened girth of unrivalled strength. And he possessed great stamina, for the tempo of the tireless dwarves had strengthened his heart and stretched his lungs to new limits.

"Wulfgar bit his lip in shame as he remembered his first conscious thought after the Battle of Bryn Shander. He had vowed to pay Bruenor back in blood as soon as he had fulfilled the terms of his indenture. He understood now, to his own amazement, that he had become a better man under the tutelage of Bruenor Battlehammer, and the mere thought of raising a weapon against the dwarf sickened him."

It was indeed the true Wulfgar who emerged from those years of servitude. He understood the visions of his father for the first time in his life, and even fulfilled Beornegar's unfinished quest, the slaying of the dragon, Icingdeath.

Then he returned to his people, the dragon's horns a trophy sufficient to allow him to challenge for the throne. And when he had killed Heafstaag, he laid a new road for the barbarians of Icewind Dale, even rallying them behind the people of Ten-Towns against the invading goblin army of the evil Akar Kessell, and then forging a new alliance on the tundra, in which all the people of Icewind Dale, barbarian and Ten-Towner alike, united against their common foe, the ever-encroaching wilderness of the savage frontier.

But after the dust of the battle had settled, and the new alliance forged, Wulfgar abdicated his new position as barbarian king, giving over the throne to an old friend of his father's, a man of similar conscience. Wulfgar would have made a great king, even at that tender age, but his heart was for the road. He wanted to learn, to grow, to see everything that his existence in Icewind Dale had denied him. And so he took up with Drizzt and Bruenor, and later was joined by Regis, on their road south in search of Mithril Hall.

Not without reservations, for he left behind the one thing in the dale that still intrigued him, and always would — Catti-brie.

But he had a destiny to fulfill, out there, on the open road and in the wide world. Catti-brie understood it even better than he, and did not bid him to stay.

By the fates, he would return to her when his journey had ended.

On The Barbarians

There is a special connotation accompanying the word "barbarian" that strikes a chord of terror across all the Realms. Barbarian raids are normally more devastating than orc attack, and just as savage. Trained soldiers, veterans of a hundred fights, quiver at the approach of a barbarian horde.

And yet, physically, a barbarian is a fighter plain and simple, no more trained (even less, formally) and no more skilled, and typically wielding inferior weapons and armor. So why does the sweat bead on the foreheads of the fighters of the civilized world at the mere mention of the word "barbarian?"

Because the mind-set of a barbarian transcends the boundaries of a normal fighter. Fanatical servants of Tempus, or some other god of battle, barbarians honestly do not fear death in battle, believing it a service to their god that will ensure them a place of honor in the land of their final reward.

And in most cases, the barbarian has little to lose. Barbarian life, except for short stretches of plunder, is materially barren and knows no comforts. They are a people existing with one aspiration: glory in battle.

Furthermore, the hard existence of a tribesmen weeds out the weakest early in their lives. Typically, a barbarian fighter will have gained more experience by the time of his 20th birthday than most fighters will ever know. And someone facing one of these warriors in battle understands that he is fighting a survivor of that brutal existence, one of the strong members of the tribe who has never known deterred from the strict codes of discipline that rule barbarian life and determine their survival. Many a soldier has cursed the meals that softened his belly and slowed his sword arm in the last breaths of his life before the club or war hammer of a hardened barbarian crushed him.

Roleplaying Tips

While Wulfgar has widened his vision of the world to include the principles and conscience not common among his people, he is still young, and still bound by a code of honor and pride. Insults may get offenders killed, honorably, of course, though in most cases, Wulfgar would temper his rage enough to accept an apology.

He is a champion of the underdog, a fearless fighter, and a loyal friend. His vein of sympathy runs deep, and he will try to relieve suffering wherever he finds it, at any personal cost.

On a large scale, he is a charismatic and dominating young man (remember he altered the very way of life for the peoples of Icewind Dale), but in one-to-one encounters, Wulfgar remains a bit unsure of himself and is easily embarrassed, which sometimes leads him to anger — bridled rage, but rage nonetheless.

But he is young, and in his drive to find his truest self, he will learn. He will grow wiser and stronger.

A chilling thought for would-be enemies!

Tall and slender, and bending with the grace of a willow in the spring breeze, Alustriel, the high lady of Silverymoon, might be the most impressive and beautiful leader in all the Northland. Men have been known to fall in love with her in a single glance, bards won't write about her for fear that their words, however sweet, would not do her justice.

It is more than Alustriel's physical beauty that awes them all. In truth, she is beautiful, silver-haired and ever-young, and with a glowing face and eyes that sparkle like the sun dances on the a clear river, but there are so many more dimensions to this woman. Keenly bright and wise, she is one of the most powerful wizards in all the Forgotten Realms, though she rarely displays her powers openly. She rules Silverymoon, the largest city in the realms north of Waterdeep and isn't anyone's puppet or figurehead, to be sure — none would make that mistaken assumption more than once!

Her reign is legitimate, her power well-earned, and her judgment fair and consistent. She is a peacemaker to the end, seeking a harmony of the goodly races so that they may fully dominate the wild lands of the North. Her magical restraint is legendary, using her spells only for personal reasons such as teleporting to her favorite grove on a moonlit night, and even then humbly and without show.

She might use her spells to enhance the atmosphere at an important meeting by creating Mordenkainen's magnificent mansion, or even to avoid an embarrassing situation by teleporting in someone who would have arrived late. But never would Alustriel use her magic to gain an unfair advantage in a diplomatic situation.

Her favorite spell is shape change, and she views it as an educational experience in seeing the world from many different perspectives. She also likes non-destructive evocations such as material, spells of learning such as legend lore, and locomotion spells like teleport without error and, another favorite, fly. Her day-to-day spells will typically reflect a blend of these types, and rarely, if ever, contain an offensive spell, reflecting Alustriel's belief that she has enough magic-user bodyguards hovering about her to protect her. (Though, in truth, she uses her teleports and the like primarily to get away from those very same bodyguards.)

Most of the magical items that she has acquired, and the few she has fabricated, she has given away, figuring that others could use them more than she. She does retain bracers of defense AC 2 (in the form of golden bracelets), a ring of protection +2, a wand of illumination, an amulet of proof against detection and location, and a cloak and boots of elvenkind.

She is indeed an impressive lady, and was born into a family of impressive women. Her sisters include The Simbul of Aglarond; Storm Silverhand, a bard of high renown; Dove Falconhand, an equally impressive ranger; and Sylune, the witch of Shadowdale, who was killed in the Year of the Worm when she broke her staff of the magi in a retributive strike against an ancient huge red dragon. (The dragon was killed as well.)

Certainly Alustriel, the second-born of the group, stands tall in their midst, taking a back seat to none of them. From her earliest days, she was a visionary, seeing the world in her own image of utopia. With her intelligence and empathetic prowess, it didn't take her long to understand how to create this vision of beauty around her.

She began adventuring at an early age, perfecting her art as a wizard. Her masters marvelled at her incredible pace. Soon she was beyond them, understanding the very fabric of spells and able to conjure the magical powers for all of her needs. While most wizards bend the powers to gain their ends, Alustriel seemed more to work as an extension of the forces, as though she had formed a symbiotic relationship with the natural forces of the universe.

And as she began her adventuring career early, Alustriel ended it early, determined to carve out a settled piece of utopia in the savage wilderness. Now Silverymoon, a city of 26,000, reflects her vision. Here the pen truly is mightier than the sword, here the sculptor's hammer outweighs the war hammer, and spells of creation are valued above those of destruction. All who come in pursuit of knowledge and the arts are welcomed, and it is not uncommon to see an elf and a dwarf walking side by side discussing things far removed from conflict.

And in the savage North, only a woman as gentle, kindly, and inspiring as Alustriel could hold this dream together.

Roleplaying tips: Unlike Piergeiron, who took a different road to a similar end, Alustriel seems not at all reserved around friends or strangers. She is open and unsuspecting (for, in light of the tenets of her city, to be anything else would make her a hypocrite) and willing, and wanting, to forgive most indiscretions.

But Alustriel is also a legislator and, when necessary, a shrewd bargainer. The responsibility of thousands falls squarely upon her shoulders, and though she accepts the burden, and is more than able to execute the office, her spirit seems more that of a child, running free without worry through grassy fields.

But the promise of Silverymoon is more than ample reward for the labors of her duties, and she has no complaints—

MINOR CHARACTERS

Except on those very rare occasions when she is forced to go against everything she believes, such as the time she had to refuse a drow elf entry into Silverymoon because of the political implications. Her lament was quite evident in her apology to that drow, Drizzt Do'Urden, and it could be that she was speaking more to her own conscience than to Drizzt when she said:

"All that I ask you to understand is that, as leader of my city, I am forced at times to act for the overall good, whatever the cost to an individual."

Commonly remembered spells:

- First-level — Affect normal fires, burning hands, detect magic, melt.
- Second-level — ESP, flaming sphere.
- Third-level — Fireball, flame arrow.
- Fourth-level — Fire charm, fire shield, fire trap.
- Fifth-level — Conjure fire elemental.

Physical description: Alzegund is a human male Red Wizard of Thay; he is an old, bald, war-scarred necromancer who openly wears robes marked on the breast and back with a red flame badge, and travels the trade routes with six grim men-at-arms, guarding those caravans the Red Wizards want kept safe.

Equipment: Alzegund has a magical bag of tricks and a wand of lightning. He also has bracers of AC6, and his robes are actually a cloak of protection +1. If forced to fight hand-to-hand, he fights with a dagger filigreed with silver.

Personality: Alzegund is a member of the School of Evocation, and specializes in fire magics. Because he does so much traveling and guarding, he has not climbed as high in his profession as his age would indicate, but he seems to enjoy his work. Indeed, while his guard maintains a tight-lipped and dour watch over him, he is continually buying drinks for other travelers and exchanging stories, some of them at the expense of his masters, the Red Wizards.

Motivations: Alzegund also spies on the military strength of Cormyr and of Zhentil Keep. Like all Red Wizards, his main loyalty is to himself, and he seeks to learn as much as he can to make himself useful to the Red Wizards.

However, he is not working so much to strengthen the Red Wizards as he is to strengthen his own position on the Inner Sea. At his age, he realizes that he will probably never become a master of a school or a zulkir, so he intends to do as well as he can and retire to some non-Thayvian area, where he can create his own power base.

Background notes: Alzegund was born into the noble clan of Agneh in Thay. He had risen to the second level of accomplishment as a magic-user when an intra-family feud resulted in the death of his parents and most of his siblings.

Alzegund was, in fact, studying under an uncle who was not involved on either side of the feud. By keeping to his studies and out of family discussions, he managed to stay alive. He made his peace with his father's murderers and continued his studies.

Five years later, as a successful seventh-level magic-user, he managed to successfully use charm monster on a powerful monster, and unleashed it in his father's enemy's bedroom.

The next day he was on his way on his first trip outside of Thay, the apprentice to the wizard guardian of a trade caravan. He has been plying the trade-ways of the Inner Sea, and avoiding his family, ever since.

Alzegund's intent in being chummy in the taverns with everyone who will drink with him is principally to draw out his new-found companions and get information from them, making them think he is a harmless toss-pot who loves the Red Wizards no more than most of their neighbors. Very few high-ranking officials are taken in by this demeanor, but he can often get vital information from lower-ranking persons, and sometimes uses his magics (he is a proficient alchemist) to do favors for them, for which he then claims a reward by forcing information from his "friends" or even having them steal things for him.

Other notes: When dealing with Alzegund, a character should be sure to check his neck when leaving, for fear the Thayvian has managed to get his head from him as "surety." Alzegund takes his role as trader and caravan master very seriously.

His route takes him from Suzail in Cormyr to Selgaunt in Sembia, thence to Procampur across the Dragon Reach and then along the coast to Telflamm, where he meets his contacts and arranges for the next trip. He often makes side trips to Hillsfar, Turmish, the Pirate Isles, Altumbel, and Westgate. A trading trip takes from one to three years, depending on how many stops he makes and the extent of trade and materials necessary to take back to Thay.

During troubled times, such as when Zhentil Keep is being particularly aggressive, he enlists extra aid in convoying his goods. Since these goods often include slaves, he is very careful about who he is hiring.

His men-at-arms are all human males. Their membership changes over the years, but now consists of the sergeant, who is a sixth-level fighter, three fourth-level fighters who have been with Alzegund for a couple of years, and two second-level sword apprentices who are on their first trip with him.

Characters running into Alzegund can find him a fund of information, a good target for a robbery (he usually carries about 20,000 gp in coins, gems, and a couple items of jewelry), or a potential patron. Characters can get flimflammed or supported by Alzegund. And, of course, Alzegund is one way of getting to see the mysterious land of Thay, though this could involve getting there in a slave coffle.

Due to his alignment, Alzegund will live up to the letter of any agreement he makes with characters, but will try to weasel out of any contract by using the contract against the characters.

Sixth-Level Human Cavalier

S:15 I:13 W:9 D:11 C:14 CH:11

Armor: Plate mail, ring of protection +1.

Languages: Common, Elven, Dwarfish.

Common skills: Armorer.

Possessions: Ring of protection +1 (always worn on right hand), broad sword +3 (2d4 + 3/1d6 +4), shield +1, knife (enchanted to transform into a short sword on command).

Weapons of proficiency: short sword (1d6/1d8), broad sword (2d4/1d6 +1), long sword (1d8/1d12), dagger (1d4/1d3), lance (3d3/3d6, double if mounted), mace (1d4 + 1/1d4 + 1).

Experience points: 65,000.

Money: 45,000 gp.

Combat: Mourngrm leads any battle he fights. He feels it his duty to bear the brunt of the assault, inspire his comrades to greater valor, and protect those unable to defend themselves. He attacks with the most powerful sword available, preferably his own broad sword. He always carries a knife that can transform on command into a short sword.

Mourngrm is dominated by concern for his wife. If she is in the same battle, he battles to a protective position in front of her. If she is directly attacked, he will ignore the rest of the battle in his effort to get to her. If Shaerl is wounded severely and falls unconscious, Mourngrm will enter a berserker rage centered on whoever harmed her. Holding Shaerl hostage will not work; even if she is threatened with immediate death, Mourngrm will attempt a rescue rather than give in to her captor.

Personality: Mourngrm likes to think he is benevolent and protective. He believes in the obligations of the nobility and the strong to protect and guide those weaker or in need of help. He knows what is right. If events suggest he might be wrong, he subconsciously denies it and rearranges things to support his belief in his infallibility. He does not consciously deny the truth, but he will deny truth the chance to be heard.

His opponents and few detractors hold him to be smothering, paternalistic, and condescending.

In the past, Mourngrm was privately bothered by his beloved wife's past. He rationalized it by believing that she stole only from evil people or monsters. In any event, he considers her retired, hence her past is irrelevant.

Relatives: Shaerl Amcathra (wife), child (name unrecorded).

Allies: Elminster, Harpers, Randall Morn, Knights of Myth Drannor.

Patron deity: Tymora.

Home: The Tower of Ashaba, Shadowdale.

Personal history: He began as a young noble of Waterdeep and was a youthful ally of the Harpers. He admired Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun, the arch-wizard. Mourngrm jumped at Khelben's offer to join Doust Sulwood, lord of Shadowdale. Mourngrm was an enthusiastic member of Blackstaff's adventuring band as they furthered the cause of good in the Dragonreach area. Mourngrm served ably in many small skirmishes and adventures and was able to amass a sizable fortune. The relationship was broken when Blackstaff and the others decided to renounce their holdings and return to full-time adventuring as the "Knights of Myth Drannor." Mourngrm wanted to join, but Blackstaff persuaded him to assume sovereignty over Shadowdale.

As a ruler, Mourngrm has proven to be a shrewd, cautious, and diplomatic lord of authority and foresight. He has periodically returned to the field of battle, such as the time he aided Randall Morn of Daggerdale in resisting Zhentil Keep, or his frequent battles against drow invasions from the subterranean realms.

Mourngrm was surprised and pleased when the new Cormyrian emissary proved to be the noblewoman Shaerl Rowanmantle. They became very friendly, then intimate, although Mourngrm felt his duties kept him from marrying. He was puzzled when she insisted on joining him on his forays in defense of Shadowdale. He felt this was unseemly and dangerous for a woman of the court. When she revealed that she was an extremely competent thief and combatant, Mourngrm was at a loss for words. He was inwardly torn between his strong adherence to the law and his love for Shaerl. He often rationalized his feelings in that it was all right for her to be a thief if her prey were Shadowdale's enemies. Still, he grew distant as time passed.

He was shattered when, in the midst of a fierce battle against devils, Shaerl died for him, but then the love in her sacrifice filled him with the power to seize victory. Later, Mourngrym discovered that Shaerl had kept from him the secret that she was carrying his child.

Mourngrym realized just how great a fool he had been. He spared no effort or expense in seeking her resurrection. He was the first sight her reborn eyes looked upon. Their wedding was a grand affair. She soon bore him a child, and it looked like a happy ending was finally upon them.

Mourngrym has long been an ally of the Harpers, but it was only recently revealed that he was in fact a Harper himself. It is unknown when Mourngrym actually joined their ranks.

As middle age and fatherhood took hold, Mourngrym's attitudes subtly altered. His normal self-confident benevolence has become smothering paternalism.

Weapons of proficiency: Short sword, dagger, dart.

Experience points: 36,000.

Money: 45,000 gp.

Combat: Shaerl prefers to avoid combat. If possible, she will flee rather than fight. If her companions are threatened, she fights with cunning and skill. She usually remains in the rear, throwing darts and knives past or between her allies. When adventuring, she carries all her weapons. Even when she is at court, she is still a formidable foe. She always wears her ring of protection and carries her two daggers in places where she can get at them within an eye's blink.

Appearance: Shaerl is an attractive, patrician woman with a graceful body that retains a firm muscle tone into her mid-30s. Her russet hair is bound at shoulder length but actually reaches to her hips. In court she favors simple gowns with elaborate embroidery. When on an adventure or a nocturnal foray, she prefers loose, dark garments and binds her hair into a tight club.

Personality: Shaerl is adventurous and danger-seeking. She dislikes the mundane, unexciting life led by her parents and siblings. Although Shaerl upholds the obligations and duties of her station, she longs for her wild youth and the adventuring life.

She is fiercely protective of Mourngrym and their child. If the child is threatened, she will remorselessly deal with the child's captor in as painful a way as possible. She acts as Mourngrym's bodyguard and discreetly deals with threats to him.

Relatives: Mourngrym Amcathra (husband), child (name unrecorded).

Allies: Lord Thomdor.

Patron deity: Mask.

Home: Tower of Ashaba, Shadowdale.

Personal history: Shaerl was born into a noble Llairhavenn family of Suzail, a city in the kingdom of Cormyr. She had a normal upper-class upbringing, ing, full of pomp and luxury, and she became utterly bored with it all. There were very few socially accepted outlets for adventuresome girls of her class. Frustration and a natural mischievousness turned her toward thievery. She became a self-taught cat burglar. She secretly practiced breaking into her parents' quarters and vaults, then moved on to break into other noble houses as her skills and self-confidence grew. She never stole that much; she mostly collected souvenirs of her escapades.

Her nocturnal activities were eventually detected. Unbeknownst to her, she was observed and identified by two captains of the city guard. They recognized the problems that might result from a simple arrest and reported their findings to Lord Thomdor. Thomdor himself was loath to punish the enterprising lass. He knew the problems inherent in a scandal involving a noble family. He knew her, her family, and especially the spirit that burned so fiercely within her. After deliberation, he summoned her to a secret, personal meeting; even her parents were unaware of it. Shaerl was immediately suspicious, but she knew she had no choice but to accede to his request. She was surprised at how long she had been under observation. She was even more surprised when Thomdor made her an offer. He offered her the chance to do something both meaningful and entertaining. She was to go to Shadowdale as an emissary of Cormyr and attempt to ally herself with Mourngrym, lord of the dale. There she was to learn all she could about both him and the dale, as well as spread Cormyrian views and explain their interests in the Shadowdale area. Then she was to report back to Lord Thomdor. The alternative he offered was public exposure, disgrace, and imprisonment.

She accepted, of course. Thomdor later made a public request for her services, which she dutifully accepted. No one was ever aware of the earlier meeting. Her parents were a bit puzzled by the sudden display of civic responsibility, but soon turned their attention to the current social calendar.

Shaerl originally resented her mission since it was not her own idea. She found Mournngrym to be a heroic, charismatic figure, but she quietly blamed him for her misfortune. As time progressed, her feelings changed. Despite her inner misgivings, she took a liking to the man. They became lovers. When her mission was ostensibly completed, she decided to stay in Shadowdale.

Shaerl found that Mournngrym's forays in the defense of his realm offered her a chance to indulge in the excitement and danger she craved. She quietly gathered suitable equipment for an itinerant thief of her stature. When Mournngrym set off on one of his forays, she followed at a distance. That night she appeared in camp and announced she was going with him. Mournngrym was reluctant to have his lady love join him on adventures into the wild lands. He was extremely surprised to discover that she was a well-trained thief and combatant, though she had to knock him to the ground twice before the idea set in that she could take care of herself.

Shaerl's skills proved helpful in many an adventure. She grew far more skilled than she might have as a simple cat burglar. The danger of the quest gave her a fire she had not known. Even her love for Mournngrym gained in intensity. Mournngrym, on the other hand, grew increasingly distant as she gained experience. He grew cooler toward her; although he still loved her, he wasn't sure he liked her. Shaerl sadly realized that she had lost him. When she discovered that she was pregnant with his child, she chose not to tell him. She still loved him, though she kept her fire inside. The turning point came during a battle in the woodlands of Myth Drannor. In a move that surprised everyone, Shaerl sacrificed herself in order to protect Mournngrym.

She remembered little of what followed except for vague images of a mostly forgotten dream. When she awoke, she discovered that Mourn-grym arranged her resurrection. The two publicly declared their love for each other and were married soon after. The first pregnancy was terminated by Shaerl's death, but she was determined to try again. Shaerl recently bore Mournngrym their first child, the future lord of the dale.

Thomdor is well pleased with her. She is welcome anytime in Cormyr. Her parents are still oblivious to her true activities. They are pleased that she is member of the ruling nobility somewhere and delighted that she has played an important part in the life of the Cormyrian king, Azoun, since this reflects well on their own family's status.

Motherhood made her take a hiatus from thieving activities. Within the year though, the old urges returned. Shaerl returned to practicing her more acrobatic skills on the night-shrouded rooftops of Shadowdale. She has also begun to publicly display some of her skills. She has become a figure of admiration for many daughters of the Shadowdale court.

Blackstaff also has the spells catapult, Detho's delirium, and decastave in his spellbooks, but rarely uses them except in special circumstances. They can all be found in the description of Detho's Libram in FR4, THE MAGISTER. Similarly, his spell dismind is in his books, as described in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ sourcebook.

Physical description: Khelben is a tall (6'), well-muscled, bearded human male, with a receding hairline, black hair shot through with white, and a distinguished manner. He always carries his trademark black staff, which is his staff of power.

Equipment: Khelben has bracers of AC2, a ring of protection +3, a staff of power, and a wand of banishment (see FR1, WATERDEEP AND THE NORTH, or FR4, THE MAGISTER). No doubt he has many other items, scrolls, and potions available, but these items are always with him.

Among his possessions, Blackstaff has the Libram of Lathintel, which is described in FR4, THE MAGISTER.

Personality: Khelben is often thought (untruly) to be humorless. His public persona is gravely wise, but not pompous. He likes to encourage young magic-users, particularly those he thinks he can recruit into the Harpers.

Motivations: Khelben is dedicated to furthering civilization and making the world safe for everyone. He is always working to influence this or that incident or trend, looking years ahead. He is a forester and a painter, and has trained many mages of note.

Background notes: Khelben Arunsun has a long history on the Sword Coast. Now he is considered the most powerful and influential arch-mage of the Sword Coast and is one of the rulers of Waterdeep (though he does not admit this openly, most people in the North suspect it).

He is allied to the Harpers, and instrumental in keeping the Lords Alliance (of Silverymoon, Sundabar, Neverwinter, and other "good" cities of the North) with Waterdeep intact. He is learned in the history, lore, and traditions of magic as practiced by humans in the North since the rise from barbarism.

Other notes: It is suggested that DMs adjust Khelben's level upward to 10 levels above the strongest PC, for use in humbling runaway characters.

Those who have seen the good king of Cormyr report him to be a handsome man, standing just under 6' tall. He maintains the regimens of exercise and drill he adopted as a young cavalier and is in excellent shape for a middle-aged man. Azoun's brown hair and beard are only now beginning to show hints of silver.

He is happily married, and his wife, Filfaeril Selzair, is as strong-willed and as cultured as her husband. Azoun and Filfaeril have two daughters, Alusair and Tanalesta. Their only son, Foril, died when he was only 2. The loss of his only male heir remains a source of great anguish for Azoun.

Azoun's nickname — "The Purple Dragon" — is derived from his battle standard. The banner with the purple dragon on a black field has flown over Cormyr for many, relatively peaceful, years. This long period of prosperity, coupled with Azoun's reputation of being a just ruler, has made Azoun's subjects loyal and content.

However, Azoun himself has found the price of rulership difficult to pay. Because he is a devoted father and husband, he has often found the demands of state far too taxing on his personal time. Also, because Azoun is idealistic, he finds the idea of sometimes placing the survival of the state over the needs of its individual citizens very disturbing.

Vangerdahast, the royal court magician and Azoun's closest friend, will often advise the king on these difficult matters. Because "Vangy" does not share Azoun's Lawful Good outlook, favoring instead the tenets of Law and Neutrality, he will often attempt to persuade Azoun that his rigid belief in Good cannot always be functional in the "real world."

Yet, despite any momentary doubts Azoun may have about the conflicts of individual liberty vs. duty to the state, he will always make his decisions based upon loyalty and duty to the "higher" good of the state and the promotion of peace in the kingdom. In functional terms, this means he expects all able citizens of Cormyr to serve or support the large standing army established in the kingdom. Any adventuring parties of four or more members based in Cormyr must be registered with the king and will likely have a set term of service they must fulfill in the army each year.

Azoun recognizes the sacrifice his citizens must make to support the state. Because of this, he is determined to make Cormyr the safest and most peaceful kingdom possible. Adventurers will encounter many facets of Azoun's "peace policy" every day they spend in Cormyr.

Azoun does not permit mercenaries or adventurers free rein in the city when they are not under binding contract to a local merchant or nobleman. Adventurers wishing to make their permanent residence in Cormyr must obtain a charter from Azoun. Public display of weapons is also limited, and adventurers who travel armed in public must have their weapons bound in "peace strings," ornate cords which are knotted around a weapon to deter its quick use.

Though Azoun does maintain his skills as a swordsman, he personally favors the finer things his position can offer him. He is a patron of the arts, and his court at Suzail is one of the most refined in all the Realms. He dabbles in both poetry and music, but is especially fond of drama.

This may account for his penchant for disguises. Often, when he ventures out of the court, he will try to pass himself off as a merchant. He is, in fact, quite adept at this and can sometimes fool even the most astute observer.

The other possible motivation for Azoun's use of disguises is his long-standing feud with the thieves and assassins guilds in and around Cormyr. Azoun detests thieves and assassins, and he went so far as to drive the Fire Knives, an organization of assassins, from Cormyr. There are many practitioners of the thieving arts who would be happy to see Azoun dead, and he has been the object of many assassination attempts. One of these attempts involved the creation of Alias by the Fire Knives, among others.

For their very substantial financial backing of Cassana as she prepared her experiment for life, the Fire Knives were allowed to include their sigil on Alias' arm and program her for one task. The Fire Knives decided their highest priority was the assassination of Azoun. As soon as she heard King Azoun's voice, Alias was instructed to attack and kill him immediately. The plot failed when Giogioni Wyvernspur, a Cormyrian nobleman, imitated Azoun's voice at a wedding. Alias attacked Giogi, and it was only luck, and the interference of Alias' friends, that saved Giogi's life.

Azoun has a very high regard for magic and magic-users, and he recognizes the great potential for good and evil among practitioners of the magic arts. Mages of fifth level or higher must register with the government. The magic-user's name, sigil, and abode are recorded with Vangerdahast. The royal magician and the Council of Mages in Suzail, also known as the "war wizards," will often call upon the mages registered with them for state service in times of crisis.

Azoun wears bracers of defense (AC 3), and a +3 ring of protection when not in battle. He also wears a ring of free action at all times. In battle, in true cavalier style, Azoun wears a magnificent suit of +5 full plate armor, and carries a +2 shield emblazoned with his standard. He owns a large number of enchanted swords but prefers to fight with either his vorpal sword or +4 defender.

In playing Azoun, GMs should remember that the king is committed to the safety and freedom of his people. He will deal harshly with troublemakers and will tend toward overgenerosity with those who want to help the kingdom. However, Vangerdahast will be at his side or very close by at all times to make sure things don't get out of hand.

Akabar Bel Akash, from the rich and prosperous land of Turmish, is a merchant and "mage of no small water," as they say in that part of the Realms. Akabar deals in fine weaves and spices, and is known by all who deal with him as a fair and honest trader.

Like many Turmish merchants, Akabar sports a mustache and a long, square beard. He is dark-skinned, blue-eyed, and has curly brown hair which he often bands with gold cords. Though the merchant-mage is very thin, his true size is often hidden by the large, billowing robes he favors. He will often be found wearing robes of crimson highlighted with thin white stripes and a white cloak with red trim. His clothing cannot hide his height of 6'2", however.

Akabar has three blue dots tattooed horizontally across his forehead. These dots mark him as a Turmish scholar of religion, reading, and magic. He also wears a single sapphire embedded in his left earlobe. The earring signifies that Akabar is married.

In fact, Akabar has two wives — Akash and Kassim — and they are currently looking for a third wife to join the family. This may sound a bit odd, but it isn't when you realize that Turmish businesses are run by women, and businesses are generally family operations. Akabar, in fact, is little more than a front man for his wives' enterprises.

This does not mean that Akabar is not self-sufficient or even strong-willed. Actually, he must have had both of those traits in order for his first wife to take him into her family when they married. He is very happy with his family and business arrangement. He enjoys traveling, and sees that his strengths as a persuasive and honest seller are being put to good use.

Akabar is generally very practical, and this fact is mirrored in the spells he commonly uses. The Turmishman will study spells that have specific uses in his travels as a merchant.

He will always know a number of useful cantrips, like clean, dry, and spice, and the higher-level spells he studies, like fly or haste, will be geared toward escape or self-preservation. Akabar commonly throws a magic mouth spell on his earring to alert him to danger as he sleeps.

The most offense-oriented spell he studies is magic missile — never fireball or lightning bolt — and that spell is used to skewer his dinner more often than it is to strike an opponent. His recent adventures, however, have made him quite proficient in the use of his chosen spells. In battle, he will often fly around his opponents, using his other spells to keep them off-balance until he and his party have a chance to escape.

The events that so radically changed Akabar's peaceful, prosperous life were the result of his desire to have one magnificent adventure before he got too old. He got far more than he bargained for and came very close to never growing old.

Akabar's adventure started when he was delivering fine weaves to an estate north of Suzail for a wedding; Dimswart, a local magic-user and sage, was finally marrying off his last daughter.

The caravan was attacked by Mis-tinarperadnacles, a red dragon, and one of the wagons was carried away, along with its occupants, the intended entertainment for the wedding – the “famous bard” Olive Ruskettle. Akabar’s spellbook was also taken in the raid, though it is unclear how Olive Ruskettle came to be carrying it when she was stolen away with the wagon.

Dimswart was intent on rescuing the lost entertainer and hired a mysterious swordswoman, Alias, and her saurial companion, Dragonbait, to save her. Akabar knew of a secret way into the dragon’s lair, and used that knowledge to force Alias and Dragonbait to take him along.

This was not his first meeting with Alias. Only a few days before Dimswart sent them to rescue Olive Ruskettle, Akabar had tried to discover the origins of the strange tattoo on Alias’ right arm. When Akabar cast a detect magic spell on the tattoo, a frightening blue light erupted from it. Alias was understandably upset by this and was not pleased when Akabar – the Turmite green grocer, as she sarcastically called him – was included in her foray against the dragon.

As time went on, and Akabar and Alias shared more adventures, the two grew very close. Akabar considered himself Alias’ protector for a long time. As Alias grew self-confident, and Akabar learned to trust her mute saurial companion, Dragonbait, he realized that he was not needed in that capacity.

His time adventuring with Alias, as she searched for the origin of her mysterious “azure bonds,” matured Akabar, especially in his use of magic. He became invaluable to Alias and was crucial in the eventual defeat of Cassana and Zrie Prakis.

For a time, Akabar was linked with the god Moander, when the deity escaped from his prison in Yulash. In the form of The Abomination – a mound of decaying earth and greenery that has the ability to grow a myriad of eyes and mouths – Moander captured the merchant-mage and possessed his mind, dragging him along like a puppet and using his voice and form to communicate with Alias, who was also a prisoner at the time. The effects of this possession are still unknown, though, as Akabar noted, his part in the eventual defeat of the mad god will certainly gain him Moander’s eternal enmity.

In a game scenario, Akabar will be encountered as a merchant. He has had his magnificent adventure and is now content to spend the rest of his days trading his wares in the Realms.

However, Akabar Bel Akash now feels a strong kindred spirit with adventurers and will be helpful in any way he can – short of joining in their adventures. His travels as a merchant have given him an outstanding knowledge of the areas surrounding the Inner Sea, in addition to his vast knowledge of Turmish history and religion. He will be glad to talk, at length, on any one of these subjects, or just trade tales of adventures with friendly parties he encounters.

Reading/writing, etiquette.

Commonly used spells: Torment, repulsion, death spell, teleport, cloud kill, fear, animate dead, polymorph other, fireball.

The first thing one notices about the strangely attractive sorceress is that her features seem like they have been etched irrevocably in alabaster. Her beauty seems too perfect to be real. In fact, it is not real at all.

Cassana is several hundred years old, but appears to be no more than 40. However, the sorceress is very proud and would never allow herself to seem anything less than beautiful. Her long, deep reddish-blond hair and hard, green eyes, her harsh, high cheekbones and soft, flawless skin, have all been preserved through a complicated longevity spell stored in the wand she constantly carries.

Cassana’s preserved beauty cannot hide her dark, perverted soul. Cassana is an irrevocably evil, sadistic woman. As she has survived for several hundred years, too, she’s had plenty of time to perfect her depravity and support it with her extensive magical ability.

The sorceress’s cruelty, though many call it insanity, is so legendary that an opera has been written about her. The story the opera tells, that of the warped relationship between Cassana and Zrie Prakis, is well-known in the Realms. The tale reveals a great deal about Cassana’s personality.

Cassana met Prakis while they were both magelings, just beginning their studies of the magical arts. They fell in love, pledged their eternal faithfulness, then were forced to part.

Different versions of the story give different reasons for this separation. In one version, Cassana and Zrie Prakis are sent on their journeyman quests to opposite ends of the Inner Sea; in another, Zrie Prakis gets lost on the Ethereal Plane and cannot return for many years. Typically, the opera has Cassana kidnapped by pirates and unable to return to her lover.

All versions of the story agree on what happened next. As the years pass and the lovers remain separate, both Cassana and Zrie Prakis grow vain and evil and very powerful. When they next meet, they duel over who is the more powerful. Cassana wins the contest, but only by killing Zrie Prakis.

Whether Cassana was already a depraved person by this time or the act of murdering her lover drove her insane, her actions after the duel reveal just how perverse she was. After she killed Zrie Prakis, Cassana gathered her lover's charred remains and placed them in a glass sarcophagus that she keeps by her bedside.

Eventually, Cassana helped to revive Zrie Prakis and now controls the lich through her wand, as she does all of her "creations." The sorceress loves to dominate and control beings and is only satisfied when she has broken an opponent's will. It is likely this is the reason she resurrected Zrie Prakis: His death was far too quick, and Cassana was left with no chance to gloat on the victory and break her lover's haughty spirit.

This desire for control was certainly Cassana's main motivation for the creation of the swordswoman, Alias – or "Puppet," as Cassana called her. In fact, the sorceress's desire for control over Alias was such that she made the swordswoman in her image, though Alias' features are far less harsh than Cassana's.

For the experiment, the sorceress gathered the support of Zrie Prakis, the Fire Knives, the mad god Moander, a mysterious, extra-dimensional halfling-shaped being named Phalse, and the Nameless Bard. While most of the beings involved in Alias' creation had a clear, specific goal for her, Cassana wanted simply to create something over which she had absolute control.

Of course, it did not work out that way. Alias was instrumental in Cassana's death on the plains outside of Westgate, where Cassana maintained her home. During a ceremony which was intended to destroy whatever free will Alias had achieved after her birth, Alias, Akabar, Dragonbait, Olive Ruskettle, and the Nameless Bard rallied against Cassana and her allies.

During the battle, Cassana's wand was tossed into the extra-planar Citadel of White Exile, where it was later destroyed. Though a formidable enemy even without her wand, the combined might of the heroes was too much for Cassana. The sorceress was apparently destroyed when Zrie Prakis' staff of power was broken while she was hold-

GMs should emphasize Cassana's charisma and cruelty in game encounters. If she is resurrected in some form in a game, she will first recreate her wand and restore her youthful appearance. Also she will likely be even more insane and vengeful than she was in her earlier incarnation. She will then gather allies and will usually have at least two servants of notable power at her immediate call.

The sorceress's wand was 18" long, shimmering blue, and had three functions. First, it acted as a modified permanent potion of longevity, allowing Cassana not to age when she was in possession of the wand. The wand also allowed her to control Zrie Prakis. The lich's existence was somehow linked to the wand. When the wand was destroyed, it is assumed Prakis was destroyed as well. Finally, the wand allowed Cassana to control Alias and creatures she summoned from other planes, like the dreaded kalmari, as if they were puppets under her command.

Cassana's spellbook is still somewhere in Westgate. Though it is well protected, the book is very valuable and worth the time to recover. The book is bound in black leather with Cassana's sigil – an insect leg-shaped squiggle surrounded by a design of thorns – is on the cover and binding.

The thorns are a special defense. Anyone touching the book will cause the branches of thorns to come to life and attack the intruder, moving straight for his or her eyes. A failed save vs. magic will mean the character is permanently blinded. The book is also protected by Xult's magical doom, for those who make it past the thorns.

The spellbook contains 28 pages, each containing one spell. The book contains: alarm, comprehend languages, magic missile, read magic, spider climb, bind, darkness 15' radius, ray of enfeeblement, ray of Ondovir waves of weariness, fireball, fly, lightning bolt, missile mastery, wind wall, confusion, dimension door, fear, ice storm, poly-

"Beautiful women were a rarity in this remote setting (Ten-Towns), and this girl was indeed the exception. Shiny auburn locks danced gaily about her shoulders, the intense sparkle of her dark blue eyes enough to bind any man hopelessly within their depths."

— from Streams of Silver

Beautiful indeed is the adopted daughter of Bruenor Battlehammer, but an enemy should take care not to underestimate the young woman. So innocent, she seems, and so full of kindness and gaiety. Yet she was raised among the hardened dwarves in the brutal land of Icewind Dale and knows which end of the sword is which.

Tolerant, though, Catti-brie is not quick to anger, and even then reluctant to fight. She prefers to talk through a problem, or to simply walk away.

Not for fear, though. Brave and able as any warrior, Catti-brie wades into battle with complete composure and a methodical approach to get the job done as painlessly as possible. She abhors violence and all the suffering it brings, but she is realistic enough to understand the practicality of knowing how to defend herself.

And she is well suited to do so. She wears a suit of elven chain mail (not magical) which Bruenor had acquired in a trade for some weapons he had forged. She wears no shield, nor a helm, and typically fights with a long sword in melee, but an approaching foe is likely to get stuck with Catti-brie's favorite dagger, which is always strapped to her hip, long before he ever gets to her. The dagger is +1 to hit and to damage in melee, but specially balanced to be +3 to hit when thrown, though the damage bonus remains +1.

Though formidable in battle, Catti-brie's heart is for the home. She places more value on people and feelings than on material possessions and exotic locations. By her thinking, the real struggles in life are internal battles — Bruenor coming to accept his present life in light of his obsession to find Mithril Hall; Drizzt Do'Urden (whom Catti-brie places upon a high pedestal of respect and admiration) finding worth in an existence of few friends and fewer comforts; and herself, reaching beyond the scars of her past.

She was born in Mirabar, the daughter of a miner. Her mother died in childbirth and her father, determined to make a better life for his baby girl, moved to Ten-Towns, the village of Termalaine, to find his fortune in the valuable knucklehead trout. For three years, he did indeed make great gains in his standard of living, and he even found a new wife and mother for Catti-brie.

But the lure of Ten-Towns' wealth blinds many to the dangers of the region. A goblin raid on Termalaine quickly ended the man's dreams and left Catti-brie orphaned. All of Termalaine might have fallen that day, except that Clan Battlehammer rushed out of their rocky valley and drove the foul horde away. Bruenor himself actually saved the baby girl from a goblin sword, and when the smoke had cleared away and the city was secured, he claimed the orphan as his own and took her back to the mines.

Catti-brie has no real memories of the time before Bruenor, just conjured images pieced together from stories she has been told. But she has lived a fine life with the dwarves and has no bitter feelings about the tragedies of her past.

"Life is for livin'!" she always says. "And there be no worth in painin' over what ye cannot change!"

To Bruenor she remains his little girl, but in the short life span of a human, Catti-brie is now coming into adulthood. She is surrounded by colorful and heroic figures, has many dear friends and dozens of willing suitors (though even the most lovesick of these flinches whenever he thinks of her protective father's many-notched axe), but the man who intrigues Catti-brie the most is undoubtedly Wulfgar.

For the five years that the young barbarian served Bruenor, Catti-brie watched him grow into a complete human being. She helped strip the bonds of his misguided pride from the caring and compassionate aspects of his personality, and now sees in him many of the finer attributes of both Drizzt and Bruenor. Both human, and about the same age, Catti-brie and Wulfgar have shared much in their time together, their most personal feelings and fears, and their outlook on all the world. They have come to see that they are kindred spirits in many ways.

They haven't realized it, perhaps, but they are in love.

Roleplaying tips: Bouncy, and with a zest for living that only enhances her already awesome beauty, Catti-brie is much more than just an attractive centerpiece in a group of adventurers. Those that know her, respect her opinions (which she'll freely give) and trust fully in her judgment. With a hard background and a pragmatic upbringing by the down-to-earth dwarves, the young woman understands pain and the harsh realities of the world, but she refuses to give an inch with her optimistic view that even a single person can make things better.

And Catti-brie views each new person she meets as an enhancement to her life, dismissing Bruenor's teachings that a person must prove his worth. Quite the contrary, Catti-brie will be open and friendly to new acquaintances and believe the best of them until they do something to teach her otherwise.

She's not fond of battle, even with goblins and the like, perceiving violence as the cornerstone of everything that is ugly in the world. Not that she'd walk into a goblin camp and try to make friends, she would just rather avoid them altogether.

And if a member of a party shows her an ugly, destructive side, she'll walk away. And if they try to bring harm upon another, she'll defend their intended victim.

Stubbornly, and without fear.

Physical description: Fzoul is a human male, wily, glib-tongued, burly, red-haired-and-mustached, and handsome. He usually wears the full panoply of ceremonial garments of a high priest of Bane.

MINOR CHARACTERS

Equipment: Fzoul commonly wears bracers of defense AC2 and adds a suit of full plate when he goes into battle (making his armor class 0). He usually wields his mace +4, but uses a silver flail or a morning star +1 if the situation seems to demand them. On his fingers he has a ring of free action and a ring of spell storing. He treasures the rod of cancellation which he keeps in a sheath inside his left boot.

In his temple, The Dark Shrine, he has three blocks of incense of meditation, and a staff of the serpent (adder) for personal use in emergencies.

Personality: Fzoul is a politician. He has something good to say for anyone who can do him good, and nothing but scorn for those who cannot affect his career. He is also quite patient. His exploitation of the intricacies of Bane politics to gain power has been slow, but sure.

Motivations: Fzoul is the leader of the minority of priests of Bane who follow Manshoon. He, and they, feels that the proper worship of the god of tyranny is to support a tyrant. He feels the most efficient tyrant around is Manshoon. Fzoul is careful to remain necessary to and friends with Manshoon, while keeping as much power as possible in his own hands, so that Manshoon will never consider him expendable, or a threat so powerful that he must be destroyed.

In fact, because of his command of the hierarchy of Bane within the Zhentarim, his influence with the everyday members of that organization is actually greater than Manshoon's.

His main ambition is to be, for now and always, the true leader of the worship of Bane in Zhentil Keep.

Background notes: Manshoon's rise to create and lead the Zhentarim is told elsewhere in this book. In Fzoul, he early found the ideal theological backing for his play for power.

Fzoul was an immediate convert to Manshoon's party — seeing in the charismatic magic-user the embodiment of the true nature of his god. Moreover, he could see that by holding onto Manshoon's cloaktails, he could create his own tyranny within the church of Bane, and surely that must be pleasing to the god.

By his machinations, Fzoul emerged at Manshoon's right side when the Zhentarim took over Zhentil Keep and then the Citadel of the Raven. The high imperceptor of Bane, a 19th-level cleric who has his headquarters in the Black Lord's Altar in Mulmaster, is now Fzoul's bitter enemy. The imperceptor, Szchulan Darkoon, continues to express his disdain for Manshoon as a priest and his belief that only Bane can be worshiped as the ultimate tyrant, and his priests should have the rule of the people of Bane. Many of those who follow these precepts are priests who theoretically follow Fzoul. There is some fear among Fzoul's followers that Szchulan is working with the eye tyrant Manxam, but Fzoul does not feel this is a significant threat, even if true.

Other notes: The ongoing struggle between the factions among the priests of Bane gives plenty of opportunity for adventures involving the machinations of Fzoul Chembryl, if not with the cleric himself.

The Red Wizards of Thay, inasmuch as they have a united policy at all (see FR6, DREAMS OF THE RED WIZARDS), support Szchulan and his adherents. This is not so much because of a belief in his version of the message of Bane, but because that can weaken their rivals, the Zhentarim.

Thus, the rivalry between Fzoul's faction and Szchulan's provides many opportunities for races to retrieve a special artifact before the other side gets it, rivalries with other (NPC) adventurer bands who have been hired by the other side, and involved confidence games where one side is played against the other while the characters actually work to deny both sides' goals.

And, of course, if characters manage to foil several of either side's schemes, they gain an ongoing enemy who will employ anything in his arsenal, including Zhentarim assassins, summoned monsters and demons, and even the armies of Zhentil Keep (or mercenary armies hired by Thay, depending on the side involved) to rid themselves of these meddlesome adventurers.

One possible storyline would involve an agent of Fzoul offering the adventurers a contract to retrieve an important item from some ruin or the treasure house of a rival of Zhentil Keep. When the adventurers retrieve the item, they find that Fzoul has decided to reward them by enlisting them forcibly into his own select forces, binding them with charm spells to insure their loyalty. From there, we have an adventure of escape, rescue, and eventual revenge.

expresses any negative emotions on his face; pursing his lips is a strong display of feeling.

But his eyes are a pale blue — icy as death.

Equipment: Ring of protection +2, ring of wizardry (doubles first- and second-level spells), staff of slinging, mirror of mental prowess, bracers of AC 5.

Personality: Cyndre is always controlled and diplomatic. His voice is always pleasant and conversational. Like a diplomat, he is always looking for an advantage for himself.

Motivations: Cyndre desires to rule a large kingdom to prove to himself that the Red Wizards of Thay were wrong to ignore and disdain him. The Moonshaes had a weak ruler and divided peoples, but it is a large and rich land, ready for exploitation, just what he was seeking.

Background notes: Cyndre came to the Moonshaes from Thay about the same time as described in FR2, MOONSHAE. He did not get along with the zulkirs who rule Thay, and decided to carve out his own empire. The relatively uncivilized Moonshaes seemed like an ideal target.

The high king already had a Council of Sorcerers, an institution created by his father 30 years before. The current, and first, leader of the council was Curmavys, a 15th-level magic-user born in the Isles who had studied under the wizards of Waterdeep. He had eight mages under him.

Curmavys welcomed Cyndre, who was already almost as powerful as he, and Cyndre's companion Alexei, into the council with some misgivings. However, he felt that magic-users of their accomplishments and background should not be allowed to run around loose. Curmavys thought he could keep better control of the newcomers if they were part of the council.

Within three years Curmavys was dead, as were five other members of the council. Cyndre and Alexei subverted the other resident members and brought in some others, so that at the culmination of his attempt to finally control the Moonshaes, Cyndre had six like-minded magic-users at his call.

In the meantime, Cyndre had struck up an alliance with the high priest of Bhaal, Hobarth. Each felt he was controlling the actions of the other. Together, they forged their master plan to conquer the Moonshaes from within.

After he arranged for the death of Curmavys and usurping the leadership of the Council of Sorcerers, Cyndre began his program of confrontation and extermination of the druids of Alaron. His first step was to enthrall High King Carrathal. Then the high king enrolled the ogres and outlaws Cyndre designated into his Scarlet Guard. With this force and his own magic behind him, Cyndre moved against the druids of Alaron.

The druids could not move fast enough to stop him. In a few years, the sacred groves had been desecrated, and the druids of Alaron had been wiped out far more thoroughly by Cyndre than they'd ever been by Kazgaroth's machinations.

In the meantime, his assassin, the half-orc Razfallow (seventh-level fighter, ninth-level thief), managed to eradicate the royal families and principal druids of Moray and Snowdown. Slowly, the kingdom of Corwell, which contained the principal druid of the Moonshaes, was isolated from the rest of the Ffolk. Bhaal knew his avatar, Kazgaroth, sought the dominion of that home of the druidic religion, and wanted to be sure the druid leaders would have no friends left when the beast's attack came. Cyndre did not understand these qualms, but humored his ally.

When Tristan Kendrick and Robyn the druid defeated and destroyed Kazgaroth, Cyndre became the main instrument in Bhaal's attempt to punish the Moonshaes for the destruction of his avatar.

In the meantime, he alienated his companion Alexei, who tried to warn him of the duplicity of Hobarth. This drove Alexei to the side of Tristan and Robyn, and Alexei's intervention helped finally bring Cyndre's schemes down around his ears.

Physical description: Daryth is swarthy and quick, and his black eyes flash with humor and danger. He speaks heavily accented Common-speech and likes to wear a red cloak and, in dangerous situations, leather armor. He has an excellent rapport with dogs.

Equipment: Gloves of thievery and escape; these are like gloves of thievery (see UNEARTHED ARCANA), but they also allow the user to escape from any bondage on his hands. No rope, shackle, or chain can bind his hands if he wishes to remove that bondage. This has no effect on the rest of his body, if that is bound, but a thief with his hands free is likely to escape any other bindings in very little time. The gloves also contain an undetectable supply of wires and other lock-picking tools.

Daryth also uses a silver scimitar with a leather hilt that he found in the same firbolg treasure hoard in which Tristan found the Sword of Cymrych Hugh.

Personality: Daryth was determinedly light and amusing, refusing to take anything seriously if he could help it. In battle or dangerous situations, he became quieter and more serious, but could still see the light side of a situation and had time to mock an enemy.

Motivations: As a spy for the pasha of Calimshan, Daryth had no real motivations except to please his teachers and superiors. Once he severed that relationship, he was totally rootless, and embarked on a journey partly to avoid the reprisals of the pasha and, really, just to see what he could see and find another place for himself.

When he came to Corwell and met Tristan and Robyn, he initially found two good comrades. Then, as Kazgaroth's net began to tighten on Corwell, he found a cause in which he could believe, and he worked diligently for the good of the people of the Moonshaes and his friends. He felt more than friendship for Robyn, but realized that her preference was for Tristan, whatever her actions toward him at any time.

Background notes: Daryth was selected as a child to be a student in the pasha of Calimshan's Academy of Stealth, a school for spies. Every student of the school is taught the usual thievery skills as they apply to espionage, and is also trained in one other skill, cover. Daryth was trained as a dog trainer, learning the trade as trainer of the desert racers of Calimshan.

However, he found himself in a dispute with the pasha about rights to some property he acquired on a mission, and thought it prudent to take an extended, and unofficial, leave of absence.

He embarked on a career as a sailor, but found that the ocean waves did not agree with him. After a stormy passage across the Sea of Swords, his ship docked at Corwell, and Daryth decided to find another career on dry land.

His career as a thief was short-lived. His first victim in Corwell was Tristan Kendrick, prince of Corwell, who realized he had been robbed immediately and chased Daryth down. In a fight with daggers they showed each other they were good fighters, and a bond sprung up between them, reinforced by Robyn's instant liking for Daryth.

At Robyn's instigation, Tristan hired Daryth as his master of hounds, and Daryth then shared their adventures throughout the Moonshaes. He survived the fight against Kazgaroth (though he may have died in the final battle against that beast but for the intervention of the Goddess). He journeyed to Alaron with Tristan and there fought High King Carrathal and the wizard Cyndre until both were slain, and Tristan was proclaimed the high king.

When the three friends returned to Gwynneth to confront Hobarth, Daryth was separated from his companions and hunted down and slain by a displacer beast sent by Bhaal to help destroy Myrloch Vale.

Other notes: At the time of events in FR2, MOONSHAE, Daryth is just finishing his training in espionage in the school of the pasha of Calimshan. Characters in that nation at that time may have cause to run into this young, but very promising, secret agent and perhaps rue the experience. If your campaign is set later, in the time of DARKWALKER ON MOONSHAE, Daryth can often be found in the company of his friend, Tristan, between the time of Kazgaroth's attempt to destroy Corwell and the conflict with Cyndre and Hobarth. They provide an entertaining confrontation in any of the taverns they haunt in Corwell or on the trail if they are out hunting with Tristan's hound, Canthus.

If befriended, Daryth proves a true, if sometimes critical, friend. He also has an excellent memory for those who oppose him and, while he is willing to forget and forgive if given the opportunity, he is not an opponent one should continue harassing.

Daryth is a swordsman and dagger man. He has some ability with sling and short bow, but would rather show off his skill with melee weapons.

By all appearances, Dendybar, the mottled wizard of Luskan's Hosttower of the Arcane, seems a weakly man, too frail to be of any threat. Yet there is a magical strength about this wizard that more than compensates for his physical frailties. His movements slow and deliberate, his voice a passionless monotone, and his hollowed face buried beneath the shadows of his robe's cowl, Dendybar creeps along from dark corner to dark corner, trusting no one and always ready with some form of magical attack.

He is a small man, barely weighing 100 pounds, and he seems to be no more than withered skin stretched over bones to anyone who has seen him without his robes. His eyes look out from within the cowl, a penetrating and dangerous glare, darker spots in deep and dark sockets. The few tufts of white hair he has left cling stubbornly in scraggly patches.

Perhaps as compensation for his physical inadequacies, Dendybar normally keeps several powerful offensive spells at his disposal, and most others he memorizes from day to day, whether he expects to leave the Hosttower or not, are designed to get him away from dangerous situations. The exceptions are those days when Dendybar plans to summon an otherworldly being, usually a demon. Then his repertoire is dedicated almost exclusively to spells pertaining to the situation (protection from evil and dolor, for example). On an average day, though, Dendybar typically would be armed with the following spells:

- First-level — Charm person, magic missile, run.
- Second-level — Invisibility, ESP web darkness 15' radius.
- Third-level — Protection from normal missiles, lightning bolt, wind wall, hold person.
- Fourth-level — Dimension door, wall of fire, Leomund's secure shelter.
- Fifth-level — Cone of cold, teleport, passwall.

In addition to this considerable repertoire, Dendybar wields several magic items, including a staff of power and a ring of protection +3. His mottled robe is really a robe of eyes, and just because he likes the chaos of rampant fire, he has fashioned a wand of fireballs, complete with a holster, for his belt. While Sydney is his present apprentice, Dendybar puts his full faith only in Bok, a flesh golem of incredible strength that he created as a defense against his fellow wizards.

For one so adept at the black arts, Dendybar started his career, not as a mage, but as a cleric serving Myrkul, the lord of bones. He switched professions in an attempt to better serve Myrkul, but has retained several powers from his former days.

"The hood that constantly shadows Dendybar's features hides a face that is little more than a skin-covered skull, Myrkul's mark upon his most loyal servant."

"In addition to his magic spells, Dendybar may animate 1d6 skeletons or 1d3 zombies each round of combat, so long as bodies are available."

— from The Savage Frontier
by Paul Jaquays

The mottled wizard takes great care to keep his religion private, even to his closest confidants, understanding the mistrust that would naturally arise against someone serving such a god.

No one knows Dendybar's actual age, but he seems to have found a limbo state concerning aging, caught somewhere between life and death. Rumors say that, like Arklem Greeth, the archmage of the Hosttower of the Arcane, Dendybar seeks lichdom, an undead state where his magic and sheer willpower alone sustain him.

Perhaps to find that end, or maybe simply in his never-ending hunt for greater power, Dendybar has become obsessed with possessing the Crystal Shard, the mighty relic of unspeakable evil forged in a past age. Dendybar knows little about the specifics of the artifact, but realizes that the Crystal Shard brought Akar Kessell, a bumbling, inept apprentice to the verge of conquering the Far North. What might it do in the hands of a true wizard?

And the quest for power is at the core of Dendybar's every action. Now serving as the master of the North Spire, one of the four wizards closest in succession to Greeth's throne, Dendybar gained his title by arranging the murder of the former occupant of the post.

And he knows no loyalty whatsoever. Eldeluc, the budding wizard who was in on the conspiracy, has been targeted as the mottled wizard's next victim simply because Dendybar resents the other mage's fast climb through the lower ranks. Eldeluc was once Dendybar's apprentice and was undyingly loyal. But now he watches over his shoulder for the strike he knows will eventually come.

And he shakes his head whenever he sees Sydney, Dendybar's apprentice, for he wonders how long it will be before Dendybar aims his foul temper at her.

Roleplaying tips: Dendybar says little, but hears everything that is being said around him, and always views the words of others in the most negative light. He will pursue any road or join any group that promises him a substantial gain in power, but otherwise has no desire to leave his small laboratory in the Hosttower. Normally, he sends Sydney out to do his work.

But even if an adventure is successful in bringing Dendybar all that he hoped it would, he is not likely to look favorably upon his fellow adventurers. Anyone who has witnessed his gains, he reasons in his perverted view of the world, serves as a potential threat to those gains.

And, in the true spirit of Myrkul, must be eliminated!

beautiful home in the countryside north of Suzail. He lives in Manor Dimswart with his wife, Leona, and a large number of servants. At one time, the sage's five daughters lived at Manor Dimswart as well, but his youngest daughter, the last to be married, was recently wed to a Wyvernspur nobleman. Now it is only on holidays and special occasions that Dimswart's studies are interrupted by children.

The "Sage of Suzail," as Dimswart is known, is a short, good-natured, likable man. Though he is getting stout as he approaches middle age, he is quick-witted. He has taken his retirement from adventuring with the King's Men, a Cormyrian adventuring company, quite well. Though his hair is now almost totally gray, Dimswart's blue eyes still sparkle whenever he gets the chance to demonstrate his ready intelligence and wit.

Dimswart has sage knowledge of herbs and minor knowledge of magical items. The sage is far more interested in plants these days than in magic, however, and he can often be found rooting around the countryside in Suzail, looking for some rare species of herb or plant.

Another of the sage's great loves is gossip, or "public information," as he calls it. Though never a gossip-monger himself, Dimswart keeps track of any rumor circulating through Suzail. He is an excellent source of information on not only Suzail, but all of Cormyr and the lands nearby. When not pursuing his studies of flora, Dimswart will be found in local taverns or inns, usually in the company of his old friend Winefiddle, drinking and listening to the latest story about whatever anyone is inclined to discuss.

Dimswart is such a good source of information, he is an unofficial reporter for King Azoun IV. Dimswart and Azoun are old friends, and it is even rumored that Azoun occasionally adventured as a young cavalier with the King's Men. Neither Dimswart nor Azoun have ever admitted that ever occurred.

The Sage of Suzail generally uses his magical abilities to further his studies. In fact, Dimswart's life is devoted almost entirely to the pursuit of knowledge now that his daughters are all married and he and Leona can live at Manor Dimswart in peace.

Dimswart will always entertain parties of adventurers, however. The sage finds that traveling companies are an excellent source of information on far-flung parts of the Realms. In exchange for any information, adventurers can expect to pay with information and an exchange of services. And Dimswart is never lacking a task suitable for a party of adventurers.

Such was the case when the swordswoman Alias sought Dimswart's assistance with the mysterious azure sigils embedded in her sword arm. In exchange for his help, the sage sent Alias, Dragonbait, her saurial companion, and Akabar Bel Akash, to rescue Olive Ruskettle from the red dragon, Mistinarperadnacles. Olive had been traveling to Manor Dimswart to play at a wedding when she was abducted by the dragon.

Before the Sage of Suzail dispenses any information, he will try to impress the adventurers with a demonstration of his powers of reasoning. Before the party has a chance to introduce itself or explain its purpose in seeking Dimswart, the sage will rattle off as much information as he can about the company. He can gather a great deal about a party simply from their accents, visible scars, clothing, and the like, but he also has likely heard of the adventurers through rumor and story. Dimswart can usually surprise even the most traveled adventurer with the amount of knowledge he has about them, if they have traveled anywhere near Cormyr.

Players encountering Dimswart will find him a very friendly, helpful man. Unlike other sages of greater power and renown, like Elminster, Dimswart is very accessible. And though he may not be able to answer every question, his knowledge of Cormyr and the lands nearby should make him a valuable source in any campaign.

When encountered in Suzail, Dimswart will often be found in the company of Curate Winefiddle.

Winefiddle is a curate in the Towers of Good Fortune, a huge temple to Tymora, in Suzail. The cleric retired to the temple after his adventuring company, the King's Men, disbanded several years ago.

Life in the temple has been very good for Winefiddle, and he has grown quite fat in the years since his retirement from adventuring. His brown hair is thinning, but like his companion Dimswart, his brown eyes still reflect an active, happy soul.

In fact, Winefiddle has found life in the temple in all ways superior to his time as an adventurer. In addition to being allowed to focus his attention on his duties as a cleric, and his favorite hobbies — relaxation and drinking — Winefiddle has found that the closest he has to come to monsters is in treating the victims of their attacks.

The curate is a compassionate, caring man, however, and is very concerned about the well-being of those for whom he cares. When encountered, Dimswart will be very interested in aiding adventurers in any way he can, as

Physical description: Durnan is an older man, still broad-shouldered and lively in step. His brunet hair is spotted with gray, and he is starting to bald. His usual garb consists of a brightly colored tunic and darker treads worn tucked into his fighting boots ("I've never known a more comfortable pair of boots.")

Equipment: In combat, Durnan uses a battle-ax +2, a dagger +1, wears elfin chain mail +3, and carries a shield +2. He also has gauntlets of ogre power, and a ring of spell turning. When he is not expecting combat, he wears the ring, and carries the dagger, a normal long sword, and wears his elfin chain mail +3 under his clothes. He always wears his boots of striding and springing.

Personality: Durnan is close-mouthed and prudent. Though he shouts in battle, Durnan does not get into arguments. He would rather retreat into silence than argue. If he does not want to answer a question, he simply looks at the questioner with a calm, expressionless face and says nothing.

In general, he is affable but not talkative. When he greets guests at his inn, he welcomes them simply and shows them to a table or gets their drinks of choice, but does not engage in idle chatter or hyperbole about the virtues of his food or vintages. He always has a quiet smile for regular customers and old friends.

In conference with the other Lords of Waterdeep, Durnan lets the others speak and then, if he has anything to add, speaks quietly and to the point.

Motivations: Durnan hates unfairness and injustice, but is tolerant of the differing interests of others. As a Lord of Waterdeep, he tries to maintain the atmosphere of tolerance and fairness for which the city is known.

Durnan's tolerance does not extend to most of the goblinoid races. Goblins, kobolds, gnolls, orcs, and half-orcs are given little service and no acceptance at his tavern. He especially hates hobgoblins, for reasons unknown, because he refuses to talk about them.

Background notes: Friends speculate that Durnan's family was slain by hobgoblins when he was still a youth, but this is not confirmed. He was a lonely adventurer who traveled the North extensively, moving from one adventuring band to another before he met Mirt (see below), with whom he became fast friends.

When he decided to "retire" to Waterdeep — actually he was just accompanying Mirt because he did not want to adventure if Mirt was not — he was asked by Mirt and Khelben to become one of the Lords of Waterdeep. He provides one of the "voices of sanity" among the Lords, reining in the enthusiasms of the more fanatically Lawful Good among the members.

As a method of advancing the goals of the Lords with less regard for the "means" espoused by Piergeiron and Texter, he became "The One," the leader of the Red Sashes — an organization that thinks it is in opposition to the tyranny of the Lords of Waterdeep, but actually works to provide for the good of the city by capturing those the law cannot or refuses to touch, and freeing those who are imprisoned unjustly, despite the demands of the law. In short, Durnan uses this organization to take care of pragmatic missions to which the paladins among the Lords would never agree.

Moreover, the Red Sashes are theoretically an independent organization willing to work for anyone, and thus are often contacted by other organizations to work "against" the Lords, giving Durnan a good grasp of the menaces to the city and the Lords.

Other notes: Durnan is the proprietor of the Yawning Portal inn in Waterdeep. This inn contains a well-like shaft leading down into the Undermountain, the subterranean ways under Waterdeep. As such, he can be the person to whom to talk about a mission to the Undermountain. Many adventurers have used this shaft as the first step of their exploration of the Undermountain. Some of them have even returned up the shaft. Others have come from other exits. Many have just not returned.

Durnan's connections with the Red Sashes and the Lords can frequently involve him with the characters' activities in Waterdeep. Also, the Red Sashes do not operate outside of Waterdeep, so Durnan might enlist the aid of the characters for a mission outside of the city that can benefit the Red Sashes, either by freeing or capturing some individual who is in need, or simply bringing in some wealth to help support the Red Sashes' expenses.

Suggested adventures: Some monster from the deeps wanders into Undermountain and then wanders up the shaft and attacks the Yawning Portal as the characters are having their evening meal. The characters deal with the monster, then accompany Durnan down the shaft to find out where the monster came from and to stop further incursions.

Durnan is, hopefully, impressed with the characters and keeps them in mind. Then, he has a mission for the Red Sashes within the city — the daughter of one of the magisters has been kidnapped to influence his decisions concerning the son of one of the noble families. The characters must get the girl out. If they are successful, Durnan considers them for other missions outside the city.

Seventh-Level Human Fighter

Artemis Entreri, the prime assassin, is possibly the most deadly killer in all the Forgotten Realms. While not a big man, barely 125 pounds, his abilities to dance his sabre through the defenses of any opponent horrifies onlookers and leaves his victim gaping in disbelief as the last breaths flow from his body.

There is a strength about the man that defies physical abilities, an inner promise of death that gives him the upper hand in most encounters. Intimidated opponents do not usually perform to the best of their abilities.

Entreri's build and movements are similar to those of Drizzt Do'Urden, though the assassin is slightly heavier than the drow ranger. Together, they appear almost as negatives of each other; Entreri's skin, accustomed to lightless nights and shadows, is milky white to Drizzt's black; his hair is jet black to the drow's stark white; and his eyes dark and sinister to the sparkling and life-filled orbs of Drizzt.

The stark contrast between the two is even more evident in their emotional makeup. Drizzt is a passionate lover of life and peace, a warrior who gains his strength through his emotional dedication to his cause. Entreri is passionless, and would consider the drow's generous nature a weakness, a fatal flaw, not to be tolerated by a true fighter.

"Catti-brie had seen this before, the trademark methods of the finest swordsman in all of Icewind Dale. The comparison to Drizzt Do'Urden was inescapable; their grace and movements were so alike, with every part of their bodies working in harmonious accord. Yet they remained strikingly different, a polarity of morals that subtly altered the aura of the dance.

"The drow ranger in battle was an instrument of beauty to behold, a perfect athlete pursuing his chosen course of righteousness with unsurpassed fervor. But Entreri was merely horrifying, a passionless murderer callously disposing of obstacles in his path."

— from Streams of Silver

So they achieve similar results despite their paradoxical views of life.

Entreri is every bit the equal of Drizzt in battle, even fighting with two weapons, a jewelled dagger and a cruel-edged sabre. His overall dexterity is 17, but his eye-hand coordination is near-perfect, and he suffers no "to hit" penalties when fighting two-handed.

Furthermore, as if he wasn't deadly enough of his own accord, the assassin has outfitted himself with powerful magic items over the years. His sabre is a +1 sword of wounding and his jewelled dagger, his most prized possession, a +4 defender. He wears only leather armor and no shield, but his black cape is actually a +4 cloak of protection, and the ring identifying him as a member of Pook's guild, a +2 ring of protection.

Even without all the magic, though, Entreri's background and unwavering devotion to perfection make him formidable. Like Regis, he grew up on the streets of Calimport, the bastard son of a prostitute, alone and depending upon his own resources for survival. His tactics, though, were much different from the subtle cons and coercions of the halfling. In the dark alleys of the city, Entreri learned the worth of a well-placed dagger.

And barely a teenager, an age when most aspiring heroes are learning their very first parries with a sword, Entreri was already hiring himself out as a mercenary soldier whenever and wherever he could find the work. His reputation as a silent and deadly killer, as well as an incredible swordsman, leaked out through the underground of the city and caught the attention of Pasha Pook, guildmaster of a powerful thieves' organization.

Noted for his ability to surround himself with the very best henchmen, it didn't take Pook long to understand the unlimited potential of the young man. Accepting Pook's offer to join the guild, Entreri studied under many of the finest thieves in all the Realms, and combining his already considerable weapons' proficiency with the lessons, he has become doubly deadly, a pure assassin.

He still serves Pook — his present mission is to hunt down Regis and recover the ruby pendant — but only because he views his association with the thieves as in his best interests. In truth, Artemis Entreri gives his allegiance to no one, and has no loyalties beyond what is best at any given moment for him in his perverted pursuit to become the ultimate killer, in his view, the ultimate victor in a world of unending conflict.

Roleplaying tips: In his absolute confidence, Entreri exudes an aura of strength that intimidates most of the people who meet him. The way he holds himself, the way he walks, the set of his jaw, would give a PC the distinct impression that Entreri could kill him at any time, even if the character was of equal or higher level than the assassin. And this calm confidence and unshakable composure keeps Entreri at his sharpest, at all times.

He is reserved and observant, speaking little and weighing every single word carefully before uttering it. He is so perceptive that rumors say he has the power to read minds. This is not true, but Entreri can take a full measure of a person in a single meeting, and understands the motivations of the world around him well enough to figure out what course the person will likely take. In game terms, treat the assassin with a degree of omniscience. He will always be a step or two ahead of the others, anticipating, waiting, and is so alert to his surroundings that he is never surprised.

It is imperative to keep in mind that Entreri is not a wanton killer. He simply follows the most logical course to achieve his present mission, be it hunting Regis or acquiring some magic item that may have caught his eye.

But if someone were to happen to get in his way . . .

Ninth-Level Dwarf Fighter

Physical description: Finellen is a female dwarf, around 400 years old. She stands about 4' high and has a fine bristling blonde beard that drops past her beltline and an unruly mass of hair atop her rounded head. Like most dwarves, Finellen has a stocky body, short legs, long arms, broad and sturdy shoulders, and surprisingly large feet. Between her beard and body type, it is difficult to tell that she is female until you hear her voice, which is equivalent to a human woman's contralto.

Equipment: When traveling or scouting the actions of firbolgs, Finellen wears leather armor and carries a battle-ax and dagger. If she knows she is going into combat, she wears darkened plate mail armor and uses a short-hafted battle-ax two-handed. She always carries a long dagger, which she wields with great effect.

Personality: Finellen is gruff and aggressive and prickly about comments concerning her size and beard. To her mind, the only good defense is a strong offense, and she values good fighters of any breed.

Motivations: Her main motivation is the protection of the dwarven race. She has little inclination to mix in the affairs of humans, though she likes the opportunities to fight that her association with Tristan Kendrick provides. Mostly she feels that "if you see a human coming – you see trouble coming."

Background notes: Finellen lived as any other dwarf for 300 years, mining, guarding the tribe, and killing duergar and firbolgs. When the firbolgs started mining coal and taking to the valley floor of Myrloch Vale, Finellen was sent to discover why they were doing this entirely uncharacteristic activity. However, she was captured.

Shortly thereafter, the population of her cell was doubled with the addition of the bard Keren. Weeks passed, then the two prisoners were freed by Prince Tristan Kendrick and his friends, who had come seeking Keren.

Finellen fought beside her new friends during the escape, then left them, refusing to have anything more to do with humans and their problems. However, when she got back to her caves, she discovered that the firbolgs were aggravating the dwarves, and the dwarves had decided to take action after all.

Leading a force of 50 dwarves, Finellen found her new battle comrades again as they were about to meet Grunnarch's Northmen and the remains of the firbolgs who had imprisoned her before. The dwarves helped the humans defeat the raiders and let the Ffolk refugees get through to western Corwell. Then they aided the humans in the defense of Caer Corwell, saving the day on at least two occasions, at great loss of dwarven life.

Sometime afterward, Finellen was given another force of dwarves and sent to track down incursions of the duergar to the east. The dwarves marched through deep caverns and came up in Alaron Isle. They found the duergar in greater than expected strength and helped Tristan and his comrades escape the dungeons of the high king. Then they went on to fight duergar.

Eventually, they were driven above ground by the overwhelming numbers of the duergar, and once again merged forces with Tristan and his rebels. They played a strong role in the final battle that slew Cyndre and routed the zombies, sahuagin, duergar, and king's Scarlet Guard. Finellen was one of those who cheered loudest when Tristan was proclaimed high king of the Moonshaes.

Then she and her remaining dwarven soldiers returned to the underworld to continue the fight against the now-depleted duergar and were not seen in the final battle against Hobarth and Bhaal.

Other notes: Finellen is adventurous for a dwarf, and probably the most likely to discover the problems of the dwarves of Norland, who are losing a war of extinction with the frost giants of the Jotunspine Mountains.

Since there are no dwarven caverns connecting Gwynneth and Norland (as there are between Gwynneth and Alaron), she might be a handy NPC to use to recruit an adventuring band to help her fellow dwarves of Norland.

The adventurers she would want would be dwarves, but her compatriots in Myrloch Vale are not interested in such a long trek in a human-built boat. If she can't find outlander dwarves, she has sufficient worldliness to enlist humans and even, perhaps, elves.

Finellen is a scrapper. Given any sort of weapon, she will tangle with opponents six times her size without a second thought. With her advanced age and experience outside the dwarven people, she finds herself more and more in positions of authority among her people. When it is time to send out an expeditionary force, the dwarven king singles out Finellen and dwarven warriors clamor to serve under her. This both gratifies and chafes her. She prefers the freedom of charging headlong into a foe, but has too much of a sense of responsibility to lead her followers in helpless charges. So she hangs back, directs her forces, and only joins the front line when they are committed and they need her as much as they need her direction. She much prefers acting as an independent scout or emissary.

Physical description: Kappiyan is a distinguished looking, tall, thin, white-bearded wizard. He is always wearing a gray robe that is never stained or dirty, despite Kappiyan's usual activities.

Equipment: Kappiyan always wears a gray robe of the arch-magi, a ring of wizardry (first-level spells), and a ring of protection +1. His house, which he rarely leaves, always has many potions, which he makes. There are a homonculous and many magical guardian creatures in his house.

At least once a year, the city watch is called in to remove some thief who thought to rob the helpless old man of his potions. Frequently after such an event, Kappiyan is seen visiting the purveyors of exotic creatures and magical traps for additions to his defenses.

Personality: Kappiyan is affable to other magic-users who want to consult with him about potions. He will also sell potions (using the prices shown in the DMG), but he becomes testy if continually asked for potions. "I am not running a potion shop," is his usual response when asked too often.

Characters coming to Kappiyan for potions undergo rigorous quizzing about how the potion is planned to be used. Purchasers are also asked to give an account later about the efficacy of the potion. Those who do not supply such a report or give inadequate reports are less likely to be sold future potions.

Also, Kappiyan had many years of experience as an adventurer before retiring to his current researches. He has a good eye for what is possible for a group, and will refuse potions to people he does not feel will use them properly.

Kappiyan sometimes provides free potions for a good cause, and has been called on by the Lords of Waterdeep for such upon occasion. However, he is just as testy toward the mighty Lords as he is toward beginning adventurers.

Motivations: Nowadays, Kappiyan is primarily interested in research, which he finances by selling potions. He is always interested in trying new versions of established potions in an attempt to extend their longevity, or change the effects slightly. He is never satisfied with the current version of any potion. There must be some way to improve it.

Background notes: Kappiyan came to Waterdeep from the South. He is believed to have originally lived in Cormyr, and left after a philosophical dispute with Vangerdahast. (This story comes from merchants from the Dragon Sea area who learned that Kappiyan lived in Waterdeep and told the story.) This has never been confirmed by Kappiyan, who occasionally lets slip references to the Dragon Sea area, but does not otherwise talk about his previous life.

However, it is obvious that, before coming to Waterdeep, he did adventure extensively. He knows very little about the conditions of the North, so his adventuring must have taken place in the Southern Realms.

Currently Kappiyan lives in Waterdeep on Anchoret's Court among the honest, if poor, working men of Waterdeep. He has lived there for more than 50 years, always looking much the same as he does today. His house is a former "grand residence" (see FR1, WATERDEEP AND THE NORTH), but every room in this palatial establishment, built when the Southern Ward was a bit higher class than it is now, is full of alchemical equipment. The great room has been turned into a zoo full of exotic animals that supply components for the various potions, most of the bedrooms are full of shelves of potion ingredients or scrolls and books that list esoteric formulations.

There are three servants, one of whose sole duty is maintenance of the animals, one of whom is both cook and cleaner, and one of whom is a supply clerk who maintains the other alchemy supplies. At this time, Kappiyan has no apprentices, though he has had some in the past. One of these (the most recent) died while trying one of Kappiyan's variant potions.

Other notes: PCs intent on robbing him should leave many of their fellows behind, fallen to his defenses. He is known to employ both traps and strange monsters in the defense of his house. Questioning former servants reveals that a new servant must spend a month learning the traps and getting acquainted with the monsters before he can be allowed to work alone in the house. The traps are changed every couple of years, and the monsters frequently die and are replaced.

When characters request potions from Kappiyan, the old mage will usually suggest they try one of his new potions, as he is always trying to simulate the effect of other magical items, such as gauntlets of ogre power or a ring of spell turning. He also tries to create potions that allow the user to cast a magic-user spell. He offers any of these potions at a nominal price.

These potions have a variable chance of actually working. DMs should adjust the chance of working to meet the situation, in the spirit of adventure literature.

S:16 I:15 W:14 D:17 C:16 CH:18

Physical description: Grunnarch's head is framed by flowing red hair and beard. He stands only average height, but seems much larger. There is an undefinable quality to the way he moves and talks that communicates his authority.

Equipment: Grunnarch uses a battle-ax one-handed, warding off blows with a shield in the other hand. He wears chain mail, giving him a good armor class when combined with his high Dexterity.

Personality: Grunnarch rules his people with an iron hand, but he is loved by his followers for his concern for their welfare and ready smile and wit.

There are stronger men among his followers, but his people realize that in Grunnarch they not only have a good war and raiding fighter, but a wise leader.

Motivations: Grunnarch is a prototypical Northman. His greatest joy is combat, and his second greatest joy is being on the sea in a long ship, on his way to a combat. However, he got his fill of slaughter when following the leadership of the disguised Kazgaroth, and is somewhat more temperate in his appetite for action now. Whether this attitude will continue is impossible to say.

Grunnarch likes a fight against a worthy foe. General slaughter can nauseate him. Fighting natural foes like beasts and weather eventually drags him down.

In general, Grunnarch is a gambling man, and fearless against normal foes. However, he knows when he must flee before a superior foe, and keeps the well-being of his people uppermost in his mind. Of course, for a great deal of his reign, the well-being of his fighting followers involved getting them into raids and fights at every opportunity. He did not have to worry about retaliation against his women and children because the Ffolk did not fight that way.

But when he realized that the alliance of Bhaal's priest and the sahuagin was a threat to all residents of the Moonshaes, he understood the benefits an alliance with the Ffolk, and he and Tristan forged the first united government of the Moonshaes since the Northmen first arrived so many hundreds of years ago.

Background notes: Grunnarch is the king of Norland, the westernmost kingdom of the Northmen in the Moonshaes. Norland is one large island with a wide expanse of pine forest and lakes protected from the storms of the Trackless Sea by the Jotunhammer Mountain range.

Grunnarch rules a dozen lesser kings whose domains make up the settled portions of Norland along the eastern coast of that island.

After gaining his kingship, Grunnarch consolidated his rule and gained a reputation as the second greatest of the kings of the Northmen in the Moonshaes.

At the peak of his power, Grunnarch joined with his fellow Northman kings to attempt to ravage Corwell. The king of Oman, Thelgar Ironhand, assembled all the the Northmen and used them in a master plan to utterly destroy the kingdom of Corwell. What none of the Northmen realized was that Thelgar Ironhand was dead, and his body taken over by Kazgaroth.

By the time Kazgaroth finally revealed himself in the heat of the final stages of the siege of Caer Corwell, Grunnarch was the only one of the Northman kings still alive. He led his panicked, routed forces from the scene and is now the main leader of the Northmen of the Moonshaes.

With his onetime opponent, Tristan, the high king of the Ffolk of the Moonshaes, Grunnarch forged the Moonshaes into a unified nation, with Northmen and Ffolk working together toward a new glory for the islands.

Other notes: DMs running a Moonshae Isles campaign can use Grunnarch as the leader for any Northmen encounter, as Grunnarch spends as much time as he can away from his duties and on the seas in his long ship. Until the time of the events of DARKWALKER ON MOONSHAE, Grunnarch also led the only cavalry force among the Northmen, a select group of 100 horsemen called the Bloodriders. These were taken over by Kazgaroth and their game statistics can be found in the write-up for that monster.

If player character dwarves have learned about the beleaguered dwarves in the Jotunhammer Mountains (see FR2, MOONSHAE), Grunnarch is the man with whom they will have to deal to get safe conduct into the mountains to try to save their kinsmen. However, considering the tolerant relationship between the Northmen and the frost giants who are oppressing the dwarves, getting that safe conduct may be very difficult.

The Northmen propitiate the frost giants with gifts and leave them strictly alone. They are not interested in having adventurers interfere with this peaceful arrangement.

Grunnarch learned his battlefield skills by raiding the Ffolk, who tend to fight in a clear field in one line. Thus, his best position as a leader is in the front rank, where he can act as an inspiration to his men and strike the most blows. However, the raid led by Kazgaroth in Thelgar's body and the siege of Caer Corwell taught him some more lessons in military tactics, and he is less likely to lead his men headlong into a charge now. He watches the terrain and uses his troops as cleverly as one can use a gang of semi-berserkers.

The most powerful of the magic-using Harpell family of Longsaddle, Malchor Harpell is also the only one who has ever ventured out from Longsaddle for any length of time. He is a true thinker, a lover of the secrets of the universe, and combines that with an adventuresome spirit.

Unlike most wizards who perfect their craft well enough to earn the title of arch-mage, Malchor is a fine physical specimen as well. Tall and straight, he could have been successful at many adventuring professions. But there is no doubt that he chose right in undertaking a career as a magic-user. His attitude is that of the true wizard. While Dendybar and other power-hungry mages seek knowledge for the sake of personal strength, Malchor seeks knowledge simply for the sake of learning.

He is a painter, a lover of art, and considers his magic as another extension of his creativity. In his magic, he is a craftsman as surely as any dwarven smith. While the dwarf pounds the metal into beautiful objects, Malchor tunes his magical skills into creations of wonder and power. Included among his long list of magical creations are a staff of the magi, rings of warmth, and rings of feather falling.

When traveling, Malchor, usually astride a griffon, always brings his staff of the magi, a +3 ring of protection, bracers of defense AC6, and a lurker cloak, as well as several rings of warmth and feather falling which he might give to a helpful adventurer or use as barter for some new spell or arcane tome. His spell choice also reflects both his love of learning and the adventuresome side, typically consisting of a balanced blend of divination-type spells such as read magic and legend lore, and evocations, such as Bigby's grasping hand and lightning bolt. His favorite spells are the various Bigby's hand maneuvers, especially Bigby's crushing hand, which does exceptionally well as an interrogation tool. Legend lore also strikes a chord in his heart, especially when it reveals some knowledge long lost to the world. Everytime Malchor casts it, he tingles in anticipation of the mysteries he may be uncovering.

As an arch-mage, Malchor certainly has an ample day-to-day spell selection to remain a formidable adventurer and an inquisitive student of the world. So dedicated to his craft, his spellbooks are overfilled with spells that most mages have never even heard of. And with his own research and his family constantly working on new spells, Malchor's books continue to swell.

Malchor was born in the Ivy Mansion on Harpell Hill in Longsaddle, the small hamlet west of Luskan and Waterdeep. The town is principally known as the home of the Harpells, an extraordinary family of magic-users experimenting on the edge of reason and caution. Many a Harpell has fallen victim to an unsus-cessful experiment, and others have lost their perspective on reality to a world of unprovable and incomprehensible theories. Therefore, when Malchor, a relatively straightforward mage, emerged to become a charter member of the Company of Crazy Adventurers, a wild band of young heroes dashing through the northern wilderness like a runaway tornado, many speculated that he was trying to escape the unsteady environment of his birthplace.

That wasn't completely true. Malchor did see limitations to life in Longsaddle. His family's singular line of reasoning (or unreasoning) had begun to stagnate for the lack of influx of new ideas and a new way of approaching the use of magic. He felt that he would achieve his potential only if he left, for a while, and saw the world from a fresh perspective.

He was the longest running member of the Company of Crazy Adventurers, then took up study under Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun. After long years and rising to the title of arch-mage, Malchor returned to Longsaddle to share some of his experiences with his kin.

Then, needing a place of study far removed from the constant explosions and interruptions of the experiments at the Ivy Mansion, Malchor traveled a half-a-day's ride to the west, to the edge of Neverwinter Woods, and built the Tower of Twilight, his finest creation.

Malchor rarely leaves his tower now, preferring the solitude of magical study. His present project involves the enhancement of stone guardians, golem-like creations that serve as guards in his tower. Malchor is a master at creating them, but is convinced that the art can be improved.

Sometimes Malchor's adventuresome side resurfaces and he'll take to the road for a short, whirlwind dash, but inevitably he finds his way back to the tower before the change of a single season.

Also, again on a whim of the complex mage's many moods, Malchor might take a younger mage under his tutelage. Though it is unlikely that any student will remain with Malchor for more than a year or two, the young mage will certainly be better off for the experience.

For he will have witnessed one of the true geniuses of the Forgotten Realms at work, a man of insight and foresight, of daring and reason, and a true lover of the art of magic use.

Roleplaying tips: For all of his hermit-like existence in the Tower of Twilight, Malchor Harpell is generally friendly and outgoing to new acquaintances. He has no reason not to trust anyone, for he knows that he is well equipped to defend himself if the need arises.

He is always willing to help out a party which travels with good intentions, and if Malchor gets involved in an adventure, hold on to your helmets! He has been known to level a mountain of goblin tunnels and drain a lake that housed a lizard man lair. Overkill is the key word here.

As for training younger mages, Malchar is quick to distinguish between a lover of learning and a lover of power. The former is likely to gain much from the arch-mage, the latter is likely to get a farewell handshake, complete with a kick in the rump!

15th-Level Human Cleric

S:16 I:15 W:18 D:15 C:16 CH:13

Commonly remembered spells:

- First-level — Ceremony, command, detect magic, purify food and drink.
- Second-level — Attraction (new spell, see other notes).

- Third-level — Animate dead, create food and water decay (new spell, particular to Bhaal, see other notes).
- Fourth-level — nil.
- Fifth-level — Air walk, control weather, wound (another spell unique to Bhaal, see other notes).
- Sixth-level — Aerial servant, blade barrier.
- Seventh-level — Earthquake.

Physical description: Hobarth is grotesquely fat; rolls of fat sag around his neck and tiny eyes gleam from beneath low, sinister brows and over-bloated cheeks. Several large warts — punishments from Bhaal for moments when he had been less than devout — mar his nose.

He usually wears his holy robes, which conceal the suit of chain mail he prudently wears underneath.

Equipment: When Hobarth came to Corwell, he was drawn to the Heart of Kazgaroth. This is the stone-like black heart of the avatar — all that is left after Tristan slew him. The Heart of Kazgaroth acts as a direct channel to Bhaal. It confers no further spells on its wielder, who must be a priest of Bhaal, but it allows the priest to use any spell without forgetting it.

The stone calls appropriate clerics to itself if it is not in the right hands. All plant life and small animal life within 15' of the stone withers and dies within a day. If Bhaal wishes to give specific commands to his priest, the stone implants images of the command in the priest's mind.

Personality: Hobarth is mean, petty, manipulative, and vicious. He has a short temper when thwarted that he tries to control. He has piggish personal habits and loves to eat.

Motivations: Like most priests of the death god, Hobarth fears Bhaal and propitiates him at every chance. He hates the sea. Next to the sea, he hates dogs. His loves are the exercise of power over people and the dealing of death.

Background notes: Hobarth, a devoted priest of Bhaal, came from Amn to the Moonshaes. Bhaal realized that while Kazgaroth made Bhaal's presence felt in the islands, the monster was not a priest, and could not convert anyone to his cause and worship, except covertly and briefly.

Once in the isles, Hobarth discovered Cyndre was already starting his own master plan for dominion over the Isles. The two joined in a holy (in Bhaal's eyes, anyway) alliance to destroy the power of the druids, each intending to destroy the other when their conquest was completed.

Then Kazgaroth, heartened because Bhaal had so reduced the power of the Goddess, made his own bid to destroy Corwell (See DARKWALKER ON MOONSHAE). Bhaal stood aside to let his avatar make his bid for conquest.

When Kazgaroth failed, Hobarth moved the alliance to avenge him. While Cyndre attempted to destroy Tristan on Alaron, Hobarth journeyed to Gwynneth, where he found the Heart of Kazgaroth and used it to animate an army of undead. He led this army to attack Myrloch Vale, the center of the Goddess' power, for the purpose of destroying it and also securing Robyn of Corwell to sacrifice to Bhaal.

Hobarth succeeded in his first purpose, but Robyn got away to join Tristan in Alaron and help him defeat Cyndre and the high king.

Hobarth followed his god's dictates to destroy Myrloch Vale and confronted Tristan and his allies there on the bare bones of the Vale in the final battle, where Bhaal himself came to confront his antagonists.

Attraction (alteration)

Level: 2

Components: V,S,M

Range: touch

Casting Time: 1 round

Duration: 1 hour/level

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: 1 target

MINOR CHARACTERS

Explanation/description: This acts as a combination of the magical spell charm person and the clerical remove fear and is much used by clerics of Bhaal because of their ambient air of death. It also has aspects of the magical spell friends. The spell replaces any negative emotions the target has toward the user with positive emotions. Repulsion becomes attraction, hatred becomes love, etc. It is reversible, as disdain and can be used in that fashion to cause the target to replace all positive feelings concerning a named target (which can be the caster if he really wants someone to despise him) with their opposites. A saving throw against this spell has modifiers of +1 through +5 if the emotions to be changed are really intense. As such, it is much more useful as a ploy to make a date with a barmaid (who is motivated to please customers, anyway) than it is to convert the feelings of one's enemies.

Commonly used spells: Levitate, deflection, aid, trance, dream sight, castigate, abjure, speak with dead, immunity to weapons, possess, raise dead.

He was destruction incarnate. Was he evil? Or was he merely a victim of a darker power?

Physical Description: He is a huge, squat man (nearly 250 pounds), rippling with muscle and suppressed power. His clothes are the simple red robes of the monk, but his teeth are blacked and his eyebrows shaven to show that he is not unaware of courtly graces. His tread is menacingly light — subtle destructive power lightly reined by an iron will.

Personality: Brilliant, cold, and calculating, Jinchin is a consummate strategist. A master swordsman, far greater than either Doin Sanehiro or Prince Gisen, he is capable of besting any opponent. He has also mastered many of the arts of the shukenja, turning these to his own evil designs, and making him an extremely deadly foe in all aspects. Yet, he never kills needlessly. Mercy and murder are one the same to him, as long as they serve a greater plan.

Motivations: Emotion rarely if ever affects Jinchin's judgment. He can be a charming host or a ruthless killer, depending on which face is more useful to him at the time. His greatest pleasure is in exhibiting his ability, whether as strategist or a fighter — a bold decision masterfully made fills him with the same heady feelings others might associate with passion or love.

Jinchin's history: Once a powerful counselor to the Imperial Court, the monk Jinchin (then known by the his clan name of Ieyasu Sabanada) was the eldest son of a major samurai family. But soon after the death of his father, he and his elder brothers fell to fighting each other. Stripped of his titles and ranks, Ieyasu retired to the distant Temple of Kagaii, renouncing his old name for the name Jinchin, and taking up the monk's robes of office.

Jinchin's original goal was merely to depose his brothers and once again rule the Sabanada Clan. But as he stayed long years at the temple, increasing his mastery of the shukenja's arts, his ambitions grew, until at last, nothing would do but complete dominion over the lands of Kozakura.

To this end, Jinchin began to gather to himself a great army — first, of discontented monks within the temple, then later, rebellious samurai and ronin circulating around the Emperor's Court. As his army grew, it began to attract even less savory recruits: monstrous oni, tengu, and legions of undead gakken.

The Earth Spider: In his quest for absolute power, Jinchin was willing to deal with the darkest of spirits. The most feared of these was the infamous Earth Spider. This terrible demon (once defeated by a great ancestor of the Emperor) held a special hatred of the Imperial Throne and all it symbolized. Coming to Jinchin in his dreams, it offered him all of its power, if the evil monk would in turn become the Earth Spider's avatar. The unholy alliance was consummated in blood, and the now unstoppable Jinchin poured forth his demonic legions upon the land.

It was in one of these battles that Jinchin first encountered Doin Sanehiro, then tactical adviser for the Shuramura Clan. Sanehiro was merely another samurai, until his strategies at the battle of Kiroshina threw back five of Jinchin's six attacks. On the sixth assault, Jinchin dispatched one of his most powerful oni to personally deal with Sanehiro. Thinking the matter ended, he was somewhat irritated to find Sanehiro alive after the battle and still a viable opponent. At each step of his orderly plan of conquest, Jinchin found himself blocked by Sanehiro, so that eventually killing the samurai became an obsession (or as close to an obsession as Jinchin would allow himself).

Jinchin's hatred of Sanehiro has grown even greater, as his dark master (the Earth Spider), will not let the monk slay the "Monkey" out of hand. As a price for gaining the demon spider's powers, Jinchin has been forced to use Sanehiro/Monkey as a pawn with which to capture the willow spirit Onoye.

Dungeon Master's information:

It is rare that an adventuring party will encounter Jinchin on the road; peons on the level of player characters will always encounter one of Jinchin's many minions. However, should the adventurers in some way thwart Jinchin, it is likely that they will come to his attention. Attacks by his monstrous allies will follow. Should the players survive these encounters, Jinchin may actually lead a force against them himself, hoping to capture and subvert them to his side.

There is one exception to this. Should the players already be allied with Sanehiro/Monkey or one of his friends, Jinchin will take very special notice of them. They will be singled out for attacks from his most powerful forces. Should the adventurers escape their fates, Jinchin will personally seek them out for destruction!

Jinchin has two aspects; that of his human self (a powerful samurai/shukenja double class), and the aspect of an avatar of the Earth Spider. As an avatar, Jinchin has access to any or all of the spells of the demon creature, although he may not use its bite and poison attacks.

The beast is a formidable foe in combat, yet whenever possible, it seeks to do battle through shrewdness and trickery rather than straightforward melee. When fighting in its true form, Kazgaroth attacks with its clutching foreclaws and vicious bite. It can, at the same time, swing its tail around to strike a foe from behind for 1d6 points of damage. A person thus struck must make a Dexterity Check with a -5 penalty, or be knocked from his feet. He can do nothing the next round except stand.

Kazgaroth can only be struck by magical weapons of +2 or greater enchantment. Its magical resistance applies to all magic-user and clerical spells, except for those neutral clerics whose powers are based on preservation of the balance of nature.

Kazgaroth can change shape at will, shrinking to as small as halfling size. It can assume the exact form of a creature (including a human or other intelligent creature) it has eaten. It cannot assume a form larger than its own — but then it doesn't really need to. It has a number of special abilities.

The beast can cause lycanthropy with its bite, if it chooses to do so. It can detect magic and detect invisibility in a 24" radius at will. It can cast a permanent charm upon a victim at a range of 1" or less. A side effect of this charm is that the victim must roll a successful saving throw vs. spell each week or permanently lose a point of Charisma (to a minimum of 3). Once per week it can cast a death spell at a character of seventh level or lower.

The beast has a unique ability to perform a corrupted type of mass charm spell, creating for itself a band of fanatically loyal undead troops known as Blood Warriors. A unit of soldiers, up to 500 individuals, can be thus corrupted as long as the unit has a strong commander to serve as the beast's lieutenant. The game stats of the Blood Warriors follow this description.

Kazgaroth draws power from the Goddess of the Moonshae Isles herself and thus chooses as a resting place a Moonwell (see FR2, MOONSHAE) that has been polluted or otherwise desecrated. The beast is the lord of the firbolgs (see MOONSHAE) and will often order a band of these giants to guard its well, and perhaps to pollute it, while it rests and gains power. If Kazgaroth is slain by any means other than the Sword of Cymrych Hugh, it will return within 3d6 years. If this sword is used to kill it, and the remains of the beast are burned to ashes, it is rumored that it can be destroyed permanently.

Apparently this happened when Prince Tristan Kendrick slew the beast, but a part of its heart survived the conflagration, and it may yet grow again.

Physical description: Kazgaroth looks like a tyrannosaurus rex with forelimbs that, while still short, actually match the rest of its body. It can run on all fours if it pleases, but usually travels on its hind legs. It has a broad, scaly body, and drools mildly acidic saliva from widespread jaws. Its feet are heavily clawed, and poisoned spikes project from its knees and elbows.

It, and most of its creations, such as the Blood Warriors (or Bloodriders) have hot fiery eyes. This continues in whatever form it assumes unless it very consciously controls itself.

Personality: Kazgaroth is evil and degradation incarnate. When it has a foe helpless it gloats, and even when masquerading as human it is cold and merciless and may kill someone on a whim.

Motivations: In the pantheon of the Realms, the beast is manifested as an aspect of Malar, the Beastlord. On the Moonshaes, however, this aspect has a specific purpose: the disruption of The Balance.

Background notes: The origins of Kazgaroth lurk in the past, nearly as distant as those of the Goddess of the Moonshae Isles herself.

Over the years, it has arisen many times to upset The Balance and create havoc. Most recently, it attempted to combine the firbolgs and Northmen into a conquering army set on destroying all the realms of the Ffolk on the Moonshaes. However, despite his depredations, Prince Tristan Kendrick and his friends Robyn the druid, Daryth of Calimshan, Keren the harper, Gavin the Smith, Finellen the dwarf, Brigit the elven knight, and Pawldo the halfling managed to stop him and slay him with the Sword of Crymrych Hugh, at the cost of Keren and Gavin's lives.

Other notes: The Blood Warriors (or Bloodriders) are a type of undead soldier corrupted from normal human warriors by Kazgaroth's power. They are fanatically loyal, never check morale, and rejoice in killing. The beast can create one such unit each time it emerges from hibernation to stalk the land.

Further information on this troop of undead can be found in FR2, MOONSHAE.

Seventh-Level Human Kensai

Proficiencies: Calligraphy, etiquette, horsemanship, reading/writing, kung fu, poetry.

There are some things so fair to look upon, that they disguise their true power and dangerousness. These are the poisonous dagger shell of the Celestial Sea, the coral banded serpent of the Great Desert. And then, there is Prince Gisen of T'u Lung.

A thousand years of culture and wisdom have culminated in the young Prince Gisen — as he, proud of his lineage and history, would be the first to tell you. Or would, were he not constantly engaged in a life and death struggle to survive against impossible odds. This is one reason why he has chosen to hide his illustrious lineage behind the simple name of a traveling mendicant called Kuang.

A young man of 22, Kuang/Gisen stands out even among the many peoples of the Lands of Men. He is tall, well-built, and has the face and features that young women dream of and scholars talk of in their histories. With his grand and flowing motions, his long hair tied back in the fashionable style of the Eastern Court, his dark, flashing eyes and saturnine smile, he might well be considered too pretty to be taken seriously. As his many adversaries have discovered far too late, this is a fatal miscalculation.

The T'u Lung court is a hotbed of duels, assassination, and intrigue, and it is in this arena that Kuang/Gisen survived to manhood. As a child of 5, the innate savagery of his family line surfaced when he single-handedly killed an assassin with his own knife. Trained in the best dojos of both the Shou and T'u courts, he has grown to be a master of the blade, as well as of various more obscure weapons, including the much dreaded kung fu of the Eastern lands.

Unlike his good friend Doin Sanehiro, Kuang's skill is that of the formal duelist. This originally made him somewhat naive concerning battlefield combat, as he mistakenly believed his opponent would follow the same rules of honor and decorum in which he was trained.

Years of fighting pitched battles in desperate circumstances have taught him the errors in his thinking.

The legend of the princess: Destined to become a third son in the hotly contested T'u Lung succession, Kuang's plans were severely altered during a trading trip to the islands. While traveling as a trader captain (Kuang is inordinately fond of elaborate disguises), he chanced to rescue a young woman who had been kidnapped by pirates. It was only much later, after the two young people had fallen deeply in love, that Kuang discovered his "princess" was indeed just that — the youngest daughter, in fact, of the powerful emperor of Shou Lung. As their two nations had been embroiled in a civil war for the last two centuries, the lovers knew their affair was doomed — yet, under the sheltering hand of the divine Kwan Yang (mistress of lovers and compassion), they still attempted to secretly meet whenever possible.

This "love under the sword" came to an abrupt end when the traveling minstrel Tam Nong Hikong came to the Shou Court singing a new tale of kidnapped princesses, heroic princes, and forbidden love. While Hikong's new tale was a popular success, it didn't take long for the Shou emperor to deduce the participants and take action. The little princess was packed off to an unknown destination, and her enraged eldest brother set assassins upon Prince Gisen to destroy him for the affront.

Fleeing the agents of the most powerful nation under heaven, Kuang knows he lacks the power to directly oppose his enemies. Even if he should win the Southern throne (and with two powerful brothers opposing him, this is doubtful), the forces of T'u Lung would be unable to prevail against Shou Lung's mighty armies. For now, Kuang travels through Kozakura and Wa, seeking allies and magics which will give him some advantage in his struggle to win his princess.

Wisdom isn't Kuang's strong point — headstrong, impulsive, and charismatic, he depends on luck and wit to get him out of most scrapes, and his sword skills to carry him through when all else fails. While his goal is etched in his mind, his methods are sketchily outlined, and his plans even worse.

Kuang is very clever, quick-witted, and fanciful. His facility for disguise, learned from his elderly tutor, allows him to pass safely where most would fear to tread. His biggest problem is his natural arrogance — a prince of an arrogant nation, descended from the sea kings of Hai-Yuan, he finds it hard to swallow his pride in difficult situations.

Currently, Kuang/Prince Gisen is in the guise of a young physician from the Eastern lands; talented with herbs and healing lore (or at least enough to get by: DMs may grant Kuang up to second-level clerical ability as part of his guise). He wears flashy but slightly tattered clothes, and carries a bag of herbs and cures. A small monkey (a symbol of his calling) rides his shoulder — he never fails to make comparisons between his pet and Doin Sanehiro's unfortunate nickname.

On the road, and in his mendicant's disguise, the Prince wears no armor other than a heavily mailed kote on his left arm (he is a left-handed swordsman, adding an additional +1 to his abilities as a fencer). In battle, Prince Gisen wears a fine and honorable suit of armor in the Shou/T'u style (+4 magical armor). Its perfect finish has been covered by a cheap coat of black lacquer to disguise its ancestry.

Dungeon Master's information: Players may encounter Prince Gisen/Kuang almost anywhere within the Eastern Realms, as his search for allies and artifacts takes him to many strange places. If the PCs are overwhelmed in an attack, he will always lend his considerable fighting skills to their cause; if he trusts them, he may try to enlist them in his crusade. This may take the form of adventures to recover powerful items, free allies, or just fight a source of oppression or evil.

The Floating and the Shimmering Blades: The famous Floating Blade of Shin Lu is one of a matched pair of swords, forged on the day of the two half-brothers' birth. The second sword is known as the Shimmering Blade of Shin Gisen. Both weapons are +3 long swords in the butterfly-tipped Shou style, and have the following powers: vorpal blade, luck blade, illusion and charm x 3 per day. However, when drawn in the presence of the matching blade, the swords become mere +3 blades, unable to tap into their greater powers. The two blades were on display in the respective capitals of Shou and T'u Lung, until 10 years ago, when both mysteriously vanished.

As legend has it, each of the twin blades is self aware, and that upon the death of each half-brother, his soul was captured and contained within his choice of weapon. The Floating Blade is said to contain the spirit of the Shou Emperor Shin Lu, and that his soul manifests itself as purity and light, teaching the blade's owner the way of peace and silent power. The Shimmering Blade of Shin Gisen manifests the spirit of its T'u Lung owner — it is violent, and possessed of quick, savage power. The Floating Blade's alignment is Lawful Good, the Shimmering Blade is Lawful Evil.

Kuang was given the blades by his sword mentor, the great Tong Fu Mei, who had replaced the blade guards and hilts. (How Tong Fu acquired the blades can only be speculated.) However, the old sword master wisely did not tell the young Prince their origin, telling him only that the blades had a long and glorious history. As a result, Kuang has little or no knowledge of the Floating and Shimmering Blades' abilities. This is as Tong Fu intended, for his plan is to see which of the two blades Kuang will favor, and thus determine the young Prince's chosen path. It is ironic indeed that the very artifacts Prince Gisen needs to carve his way to the Jade Throne are within his very grasp.

A green-eyed man with pale brown hair who looks to be in his mid-20s, Lhaeo has aged well. His actual age is not well known. When he lets his true personality be seen, he is a quietly confident man possessing a keen mind and a very dry sense of humor. Lhaeo sees a lot and says very little, a trait that Elminster values greatly, calling him "the very soul of discretion."

To most of the world at large, he is a lisping, simpering fop of a man, with an effeminate way about him. He speaks in a high, lilting voice, avoids direct eye contact, and never sits or stands upright. All of this is an act which he has been playing for around 10 years. He can slip back and forth between personalities with startling ease.

To the best of Lhaeo's knowledge, he is the last surviving member of a noble family in Tethyr. He is the son of King Alemander IV and the younger brother to prince Alemander V, traitor and kinslayer. Lhaeo's mother was sent on a long land and sea excursion for her health shortly after becoming pregnant with him. It lasted over a year, and she toured many kingdoms.

When the lad was but 6 months old, he was given into the hands of Elminster at the request of King Alemander IV. Since Lhaeo was the younger son, the king sought to protect him from the intrigues of court and get him the best education in all of Faerun, namely under the tutelage of the famous Elminster. The entire birth and giving over of the boy to the sage was kept a secret. Later, the secret was kept to protect his life.

Ten years ago, when the royal family was thrown down from power, the last person in Tethyr to know of the existence of the prince died. Elminster told Lhaeo of his true heritage on his 16th birthday. By that time, Tethyr was already in strife. To return would mean certain death for one only trained as a scribe. With time he has lost most of his desire to journey to a homeland he never knew.

His resemblance to the royal family is close enough, at least so Elminster says, that he has adopted a false personality to throw off any visitors from Tethyr who might pass through Shadowdale. Most men will not see past the voice and attitude to think that there might be a prince present.

Lhaeo has no desire to rule any nation, and is content to merely be the foremost scribe to the foremost sage and practitioner of the art in the Realms. He rarely leaves Elminster's Tower, except to get supplies and other common items in Shadowdale. On rare occasions he will accompany Elminster on a journey, but prefers to be left behind.

He has had few women in his years, and usually they have sharp, penetrating minds, and are not easily fooled by his act. Currently he is secretly trysting with Storm Silverhand, a former adventuress of considerable reputation, who cares not what others may think of her. They have kept their relationship secret from their friends, although it is almost certain that Elminster is aware of it.

If you use the DRAGON® magazine NPC class of scribes, Lhaeo would be an 11th-level scribe. As such, he has the trained ability similar to the write spell (first-level magic-user) without needing to cast any magic. Lhaeo can memorize and cast up to two of the following spells per day: Comprehend languages, confuse languages (reverse of previous), erase, read magic, unreadable magic (reverse of previous), explosive runes, secret page, encrypt, inscribe, and legend lore. He has learned all of these spells from Elminster. After two decades of service, Lhaeo has learned a lot from them. He reads and writes every language in the Realms, and several from other worlds, and speaks Elvish. He is versed in codes and ciphers, and can forge most styles of handwriting. He is especially adept at imitating Elminster's writing, frequently leaving messages for the old sage written this way. This harmless practical joke has been known to produce quite a reaction, to which Lhaeo smiles and goes back to peeling potatoes.

He is particularly skilled at cartography and calligraphy. He has made several innovations in mapping now in common use throughout the Realms. Original maps of his can command a fair price in most civilized cities, and caravan masters pay a high price even for a copy of a copy.

Lhaeo has few possessions of his own. One is a short sword of quickness (+2) emblazoned with his original family crest, which he hides under a wrapping of leather. Rarely needed, he keeps it hidden in the bedroom of the tower. It is his only heritage from his royal lineage. With it he could prove his parentage to any in Tethyr, although he has no desire to do so.

Physical description: Maaril is a human male, a handsome, dark-eyed wizard with a jutting black beard curling from the point of his chin. Maaril is given to wearing dark green or purple robes and always carries a staff.

Equipment: Maaril always wears his bracers of AC4, his amulet of proof against detection and location, and a ring of X-ray vision. And he is never without his staff of power.

Personality: Maaril is a quiet, patient, behind-the-scenes schemer. He is known as an eccentric, but no one knows of his evil side. He rarely appears in public, but is known to spread the word to the taverns that he is having a party for those adventurers who have returned from their latest quests in the last three months. At these parties, he makes a point of meeting everyone and talking about their adventures with some animation, asking for particulars about how monsters were fought and what devices were used or found in the course of the adventure.

Motivations: Maaril's main interest in life is magic items, and he will do anything he can, in his own way, to obtain any items adventurers bring into Waterdeep. He throws his "welcome home" parties in order to find out about the latest items found by adventurers and what other items they may have in which he is interested.

He is also fascinated with other planes and continually researches the spells necessary to open up gates and the spells necessary to control denizens of other planes once he has opened up the gate. He is a careful planner, and is not likely to open up a gate full of monsters he cannot control.

Background notes: It is said that Maaril came from east of the Inner Sea, from Thay or Mulhorand or Aglarond or one of those other exotic lands that are known so little on the Sword Coast. However, very little is known of Maaril's life before he came to Waterdeep.

He has adventured with several of the adventurers of the city and has a reputation as a greedy but proficient magic-user who always wants magic items as his share of any loot. He is also stingy with his magic items, using spells before a magic item. Of course, if he is traveling with an adventuring band, his spell mix, as shown above, changes to fit the situation.

Other notes: Maaril lives in the Dragon Tower, which is so called because the top of the tower is carved into a dragon head and the smoke from the chimneys issues from the dragon's nostrils and mouth, an eerie sight.

Maaril rarely issues forth from this tower, except to attend the private parties of the nobles of Waterdeep or make arrangements for his own parties, which are restricted to the bottom floor of the tower. Guests climbing the stairs are stopped by animated statues (stone golems) who do not let anyone pass to the upper stories.

The tower is full of guardian monsters in the form of enchanted constructs, and they remain lifeless if Maaril has guests rather than intruders, unless the guests go where they are not wanted.

When Maaril wants to seize a magic item from its current owner, he sends gargoyles or clay golems by night. If adventurers prove pesky and persistent in wanting their items back, he hires (through intermediaries) bravos and assassins to do away with them.

When the golems and gargoyles secure the items for which they are sent, they return to the Dragon Tower by means of the sewers of Waterdeep. Maaril has a secret entrance to the sewers in his kitchen area, which is in the back of the first floor of the tower.

Maaril can be a good method of getting rid of a magic item that proves too disrupting to the campaign. If the characters are so enamored of the object that they try to get it back, Maaril can become a major menace to the party, growing in level as they do, and always ready to attack them with hirelings or constructs, or otherwise work against them. Remember that he is constantly acquiring new magic items from other sources as he deals with the player characters.

If he gets the characters mad enough, he can be used as an excuse for a trip to the other planes. As the characters close in on him, he escapes to another plane, and the characters must follow him (using some artifact that he had to leave behind in the rush). Once on the other plane, they must hunt him down, and deal with the inhabitants of the other plane. The DM can devise an elaborate society of other plane beings whose ways are totally foreign to the party members, and to Maaril. The characters may have to team up with Maaril to escape this plane, then finally deal with him back in the Forgotten Realms. And, of course, there is nothing to say that they will come out in the same place they entered.

- Fifth-level — Cloud kill, feeblemind, magic jar
- Sixth-level — Disintegrate, project image.
- Seventh-level — Teleport without error
- Eighth-level — Trap the soul.

Physical description: Manshoon is a human male of average size who always wears a mask. It is said that he has had his features changed from when he was last seen unmasked. In any case, no one knows his true face, and he is said to walk unmasked in the streets of Zhentil Keep to get a better understanding of the people. If so, his actions prove this deception is solely for the purpose of learning how to repress them better.

Equipment: Manshoon carries a staff of the magi, wears black robes of the arch-magi and wears a ring of spell storing and a ring of wizardry that doubles fourth- and fifth-level spells. If he does, in fact, walk the streets of Zhentil Keep, then he must have other magical items that protect him, or some sort of illusion to hide the appearance of his usual equipment.

Personality: Manshoon is cruel, calculating, and careful. He never lets his temper master his reason, and is always alert. He is quite content to flee danger.

Motivations: Manshoon learned at an early age that the best spot to occupy in a tyranny is the tyrant's seat. His tyrannical father abused his power over his children, and Manshoon decided that no one would again have that authority over him.

His ultimate goal is the total domination of the Realms from the Sunrise Mountains to the Sword Coast. Then, perhaps, he will feel safe and sure that no one will be able to tyrannize him again.

Background notes: Manshoon was born to a noble house of Zhentil

MINOR CHARACTERS

Keep. After his father's death, Manshooon first slew his older brother Asmoth and then seized control of the city's governing councils by skillful intrigue, staunch allies (such as the city ruler, Lord Chess, a lifelong "friend"), and the aid of the beholder Xantriph and that faction of the priesthood of Bane led by Fzoul Chembryl.

Manshooon's alliances with the dark nagas, and his manipulations of the Cult of the Dragon, increased his influence and bought him the time necessary to build his personal mastery of the magical arts without allowing stronger rivals to assume control of the city until he was ready to take it.

Now he has virtual control of the city and he has flourished; his spell library is thought to be the equal of Khelben Arunsun's, and his arsenal of magical devices and weapons the largest held by a single mage anywhere in the Realms (although it is scattered, hidden, and guarded by spells and monsters).

Other notes: Manshooon heads the Zhentarim; its power and success are largely due to his efforts, and its collective control of Zhentil Keep, the Citadel of the Raven (and through it, dominance of Thar and the cities of the Moonsea's north coast), Darkhold (and through it, maintenance of the shortest overland trade route between the Inner Sea and Waterdeep) have made him very rich.

He seems an unbeatable foe; others face danger to do his bidding, but he is "never there."

It must be kept in mind that although the Zhentarim (known as "The Black Network" to its foes) is a powerful force, it does not, in fact, control Zhentil Keep. Manshooon has the ear of Lord Chess, but so do many other councilors, including representatives of Lord Bane who are not under the thumb of Fzoul Chembryl.

Thus, it is possible to enter Zhentil Keep to confront Manshooon (assuming anyone would want to do so) and not be stopped at the city gates. However, Manshooon has his own small fortress within the walls of Zhentil Keep, and his alliance of all classes of being makes him well-nigh invulnerable. Anyone wishing to assault him directly will need help.

One interesting focus for adventure is Manshooon's many caches of equipment and provisions. Each of these would provide a rare treasure for an adventuring party. Of course, discovering a map to any of these caches is virtually impossible, but it would not be strange for Manshooon to hide them away in a dungeon where other creatures and treasures can serve to scare away or distract adventurers.

This situation could serve as a means of involving a party of adventurers who have had no dealings with the Zhentarim in a feud with Manshooon. In whatever dungeon they are exploring, simply set up a treasure of gems, jewelry, and a couple of magic items appropriate for a magic-user but usable by others (such as rings of protection or some miscellaneous magic item), guard them with monsters and/or traps that can sit in one place for decades without needing to move around, and let them be found by the intrepid adventurers. They slay the guardians, avoid the traps, and gain a useful treasure. Manshooon is very upset, and soon learns who looted his cache, and the characters gain an implacable foe, who will not rest until they are all dead.

Physical description: Manxam's physical shape is the same as any other eye tyrant: A large diameter sphere covered in chitin with ten eyestalks, a large eye in the forward part of the sphere, and a tooth-filled mouth below that, all of which floats about 3" above the ground.

Equipment: There is very little equipment that is of use to an eye tyrant, but Manxam has rigged a framework among his eye tentacles and had a helm of telepathy altered to let him wear and use it.

Like any eye tyrant, Manxam has extensive treasures, including several magical items. He likes to collect them for the sake of collecting them, and, of course, any magic item in his collection cannot be used against him.

Personality: Manxam is a very reasonable beholder, ready to deal with humans (as long as it is to his perceived advantage) rather than immediately attack them. For this reason, he first allied himself with Zhentil Keep.

He is particularly friendly to priests of Bane, and unfriendly to magic-users unless they demonstrate their friendliness to him. He will not negotiate with a magic-user, though he is willing to speak to one for the purpose of threatening him.

Motivations: Manxam is motivated by a desire to build up a private little fiefdom in Teshwave. He has servants and slaves, and is willing to help the humans of Zhentil Keep in order to accumulate more wealth to build up his own defenses.

Manxam, like most of the eye tyrants who have cooperated with humankind in Zhentil Keep prior to the rise of the Zhentarim, resents and despises the "upstart mages," vastly preferring the priests of Bane, who accord beholders the respect they see as their due. Moreover, he views the Zhentarim's bold expansionist policies with increasing alarm, thinking that they will lead to an inevitable battle union of all of Zhentil Keep's foes, and the resulting defeat and destruction of Zhentil Keep. If Zhentil Keep is destroyed, its allies will be destroyed, and Manxam is too intelligent to think he won't be one of the allies to go down.

For this reason, he is helping the opposing faction of priests of Bane, based in Mulmaster, to thwart the Zhentarim where he can, and still remain in the good graces of Zhentil Keep. It is a thin edge he walks, but he has supreme confidence in his ability to walk it.

Background notes: Manxam spent centuries in the shadow of Xantirph and Zorkha. However, since their deaths at the hands of adventurers, he is probably the most powerful eye tyrant in the lands of the northwest Inner Sea, including the Moonsea cities, Sembia, Cormyr, and the Dales. Manxam deals in the politics of men as Xantirph did, but with a far lower profile and fewer servant creatures.

Since the great dragon invasion of a few years ago, Manxam has lived in Teshwave, once a burgeoning riverside trade town, now a ruin inhabited by the remnants of its population and an eye tyrant who has taken this time of devastation as an invitation to settle himself into a nice little estate.

The Zhentarim leave him alone, but other residents of Zhentil Keep visit and keep him apprised of current developments.

Other notes: It is thought that the anti-Zhentarim faction is using Teshwave and Manxam as a focal point for assembling their forces and training recruits for the "great day" when they drive Manshoon and his followers out of Zhentil Keep. However, they are faced with the problem of being a relatively small force facing a large, successful, operation. Being the alignment they are, they cannot even depend on the support of the populace around Zhentil Keep, for they are just as terrifying and tyrannical as the Zhentarim.

This presents some interesting possibilities for adventures, as characters can be lured to Teshwave and persuaded to "strike a blow for freedom" against the Zhentarim and gain great treasure at the same time. In this way, the anti-Zhentarim faction, which still is a great part of Zhentil Keep, is not seen as directly threatening the city, as long as no one realizes it is sponsoring the bandits who are giving the Zhentarim a bad time.

Of course, what the characters do when they realize that their patrons are led by an eye tyrant is a good question, as is the question of how long Manxam can stay in the background instead of coming to the fore and trying to enslave or kill the characters. After all, that has been the instinct of beholders for centuries, and centuries of instinct are hard to shake off.

The characters can realize the nature of their patrons in several ways, from spotting Manxam lurking in the background to making a deduction based on the condition of the people of Teshwave and what is being done toward recovery for the town.

Tiger Hengeyokai

Proficiencies: Calligraphy, etiquette, reading/writing, survival, tracking, gaming, hunting, and running.

Anger drives him — a terrible, feral thing. For he has not yet decided which path to take; that of men or that of the beast. His greatest weakness is that he worships power in all its forms, and fears it most of all in himself.

Personal History: Born a shape-changer, the hengeyokai Masakado may assume human, cat-man or tiger aspects. He is beyond the bounds of normal society, but unlike others of his kind, his aloneness torments him and drives him to associate even more with the world of men.

As a human, Masakado is thin and lithe — a cat in all but shape. His rich, lustrous hair is shot with golden streaks (a sign of his tiger blood), while his features are sharp and savage, as if roughly carved from stone. A soft, gentle voice and sleepy indolent movements belie an incredible awareness of his surroundings; his senses are far keener than those of others, and the slightest sound can jar him from torpor to instant activity. Moody, intense and headstrong, he finds it hard to plan or think ahead; instead, he lives for the moment.

Masakado is a creature of rage; dominated by the wild and savage side of himself, he is constantly struggling to subdue his animal nature. His manners are urbane; he is well-educated and intelligent. But his blood calls him to hunt at night and to seek the fury of battle and the kill. His soft voice sings with implied threat and menace, and his actions are violent and erratic. He takes offense at the smallest things, particularly if the slight is from a human.

Masakado's greatest secret is his alliance with the monk Jinchin, a human he loathes and hates, but serves willingly. Perhaps this is because each sees himself mirrored in the other. Ultimately, Masakado's fury will lead him to his destruction, as his anger drives him to honor no other will but his own.

Dungeon Master's information: Encountering Masakado is a risky proposition for any adventuring party. His violent mood swings and fearsome combat skills make him dangerous in the extreme. If the party ignores his markedly hengeyokai background, he may join them for a time as a companion; however, at the least hint of insult or notice, he will fly into a murderous rage.

Masakado wears fairly standard armor for a Kozakuran — lacquered deep black with diagonal stripes of gold on back, breast, and helm. He carries an extremely long no-dachi (the long horse sword), which he easily uses with one hand. Neither armor nor arms possess any magical properties.

Physical description: Mirt is a human male — fat, casual in dress, and generally seen with a tankard in his hand. His face is round and red-nosed, his hair is an unremarkable brown, and he walks with a slight hitch in his step, as if being very careful where he puts his feet. Anyone who sees him for the first time assumes he is drunk.

Equipment: Mirt wears a set of stained leather armor +4 under a loose tunic and treads. This includes a hood that lies under the tunic unless he is getting into a fight. In a fight, he fights with two weapons, his long sword +2 and his dagger. He also wears a ring of regeneration. Around his neck is a gem on a chain which is actually a periapt of proof against poison +2.

Personality: Mirt is coarse-mannered and gruff, a hard-drinking man. In earlier days, he also had a reputation for being lusty and brawling. Anyone who has dealings with him realizes that beneath the beery exterior is a very shrewd man.

Anyone who has closer relationships with him, such as his friends among the Lords of Waterdeep, know that he is also a romantic, and very soft-hearted.

Motivations: Mirt wishes to maintain the peace and prosperity of Waterdeep, and uses his power as a Lord of Waterdeep to insure this tranquility. At one time, Mirt was a money-grubbing mercenary, but once he had accumulated a fortune, he realized that he could not buy the peace and tranquility he wanted, that he would have to work for it. The calm he craved would not be possible unless the rest of the world was at peace.

So when Khelben and Sammereza greeted him when he moved to Waterdeep and asked him to become a Lord of Waterdeep, he accepted wholeheartedly. Now he makes his wheezing way around the streets of the city, looking for problems and trying to see what must be done to keep Waterdeep safe.

He is one of the most practical of the members of the Lords, though his innate romanticism sometimes clouds his views of the most practical ways to accomplish a purpose.

Background notes: Mirt is short for Mertonius, and as the son of a successful coaster (a trading concern along the Sword Coast), he was brought up with an appreciation of the legends of the great heroes of yore. He gravitated toward the life of a fighting man, and rapidly gained prominence under his nickname, Mirt.

Eventually, he became a successful mercenary general of the North and Sword Coast lands called "Mirt the Merciless," and accumulated a vast store of wealth. Along the way, he met Durnan the Wanderer, and they became good friends and companions.

Finally, Mirt decided he was tired, and determined that he would retire and enjoy it. The younger Durnan followed him into retirement, mostly because he could not conceive of continuing his adventuring without Mirt.

Within a month of his arrival in Waterdeep, Mirt was invited to become a Lord of Waterdeep. He was already looking for a way to break his boredom, so he accepted immediately. A few years later, when another Lord died, he suggested that Durnan be brought into the Lords, and the other Lords agreed. It was something of a shock to Durnan to see Mirt there, as he had begun to fall away from his friend because of Mirt's strange behavior.

Shortly after becoming a Lord, Mirt decided to get closer to the people of Waterdeep. He figured the best way was to become a thief. So the old, fat, but surprisingly agile Tonius the thief appeared in the Dock Ward and became a member of the Thieves Guild. He advanced rapidly until the Lords, alarmed, among other things, at the success of thieves in robbing them, decided to close the guild down. Mirt acted as a spy for the Lords, discovering all the secret ways and safe houses, then in a week of flame and steel, the guild was destroyed, and most of its members slain, captured, or driven out of Waterdeep.

After that, Mirt returned to his craft as a fighter and continued in that class, gaining most of his experience on a few missions with other Lords that took them Undermountain and into other planes to defend Waterdeep.

Now, though he is often seen wheezing about from tavern to tavern in food-stained clothing, Mirt is actually a very rich man. He is also one of the most influential Lords of Waterdeep, though few beyond the Lords themselves know this. He is well-loved by his fellows, even the paladins, and is wise in tactics and in judging the characters of all races and creeds.

Other notes: Mirt's constant companion is the young fighter Asper, whom he rescued as an infant from a sacked city, and whom he regards as his little girl, despite her now-matured beauty. Asper is a fighter of about fifth level, (DEX 17, CHA 16, CG) worships Tymora, and is a lithe, petite beauty, soft-spoken yet merry. Her weapon of choice is the bow, and she has a composite short bow +1 and 13 arrows +1 and four arrows +3 to use with it. She also has an arrow +3 of slaying griffins which is fletched with griffin feathers.

She can speak and use magic, having gained two spells of each level from first through fourth level, and one fifth-level spell. Mist can breathe a cone of fire 9" long by 3" base diameter. Like all dragons in the Realms, she can use this breath weapon as many times as she sees fit in a 24-hour period, inflicting total damage not exceeding three times her hit points, or 270 total points of damage.

Where Mist differs from a standard red dragons is in her personality. While most red dragons are horrifyingly evil and avaricious creatures, Mist is rather refined and even a bit naive in her outlook on life. She is far from the terrifying force of evil stereotypically personified by red dragons.

This does not mean Mist is not deadly or evil. She is most certainly both. Mist, however, is not prone to slaughtering parties for fun, or destroying villages for no reason other than to relish the chaos it creates. That type of wanton destruction bores Mist, and she feels there are more important things to be accomplished than simple demolition.

Mist discovered how boring – and dangerous – destruction for the sake of chaos can be when she flew south and west with a flight of dragons from the glaciers beyond Thar and attacked Yulash and Shadowdale. Though the destruction of Yulash was mildly amusing to Mist, the pitched battle over Shadowdale in which many of her comrades were destroyed by the river witch Selune was simply too dangerous to be enjoyed.

After the battle over Shadowdale, Mist moved to the Storm Horn Mountains, west of Cormyr. There she battled a younger dragon, driving him out of his lair and appropriating his hoard. During the battle, before Mist sealed her victory by tearing through her opponent's wings and grounding him, she grew overconfident, and the younger male struck a nearly fatal blow. Mist quickly defeated the other dragon after that, but it was not the last time Mist would pay for toying with her adversaries.

After the battle, Mist remained in the Storm Horns, perched over the trade route from Suzail to Waymoot, waiting for travelers and merchants to provide her with what she considered really important. In the lair, a flock of ravens constantly flutters about, and Mist seems able to read their actions, if not communicate with them directly, for the birds often warn her of approaching attackers when she is asleep.

Most of the things Mist deems important have to do with her personal comfort. She is very concerned with her diet and maintaining a schedule of regular and frequent meals. Her raids on villages or caravans usually occur around her numerous mealtimes.

Like all red dragons, Mist is interested in obtaining material wealth. But she is often bored by simple items of gold or silver. The only things that really interest her, other than food, are, in fact, music and story. For this reason, Mist is likely to attack caravans that may be carrying magical items that can hold her interest – like mechanical singing birds or talking mirrors. Of course, adventurers can sing and tell tales, too, and Mist has been known to kidnap people and keep them around as long as they keep her entertained.

It was on one of her frequent raids on the caravans traveling to Suzail that Mist first got involved with Olive Ruskettle. The halfling thief was traveling as a bard to the wedding of the sage Dimswart's daughter in Suzail when Mist carried off the wagon she was in. Mist was delighted to have snagged such a wonderfully entertaining prize, and kept Olive in a cage in her lair.

Olive kept Mist entertained until the swordswoman Alias, with the help of Akabar Bel Akash and Dragonbait, rescued the halfling. Alias challenged and defeated Mist in a feint of honor. Though Mist was honorable enough to follow the rules of combat during the feint, she was set to attack the heroes when Alias escaped with Olive. The dragon was so offended by her loss to Alias that she vowed to destroy the swordswoman.

Though she came close on many occasions, Mist never saw Alias again. However, the dragon did catch up with Olive Ruskettle outside of Yulash. Again Mist delayed devouring the halfling so the pseudo-bard could sing for her. This time it was the saurial paladin Dragonbait who rescued Olive through a feint of honor – though with considerable help from Olive.

The defeated dragon agreed to help Dragonbait rescue Alias and Akabar from The Abomination of Moander. In the initial skirmish, Akabar was rescued from The Abomination. However, in a spectacular battle over Westgate, Mist and The Abomination destroyed each other.

This may not be the end of Mist's existence in the Realms. The Cult of the Dragon has certainly learned of Mist's demise and it is possible they may attempt to revive her as a dracolich. The huge amount of damage Mist must have sustained in the battle with The Abomination of Moander will certainly make any resurrection difficult, if not impossible.

If Mist were to return, however, she would certainly wish to revenge herself on Alias and her companions. In fact, she would very likely hold a grudge against most adventurers, blaming them all for her misfortune.

Mist will also retain many of the foibles that made her unlike most red dragons. Whether as a dragon or a dracolich, Mist will undoubtedly retain her interest in music and story. If an adventurer can't divert the dragon with a song or tale, Mist will likely give them plenty of time to escape anyway. She always toys with her adversaries before dispatching them, a habit that cost her her life.

14th-Level Human Great Druid

Commonly remembered spells:

- First-level — Animal friendship, ceremony, speak with animals.
- Second-level — Barkskin, charm person, locate plants.
- Third-level — Call lightning, neutralize poison, protection from fire.
- Fourth-level — Animal summoning I, call woodland beings, plant door.
- Fifth-level — Commune with nature, insect plague, wall of fire.
- Sixth-level — Cure critical wounds, fire seeds, wall of thorns, weather summoning.

- Seventh-level — Animate rock, conjure earth elemental, control weather finger of death.

Like any druid of seventh level or higher in the Moonshaes, Genna can create a rune stick. The rune stick is a kind of magical wand that can be created by a druid of seventh level or higher who also has a Dexterity of 14 or better. The rune stick is a short piece of oak about 12" long, carved with a detailed pattern of runes, and then wrapped in mistletoe or holly. It normally can be used to store up to five spell levels of druidical spells. However, the great druid of the Moonshaes can put up to 20 levels of spells into a rune stick.

The stick takes 1d4 hours to create for every spell level put into it (roll separately for each spell). Upon completing the rune stick, the druid must cast the spells he or she wishes to store upon it. The rune stick crumbles to dust one month after creation. It cannot be recharged.

The spells stored in the rune stick are cast at the level of the druid who enchanted the rune stick. It can be used by any druid who knows the command word. It can also be used by any maiden of pure heart (use the unicorn test to determine this) who knows the command word. However, when used by a non-druid, the effects of the spells (radius, range, damage, etc.) are halved, and the victim receives a +4 modifier to his saving throw.

Physical description: Genna is a pleasantly rounded older woman. She has a plump, lined face, and a warm smile. Her hair is brown and worn short. As befits her position as representative of the Goddess, she is very motherly. She seems to be middle-aged, but she is older than she looks.

Generally, Genna wears the robes of her station as great druid of the Moonshaes.

Equipment: Genna usually has a torque of the goddess (see description of Robyn) and a druid staff. This staff is like Robyn's Staff of the White Well, but has the head of a bear carved into its top and can only be used to summon bears. It cannot be used to summon a fire storm or summon weather as the Staff of the White Well can.

If she knows she is going into a fight, Genna wears leather armor. Genna will also enchant some fire seeds and a rune stick as needed.

Personality: Since she took over the position of great druid of the Moonshaes, Genna has maintained a low profile, preferring to maintain Myrloch Vale and lead her fellow druids by example rather than autocratic command. Her humble attitude is shown by her favorite shape-changes. She would rather be a sparrow than an eagle, a shrew than a wolf, a lizard than a viper.

However, she is fiercely dedicated to the defense of the Goddess, and brooks no opposition.

Motivations: Genna always felt inferior to her sister, the highly charismatic Brianna Moonsinger. When Brianna was slain, the Circle of Druids was surprised to discover that Genna was the best qualified to succeed her sister, but no more surprised than Genna herself was.

She buried her resentment of Brianna to be the best great druid the Isles had ever seen, but under her dominion, the druids of other isles were slain or driven out, the Leviathan was slain, and the principal Moonwell defiled despite all the efforts of Genna and the remaining druids.

Thus, when Hobarth managed to insert the Heart of Kazgaroth into Genna as she sat defenseless in the statue form created by the Goddess in a last effort to protect her servants, the heart fed on Genna's resentment and frustration to turn her into a willing servant of Bhaal, dedicated to destroying what she had lived so long to preserve.

Background notes: Genna is the sister of the former great druid, Brianna Moonsinger (Robyn's mother). She gained her sister's rank when Brianna was slain trying to stop Kazgaroth from manifesting.

MINOR CHARACTERS

When Kazgaroth finally arrived, Genna organized the spiritual defense of Corwell against the monster, but she would have failed without Prince Tristan and Robyn to turn the tide with the Sword of Cymrych Hugh and Robyn's burgeoning druidic powers.

Recognizing that Robyn had potential to be the greatest druid the Isles had ever seen, Genna took her under her wing. But before she could finish the girl's training, Hobarth struck with his army of undead and managed to defeat the assembled druids.

After the fight at the Moonwell, in which the Goddess turned Genna and her fellow druids to stone to thwart Hobarth, he took the Heart of Kazgaroth and implanted it in her statue. This corrupted the great druid and turned her into an anti-druid, with all the powers of a druid but dedicated to the destruction of the Goddess and the ascendancy of Bhaal.

Sixth-Level Korobokuru Wu Jen

Commonly used spells: Animate wood, ghost light, secret signs, shield, animal companion, animate water, detect shape-changer, commune with lesser spirit, scry, shout, stone shape, and true sight.

"There must be a special kami in Celestial Heaven that watches over such things as the korobokuru. For if there wasn't, I am certain I would have killed Okotampe years ago!" — Prince Gisen

A korobokuru dwarf only distantly related to men, Okotampe is small (shorter than 4' tall), wiry, and thin. From his bowlegged stance, to his wild beard and hair liberally coated in bear fat, he is almost a throwback to a time before the Celestial Ones taught men to walk upright and use fire. He never bathes, wears filthy rags, spits, curses, yells, and is invariably rude.

If others stare at him and call him names, it doesn't matter to Okotampe; he has little use for humans anyway, considering them little more than barbarian invaders. His culture is a far older one, with its own mystical rhythms and ancient powers.

Okotampe is a shaman — a sorcerer of skill among his people. Through their totem animals and legends which were old before the first kings, the korobokuru people have access to the Spirit World itself. To them, the Bear Gods and Owl Women walk the earth in invisible form, invisible to lesser beings, and visible to the korobokuru only through their use of their magical symbols and nature signs.

Okotampe is the only one of the companions of Monkey who knows of Onoye's true spirit origin. Believing her to be a guide from the Owl Woman, he travels with her, hoping Onoye will lead him to a new totem spirit to replace his tribes' old one. Because he believes the willow woman to be from the gods, he is understandably overly protective of her. He tolerates the other members of Monkey's group as associates of his spirit guide with their own arcane purposes in the gods' plans.

Okotampe wears no armor and usually carries no weapons, preferring to use whatever comes to hand. He is extremely fond of clubs and other large, heavy objects. These he wields with a strength far greater than his appearance warrants. During the battle for the village of Tomobiki, he acquired a rusting iron tetsubo, which he now uses exclusively, when he uses a weapon at all.

Dungeon Master's information: Players are likely to encounter Okotampe in almost any locale, although he often returns to visit Monkey at his temple in Tomobiki. As an encounter, Okotampe is more likely to be an aggravation than an experience. He is likely to talk in riddles, refuse to divulge information, yell at the adventurers, insult anyone whom he meets, and generally make a nuisance of himself.

Okotampe has no fixed abode, preferring to live in the trees or in the nearest cave. His needs are few, and he will show little or no interest in treasure or possessions. In most cases, he will either ignore the adventurers or bore them to death with long, rambling stories about spirits, animals, and the korobokuru gods. The exception is if there are spirit people among the party members. These people he will treat with great deference and respect, taking time to talk to them while ignoring most of the other party members.

If there is perfection, then it is mirrored in a moving stream. And if there is perfection in woman, it is Onoye, for like a stream, she mirrors Heaven and yet has hidden, shifting depths below her peace.

The book of yan: A tiny woman of delicate grace and perfect bearing, Onoye is the embodiment of refined beauty. Her clear voice and simple, unpretentious manners belie a carefully sheltered upbringing, perhaps as the daughter of a great lord or even a dai-myō.

But Onoye is more than a mere ornament of a Shogonate castle. She has an innate understanding of the human soul, of the complexities of social relationships, of the inner meanings of conversation. Her passions run deep beneath her calm exterior; her endurance is astonishing, and her fury and savagery can explode without warning or source. At these times, she seems to be more than human, to be truly a force of nature.

Onoye's secret: This is not too far from the truth. For Onoye is actually a lesser nature spirit — an earthbound, minor deity more goddess than human. She has left her previous life to wander the earth in a mortal form, seeking fulfillment unattainable through any other path. Her fate is thus intertwined with Sanehiro/Monkey's, as he seeks to rise above his human weaknesses.

Willow and Monkey: The essential yin and yang of these two people is evident in their relationship to each other. Early in their travels, Sanehiro, rootless and seeking comfort, imagined that he was in love with the beautiful willow woman. Her gentle rebuff of his fumbling attentions caused Sanehiro to reconsider things, so that eventually he came to view her more as a daughter than a lover. However, as Sanehiro gained greater self-awareness, culminating in his rebirth as the shukenja Monkey, his courage and honesty touched something deeper within Onoye. This dimly realized feeling has blossomed into the fire of love — a love which can never be realized as Monkey is destined for greater things.

Onoye's kami powers are few but potent, and she is reluctant to reveal them, fearing that her secret might be divined. Without actually lying, she has constructed an elaborate background, implying some things, agreeing to other things, and letting those around her supply the missing parts from their own imaginations. Sometimes this doesn't work; those who know her often discover disturbing gaps in her knowledge. She knows the working of nature and the seasons, but is confounded by such everyday things as the ceremonies of the Way of Enlightenment or the names of famous personages. She is strangely uncurious about the material world; food, money, or shelter mean nothing to her. Yet she is fascinated by talk of spirits, magic, and the affairs of Heaven.

Onoye fears little — not even death itself. Her greatest fear is of being discovered. It is forbidden for those not in communion with the Spirit World to know her true nature; should she be found out, she would be compelled to return to her willow spirit shape in shame. This would take her away from her beloved shukenja and end her tenuous visit on earth.

Dungeon Masters information: Onoye will always be encountered in the company of Sanehiro/Monkey; in fact, she will never be more than a few yards from his side if possible. She will take a polite and gentle interest in the adventurers, although she will not show any great interest in their affairs unless they speak of magic and the Spirit World. Her conversation will then become more animated, showing a bright and sparkling personality beneath her passive demeanor.

Onoye's sorcery enables her to appear as a non-magical being; an ordinary woman to all who meet her. Only those with some connection to the Spirit World will be able to perceive her secret. Other spirit folk within a party will know almost automatically, but will be constrained by the laws of Heaven from revealing her identity. Shukenja and other enlightened souls may have an inkling.

Onoye wears no armor, and carries almost no weapons. Her only armament is the slender dagger all high-born women carry to defend themselves against dishonor. Her greatest powers come from her spirit ability to raise the force of nature against her foes. This ability, which may be used only once per week, covers a range of one mile, and has a duration of up to 1d10 rounds, acts as a combination of the following spells: Elemental burst, animate water, cloudburst, move earth, whirlwind and call (animals only). Onoye will only invoke this power if Sanehiro/Monkey is in severe danger — otherwise, she will not use her abilities, even to save her own life.

Physical description: Orgauth is a human male in early middle age. His dirty blond hair virtually masks his few gray hairs. He often wears the russet and scarlet colors of his livery; his arms are a russet raven striking, talons out, on a scarlet field. In combat he wears his plate armor and wields a bastard sword two-handed.

Equipment: Orgauth's armor is plate mail +2 and he usually wields a bastard sword +2, though he has a crossbow of distance with which he is equally proficient. He also has a ring of human influence and carries a set of eyes of the eagle in a pouch for using with the crossbow.

Personality: Orgauth seems to be a simple merchant-fighter, blunt in his ways and with just the bare cunning necessary to survive as a trader in an essentially evil city. Actually, Orgauth is a ruthless, subtle schemer.

Motivations: Orgauth is torn between his lust for control and his wish to maintain the trade relations that enrich him. Outwardly, he supports the Zhentarim (indeed, his goals and theirs often coincide), but he also supports activities that work against the Zhentarim, or betrays their more reckless or ill-founded projects.

He works to maintain the rule of Maalthiir in Hillsfar as a check against the expansionist policies of the Zhentarim. He believes that an empire centered on Zhentil Keep would overreach and weaken the city's military strength and earn it the enmity of those conquered, which would hurt his trade projects.

One of his major allies is Manxam the beholder.

Background notes: Orgauth started as the younger son of one of the nobles of Zhentil Keep. As a younger son, he devoted himself to warfare for 15 years, fighting many times in the armies of Zhentil Keep.

In the meantime, his father and older brother died, and Orgauth retired from the military to become one of the lords of Zhentil Keep. He earns much respect as a seasoned veteran of the Moonsea wars and is now a wealthy merchant in his own right.

He has built his ore-refining (mostly taking ore from a mine he discovered in a campaign against the orcs) and caravan-running concerns into much coinage, and he maintains, in the guise of a normal work force, a strong bodyguard of about 60 or 70 men-at-arms. This last shrewd measure undoubtedly has ensured his own survival in the noble hierarchy of Zhentil Keep throughout the rise of the Zhentarim. There have been several attempts on his life from rivals from among the Zhentarim, and all have failed, thanks to the watchfulness of his bodyguard.

Manshoon considers Orgauth one of his "loyal opposition," men who do not see the wisdom in Zhentil Keep's expansionism, but support him still as the best person to really run the city. Orgauth is also consulted by Lord Chess, and Orgauth frequently argues the Zhentarim cause to him. He works against the Zhentarim on a more subtle level.

Other notes: Orgauth's bodyguard consists of five fifth-level fighters (the sergeants who lead the others), nine fourth-level fighters, 12 third-level fighters, 20 second-level fighters, and 30 first-level fighters. His real work force consists of about 50 more zero-level fighters who are being trained in both warfare and surveillance.

All of these fighters are trained in riding, spear, short bow, and broad sword and shield. They are not actually an effective cavalry force, but they can stay on their horses long enough to get to a fight and get off to fight.

Because of Orgauth's opposition to the Zhentarim, he can be a source of adventure for characters who are interacting with the Zhentarim.

He can warn (through indirect comments or agents, never by his own direct statement) people that the Zhentarim do not always live up to the spirit of their contracts.

He can hire adventurers himself to guard his caravans or perform special missions for him, particularly in times of stress when he wants all of his own guard around him to protect him.

Conversely, he can become the villain you hate to hate. He has a certain courtesy and gentility that most of the Zhentarim lack. He is an evil man, but he does not want to spread his form of villainy all over the Inner Sea, as the Zhentarim do. He wants to be left alone to oppress his workers, buy and sell slaves, and manipulate the minerals markets for his own profit.

If commanded by the Zhentarim to kill the characters, he will certainly try to do so. His first priority is his own well-being. Still, if he thought that the characters might put a spoke in the wheel of the Zhentarim advance, he might look the other way and let them continue, rather than reveal them to Manshoon. After all, if Manshoon and Fzoul were destroyed, a man could get back to making a dishonest profit in peace again, and Zhentil Keep would be a much less stressful place to live.

He can be contacted through his offices in his citadel in the northeastern area of Zhentil Keep. He is generally in Zhentil Keep, though he occasionally accompanies his caravans elsewhere around the Moonsea.

If encountered with a caravan, he has one troop (25 men) of his bodyguard with him. The rest are minding the home front.

Physical description: Pawldo is a male halfling, brown-haired, an inch or two over 3' in height. He is over 60 years old, with graying hair, but his smiling face is cleanshaven and free of wrinkles.

Equipment: Pawldo's usual equipment is a short bow and a short sword. When he knows he is going into combat, he wears leather armor as he finds metal too constricting.

Personality: Pawldo is brave but mildly pessimistic. He is likely to comment on the hopelessness of a situation before going forth to prove himself wrong. This is a last vestige of his heritage as a halfling, a race which, in general, prefers building a warm fire in a hearth at home to burning out an orc village.

However, unlike his more staid kinfolk, Pawldo is an adventurer. He goes where prudent halflings do not follow. He has found a merchant's life fits this penchant of his for exploration and excitement full well. However, he is likely to add a dash of larceny to his recipe for successful merchantry, and is as likely to running a confidence game as he is to deal in honest merchandise.

Motivations: Pawldo has three main motivations. The most important is friendship. In his early 50s he struck up an acquaintance with Prince Tristan and Robyn, and this ripened into a friendship that could not be broken by the most dire circumstances. Pawldo's other two motivations are thrill seeking and greed. In many ways, these are two aspects of the same motivation, for he often attempts confidence games more for the thrill of succeeding in fooling people four times his size (by weight, anyway) than for the monetary reward.

Background notes: Pawldo is a merchant who was born and raised in Lowhill in Corwell, but who has sailed all over the Sword Coast.

He first made the acquaintance of Prince Tristan when he sold the prince some weapons he had gained on a merchanting trip. They talked of weapons and hunting, and became hunting companions. Robyn, Tristan's constant companion as a child, found that she also liked the little man, and willingly included him in on any plans they made for adventuring.

But every year Pawldo left to make a trading voyage among the Moonshaes and sometimes to the Sword Coast. One year, he decided to deal in dogs and arranged to find a hunting pack leader for his friend, the prince. On his travels he found the great moor hound Canthus and sold the dog to Prince Tristan. Since his travels for the year were done, he resumed his usual non-traveling place at Tristan's side and became enmeshed in the battle against Kazgaroth. He helped rescue Finellen and Keren the bard from the firbolgs, lent his archery skills against the Northmen invaders along the road to Caer Corwell, led the archers of his people in the defense of Caer Corwell, and accompanied his friends in the final battle against Kazgaroth — almost dying, except for the intervention of the Goddess when the monster was slain.

The next year, he was selling phony crystals in Alaron when he saw Prince Tristan and Daryth being arrested by High King Carrathal's Scarlet Guard, and acted to rescue them. From there, he spied on the high king and participated in the final battle against Cyndre, High King Carrathal, and their duergar and sahuagin allies.

Finally, Pawldo joined Tristan and Robyn in the final battle against Hobarth and Bhaal himself.

Other notes: Pawldo is an ideal introduction to the Moonshaes. His merchant adventures take him throughout the isles and to the Sword Coast, and his stories of the glories of the Moonshaes, and perhaps some hints of the possibilities of high adventure in the mountains of the Jotunheim, or against the troll-folk of Moray, could lure adventurers across the sea from the Sword Coast.

Moreover, Pawldo, while confident of his own abilities, is not unaware that the seas on which he travels can be full of dangers, and he has been known to employ adventurers as guards for his goods and person.

Pawldo is also inclined to get into trouble for a good cause. If a player character befriends him, then gets into trouble with the authorities or some powerful private citizen, Pawldo may well come to his rescue, preferably without having to directly assault any turnkeys.

Note that Pawldo is quick and sturdy, but not incredibly strong. He does not get involved in stand-up battles if he can help it — he'd much rather sit back and snipe with his bow and arrows.

Piergeiron, "The Paladinson," is a tall and muscular, strikingly handsome man with a firm jaw and dark eyes. His hair, curly and brown, is flecked with grey at the temples, but this only adds to the regal aura of the noble man.

Of the reputed 16 Lords of Waterdeep, Piergeiron is the only one openly known and recognized, and as such, he speaks for the others in matters concerning the city. He is the commander of the watch, warden of the guard, and overmaster of the guilds. His word is law in the City of Splendors, even above the guild law, and thus he is in a position to make many enemies.

Even if a foe was to catch the young lord on one of the many instances that he is alone, he would find himself faced by an opponent quite able to take care of himself. Dressed in his full plate mail armor and his shining shield +1, emblazoned with golden scales atop the head of a war hammer, the symbol of Tyr the even-handed, the Paladinson fears no battle and has yet to be bested.

He wields Clamorour, a holy avenger, the sword of his father, and though he prefers diplomacy to battle, he fights with the knowledge that he is blessed by his god.

"Yet, within Waterdeep, Piergeiron has little to fear. He handles his position and authority with such caring and dedication to his responsibility that the Waterdhavians, even those with personal grudges against him know that they could not find a better man for the position. The only ones who would want to bring harm to this Lord are those against the city itself.

“... and his decree is the only absolute law in this city of interpretation and subtle evasion. As such, he is very safe from Waterdhavians — and his life is threatened by foreign powers, such as Amn, Calimshan, and Luskan, for the same reason; he is so above reproach, and so able in his administration and justice, that the city flourishes.”

— from Waterdeep and the North by Ed Greenwood

Piergeiron weighs his every word before he speaks it, and often, understanding the tact of silence, keeps his thoughts to himself. When he does speak, he enunciates every word slowly and deliberately, wanting those around him to fully grasp the exact meaning and connotations of what he has to say.

Because of this cautious manner of speaking, some snicker his other nickname, “The Thickskull,” behind his back. But they are unperceptive, or are the ones who should rightly wear the insulting mantle themselves. Far from stupid, Piergeiron never forgets the weight of his position and understands the many potential implications of his every word.

He has heard the degrading nickname, and he has even laughed about it, not confusing the pride and execution of his office and his code with the destructive pride of self. And Piergeiron is smart enough to use this misperception of his mental prowess to his advantage. If his political enemies underestimate him, he correctly reasons, they will often slip up in their dealings with him, not expecting him to pick up on the subtleties of the conversation.

Piergeiron was born with large shoes to fill. He was the son of Athar, “The Shining Knight,” an adventuring paladin who captured the imagination of the whole Northland with his daring and heroic accomplishments. Also called “The Arm of Tyr,” Athar roamed throughout the North, vanquishing evil and rescuing whole towns from persecuting and unjust governments. The very name of Athar still brings a smile and a look of true love and admiration to the faces of elders all across the land.

It is said that Athar was once a Lord of Waterdeep, but this has never been proven. His son, though, seemed destined for the position from very early in his life. Piergeiron, less a wanderer than his father, always believed that the true fostering of the word of Tyr could be better achieved through a strong central location, and thus, as soon as he had earned respect through deeds of valor and conscience, he moved right into the position offered him, becoming the only visible Lord of the city.

Even his greatest skeptics soon came to understand the young man’s value and were silenced. In all the years Piergeiron has ruled the city, he has rarely angered even the most selfish of guilds, and has become so well-loved by the general populace that nobody, or no guild, would dare to strike against him in any case, fearing the inevitable, and brutal, reprisals that would surely befall them.

Roleplaying tips: Piergeiron is a gentle man who seems to walk secure in the truth and righteousness of his chosen course. Never will adventurers meet a man so comfortable in his way of life and in his every action. He is pleasant and warm, though he doesn’t speak much, and has a heart and manner that give new heights to the meaning of generosity.

He is comfortable in battle as well, knowing that Tyr supports his every move. He swings Clamorour easily and ably, and accepts the possibility of his own death without fear.

Though Waterdeep bears little semblance to Camelot, Piergeiron just might be the Forgotten Realms’ version of King Arthur. He believes in justice, even for the poor, and executes it with his every move and every word. “Might for right” would be an apt motto.

Certainly his father would be proud of him, and no longer does he walk in Athar’s shadow. Even Athar’s most devoted admirers admit that his son excels in ways the elder did not, ways that might prove more important to the future of the Northland in general.

For Piergeiron is just the type of leader who will transform the savage Northland into a united realm of peace.

Zrie Prakis’ appearance is enough to strike fear into anyone’s heart. The 18th-level lich is covered with age-worn, rotting, translucent flesh, pulled tight over its skeleton. Its black, gaping eye sockets contain pinpoints of sharp, red light. The undead sorcerer’s laugh is hollow and deep. And like all liches, Zrie Prakis’ touch causes 1d10 points of freezing damage and paralyzes those who fail to make their saving throws. The staff of power he carries is equally deadly.

The story of Zrie Prakis’ death at the hands of his lover Cassana is quite well known in the Realms, and is even the subject of a popular opera performed frequently in The Living City. The opera makes the tale out to be a tragedy, though it is more commonly told as a horror story. Zrie Prakis is seen as a kind of bogeyman throughout the Realms, and parents often invoke his name to keep young children in line.

Zrie Prakis met the sorceress Cassana many years ago while they were both apprentices, just beginning their studies of the magical arts. They fell in love, pledged their eternal faithfulness, then were forced to part.

During the years of their separation, both Zrie Prakis and Cassana grew very powerful. The mage also grew obsessively proud of himself and what he considered his unique powers. Zrie Prakis adopted for his sigil three interlocking rings, a common enough symbol in the Realms, but decided that it should be his symbol alone. He destroyed an ale house in Sembia simply because the innkeep happened to choose three interlocking rings to grace his sign.

It is not surprising then, that when Zrie Prakis met Cassana again, he tried to prove himself the greater mage. He was not, and Cassana killed him in proving it. Cassana gathered Zrie Prakis' remains and kept them in a glass sarcophagus next to her bed. Eventually, she resurrected him as a lich.

Zrie Prakis' existence was linked to Cassana's wand, and the sorceress used it to control her undead lover. The closer Zrie Prakis remained to the wand, the greater his power. And though the wand kept Zrie Prakis from acting directly against Cassana, he plotted against her from the day she brought him back from the dead.

The lich was destroyed again in the battle that finally brought down Cassana. When the sorceress's wand was cast into a parallel dimension, the source of Zrie Prakis' existence was cut and he tumbled to dust. Liches are not so easily destroyed, however, and the Realms may hear from Zrie Prakis again.

Zrie Prakis was a vengeful creature, capable of great evil. He served Cassana well, though he constantly sought ways to be free of her control. The lich often contacted other planes and summoned horrible creatures to serve the sorceress. Those who seek to conquer Zrie Prakis or his allies will certainly encounter creatures such as the crystal elemental he brought to this plane to capture Alias.

In his first incarnation as a lich, however, Zrie Prakis was a servant of Cassana, and thus completely subject to her will. In fact, he was only one of a number of creatures that served the dark sorceress. If encountered as a servant of Cassana, he will likely be only part of a larger force of monsters — like the kalmari.

The kalmari in its natural state is an amorphous being of a mistlike consistency with a 3' long, tapering tail. The most striking thing about the kalmari is its jaws, which seem to stretch almost all the way around its body. Set below the kalmari's two unblinking yellow eyes, the mouth is filled with huge pointed teeth. However, adventurers are likely to first encounter the kalmari while it is possessing a host from this plane.

To be called to this plane, a kalmari must possess a body made of materials from this plane. It prefers to possess a living host, which it then devours from the inside, but will also be contained by a non-living shell created to give it full use of its terrible jaws.

The body being possessed retains its natural armor class, but will only take 10 points of damage before it splits and falls apart. After the host is destroyed, the kalmari will emerge, making a noise like a thousand hissing snakes. The kalmari can only stay on this plane without a host or magical shell for 10 minutes. After that time, it is sent hurtling back to Acheron.

The kalmari's jaws inflict 1d10 points of damage and its tail only 1d6. However, the kalmari can entangle a victim with its tail when it hits with a natural 20. Only when the tail is severed, by doing 10 points of damage specifically to it, is the victim free. Otherwise the adventurer is helpless.

It is the mouth of the kalmari that is most feared, however. Though the kalmari's bite is not deadly, the monster can swallow a creature whole on any hit over 20% (4 or more over the required number to hit) or on a natural 20. The creatures will be digested in a number of rounds equal to its level or number of hit dice. After that time, the creature cannot be resurrected. The kalmari will not attempt to swallow anything else until the creature is dead.

The kalmari's one weakness is that it cannot digest magic. It will vomit up any magic item swallowed with a creature immediately upon the death of the creature possessing it. The kalmari can be slain with any magical weapon which it has eaten once and rejected. These weapons have an added +2 to hit the kalmari, and also gain +2 to the damage bonus they normally possess, but only against that kalmari. Note, too, that a kalmari can only be slain with a weapon it once ate and weapons eaten and rejected by other kalmari are treated as normal magic weapons.

Created by the Cult of the Dragon, Rauglothgar was the second most powerful dracolich in the Realms, behind only the blue, huge great wyrm Shargrailar. He was a dracolich so long, that the preserved flesh and hide finally just wore out and fell apart, much like a man's favorite pair of shoes. He is now a huge skeletal form with glowing red lights floating in his eye sockets.

Rauglothgar was already old by the time man came to the Thunder Peaks. In his youth, he had flown and fought against many of his kind, completely clearing the air space above the Thunder Peaks of other dragonkind. His hoard was the largest ever assembled by a dragon.

He watched as men began to carve empires from the Inner Sea lands. He watched them battle the kobolds, orcs, and bugbears for passage through his mountains. He grew afraid, for man brought magic, magic even more powerful than he could wield. Magic powerful enough to slay Rauglothgar.

As men populated the Inner Sea lands, Rauglothgar flew less often, and other dragonkind began to return to the Thunder Peaks. When the cult approached him with their offer of eternal life, eternal strength, and immunity to many powerful magics, he readily agreed. It helped that they offered to increase his already staggering hoard.

He was one of the first dragons to undergo the complicated and lengthy ritual to become a dracolich. As the years passed, his hoard grew, and Rauglothgar began to become bored. Eternal life was an insidious curse, soon becoming eternal boredom. With the cult at his beck and call, and his lich status, no one could stand against him.

Then came a slip of girl, brought to him by the cult arch-mage The Shadow-sil, whose virgin blood he would use to maintain his lichdom. A puny female who was no threat to his lowest servant let alone the great Rauglothgar the Proud. But this nothing of a human could wield spellfire! The very touch of it broke down the magic holding his life force to his body. His mightiest magics and burning breath could not touch her, in fact they merely fed her power.

Rauglothgar died at the hands of Shandril Shessair, wielder of spellfire, in the caverns under the Tower Tranquil, his lair in the Thunder Peaks. Present at the time were the sage and arch-mage Elminster, and several adventurers of no consequence to him, the Knights of Myth Drannor. They plundered his hoard, leaving only the lesser coins and gems, and none of the magic items.

Powers of a dracolich: A dracolich has all the normal dragon powers it had in life, including spell casting ability, Physical attacks and breath weapons are as usual, and spells are cast as if by a magic-user of level equal to the dragon's hit dice. Therefore, Rauglothgar casts spells as if he were an 11th-level mage. They can detect hidden and invisible creatures within 1" per age level (8" for Rauglothgar), and cause fear in creatures under six hit dice.

Its new powers are largely immunities. Like human lichs, a dracolich is immune to charm, sleep, enfeeblement, polymorph, cold (of any sort), electricity, insanity and death spells or symbols. It can not be controlled by any item of dragon control, and it cannot be turned by a cleric regardless of level. In addition, the dracolich is immune to poison, paralysis, or being magically held.

Attacks by elemental means no longer get special bonuses due to its undead status. Once it wins a single battle as a lich, the dracolich is immune to fear of all sorts, including magical and psionic. As would be expected of any undead creature, it has no need to eat, except to fuel its breath weapon, and no longer sleeps.

All physical attacks made by the dracolich add 2d8 points of chilling damage, similar to human lichs. A save vs. paralysis is required, or the victim is paralyzed for 2d6 rounds by the touch. Once every three days the dracolich can attempt to control undead (as the potion) creatures within 6".

To meet the gaze of a dracolich (within 4" of it) can be dangerous. Creatures under six hit dice are paralyzed instantly, while the dracolich holds that gaze. All others must save at +3. Once a save is made, that particular dracolich can no longer paralyze that creature by gaze.

The cult plays an active role in the activities of all known dracoliches. They provide them with treasure and teach them the most powerful spells they can learn. A large and powerful party is always near the dracolich, frequently worshiping within sight of it.

When a dracolich dies, its life force flees to a prepared corpse of a dragonkin creature, in the case of Rauglothgar, a fire drake. If this animated corpse can consume 10% of the remaining flesh of the dracolich within one phase of the moon, it will slowly metamorphose into a body exactly like original dracolich. No one knows if this has happened with Rauglothgar, but it is sure that the Cult of the Dragon will do all it can to see that it does. If so, he will lose 1d8 hit points permanently to grow his new body, just like all dracoliches. His new body will be fully fleshed for decades to come, if it survives that long.

Regis the halfling, or "Rumblebelly," as Bruenor calls him, is the most diminutive member of the Companions of the Hall. Barely 3' high (with the fluff of his curly brown locks) and with a belly too round and legs too short for the road, Regis may appear to be more of a hindrance than an asset to his fellow companions.

But Bruenor, Drizzt, and Wulfgar know better than to estimate the halfling's worth in physical stature alone. Witty, crafty, and blessed with more than his share of good luck, Regis always seems to land on his feet, in the right place, and at the right time. He wears leather armor and fights, when he absolutely has no other choice, with a little +2 mace that Bruenor made for him.

Regis has carried the weapon for several years, but it certainly isn't worn from use. He abhors violence, especially when it is directed at him, and if his words can't get him out of a fight, his little legs have been known to outrun a thrown spear. Many times, Regis has avoided battle by using his ruby pendant, a magical charm that casts a form of hypnosis over anyone viewing it, opening them up to suggestions (as the third-level magic-user spell) of the halfling. The ruby's magic is quite powerful and all saves against its hypnotic web are made at -2 (-4 if Regis is using the gemstone along with his charisma and his disarming smile).

Of course, Regis is not above using the ruby to get other things that he might desire. He is a master of comfort, perfecting the fine arts of eating and sleeping. If he can charm someone into inviting him over for dinner, or into offering him some small trinket that they probably don't really want anyway, then what is the harm?

Yet not everyone adheres to this philosophy, and Regis runs from a dark past indeed.

He was born in or around the southern city of Calimport; exactly where or when, he does not know, nor does he have any idea of who his parents were. His earliest recollections are of a childhood spent alone on the street, begging and stealing, and then being adopted by some kind-hearted "ladies" of one of Calimport's numerous brothels. He lived in the house for several years, learning the ways and wiles of the world, until the ladies introduced him to one of their most prominent clients, Pasha Pook, master of a powerful thieves guild.

Regis intrigued Pook. With his innocent looks, diminutive size, and nimble fingers, the halfling showed great potential for the trade. Regis did not disappoint. His eyes at a person's belt level, he could slip through the packed crowd at Calimport's renowned open market, picking the fattest purses, and his ability to pull off a confidence scam was unsurpassed by any in the guild. He rose up fast through the ranks, becoming a burglar in only a few short years.

But except for those at the very top echelons of power, life in a thieves' guild is hard work. And Regis, too in love with comfort, soon ran out of patience for his climb to the top. He wanted a shortcut.

The opportunity came unexpectedly a few years later. Regis discovered that Pook employed a magical ruby in his dealings, a charm that lent him an advantage over his adversaries and influence over his allies. Regis promptly relieved his guild master of the ruby and took out for the road, envisioning a life of comfort as a guild master in some other city.

But Pook proved more determined than Regis had anticipated, and wherever the halfling went, Pook's men soon appeared. Finally, after years on the run, Regis made his way to Ten-Towns, believing this remote frontier settlement to be beyond the long arms of Pook. He made many friends there, particularly his fellow Companions of the Hall and Catti-brie, earned a fine living as a scrimshander (especially after he learned just how effective the hypnotizing gem could be), and was even once elected a spokesman for one of the towns. And after the great victory over Akar Kessell's goblinoid army, Regis somehow came out as the hero and was awarded, again with a little help from the ruby, the finest palace in all Icewind Dale and uncoupled gifts of food and fine clothing. He had found his true calling, by his estimation, and thought that he would live out the rest of his life in comfort and luxury.

But it all came crashing down around him in the spring after the battle, when Artemis Entreri, Pook's prime assassin, arrived in Bryn Shander. Preferring life on the road beside his formidable friends to death in a palace, no matter how fine, Regis took Bruenor up on an earlier offer and rushed out onto the open tundra to join the Companions of the Hall as they began their quest for Mithril Hall.

Roleplaying tips: Regis is good-natured, good-humored, and not malicious in the least. Last in battle, and proud of it, he strikes only when he has run out of other options, or in defense of a friend (and hopefully from behind).

He does his share of mischief, though (more than his share), but never sets out to hurt anybody. And a good portion of Regis' extraordinary luck lies in his ability to temper his actions with good sense. He rarely outright steals anything, preferring subtle cons, and tries hard not to do anything that will set someone after him further down the road. He uses his ruby with similar caution.

But Regis is weak in the face of temptation, and if someone, even a friend, possesses something that he truly desires, and if the opportunity presents itself in the right way . . .

Reading/writing, alertness, running.

Adventurers familiar with bards and the limitations barding colleges put on the induction of halflings will realize instantly upon meeting the famous Olive Ruskettle that she cannot possibly be a true bard.

In fact, Olive not only isn't a true bard, she has never had formal bardic training, and the renown attached to her name has been slightly misplaced, though Olive has done all she can to foster the confusion.

The halfling who claims to be Olive Ruskettle is really a thief who has always aspired to a life of entertaining people and the easy living that profession can bring. Her name is not even Olive Ruskettle; the halfling won the name and the reputation of Olav Ruskettle, a true and famous bard, in a dice game. Since that time, "Olive" has done her best to maintain her image as a bard of great talent.

Olive's glib tongue, boisterous personality, and fair talent for singing and playing have carried her far. Though she has been cornered many times by well-traveled folk who claim to have seen the "real" Olav Ruskettle perform, Olive always manages to lie her way out of the confrontation, often claiming that the person who claimed to be Olav Ruskettle was someone who was trying to steal her name and pass himself off as a bard.

Though she claims to be from the Cormyr, no one has ever been able to pin down Olive's true home. The hazel-eyed, red-haired halfling prefers it that way, too. Though she is charismatic and attractive, she realizes her past as a thief could cause her a number of problems if it were discovered.

But this does not mean Olive has forsaken her thieving abilities or retired as a practitioner of the thieving arts. In fact, Olive has found the ability to pick pockets with finesse and open locks with ease quite a benefit to her life as a performer. Patrons who refuse to pay her what she feels she deserves for her singing often end up missing their purses when Olive leaves.

Olive is only 3' tall, which is short even for a halfling. Because of this, and the taller races' general reaction to halflings as a cute — though somewhat prone to pilfering — race of beings, Olive tends to react strongly against anyone who treats her as less than an equal. For example, people who might pat Olive on the head or pick her up, would find themselves barraged by caustic insults and perhaps even fists and feet.

The halfling also hates those who rigidly follow the tenets of a specific alignment, and especially loathes paladins. Olive is insecure about her past as a thief and really doesn't consider herself a common pickpocket. She believes she is only taking what is her due, and often that is the case. Those who see the world through the blinders of a rigorous devotion to either Law or Chaos, Good or Evil, often fail to see the validity of Olive's perspective.

In fact, Olive finds she is quite often mistaken for a villain when she is simply taking care of herself the best way she knows how. Such was certainly the case when she was convinced by the evil pseudo-halfling Phalse to help him track the swordswoman Alias. Though Alias had rescued Olive from the dragon Mist, who had kidnapped her, Olive had seen Alias attack someone for no particular reason, and had heard about her attack on a cleric. The swordswoman seemed, as Phalse pointed out, a very dangerous woman. While this was certainly a substantial incentive to aid in her capture, Phalse also offered Olive a great deal of money.

When Olive discovered she had allied herself with the wrong party, that Alias was not a menace and her creators were extremely evil and dangerous, Olive helped rescue Akabar Bel Akash from Cassana's dungeon, and then helped foil the sorceress's plans to gain complete control of Alias.

Olive's adventures with Alias gained her a myriad of new songs to sing, and Olive is even planning on composing a long work telling the adventures of Alias and her companions. The piece, entitled "The Magic Arm Chronicles," may take the form of a book or a lay. Olive has yet to start it.

In addition to a number of wonderful songs and a wealth of material for new tales, Olive gained another very special gift from her adventures with Alias. Because the halfling helped to rescue the Nameless Bard from Cassana's dungeon, the true bard, a Harper, gave Olive his small, silver harp and crescent moon pin, the symbol of the Harpers. The Nameless Bard was once banished to the awesome Citadel of White Exile for attempting to create a being to keep his songs alive forever. It is unknown if the Harpers will punish him even more severely when they learn of this act — one that could certainly cause more annoyance for the Harpers and the Realms than any of the Nameless Bard's earlier mistakes.

Dungeon Masters running Olive should emphasize her desire to become a true bard and, at the same time, the chaotic side of her character that prevents her from doing so. Players will find Olive interested in any stories or songs they can relate to her, though she will often get bored if the telling is long or the tale too philosophical.

In return for any stories told to her, or food and drink sent her way, Olive will regale the adventurers with the story of Alias' quest to discover the meaning of her azure bonds. Of course, the halfling will emphasize, and even expand, her part in the adventure.

Olive loves strong drink and has a very strong constitution. For a person of such small stature and slight build, Olive eats and drinks quite heavily. Player characters attempting to match her will likely find themselves far out-classed.

When the tales are over and the food and drink gone, Olive will depart, paying as little as possible of the bill.

Physical description: Nymara Scheiron is a brunette, tousle-haired and lush-figured female of middle years.

Nymara can appear as a stunningly beautiful lady of high station if she wishes to do so (very rare), but is more often found heavily made up and perfumed, dressed revealingly and lounging in an alley or bar at the docks. She dons less distinctive garb to follow people in the streets without being noticed.

Equipment: Kitten always carries her dagger +2 and, if she anticipates combat or other physical danger, puts on her leather armor +1. Otherwise, she depends on her wiles, her dexterity, and her ring of invisibility

Personality: Kitten is fierce, with an occasionally savage temper. She is a hard-bitten entertainer and sometime thief of Waterdeep's docks, who is servile to no one. She regards Mirt, Durnan, Larissa, and Khelben as her dear friends and delights in relaxing with them when she is not on the streets or poking about in the goods of this or that suspicious visitor to the city. She distrusts such paragons as Piergeiron, Texter, and Caladorn (though she has found that Caladorn can enjoy a bit of slumming, if the conditions are sufficiently controlled that he doesn't come too close to the real world).

Motivations: Kitten is a practical person, and this outlook influences the details of many an action by the Lords. She knows how this or that decree will appear to, or work among, the common folk.

Kitten will not take a copper piece from her fellow Lords, fiercely rejecting any gifts or charity. Deep inside, she feels the ability to influence the work of the Lords is its own reward, though she prizes her reputation for toughness too much to ever say such a thing to her friends.

Background notes: Few people, even among the Lords of Waterdeep, know Kitten's full name. They just know her as "Kitten the Entertainer," and leave it at that. No one but her fellow Lord, Larissa Neathal, knows that she spent most of her younger years as an adventurer. Even Larissa does not know that she is actually the daughter of a noble house of Silvermoon, and ran away from an arranged marriage to become an adventurer.

After many adventures, including a year as a Zhentarim slave until she killed her master and escaped, Kitten found herself fighting an evil demigod ("The Godson," son of Bane) toe-to-toe with blades when a summoning by a company of adventurers went awry. After that experience, she decided that a thief and entertainer's life in Waterdeep was preferable to taking on the likes of demigods. However, the Godson remembers Kitten, and may yet have occasion to pay her another visit.

Over 10 years ago, after Kitten had been back in Waterdeep for three years, she was recognized by Mirt and recruited by Mirt and Khelben to the ranks of the Lords of Waterdeep.

Kitten was never a member of the thieves guild. As a practical matter, she was happy when the Lords drove the thieves out. It made her life a lot easier.

Other notes: Kitten is familiar with the sewers of Waterdeep and the roofs in many districts, using them as highways that are faster and less crowded than the streets.

Kitten is an NPC that characters wandering the seamier side of Waterdeep could encounter any time. As an entertainer, she has lost the bloom of youth, but is well-experienced. Characters might also find her acting uncommonly nosy about the doings of passers-by or what is in their parcels. The passers-by would not notice, of course, but sharp-eye player characters would.

Alternately, if characters are being secretive about their doings, they might find Kitten nosing around their possessions and accommodations. An attempt to run off a nosy thief could suddenly land the characters in much trouble with the Lords. And, of course, if everything is settled amicably and the Lords are satisfied that there is nothing untoward in the characters' actions (as long as they haven't killed or maimed Kitten), then perhaps they will have impressed the Lords enough to make the Lords want to use them in some mission of interest to Waterdeep and the world.

Another hook to bring the characters into contact with the Lords would be for them to rescue Kitten from an over-aggressive would-be customer. Of course, she could have handled the situation herself, but she would appreciate the assistance, particularly if the rescuers are good-looking young men. Again, this puts the characters into contact with the Lords without realizing it, and gives at least one Lord a reason to keep an eye on them and possibly recruit them for future problem-solving.

And of course, for player characters with a taste for fighting demigods, there is the menace of The Godson (see FR6, DREAMS OF THE RED WIZARDS for statistics), who wanders the Realms on his father's business (and surreptitiously supports the Zhentarim to thwart his demanding father) and may find the chance to come to Waterdeep and look up old friends.

- Third-level — Cure disease, neutralize poison.

Physical description: Storm is a tall, striking, well-muscled human female. She has hair of silvery hue and blue-gray eyes. She wears a silver ring and a tiara, and a silver bracer on her right wrist bearing her badge, a silver moon and a silver harp on a black field.

Equipment: Storm bears a luck blade +1, which has one wish left. Her silver ring is a ring of protection +2 and she wears a set of elfin chain mail +2 under her normal flowing robes. The tiara acts as a ring of fire resistance in all ways, including precluding the wearing of another magical ring. The bracer is just an item of jewelry that protects her arm when shooting a bow.

Storm also has a sling +1 and 12 bullets +2. She has recently acquired a Methild's harp (see FR4, THE MAGISTER) and is now learning how to use it.

Personality: Storm has always been adventurous and a lover of risks. She is quick with a laugh and a song, and has little of the grimness that marked her sister Sylune and still marks Alustriel of Silvermoon and The Simbul.

Motivations: Initially, Storm was motivated by a lust for adventure and gain. Later, she began to realize that the Realms needed a force to balance the evil of the Zhentarim and Red Wizards, and helped her sister Sylune found the Harpers. Now she works in her own way for the preservation of the Realms from those who would ravage them for their own gain.

Background notes: Of the famous five sisters (the others are the ranger Dove, Alustriel of Silvermoon, The Simbul, and the now-deceased witch Sylune), Storm is the youngest and most spoiled. Like all of the sisters, she was encouraged to follow the path that attracted her, and that was the path of the rogue, or thief. For several years she built up her proficiency in the roguish arts until she met Maxan, a fighter of Lawful Good tendencies who tried to persuade her that she would be a better fighter than thief. She denied his blandishments until they were involved in a battle in which all of her thiefly skills were of no use, but her natural strength of arm (she is the strongest of the sisters) slew the foe.

She adopted the class of fighter and soon proved her natural talent for the fighting life. Then she met the druid Briadorn of the Circle of Shadowdale, and it changed her life, as he praised her voice and suggested that she pursue the life of a bard.

Normally, she would not have been accepted as a bard because she had pursued her two vocations of thief and fighter in the wrong order, but her talent and motivation were so obvious that the druids allowed her into their circle as a bard. Since that time, her voice has been raised in song in the cause of good all over the Inner Sea.

Long a resident of Shadowdale, she used her home as a base for long, far-traveling, adventures for her own gain (particularly when she was young and learning the arts of a thief) and to further the ends of the Harpers. Storm is sometimes referred to as "The Harper of Shadowdale."

Storm's longtime companion, Maxan, was recently destroyed by demons in the same adventure in which she acquired the Methild's harp, and Storm has turned away from the bold and wild adventures she enjoyed with him.

She still acts as an adviser to Doust of Shadowdale and stands ready to protect her village from invaders.

Other notes: Storm Silverhand is a fund of information for the adventurer operating from the Dales. While she has little inclination to adventure herself, she is still ready to assist the Harpers in any way she can, which includes training promising young bards.

Moreover, as a bard, she is a fund of legend lore information about magic items found by adventurers, and she will do what she can for those she feels fit the goals of her organization.

Since she is somewhat sedentary these days, Storm and her friends in Shadowdale, such as Elminster, have become something of a central clearinghouse for Harper information.

Also, while Storm's sense of adventure was quelled with the death of her longtime companion, the spark is still there, particularly because she now has an instrument that could be very useful in adventuring. She does not admit it to herself, but she is looking for a small band that could use her assistance.

The Simbul has also placed detect magic and protection from evil on herself with a permanency spell, and used a wish to give herself permanent use of Serten's spell immunity.

Physical description: The Simbul is a tall, silver-haired human lady with the striking good looks shared by her sisters. In court (which is rare), she wears purple and blue gowns with silver trim. When wandering, she wears gray exclusively. No one has noticed a change in her appearance since she took the throne of Aglarond, 38 years ago.

Equipment: The Simbul prefers to use her own magics and talents to using magic items, but she does carry an impressive array of magic items which she rarely uses.

In particular, The Simbul usually wears a set of bracelets which are bracers of defense AC1 and a ring of spell storing and a ring of shooting stars. She has a staff of power which she used in earlier days, but it is largely depleted and usually resides in a (well guarded) place of honor in her apartments in Aglarond.

She also has a selection of wands, including several of the rare wands described in FR4, THE MAGISTER, and several other rings of magic. When she is in Aglarond, she will inscribe scrolls for her assistants.

Personality: She can be ruthless if necessary, but usually avoids combat if possible. She prefers the subtle use of magic to the blatant, but if cornered, will unleash her full arsenal.

Motivations: The Simbul's principal motivation is to preserve her small country of Aglarond against the might of Thay and the machinations of other surrounding realms. She also seeks to work mysterious ends understandable only to herself.

These mysterious ends take her on long expeditions, usually shape changed, to nations all around the Inner Sea – forming alliances and providing examples to those who might menace herself or her nation.

Background notes: When King Halacar of Aglarond died in the Battle of Lapendrar (1260) and his sister, the sorceress Ilione, took the throne, The Simbul was a young woman, just starting out in her career as a magic-user.

However, Ilione had heard of her through The Simbul's sister, Sylune, and invited the young mage to join her as her apprentice and heir. The Simbul arrived shortly after receiving the invitation and immediately began learning all the knowledgeable Ilione could impart and gaining the confidence of the half-elves of her adopted country.

Ilione died during the Great Plague of The Inner Sea in 1320. The Simbul ascended to the throne, already mighty in magic, and is still the ruler of Aglarond. Her awesome magical powers have kept the forces of Thay from overwhelming her kingdom. She is a mysterious, lonely arch-mage whose proper name is known only to her sisters (Sylune of Shadowdale, now deceased; Alustriel of Silvermoon; the bard Storm Silverhand; and the ranger Dove), and whose true name is secret even from them. The Simbul travels widely in many planes, shape shifting constantly.

Other notes: Besides being an awesome opponent to any character coming from Thay, The Simbul is an excellent NPC for instigating player character activity in Thay. She is continually looking for information about Thay and agents to satisfy her needs for action in Thay. At this time, she is making a circuit of the Eastern Realms, looking for information and assistance. She can find the player characters and ask them to assist her. In the Realms, if The Simbul asks, you fulfill her needs. She's a good friend, and a deadly enemy.

Encountering the Simbul can happen at any time. While she prefers to wear grey, she can be garbed in anything, and uses her many contacts throughout the Realms, even in Zhentil Keep, to produce an identity in keeping with the land through which she is wandering.

Too, The Simbul is as apt to appear as a gray cat, or wolf, or dark-plumaged eagle or hawk. If the characters are acting surreptitiously in enemy territory, they may find a spider growing into a statuesque woman who wants to enlist their aid or assist them, if they are meeting her ends.

And her ends are as mysterious as rumored. In other words, the DM can make them whatever he pleases to fulfill the needs of his campaign. However, remember that they should be many-layered and convoluted, and she will never say what her real goals are.

Not an overly attractive woman, the young mage Sydney devotes all of her energies to her obsession with power. She is heavyset and a bit too square-shouldered, her dress frumpy, and her hair unkempt, and she generally presents an indifferent, even antagonistic attitude to any advances on a social level. But though she is not the most likable person around, no one can deny the sharpness of her mind.

Certainly Dendybar, one of the most powerful wizards in all of Luskan, understands the potential in the woman. He took Sydney under his tutelage after only one encounter with her, moreso to prevent one of the other wizards from snatching her up than to fill any need he might have had for a protegee. Perhaps the best indicator of just how powerful Sydney might someday become is the measure of care and caution with which Dendybar is bringing her along. He has taught her mostly defensive spells and no destructive evocations at all — her most powerful offensive spell is web. Sydney is his connection to the outside world, and is most effective in a manipulative role. Her spellbook, therefore is filled with spells such as charm person, and defensive spells such as wizard lock, shield, and protection from normal missiles.

Perhaps to make up for the limited offensive power he has granted her, Dendybar has bestowed great gifts upon his prize student, and Sydney, though she prefers to exercise her own magical prowess, is quick to grab at her wand of lightning bolts (83 charges) in a tight situation. Also, she keeps a mirror of mental prowess in her small room at the Hosttower of the Arcane. Her spellbook holds numerous spells for a mage of her level, and Sydney typically leaves the Hosttower after memorizing:

- First-level — Charm person, comprehend languages, shield x 2.
- Second-level — Web, wizard lock.
- Third-level — Protection from normal missiles, haste.

The “chicken-or-the-egg” dilemma applies wholeheartedly to Sydney. It is difficult to determine if her lack of physical attractiveness contributed to her burning desire for the magical arts, or if her obsession with power stunted her social growth. Certainly she is rather plain-looking, but what Sydney truly lacks is an inner glow of beauty.

Ironically, the absence of those social wiles hinders Sydney in her quest for power. Dendybar gave her the mirror of mental prowess, and the first spell he ever taught her was charm person, because he understands the special advantage a female mage in the Northland enjoys. Wizards like wizards; ordinary folk don't trust them or understand them, and men outnumber women 10-to-1 in the magic-user circles of the North. Sydney has many would-be suitors despite herself, one Harkle Harpell of the Longsaddle Harpells in particular, who offer her lessons, information, even minor magic items in an attempt to win her favor. But while Sydney has no reservations whatsoever about taking advantage of someone, she remains clumsy and uncomfortable in such situations and with the charm spells, and has never fully exploited the possibilities open before her.

She has spent all of her 25 years in Luskan, the daughter of a weaver-woman and a merchant sailor. Her family was not rich, but neither was it poor, living a modest life in a comfortable apartment near the center of the city. Often young Sydney would stare out of her window at the wondrous, tree-like towers of the Hosttower of the Arcane and dream of studying the secrets of the universe. This was much to her mother's dismay, for the woman wanted only one thing from her only daughter: grandchildren.

But Sydney had other aspirations, and when she enrolled in, and clearly won, the Challenge of the Aspiring Wizards, a test of mental prowess conducted every fifth year by the Hosttower to discern if any potential wizards might be found among the general populace, the powerful lobby of the Hosttower came into play on her side. Even the controlling merchants in Luskan adhere to the few, but emphatic, demands of the city's wizards, and Sydney's parents had no choice but to give in to her wishes.

Her very first interview upon joining the order was with the tower's second in command, Dendybar, and thus the relationship was begun.

And now, fully convinced that the guiding fates have set aside a special and brightly burning star just for her, Sydney drives herself into her work with passion, absorbing every word her master utters and pouring through the magical tomes each night until her eyes sting from the candle smoke, sacrificing her very existence for the all-consuming obsession.

Roleplaying tips: Sydney is quickly bored with new people, having no interest in anything they might do unless it affects her future.

She is learning — slowly — the arts of manipulation, and will play up to any mage who might be of use to her. But any interest Sydney shows in anybody will be for selfish reasons. She is devoid of sympathy and empathy, caring not at all for the sufferings of others. In her distorted perception, her existence is all that matters, even to the point where she honestly wonders if anyone else truly exists when she is not around, as if all the other people in all the Realms live their lives simply to nurture the continuing experience that she calls her life.

She is undeniably loyal to Dendybar, though, but only because she perceives the Mottled Wizard to be her chosen tutor in this existence. In Sydney's delusions of grandeur, the gods have appointed Dendybar the vital task of training their shining star.

- Ninth-level — Shape change.

Physical description: Sylune was a human female — strikingly beautiful, with long black hair that became silver early in her life. She dressed in a nondescript brown robe, and always carried her staff.

Equipment: Sylune's drab brown robe was actually a robe of protection +4. She carried a staff of the magi and wore a ring of spell storing and a ring of fire resistance. She had many scrolls with various protection spells on them, and possessed a crystal ball which is now in the possession of her old friend, Elminster (as, one assumes, are most of the scrolls).

Personality: Sylune was always gracious, gentle, and polite. Among the five sisters, she was the motherly one, and at the same time, the stern example to them all. Sometimes she seemed to feel the burden of being the example to the others, yet she was always willing to listen and lend herself to causes that needed her talents.

However, like any of her clan, Sylune could be short with fools and liars, and quick to point out their shortcomings. She had a tongue that mostly caressed the ears of her listeners, but it could blister the ears of those who would waste her time with foolishness.

Motivations: Sylune was motivated by the example of her lover and then husband, Aumry, lord of Shadowdale. They adventured together in their youth, and when Aumry was called upon to assume the mantle of lord, she married him and took on the burden of lady.

Her dedication was to the well-being of her people at all time. She was their most fierce defender, standing out among many other defenders, including two of her sisters, Dove and Storm Silverhand. She finally proved her dedication with her life.

Background notes: Sylune was born in the year of the Dancing Maiden (1202 DR), and was killed in the Year of the Worm (1356 DR).

Upon the death of her husband, Aumry, she fought against a number of evil usurpers, overcame them, and then kept peace in the dale, working to achieve this with Elminster, the bard Storm Silverhand (her sister), and Mane's Band, until a rightful lord, Doust Sulwood, returned. Sylune was slain by a huge ancient red dragon under the influence of the Cult of the Dragon. She slew the dragon as she herself perished, breaking her staff of the magi for a retributive strike.

Other notes: Sylune was a friend and ally to Doust and his companions. She lived in a hut in the woods south and west of most homes in the dale, where she served all dalefolk as midwife, comforter, and physician. Sylune was the eldest sister of The Simbul of Aglarond, Storm Silverhand, Alustriel of Silverymoon, and the ranger Dove.

One of her early feats was helping to form the Harpers, along with her sister, Storm Silverhand, and a group of other rangers and bards. This was almost a century ago, when Sylune was still young, but the organization has grown to become a major force for the propagation of "good" against such entities as the Zhentarim and the Red Wizards of Thay.

Since Sylune is dead, it is difficult (though not impossible) for characters to interact with her. Yet, her legacy does give characters some hooks for adventure.

Stories of Sylune are told by bards (particularly Storm Silverhand, but her saga is considered prime recruiting material by all the Harpers) as inspiration for the living. Thus, Sylune is still fulfilling her function. From her adventures, characters can gain inspiration (that is to say, the DM can give them hints) for dealing with problems that seem unsurmountable at any particular moment.

And, of course, her legacy of the Harpers provides plenty of opportunity for adventure as recruits to that elite network oppose the machinations of Zhentarim and Red Wizard alike.

Physical description: Vangerdahast looks like a middle-aged, paunchy, white-bearded man of kindly but stern manner. In fact, he has been around, looking much the same, for 30 years, so he is older than he looks.

Vangerdahast always wears long robes with capacious sleeves.

Equipment: Vangerdahast has a ceremonial dagger which is actually a dagger +1. He wears bracers of AC2 and a ring of protection+3. He also has several magical wands, and generally carries a wand of armory (see other notes) and a wand of force in one of his copious sleeves. He has several other magical rings, and wears different ones depending on the situation. In court, which is where he is usually found, he wears a ring of multiple wishes with an unknown number of uses left. He has used it twice in times of disaster.

He is also known to have supplied the king with magical rings, and resupplies him when he gives them away to people on special missions or who have done the king important favors.

Personality: Vangerdahast is quiet and unassuming, although during court ceremonies, he can be very dignified, solemn, and impressive. A studiously pragmatic person, Vangerdahast always tries to appear unflappable and ready to cope with anything. He is of kindly but stern manner.

Motivations: Vangerdahast is known for lifelong loyalty to Azoun IV, king of Cormyr. He feels that Azoun is the best possible ruler for Cormyr, and works to maintain Azoun's rule. He tends to take the most expeditious route, rather than the "good" path, which might be longer and less likely, in his view, to succeed.

However, he is concerned for the welfare of the entire nation, and realizes that repression and arbitrariness are the best ways to make the people want a change of ruler.

Background notes: Vangerdahast spent his youth, in the time of Azoun's grandfather's rule, as an adventurer — gaining many friends in the adventurer and retired adventurer circles. Since many of these people are now kings or advisers to kings, he has a network of friends and acquaintances throughout the Realms.

Azoun's father, Rhigaerd II, appointed Vangerdahast as Azoun's tutor in the history and lineages of Cormyr and in matters of magic and such rulership subjects as ethics. Vangerdahast used this position to become the king's most trusted adviser.

Vangerdahast aided the king in his youth and has supported Azoun's rule throughout his reign. He is respected by fellow mages and the people of Cormyr alike.

Vangerdahast is now the royal magician of Cormyr, court wizard of the Purple Dragon, and head of Suzail's Council of Mages. When he is not advising the king, he spends his time researching spells and enchanting magical items for him.

Other notes: As the adviser to the king of one of the major nations of the Realms, Vangerdahast is someone that player characters will almost inevitably meet or otherwise interact with in their travels. He is the man behind Cormyr's activities against the Zhentarim, and he is always interested when a party has found some item of magic that they want to identify or dispose of.

Parties sent on missions for the Harpers by Storm Silverhand or The Simbul may be told to talk to Vangerdahast about the subject of the mission and gain his counsel. Vangerdahast is not a Harper, but is generally sympathetic to their aims.

The wand of armory: This type of wand was originally devised by the long-dead wizard Hosta. His apprentices spread the method of making it far and wide through the North of the Realms.

When touched to a target creature or activated upon the user's person, this wand envelops the target with an invisible, magical field of force which affords the equivalent of armor class 0 protection.

The field of force can be destroyed by dispel magic, limited wish, disintegrate (which does not affect the person protected) or similar, stronger, spells. Otherwise, it lasts for six rounds. During this time it absorbs magic missile and all electrical (including magical) attacks, so the target is not affected, but the field does not affect any other spell going in or out of the field.

The "force armor" is used in addition to any armor worn. That means the attacker must attack twice, once against the armor class 0 from the wand, and once against the normal armor class of the target. It completely covers any size M or S creature (who need not be conscious, alive, or even willing to be protected). There is no saving throw. Size L creatures have their heads and torsos protected.

Any member of any class may use this wand. It cannot be recharged. Each use of the wand drains one charge.

He is the true wave man, driven by the winds, hammered to the Earth, shadowed by fire and eternal as death. Who is he? He is no one.

Background: It is possible that no one will ever know exactly who the Wanderer is — not even himself. Born from the ashes of the terrible battle of Kiroshina, he is a man without history, without name, and without family.

Slender and strong, with black hair and eyes, he is unremarkable among the peoples of Kara Tur. His face is young, without the wrinkles and marks of age or care. Found wandering the blasted battlefields of Kanazaki Province, he wore the garb of a soldier, but his armor was so torn that not even the side for which he fought could be determined.

Who he is is The Wanderer's least concern — in fact, his identity seems to be something from which he now flees. His motivation is to always keep moving, keep doing, so that he need not ever consider his past — a past perhaps too horrible to remember. If he is approached by someone from out of his previous life, he will rebuff them with angry words, or run from them in terror. Doin Sanehiro is the lodestone of The Wanderer's life. He follows the older warrior without question, giving the "Monkey" his loyalty and the responsibility for The Wanderer's actions. In turn, Sanehiro does not ask The Wanderer to explain his past or choose sides.

As the companions travel together,

The Wanderer has slowly accumulated the bits and pieces of a new identity; a livable fiction made up from the images his friends project upon him. This new self mirrors his increasing loyalty to Sanehiro, as the quintessential ronin becomes samurai again under a new lord.

Dungeon Master's information:

The Wanderer can be encountered on the road alone or in the company of Sanehiro/Monkey. His usual abode is a small woodcutter's hut on the edge of Tomobiki village, surrounded by a thick brake of bamboo and scattered fields.

The Wanderer rarely speaks, even to his closest friends. When encountering an adventuring party, he will watch them silently, a somewhat distant and considering look in his eyes. Should any player recognize him, he will go out of his way to avoid that person; if he cannot, he will rebuff the adventurer with loud words and curses. The Wanderer will only become violent if severely pressed.

The Wanderer normally does not wear armor or carry weapons, although he does have both at his hut and will wear them into battle. At first glance, the armor appears to be a battered mismatch from no determinable army; however, a careful use of the detect magic spell will prove the armor to be enchanted to +3. The Wanderer's swords are of uncertain antiquity, but are actually enchanted with the ability to cast the spell protection from spirits three times per day. If asked, The Wanderer will say that he found the sword and armor on the battlefield of Kiroshina and that he knows nothing of their histories.

Physical description: Xanathar's physical shape is the same as any other eye tyrant: A large diameter sphere covered in chitin with 10 eyestalks, a large eye in the forward part of the sphere, and a tooth-filled mouth below that. His body color (which varies with every beholder) is a dark blue-gray which shades toward a dull yellow-orange around his cavernous mouth and underside. All of the above is usually floating about 3' off the ground.

Equipment: Xanathar, like all eye tyrants, has no particular faith in magical equipment. However, he has had specially made an eyes talk ring of proof against detection and location which is around his fifth eyestalk. He has similar rings around all of his other eyestalks, but they are simply jewelry, worth about 350 gp each.

Personality: Xanathar loves his position as the secret lord of Waterdeep's criminal underground. His great pleasure is chuckling over the vanity of the Lords of Waterdeep, who think they have eradicated organized crime in Waterdeep, while he prospers in the sewers beneath their feet.

Motivations: Xanathar is a creature of pleasures — it enjoys finely prepared foods, scented oils, and spiced southern tobaccos and herbs. His principal goal is to maintain his position as crime lord of Waterdeep.

Besides avoiding the scrutiny of the Lords of Waterdeep, Xanathar is keeping himself from common knowledge because he doesn't want his former masters of the Zhentarim to know where he is (see background).

Background notes: Xanathar came to Waterdeep as cargo in a trading caravan from Zhentil Keep. He was a follower of Xantriph, Manshoon's eye tyrant ally, and initially, his mission was to work toward the destruction of the Lords of Waterdeep and the promotion of a ruler who would be friendly to Zhentil Keep and the Zhentarim.

However, after a couple of months of conspiracy and lurking about the shadows of the docks, the free market atmosphere of Waterdeep inspired Xanathar, and he defied his masters by disappearing from their view.

In no time he had a network of thieves working for him, and had found his hideout underneath Waterdeep.

Xanathar is now the master of the “unofficial” thieves guild of Waterdeep. He works solely through free-lancers who receive orders indirectly. Only his most trusted lieutenants have any idea that Xanathar exists, or is a beholder.

He has not left his hideout for years, allowing his lieutenants to supply all of his needs. The Lords of Waterdeep have no idea that there is an eye tyrant within 200 miles of Waterdeep.

Other notes: Xanathar makes his home is an opulent chamber that lies hidden behind a secret door leading from the sewers of Waterdeep. His main chamber has yet to be located by the forces of Law, and indeed, few know of his very existence in the city. He has the best knowledge of the sewers and their entrances both into the major citadels and into Undermountain as well.

Xanathar’s abode is enmeshed in a net of trapped passages, of which only the four councilors know the safe passage. Most of the traps are non-lethal, primarily consisting of pits and nets and falling cages. Interlopers are taken from the traps and kept as pets briefly, wrung dry for information, then dispatched (for Xanathar’s appetite is enormous).

The chambers in Xanathar’s lair contain a number of treasure vaults and libraries (with information from Slink written in code). Xanathar himself reclines in a clear glass tank of scented water when planning criminal activities.

Xanathar is served by his central “four councilors” who meet with him regularly. They in turn deal with other underlings.

Slan Thurbel is his mercenary leader, a sixth-level fighter who arranges crimes of violence.

Slink Monteskor is Xanathar’s book-keeper and gatherer of information – he has a network of snitches scattered throughout the poor sections and among some servants of the upper classes.

Ott Steeltoes is a renegade of Ironmaster, a one-eyed and one-legged dwarven pirate, who is a fifth-level fighter and thief.

Darkeyes is a half-drow thief of seventh level, and Xanathar’s personal favorite. She is also a master at blackmail and extortion, and her information comes from the darker festhalls of Waterdeep and their more stylish patrons.

In his lair, Xanathar keeps a pair of charmed intellect devourers, and a winglet of six gargoyles for local defense.

Player characters may learn of Xanathar’s existence by running afoul of Zhentarim agents who are “looking for a beholder.”

ADVENTURING BROTHERHOODS

Bands of adventurers are common in the Forgotten Realms. They are composed of individuals united by a desire for money, magic, skill, fame and, most essentially, adventure. They are tolerated in most places and have a long tradition. Certain lands, such as Cormyr, require that bands register and receive a royal charter to operate within their borders; a few, such as Amn, forbid adventurers outright.

The number of adventuring companies is large and constantly changing. Such groups are established, vanish, and change names and locations constantly with the passing winters.

Two notable groups are described below. Both have shown remarkable longevity and are quite well known. The Knights of Myth Drannor, operating out of Shadowdale, are an example of a fairly typical group that started just looking for adventure; as they became powerful, they embraced a number of worthy causes, such as the defense of Shadowdale and the monitoring of the ruins of Myth Drannor. The Company of Eight, of Tethyr, is a group with a much more narrow focus; their expressed purpose is to provide stability in the state of near-anarchy in their country.

The Knights of Myth Drannor

These adventurers first came to prominence as rulers of Shadowdale, in their successful defiance of the armies of Zhentil Keep. They were instrumental in the defeat of Lashan of Scardale, and remain able foes of the Zhentarim and of the drow beneath the Dragonreach lands.

The Knights began in Espar as a nameless band of youths, young men and women who had grown up together. They received a charter from King Azoun of Cormyr allowing them to bear arms. The royal assent included a strong recommendation that the party of adventurers explore and clean out the "Haunted Halls," a bandit hold north of the village of Eveningstar.

The group departed on the 28th of Tarsakh, Year of the Harp, and spent two months adventuring in the Halls. The group then moved on to the Stonelands, exploring assorted tombs and strongholds of evil creatures.

It was at this time that the Knights first ran afoul of the Zhentarim, who were engaged in taking control of the Stonelands in order to complete an overland caravan route from Zhentil Keep to the Sword Coast. The party slew Maglor, a Zhentarim spy, in Eveningstar, and later slew the renegade Zhentarim mage Whisper. A thief, Nith, whom the party rescued in the Halls during this time was actually a Zhentarim spy, Asbarode. He laid hold of a magical sword that compelled him to take it elsewhere, and left the band.

As with almost any beginning group, the Knights at first had several bad elements: companions who were uncooperative, and attempted to slay or steal from their fellows. Two of these in the Knights, the fighters Agannor Wildsilver and Bey Freemantle, met swift and brutal ends.

The party discovered a curious feature common to many ancient ruins in the Realms: permanent teleportation gates linking one dungeon with another, far-distant one. By chance they took one to the great city of Waterdeep, where they met Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun, who had heard of their doings via Harper agents (such as Dove, later a Knight herself and the wife of Florin Falconhand). Khelben recognized a golden opportunity to hand the Zhentarim a setback: He gave Florin the pendant and title of lord of Shadowdale, to claim if he could. After strengthening and healing the band, Khelben teleported them all back to Eveningstar.

The party traversed the Stonelands to Shadowdale, where they took possession of the monster-infested Tower of Ashaba and met Sylune, Elminster, and other notable locals, including Mane's Band (adventurers) and a few drow agents. It was some time before the adventurers had secured the tower, but by the time they had, they had found enough treasure to rebuild the structure. They also discovered the chilling secret of the Tower of Ashaba: It had been built not by men, but by the drow, to guard the entrances to the realms below. The drow had been coming up through the ruined tower to trade with the Zhentarim, who had a hidden stronghold in the woods near Shadowdale.

Florin declined the lordship of Shadowdale; instead, he asked that his fellow Knights elect one of their number to take the position. Doust Sulwood, cleric of Tymora, was chosen. Supported by the sage Elminster, the witch Sylune, Tamshan the bard, and the magic-user Boots "The Lucky" of Mane's Band (the latter two Harper agents), Doust established his rule. He called village meetings, democratic "lord's courts," to discuss matters great and small, and arranged to have elected a council of locals to advise him.

Troubles with the Zhentarim continued to plague Doust; caravan after caravan from Zhentil Keep, some carrying slaves, pushed through Shadowdale, and fought the Knights' guards. At the same time, the adventurers made forays against local giants, wiping out the Flaming Tower, tackled a beholder allied with the Zhentarim, and encountered "The Hand," a band of evil adventurers based in Voonlar.

All too soon, Zhentil Keep sent an army against the dale, supporting a false claim on the lordship from Lyran Nanther of Melvaunt. Astonishingly, the party's mercenaries and militia, with elven and Harper help, prevailed against 10 times their number; but it was recognized that Zhentil Keep had not yet given up the struggle.

The party members continued to establish themselves in the dale, uncovering Zhentarim and drow agents, identifying a weretiger, and discovering the talents of Illistyl Elventree. They solidified the dale's defenses and settled new farmers. Envoys began to arrive from local rulers and priesthoods; most were politely refused, but Tyche, Lathander, and Chauntea were granted land.

Before Zhentil Keep could make its next attack, the Knights made a lightning attack on Voonlar, a village up the road. There they razed and plundered the temple of the evil god Bane, taking over 400 prisoners, including drow and Zhentarim. While the Zhentarim recovered from this blow, the adventurers dealt another to the drow in the caverns below the dale.

This venture was highly successful, but as the adventurers themselves were recovering, Lashan of Scardale, secretly supported by the high imperceptor of Bane, suddenly invaded and conquered neighboring Harrowdale and Featherdale. He then took Battle-dale and Tasseldale beyond before anyone could mobilize their forces, and attacked Mistedale. Cormyr guarded its borders by annexing Tilverton to the west, and Sembia rushed its forces north to protect Deepingdale and prevent Lashan from turning south. It was left to Shadowdale, the elves (who were leaving the Elven Court for the tranquility of Evermeet as fast as they could), the Harpers, and the druidic circles in the area to bolster Mistedale and hold Lashan's empire back. Hold they did — and Lashan's empire began to crumble as he was attacked from all sides.

The departing elves invited the party to enter Myth Drannor. There they found much evil, but also another gate to Waterdeep, as well as gates to other worlds. They found a treasure cache known as the Elfhold, and encountered renegade lords of Zhentil Keep, seeking allies to fight against the Zhentarim, and the goddess Mielikki.

Aumark Lithyl then left the party to take the throne of Ruathym, since his father had been slain in the war with Luskan. To replace him, Khelben sent a young Waterdhavian cavalier, Mourn-grym Amcathra. When Doust relinquished his title, Mourn-grym was named lord of Shadowdale.

In Myth Drannor, the band found a deck of many things, and Doust amazingly survived the drawing of a death card. Soon thereafter, Islif gave birth to a son, Jhaok, and Mielikki appeared to Florin, commanding him to marry Dove.

The party guarded Shadowdale until the deep snows of winter made attack by Zhentil Keep impossible; then they made their way to Myth Drannor to take the gate to Waterdeep, where they wintered in a villa, dubbed "Cold Comfort" Jhessail gave birth to Veluthil, and Dove and Florin were wed.

When spring of the Year of the Prince came, the adventurers left Waterdeep to explore the Realms, having left the defense of Shadowdale to Mourn-grym, Elminster, and their army. They spent most of the next year exploring the northern Sword Coast, and then coming down the western edge of the Great Desert, Anauroch, to Westgate, then Cormyr and the Dales at last. Along the way, they found the lost city of Gauntlgrym, met with Alustriel, high lady of Silvermoon, and the wandering Simbul of Aglarond, and lost Jelde, then Doust and Islif, to retirement.

ADVENTURING BROTHERHOODS

Instead of returning to Shadowdale, the remaining party members elected to go to Myth Drannor, hoping to establish their own stronghold there. They found a nasty surprise there: hordes of devils, summoned by priests of Bane, infested the ruins. After hard fighting, the party retired to Essembra, there to rest and welcome Rathan Thentraver, cleric of Tymora, and Torm, a rogue, into their ranks. They also finally chose a name: The Knights of Myth Drannor.

The Knights have since had many adventures, exploring other worlds, battling the drow (and in the process gaining a new companion, Sharantyr), and continuing to fight the Zhentarim and their devil and orc agents. They have also had many battles in the ruins of Myth Drannor; adventurers flock there from the lands all around, searching for treasure, but finding instead swift death from diabolical claws.

The death of Sylune and the devastation of much of the Dalelands at the claws and fangs of dragons at the behest of the Cult of the Dragon gained the Knights a new enemy. Currently the Knights are fighting on against ever-more-powerful foes; and they are beginning to question the nature and aims of the Harpers.

Having renounced their official positions in Shadowdale, they remain "lords" and "ladies" of the dale, respected by all the dalefolk; and Elminster, and the bard Storm Silverhand remain staunch allies.

Currently the Knights are: Florin Falconhand and his wife, Dove; Jhessail Silvertree and her husband, Merith Strongbow; the druid, Lanseril Snowmantle; and four "junior members": the magic-user Illistyl Elventree, her lover Torm, Rathan Thentraver, and the ranger Sharantyr. Less active members are Jelde Asturien, Doust Sulwood, and Islif Lurelake, and Mourngrym Amcathra, with his wife, Shaerl Rowanmantle. Mourngrym and Shaerl are described elsewhere in this book; the rest are described below.

Jhessail coordinates domestic matters for the Knights, while Florin is battle leader; but all party members are equal, and all important decisions are decided by a democratic vote.

The party does not currently have a permanent stronghold or base, although they are hoping to build one. They are always welcome at the Tower of Ashaba or almost anywhere else in Shadowdale; and there they keep a cache of communal treasure and magic, deposited in the days of Doust's lordship. It includes healing scrolls and potions and at least one elixir of life.

The Knights utilize no hirelings or henchmen; all who so offer their services are sent to aid Lord Mourngrym in policing Shadowdale.

Spellbooks: The spell-casting members of the Knights have pooled their resources, gathering all their known spells together. The books containing these spells are kept safe in the Tower of Ashaba in Shadowdale; any magic-using Knight can have access to them. Each Knight has a traveling spellbook, in which are recorded those spells listed in the character descriptions below as "spells commonly memorized." Some also have their own books of cantrips; such zero-level spells are not recorded in the shared books.

The Knights of Myth Drannor are always eager to find new spells to add to the communal books as well as their personal repertoires.

A longtime member of the Knights, Jelde was one of the original members from the Cormyrian village of Espar. The name given to him there was Semoor Wolftooth; but now he finds himself called this only by acquaintances of long, long ago. His name is now Jelde Asturien: It is the tradition of clerics of Lathander, God of the Dawn, to take a new name, revealed by their deity, upon gaining the rank of priest (third level). This symbolizes the rebirth and renewal that Lathander also represents.

Another appellation from Jelde's past is the nickname, "Stoop." This name came from his favorite pastime, fishing; as a boy he spent long hours in that posture, waiting for a strike on his line. Now, so many years later, he has fewer occasions to pass an idle afternoon on a riverbank. But he still likes to fish, and on those occasions when he gets out of Eveningstar, he rarely fails to bring along his fishing tackle.

When Semoor came of age, he left Espar to seek his fortune. Among his companions were Florin Falconhand, Islif Lurelake, and Doust Sulwood, the nucleus of what would someday be named the Knights of Myth Drannor. Though sarcastic and scheming, Semoor was ever loyal to his companions, and ever a valued asset. In the course of their adventures, Semoor found his vocation as a cleric of Lathander, and earned his new name, Jelde Asturien.

Jelde became a noble of Shadowdale when the knights returned from Waterdeep with the pendant from Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun to claim lordship of Shadowdale. He took the title seneschal of the Tower of Ashaba, and served well in the conflicts with the drow, the Zhentarim, and the would-be-conqueror-tyrant, Lashan of Scardale. He retains the honorary title of a lord of Shadowdale.

At last Jelde tired of the adventuring life. He chose to retire from the life of wandering to better serve Lathander. He presently resides at his deity's temple in Eveningstar and is a prominent, respected member of the clergy. Most of his time is devoted to matters of worship, administration, and sharing his wisdom and experience with upcoming members of Lathander's priesthood. But he does equip himself on occasion and sally forth in the Morninglord's service to the Stonelands, or elsewhere; and if the Knights of Myth Drannor needed his service, he could hardly refuse their request.

Asturien dons magical chain mail and wields a magical hammer in combat. He is strong and hardy; but with his excellent spell-casting capabilities, augmented by his ring of spell storing, he no longer would need so much to engage in hand-to-hand combat. He recently possessed, for a brief time, a magical tooth, but it was taken from him in battle. The tooth's powers had not yet been discovered; it may have been an artifact.

For his glyph of warding spell, Jelde prefers the magical rune named telatha. Nicknamed "Morninglow," telatha is favored by priests of Lathander, who claim that the Morninglord taught it to them ages ago. (Clerics of other faiths may learn and employ it; Asturien has taught his fellow cleric Knights, Doust and Rathan, to recognize and to use it.) When triggered, the glyph explodes with the intense brightness of the rising sun, automatically stunning for 1d4 +1 segments and blinding the creature that triggers it. The blindness is permanent unless a saving throw vs. spells is successful, in which case it lasts 1d6 turns.

Of all the knights of Myth Drannor, only Illistyl is a native of Shadowdale. Her psionic abilities and aptitude for magic, noted in the Shadowdale census of the Year of the Harp, were discovered accidentally by the Knights, who were actually seeking the weretiger who had slain the thief Alura Durshavin, one of their number. Doust Sulwood, then lord of the dale, brought her to live in the Tower of Ashaba after her parents, Ilcort and Lasha Elventree, were killed in the battles with Zhentil Keep. Besides being concerned for the young woman's personal welfare, the Knights recognized her as an asset to be carefully protected and nurtured for the good of the dale.

Her tutor in the art, Jhessail Silvertree, is also Illistyl's good friend. Since Jhessail became a mother, a greater role as spell weaver for the Knights has fallen to this young theurgist. When the greater tasks are at hand, however, Illistyl steps aside and permits Jhessail to lend her full and formidable powers to the Knights' projects. Illistyl then takes care of the child of Jhessail and Merith Strongbow, and tends to the daily magical needs of the dale folk, as the deceased witch Sylune used to do, and calls for Elminster's aid if it is necessary.

Illistyl is young, small, and lithe – 17 winters old, 5'1" tall, and 96 pounds heavy. She is ambidextrous. Her straight, dark hair is cut just past shoulder length, and her friendly eyes have an impish sparkle. She likes comfortable, colorful clothing, quickly taking breeches and a tunic instead of stuffy mage's robes or a lady's dress. She has a wry sense of humor, and is quite independent and sharp-tongued — very necessary traits for anyone who would be the lover of the thief, Torm, as she is. Beneath her often-cocky exterior, Illistyl is sensitive, reliable, and acutely perceptive.

In addition to a traveling spellbook containing the "spells commonly memorized," listed above, Illistyl has a book of 36 cantrips. This repertoire consists of the following:

Useful — Chill, clean, color, dampen, dry, dust, exterminate, flavor, freshen, polish, salt, shine, spice, stitch, sweeten, tie, warm, wrap.

Person-affecting: Blink, cough, giggle, sneeze, twitch, wink, yawn.

Magical items and equipment: Full plate armor +1, long sword +1 luck blade (with 2 wishes), three arrows +2, three arrows +3, one arrow +4, two potions of extra-healing, cloak and boots of elvenkind, rogue stone (see below), quiver, five silver-tipped arrows, dagger, shield.

Dove is the second-youngest of a famous family of five sisters. Her three illustrious older siblings are Sylune, the late witch and lady of Shadowdale; Alustriel, high lady of Silvermoon; and the bard Storm Silverhand, a resident of Shadowdale. The youngest sister is The Simbul, witch-queen of Aglarond. All of these human sisters are very old (Dove is 142), but retain their youthful appearance and vitality through the use of potions of longevity and similar magic.

Besides being a Knight of Myth Drannor, Dove is, like her sister Storm, one of the Harpers. For many years even before the creation of the Knights, Dove fought the Zhentarim and their minions and other evil creatures of the Inner Sea lands.

A number of times in the course of these activities, she encountered a band of young Cormyrian adventurers, the nucleus of the Knights of Myth Drannor.

The battle leader of the group, one ranger named Florin Falconhand, was in need of training, and Dove served as his tutor.

Florin more than repaid the service. Later when Dove had become the prisoner of Orvar "The Unseen" of the Zhentarim, she ran into Florin in the Whistling Wizard Inn in Voonlar, and he released her from her captivity. Dove relocated to Shadowdale to join the Knights of Myth Drannor; not long thereafter she took to husband Florin, the most "noble" man she had ever met.

Soon after Doust relinquished his lordship over Shadowdale, the Knights moved on, concentrating their attention on Myth Drannor. Dove became pregnant, and she retired to Evermeet, the fabled island realm of elvenkind, to give birth and raise her child, Azalar Falconhand. She and Florin (and, of course, Azalar) are among the very few humans permitted to set foot in Evermeet. Dove and Azalar currently remain there, to be visited on occasion by Florin.

Beautiful, graceful, and quiet, Dove is a tall woman — at 6' in height, she is not much shorter than her husband. Like her husband and many other Knights, Dove is ambidextrous. She is kind, calm, and firm; her reserved air conveys a strong sense of strength, confidence and wisdom. She is probably the most shy and withdrawn of the sisters, but she is an accomplished singer and harpist, and in private she likes to dance.

Listed under magical items and equipment above, are only the most basic items that Dove would be found carrying. She also will have whatever equipment and provisions would be appropriate for the situation in which she is found, plus some cash or jewels. As all the long-lived sisters do, Dove has several secret caches of treasure about the Forgotten Realms, containing coins and jewelry, spare weapons and armor, as well as useful, common magic items (e.g., potions of healing and longevity, magical arrows, and perhaps a protection scroll).

Florin Falconhand, an imposing and inspiring man, is a senior member and the leading figure of the Knights of Myth Drannor. He was born in Espar 26 years ago to Hethcanter Falconhand (fourth-level fighter), a retired Cormyrian army captain, and the half-elf Skydusk (fourth-level magic-user). Florin himself is entirely human.

In his youth, Florin was interested in nature (especially flowers) and elvenkind, and his mother encouraged him to learn about gardening. His father apprenticed him to the famous armorer, Hawkstone, believing the lad would need a more useful trade to get by in the world, but the boy ever preferred forest to forge. His long, solitary walks in the woods earned him the nickname "Silent," and allowed him to pick up smatterings of the Elvish, Dryadic, and Treant languages.

When he came of age, Florin set out to find his fortune with his companions, Islif Lurelake, Jhessail Silvertree, Doust Sulwood, and Semoor Wolftooth. Skilled with sword and tongue, the ranger emerged as a leader in battle and the diplomatic representative of the band.

After some time of adventuring with the Knights, Florin was considered fit by the wizard Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun of Waterdeep to be lord of Shadowdale. Florin declined the office, and allowed it to be bestowed upon his stalwart companion, Doust. Florin served as warden of Shadowdale, and represented the tiny state in diplomatic matters with neighboring lands and rulers.

Florin would seem to be very important to his patron deity, the forest goddess Mielikki — so important that she has appeared to him personally on at least seven occasions. In one such instance, she ordered him to marry Dove the ranger, telling him that it was "necessary." Dove had tutored him in the ways of the forest, and he had rescued her from a Zhentarim captor.

Dove was not the first woman with whom Florin had been involved. Among the many ladies before with whom he had acquainted himself in his travels, Florin was enamored of the thief "Pennae," Alura Durshavin. Sadly, she was slain in Shadowdale by a weretiger. The lycanthrope turned out to be Lune Lyrohar, an unfortunate pleasure girl at Mother Tara's. (On the positive side, the search for her revealed the powers of Illistyl Elventree, who is now a member of the Knights.)

Florin remains battle leader of the Knights, a formidable warrior. When not in service to the Knights, he retires to Evermeet, the tree-cloaked elven realm across the sea where his wife, Dove, and young son, Azalar, presently reside. The members of the little family are among the few humans permitted in that island kingdom.

Spell ability of both magical and druidic nature is now available to Florin; he has been trained by his companions, the sorceress Jhessail Silvertree, and the druid Lanseril Snowmantle. Among the magic-user spells, Florin can never learn magic missile, but he has learned and used find familiar in order to acquire his familiar, the hawk Minstrel. Minstrel has 2 hp and customarily rides about on Florin's shoulder. Florin can telepathically see through the bird's eyes.

Florin also has a white charger, a heavy war horse named Firefoam. Gained by a magical wish, Firefoam is the equivalent of a paladin's war horse. The beast (AC 5, hp 37, MV 18", INT 7) can communicate telepathically with Florin on a basic level — feelings, yes or no, danger, recognition of beings, and so forth. Firefoam can fight alone with hooves and teeth, or with a rider on his back, and will serve Florin for six more years.

Among Florin's possessions are a unique, magical shield, Reptar's Wall, and a rogue stone. The rogue stone, just like the one possessed by his wife, Dove Falconhand, is a gift from the elves that can teleport Florin without error to Evermeet.

MAGISTER) is a shield +1. It can cause the wearer to become invisible for 2d4 rounds upon verbal command, once every 16 hours, or fly for two turns, once every 24 hours, draining a nearby magic item (charges from a chargeable item, all dweomer from a "one-shot" item, or negating a permanent item for a time) to do so. The shield makes no sound when struck or dropped.

Florin is 6'2" tall, broad-shouldered, 162 pounds, and ambidextrous. He has curly brown hair, blue-gray eyes, and a burn scar on his right hand (from petting a baby red dragon when small). He has a kingly demeanor, and is not as jovial as the other Knights; he is good-natured, but quiet and dignified.

Languages: Common, Neutral Good.

Weapon proficiencies: Ax, broad sword, halberd, long sword, scimitar, sling.

Non-weapon proficiencies/skills: Alertness, riding, running, swimming.

Saving throws: Paralysis/poison — 10; Petrification/polymorph — 11; Rod/staff/wand — 12; Breath weapon — 12; Spells — 13.

Magical items and equipment: Long sword +1/+2 vs. magic-using and enchanted creatures, periapt of wound closure, potion of vitality, ring of protection +2, field plate armor, great helm, large shield, sling, pouch with 30 sling bullets, bullseye lantern, four flasks of oil, tinderbox, backpack, provisions, and water skin.

Another member of the original party that came from Espar, at age 25 Islif Lurelake is a formidable warrior of high repute.

The parents of Islif are Tesha and Buckman Lurelake. Her father, Buckman, was a trader, often away from his family on business. Islif was often left free to roam as she would. At the local swimming hole she made friends with her future adventuring companions: Florin Falconhand, Jhessail Silvertree, Doust Sulwood, and Semoor Wolftooth.

She also befriended a scarred old fighter, Skuldi Wolfspear, who became her first tutor in the arts of battle. Skuldi still makes a living as a hunter and guide in the Espar region.

Adventuring, Islif proved herself a competent sword fighter, brave explorer, and a dependable companion. She gained skill rapidly and learned the use of many weapons, though she did not choose to favor any one with specialization. She normally uses her magical long sword in melee, and a sling for missile combat.

Not long after Doust Sulwood was selected to become lord of Shadowdale, he asked Islif to marry him, and she accepted. Islif also served as captain of the militia of Shadowdale, and proved an able leader in battle against Zhentil Keep and Scardale.

The couple's young son, Jhaok Sulwood, was born in Shadowdale on the 22nd of Marpenoth, Year of the Worm. The boy has black hair, clear silver eyes, and already shows interest in following in his mother's footsteps as a fighter.

After Doust gave up the lordship of Shadowdale to Mourngrym Amcathra, he and Islif retired, at least temporarily, to Arabel, where they are enjoying a peaceful life. For the present, they are content to take life easy and bring up their child well.

Islif is tall and brawny (6', 146 pounds), a fearless fighter with a devil-may-care attitude. As Doust well knows, she still has a streak of drill sergeant in her from the days of barking commands at Shadowdale's soldiers. Her boldness also makes her a good trader, as her parents were. She enjoys woodcarving and sculpting, and dislikes "macho" men.

Islif has silvery-blue eyes and shoulder-length hair, black and very straight. She is more commonly found wearing day-to-day clothes or fashionable evening gowns these days, but she still keeps her trusty suit of field plate armor well oiled and ready for use.

ADVENTURING BROTHERHOODS

The female ranger Sharantyr is the newest member of the Knights of Myth Drannor. Her lack of a surname is quite common in the Realms. She has yet to choose one, and might never do so.

Sharantyr was born to a merchant couple in Baldur's Gate. Her father, Zunzyr Thalomm, traded textiles, and her mother, Nathla, dealt in embroidery and fine needlework. Sharantyr never saw much of her native town, since her parents' careers took them all over the North.

The life of a traveling merchant in the Realms can be as risky as that of an adventurer, as was demonstrated most tragically when Sharantyr was barely 2 years of age. Her parents' caravan was waylaid by trolls north of Scornubel, and both killed. Sharantyr escaped miraculously in the confusion as the caravan dissolved. She fled many miles into the forest, alone, until she collapsed from exhaustion after all the exertion and terror.

She was found by a gentle ranger, Thautyr, who treated her bruises and scrapes and nursed her back to health and vitality. He brought her up as if she were his own daughter, training her in wood lore and the use of weapons.

Twenty years after he had saved Sharantyr from the dangers of the forest, Thautyr passed away, victim of a fever. Sharantyr buried him, and then decided that she could no longer live alone in their little forest dwelling. She packed what possessions she could carry, including her adoptive father's great sword, and journeyed away to find her fortune.

She traveled south to Iriaebor, and then east, through Cormyr, to the Dalelands. She had the misfortune of encountering a group of drow raiders, who took her prisoner and carried her deep beneath the earth.

Luckily she was discovered and rescued by the Knights of Myth Drannor, who were on one of their forays against the evil elves of the Underdark. Impressed by Sharantyr's fighting skill, resourcefulness, and determination (she had the guts to face a beholder and to bait drow into a trap), the Knights offered Sharantyr a place in their ranks, which she gladly accepted.

Sharantyr is graceful and beautiful, with long, silky, brown hair and gray-green eyes. Those eyes can almost smoke with silent anger; she has a hot temper, and though she has been through enough hardship to know when it is best to control her passions, it usually can be seen in her eyes. Sharantyr is quiet, a woman of few words but much battle skill, and she enjoys familiarizing herself with the Dalelands by traveling with the bard, Storm Silverhand, of Shadowdale.

She wears chain mail under her traveling tunic and cloak, and carries a long sword at her side. She has a shield, but usually keeps it on her riding horse, unless she is expecting a melee. Her two-handed sword gets similar treatment or, sometimes, is strapped to her back in its sheath. A dagger is concealed in each boot. Being ambidextrous, Sharantyr wields long sword, dagger, and shield equally well in either hand.

This ranger has amassed enough experience points to advance to third level, but on account of all the bustle and trouble in the Dales of late, Florin Falconhand has not yet had time to train her, as he has promised to do.

Small and motherly, but commanding, Jhessail Silvertree is the maternal leader of the Knights of Myth Drannor.

Like many of the senior Knights, Jhessail is a native of Espar, Cormyr. She is the daughter of foresters and elffriends, Criag and Lhanna Silvertree, from whom she inherited an undying interest in elves and woodlands.

As a child, Jhessail was fascinated by magic as soon as she discovered it. The elves, on good terms with her family, discovered that besides having any child's delight with conjurers' tricks, "Twoteeth," as she was nicknamed, had a real aptitude for the art. Even before she could read or write well, Jhessail had discovered how to use a few simple cantrips, just from carefully observing mages and their apprentices. She delighted her young friends with such petty magics as blue light. The elves, with her parents' permission, arranged for the precocious child to be tutored immediately by Hezom of Espar.

Formal training matured Jhessail's magical talents, even as nature and a healthy lifestyle developed her body into one of striking, near-elfin beauty. Her old nickname, Twoteeth, was replaced by "Flamehair," on account of her long, fiery, orange-brown tresses. She has a slim, exquisite figure (5'9", 91 pounds), a gentle mouth, and dark gray-green eyes. She came to favor simple apparel, such as plain, dark robes, that allows her natural beauty to shine.

After completing her apprenticeship to Hezom, Jhessail was encouraged by her parents to go out and see the world; so she set off with a band of friends, the nucleus of the Knights of Myth Drannor. One woman in the group, a magic-user named Martess, was soon killed; she too had been an apprentice of Hezom and a good friend of Jhessail. The loss hurt this sensitive, young sorceress; but it helped to harden her to the harsh realities of an adventurer's life. And she rose rapidly in power, reading a libram of silver magic and acquiring a familiar, a black cat named Jet (AC 7, hp 4, MV 12", INT 14).

Talents besides magic were cultivated by Jhess (as she now is usually called by her fellow Knights). She learned and practiced her skills of healing, animal training, endurance, and riding. Her wide range of abilities made her powerful and respected among the Knights.

Jhessail's first lover was one of the Knights, the cleric Jelde Asturien, who had also come from Espar. The elf Merith Strongbow contested Jelde's claims on Jhessail. Ultimately, the choice was, of course, Jhessail's, and she decided that she loved Merith more. Winning his hand in marriage before all the Elven Court was no mean task, but Jhessail proved herself well. By elven standards she is extremely young; and even though she seeks to extend her life span by magical means, she hasn't hoped to outlive even the youth of her husband.

The marriage, enacted on Alturiak 15, Year of the Worm, has produced one half-elven daughter, Veluthil Silverbow. The first name means "beautiful of the evening," in reference to the time of her birth on Mirtul 1, Year of the Prince;

"veluthe" means "beautiful," and "thil," "evening." Veluthil's surname is a combination of those of her parents, as is tradition for half-elves of the Realms; when she grows older she may keep this name or choose another.

Veluthil is cared for by Illistyl Elventree at least as much as by her mother; as the Knights of Myth Drannor member most experienced in the use of magic, Jhessail's services are often in demand, and she is not one to miss adventure.

She is warm, kind, and understanding, yet strict and proper. Her passion and strong will are tempered by great self-control. Jhess has undertaken to train Illistyl Elventree as her successor and to develop Florin Falconhand's new magical powers. She also is carefully nudging her infant into familiarity with magic.

Jhessail's spells, built up from spellbooks gained in the Knights' adventures, are shared freely with the other spell-casters of the group, particularly her husband. Besides her memorized spells, Jhessail has an impressive array of magical devices that make her quite formidable in combat.

In addition to a traveling spellbook containing the "spells commonly memorized," listed above, Jhessail has a book of 34 cantrips. This repertoire consists of the following:

Useful — Chill, clean, color, dampen, dry, dust, flavor, freshen, gather, polish, salt, shine, spice, stitch, sweeten, tie, warm, wrap.

Lanseril is a native of Snowmantle, a tiny village north of Daggerdale, on the edge of the Border Forest. When he came of age, he took his village's name as his own.

Raunaeril "The Rose," an elf, was Lanseril's father; his mother was a beautiful human maiden of Snowmantle, Nelael "Heth's Girl."

Lanseril loved to play in the forest with the elves, and hated what little he saw of cities. A druid who lived in the forest near Snowmantle, one Haemfaest "Holloweye" Sarthun (he had lost his left eye in a long-ago battle, but refused to wear an eye patch), took a fancy to the half-elven lad and introduced him to the worship of Silvanus.

Silvanus was to Lanseril a much more believable deity than Rillifane Rallathil, the elven deity favored by his father's tribe. This was in spite of the fact that Haemfaest and the elves believed that Lanseril had once, unknowingly, met Rillifane on the forest paths, and played tag with him around the trees until, in full view of Raunaeril, who was angrily approaching, the green-clad elf with the bow whom Lanseril was chasing turned into a great oak tree. Then one night, over a week later, that great oak tree vanished.

Raunaeril's was one of "The Lost," the elven tribe that inhabited the Border Forest; perhaps they still do, but they have not been heard from for over 30 years. They appear to have been killed off or forced to withdraw by the increasing strength of humankind in the North, and by the orcs who seized the mines of Tethyamar and began raiding from them into the lands about.

Both of Lanseril's parents perished, together, on the trampled banks of the river Tesh, in a bloody struggle with raiders from the Citadel of the Raven. Six-year-old Lanseril was left behind. Fortunately, the druid Haemfaest, looked after the half-mad, disconsolate boy; but one winter night, about a year later, the old druid fell prey to a pack of hungry wolves. The boy was pursued by the wolves, and was forced to flee south. He bears a near-obsessive hatred for those animals to this day.

Eventually Lanseril arrived in Deepingdale, where, in Highmoon, he was able to carve out a niche for himself. He worked for a local merchant, Braun o' the Beard, as a runner, errand-boy and animal keeper; even then he could train animals and identify their unique sounds, or "voices" as he always called them. Lanseril worked devotedly for Braun for 12 years, seeing much of the local roads and businesses. But in the end, he was made miserable by the jealous younger cousin of Braun, who hoped to inherit the business, and didn't want a competent, well-liked apprentice blocking his plans.

In a way, it was opportune that Lanseril was forced to seek new horizons. A ranger, Briadorn of the druidic Circle of Shadowdale, saw Lanseril gently caring for an injured hare, treating its wounds with herbs, and offered to bring him to the dale.

Lanseril accepted, and soon became a most valuable member of the Knights of Myth Drannor. Though quiet and gentle in appearance, he is perhaps the greatest strategist among the Knights (his clever use of an insect plague from a spell scroll was instrumental in defeating Zhentil Keep's reinforcements in the Battle of Shadowdale), and a shrewd, Machiavellian diplomat. He has an absolutely phenomenal memory, able to recognize faces, sigils, even handwriting years after seeing it last, and he can sometimes almost recite verbatim conversations overheard long ago. Lanseril sees all, remembers all, and thinks on his feet.

Lanseril has brown hair, delicate features and blue eyes. He is ambidextrous, 6'2" tall, 100 pounds, and 48 years old. He is generally friendly, but sometimes with a hint of condescension. Since becoming a Knight, he has developed a great attachment to Shadowdale and its people, whom he regards as being under his protection as much as the local woods are.

Possessions are few for this druid; he has no great longing for worldly goods, and he understands how easily they come and go. Of note among the things he does keep is the Firecrown, a magical treasure. It is a golden circlet whose gems, usable twice every 200 turns, can emit two rays of fire, doing 18 points of damage (half if a save vs. spells is made). This enchanted coronet was won from giants in the Flaming Tower, a fortress that Lanseril and his companions destroyed with the aid of treants.

Lanseril also has two trained badgers, who can dig, fetch keys (or similarly small items), gnaw ropes, and the like upon telepathic command.

He has enough experience to advance to ninth level, if he could ever spare the time for the necessary training and communion with nature.

Merith Strongbow is a tall, black-haired moon elf, ambidextrous, with one eye blue and one green. He was born 184 years ago, on the banks of the River Duathamper in the Great Wood (more commonly called the Elven Court), to Laerune and Lianthorn Strongbow.

The elves train their folk carefully and well, and Merith was no exception. His father tutored him in the use of weapons, and they practiced their skills in battle against the men, from the developing Dalelands and Moonsea cities, who were trying to clear the forest, upon which the elves depended and which they cherished so dearly. Merith's first magical training came from the "Gray Ladies" of Semblerholme, an elven retreat on the shores of Lake Sember.

After the death of his parents 20 years ago, Merith sought to avenge their murder, but never managed to locate their slayer, a human mercenary warrior-captain named Todelyn. To this day he remains alert for any clue as to the whereabouts of that man, but he has become involved in pursuits more constructive than vengeance.

Central to those pursuits was Merith's joining the Knights of Myth Drannor. He was sent by the Elven Court, with the purpose of influencing the Shadowdale adventurers to steer them from actions harmful to the elven woods and ways. Carrying a letter from Luvon, a elven ally of Doust Sulwood and company, Merith was instantly accepted and has remained in the company ever since.

Strongbow has served well among the knights; he is formidable as both fighter and mage. Augmenting his magical powers is a familiar, a black cat named Shadowclaw (AC 7, MV 13", hp 4, INT 12). He used to have a pseudo-dragon, Eshhkk, but that familiar perished in a battle with evil nagas in the ruins of Myth Drannor.

The most important things in Merith's life today are his wife and child. After joining the Knights, he fell in love with their sorceress, Jhessail Silvertree. They have had one daughter, Veluthil Silverbow (see Jhessail's description, above). Merith holds great respect for Jhessail's superior magical powers, and she in turn is impressed by his mixture of abilities as a multi-classed character. The two cooperate in combat, each lending the other whatever assistance might prove most efficient, and each also looking to protect the other. After adventuring together for so long a time, the two make a very effective team.

Jhessail and Merith are an effective team in every other way. They are deeply in love, each willing to sacrifice anything and everything for the other, or their child, Veluthil.

Merith is sometimes saddened by the thought of outliving Jhessail; but in typical elven manner, he will not let it interfere with his appreciation of the joys of the present. And he is comforted by the thought of seeing Veluthil mature and become as beautiful and formidable as her mother.

Associating with humans, Merith's lifestyle is certainly different from that of the typical elf in the Elven Court, but he enjoys it; and though the People (the elves) have left the Elven Court for the safety of Evermeet, Merith remains with the Knights. He knows well that, with elven longevity, provided he is not slain, he can expect to devote many future centuries to other activities.

Besides the typical elven affinities for woodlands, animals, etc., Merith enjoys swimming a great deal and is interested in fine woodwork and carved adornment. At present, he only collects such items, but some time in the far future he might be interested enough to learn how to craft them.

Since the elves left the Elven Court, Merith has become increasingly reckless in battle. He particularly hates orcs, drow, and the Zhentarim. He dislikes dwarves, but in truth has had little contact with them.

Sylabra is Merith's favored weapon. It is a silver long sword +3 of Chaotic Good alignment, with Intelligence 14 and ego 6. It can detect invisible objects (1" radius), detect magic (1" radius), and glow with a silvery-blue radiance at the bearer's will.

In addition to a traveling spellbook containing the "spells commonly memorized," listed above, Merith has a book of 35 cantrips. This repertoire consists of the following:

Useful — Chill, clean, color, dampen, dry, dust, flavor, freshen, gather, shine, spice, sprout, stitch, sweeten, tie, warm, wrap.

Reversed — Dusty tangle, untie.

Person-affecting — Giggle, sneeze, wink, yawn.

Yet another native of Espar, Doust was born to Farflung Sulwood and his wife, Piirl. Doust's mother perished in childbirth. His father, a retired Cormyr-ian soldier, never remarried, nor even really recovered from the loss of his beloved, taking comfort chiefly in drink and, on rare occasion, in his son. Doust grew up lonely, afraid of a drunken father whom he never could seem to adequately please, and his awkwardness earned him the nickname, "Clumsy."

As soon as he was old enough to leave, Doust set off in search of adventure with the other youths of his age — Florin Falconhand, Semoor Wolfteeth, etc. Though he is by nature quiet and careful, Doust embraced the religion of Tymora, hoping that service to this goddess of luck and adventure would help him break out of a life of drifting inactivity. His first tutor in clerical ways was Transtor Asberil.

Doust soon distinguished himself as a solid fighter in the ranks of the Knights. Within two years of departing from Espar, he found himself named by his companions to be lord of Shadowdale, after Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun of Waterdeep offered the rulership to the party.

Soon thereafter, Doust married Islif Lurelake, his companion-in-arms. They have had one child, a son named Jhaok Sulwood (see Islif Lurelake's description, above).

Lord Doust Sulwood proved himself an effective, popular leader, in spite of the chaos that accompanied his reign, with troubles from Zhentil Keep, Lashan of Scardale, and the Cult of the Dragon resulting in the deaths of many of Doust's subjects. A lasting contribution to the Dale was the "lord's court," a weekly meeting where the dalefolk could speak openly about their grievances and views, and internal affairs could there be decided by the vote of the Council of Elders.

In the end, Doust relinquished his rulership to the cavalier Mourngrym Amcathra, also a Knight. It was difficult for Doust to reconcile the fickle demands of Lady Luck and still make responsible decisions to ensure the safety of the dalefolk. Since he did not wish to forsake his goddess, he gave up the dale rather than rule poorly.

Doust has settled in Arabel with his wife and son. There they live peacefully, and Doust is free to worship his deity at the local temple, unharried by the heavy burden of leadership. He particularly enjoys the freedom of leisure time with his wife and raising his son.

A fat, jolly cleric, Rathan is the closest friend of the thief, Torm; the two are an effective and amusing team in their adventures, each ribbing the other as much and as well as they cooperate.

Rathan is a heavy drinker, much enamored of his ubiquitous wine; this makes him the butt of many of Torm's jests. But the cleric is not really a buffoon, as the light-fingered friend understands; his "drunken sot" act hides his sensitive, romantic character. Without alcohol, Rathan fears his sensitive and prudent nature would win out; but as a priest of Tymora, he needs to favor luck and live in danger. So he steels himself with drink; and to be able to drink much, he eats like a starving wolf. This makes him rather obese, but permits him to drink a great deal without staggering and slurring his jests.

Born to a merchant family of shoemakers in Arabel on Kythorn 6, Year of the Thunder, Rathan was the child of Rathmur and Ulla Thentraver. From Rathmur, Rathan inherited his jovial, bluntly honest manner, while his plump, homely features can be traced to his mother. Both parents died of cholera before Rathan had come of age, and the boy found himself quickly inducted into the priesthood of Tymora, so that his greedy uncles could acquire all the family wealth.

Segril, Rathan's superior in Tymora's temple in Arabel, commanded the young priest to go out to "spread the Lady's favor (and influence) among adventurers, those active in strife, change, and perilous deeds in the multiverse." Many speculate that Segril just wanted to be rid of him.

The Dalelands were where Rathan found himself, and he joined the ranks of the Knights of Myth Drannor in Shadowdale. Among them, he has proven stout and fearless in combat; in one particularly fierce battle with mages of the Zhentarim, he won a ring of the ram.

Rathan is 6' tall, 232 pounds, and left-handed. He has brown hair, a stubby mustache, rivetting brown eyes, and large strong features (which earned him the nickname "Strongjaws" in his childhood).

A smooth-tongued trickster, Torm is consistently and lightheartedly insulting, obscene, and outrageous in his speech. He is the cockiest of all the Knights, remorselessly goading even his adventuring fellows to the brink of belting him; the women often do hit him, hard and accurately. His best friend, Rathan Thentraver, is the most common butt of Torm's jests and jibes.

The thief is carefree and daring, never resisting the chance to add a dash of bold, flashy daring to a venture. When once asked about his brazen attitude to adventuring, he responded, "The war cries and all? Well, if you're risking death, why not have fun? If I wanted to risk death without having fun, I'd be a tax collector, not a thief." On another occasion, a person demanded of him, "Have you no honor?" to which Torm lightly confessed, "Aye, indeed. I keep it at the bottom of my backpack and take it out to shine it up and look at it on windy nights in the wilderness, by the fire. It looks grand, I tell you. But it is poor company, and doesn't keep one warm."

Perhaps to keep himself warm, Torm has cut quite a swath through the ladies of Sembia, Hillsfar, and (surprisingly) Zhentil Keep. Torm's charm easily wins him many fair maidens — and sometimes angry fathers and brothers when he departs in pursuit of another adventure or another lass. (He currently steers clear of all three of those places.)

One romance in which Torm is now involved seems to be gaining unusual (for Torm) longevity, and this is with Illistyl Elventree, a fellow Knight of Myth Drannor: Torm continues to dally with other women, but finds a particular attraction for that young sorceress, and she has helped bring out a softer, kinder side of the rogue. Some Knights speculate that if he ever grows most of the way out of his "perpetual adolescence," the two might settle down in some sort of stable relationship.

Torm is handsome, of slim build, with green eyes, black hair, and a fine mustache. He likes to dress extravagantly; on special occasions he wears a pendant of a king's tear (an extremely rare gem, unique to the Realms) set in a web-like mesh of electrum.

Netha, a prostitute of Westgate, bore Torm; it is generally believed that Dathguld, a lord of that city, was his father. This noble lineage is the reason that the Night Masks (a band of thieves and assassins) have on several occasions tried to end Torm's life. They probably have been hired by Orgule, a rival lord; Torm therefore avoids Westgate in his travels. His favored alias, "Rathgar," is becoming far too well-known for safe, continued use.

In battle, the thief prefers to wield a long sword, and sometimes one of his daggers as well. (He always carries one in each boot.)

Torm has a particular fascination with magical devices. Besides those listed above among his possessions, the thief normally carries 1d4 minor items. The following table may be used to determine them specifically:

d%	Roll	Result
01		Any item
02		Beads of force (1d3)
03		Cyclocone
04		Dart of the hornets' nest
05		Deck of illusions
06-08		Dust, magical (appearance, disappearance, dryness, illusion, or tracelessness)
09		Eyes of minute seeing or Lens of detection
10		Fire gyregam (see FR4, THE MAGISTER, for details)
11		Keoghtom's ointment
12		Mist of rapture (see FR4, THE MAGISTER, for details)
13		Necklace of missiles (1d4 missiles)
14		Nolser's marvelous pigments
15-59		Potion (any type, consult UNEARTHED ARCANA tables)
60-62		Quaal's feather tokens
63-97		Scroll (protection or not more than four spells; consult UNEARTHED ARCANA tables)
98		Sheet of smallness
99		Sovereign glue
00		Ultimate solution

The DM is encouraged to expand this table with items from other sources (such as DRAGON® Magazine, and his own imagination). Appropriate items are those with limited charges and/or relatively minor effects; in any case, avoid anything with an XP value greater than 1,000. Torm particularly likes flashy items, and he has an interest in items with applications outside adventuring (e.g., a comb that grooms the user when its command word is spoken). The thief can rarely resist the chance to obtain a new item, by trade, trick, or theft.

(A special word of thanks must go to Ed Greenwood for providing reams of valuable notes on the Knights; also to be thanked are those players who first brought to life the personalities described above.)

The Company of Eight

The Company of Eight is an adventuring band of the country of Tethyr (see FR3, EMPIRES OF THE SANDS). Since its formation 13 years ago, the Company has risen in fame. The Company's efforts for justice in Tethyr's power vacuum have demonstrated that, even after the fall of the Tethyr kings, there may be the means and the will to achieve a political situation that is neither anarchy nor despotism. With perseverance and luck, the Company may also be instrumental in guaranteeing that Tethyr's next dynasty (if there is to be one) starts off on the path of righteousness, peace, and freedom.

When the Company was founded, it had eight members: Mirthal Aendryr (male elf magic-user/thief), Ralma Damond (human female fighter), Nestrun Farclutch (human male fighter), Chiaelin Frenel (female half-elf fighter/cleric), the brothers Alain and Tardeth Llanistaph (human male rangers), Thiel Ralmun (human male magic-user), and Kaleene Thalwood (human female druid). These people had all adventured together at one time or another, and they decided that they would do best to come together as an organized group. Some people — most notably Alain Llanistaph — believed right off that the Company ought to be devoted to a noble cause, like justice and peace in Tethyr; but initially, the group was, by and large, most devoted to the ideals of profit and adventure.

It was a tragedy that changed the Company's orientation from profit to its present tripartite goals of peace, freedom, and justice. Within the Company's first year its leader, Alain Llanistaph, was slain and could not be resurrected. (See the description of his brother, Tardeth, below, for more details.) This led the other companions to wonder: Was Alain's death really worthwhile? Was profit really worth the life of so noble a man? Especially one who really wasn't himself interested in the money? Alain usually made large donations to charity, and it was no secret that he had hoped the Company would grow to work for higher ideals than profit. Kaleene Thalwood became the Company's leader, and her suggestion that service take precedence over profit was accepted. The companions swore an oath to each other and their cause; and they pronounced the new eighth companion to be their guide and guardian, the Lady of Truth and Justice.

After this reorientation, the Company became involved in a number of small projects: driving away humanoids and other lesser monsters, miscellaneous small tasks to assist individuals in need, plus the staple caravan escort work on the Trade Way that earned it its living.

The first real measure of fame came to the Company 11 years ago. A green dragon, apparently from the eastern depths of the Forest of Tethir, was feasting on caravans that traveled the Trade Way. Then it was so bold as to assault and plunder a small village north of Mosstone. Fear swept the region: Merchants couldn't find guards or drovers willing to risk the Trade Way, villages called meetings and tried to muster defenses against the rampaging lizard. Even before the lord mayor of Mosstone's decree offering a rich prize for the dragon's head was issued, the fledgling Company of Eight had quickly risen to the challenge.

The Company did slay the dragon (and discovered Chiaelin's sword to be a green dragon slayer; it is now a possession of the halfling, Paddy), but at the bitter price of Kaleene Thalwood's life. The Company earned a great deal of respect, however; perhaps as much of it came from the immediate donation of the lord mayor's reward to charity as from the actual defeat of the dragon. The dragon's hoard also found good use: With it the Company constructed a headquarters in the forest, and named it Cayr Thalwood, in honor of their late companion (see below).

Since then, the Company of Eight's renown has continued to rise steadily — especially after the disintegration of all royal and much noble power in the Ten Black Days of Eleint a decade ago. With the disappearance of central government, the Company's leader, Tardeth, has recognized the group's purpose as being all the more vital. The Company has continued to drive off monsters and marauders (including another dragon), and in slow times, the companions still may be found guarding merchant caravans as they traverse the forest. But political matters have also attracted the Company's attention. On the small scale, oppressive lords have been pressured into easing the burdens on their subjects, releasing persons wrongly imprisoned, and so forth. The most famous political endeavors of the Company (which have given it the leverage to do things like pressure leaders) were the successful effort to secure peace after a bloodbath in northeastern Tethyr eight years ago (an aftershock of the kingdom's fall), and, most notably, the Company's central role in the organization and leadership of the forces that crushed the rule of the late tyrant of Ithmong four years ago.

The Company's current object of scrutiny is again Ithmong and its present ruler, Ernest Gallowglass, who seems determined to follow in his predecessor's totalitarian footsteps. Of course, Tardeth and his fellows do keep an eye on all Tethyr, as well as surrounding lands; but Gallowglass has been flexing Ithmong's economic muscles of late, and is said to be amassing an army, so he seems the biggest problem on the horizon. Though there is diversity of political views within the Company, all agree that tyranny under Gallowglass is entirely undesirable.

Changes have affected the Company over the years; only one of its seven current members, Tardeth Llanistaph, goes back to the Company's creation. Of the six characters who have been replaced over the years, three died and three retired. The retirees all remain on very good terms with the group, though contact is not very frequent.

Mirthal Aendryr (a Suldusk wood elf, fifth-level magic-user/seventh-level thief) departed only about a year ago and was replaced by Manny Arbustle, Arkaneus' druidic apprentice. Aendryr had wandered Faerun for a quarter century and then joined the Company, and simply wished to return to his people for a time. Besides attending to his own business, Aendryr takes care to maintain a sanctuary for the Company of Eight in the southeast of the forest.

Ralma and Nestrin Damond (human fighters of eighth and seventh level, respectively) settled down in Pailstone to marry and start a family. They now have three children: son Tardeth (age 5), daughters Kaleene (2 1/2) and Arkanea (1). After Ralma and Nestrin left six years ago, Marilyn Haresdown and Sylvanus Moondrop took their places in the Company. The young family still helps the Company by maintaining a sanctuary in the northeast arm of the Forest of Tethir, and by paying careful attention to all news and political developments in the country's northeastern region.

A list of the present members of the Company of Eight, in order of seniority, is as follows: Tardeth Llanistaph, Arkaneus Silvermane (human male druid), Marilyn Haresdown (human female fighter), Sylvanus Moondrop (elf male fighter), Lawantha Silendia (human female magic-user), Paddy Stoutfellow (halfling male fighter/thief), and Manfred "Manny" Arbustle (human male druid).

Tardeth is recognized as spokesman of the group, and leader — the latter only to a certain extent, since any decision of significance is made by the vote of all the companions, but Tardeth's seniority and dedication gives his opinion much weight.

Friends and foes: Over the years, the Company has acquired quite a number of useful allies and at least as many enemies. Six brief examples follow; it is by no means a comprehensive selection, and the complete list is, of course, always changing. It should give the DM some ideas, though, of what resources the Company may have and what difficulties might appear in the future.

First some friends: Jordy Gallum (eighth-level human male fighter) is the chief of the constabulary of Mosstone. Almost everyone in that town holds the Company of Eight in high regard. What makes Jordy special is that he is a longtime friend of Tardeth; and, as an officer in the army of Tethyr, he was a comrade of Marilyn Haresdown years ago.

Tethirmin (13th-level half-elf druid) is the arch-druid of Mosstone, and an extremely powerful and influential figure in the area. It was he who tutored Arkaneus Silvermane decades ago, and the two remain close. Rumor has it that Arkaneus is to succeed Tethirmin if that druid ascends to a higher position, retires, or otherwise vacates his post. How this would affect the status of Arkaneus in the Company — if he would accept the position at all — is a matter of intense speculation in local druidic circles.

Garlokantha (small, sub-adult, female gold dragon) dwells in the east-central Forest of Tethir. The Company of Eight saved her from a band of evil adventurers three years ago. She would happily repay the Company with any favor she could grant.

And then some foes: Argrum Black-spear (ninth-level half-orc male fighter/10th-level thief) is a bandit chieftain operating along the Trade Way with a keen skill for organization. His own raiders have become the most successful — in part by learning early on that the Company of Eight is to be avoided. He wishes to form an alliance of the most powerful bandit groups; of course, such an organization would surely attract the Company's attention, and rumors of it are spreading already. That is fine with Argrum, because a second goal of his is to trap and eliminate the Company and thus make banditry easier for all.

Tleobar (10th-level female drow fighter/fifth-level magic-user) encountered the Company of Eight three years ago in the Forest of Tethir, when, with some companions, she was attempting to slay and rob a gold dragon, Garlokantha. Tleobar, unlike her compatriots, escaped and survived. She holds quite a grudge against the Company — especially when she realized that the elf, Sylvanus Moondrop, was the same one who had led a daring and successful assault on her home in the Forest of Mir 15 years earlier. The Company is totally unaware of Tleobar and her thirst for revenge.

level human male fighter) is a petty lordling who has often offended the Company's sense of justice and has been pressured into change. More than anything, this has wounded his pride. He therefore plots to make the lives of the companions miserable (especially those of Tardeth and Marilyn) in any way he can. Vain Lord Lylburg has even considered hiring an assassin, but hasn't quite mustered the boldness to do so.

Cayr Thalwood is the name given to the primary base of the Company of Eight, located about 30 miles southeast of Mosstone in the Forest of Tethir. It is named after the druidess Kaleene Thalwood, an original member of the company, who was killed by the green dragon 11 years ago.

Besides the main outpost near Mosstone, the Company maintains a dozen small sanctuaries, scattered through the forest. They are small, concealed locations (caves, hidden tree forts, camouflaged huts in dense portions of the wood, etc.), convenient for shelter and respite. In each is a cache of food and weapons and some dry blankets, and materials for minor repairs (needles, cloth, bowstrings, etc.), and supplies of bandages and dried healing herbs for treating wounds, poison, and illness.

As was mentioned above, the one in the southeast is maintained by the Suldusk elf Aendryr, and the one in the northeast by Nestrin and Ralma Damond. A few of other sanctuaries far from the main base (the pair on the peninsula, for example) are stocked and kept in order by friendly elf tribes (who also use them when necessary); otherwise, the company members must themselves periodically check their upkeep.

Magical items and equipment: Leather armor, quarterstaff, four throwing daggers, sling, 20 sling bullets, light war horse (AC 7, MV 24") hp 6), saddle and tack, large sack, one week's provisions, water skin, bowls, two small boxes of mistletoe, holly, etc.

Manfred Arbustle is a young fellow, who looks even younger with his boyish freckles. His hair is sandy brown, his eyes blue, and he likes best to wear olive or brown hooded robes over his leather armor. His weapon of choice, a quarterstaff that also serves as walking staff, is hardly more than an uncured sapling — appropriately reflecting Manfred's status, perhaps.

This druid joined the Company only about a year ago, replacing the retiring elven mage/thief, Mirthal Aendryr. Manfred is Arkaneus Silvermane's apprentice; he was adopted into the Company of Eight chiefly on account of his mentor's words of praise. He shows a lot of promise and eagerness, but has yet to decisively prove himself.

Manfred's position in the Company of Eight is, from his perspective, uncomfortable. Manfred is quite insecure; he hasn't quite found a niche for himself among the Company members. He does not wish to be simply Silvermane's apprentice, nor does he enjoy feeling like a junior member, almost a child, on account of his relative lack of experience. This is why the diminutive nickname, "Manny," which everyone uses, grates on him so much. It makes him feel like he's on the level of the children who tag along after the Company whenever they pass through a village.

In his desire to prove himself, Manny is wont to be overeager, experimental, even reckless at times. But still, he is all too aware of his inadequacies; while he could hold his own against a few humanoids, he does not nearly approach the skill level of any other Company member. Being suspended between his eagerness and his insecurities causes Manfred sometimes to act sullen or rebellious. It is tragic that sometime, faced with an important task, his eagerness, or even his sense of duty, may succumb to a poor self-image.

Manfred is, naturally, very close to his mentor, Arkaneus. He is devotedly loyal to the older druid, and trusts him absolutely, though he may act as if this were not the case, for the sake of proving to himself that he is more than Silvermane's shadow. Manny also thinks highly of the elf, Sylvanus, and hopes to become better friends with him; he is a great admirer of elvenkind for their ability to coexist with nature.

He gets along well with most of the rest of the party, though they do make him a little bit uncomfortable (especially the seemingly invincible Tardeth).

The one person Manfred trusts least of all is the "Calishite witch," Lawantha. His family in Velen imbued him with a prejudice against foreigners, especially Calishites; his father as a youth was captured by pirates and sold into slavery in Calimshan. Besides of this automatic distrust, Manny thinks Lawantha is arrogant, condescending, and very artificial. Unfortunately, he also finds her very attractive, and he is jealous of the fact that she has studied the flora of his home peninsula even more than he.

Manfred became a druid on account of his great love of nature; this love sustains him throughout the trials and tribulations of proving himself. Whenever he feels stressed, he finds great relief by going alone into the forest to be with nature, absorbing himself in fascination with its countless wonders.

ADVENTURING BROTHERHOODS

Magical items and equipment:

Scale mail +3, large shield +3, dancing broad sword +3, potion of extra healing, ring of swimming, broad sword, composite short bow, two quivers, 30 arrows, 10 silver-tipped arrows, battle-ax, dagger, light war horse (AC 7, MV 24", hp 9), saddle and tack, saddlebags, three large sacks, two weeks' rations, two water skins, three torches, lantern, tent, bedroll.

Of noble blood, Marilyn Haresdown was originally destined to be a lady-in-waiting in Castle Tethyr. She was much more interested in horses, archery, and swordplay than courtly matters and husband-seeking, however. Against her family's desires, she ended up with an officer's commission in the army of Tethyr rather than a noble's wedding band. She was a successful leader, well respected, and a skilled fighter. After a couple of years, she married a fellow officer, Dorian Haresdown.

Unfortunately, not long thereafter, came the fall of Castle Tethyr. Marilyn managed to escape the carnage; her husband, Dorian, was not so fortunate. As she fled to the northeast, Marilyn found little comfort in the knowledge that her love had died loyally defending his king.

For about three years, Marilyn adventured in the region of Cormyr and Sembia, and even visited Shadowdale. There she made the acquaintance of Elminster and his scribe, Lhaeo, and she related to them the tale of what had befallen the kingdom of Tethyr. They also discussed what might be the present state and the future of the country.

This conversation was a turning point for Marilyn. Afterward, she was determined to return to her homeland, there to attempt to right the wrongs of treachery in the last dynasty. She found that Tethyr had calmed quite a bit from the "Ten Black Days of Eleint," when she had left; still, there was much chaos. Six years ago, she quite readily joined the Company of Eight, to which she was introduced by a former fellow officer, Jordy Gallum of Mosstone, a friend of Tardeth Llanistaph.

Marilyn's overriding concern is the restructuring of Tethyr — which is only understandable, since the dissolution of the old dynasty claimed the lives of most of her relatives, friends, and comrades-in-arms. She is almost certainly the person in the Company of Eight most devoted to the reunification of Tethyr. What she would like to see is a new dynasty — hopefully with blood ties to the old, for legitimacy. The Company, she believes, must serve to facilitate the establishment of a new, single, just government over Tethyr.

Of course, not everyone in the company agrees with her; Sylvanus Moon-drop has the most different political views, and the two often are at odds. Fortunately, all members agree that the group's cohesiveness and cooperation are paramount, and they are willing to restrain their own wishes and political convictions before the decisions are reached by the whole party. (Naturally this doesn't preclude a great deal of heated debate.)

Blonde, green-eyed Marilyn is a very active, energetic character. She is still very fond of horse riding and archery, and she likes to fashion her own bows and arrows, with greatest care and expertise.

Her closest friend in the Company is Lawantha, the Calishite sorceress. They share, among other things, a great interest in medicinal herbs. Often the two take long walks together, talking and collecting plants. Marilyn prefers the open plains of southern Tethyr to the forest where the Company is based, but she has come to appreciate the forest more and more through what she has learned from the other Company members.

Tall, broad-shouldered, handsome Tardeth appears the archetypical mighty hero, and many people would regard him as such. He is indeed powerful, honorable, and just, but not without flaws.

Of the eight original members of the Company, only Tardeth remains. This is a result both of his devotion to the causes the Company espouses and of the fact that the Company runs quite smoothly under the ranger's implicit leadership. These two points are widely recognized, but in addition, Tardeth has a very personal reason for his total devotion to the Company and its endeavors.

This personal reason is wrapped up in the identity and fate of the mysterious "eighth companion." One can't help but notice that the famed Company of Eight has but seven members. Tardeth will quickly explain that this is a bit of superstition: seven is a lucky number, and the eighth spot is kept for "The Lady of Truth and Justice," who symbolizes the whole point of the Company's existence (as Tardeth sees it).

While that isn't untrue, it fails to convey the whole story. At its inception, the Company did have eight members. Tardeth's older brother, Alain Llanistaph, was the man who really gathered together the group in the first place. He believed that the Company needed to be more than a fraternity of monster-bashers; it needed to take a role in shaping the future of Tethyr and caring for its people's welfare.

Tragically, Alain was the first member of the Company to die, and barely a year after the group's creation. Equally tragic, it was not a necessary death, nor was it even directly for Tethyr's welfare; in fact, Alain was killed while trying to undo mistakes made by his young and (at the time) somewhat careless brother, Tardeth. Three beings witnessed the death and understood the blame that was Tardeth's: Tardeth himself, Alain's intelligent sword (see below), and the late half-elven druidess, Kaleene Thalwood.

Kaleene ascended to leadership of the Company. She didn't deepen Tardeth's wound by explaining the situation to the rest of the Company, but she did support Tardeth's wish that Alain not be replaced in the Company's ranks.

The druidess met her own end hardly a year later, and the ranks were replenished by the addition of the druid, Arkaneus Silvermane. Tardeth became the Company leader, and has been ever since.

The empty eighth spot serves as a constant reminder to Tardeth of his own faults and weaknesses, and the gravity of his mission. He has almost single-mindedly devoted himself to his brother's ideals, as if doing so could change the fact of Alain's senseless death; at the least, Tardeth can find comfort in trying to do for Tethyr what Alain would have done (though, he fears, Alain would have done it better).

The whole issue remains a major psychological scar and weakness for Tardeth. There is no living person with whom Tardeth discusses the matter. The only way he eases his conscience is to devote himself more and more to Alain's goals.

Someone who pries too closely into the identity of the eighth companion could soon alienate Tardeth; the same would befall someone inquiring much about the ranger's family. He says only that he had a brother, but no one of his immediate family still lives. The Company is his family now.

Also, Tardeth is unusually possessive of his sword (formerly Alain's), which he calls "The Scales of Justice." This intelligent blade, a long sword +3 (Neutral Good, INT 15, Ego 8, detect traps, magic; heals once/day; speaks Neutral Good and Common), belonged to Alain, and witnessed his death. The man and sword understand each other well. Once, long ago, Tardeth became mentally unstable as a result of difficulty in dealing with guilt over his brother's death. Fortunately, "Scales" recognized what was happening, and took control of his possessor. It prevented a major catastrophe for the Company. Since then, Tardeth has come to rely on Scales as a sort of security blanket should such an event again occur.

None of the current members of the Company know the true history of the eighth member. Arkaneus Silvermane knew of Alain, and suspects that he once was in the company. He has hypothesized to himself that Tardeth had something to do with Alain's no longer being with the Company, but is tactful enough never to have brought up the issue.

Tardeth normally wears leather and a ring of protection +3; if he expects to engage in combat, he dons his suit of chain mail +4. He is proficient and comfortable with a number of weapons (note especially his longbow and magic arrows), but always prefers to use Scales.

The ranger is affable and optimistic (but not overly so, belying the internal doubts and turmoil that he has almost even hidden from himself. In maintaining the group, he has always sought a balance of regions, races, and temperaments as well as skills among the companions.

Tardeth is on good terms with everyone in the group. He sees much potential in Manny, whom he thinks may lead the "next generation" of the Company; Lawantha and Arkaneus have taught him magical spells and druidic lore, respectively, and so forth.

Politically unlike Marilyn, Tardeth does not see himself so much as a builder; but neither does he adopt Moon-drop's vision of Tethyr politics. Tardeth is more certain of what he doesn't want — namely, tyrants such as Ernest Gallowglass of Ithmong. If a decent monarchy could be set up, Tardeth would lend it his support; but in the meantime, he thinks he is more than busy fighting injustice and trying to keep Tethyr from slipping into total chaos.

Sylvanus Moondrop, a wood elf of the Elmanesse tribe, has been a member of the Company of Eight for six years. Prior to joining, he adventured in Tethyr and some of northern Calimshan. In Tethyr, he is most familiar with the central and southern portions of the Forest of Tethir, and the Trade Way. In Calimshan, Sylvanus twice braved the Forest of Mir in assaults on drow holdings.

Moondrop is not unusual in appearance, among wood elves of the Realms. He is tall and slender, and his copper hair frames a long, smooth-skinned face, also of copper hue; the shadows in his face and hair seem to have a green tint, but perhaps that is only from the startling verdance of his eyes.

Sylvanus is unusually gregarious for a wood elf. He enjoys meeting people of all backgrounds, and he is delighted by the diversity he finds in the world. He enjoys Paddy's company best of those in the Company, and loves to plot jokes with the halfling.

Though ambivalent on most issues, Moondrop is unusually vocal and unyielding on the the question of Tethyr's political future. He does not wish to see a reunited Tethyr, under the rule of Ithmong or any other city. Rather, he desires a balance of city-states in a weak alliance. The "city-states" would include the human cities and the non-human lands — specifically, the elven Elmanesse tribe of the Forest of Tethir, and the halflings of the Purple Hills. These states would not only cooperate to mutual advantage, but would serve to check and balance each others' power. The duty of the Company of Eight, according to the elf, is to see that the balance is maintained, by keeping tabs on goings-on and taking action when necessary (as may be the case with Ernest Gallowglass of Ithmong), without too much interference in each city-state's business.

Archery is one of Moondrop's favorite activities, and this actually helps the group get along. Though he vehemently disagrees with Marilyn Haresdown in the political arena, and neither is willing to compromise his or her views (their "discussions" too often too quickly become shouting contests), Sylvanus does deeply respect her talent in fashioning bows and arrows; and she, in turn, respects his skill in their use.

When not involved in Company matters, Sylvanus can often be found traveling the forest, especially along the Trade Way. There, he and elven friends, and sometimes Paddy Stoutfellow, make sport by playing vigilantes and driving away bandits who try to harass travelers. This has done much to increase Moondrop's personal renown, as well as, indirectly, that of the Company of Eight.

Lawantha is a Calishite sorceress who has been with the Company of Eight for four years. Her predecessor, one Thiel Ralmun, was also a Calishite mage — her cousin, in fact. He was slain when the Company was leading the overthrow of the former tyrant of Ithmong. Lawantha came to Tethyr to recover her cousin's body and bring it home to Calimport for burial. The Company escorted her on this journey, and on the way, they faced numerous perils. Lawantha was impressed by the Company's skill, spirit and cohesiveness; and the company members, looking for an addition to their ranks, were impressed by the Calishite sorceress's prowess and loyalty to her family. After Thiel Ralmun's proper burial, Lawantha was invited to take his place, and she accepted.

Lawantha has proven herself with the group. Tardeth and Marilyn have become closest to her and understand her best; but the sorceress is sometimes a source of tension for other group members, particularly the young and somewhat xenophobic druid, Manny. There is some feeling that Silendia is a mercenary foreigner, not at all personally devoted to the cause of Tethyr's welfare. It is true, Lawantha is somewhat distanced by her nationality, but she is fiercely loyal to the group. She recognizes any matter of importance to the group — be it Tethyr's welfare or anything else — as being, by association, of importance to her, even if she may personally be somewhat disinterested. It is regrettable that, in a typical Calishite manner, she usually fails to hide such disinterest.

Fortunately, most members of the group have come to understand this woman, to recognize her basic benevolence and loyalty. The person who understands her least is Manfred Arbustle, the Company's youngest and newest member. Manfred often thinks of Lawantha as an arrogant, condescending foreigner who must only be in the Company to show off her talent for magic, if not for some unknown, sinister end. Lawantha is unaware of Manfred's hostility (tinged, as is typical of such feelings, with a smattering of jealousy), and unaware that her frequent use of his nickname, "Manny," which seems to her a gesture of camaraderie, only makes her appear all the more condescending in his eyes.

Before she joined the Company, Lawantha had traveled and adventured far and wide, but most intensively in her native Calimshan. The Spider Swamp's secrets have particularly intrigued her, especially its botany: A number of useful herbs and fungi are apparently unique to that region of Faerun. Should contacts in the area ever be necessary, Lawantha has good friends living in both Almraiven and Volothamp. (Also, it may be noted, she comes from a large family of merchants that has scattered across Calimshan in pursuit of business; she could probably find a close relative in any major Calishite city.)

Tethyr was also a place in which Lawantha had traveled; in fact, she had met most members of the Company when visiting her late cousin, Thiel Ralmun. Her explorations in Tethyr focused especially on the peninsula forest, where the many varieties of fungi and their related slimes and molds attracted her scholarly interest. The same interest in fungi frequently brings Lawantha to Brost's "mushroom country," to the north of the Forest of Tethir.

As a naturalist, Lawantha is most interested in all sorts of fungi and medicinal herbs; she is very knowledgeable in the identification and uses of both. She also has experience with the dogs of Brost that are trained to sniff out particular mushrooms.

The oldest human among the companions, Arkaneus also has seniority in the group second only to that of Tardeth. As a full druid of 12th level, he is also one of the most formidable characters in this group of adventurers. In spite of this, the aged druid takes a surprisingly low-key role; he sits back quietly as the fireworks fly between Marilyn and Sylvanus, for example, rarely intervening, and then subtly coaxing the two into a compromise.

Patient Arkaneus takes this approach to all of life. Nature always works itself out, he believes; his role as a druid is to see that it is allowed to do so.

As a druid of name level, Silvermane has three lesser druids as attendants, all of them initiates of the First Circle. Two of them, Leisha and Thastrun, are a married couple. They do not adventure at all; instead, they are devoted to the care of Cayr Thalwood and the surrounding woods.

The third attendant might be more suitably termed an apprentice. This is Manfred Arbustle, who has himself become a member of the Company of Eight. Arkaneus has a great deal of faith in and hope for his young apprentice — probably more than Manny has for himself. But Arkaneus realizes this as well, and believes that Manny will in fact have to prove to himself what he can make of his life.

Many human issues — say, politics — receive a sort of ambivalence from Arkaneus; or at least he isn't devoted fanatically to single points of view (except of course the protection of nature; but even here he is more willing than most of his profession to tolerate short-term abuse, believing it all balances out). He is a cool, rational decision-maker, without emotional attachment to many issues. For this reason, Tardeth relies heavily upon him for advice and wise guidance.

Arkaneus is quite devoted to the Company (were he not, he hardly would have given it 11 years of his life). He does not have the personal, passionate devotion of Tardeth or Marilyn; nor is he as flippant as Paddy. The druid believes that chaos in Tethyr would be as bad as a rigid system of law; therefore, his service to the Company of Eight is in effect service to balance and true neutrality in Tethyr's present, near-anarchic state. Besides this "ideological" reason, Arkaneus feels that the Company's devotion to justice is noble and worthy, and he appreciates the good the Company has done for the Forest of Tethir (counteracting rampaging monsters, bandits, etc.). And, finally, he feels deep bonds with the others in the group as friends.

Another close associate of Arkaneus, outside the Company, is the half-elf Tethirmin, arch-druid of Mosstone, who was the human druid's mentor so many decades ago. Tethirmin has made it clear that Arkaneus could be his successor, but Arkaneus would be hesitant to become arch-druid, in spite of the power and prestige it entails. With its advantages would come many obligations, and these would be hard to reconcile with continued service in the Company of Eight.

Arkaneus' real wish for the future is to see Manny rise and eventually be able to take his mentor's place as druid, allowing Arkaneus to retire — to be full-time caretaker of Cayr Thalwood, to live as a hermit elsewhere in the Forest of Tethir, or perhaps to go and serve the great druid.

Black-haired, bushy-sideburned Paddy Stoutfellow is the clown of the Company of Eight. Besides being a valuable member in himself, his irreverent sense of humor serves a very important function in helping the party coexist smoothly and putting matters in perspective. And being annoyed by Paddy's friendly mockery can take one's mind off more serious worries, a most welcome break.

Paddy likes everyone in the group, but they're almost always too serious. He never misses a chance to point this out teasingly. Tardeth is too busy and worried about the welfare of the Company and Tethyr; Manny is too self-conscious; Marilyn is obsessed with the reestablishment of a kingdom over Tethyr; Lawantha appears stuffy on account of her Calishite manners and mannerisms. Arkaneus is pretty decent, but a little old and wrapped up in religion. Paddy gets along best with Sylvanus (though this does not spare the elf any ribbing); they are the two non-humans in the group, and both have very different perspectives on all the matters with which the humans are obsessed.

Though Paddy is very cheerful, light-hearted, and incessantly making sport of his companions and their worries, he is an uncompromisingly loyal group member. This is not out of devotion to any particular cause, or some vague ideal of loyalty and honor, but simply because the members of the Company are his friends. And, all lightheartedness aside, friends are what Paddy values most, and he stands by them.

More than anyone else in the group, Paddy is here for adventure. He joined just over two years ago, hoping that he'd find thrills and excitement, stories to share with his grandchildren back in the Purple Hills a few decades down the line.

Paddy has never been particularly involved in politics; he is not sure whether a reunited kingdom, like Marilyn wants, or something more like a confederation, as Moondrop envisions, would best suit Tethyr. The Purple Hills halflings will probably go along with whatever emerges, if it promises greater stability, security, and prosperity. These three things are Paddy's long-term goals as well; as to how to reach them, he's still undecided.

Stoutfellow is fond of drinking and games of chance, but rarely to excess. Thieving is his favorite game of chance, but here, too, he is careful. He is not greedy, just thrill-seeking. He would much prefer to attempt a difficult job for an almost worthless item — say, to steal the handkerchief of the Meisarch of Amn — over an easy burglary with great profit. And he is always more than happy to use (and show off) his talents for the party's benefit.

Hall of Heroes

The FORGOTTEN REALMS™ fantasy world has been the site of many great adventures and home to countless valiant heroes and infamous villains. Many a tale of derring-do has been recounted in novels like the Moonshae trilogy by Douglas Niles, The Crystal Shard by R. A. Salvatore, Azure Bonds by Kate Novak and Jeff Grubb, and Spellfire by Ed Greenwood (creator of the FORGOTTEN REALMS fantasy world).

Until now, the characters from these FORGOTTEN REALMS novels have been unavailable to AD&D® game players. But no longer.

Hall of Heroes provides complete histories and AD&D game statistics for such beloved characters as Elminster, the greatest sage and magic user of the Realms, Tristan Kendrick and Robyn of the Moonshae isles, Wulfgar the Barbarian, Drizzt the dark elf, and Bruenor the dwarf, all from the northern reaches, plus Alias and Dragonbait, Shandril and Narm Tamaraiith, and many more.

But the Hall of Heroes is more than a listing of game statistics: It's also a sourcebook describing (among other things) artificial and magical lifeforms of the Realms, as well as the lives of the world's elves, dwarves, lizardmen, and exotic creatures.

Whatever your interest in the FORGOTTEN REALMS campaign setting, you'll find much to entertain and intrigue you in this volume.

INTRODUCTION

Welcome to Cities of Mystery, a product designed to help you, the Dungeon Master, create colorful, exciting cities for your campaign—taking the mystery out of creating and using city environments in a fantasy role-playing game. With the aid of the building fold-ups included in this product, cities will come to life before your players' eyes.

Although the text of this book contains terms and specifics that pertain to the D&D® game, the AD&D® game, and the AD&D 2nd Edition game, the facts and principles can be used in conjunction with any fantasy role-playing game. A city—no matter what game system the city is located in.

Well-developed cities are an important part of every good campaign, because player characters must visit cities throughout their adventuring careers. Cities are ideal places for PCs to purchase equipment and to rest between adventures. Unfortunately, that is all cities are to many players, because their DMs concentrate on developing dungeons and wilderness scenarios to tax the abilities of the players' characters. But cities can be much more than waysides and watering holes. They are places teeming with life, and they hold as much mystery and adventure as the deepest, darkest dungeons.

Some of the chapters in Cities of Mystery begin with boxed text. These are designed to be entertaining and to help you get a better feel for some of the characters who might populate your fantasy cities. The characters in these boxed sections are Athormis, a mage, and Boliver, a dwarf. They are adventurers who have visited many cities and consider themselves experts. If you wish, you can develop statistics for these personalities and add them to your city campaigns.

Laying The Foundation

Cities of Mystery will teach you how to create vibrant cities that will become essential parts of your campaign. You will learn how to place cities on your campaign map, paying attention to geographic features and climate. You will find out how to determine the size of a city. In addition, an extensive list of merchants and shopkeepers is presented to help add life to your cities' business districts. And encounter charts will help you keep the action moving.

You also will be given an overview of various forms of governments which you can establish in your cities. A city can be nearly useless without a government; taking time to select a government for each city the PCs visit is worth the effort. In addition, you will learn how to create rulers and give them personalities that will affect how the city is run.

Other aspects that are covered include establishing city defenses; creating histories for cities; setting up celebrations and special events; determining the races that live there; deciding what a city's buildings are made of; and establishing neighborhoods for the various factions within a community. In addition, a tax system can be implemented, and a list of crimes and penalties can be set up. All of these aspects of city life need to be considered when constructing communities for your player characters' enjoyment.

Cities of Mystery will help you get player characters closely involved in your cities by putting them to work as merchants, guards, or in other professions, or by giving them roles in the government or defense of a city.

Sauter and The Adventures

In addition to all of the guidelines outlined above, Cities of Mystery contains a sample city, Sauter, which was created using the information presented in the product. Sauter can be used as a sample you can study when creating your own cities, or it can be more fully developed and added to your campaign.

Five complete city adventures are included with this product. Although they are written based on the AD&D game and the AD&D 2nd Edition game, with a little adjusting they can be used with nearly any fantasy game system. The adventures are for characters of a variety of levels, and there is room for you to expand the adventures based on the businesses and characters in your own cities.

Following the adventures is a page filled with adventure plots just waiting to be fleshed out for the pleasure of you and your players.

The stars of Cities of Mystery are the street layouts and building fold-ups that can be assembled to add a new dimension of gaming to city adventures. The buildings are easy to put together; the directions are on the back of the building diagrams. More than 30 buildings can be created from this packet. The buildings can be arranged many different ways on the street layouts, and many of the one-story buildings can be stacked to create multistory buildings or towers. The buildings are made to scale for 25mm miniatures and are sturdy enough to support miniatures on their upper stories and roofs. The buildings can be folded flat for easy storage and can be kept in the Cities of Mystery box and taken to game sessions. And the buildings and streets in this product can be added to; future accessories for the AD&D game, the D&D game, and the AD&D Oriental Adventures game will contain more buildings and streets that can be merged with the set in Cities of Mystery.

City encounters are more fun with the fold-ups. As DM, you can set up city blocks in advance of a gaming session, concealing monsters and characters under various buildings. As player characters explore the city or move through a preset adventure, they go from building to building. You lift up the buildings they enter to show the occupants. There won't be any arguing about where player characters and their adversaries are standing, because the fold-ups and miniatures detail the placements. More directions for using the fold-ups and the street layouts are presented throughout this product.

Getting Started

In planning the cities for your fantasy campaigns, you have all of history—and your imagination—to draw from. You might choose to pattern your cities after real ones of the present or the past. Cities have existed nearly as long as people, beginning when groups of cavemen, hunters, and foragers banded together to protect themselves from other tribes. Cities are responsible for the rise of commerce and industry, and they are also credited with advancing the arts, literature, and education. And cities will be attractive in your campaign as long as you keep them interesting and exciting for your players.

WHERE TO LOCATE CITIES

The dwarf tucked his long gray beard into his belt, looked up at his human friend, and sighed.

"We've been on the road too long, Athormis. It's time to spend some of our wealth in a city; dine on fine meals, ride on a riverboat, spend a few evenings in a tavern. Maybe there'll be a festival. And that city looks as good as any other," the dwarf said, pointing toward Sauter, a bustling city located at the juncture of a river and the sea.

"Ah, Boliver," the human mage replied. "Yes, I think you're right. A week away from adventuring would do us both some good. I'm getting too old to spend every night sleeping in the woods. Besides, I'm in need of some spell components. And I'm sure you're in need of some ale."

The pair walked toward the city, their backpacks full of treasure from their last adventure and happily weighing them down.

"I like river cities," Boliver mused. "Those kinds of cities have plenty of taverns and a good number of adventurers passing through. Barge captains and sailors always seem loaded with rumors of treasure to be gained and castles to explore. After a week or so here we'll be ready to pursue one of those rumors. And maybe after that we can travel up to a mountain village. We haven't been to the mountains in a while."

The first step in creating interesting cities for your campaign is deciding where to place them. It is not good enough to unfold your campaign map and make marks at random to represent cities. While it might look nice to have cities evenly spaced three to four inches apart on a map, that sort of placement might not be realistic or practical. The better judgment you use in locating your cities, the more enjoyment and satisfaction you and your players will get out of them.

Communities are established in certain locations for certain purposes, and a community grows to the size of a village, town, or city for a reason. For example, a lake-shore settlement of fishermen might eventually grow into a town that becomes involved in exporting fish to other communities. A seacoast village that boasts a deep harbor could grow into a major trading city because it has the best harbor within hundreds of miles. Or a mining community that began with a half-dozen dwarves could develop into a town of a few thousand people who have a dozen different livelihoods, but who ultimately are supported because of the presence of the mine.

If your campaign map is one that came with a fantasy game product, it probably already has several cities on it. Of course, you can always add more—as long as where you put them (and why you locate them there) makes sense.

If your campaign map is one you have created, look at the terrain features you have devised and compare them with terrain features and cities in an atlas. Study the features on a map, and you will be able to reason out why a town or city comes into being in a certain location. This knowledge will help you to place cities in realistic locations on your campaign map.

Lakes: Cities located along lakes frequently rely on fishing and hunting as their prime industries or livelihoods. In addition, lakes provide a source of fresh water, which is a necessity to all communities. Some lake-shore cities are involved in farming, drawing water from the lake to the crops. And some become involved in forestry because of the profusion of trees which usually grow near lakes. If the lake is large enough, or serves as a source for a river, it can be used as a transportation route and will allow cities located on the lake to more easily engage in trade with other cities.

Seacoasts: Many large cities are found along seacoasts because of the opportunities the coast provides the populace. The coast is a source of industries, such as fishing and shipping. A city located along a portion of coast that affords a deep harbor can develop a shipbuilding industry and become a vital trading port, developing a myriad of industries and growing in population. A tourist industry can develop, since ship passengers and crewmen must do something with their time between journeys. Many coastal cities are also on rivers, which provides an avenue for transporting goods inland.

Rivers: For many of the same reasons given above for lakes and seacoasts, cities develop along rivers. Rivers provide a fishing industry and are a source of transportation for taking goods to other communities. Grain mills and lumber mills can develop, powered by the river.

Plains: Many farming communities begin in areas of relatively flat, fertile ground. These communities are usually smaller than those found along waterways. They are often close-knit, with the populace having common concerns and goals. Other cities rely on these communities to sell them foodstuffs. In addition, sometimes towns will develop in plains areas because the location is a good stopping point on a trade or travel route between two larger cities. These “in-between” towns have a variety of industries or livelihoods, frequently providing goods which are picked up by merchants traveling between larger cities.

Mountains: Farming communities that concentrate on herd animals such as goats and sheep, and communities built around hunting and forestry, can be found in mountainous areas. Other industries such as fishing (from mountain streams) and textile manufacturing (from goat hair and wool) also thrive in mountain towns. In addition, some mountain “boom towns” can be found next to copper, silver, or gold mines. These towns could be filled with a mix of peoples and industries all dependent on the success of the mines.

Forests: Hunting and forestry industries are among the prime reasons communities develop in wooded areas. Like plains towns, these towns are often small and close-knit, and many of these towns also will be located along a river or lake.

Deserts: Towns in these arid places are few. Most of them develop around an oasis and must rely on trade from other cities to support them. However, towns in desert climates can develop industries, such as herding or selling animals native to the land—camels, birds, and reptiles. In addition, some of these towns could have developed because they were stopping points between larger cities.

Combination: Many cities will exist where more than one of the above geographic features are present. In any combination, water is almost always one of the elements. For example, a village of hunters nestled deep in the woods might be a short distance from a river. Or a town that developed because it was a convenient stop between two large cities could be near a small lake.

The Fantastic: Since the AD&D® game, D&D® game, and other fantasy role-playing games are filled with wondrous and fantastic things, cities in those worlds can be located in unusual, “unrealistic” spots. For example, a city populated by sages might thrive on a cold, lonely mountain peak; an isolated group of people could have built a stunning city with golden spires in the middle of a dormant volcano; a village built on stilts over a mist-covered bog could serve as the home for an austere and warlike band of fighters.

In a fantastic universe, not all of the standard “rules” need apply. If the residents of a town have some magical means of obtaining water, it wouldn’t be necessary for their community to be located near a lake or river. If they can likewise create food magically, then their community could be located in a barren, isolated spot (such as the city of sages described above) far away from any fertile land or trade routes.

However, even in a world where magic exists; it is important that fantastic cities be limited in number. If they are the norm instead of the exception, they will not be unusual and distinctive to your players, and their excitement and interest level will drop off. In order for the fantastic to be seen as fantastic, you must use such devices sparingly.

Even a fantastic city must have a reason for being located where it is. Perhaps the city filled with sages came into being on that mountaintop because a sacred item is wedged in a crack near the peak, and the sages congregated in this location so they could protect it. Perhaps a group of people discovered some great treasure in the dormant volcano and built a city there because they considered it an omen that their people should stay. And maybe the warlike tribe of fighters lives in the stilt village because they believe the place can be easily defended, and they hope their enemies will fall into the patches of quicksand that ring most of their buildings—but which the tribesmen,

Other possible locations for fantastic cities could include the ocean floor, a stationary cloud, in the boughs of a huge tree, deep within the earth, in an interdimensional pocket, or on a solid patch of ground in the middle of a dark and dangerous swamp. Let your imagination run free, but remember not to overdo the number of “unearthly” cities you place on your campaign map. Even in a fantastic universe, the laws and principles of our real world will still apply for most of the communities that come into existence.

Climate: Weather conditions can have a significant impact on the location of cities. For example, it would not make sense to locate a city with a population of 10,000 on a polar icecap, or to put a farming community in an area where rains are brief and infrequent. Many of the cities on a continent will be found in temperate areas where the people can live comfortably—especially since people in medieval-flavored fantasy worlds do not have the modern-world advantages of heating and insulation.

Proximity: The locations of cities also affects where towns grow. For example, small towns can be found around larger cities. The towns produce raw materials for the large city to use in making more sophisticated items; for instance, a town provides hides and skins from livestock, which are shipped to manufacturing plants in the city and made into finished goods (boots, vests, and so forth). Some of the smaller towns around a city are usually farming communities that provide food for the city’s population. In turn, the city provides finished goods and opportunities for entertainment and employment to the townspeople.

HAMLET OR METROPOLIS?

Athormis eyed the people walking up and down the raised wooden sidewalks in front of the shops. The wooden sidewalks extended as far as he could see toward the ocean, and nearly every building had steps leading up from the raised sidewalks to the front doors. Boliver noticed the mage staring.

"This part of the city is very close to the river, Athormis. The people built their businesses up higher in case the river jumps its banks. They must have had a dwarf involved, because sometimes humans don't think about such things."

The mage scowled at his friend and changed the subject. "This is a real city, Boliver. Thousands upon thousands of people live here. There are not too many cities this large on the continent. And judging from my map, this is the largest city this far north. No wonder we passed so many villages on our way here. The people in those villages probably supply a lot of goods to the businesses here. And there's probably enough going on in this city that we could lose ourselves here for more than a week."

Size and The Social Climate

The size of a city is important, because that fact will help determine the number and types of industries or livelihoods found there. The size of a city could also determine how often the player characters in your campaign visit it and for what reasons. For example, PCs who are looking for good bargains on equipment or other necessities might find them more often in a village, where the shopkeepers' needs are simpler, and their prices lower, than those of similar merchants in a larger town. But if PCs are looking for excitement or employment, they're probably better off going to large cities, where there are many more opportunities of those sorts.

In medieval times it was common for a person to go through his entire life without traveling more than 20 miles from the town, village, or city where he was born. The community had everything these people needed—food, shelter, and a feeling of camaraderie. In many cases the people were so poor they could not afford transportation to larger cities and found themselves tied to their village, land, and lieges. This isolation caused a community, especially a smaller community, to be more close-knit and protective of its members: Everyone knew everyone else. The larger the city, the more likely that many residents had not lived their entire lives there, and the less likely that the city enjoyed a close-knit atmosphere. It would usually be easier for a person to remain anonymous in a larger city, losing himself in the crowd. You should keep these facts in mind as you create and populate communities in your campaign.

Following are definitions of types of communities based on size. Once you have located a good spot for a community, the next step is to decide how large (in population) that community will be.

Hamlet: This is the smallest kind of city, and in a medieval-flavored fantasy campaign it is probably the most numerous type of community. A hamlet consists of no more than a few dozen homes that are grouped together in the country.

The population of a hamlet ranges between 50 and 250, with three to eight people per home. The people in a hamlet are likely to be of one race, to come from similar backgrounds, and to have similar livelihoods and interests. For example, all of a hamlet's residents could be wheat farmers who have built their homes next to each other for mutual protection and for a sense of community. Or, a hamlet could consist of a few homes belonging to silver miners, who have no desire to see their community grow any larger (because they don't want to share the wealth any more than it's being shared already).

It is difficult for outsiders to be accepted in a community as small as a hamlet. Although hamlets will not have temples or monasteries, many hamlets are within a few miles of a town or city which has such features.

Village: This is a grouping of more than two dozen homes, but fewer than 200, with a population ranging between 200 and 1,000. Like a hamlet, a village will have residents with similar livelihoods and who probably belong to the same race. However, there will be more of a variety in interests and a chance for some of the residents to be of a different race, but one which gets along with the predominant race. For example, a village of humans might have a few half-elf residents.

If a village is the center of a farming community, the residents could be involved in herding livestock, spinning wool, farming wheat, and growing fruit. In comparison, the residents of a hamlet might all farm the same crop. A large village could have a small temple or monastery and a few stores which carry basic goods to meet the population's needs.

A small village is much like a hamlet in that outsiders are regarded as strangers and are not readily accepted. However, villagers can be friendly, and the actions of the outsiders will determine how long it takes for them to be assimilated into the village.

The people who live in villages usually have everything they need to sustain their rather simple livelihoods. However, adventuring player characters with other than basic needs could become frustrated with the lack of variety in the services and goods available in a village.

Town: Larger than a village but smaller than a city, a town consists of many homes and several public buildings, including a business district. The population of a town in a medieval fantasy world could range from 500 to 15,000, with the larger towns having a mix of races. There are a variety of industries in a town, with the larger towns having more different industries. In addition, some of the larger towns might be located near a large city.

Towns are large enough to support guilds, and members of the guild tend to congregate in neighborhoods. Towns are also large enough to support temples and monasteries. The larger the town, the more likely there will be a divergence in beliefs, meaning that temples and monasteries could be erected to support a variety of religions. However, it is possible, especially in the realm of fantasy, for a town to allow the official worshiping of only one religion.

Player characters might feel more comfortable in towns than in villages and hamlets, since more goods are available and there are more people to mix with. And because there are more people, the adventurers will feel less like outsiders.

City: A city is larger and is in many respects considered more important than a town. It boasts more public buildings, a larger business district or more than one business district, and is home to more industries. Cities draw many people from the surrounding area because of the opportunities for work. In most cases, the larger the city, the more varied the opportunities, the wider the variety of industries, and the more cultures and races of people are represented. Cities can have a more complex administration than smaller communities, since there are more people to manage, more businesses to oversee, and usually more officials involved in the government. Although it is difficult to pin a population number to the definition of a city, for the purpose of creating cities for a campaign, consider the range to be from 15,000 to 200,000. It is impractical for a city with a medieval flavor to have a population larger than the higher number.

The Big Picture

When establishing the size of communities, you should also consider the number of cities in your world or in a country in your world. Unless you have a specific reason for doing things differently, apply these general rules when deciding how many communities of a certain size exist in your campaign world or in a country within that world.

At least half of the communities should be hamlets or small villages, one-quarter to one-third large villages or small to medium-sized towns, and the remainder large towns and cities. Only a very few of the communities in any area should be large cities with populations in excess of 75,000; in fact, it would not be unbelievable to have only one city of this size in an entire country or even an entire continent.

Again, for a real-world reference, look at the list of communities and their populations that is generally provided along with a map of a country or state in an atlas. You will see that the vast majority of the communities are quite small in population, and only a very small proportion are major cities covering a lot of land and containing many thousands of people. It will take quite a bit more time for you to create dozens of small communities than it would to spot a half-dozen big cities and say that almost everyone lives in one of them, but the end result will be a more believable and more realistic world—which is important for the sake of your and your players' enjoyment.

Plausible Placement

Once you have determined how many cities of what size will go in a country, you must be careful to assign each community to a location that makes sense according to its size. The largest cities likely will be found along a coast or adjacent to a large river because of the opportunities for commerce that the waterways afford. This does not mean that small towns and villages should not be placed beside or near a river, lake, or ocean—everybody needs and uses water.

However, it would not make a lot of sense to put a very large city miles from a waterway in an area of the country that is nearly inaccessible. It would not make sense for a large city to have developed in such a place, because not very many people would choose to live in such a remote location, and the opportunities for business and commerce would not support an extremely large population.

Choosing a Capital

If you want to designate one of your newly placed cities as the capital of a country or a province, you do not have to choose the largest one. However, the capital of a country should be a city, not a town or a village. The capital is the center of government for a country or province and is usually also a nucleus of merchant or trade activity, so it should be placed where people can travel to and from it easily, which usually means locating it on the bank of a large river or along the seacoast.

WHAT KIND OF GOVERNMENT?

"I wonder what sort of political system they have here," Athormis said, brushing some of the dust off his robes and leading the dwarf into a large inn. It was a little past midday, and the mage hadn't eaten for several hours.

"You're always interested in that sort of stuff," the dwarf replied. "It only concerns me when the government taxes visiting adventurers."

The pair chose a table near the front window so they could watch the activity outside. Boliver opened his menu, grumbled under his breath about the prices, and proceeded to order for himself and the mage.

"You don't quite understand," Athormis interjected as he studied his menu, not realizing his meal had been selected for him while he was lost in concentration. "I'll have the roast duck and the boiled potatoes," he said as the cook walked past him, but failed to notice that the man wasn't paying attention. Then he turned back to Boliver. "A government is the most necessary element in any city. The government is linked to nearly all aspects of a city's operation and usually determines the atmosphere of a city; progressive, thriving, stagnant, decaying, friendly, or hostile. I know. I've studied such things. Besides, from our standpoint governments are a continual source of adventuring opportunities and—I suppose from your standpoint—can be a continual source of problems."

"The government "establishes taxes, which affect every city resident—and sometimes visiting adventurers. The government usually determines a city's relationship with neighboring cities, which also affects residents and visitors. The government establishes a city's militia, in which you might find yourself someday if you keep grumbling about the adventures I select. And what's more, the government is linked to mercantile activity, sometimes regulating commerce and determining who can sell and what can be sold."

"All right. Point made," Boliver said, watching the kitchen door and sniffing. "They're necessary. But most governments I've witnessed—and I've witnessed as many governments as I have hairs in my beard—levy too many taxes, have too many regulations, and the officials in the government are too stuffy, overbearing, and unapproachable."

The pair continued to chat about politics and politicians, while an elderly elf with long white hair watched them from a corner table. The cook brought the pair their meal. The elf, finished with his, rose and walked past them.

"Good afternoon, gentlemen, and welcome to our city. I believe you're new to Sauter. My name is White William. I'm one of the city leaders. I hope you have a pleasant stay."

Whenever people band together to form a community, they will live under some form of government. One or more leaders will emerge from the group, and those leaders will have a lot to say about the quality of life in the community, by virtue of how they exercise their power.

Each community might have a form of government different from the government in the next closest community. Or, you might choose to have a dominant form of government in a country, with all the communities in that country having the same form of government. Sometimes the form of government you select for a city could also extend to the land surrounding a city, so that farmers, herders, miners, or other people living outside the city walls are affected by the laws.

Below are brief descriptions of various types of governments and examples of how each government could be used in a fantasy campaign. Some of the types have similarities, and you might want to consider combining similar types into a special hybrid. Please note that each example is just that—one possibility of what the rulership under a particular form of government could be. Following each example is a suggestion of how player characters could become involved with each form of government. This list of governments is not exhaustive, but should present you with several options for establishing city governments in your campaign.

Anarchy: This is basically a lack of government. It is marked by an absence of laws and an obvious state of disorder marked by violence, unrest, and assorted attempts to exert control. The wealthy or the physically powerful (or a coalition of both types of people) usually have the most influence in this type of community, but they aren't leaders in the true sense of the word because the community at large doesn't recognize them as such. Anarchy can develop when a coup against the former government is successful, but the overthrowing forces cannot come into power. Chaos takes hold. Or a monarch could die without an heir, leaving the town to govern itself. The residents, unable to determine a form of government, decide on no government.

Example: A small town is in a state of anarchy because the populace overthrew a tyrannical leader. The populace decides it doesn't need to be governed, claiming each resident should live the way he wants to.

Player characters could be very frustrated in this environment and could feel like adults in a community of children who each demand their own way. If the PCs do not decide to get out fast, they might want to attempt to establish some form of government, putting one of the more responsible residents in charge.

Autocracy: In this form of government, one self-appointed person holds supreme authority. It is a form of dictatorship in which the ruler is sometimes considered a tyrant or a despot. The larger the community, the more people the autocrat likely will have beneath him to help control the populace. However, no matter how many subordinates the autocrat has, he still maintains control. An autocrat can come to power in many ways, such as by usurping authority in a military takeover.

Example: The head of a small city is an autocrat. He rules the populace with an iron hand, strictly regulating all commerce and movement in and out of the city. Foreigners can come into the city to do business and purchase goods, but few of the city's residents are allowed outside the gates. The population is heavily taxed, and is therefore kept poor and powerless.

Player characters visiting such a city could find the living situation uncomfortable and might find themselves embroiled in an adventure that involves an attempt to overthrow the tyrant.

Bureaucracy: This is essentially government by bureaus or departments, or it can be considered the consequence of another form of government which establishes bureaus. The departments establish laws and rules and expect adherence to the administration's guidelines. This government could be established by several means, such as by election by the populace. The tone of this government can be varied, based on the makeup of the bureaucrats. Perhaps the bureaus are really looking out for the public's best interests. Or perhaps the members of the bureaucracy are greedy and selfish, filling their coffers instead of the public's.

Example: The government of a large town is a bureaucracy composed of five departments responsible for maintaining the town's defenses and militia; dealing with all commerce activities; handling public improvements; setting up laws and handling judicial matters; and collecting taxes and distributing the money to the other bureaus.

Player characters in a town with this form of government might be a part of one of these departments or could find themselves affected by a department's decisions.

Collegium: This is government by an elite group of people, each of whom has approximately the same amount of power. The members within the group determine how members are replaced and whether the group should be expanded. Again, the tone of government with this system can vary based on the individuals involved.

Example: A collegium of 12 people governs a mid-sized town. Each member of the collegium is recognized as a wise and intelligent member of the community. Each member has the same authority and might be assigned the task of looking after a certain section of the town or a certain area of the town's operation. All decisions and rules are made by vote of the collegium.

Player characters in a town with this form of government might find themselves part of the collegium or could be asked by the collegium to perform various tasks.

Democracy: The residents of this community have established their own government, either by putting themselves in the government or by appointing representatives to rule for them. Each resident likely will be considered equal under the law each with the same rights and opportunities. This is also considered government by the majority.

Example: A large city has a democratic government. The populace holds an annual election to determine who among them will be the representatives charged with governing the city. The representatives set policies and enforce laws according to the majority of the people's wishes.

Player characters in a city governed by a democracy could be involved in getting a NPC elected or could campaign for a position themselves.

Dictatorship: Similar in some respects to an autocracy, a dictatorship is a very strict form of government in which authority resides in the hands of one individual. However, this person is not necessarily a tyrant or despot. The ruler could be wise and concerned about his people. Dictators can come to power in many ways, such as through tightly controlled elections or military coups; however, in most cases the masses have no voice in the choice of a dictator. A dictator will have others in authority beneath him—whom he appoints and maintains control over.

Example: The dictator of a town is a rigid individual with a military background who requires strict adherence to his laws. Although he is not an evil-aligned person, he is quick to have residents punished who do not follow his policies. The town is well kept up, with streets continually being repaired and storefronts clean and orderly. However, not all of the town's money goes for public improvements. This dictator enjoys wealth, living in a large estate and taking some of the residents' tax money to use for his personal wants.

A player character in this town could be working with residents to effect a change in the government so that the laws are not so stringent and the people not taxed so heavily. PCs in this situation are at great risk, for if they are caught the punishment could be severe.

Feodality: This is a form of government that is almost always coupled with another government type, with the officials in that government setting up a system of feudalism. A feodality is a hierarchy in which power is held by people in a "layered system, with each layer being responsible to the layer above it. In some respects this is like a historical medieval feudal system; serfs who worked the land were responsible to the vassals, who were responsible to more powerful lords or a king.

Example: A dictator who establishes a feodality in a town sets up three layers of authority. A group of businessmen are responsible to a group of wealthy landowners, who are responsible to a few very wealthy and very powerful nobles, who are ultimately responsible to the dictator.

Player characters in a community of this type could be tied to NPCs in any of the three layers and could be asked to perform various missions for that group and ultimately for the community. Or, the PCs could be dissatisfied with the government and seek to add another layer to the feodality, so that the laborers or farmers have representation.

Gerontocracy: This is rule by elderly men and women. The gerontocracy could consist of a council made up of town residents who are older than a certain age (perhaps 60 for humans, probably much higher for demihumans), or it could be a government where the elders in the community elect a leader from among themselves. This form of leadership could exist because the residents of the community believe that the eldest members possess the most wisdom and the most life experience, and are therefore the best to govern.

Example: The leader of a town is an elderly man elected by all the town residents who are of old age—at least 60 for humans, 67 for halflings, 83 for half-elves, 133 for gnomes, 167 for dwarves, and 233 for elves. The leader establishes town policies and seeks the advice of the town's other elderly residents. The older people in town receive more benefits and are taxed less heavily than the younger residents.

Player characters in this environment, especially those of young age, could be frustrated with the atmosphere and might become involved in a movement to reform the government or to get representation for younger individuals.

Gynarchy/Matriarchy: Women rule in this form of government, whether it be a council of several women or one woman who is in a supreme position of authority. This situation can come about several ways; perhaps women are dominant in this city or are in such greater numbers than men that they can establish the government. In a matriarchy, rule is held by older women; in a gynarchy, no distinction is made for age.

Example: A body of five women rule a mid-sized city. Although they work to benefit the city, not themselves, females in the city do receive better treatment and have more rights than they probably would experience under a different government.

WHAT KIND OF GOVERNMENT?

Male player characters might not want to stay in this environment long. The player characters could seek to change the status of men in the community—with or without overthrowing the government. Female player characters might enjoy this form of leadership and could get involved in keeping down attempts to overthrow it.

Hierarchy or Hierocracy: Clergy govern in this system, with the highest-level church leaders having the most authority. The tone of the government would be based primarily on the alignment of the clergy and the deity they worship. The leaders in this form of government most definitely would be wise (since all powerful clerics have high Wisdom scores), and if they are good-aligned likely would have the population's interests at heart. However, this form of government is not without its potential problems, since there would be no separation between church and state. The church is the state.

Example: The temple of Poseidon is the dominant religion in a small town and has charged itself with governing the residents. The highest-level cleric is the town's leader, with the other clerics in descending rank being lesser officials and advisors. The clerics' values are enforced upon the community, and there might be little or no tolerance for other religions.

A player character cleric in the adventuring party might worship another deity and could involve the entire party in an attempt to get religious freedom in the town. Or the player characters might not agree with the leader clerics' philosophies, especially if the clerics worship an evil deity, and the PCs could attempt to change the government or become involved in covert activities opposing the government's edicts.

Magocracy: Wizards, particularly mages, are the leaders in a community with this form of government. The mages, who vested themselves with political power believing that their great intelligence makes them fit rulers, establish rules and regulations and enforce them—if need be, through the use of spells.

Example: The three highest-level mages in a city decide all of the city's policies and use their spells and magic items to keep the population in line. The mages are fair, attempt to treat each resident equally, and are usually open to new ideas. The city is well defended, with flying patrols and magical traps, and the citizens seem content.

Player characters might enjoy a good relationship with this government and might be among the appointed officials. Or the PCs could be the rulers' "champions," performing missions on behalf of the government.

Militocracy: The leaders of the community's military forces are in charge, and the residents are governed by the military. There are likely many laws, and they are rigidly enforced. In a city with such a government, residents could be required to serve for a period of time in the military. This form of government could be a variation of a dictatorship, if there is one supreme military leader, or an oligarchy (see below), if ultimate power is shared by more than one high-ranking soldier.

Example: The general of a small city's militia has assumed control of the government and is bossing the residents around just like they were his troops. He has imposed a mandatory draft and continues to develop a code of laws. Despite the unrest among the people, the city prospers. Its trade, upon which numerous regulations have been imposed, flourishes, and the people are enjoying their newfound wealth.

In an adventure involving a militocracy, the player characters could be sought out by a faction of the populace which cannot tolerate the military regime. They are asked to take steps to reduce the laws and regulations—without destroying the government, because the people are pleased with their economic state.

Monarchy: In this government, one person (the equivalent of a king, queen, sultan, emperor, etc.) has the hereditary right to rule. On occasion, a monarch will wield his power based on a claim of divinity, saying that he was chosen by or descended from the gods. Rule is sometimes passed on to the eldest male or eldest female child. A monarch will rule based on his or her alignment and the motives the DM has established for the character. In some cases a monarch is dependent on the nobility for support and allegiance. And in other cases a monarch could be simply a figurehead, with another form of government coexisting and having the real power.

Example: A city is ruled by a king whose family has been in power since the city was formed. The king has appointed several people to enforce his laws and favors the nobility and the wealthy. The peasants and commoners are taxed heavily and not allowed to rise above their stations.

In such a city, player characters could become champions of the commoners, thwarting the king's plans to tax the people and becoming an irritating burr in the monarch's side.

Oligarchy: In this form of government, power rests with a few individuals, perhaps but not necessarily members of the same family. A government such as this is sometimes characterized as selfish, with the rulers' interests and desires coming before the welfare of the people they are governing. Such a government could come about because a previous government was overthrown or because a childless monarch died, leaving power in the hands of a small group of distant relatives.

Example: Twin brothers, descendants of a king, come into power. They share rulership of a city, although each would like to be the sole ruler. They are selfish and greedy, taxing the people and lining their own coffers with the wealth while public needs are not attended to.

This is another situation where PCs could be champions of the people.

Patriarchy: This is similar to a gerontocracy, but the rulers are men only. The atmosphere in communities with this form of government is again dependent on the personalities the DM has assigned to the rulers. When the leader dies, rule could be passed down to the next oldest man.

Example: The eldest man in a large town is the head of the government, and he appoints lesser officials to carry out his policies. However, this leader, once a kind and just man, has become senile and is creating laws on whims and punishing people for little reason.

The player characters in such a situation might be approached by the town's lesser officials and asked to find a cure for the leader's senility, or they may be asked to help overthrow him.

Pedocracy: Well-educated persons and scholars are in charge under this system, and they establish laws which they believe are in the best interest of those they govern. A pedocracy might be headed by one person, or by a group of people who share authority and responsibility. In a fantasy setting, these rulers would likely be either wizards (mages or illusionists), because of their typically high intelligence, or priests (clerics or druids), who generally have great wisdom—or perhaps a consortium of both types of characters. It is also possible for a member of some other class to be the leader of a pedocracy, particularly if the character has high charisma to go along with his high intelligence or wisdom.

Example: A small city is governed by a group of scholars, whose seat of government is a vast library. The scholars govern wisely and well, studying the community and instituting policies that improve the people's welfare. They assign residents to positions and tasks based on the residents' abilities. And the rulers are always searching for ways to improve the city.

Player characters could be under the employ of the leaders, who frequently send them on adventures to get information about the surrounding lands.

Plutocracy: The wealthy are the rulers in this form of government. Their power is derived from their wealth and holdings, and all the other residents of such a community are subject to their decrees. This government could also fall into other categories; it could be an oligarchy in which a few very wealthy individuals have supreme control. Or the leadership could be in the form of a council of the wealthiest individuals in the community, who have charged themselves with the responsibility of running the government. A plutocracy can come into being through several avenues; the wealthy people in a particular community could have always enjoyed a significant amount of power, and when a leader died they assumed his role. Or perhaps a few wealthy individuals established the community, and because of that precedent the wealthy have always held power.

Example: A seacoast town is governed by its four wealthiest landowners. Each landowner is in charge of a quarter of the town, and together they decide policies and programs for the entire town. However, there is disparity between the sections of town. One landowner favors the rich and lavishes his share of the tax money on them; another landowner favors the merchants and devotes his energies to bettering commerce in his quarter; the remaining two landowners are more fair, spreading out the tax money throughout their quarters so that all the people benefit.

Player characters residing in or visiting one of these quarters could be made quickly aware of the differences and could be encouraged to do something to make living conditions more equitable. Or player characters visiting any city governed by a plutocracy could become the champions of the commoners, who want more of a voice in the operation of the city.

Republic: This is similar to a democracy, because it is a representative form of government. However, there can be differences. The representatives in a republic are elected by people entitled to vote. And those voters might only include men, the rich, or the learned. Commoners or women might be excluded. So while ultimately power rests in the hands of the citizens, it might not rest with all the citizens. The representatives might rule as a group, or there might be an overall leader elected from among those in the group.

Example: A town is governed by representatives elected by the male residents. For the most part, these representatives make decisions based on the wishes of those who elected them, although they sometimes create policies which they believe will better the community, even though the voters (adult males) might disapprove.

Player characters in this environment might be among those electing the representatives, although female player characters could be upset by this system. The PCs could also work to change the republic into a democracy, in which everyone has a say in choosing the representatives. In a non-evil republic government, the PCs could be charged with helping to keep the government in place by putting down attempts to overthrow it.

Syndicracy: This is government by a group of merchants and tradesmen. Each member, who might also be a guild leader, could represent an interest. For example, a syndicracy composed of six members could have one person representing the banking industry; one for the farm industry; one for manufacturers of clothing and other dry goods; one for service industries such as inns and taverns; one representing the general labor force; and one protecting the interests of pottery makers, silversmiths, and goldsmiths.

Or the syndics might not be specialists; instead, they might be the members of a council that concerns itself with making the best decisions for all the various members of the economic community. The tone of the government will be derived from the alignments and personalities of the syndics, but in any case the thrust of the government's operation will be toward the betterment of commerce and economic standing.

Example: A syndicracy operating in a mid-sized city has implemented programs which have resulted in a booming trade business. Merchants and farmers are prospering; however, common laborers have not received a raise in pay or any other benefit. The laborers are disgruntled, but feel that they have no recourse because no one in the government is looking out for them in particular, and they can't afford to pull up stakes and relocate.

Player characters visiting or operating out of such a city could be asked to help a faction within the city, such as the laborers, get more power.

Theocracy: This is a form of government derived, or supposedly derived, from a deity. The ruler could be a person claiming to be the direct descendant of a god or the representative of a god, and he could claim to govern based on the deity's wishes. The ruler or rulers would not have to be priests (clerics or druids). The tone of this government will be based on the personality and alignment of the ruler or rulers, and the deity worshiped. If the deity is evil, the ruler could have an oppressive reign marked by acts of terror and violence. However, if the deity is good, the ruler could be understanding and beneficent, and the people could prosper. In some theocracies the ruler might not actually have any ties to the deity, claiming a relationship only so he could come into political power. There are several ways for a theocracy to be established in a community; for example, if the majority of people in a community worship the same deity, this could set the stage for a person who claims to be descended from the deity to step into control.

Example: A female dwarven follower of Moradin claims the god speaks to her and gives her direction on how to help the residents of the dwarvish town. Her power in the community grows until she is named the town leader.

If any dwarven player characters are involved with the adventuring party in this town, they could be sent on a mission for Moradin on behalf of the town's leader.

WHAT KIND OF GOVERNMENT?

Mixing Governments

You might want to have more than one form of government present in some of your cities. For example, a monarchy could be the major form of government, with a king being the overall ruler of a city. However, underneath the king are a few high-powered administrators who operate like an oligarchy, and beneath them a council of syndics. This form of government is also a hierarchy, with the council reporting to the administrators, who in turn report to the king. It is likely that only a large city would have a government as complex as this.

To randomly determine the form of government for a city you have placed, use the following chart—but reroll if the result is impossible or impractical (for instance, a magocracy in a hamlet that has no wizards, or a gerontocracy in a village formed just a few years earlier by a group of young and middle-aged settlers).

GOVERNMENT IN ACTION

To give you more ideas of how a community's government can be a source of adventures, here are a few situations that could occur under a number of different forms of government. In each case, player characters who visit or live in the community will be affected by—and perhaps themselves have an impact on—what happens as a result of these policies.

1. Officials want to expand the boundaries of the city and bring more people under the jurisdiction of the government. They hope this will make the city a more powerful force on the continent. A good-aligned or neutral-aligned ruler or rulers might accomplish this by meeting with the people outside the city's current boundaries and attempting to convince them that their way of life would be better if they were under the protection of the city and could enjoy the benefits the city government offers. In this situation, player characters could be among the delegation attempting to convince the outside people. An evil-aligned ruler could attempt to take the lands by force. In this case, the PCs might get involved in helping to keep the outer lands free.

2. The government wants to improve the physical appearance of the city and has implemented extensive public-improvement programs which will create schools and parks and will upgrade public buildings and storefronts. Goals such as this could fit with rulers of any alignment, and could have a significant impact on the population, which might be heavily taxed so the improvements can be made. Player characters in this situation could help find ways to accomplish the goal without forcing the citizens to suffer a crippling tax burden.

3. A ruler is determined to build up the military might of the city and improve the city's defenses. His plan calls for a draft to be implemented, forcing all healthy young men in the city to serve a stint in the militia. In addition, many citizens are put to work building a wall around the town. This plan can also fit with rulers of any alignment. Player characters involved with this city could be faced with conscription into military service, or being ordered to join the work force to build the walls.

Boliver coughed in surprise and spat out a mouthful of soup as the elf left the inn. "Wonderful. We're not in this city more than an hour, and already we've insulted the city officials. Wonderful."

Athormis smiled. "You—not we—insulted a city official. Besides, he didn't seem upset. He seems a likeable sort, and pretty sure of himself. I didn't see any bodyguards nearby, and he wasn't wearing any armor. Maybe the people are happy with him, and he's not afraid of walking among them. And he said he is one of the city leaders, so be thankful we aren't in a city with some form of monarchy or dictatorship. This city looks in good shape, from what we've seen of it so far. That probably means the government is progressive. At the very least, the city streets look in good repair. Boliver, the leaders here are probably better at running this city than our cook is at running his inn. I ordered roast duck. This is beef stew. And where are my boiled potatoes?"

GOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

As you continue to develop your cities and those cities' governments, you must decide how the governments relate to each other. For example, if the governments of two sea-coast cities that are within 20 miles of each other do not get along, the cities' officials might plant spies in each other's courthouses, take drastic measures to compete for harbor trade, or in an extreme case threaten war. On the other hand, if those two cities are on friendly terms, they could develop cooperative trade programs and have an agreement to combine militias if either city comes under attack.

The following table can help you determine relationships between cities. For random determination, roll d100 and assign the result to the two cities in question. In most cases, you should simply select one of the six possibilities that seems reasonable and likely in light of the cities' other aspects. Remember at all times that any facts about the cities in your campaign must have reasons to back them up, whether those facts were determined by a die roll or by a judgment you made.

| 01-45 | Governments are cooperative and enjoy good, friendly relations. |
| 46-65 | Governments accept each other and under certain circumstances would aid each other. |
| 66-76 | Governments accept each other, but are neither friendly nor hostile to each other. |
| 77-87 | Governments ignore each other. |
| 88-95 | Governments are antagonistic. |
| 96-00 | Governments are hostile, and with some provocation could go to war. |

PUTTING LIFE INTO LEADERS

To make a city and its government be vibrant, realistic, and truly interesting, you must create personalities and goals for the city leaders and establish the leaders' alignments. The goals of a city's government frequently mirror the personal goals of the highest officials. If a city's government has no goals, the city will stagnate. And if the city officials lack depth, the government's goals will be shallow or nonexistent.

It is essential to put some thought into the makeup of a city's rulers, and to have the rulers' characteristics developed before the PCs come to a city and want to know about what they're getting into. You don't have to tell players everything at once, of course, but you should have all the facts worked out so that what you do reveal to them is consistent with other facts they may have learned or heard about. In a wilderness adventure or a dungeon expedition, you may be able to get away with making up some things as you go along. In a city adventure, it's much more difficult to "wing it" on a large scale, because you're dealing with an environment that is much more complex than an expanse of wilderness or a collection of rooms in a dungeon.

You may want to draw your officials' personalities from personages you have come to know through novels, movies, or history books. The rulers of Europe in the Middle Ages are rich with character, motivations, and foibles. You might be more familiar with leaders from the modern era—and you don't have to limit yourself to people who actually are or were leaders in government and politics. (Imagine how interesting it might be for PCs to enter a city governed by someone modeled after Al Capone or—at the other extreme—someone like Gandhi.)

Another source for creating full-bodied rulers is the NPC generation system in the AD&D® game Dungeon Masters Guide. In lieu of those tables, the following lists of traits can be used as a starting point to help you flesh out your city officials or to help create city officials quickly. Please note that the characteristics listed on the tables are only a few of the traits a leader might possess; many, many more are possible.

d100 roll Alignment of ruler(s)

01-15	Lawful good
16-30	Neutral good
31-40	Chaotic good
41-70	Neutral
71-75	Chaotic neutral
76-85	Lawful neutral

86-92	Lawful evil
93-97	Neutral evil
98-00	Chaotic evil

If an official's alignment is lawful good, neutral good, or chaotic good, roll on the following table (use d3 and d10) to help determine the official's personality traits. Roll three to five times for each official, discarding or rerolling traits which are not compatible.

1 Trustworthy	16 Cowardly
2 Considerate	17 Truthful
3 Understanding	18 Progressive
4 Domineering	19 Boastful
5 Generous	20 Open-minded
6 Scholarly	21 Optimistic
7 Proud	22 Even-tempered
8 Intelligent	23 Lazy
9 Energetic	24 Selfish/greedy
10 Honorable	25 Brave
11 Moody	26 Covetous
12 Temperamental	27 Shy
13 Virtuuous	28 Bold
14 Foolhardy	29 Loud
15 Aggressive	30 Passionate

Rulers who are chaotic neutral, neutral, or lawful neutral could have traits from the following table. Reroll or ignore traits which are in conflict.

1 Moody	16 Curious
2 Fearless	17 Cowardly
3 Intelligent	18 Gracious
4 Selfish/greedy	19 Haughty
5 Considerate	20 Warlike
6 Hot-tempered	21 Easygoing
7 Indecisive	22 Power-hungry
8 Diplomatic	23 Rude
9 Well-spoken	24 Driven
10 Careless	25 Soft-hearted
11 Kind	26 Foolhardy
12 Covetous	27 Brave
13 Unpredictable	28 Talkative
14 Compassionate	29 Humorous
15 Aggressive	30 Flamboyant

Officials who are lawful evil, neutral evil, or chaotic evil could have three to five traits from the following table. Again, reroll or ignore traits which conflict.

1 Malevolent	16 Brave
2 Greedy	17 Cowardly
3 Diplomatic	18 Scheming
4 Well-educated	19 Dishonest
5 Immoral	20 Egotistical
6 Vengeful	21 Jealous

7 Warlike	22 Power-hungry
8 Progressive	23 Cautious
9 Driven	24 Covetous
10 Lazy	25 Insensitive
11 Unpredictable	26 Maniacal
12 Flamboyant	27 Devious
13 Bold	28 Domineering
14 Secretive	29 Harsh
15 Deceptive	30 Cruel

Adding a Title

Each city official should have a title or two. A title will set the NPC leader above the rest of the populace and will help identify the NPC's role to player characters visiting the city. There are a great many titles to choose from, and you can probably think of at least a couple of dozen right away. A thesaurus is a good place to look for a long list of titles that people have given to their rulers. When assigning a title to a ruler, be sure it is consistent with the type of government and the personality or background of the ruler(s). For instance, it's improbable that the leaders of an oligarchy would all have the title of King, and the head official in a modest farming community would probably not be called Pharaoh.

Adding Depth

To more fully flesh out city officials, consider creating strengths, weaknesses, and a colorful background.

Strengths: Every official, in fact every character, has strengths integral to his or her being. A compassionate king's greatest strength might be his popularity. With the people behind him, peasants and nobles alike, he will have a strong reign, and those who oppose him will be easily defeated. The leader in a militocracy might have a brilliant military mind as his greatest strength. Perhaps this leader could unerringly lead troops against a neighboring city threatening war. Perhaps the strength of a leader in a democracy is his wisdom and an uncanny ability to make the correct judgment in establishing public policy. The strengths of a ruler are in many respects the strengths of a city, and should be fairly apparent to PCs who live in or visit the city.

Weaknesses: Every ruler should have at least one major weakness, which can add interest to city campaigns and could play a significant part in adventures where PCs come into conflict with the ruler or must aid him. Such a weakness could be a phobia, many of which are listed in the Dungeon Masters Guide. A ruler's weaknesses do not have to be as obvious as his strengths and could present a challenge for the PCs to discover. For example, perhaps a king refuses to consider new ideas because he fears the unknown. Because of this weakness, the city is not progressing, staying rooted in its age-old ways of operating. For the city to move forward, the ruler's weakness must be identified and overcome. Perhaps the weakness of an evil, tyrannical queen is her overconfidence. Discovering this could be the key to defeating her and freeing her subjects.

Influences: Does anything influence the ruler? Is he motivated to gain more wealth? Is he influenced by the opinions and advice of the wealthy in the city, ignoring the commoners' wishes? Is he influenced by the stars, putting his faith in astrology and seers? Perhaps the ruler has an attachment to mysticism, seeing events as omens which affect his plans for the city. Or maybe the ruler is wishy-washy, allowing himself to be influenced by many different forces at different times, which causes him to frequently change city policies.

Background: How did the ruler come into power? Was he elected? Did he overthrow the previous government, which causes him to be fearful of the same thing happening to him? Is he the last in a line of monarchs descended from the founder of the city?

Keeping the Power: How does the city's ruler retain his power? Is he popular enough with the people, or does he have a fair enough government that there is no serious threat to depose him? If he is a tyrant, does he have magical protection or an elite force of bodyguards to keep him on the throne? Is the ruler well defended or protected with wards and other magical devices?

A Ruler with Class: Perhaps the city's top official or officials are former adventurers. Making a ruler a member of a character class is not necessary, but doing so will give an official more hit points, a better armor class—especially if he has magic armor or protection devices from his adventuring days—and an edge in defending himself. In addition, it gives the official something in common with the player characters.

Abilities: You should determine what languages the ruler speaks and writes and what proficiencies the ruler has.

Underlings: The larger the town or city, the more officials the government will have. Because of that, you must determine how many underlings, or lesser officials, a ruler has. The number also should be dependent on the makeup of the ruler. An overconfident ruler who doesn't want to share power will have fewer officials under him than a ruler who recognizes the need for more administrators.

Favoritism: It is possible that a ruler might favor a segment of the population and create laws to benefit them. For example, a ruler who is partial to the wealthy could tax them less. Or a ruler who favors adventurers could look the other way if adventurers break a few laws.

Housing: You will have to determine if the ruler lives within the city walls or in an estate outside the city. Does he live in a castle, manor house, expensive apartment, fortified home? If applicable, you should decide how the manor or estate is protected. Planning this in advance will make it easier to deal with PCs who want to confront the ruler. It is a good idea to set aside a few of the building fold-ups which you can combine to create a ruler's estate. Determining which street layouts are around the estate will help you determine what kind of security the leader's office or residence has. Is it surrounded by other buildings (which would make a sneak attack easier to pull off), or does it stand alone on a hilltop (so that no one can approach unseen)?

Protection: You also must decide if the ruler has bodyguards, and if so how many and of what level. In addition, you should take into consideration magic protection. Even if the ruler is not of an adventuring class, he could still have magic items or protective devices to help keep him from harm.

Ties to the Military: Another consideration is the ruler's link to the military. In a militocracy, the city's leader is also the leader of the military. In other forms of government there may be other officials in charge of the military or city guards, and there may be several steps or layers of authority between the ruler and the military.

Popularity: One of the most important aspects of a ruler is how the populace views him. Is he a popular ruler? Is the populace split with a few classes favoring him and a few hoping for a new leader? Or do most of the people hope for a new leader?

"It's not bad stew," Athormis said, running a piece of bread around the bottom of the bowl to get the last bit. "But let's go someplace for dinner that serves duck. Boliver, your turn to pick up the bill." The dwarf threw a gold piece on the table, which was more than enough to pay for several meals at the inn, and the pair walked out to continue their exploration of Sauter.

"You know, Boliver," Athormis continued, "I really wish we would have known that White William was with the government. We could have asked him to eat with us. I wager we could have found out all manner of information about this city and the people who run it, their strengths and weaknesses, their plans. It would have been a fascinating conversation. Maybe we'll run into him again."

"Don't wager on it," Boliver said, dragging the mage toward a weaponsmith. "City's too big. And besides, he's an elf. I've never been overly fond of elves."

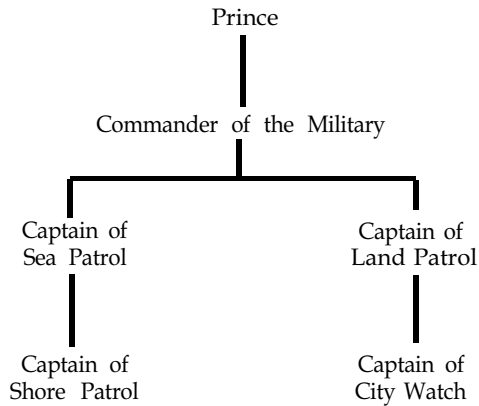

AN ELEMENT OF THE FANTASTIC

Although the majority of officials in your campaign should be human, half-elf, elf, or a member of one of the other humanoid races, a few officials could have a fantastic nature. Perhaps a silver dragon polymorphed into human form is the leader of a mountain town. Maybe a doppelganger has taken the place of a small-town mayor and has been running the town for the past few years. Or perhaps a lich or other evil creature is the ruler of a sprawling city and has an army of goblins and other creatures at his command. Whatever or whoever you decide to establish as a "fantastic" ruler should be unique and well crafted. And above all else, there should be few of these unique rulers. If monster-leaders are commonplace, there will be nothing fantastic about them.

CHARTING THE GOVERNMENT

Example: Oligarchy

One of the easiest ways to visualize the chain of command for any form of government you assign to a town or city is to create a tree of power, or an outline, as shown on this page, detailing which officials have the most power and showing whom they report to.

Creating such an outline for each major city and town that PCs frequently visit will help you keep the forms of government straight between your many communities. Each chart could also bear the names of the important NPCs you have assigned to various positions. In addition, if you choose to make information from the charts available to the players interested in your cities' governments, they will be able to easily tell which PCs their characters need to seek out when dealing with various aspects of the government. This also will help them keep the officials' names straight, especially if their characters frequently visit several towns and cities.

Not all outlines will have the same structure. A democracy will have a different outline from a monarchy, which will have a different outline from an oligarchy, which will have a different outline from a military, and so forth. You likely will have to develop a different basic chart for each type of government you use.

The example here shows the possible outline for an oligarchy ruled by two brothers. The princes share power equally, and they are over everyone else in the government and in the city. Immediately beneath them are the commander of the city's military forces and the regents, the latter of whom oversee the chief counselors, the courts, and the advisory councils. Beneath the councils are the city guild council and harbor master. Beneath the chief counselors are the ambassadors and tax collectors. And beneath the courts are the jails and public shelters. In addition, the major guilds are beneath the guild council. There are other guilds which report to the major guilds, but they are not listed.

You could choose to go beyond a basic chart such as this, creating additional charts for the military, merchants, courts, ship yards, and other areas within a city. In addition, you could create two charts for a city's government. The first chart would show the governmental structure as the public perceives it, complete with the names of officials. This chart would be available to the players. A second chart, which only you or your players whose characters are within the government would see, would detail the actual power structure and would reveal the real authority in the city, such as the power behind a puppet monarch.

THE CITY'S DEFENSES

Boliver stuck his new silvered throwing hammer in his backpack and waited for Athormis to buy a dagger. The mage was particular about his weapons, even though the dwarf considered a dagger scant defense. Athormis turned the dagger over and over in his long fingers before sheathing it at his waist. "All right. I'm ready," the mage said.

They walked out onto the city streets, where Boliver bumped into a uniformed guard. "Excuse me," the dwarf said, his face turning scarlet. "I wasn't watching where I was going, sir." The guard simply nodded and walked away to join another guard on patrol in the merchants district.

"Whew," Boliver said. "I've been in places where guards would accuse you of trying to pick their pockets or something. I wonder if there are a lot of guards here?"

"Oh, I do hope so," Athormis answered. "I feel safer in a city with a good, sturdy wall and plenty of guards around. Remember, we're toting considerable wealth around with us, and the presence of guards keeps our wealth that much safer. Maybe we should find a jeweler and exchange some of our gold for a few small but fine gems. Gems are easier to conceal and aren't as heavy."

"I hate to agree with you, Athormis, but you're right. I guess I do feel better with a few guards walking the streets. Every place needs some form of defense to make the citizens feel secure and to prevent the community from being overrun by invaders, disgruntled citizens, and ill-tempered adventurers—ourselves excluded, of course. A good defense prevents rowdy characters from walking into a village and doing whatever they please. And a defense, such as a militia, can also provide a good source of employment between adventures. Remember about eight years ago when we were in Delmarr and were hired on as guard sergeants? Ahhh, those were the days. . . ."

The Military

The size of a militia will depend on many factors, including the size of the population, the makeup of the community's leaders, and the community's stance with surrounding villages, towns, and cities. For example, a city that has an uneasy relationship with its neighbors probably would have a large militia or more than one military force. A town whose ruler is frightened of potential threats from the outside also likely would have a comparatively large force. However, a town that has good relations with its neighbors, has never been invaded, and has a confident leader might have just a small militia.

Hamlets and small villages might have no protection other than the citizens themselves (principally, but perhaps not exclusively, the healthy adult males), who band together when a threat is posed. These citizens might also serve as the community's watch, taking turns patrolling the area. In addition, perhaps there is a community plan in which all the men rally to the community's defense if an alarm is sounded. However, it is also possible that a hamlet or small village will have a fairly well organized defense force, especially if the community has enemies.

Larger villages, towns, and cities should have better defenses because more people live there, there are more merchants who demand protection, and there are public buildings which officials will demand be defended. One of the major reasons people live in communities is for protection. And the larger the community, the more defenses and the larger the militia it will have. However, size of the militia is again dependent on some of the factors mentioned above, such as the confidence level of the community officials. Villages, towns, and cities also could have walls, a moat, magic, or perhaps a friendly creature or monster to help defend them.

You must select the added defenses for your communities in part based on each community's location. For example, a town on an arid plain is not likely to be protected by a moat (unless there is some fantastic reason for the water not evaporating). A frigid northern village is not going to be protected by a friendly monster that is native to warm climes. And player characters are not likely to see a village in the swamp surrounded by a thick stone wall—unless the ground in that part of the swamp is unusually solid (thanks to magic?). A little bit of common sense will help you develop your communities' defenses.

Following is a table you can consult for ideas on how a community might be defended. It also can be used to randomly generate defenses. After the table are explanations of the types of defenses and guidelines for the size of militias.

S = Sentries/Guards/Militia: The most common form of defense a community will have is men trained to defend the public. From a hamlet, where a few residents act as sentries and volunteer defenders, to a large city with several guard forces, these men will be the first to combat whatever problems arise. There should be a base of 1 guard per 150 residents, with a minimum of 3 guards. If the community is on peaceful terms with its neighbors and has no known enemies, there will be 1 guard per 200 residents, with a minimum of 3 guards. If, however, the community is on uneasy terms with its neighbors, or has unrest within its own boundaries, there will be 1 guard per 100 residents, with a minimum of 5 guards.

Communities with less than 5,000 residents are not likely to have an army (militia), unless the community has known enemies or feels threatened. In an army, there should be a base of 25 soldiers per 1,000 residents. This number will double, triple, or quadruple, depending on the severity of the threat posed against the community. A standing army is responsible for patrolling a community's boundaries and the surrounding lands.

THE CITY'S DEFENSES

You must also consider the makeup of the forces. A village could have a guard force made up of 0-level humans, while a large town might have more than one force, each of which consists of personnel ranging from 0-level humans through 5th level fighters, with the higher-level NPCs having commanding roles. The larger a community is, the better chance that it will have relatively high-level characters in its militia.

You should consider specifically creating the NPCs who are in leading roles in a city's militia or guard force, since it is likely that player characters will interact with them. Rowdy PCs unwinding in a tavern after a long adventure could find themselves up against the leader of the guards. Or, PCs wanting to find work between adventures might have to deal with some of the higher-ups in the community's army.

CW = City Wall: This is one of the best defenses a city can create. A tall, sturdy wall made of brick, stone, or clay can serve a variety of purposes. Sentries standing on parapets along the wall can regulate who enters and leaves the city; can get a good view of the surrounding area and spot potential attackers at a distance; and can even survey the city, keeping an eye out for lawbreakers, fires, and trouble. In times of attack, guards and members of the city's militia can stand along the wall, raining arrows, spears, and oil on the assailants and using the wall for cover.

How wealthy a community is and what kind of labor force it has will help determine how much the wall encompasses. For example, a wealthy community with a large work force could have a wall that circles the entire city. Other cities might only have a wall around a portion of the city, such as where the wealthy) merchants, city officials, and public buildings are located. A city that is small in area is likely to have more of its territory protected by walls than a city whose territory is sprawling and perhaps oddly shaped (it's easier to build straight walls than it is to make curved ones, or ones with lots of corners).

W= Water: A moat, especially one that is wide and deep and filled with water, will serve some of the same functions as a city wall. A moat will slow invaders, who must deal with the water before they can effectively attack the city. It will help the city regulate who enters and leaves, since people must either cross at designated spots or be good swimmers. Sentries stationed around the moat could watch the people going in and out of the city, being automatically suspicious of people choosing to swim rather than walk across at designated points.

In addition, you could choose to populate your water-filled moats for an extra defense by adding alligators, giant pikes, eels, lam preys, gars, quippers, giant crayfish, or water snakes. Some moats might be filled with substances other than water, such as long spikes or viscous oil that can be set on fire. Or, a moat could be left empty—just a deep, wide ditch that visitors and enemies must contend with.

Another option for defense is to locate a town or city on an island in a lake or a river. This has the same effect as a water-filled moat, in that people must deal with the water to get to the city, and it also provides a source of fresh water and a foundation for some industries, such as fishing.

FM = Friendly Monster: You should restrict the number of communities that have friendly monsters or friendly creatures as guards so these cities can retain their fantastic nature. However, having a few communities that are guarded by such creatures will add fun to the campaign and could be a source of interaction with the player characters. First, there must be a reason why the creature is helping to protect the city. Perhaps the city official is a former adventurer who saved the creature's life, and the monster is expressing its gratitude. Maybe the good-aligned creature or monster likes humankind and does not want any ill to befall this particular community. Perhaps there is a joint agreement for protection, with the creature helping to defend the city in exchange for the city's militia agreeing to help defend it and its lair.

Here are some suggestions for good-aligned creatures or monsters that might serve as effective defenders for a community because of their special abilities: dragon (brass, bronze, copper, gold, silver), dragonne, genie, giant (cloud or storm), kirin, lammasu, androsphinx, and treant.

There are many other monsters you could consider, based on the game system you are using. Remember, the friendly monster might not always be obvious. For example, a village protected by a few treants might not appear to be guarded at all. However, people posing a threat to the village's safety could soon find themselves surrounded and entangled by trees. A city could appear to have only a lone sentry on the wall. However, an invading force would quickly learn the "lone sentry's" breath weapon is devastating—an instant after the silver dragon reassumes its natural form. The polymorph ability doesn't need to be innate; in return for some great favor or as a way of expressing their gratitude to the city for some reason, a friendly monster might be willing to subject itself to a spell that causes it to appear human. In most cases, shapechanging or concealing monster guards is probably a good idea, because cities with monster guards that are obvious could soon become the targets of non-good people who equate treasure and power with killing monsters.

You should also consider evil creatures for guarding cities with evil rulers. Such guards could include dragons (especially black, green, and red), bugbears, gargoyles, evil giants, and assorted undead. Again, there are ways to make these monsters, which indeed could be friendly to the city's rulers, seem something other than what they really are.

Even cities with good-aligned rulers might have evil creatures guarding them, if the people in power have a way to control those creatures.

M= Magic: Many possibilities exist for defending a city with magic. If there are mid- to high-level mages, clerics, and illusionists in residence, they can be called into action when the city is threatened. Perhaps the leaders have such spell casters in their employ and will routinely have the clerics cast wyvern watch at specified areas outside the gates in the evening, or have mages wizard lock a few key gates. Magic mouth spells could warn people away after certain hours. And high-level illusionists casting programmed illusions could scare away people after dark.

Golems created by high-level mages and clerics make powerful sentries. An aerial servant conjured by a cleric could keep many enemies at bay.

Magic items are also useful in helping to protect a city. For example, a ring of djinni summoning can bring forth a high-powered protector, a bowl of commanding water elementals can make a city's moat very deadly, and a few ropes of entanglement in the hands of sentries can make short work of enemies. The possibilities are limited only by your imagination.

However, it is important that you regulate the use of magic as a defense. A small village isn't likely to have many (if any) high-level spellcasters to come to its aid. And magic items are not easy to come by; not every town surrounded by a moat will have a bowl of commanding water elementals. For city-design purposes, magic used as a city's method of defense should be treated like friendly monsters: if it isn't used commonly as a defense, it will be considered special and more fun for the players when their characters encounter a community that uses it.

AP = Air Patrol: Air patrols (sometimes a branch of magic defense) can consist of a few sentries periodically taking potions of flying, flying spellcasters, or guards on winged mounts. If a city has several alchemists or mages to concoct the mixtures, it might be a common procedure to have sentries imbibe potions of flying and scout the area. Mages in the city's employ might regularly fly invisibly around certain vulnerable locations. In addition, a few specially trained guards might possess rings of flying which aid them in their patrol of the city and surrounding lands; Cities with a budget to afford expensive magic items might place a few guard forces on carpets of flying which can be seen flitting about the city's neighborhoods or hovering above the city's walls.

Flying mounts can be used more often than many magic items and can last longer than fly spells. A city with a stable of pegasi, hippogriffs, griffons, or giant eagles has a formidable air patrol.

Adding a flying patrol can also improve a city's image and make it a place bards sing about and storytellers spin yarns about. It could be an attractive environment for player characters who enjoy the fantastic element the city boasts.

Combinations: The most natural combination of defenses is a militia and a city wall, or a militia, a city wall, and a moat. These are things that can be created by normal people—which make up the bulk of the population of any city. Creating other combinations, such as those suggested in the tables, will also work well to defend a city, but the combination should: make sense when the size, location, and governmental nature of the city are taken into consideration.

The PCs' Role: To help make player characters feel like they belong in the community, they could be called upon to help defend it. Perhaps the PCs are part-time city guards or serve in the militia between adventures. Taking part in the city's defense will help the PCs learn more about the city and your campaign. In addition, scenarios can be built around the problem of defending the city. If the PCs are mid-level or above, the leader of a city or the NPC in charge of the city's defense could ask them to serve as a special defense force that would take on assignments too tough for normal militiamen. Serving in the militia would also be a source of inner conflict for player characters, and could test their alignments. For example, there could be a wonderfully deep dungeon filled with monsters and treasure that is just waiting to be explored. But it is going to have to wait a little longer, since PCs must serve another month in the militia before they can get time off.

FABRICATING A HISTORY

"Boliver, look at that statue. The bronze one at the end of the merchants district. It intrigues me. Maybe it has something to do with the city's history. I'm going to find out what it's about."

"Well, my friend, you go do that. See the tavern about a block from that enchanting statue of yours? That's where I'm going. You spend all the time you like studying the statue. I'll study a few tankards of ale. Come and get me when you're done with your history lesson."

The mage continued down the street to the statue of six figures—a tall male elven ranger, a male half-elven fighter, two female human clerics, and two other males, one of whom could have been of nearly any adventuring class, and the other who was obviously a spellcaster. The ranger looked vaguely familiar, but Athormis couldn't place him. The statue was probably a few hundred years old. A bronze sign beneath it read: "In memory of Sauter's Adventurers and Founders. The city lives in their memory." The mage reached out and touched the cool metal arm of the ranger and then went to join his companion in the tavern.

Establishing a history for a city will help you understand the city you are creating and will help you add color to it, populate it, and create adventures centered on it.

In the steps you have taken in the creation process so far, you have already gone a long way toward defining your city's history. Its location, its present population, and the type of government its people live under are facts that all have a great bearing on how the city began and how it developed. Now it's time to build more facts on top of those and give your city a past—make it exist in time as well as in space.

The age of the community is one of the most important basic facts you must now decide. If a town of humans has existed for less than two hundred years, it will probably have a rich and full history. Several generations of families will have lived there, passing down knowledge from one generation to the next, so that present-day residents will know all about the area and how the community came into being.

If the community is older than two hundred years, its history will be that much deeper—but there's also the possibility that certain facts about its early existence have been lost in antiquity. In such a case, PCs might be approached by a sage who asks them to undertake an expedition to find a lost relic that will explain when and how the city came into being.

In contrast, a young community will naturally lack a lengthy history, and its people will not be as rooted to the land, still retaining some ties to their native communities. Knowing the age of the city you are creating will help you determine how lengthy and how detailed its history should be.

Tracing The Roots

After you assign an age to a city, you must determine what caused it to spring into being. Did the largest city on your continent start out as a humble fishing village that quickly turned into a major port? Maybe the city began as a farming community which concentrated on raising grains and then evolved into a trade center with farming now as a minor industry.

Player characters might be interested in who founded the city. A collection of fishermen or farmers? A group of adventurous pioneers who braved the hardships of the land and fought off a band of goblins which laired where the city now stands?

Maybe (as discussed above) the origin and age of a city are mysterious. The city residents and the residents of neighboring communities do not know how long it has been there. No one knows how it came into being, who founded it, or what caused someone to locate a city on that spot. This is all well and good—but you still have to know these facts, even if the residents don't.

You must also consider the initial mix of people who lived in the community as it was beginning. For example, a village nestled in the woods along the banks of a river originally could have been the home for a few hundred wood elves. However, something might have happened early in the village's life to cause the wood elves to disappear. Perhaps the ancestors of the humans who now live in the village drove them off, and the wood elves who live nearby resent the humans and avoid the village. Or perhaps a band of monsters drove the wood elves from their home, and the human adventurers who defeated the monsters are credited with establishing the village.

Another example: Perhaps a city started out as a human trading settlement, but through the years demihumans moved in. It might be common to see dwarves, elves, gnomes, halflings, and humans walking together on the city streets, the tolerance for each other's races having grown through the years. A history for a community will help justify the current makeup of the population and the population's view toward strangers and members of other races.

You should also consider if the government of a city has changed through the decades. Did a city which began as a humble farming village, where everyone had a say in the day-to-day operations, retain the democratic form of government as it evolved and grew? Or is that city now ruled by a monarchy, and if so when did the form of government change? Charting the course of a city's government will help explain which groups of people support the current government and which groups wish for an alternative.

It does not take long to construct a brief history. You might want to consult other gaming products which feature cities to get ideas on how to create a history. For example, The FORGOTTEN REALMS™ campaign setting contains a history in which major events are listed in a timeline. If your campaign world has some sort of calendar (and it ought to), you can establish dates when certain events occurred in a city's history. Alternatively, you can simply count backward from the present time (after determining when a city came into being) and then locate events at various points during the time that has elapsed since the settlement was founded. Significant events could include invasions, changes in the government, dates when famous dignitaries visited the city, major expansions, sweeping losses in the population because of disease, large festivals that drew people from miles away, and major disasters such as earthquakes, floods, tornadoes, or hurricanes.

Perhaps patterns exist in the city's history, such as a major earthquake hitting the area every 50 to 60 years, or the city being invaded by a band of fighters from the north every 20 years. Player characters interested in a city's history could note these events and try to take precautions so history won't repeat itself. Maybe the PCs are not able to do something about earthquakes or other natural occurrences, but they certainly can go into the mountains to see if the band of fighters is planning another raid.

MAKEUP OF THE POPULATION

Inside the tavern were a few dozen patrons—half-elves, humans, two halflings, and a gray-bearded dwarf. Athormis pulled up a chair next to the dwarf and waved to the barkeep. “Fruit juice, please.”

The dwarf looked embarrassed. “Athormis, couldn’t you have at least ordered wine?”

“Too early in the day, Boliver. Besides, I want to keep my wits sharp. There’s so much to see in this city. I do believe it was founded by a group of adventurers, or so says the plaque next to that statue I studied. This is a fascinating place. Just look at this tavern. There are people of several races in here, and they’re all getting along.”

“Imagine that,” the dwarf said sarcastically as he upended his mug of ale. “Yes, I’ve noticed it, too. This city, like most of the others we’ve been in, is dominated by humans. But this city has a good mix of races. I like it here.”

of classes from city to city; for example, establishing a higher percentage of lower-class residents in one city than in another.

Upper Class: This can include the city’s rulers, nobility, wealthy landowners, shipping magnates, and very wealthy merchants. Almost always, the upper class will comprise the smallest percentage of the population. These are the elite, and if there are too many of them, they lose their elite status.

Middle Class: Lesser city officials, leaders of the city’s guilds, rich merchants, ship captains, successful artisans and craftsmen, and well-to-do farmers fall into this category. In some cities, the bulk of the population is considered middle class. However, in other cities the middle class could comprise a third or less of the population, with the largest percentage of the population falling into the lower class.

Lower Class: This consists of poor farmers, sailors, journeymen, tradesmen, poor artisans and craftsmen, poor merchants, laborers, and any other persons who can’t be defined as belonging to a higher class.

Adventurers usually will fit into the middle class or lower class, depending on their economic condition as of their last adventure. Although some adventurers, including the player characters, could have enough wealth to put them in the upper-class bracket, they might not be considered as such.

The Population’s Age

Although most communities have residents of all ages, some communities have a predominant age bracket. If you choose to have a few towns or cities with a predominant age bracket, you should point it out to player characters who visit—it is a fact that is fairly noticeable. For example, a community which has stagnated or is on the decline, with few employment possibilities for the residents, might have a higher than average proportion of elderly people. (The young people might have moved to other cities to look for work.) Or perhaps you could create a town where there is an inordinate number of young people. (A plague might have wiped out most of the elderly.)

Predominant Races

Some cities in your campaign could be melting pots, where people of all races and ages come together for mutual protection and to earn a living. Such cities likely will be along a coast or other major travel route where it is easy for people to journey there, and they likely will have relatively large populations.

However, many cities with a fantasy or medieval flavor will have a predominant race or heritage. For example, humans could make up the majority of the population in many of a DM’s cities. This could further be broken down into types of humans, such as fair-skinned, light-haired humans from the north; dark-skinned, dark-haired humans from the south; or tall, muscular, deep-voiced humans from the west. The same can apply to other races. For example, one town could be composed predominantly of wood elves, another high elves, and yet another half-elves.

In addition to the predominant race in a city, you must determine additional races present, with the overall mix of the population making sense. In the AD&D® game, dwarves and elves do not necessarily get along. Therefore, it would not make much sense to have a community made up of large numbers of dwarves and high elves—unless there existed a fantastic reason why the races are coexisting.

A city’s population base will also help determine how the player characters fit in. A city composed solely of humans might be suspicious of a group of player character adventurers who are dwarves, halflings, and gnomes. Or a community of dwarves could snub visiting player character elves.

You also must decide if “monster” races such as lizard men and half-orcs are allowed to walk the street. People live in a community in part for protection, so it is likely that they will not tolerate monsters walking around in their merchant quarters. However, you may allow such monster races in some of your cities, especially if there are valid reasons for their presence. For example, a band of neutral lizard men live a few miles from a trading community and once a month come to town to do business. Perhaps a city will allow members of such races to visit if they obtain permits or licenses or if some residents within the community will vouch for them.

The existence of demihumans in the AD&D® game universe gives you a tremendous opportunity to create a distinctive mix of residents for each of the cities you design—leading to a different atmosphere in every community the PCs visit.

Social Classes

There are three basic social classes: lower, middle, and upper. You might want to consider adding a fourth class, the nobility. Another possibility is to further break down the classes into divisions, with two (lower/upper) or three (lower/middle/upper) subclasses within each major section. It is up to you how many classes exist in your cities, but it is certain that some kind of class structure prevails. Among any group of people, there will always be haves and have-nots, even if the difference between the two groups is relatively small. At the very least, in any community with a government, there will be leaders and nonleaders—and in an anarchy, the richest and/or strongest members of the group will quickly establish themselves as the upper class, even if they aren’t actual leaders. It is also important that you mix the percentages

TAXES: A WAY OF LIFE

Few communities can exist without a tax structure to pay for public improvements, civic programs, the military, and the salaries of the leaders. Because of that, you will have to establish at least a rudimentary tax system for your major cities and the communities the player characters frequent.

To make the tax system easy to deal with, you could have all communities within a country adopt the same basic system. However, some communities might have taxes beyond the basic system, to support a growing army or the expensive tastes of a monarch.

Taxes are frequently something that player characters (and some DMs) do not think about. But the characters will learn about them quickly—and with mixed emotions—when taxes become a practice added to the campaign. It is possible that taxes will not affect player characters who travel from town to town, calling no place home. However, player characters who have a city or a town as a base of operations should be taxed like any nonadventuring resident. And traveling characters who keep some of their treasure in local banks or holding establishments also will be affected.

To prevent taxation from becoming a game detail that bogs down a campaign with unnecessary paperwork, you could levy taxes only once or twice a year and charge every resident a straight percentage of all their earnings and accumulated wealth, such as 5% or 10%. Taxing property as well as cash will keep player characters from spending all their gold pieces on items which they hope are not taxable.

However, you might want to adopt a tax system which affects classes of people differently. If a city's ruler favors the wealthy, the city might only tax members of the upper class 5%, and members of the middle and lower classes 10%. A city with a democratic form of government could tax everyone equally or could tax people according to their ability to pay—charging the rich 10% or more, the middle class 5%, and the lower class even less.

A city run by syndics could develop a tax structure involving the mercantile system. Farmers bringing grain to market could be charged by the wagonload, shop owners could be taxed on the goods in their store and on the income they receive, and peddlers could be taxed on the goods they want to sell and be charged a fee for a peddler's license. Player characters could be affected by the taxes, although not directly. Goods could cost more in the community because of taxes; a sword a player character would pay 25 gp for in one town could cost twice as much in this community. And player characters trying to sell or trade some of the treasure they accumulated on their last adventure might be faced with merchants' taxes or be charged with breaking the law.

If you choose to have groups of people taxed differently in a community, you may want to place a stiff tax burden on adventurers. Many government officials, especially those who are former adventurers, realize that adventurers are frequently laden with gems, gold, and magic items that they have picked up in a nearby dungeon. These officials could see adventurers, including the player characters, as targets for special taxes—based on, of course, the fact that adventurers are more wealthy than the majority of the town's citizens. In such an instance, the government might choose to charge recognized adventurers a tax of 20% or more. This will certainly get the player characters to notice the tax system and other aspects of your cities. To take the tax system one step further, you could opt to tax magic items—with everyone paying a specified fee for each magic item they possess. However, you must be careful that you do not tax the city residents or the player characters too heavily, or your city will be faced with the threat of revolution or never will be visited by the player characters again.

To back up a tax system, each city must have laws to punish the offenders and ways to enforce the tax system and the laws. For example, a city run by a council of priests should have little trouble assigning clerics to go to the homes of people suspected of tax fraud and question them about their wealth and belongings (obtaining truthful information through detect lie spells and other magics). Or, a city which has a tax on magic items should have a means to ascertain who has magic and how much of it is possessed. A staff of low-level mages and clerics or a few officials with wands of magic detection should be able to find out where the magic is.

Tax rates also could be affected by events taking place in a community. If a war is brewing and a town needs to raise money for arms, and to feed and clothe its soldiers, taxes could go up. Or if the city rulers want to build more public buildings, a special tax could be created for that purpose.

How elaborate a tax system becomes will depend on how much time you want to put in on it. You must be careful to not let a tax system take a commanding position within your city and mirror the real world too much, however, because players could soon become bored and decide to stay in the wilderness.

To add some variety without making things much more complex, think about unusual taxes or fees that a particular city might assess. A town might prohibit the wearing of weapons by civilians—unless the person is willing to pay a fee for the right to keep his sword strapped to his side. Another city has tax collectors stationed at all of the major street intersections, where they collect a small amount of money from everyone who wants to walk or ride down that street (the world's first tollway system?).

Taxes can also serve as an avenue for adventure. An oppressive city ruler can become obsessed with taxes—layering one tax on top of another until the city's poorer residents seek the player characters' help. A revolution could be in order. Or a city's tax money could be stolen by outside forces. If the player characters are not able to recover the money, another tax will have to be assessed to pay for the upkeep of the city's army. From a different angle, a town's new ruler, who campaigned to abolish taxes, did just that when he was elected to office. Although the populace initially liked the idea (and many within the city walls still do), the situation will cause havoc. Public improvements will fall by the wayside. And it is a mystery how the city officials will be paid. It could be up to the player characters to straighten out the mess and get the government and the tax system back on the right path. You can also set up the city's chief tax collector as a nemesis for the PCs, creating adventures around the collector's attempts to tax them.

A CITY'S BUILDING BLOCKS

To add more depth and realism to fantasy cities, you can detail the materials the city buildings are made of and describe the appearance of the structures to your players. The city will seem more alive if everyone knows what it looks like.

Many players like to hear descriptive passages about the dungeon rooms their characters enter or wilderness settings their characters chance upon. Roaming about a city should be no different. If you have taken time to establish what the city's buildings look like and what they are made of, you can regale your players with descriptions of the merchants' quarters where buildings are packed close together, the docks where workers hurry between ships, and the residential and government sections bustling with pedestrians. You can lavishly describe the differences between the spacious manors where the wealthy live and the dismal hovels occupied by the poor. And the player characters might be tempted to stay in the city longer because they can "see" it. Use of the building fold-ups and street layouts that come with this product will be a big help in getting players to visualize sections of a city.

The Raw Material

Wood, straw, brick, fieldstone, clay, and hard-packed earth are some of the materials people in a medieval period would have to work with in creating buildings. The materials could be held together with mortar, dung, nails, and twine and fashioned into homes, businesses, and public buildings. The more money people in a community have to work with, the better the materials they can afford, such as brick and fieldstone. You may have other materials in your campaign which can be used to build structures: special hardwood from exotic trees, a unique sort of thatch material that repels water, fantastic "airstones" that are very light but also very strong.

If you take some time to describe the various building materials that are used by residents and which ones are superior to others, player characters soon will be able to tell who in a community has money, based on the materials their homes are made of. The building fold-ups make it easy for players to see which buildings were more costly to make, and the colorful fold-up exteriors show at a glance what the buildings are made of.

In addition, the size of a building can help determine the wealth of the occupants. Putting several of the fold-ups together to make an estate will make it obvious to the PCs that an important character lives there.

Adventures can arise out of building construction. For example, a gang of bullies could be setting fire to the wood homes in the community, threatening residents for protection money. Or a high-level wizard could be terrorizing the wealthy by turning their homes to mud with a few carefully cast rock to mud spells. A shortage of building materials also can suggest an adventure; the player characters could be hired to travel to a nearby town and bring back wagonloads of brick.

Ice Can Be Nice

The location of a city can help determine what its buildings are made of. For example, a fishermen's village in the far north could consist of several dozen igloos. If there are artisans in that village, some of the buildings could be quite elaborate, with large, shiny domes and sparkling, twisting spires, all carved out of snow and ice. Ice sculptures could ring the edge of town. The city would gleam in the sunlight, and the moon and stars would make the buildings glitter in the evening. Player characters would be attracted to such a city and intrigued by the people who created the buildings.

In contrast, most of the buildings in a town on the plains would be built of wood, reeds, and grasses—building materials that would be abundant in that environment. A town like this might take on the appearance of a frontier town from the Old West, where a main street runs through the middle of the merchants' district. In another plains community, the buildings might consist of wooden structures covered with animal skins.

A town or a village in the mountains actually might be built into the mountains, with homes being cavelike structures and their entrances covered with wood or stone fronts.

The homes in a village nestled in the woods might be built in the trees and made out of grasses, twigs, leaves, and other abundant materials.

Size and The Land

How much land a city covers, and the population of the city, are other factors that will play a role in what the buildings look like. If a town with a relatively small population covers a lot of land, the buildings could be spacious one-story structures surrounded by big yards. On the other hand, if a city has a large population and not a great deal of land, the buildings will be close together, with only enough yard to permit people to walk between the buildings. There will be few one-story structures, and when a building needs to be expanded, the owner will have to take off the roof and add another level. The fold-ups in this product can accommodate a variety of city styles and layouts. You can create a town where all the buildings are one story tall. Another town could have only multistoried buildings.

Don't Forget The Wall

If a community is surrounded by a wall for protection, it is important that you establish what the wall is made of. A wooden wall might not be much protection if the enemy comes at it with siege machinery and flaming oil. However, walls made of brick, fieldstone, dried earth, and other more durable substances will last longer and afford the residents more safety.

WHERE GOES THE NEIGHBORHOOD?

"Dwarf! You, dwarf!" said a halfling a few tables away. "Why aren't you at the feast for Moradin the dwarven community is having?"

Athormis and Boliver turned to the speaker. "My name's Boliver, not dwarf," Boliver said. "And I don't know anything about the feast you're talking about. But I'd like to hear more."

The halfling approached the pair. "I'm Sneezil Fastfingers—at your service. You must be new to the city. I had just figured you for locals. This tavern isn't frequented by many visitors. They prefer the places with fancy decorations and fruit in the drinks. The dwarven community, about a dozen blocks from here, is having a feast for Moradin. I'm going simply because I have a lot of friends in that neighborhood and they always invite me. You're welcome to join me. But your human friend might stand out a little."

with a long, brown beard sat in his place. "Let's go," Athormis said. "I'd like to see the dwarven neighborhood."

"Sauter has quite a few neighborhoods," the halfling said as he led them through the city streets. "But that's common. Almost every community that I've been in that was larger than a village had neighborhoods, sections of the community designated for various groups of people and businesses. Neighborhoods make cities more interesting. And lots of adventure can be found in neighborhoods."

"Some cities create neighborhoods through zoning laws, establishing specific locations where homes, businesses, and public buildings can be erected. Cities without zoning laws or building plans could have a nightmare landscape of public buildings wedged between private homes and merchants' shops scattered throughout residential districts and the government quarter. A patchwork arrangement like that, which evolves with no regard to city planning, might not be the ideal place to live and certainly would present problems to visitors—especially people like yourselves. It could be difficult to find anything!

Most medieval cities did not have actual zoning laws. But it frequently happened that, over the years of the evolution of a city, sections of the population with something in common did end up being clustered in one general location—a neighborhood for a certain social class, people of a certain occupation, and so forth. You can apply the same principle when creating a fantasy city. If you put a little thought into establishing zones within a city, it will be easy for player characters to locate shops they want to go to and neighborhoods they want to investigate.

An easy way to begin developing neighborhoods is to sketch out the city boundaries and draw in some of the main streets. It is not necessary to draw in every building, and it is far from practical—especially if the city you are working with is large. After the sketch is complete, circle certain areas, designating them as business or merchants districts, the government quarter, residential districts, the entertainment quarter, and wharf area (if there is one for the city).

Many mid-sized and large cities will have several merchants and residential districts. This is because as the city grew, "spreading out from its original center," additional neighborhoods developed. In a very large city, there could appear to be cities within the city, because as that community grew to its great proportions large, self-sufficient neighborhoods developed. A person living on the east side of such a large city might never need to travel to the west side, since businesses, temples, and recreation areas are available on his own side of town.

A Place for The Wealthy

Members of the upper class like to live apart from the rest of society, building their homes in a portion of the city or an area just outside the city where they can have large yards and peace and quiet. They prefer not to associate with classes of people beneath them, especially the lower class. They want a section that is clean and better than the rest of the city.

Their homes will be manor houses, estates, or small palaces and castles. They will be made of the best materials, and many of them will be ornate and will have sculpted lawns. Some will have fences or walls around them for security.

There may be little cause for player characters to venture into a wealthy neighborhood, unless they are invited to a feast or are curious. The crime rate is low or nonexistent in these neighborhoods, because the wealthy can afford guards or have access to magic to protect themselves and their belongings. However, there are always avenues for adventures in any neighborhood. Perhaps a very crafty and very experienced thief overcame all the traps a wealthy landowner had in place and managed to steal a set of priceless jewels. Or perhaps a monster has found its way into a wealthy neighborhood and is killing the guards. Pulling the player characters into a wealthy neighborhood for an adventure will let them witness the opulence and extravagance of the neighborhood compared to the conditions in poorer sections of the city.

A Place for The Poor

The buildings are close together in lower-class neighborhoods, and the people are, too. Several families—as many as 40 or 50 people—could be crowded together in a large home. In the majority of poorer sections, the crime rate is high, and there is more violence, because the living conditions cause tempers to flare and people to become desperate. Because living conditions usually are not clean, there are vermin—rats and insects of normal and giant size—living alongside the people and competing for their food and shelter.

Because of these factors, player characters could frequently find themselves moving about in poorer "neighborhoods, especially if they are in the employ of the city and forced to deal with the crimes and giant vermin there.

And The Classes in Between

Members of the middle class live in a variety of buildings, based on how much money or property they have and what part of town they want to live in. Middle-class buildings range from rented quarters to fairly large homes.

The majority of player characters will fit into this class of society; and therefore could end up spending most of their time in middle-class neighborhoods. These neighborhoods are among the most colorful in the city, as the middle class is composed of a wide range of people of varying incomes and experience.

Merchants and Public Buildings

Merchants can be found in business districts in lower-class and middle-class neighborhoods, and should be located near roads so it will be easy for them to move goods in and out of town or to a river or harbor for shipping. If there are zoning laws in the city, merchants' stalls and buildings will be in designated areas and not scattered among residential buildings. The same can be said for public buildings, although most of those probably will be found near merchants' quarters and near middle-class neighborhoods. Public buildings will consist of government offices, courts, guard and army barracks, jails, and public recreation centers. Grouping public buildings and merchants shops together is convenient for the public. City residents and player characters will find it easy to take care of their business if all the places they need to visit are located close together.

A Place for Demihumans

If a city is dominated by humans, other races who live there might have formed their own little neighborhoods for a sense of camaraderie and to feel more comfortable.

A large city should have a foreign quarter, where humans who are natives of different parts of the country live. It also could have an elven quarter, which further could be broken down for half-elves, wood elves, and high elves. A halfling district could consist of burrowlike homes and could be adjacent to a community of dwarves. It is important to note that not all elves, halflings, dwarves, or other demihumans in a large city would live in one of those neighborhoods. Many of the demihumans will live side by side with humans.

Demihuman neighborhoods within a large city can add fun to a campaign and will provide player character demihumans places to go to learn information about what is going on in the city and to feel more at home.

"Very practical—neighborhoods for people of like backgrounds and interests," Athormis said. "I think adventurers would fit in well in a demihuman neighborhood, since most adventuring parties are composed of a mix of races. And these neighborhoods would be great places to explore—like cities within a city."

The halfling nodded and took them to a neighborhood where the homes looked very sturdy and were constructed of stone. "This is it," he said, and immediately began to size up the crowd.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT

As the two dwarves and the halfling entered the dwarven community, they saw two city guards carrying away a struggling dwarf. Behind the guard stormed a dwarf in an apron, brandishing a meat cleaver. "And don't let him out for at least a year. Stealing from celebrants at the feast of Moradin is a terrible crime."

"Good thing when our adventuring group split up last year, the thief went with the ranger," Boliver said. Athormis nodded and headed toward the center of the celebration, where a large boar was roasting on a spit. The halfling gulped and stuffed his hands into his pants pockets. And the music and the crowd swallowed up the three.

Communities the size of a village and larger should have a code of laws which the residents are expected to live up to and which the community has a way to enforce. Some communities as small as a hamlet might also have a code of laws, although it may not necessarily be written down. How complex a community's laws are will depend on the type of government in the community, the predominant alignment of the citizens and the leaders, and the amount of time you are willing to spend to put the laws together.

It does not matter whether a city is run by good or evil characters; it still should have laws. Without laws and a means to enforce them, a city would be plagued by chaotic behavior, and bullies with enough power behind them soon would be in control. (This is basically the situation that would arise in an anarchy, where the only significant law is survival of the fittest.)

A point about chaotic alignment as it pertains to communities and laws: The leader of a city may be chaotic in alignment, but the philosophy of the city itself must be based on some aspect of lawfulness in order for a legal system to exist. The concept of a chaotic person governing a lawful community is not as strange as it might seem; the chaotic person is, by nature, concerned primarily (perhaps solely) with his own welfare, but he is willing to work "within the system" to achieve his goal. A chaotic good leader, for example, might want to treat his subjects well because by doing so he broadens the base of his own popularity and power. A chaotic evil leader will make no secret of the fact that he cares for no one but himself—and woe to anyone who gets in the way of his selfish motives.

It is not necessary to consult law books or police logs to create a system of laws and punishments for a community. Common sense will yield a workable system that can be understood by the player: characters. Many PCs will never become involved with the law in a community, because they will attempt to stay on the straight and narrow and will only hear about the laws through listening to gossip and reports of events in the city. However, other PCs who are boisterous in town or who are quick to jump into fights with the local residents could quickly learn firsthand about the legal system.

Listing The Crimes

Some of the more obvious crimes that could occur in a medieval-flavored fantasy community include murder, attempted murder; kidnapping, treason, assault, burglary, theft, tax evasion, counterfeiting, defrauding the public or the government, attempting to overthrow the government, deserting from the army, vandalism, arson, public indecency, public nuisance, and public intoxication.

Some special laws should apply only to certain cities; it could be illegal to burn cooking or heating fires after midnight in a town where most of the buildings are made of wood or straw. Or it could be illegal to use more than a specified amount of water per day in a desert town where water is in limited supply.

In addition, you could add crimes such as bringing monsters—alive or dead—into the city, selling magic items without a permit, riding nonstandard mounts without a permit, and using magic or casting spells within the city walls.

Some fantasy towns, just like present-day cities, could have several unusual laws that are on the books but are no longer rigidly enforced, defining such crimes as spitting on city streets or walking on the right side of a street after dark.

Punishment

Penalties will vary with the crimes committed, with the more severe crimes such as murder, kidnapping, and treason having much stiffer punishments than crimes such as carrying a sword without a permit or public drunkenness. In addition, punishments should vary between communities, since not all leaders view crimes the same and not all leaders have the same temperaments. For example, someone found guilty of kidnapping in one city might be hanged the next morning, while a person found guilty of the same crime in another town might be sentenced to 10 years in prison. Also, what is considered a crime in one city, such as public drunkenness or public indecency, might only be seen as an amusing or annoying act in some other city.

In some communities, you might decide that justice is harsh, with severe penalties for all crimes and capital punishment for criminals who are guilty of seemingly minor violations. Residents will be on their toes, to put it mildly, in these communities. In other cities, justice may be lax, and people might be prosecuted only if they robbed the wrong person or kidnapped someone of consequence in the community.

Possible penalties for crimes include death, prison sentences, monetary fines (which could be coupled with other sentences), assignment to work details, loss of a limb (such as losing a hand or arm for stealing), or being required to perform a dangerous mission for the government. This latter sentence could be used as a vehicle to propel player characters who are found guilty of breaking the law into adventures in and out of the city. A few penalties could also be based on a city's needs. For example, if a city is building a wall around its borders, the justice system would be more likely to sentence criminals to a work detail than to time in a prison.

Creating a Justice System

If a community has laws and punishments for breaking those laws, it should also have a court system or some type of recourse for hearing the cases. Such a system could be complex, with judges to hear the case, officials representing the accused and the accusers, and a jury of selected citizens to decide on guilt or innocence. Or it could be simple, with a judge or moderator appointed to consider the evidence and render a verdict. Some courts might not even allow the accused to speak in their own behalf. A community with a large number of clerics could put them in charge of the justice system. Their detect lie spells could eliminate the need for a jury in many cases.

CUSTOMS AND BELIEFS

"Praise Moradin!" the revelers shouted. Athormis reached for another hunk of roast boar while Boliver danced with his new friends. The pair had lost their halfling companion shortly after arriving at the festivities. "Praise to Sauter for letting people worship freely!" another celebrant added.

The dance ended and Boliver joined his polymorphed friend. "I'm pleased to be in a city that doesn't restrict people's beliefs," the dwarf said.

"We don't know that some beliefs aren't restricted," Athormis replied. "Maybe the Sauter officials don't permit the worship of evil deities. I halfway hope that's the case. I've had my fill of evil clerics and their fanatic followers. I've also had my fill of this roast boar. And I'm going to have to leave in a few minutes. My spell will be wearing off, and I'll be returning to my human form. The only other humans around here are city guards. And I don't want to cause problems."

ship will suggest themselves automatically. Following is some advice that will help you make logical and reasonable decisions about customs and beliefs.

Politics Plays a Part

The government within a city will have an impact on the number of temples and deities worshiped. A city governed by a hierarchy of priests may not be tolerant of other religions. Perhaps only the priests' religion is recognized, and all the known temples in that community are for that religion's deity or deities. In such a city you might want to establish other religions that operate underground, away from the prying eyes of the city rulers.

On the other hand, perhaps a large city governed by a democracy encourages freedom of worship, and there are many temples devoted to many different deities of many different alignments.

Another option, in the middle ground, is to establish two to five major recognized religions within a city. The majority of the population would worship one of these deities, and there would be temples built to them. However, other deities could be recognized by a minority within the population. These people might have to practice their beliefs in someone's home or business because they lack the money for a temple. However, they would not have to keep their beliefs hidden.

Still another possibility is to have many places devoted to a variety of deities. However, not all of these places will be large, inspiring temples. Perhaps one location is a shrine in a park with benches around it. Another place could be a storefront establishment in a lower-class neighborhood that passes out prayers and food to the residents. And yet another option could be a covered wagon that travels throughout the city, while the clerics who drive it spread their faith.

Alignment Makes a Difference

The alignment of a city's rulers will have an effect on the number of deities worshiped and the deities' alignments. For example, a lawful good monarch would prevent temples from being built to chaotic neutral or evil deities. If some of the city's residents wanted to worship these deities, they would have to do so in secret. This monarch could declare one official deity for the city, while not prohibiting the populace from worshipping other good deities.

If a city is governed by evil rulers, the deity recognized would most likely be evil—with the worship of good deities frowned upon or prohibited. However, if the evil rulers are trying to hide their true natures, they might allow residents to worship good and neutral deities.

These are only examples of how government influences customs and beliefs. It is up to you to determine how—if at all—the political and religious factions relate. In some cities, church and state may be entirely separate; the government doesn't care who worships whom, so long as religious issues don't pose a threat to the general welfare or to the government itself.

Creating a Conflict

You should consider establishing a conflict in a community between worshipers. If a city or town has two major temples, the leaders of each establishment could be involved in a battle of one-upmanship and could continually try to recruit worshipers, both from within the community and from within groups of transient adventurers. Perhaps both temple leaders are of good alignment and do not go about their efforts maliciously, but are still causing problems within the community.

An opposing possibility could be cooperating temples, where the leaders work together and maybe even have a joint council where the community's concerns are discussed.

Conflict, of course, translates into an opportunity for adventure—and that's where the PCs come in. Perhaps some of the party members are devout followers of a deity whose worshipers are being persecuted. Maybe the PCs have no vested interest in any of a city's major religions, but will be hired by the government to help quell a disturbance between two rival factions.

Keep it Fantastic

No matter how many temples you establish in your communities or how many deities your NPCs and PCs recognize, you should remember to keep it on a fantasy level. Bringing real-life religions and beliefs into a fantasy campaign usually is not a good idea.

PUTTING THE PCs TO WORK

Boliver and Athormis left the revelers behind—and just in time, as the mage's polymorph spell ran out and he returned to his human form. "Mmmm, but that was delicious. And we didn't even have to pay for it," Athormis said.

"Don't feel bad about it. I donated ten gold to the temple they're building. That should just about cover what you ate! The friends laughed and headed to the center of the city, where they planned to find lodging. Along the way they spotted notices illuminated by the light pouring out of building windows. Boliver stopped to look at a few.

"Athormis, look at this. These are postings for work: merchant guards, street cleaners, teachers, sailors. If we ever run out of gold, we could always work for a few months."

Athormis chuckled. "Remember when we were sergeants? About eight years ago? That stint of employment lasted about two weeks. You had trouble keeping regular working hours."

A community is a busy place. There's always work to be done, and usually a shortage of people who are willing and able to perform that work. Whether for a diversion, a challenge, or a way to pick up some cash without risking one's life, player characters may decide (or you may decide for them) that getting a job in the city for a while is not a bad idea.

For people as skilled and versatile as the PCs, the possibilities are almost limitless. Joining the city guard, enlisting in the city army, hiring on as bodyguards for important and wealthy people or city officials, becoming bouncers for taverns and other establishments, becoming bounty hunters or spies, running for public office or assuming an official position, seeking a simple job in the merchants' quarter or along the docks, and opening a business are among the jobs that adventurers can consider. Some of the opportunities are described in a little more detail below, including suggestions about how to make the jobs interesting for your players and how to turn them into adventures for a campaign.

On Guard!

A job in the city guard will appeal primarily to fighters and clerics, characters who typically have good fighting abilities. Thieves who successfully convince city officials that they are fighters also can find work on the guard force. Mages and illusionists are frequently seen as physically weak and would be encouraged to seek work elsewhere. Most city guards would prefer to hire characters who would wear armor. It is up to you to decide if your city's guard force is an equal-opportunity employer, hiring people of both sexes, or if the guard force is strictly a men-only or a women-only line of work.

The guard force in a town is composed primarily of 0-level and 1st level fighters, with a few higher-level fighters serving as the top-ranking officers. Player character adventurers of any level would be welcomed into the guard and probably would be given positions of authority. However, in a city, especially a large one, the guard force would be more experienced. Perhaps nothing less than 1st or 2nd level fighters would be accepted, and guard sergeants would be no lower than 3rd level. A larger city has a greater population to draw from, and therefore can be a little more choosy about who is hired to protect the citizens.

Before you allow player characters to join the city guard, you must decide how many people are in the guard and the ranks and numbers of the guard officers. You need to assign levels to the ranks, in part based on the size of the community. For example, in a city, sergeants might be of 3rd and 4th levels, lieutenants 5th and 6th, and captains 7th and 8th.

In a town, the levels of guard officers would generally be lower because there are fewer people to draw from and there would be a smaller guard force.

In a community of any size, you can have a little fun by creating an 8th level fighter who's still only a sergeant or an enlisted man because he has trouble following orders. At the other extreme is the captain who's a measly 3rd level fighter—the son of the commandant, who was given or promoted into a position he's not really capable of holding.

When a player character asks for a position on the guard force, you should look at the PC's level and decide what rank to assign the character. However, a 6th level character hoping to be hired as a captain could be in for a surprise. You might want to have the character start out as a sergeant to prove himself. To add a touch of realism, you can list how many men the PC officer is in charge of and the amount of time he is expected to work. City officials might be tolerant of adventurers, allowing them to work on shifts of three weeks on and three weeks off, to accommodate an adventurer's "need" to make journeys to dungeons and wilderness areas. After all, the city will benefit because the fighter is gaining more experience, sharpening his abilities, and possibly picking up magic items to improve his ability to hold his own in combat.

It is important to establish the guard force's duties, which probably would consist mainly of patrolling the city and arresting lawbreakers. If a city has an adventurers quarter, the guard officials might station PC guards there, believing that adventurers can deal better with other adventurers than city-bred guards who lack the same life experiences.

You should award PC guards money and experience for their accomplishments and should promote PCs within the ranks as they rise in levels and perform well for the city. Guard work is an adventure in itself, and should bring rewards accordingly.

Concocting adventures that are related to a PC's stint on guard duty will give you more opportunities to use the street layouts and fold-up buildings that come with this product. The PC guards could be charged with stopping a riot in the merchants quarter, catching a notorious cat burglar, halting a ring of pickpockets, posing as victims to snare a band of thieves and muggers, or investigating a counterfeiting racket. In addition, player character guards could pick up a myriad of rumors while on their beats, learning about newly discovered dungeons or unearthed ruins from adventurers they meet.

Working on the city guard will also give PCs a chance to travel throughout the city, learning about all the neighborhoods and the people who live there. It is a perfect opportunity for you to show off your creation.

They're in The Army Now

Serving in a city's militia is in some respects similar to being in the city guard. PCs could be assigned ranks based on their levels. However, unlike in the guard, wizards would be sought after. Military leaders recognize that a well-cast fireball can do much more damage than a squadron of low-level fighters. You could choose to have the military pay spellcasters more than ordinary soldiers. But it would be unlikely that wizards would be named as officers. Fighters, most military officials would agree, have the best military minds and can plan the most successful strategies. Thieves might be welcomed into some armies if they agree to perform spying missions. And clerics would be in great demand because of their ability to heal the wounded. The army is a place where an entire adventuring party could find work.

How busy an army is—and the player characters enlisted in it—will depend on the city's relationship with nearby tribes and communities. An army in peacetime is more likely to grant the PCs leaves so they can adventure. However, the adventuring likely will have to be short-term, since most furloughs might be for only a week or two.

Army duty is a continuous source of adventures and could keep the PCs so busy they will not have time to look for a dungeon. An army, or portions of it, could be called upon to help the city guard when disasters such as tornadoes, floods, and massive fires strike. In addition, members of the army could also be called upon to stop riots, to protect city officials, or to serve as added protection during festivals and celebrations.

Player characters can be encouraged to take an active part in a city's army by being made responsible for drawing up defense plans and determining how troops will be deployed if the city comes under attack. If a city is located next to an ocean or a large river, the PCs could be expected to develop water-based defense plans.

If the city is aggressive and wants to use its army to wipe out tribes of monsters lairing nearby, the PCs would be called upon to develop attack strategies and may be asked to lead an advance force to learn the strength of the monsters. If the city learns that a neighboring city is planning a war, the PCs could be charged with helping to direct an attack against that city—taking the war to the enemy to prevent the PCs' home city from being damaged and innocent citizens from being killed. The player characters also could be assigned spying missions to neighboring cities. Or they could be asked to patrol the area surrounding the city, where they might find an adventure or two to undertake.

Being Bodyguards

This is another opportunity for the player characters to find work as a group. Wealthy merchants, rich landowners, and powerful city officials all need protection—or think they need protection. Some of these people have accumulated enemies through the years: people they have put out of business because of shrewd mercantile maneuvers, former landowners who have had their property absorbed, and former officials who were ousted from office or defeated in elections. The PCs could be asked to accompany these high-powered NPCs as they travel through the city or journey to other cities.

The job will provide rich role-playing opportunities, as the PCs will have to deal with haughty NPCs who are used to being waited on, greedy merchants who only care about making money, or political officials whom they might not see eye to eye with. It could test the PCs' loyalty to their employers. However, not all high-powered NPCs should have major character flaws. Some of them should be easy to get along with, and be people with whom the PCs could easily sympathize.

Adventure possibilities include protecting a political official from assassination attempts; accompanying a wealthy merchant who is traveling with a cargo of precious gems and other valuables; setting up defenses for a wealthy landowner who has been receiving threats from an unknown party; guarding the city's museum, which is filled with temptations for thieves; or escorting a nobleman's son to a wedding with another nobleman's daughter in a nearby city.

As with a city guard position, being a bodyguard will allow a PC to explore many sections of the city and will let you show off some of the work you have put into creating the city.

Bouncers and Strongarms

Although this is a viable form of employment for player character adventurers, especially fighters, there are fewer kinds of scenario possibilities you can develop. However, the job is not without merit. It will be an avenue for you to use some of the buildings in this product and stage elaborate bar-room brawls that will test PCs' abilities to subdue NPCs without killing them. You can create chase scenes that will have the PCs running after culprits through the twisting and turning streets of the city, over rooftops, and perhaps through dark and dangerous alleys.

It is likely that only strong-looking fighters will be employed bouncers for taverns and other establishments in the city, with the wages being dependent upon how well-to-do or busy the establishment is. And it is not likely that the entire party of adventurers can work as bouncers at the same establishment. However, while there are drawbacks to this type of work, there are a few advantages. PCs working as bouncers in the adventurers quarter could learn about dungeons, monsters lairs, pirates' plans to attack the city, or thieves discussing what establishments to rob.

Bounty Hunters and Spies

These professions could be used for adventures in and out of the city. PCs of any class, race, or sex could become bounty hunters or spies, working for city officials, merchants, or themselves.

As bounty hunters the, PCs could stalk the city streets or the area around the city, looking for NPC villains with prices on their heads. This could pit the PCs against powerful and cunning NPCs you have developed and could take the PCs almost anywhere you desire—in the sewers under the city streets, through the various neighborhoods of the city, and through the environs surrounding the city, testing their investigative and combat abilities. Player characters could come up with a considerable amount of treasure this way, or could end up losing out if their targets are more powerful than they are. They could even gain fame and fortune in the city. Of course, you always can add a few twists, such as the PCs' target being framed by the people who hired the PCs to catch him.

Spying assignments can also take the player characters to a variety of places and will test their ability to be stealthy information gatherers, rather than hack-and-slash adventurers who swing first and ask questions later. And they will allow you to carefully lay out encounters involving the streets and fold-up buildings.

Spy work in itself is an adventure, and has the potential to lead the characters into a string of further adventures as they uncover more and more information. Perhaps the PCs will uncover the location of a major thieves' guild; will learn about a plot to overthrow the government; will discover that counterfeit coins are being released in the city in an attempt to ruin the economy; or will discover that a band of evil adventurers is bringing monsters into the city through the sewer system and plans to use them to threaten merchants into paying protection money.

Spying is yet another profession which will help the PCs learn about your cities and the colorful NPCs who reside there. It can also put the PCs in peril as they accumulate enemies who might pursue them in adventures in the future.

Getting into Office

Politics is a line of work that could appeal to any player character, regardless of class, race, or sex—although in some fantasy campaigns it may be difficult for a woman or a demihuman to rise to a position of power in a human community. How player characters become involved in the government of a city or town will depend largely on the form of government you have established. For example, if a community is run by a dictator, the only way the PCs could get into power is to make good friends with the dictator and be appointed to a position, or to overthrow him and take a position by force. On the other hand, a democracy opens the door to all sorts of possibilities. In any case, three main factors have a bearing on how successful a PC might be as a leader or politician; these are discussed below.

Size of the Community: PCs wanting a position of power probably will have better luck obtaining it in smaller communities, where there are not as many adventurers and where they will be deemed as more important people. It will be easier for PCs to impress a community of 500 than one of 5,000. And if the community's residents are taken with the PCs, they may even ask the characters to lead them.

Race: Although many NPCs in fantasy campaigns are race-blind, communities as a whole are not. A half-elf seeking an appointment as a city official may not be well received in a town composed primarily of humans. However, the half-elf would have a better chance of getting the position than a full elf, dwarf, halfling, or gnome. Of course, if the appointment is being made by the city's chief official, and the PC is in good favor with that official, race might have little impact.

Charisma: Politicians and officials tend to be charismatic. They have a way with words and can turn a phrase to get the public behind them or to get the public not to suspect them of wrongdoing. The public is drawn to charismatic people; they like to hear them talk, they like to watch them in action, and they tend to support a charismatic person over a mousy individual who doesn't present himself well. Obviously, a player character with a Charisma score of 16 should have a better chance of being elected or appointed to a position than a player character with a score of 6. It only makes sense to have a better-received or better-liked PC in a position of power than a PC who repulses a portion of the population.

Being the Top Dog: There are numerous ways for player characters to be appointed as lesser city officials or to be put in charge of a city guild or the city guard or army. Winning favor with the present leader or leaders is one of the best avenues. However, there may come a time when some of the player characters who have been involved with the city campaign for a while want a major position of power or want to become the city leader. How this will occur will depend almost exclusively on the type of government in place. For example, player characters will not be able to be in charge of a city with a monarchy unless they are related to the royal family or for some reason depose the monarch. PCs in a city with a tyrannical despot might be tempted to overthrow the government for the betterment of themselves and the rest of the residents, putting themselves in charge. In a militocracy, they might want to take over the government for similar reasons. However, in a democracy or a republic, they should have to campaign for a position, selling themselves to the people eligible to vote. All of these possibilities will provide adventures for the PCs. And many city adventures will abound once they are in office, as they must deal with some of the extraordinary and fantastic confrontations facing the city.

However, once PCs come into power—something you might want to reserve for higher-level PCs—they will find their lifestyles drastically, and perhaps unfortunately, changed. Player characters who are lesser officials in a city or town government should still have plenty of time on their hands to adventure. Even PCs who are in charge of the city guilds, the guard force, or the army will be able to get away for a time, putting their next in command in charge in their absence. But PCs who are on top in the political structure will find their time taken up with city problems and concerns. They might be able to adventure once in a while, but not often. Some players could find that putting one of their characters into a supreme position of power is a good way to retire that character.

Setting up Shop

Becoming merchants might appeal to player characters who want to add a little financial security to their lives, establish a permanent place of residence, and have a place to sell all the treasure they have been accumulating on trips to the dungeon.

Setting up shop as a merchant can be as much fun as building a castle, since players have to determine how large a building they want, what they want to sell, and how many employees their characters will need to hire to watch the shop so the characters can still adventure. This may be one of the most convenient forms of employment in a city, because a merchant could set his own hours and close down the shop if he is away adventuring for an extended period of time.

Of course, this form of employment also will take a little extra work on your part, as you will have to determine how much to charge the player character for construction of a building, or how much rent to charge him for occupying an existing structure; how much to assess him for the business's operating costs, including the cost for hired help; and how much money he brings in monthly or annually from the goods he sells. Income will be tied to the goods sold. For example, a player character opening a bakery is not going to make as much as a player character opening a weapons shop that features a few magic items and baubles found on adventures. Some player characters could choose to open businesses based on their nonweapon proficiencies such as gem cutting, carpentry, weaving, pottery making, and so forth. This would give the PCs a chance to use their non-fighting related skills.

Many adventures can spring from PC-owned businesses. For example, the player characters could be faced with a gang of thieves demanding protection money; could have to deal with belligerent customers who are not quite human, or could have to confront a ring of thieves bothering the merchants in a district.

Mental Labor and Odd Jobs

Some player characters might opt for manual labor, such as loading ships on the docks, loading and unloading merchant wagons, and hiring on construction crews. Or they might choose to seek part-time employment as clerks or private guards in the merchants quarter. These jobs are not as exciting as the others described in this section, and they will not yield the PCs much money. But they will serve to occupy PCs between adventures and can be used as a vehicle for claiming that some characters are occupied when those PCs' players are not able to attend a gaming session.

Still, if you're clever you can create adventures for these PCs in their mundane jobs. For example, player characters working on the docks could get pressed or kidnapped into labor on a ship, setting them up for high-seas adventures. Or, PCs working in shops in the merchants quarters could save the day when thieves and ruffians attempt to ruin the business.

Many other avenues for PC employment exist in a city, and will depend in part on the size of the city and the businesses and adventures you have planned. Some player characters could become so involved in their jobs that (for a time, at least) they will not want to look for adventure elsewhere.

KEEPING THE PARTY TOGETHER

One of the most difficult tasks that you will face when running city adventures is keeping a party of player character adventurers together—or, failing that, handling the play session during times when the PCs have separated. Frequently when a group of player characters descends upon a town, the temptation is great for them to split up. Each character wants to go his own way for a while, taking care of shopping and whatever other kind of “town business” needs to be done.

There’s nothing wrong with this from the standpoint of realism or practicality, but obviously a fragmented party can be very taxing for a DM. When a split occurs, you may be obliged to take turns dealing with each splinter group while the other players sit around the table and get bored or carry on a conversation, distracting you and the player(s) you are trying to pay attention to at the moment. It may be difficult for you to spend an equal amount of time with each player, which can cause hard feelings.

There are several ways to address the split-group situation. You can try to keep it from happening, or you can make the best of it and try to give each PC or small group of PCs the freedom they want without inconveniencing other players.

If PCs want to split up but you don’t think that the tactic is necessary or desirable, you can try to contrive some situation that will gently force them to stay together or rejoin into a group if they have already separated. Solitary adventurers would be more prone to muggings and robbery attempts than PCs traveling in a group. Merchants might charge exorbitant prices to adventurers who go shopping by themselves, but offer a lower “group rate” when everyone in a party comes into the store at the same time. Without being too blatant about it, you might be able to plunge the party into a threatening or tension-filled situation right after they come through the gates, so that their natural inclination would be to stay together in case real trouble breaks out.

If PCs insist on going their separate ways and you don’t really want to deny them the opportunity to do some looking around on their own, then you have to address your players and get them to understand and agree to some ground rules. Explain to them that it will take some time for you to deal with each of their characters individually, and that anyone who isn’t in the action at a given time should still pay attention to what’s going on—so that they can learn from the other player’s experience, and none of the players will have to waste time later recounting what happened to his character while the group was split up.

For the utmost in realism, you can allow players to take their characters on solitary jaunts through the city, and conduct each session away from the sight and hearing of other players. Explain to the players that if they really want to go off on their own, then you’re willing to accommodate them—but what that means is that any player not presently involved in the action will have to leave the room. No one will be allowed to know what has happened to his comrades’ characters until those characters reunite and relate to each other what they’ve experienced in the meantime. This is the price they’ll have to pay for splitting up. By going off separately, they’ll be able to explore a lot more of the city in the same amount of game time than if they had all traveled together—but the tradeoff is that some of them might overlook clues or special features that other players’ characters would have noticed if they had been moving as a group. And all the players will have to spend time later relating to each other what their characters discovered and learned while they were on their own. If you explain to the players ahead of time that this is what they can expect, then they will have no reasonable cause to complain if each of them is only involved in a fraction of the playing session during which all of their exploration, shopping, and other solitary activities are taking place.

In short, a split party doesn’t have to be a problem, as long as each player understands that along with freedom comes responsibility. You’ll have to be willing to put up with handling each PC or small group of PCs separately for as long as they decide to stay apart, but chances are that the players will soon tire of being lone wolves and will want to get back into a large group—because, as you and they all know, the whole is greater than the sum of its parts.

SPECIAL EVENTS

Boliver and Athormis, tired from the festivities at the feast of Moradin, checked into the Golden Dragon Inn for the evening and paid extra for warm baths. As the proprietor brought them fresh linens and water, he assessed their condition. "Tired from traveling? You must have come a long way for the street festival that starts tomorrow. But you'll find the journey was worth it. Dancing, singing, merchants with items on sale, and all sorts of food. People will be celebrating into the early morning hours. You better get your rest."

Athormis sighed and took the bed by the window. "I've had enough celebrations."

Boliver laughed. "There are never enough celebrations, my friend. I could get to like this place."

Festivals, street fairs, and other special events will provide a continuous source for city adventures and will often induce player characters to stay longer in a city because they want to witness or participate in the upcoming events. Communities of all sizes have special events, with larger towns and cities having more elaborate events and usually staging them more often.

Using The Neighborhoods

Some events are limited to neighborhoods. For example, a halfling neighborhood in a large city might hold regular feasts, for which everyone in the community prepares something to eat and participates in the pageantry in some way. A dwarven neighborhood could hold a ceremony to revere the residents' deity, while an elven neighborhood could stage a festival to honor nature.

In general, lower-class neighborhoods would not have a lot of organized celebrations, either because the people aren't very jovial about their situation in life or because they really don't have much to celebrate. Upper-class residents would probably consider themselves above such unsophisticated displays of emotion. But middle-class neighborhoods could be home to a variety of events.

Street Festivals

One of the most common forms of celebration is the "ordinary" street festival. Such events draw spectators and participants from throughout the city and from neighboring communities. They are a boon to the merchants, fun for the residents, and a headache for city officials, who must contend with the noise, litter, and crime rate attached to such events.

Festivals also draw thieves. Crowds of people are to thieves like honey to a bear. The guild will be out in force, operating a variety of scams to take money away from the celebrants. Thieves will also visit the homes of: people who are away having a good time. Thwarting these thieves can provide the basis of several adventures for the player characters.

Bargain Days

Perhaps the merchants quarter will feature bargain days, when they take some of their merchandise out on the street and offer it at discount prices. Player characters could be drawn to the possibility of getting adventuring gear or magic items for less than normal price. Again, sales such as these will bring out the thieves. Bargain days could also give the player characters more than they bargained for: magic shops might put out less than reliable items, unidentified magic items, and Potions that do not quite live up to expectations.

That's Entertainment

Communities wanting to add a bit of culture to the lives of the residents could open their gates to bands of performers who offer to put on dramatic, musical, and humorous plays. Although sitting in an audience and watching performers recite clever dialogue might not be on the player characters' list of favorite things to do, the play can provide a vehicle for city adventures. Perhaps a member or two of the cast is something other than he seems—a spy working for a rival government or an assassin waiting for a chance at one of the city's leaders, who happens to be sitting in the front row. Maybe one of the actors plans to kidnap a prominent member of society, spirit him away disguised in a gaudy actor's costume, and ransom him.

Carnivals and Side Shows

This kind of special event is a vehicle to unleash monsters upon an unsuspecting community. A traveling carnival with a wagon train of unusual animals and monsters rolls into town to put on a performance. The event draws people from all of the city's neighborhoods, including a few mischievous youngsters who let some of the monsters loose.

However, carnivals offer other avenues of excitement to the player characters. Some carnivals include displays and attractions to test a character's strength, wit, or daring. What bold fighter would pass up an opportunity to show off his muscles in front of a crowd? Carnivals could also offer gambling games (some honest, some not), where player characters can bet some of their dungeon-earned gold pieces.

Celebrating The PCs

Perhaps the player characters are heroes to the town, and the residents want to show their affection and appreciation by holding a celebration to honor them. It is possible the town will be so proud of its heroes that the residents will begin fabricating great and wondrous tales of their accomplishments, making the PCs seem much stronger and more experienced than they actually are. This could translate into an open invitation for some high-level villains to take them on. Celebrations or feasts to honor the PCs also would pose good opportunities for any of the characters' enemies to come to town and wreak havoc or embarrass the PCs.

But Don't Overdo It

Whatever events you decide to establish in your cities, you must be cautious not to have something go wrong at every one. If a major problem occurred every time the city celebrated, there soon would be no more celebrations.

Of course, pickpocketing and other minor crimes always will occur—and sometimes player characters should be the victims. But kidnappings, murders, and other major incidents should not be a regular event. Let the residents and the PCs relax once in a while.

THE LIFEBLOOD OF THE CITY

The quality and size of a community is tied to the livelihoods of its residents. No village, town, or city could exist for very long if the people who lived there did not have a means to support themselves. In general, the smaller a community is, the more centralized its economy will be. In a village, the majority of the residents might make their livings doing the same sort of work (fishing, farming, mining, etc.), while in a large town or a city, there is liable to be a great number of different professions and a wide diversity between them.

The industries or livelihoods predominant in a community could be linked to the reason a community formed. For example, a town at the juncture of a river and the coast that was founded by a group of fishermen still could have fishing as its predominant industry—probably would have, unless something remarkable happened in the meantime to cause the fishing industry to be supplanted by something else. A city that began as a mining settlement still could have a large number of residents working in the mines—unless the mines have been depleted, in which case the city might be in serious economic trouble. You must determine the major industries or livelihoods in each community in your campaign world, basing them in part on the community's location, the nature of its population, and the major industries of other communities in the vicinity. On this last point: It would not make sense for two villages located just a few miles apart to both be primarily involved in mining, unless there's plenty of raw ore to be had in the surrounding hills and mountains or unless you want to create a conflict situation where both villages are laying claim to the same territory.

After establishing how the residents of each community (particularly the smaller ones) make their livings, it's time to think about the other important aspect of a community's economic health: the professionals who make, sell, and trade things—the merchants and craftsmen who provide all the items that the residents cannot make or otherwise obtain for themselves.

Commerce and Craftsmen

Communities grow into villages, towns, and cities as merchants and craftsmen set up stalls and shops. Merchants and craftsmen make a living off the residents and add to the economic prosperity of a community because they hire workers) boosting employment prospects. As the job opportunities increase, more people move into a community looking for work, increasing its population. And as a community's population grows, more merchants and craftsmen open up stalls and shops, continuing the cycle.

Merchants and craftsmen are essential to a fantasy campaign, especially if you want your players to spend some time in cities. One of the main reasons PCs travel to cities is to purchase goods or trade some of the items they have acquired on their adventures. If you have not put some thought into the merchants and craftsmen in your cities, the time the PCs spend there will be brief and unrewarding.

Opening up for Business

Before you randomly set up shops in cities and towns, you must consider the population and makeup of the communities. The size of a community determines how many merchants and craftsmen have shops, and the makeup and location of a community could help determine the types of businesses. For example, a hamlet with 50 residents probably will not have any merchants or craftsmen. There simply aren't enough people to support a business. The residents will rely on farming, fishing, or other industries to support themselves, and will have to travel to larger communities to buy things that they cannot make. A large hamlet with 250 residents might have one craftsman, such as a blacksmith.

The larger the community, the more merchants and craftsmen it will have, and therefore the stronger the lure it will be for PCs who want to go on a shopping expedition. A very large city will have hundreds of merchants and craftsmen selling a wide variety of goods and offering many, many services. PCs could find a little bit of everything in a big city. You could find it easy, although time-consuming, to list the many types of shops and businesses available.

However, the situation is much different for you and the players when dealing with small communities. The smaller the community, the more care you might have to take in selecting the merchants and craftsmen. In a small town there will be fewer dealers, fewer choices for the player characters. And because there are fewer shops, the merchandise those shops sell and the services dealers offer must make sense. For example, a small town with a dozen merchants and craftsmen is not likely to have a dealer of rare books and scrolls or a jeweler who sells expensive rings and necklaces. The merchants in a small community likely will cater to the basic needs of the populace, providing food, clothing, shoes, tools, and other essentials. A small community would not be likely to have a magic shop, although some merchants might have a magic item or two for sale.

A small community probably will have a blacksmith, an inn, and a tavern. There could be a dry goods dealer, a fabric shop, and a general store that sells a little bit of everything. While the residents might be able to purchase a few books from one of those merchants, there would not be much call for one merchant to deal exclusively in books; such items are expensive, and in a medieval fantasy setting would only appeal to a small portion of the populace. And a jeweler has to have a reasonably large population base to draw upon, since not everyone can afford his wares.

However, there is a pleasant medium. A mid-sized or large town will have merchants quarters that boast a variety of goods and services, although PCs looking for swords may not have a dozen weapon shops to browse through. And magic might be a little more readily available than in a small community, although it would be unlikely that a shop would deal exclusively in magic in any community smaller than a city.

Touching on The Merchandise

A community's location and population will influence the type of merchants and craftsmen that set up shop. Location is tied to a community's industries, or livelihoods; therefore location also affects a community's needs. For example, a city on a sea-coast would need several shipwrights, rope makers, bait shops, and sail makers—in addition to shops catering to the rest of the population's wants. A farming town on the plains would have a wainwright (wagon maker), barrelwrights, tool makers, animal handlers, and grain storehouses. A community that has an abundance of wealthy people will have shops that sell expensive fineries, jewelry, works of art, and silk clothing, while a community that has a large population of commoners will have several shops selling basic household goods. In addition, the makeup of the community, coupled with its location, will help the DM determine what goods are not available. For example, a peaceful farming community would be unlikely to have an armorer or a weaponsmith. And a dwarven mining town probably wouldn't have a silk merchant or a florist.

Availability and The PC

In many campaigns, player characters are used to walking into the closest town and purchasing any weapons they desire—while they wait for their armor to be repaired. Players expect weapons to be available at the prices listed in the game books, and some of them even expect to find a variety of magic weapons for sale.

However, not all of those goods and services should be available in every city, especially if you have taken time to create commerce systems for the cities you have developed. PCs traveling in well-developed communities are going to soon learn that not everything is available everywhere, especially in small communities. PCs walking into a large village might have to be satisfied with going to a local blacksmith to have the dents taken out of their armor—and the work might not be guaranteed if the blacksmith is only used to making tools and shoeing horses. They might not be able to find any decent weapons for sale, and the residents could laugh at them if they ask to buy magic potions.

Some communities could have a version of what the PCs want, such as studded leather armor when they are looking for chain mail. A farming community would have a better chance of having leather armor than metal armor because of the livestock hides that could be used.

While initially you might have to deal with your players' frustrations in situations such as these, in the end the players should get more enjoyment out of the campaign. The PCs will learn which communities have the widest variety of weapons for sale, which cities have dealers in magic, and where they can get their armor repaired. Shopping for the goods and services they need could become an adventure in itself, since they might have to visit two or three towns to take care of all their needs. As the PCs familiarize themselves with your communities, they will learn which merchants quarters have the best prices and which shop owners know the most rumors that could lead to adventure.

If you make detailed maps of your cities, you will want to consider where to place the merchants. In most cases, a merchants district will be near a transportation route so it will be convenient to take goods in and out. Historically, in several medieval cities businesses selling similar goods were located near each other. For example, in a large town there would be a street of butchers, a street of potters, a street of dry goods merchants, and so on.

Gold Pieces and Common Sense

It is up to you to set the prices in the shops throughout your cities. Many game systems list prices for most of the items player characters typically buy. However, it is important that you realize those prices should not be viewed as law. And in some cases PCs will ask for items that do not have prices listed in the game books. When this happens, you will have to base the price of an item on the likely availability of it and the estimated value of it compared with other goods.

Prices for goods and services should vary between communities, just like they do between present-day cities. Many factors influence the price of merchandise, such as taxes in a city, the economic climate of a city, and the availability of goods. For example, in a farming town grain and livestock could be considerably lower than "book price" because grain and livestock are abundant. However, in a large mountain village, grain could be very expensive, since there are no farmers in the community to grow it, and it must be brought in by traveling merchants. In a seacoast city, fish and products associated with the sea could be very inexpensive because of their availability; however, metal goods could be expensive because they have to be shipped in. A town located in the middle of a large plains area, with no other towns around for a hundred miles or so, might charge higher prices for everything because the residents cannot afford to travel elsewhere for better deals. On the other hand, two towns located within a few miles of each other could have fluctuating prices as they compete for area residents' business, making many goods less expensive than "book price."

Some communities could charge special taxes on certain merchandise, such as weapons and armor. Magic items sold in the open might have hefty taxes, because the city officials know that people who can afford to buy magic can also afford to pay extra taxes on it.

Another factor that influences price is demand. If residents in a community purchase a lot of a particular item, such as sailcloth in a seacoast town, the merchants could charge a fair price because the turnover of goods is fast and they keep plenty in stock. In addition, if there is more than one merchant selling the cloth, the buyers (perhaps seagoing player characters) could come out ahead as the merchants compete for business. On the other hand, if a player character is trying to buy an item for which there is little or no demand, such as a suit of armor in a farming town, that character could be forced to pay a high price. It could be considered a rare item, since bringing it to the town was costly, and the merchant could need to make a considerable profit from it because it took up shelf or storage space that could have been allocated to other merchandise.

The player characters themselves could play a role in the cost of goods. A half-elf looking for a short sword in a town filled with dwarves might have to pay a lot more for the item than a dwarf or human wanting to buy it. In addition, a PC with bargaining skill or a high Charisma score probably could get a better deal than a crude PC who has a low Charisma.

You will have to review all these factors and perhaps more when determining prices.

Guilds

Many fantasy role-players are familiar with thieves guilds, fighters guilds, wizards guilds, and other such organizations because their characters come into contact with the guilds as they search for information, lodging, or training. But many players are unaware that guilds abound throughout cities for merchants and craftsmen, and they are every bit as important to a community as the guilds which deal with character professions.

Not all communities will have guilds. Hamlets and small villages will not have enough merchants and craftsmen to warrant a guild. Any problems that come up will be handled by the individual merchant(s) involved, unless the problems are severe, in which case the community's officials will be called in to help.

Merchants' and craftsmen's guilds are necessary in larger communities, where there are several dealers in the same merchandise or several people offering the same service. The guild deal with the external and internal affairs of their members, helping to keep the businesses running smoothly and helping to foster good relations between city officials and the merchants and craftsmen.

Internally, guilds monitor the wages of shop employees, the working conditions; and the duration and conditions of apprenticeship—if the merchants and craftsmen in the guild have apprentices. If the guild is dissatisfied with a business's practices, such as if the working conditions for employees are unbearable, it can fine the merchant or impose other penalties.

Some guilds also monitor the goods their member businesses sell. For example, a bakers' guild might want to approve the ingredients in the merchants' wares. A jewellers' guild could inspect the merchants' pieces to make sure real gems and precious metals are being used. Jewelers caught passing off colored glass as gems could be fined and their acts publicized to warn future customers.

Guilds also enforce customs, such as closing shops by a certain time of day or on holidays. They also try to prevent monopolies by keeping a larger shop from putting its competitors out of business or keeping it from absorbing smaller shops. In addition, they can attempt to regulate the price of goods and restrict competition, carefully monitoring the shops in the city and sometimes preventing shops from opening if they believe those shops would hurt the present merchants' business too much. Some guilds also exercise political power by raising prices, closing shops, or making labor unavailable unless laws to benefit the guilds are passed, or laws that would hurt them are stricken.

If there are five or more of a particular type of business within a city, it is likely there is a guild to represent that group of merchants or craftsmen. You also can create an overall merchants' guild, which oversees all of the individual guilds. PCs could be forced to deal with these guilds if they attempt to set up shops or if they come into conflict with some of the merchants and craftsmen.

Making Shopping Reasonable

Even though you have a well-developed merchants quarter, complete with detailed businesses and merchants' personalities, you should not force PCs to go shopping for every little item they need. For example, if an upcoming game session is going to center on a dungeon expedition, you should not play out each character's shopping for rope, iron rations, and torches—unless the PCs want to go through this.

Eventually, you will find that once your players become interested in cities you will not have to force any shopping expeditions; the players will initiate them—sometimes at nearly every gaming session.

Adding The Adventure

Hundreds of adventures can spring from encounters with merchants and craftsmen. Merchants are a source for rumors and information. Because they deal with the public every day, they know what is going on in the various neighborhoods. If a merchant has a politician for a customer, he has a way to find about general facts about the government's current affairs. If a merchant has adventurers for customers, he can learn about nearby ruins and dungeons, who's hiring mercenaries, and if there are monstrous forces about. Some merchants could charge PCs for information. However, if the PCs are regular customers or do not quibble about prices, the merchants could provide information for free.

The merchants themselves can also be a source of adventures. For example, a merchant could hire the PCs to escort a valuable shipment to or from town because there are brigands about. Perhaps some of the merchants have had trouble with thieves and want the PCs to find the villains responsible for stealing their merchandise. One merchant might hire a PC or two to spy on another merchant in an attempt to learn his business secrets. A few adventures can come upon the PCs subtly, such as having a PC purchase an item from a merchant and later discovering the item is being sought by a band of cutthroats. Or a PC could accidentally purchase a cursed item that causes all sorts of problems until a way is found to lift the curse.

If the player characters are attempting to set up their own business, selling some of the merchandise they have been acquiring during their dungeon expeditions, they could be faced with several adventures: underhanded competitors, conflicts with guilds, and persistent thieves. The PCs could even find themselves involved in conflicts between guilds or between a guild and the government.

In addition, PCs traveling between towns could develop their own mercantile adventures, going out of their way to find goods to transport to the next town they plan to visit. Since they are planning on going there any way, they might as well make a profit along the way.

Giving Them Character

Merchants and craftsmen can develop into major NPCs that are visited by the player characters anytime they come into the city. Sometimes these characters will develop as the campaign progresses and the PCs find a favorite shop and eventually consider the merchant a good friend. The NPCs' personalities will grow the more time the player characters spend with them. However, you might want to establish in advance a few detailed NPC merchants with whom the PCs can interact and get leads for adventures. To help develop the merchants' personalities, you can consult the business tables (page 38) and ruler tables (page 13) in this product, the NPC tables in the Dungeon Masters Guide, or you can create your own personalities from scratch.

When a merchant becomes a major NPC, he also becomes a ready source for adventures. Such an NPC can readily locate the player characters to tell them about adventures brewing. Or, if the NPC gets in trouble, the player characters likely will come to his aid.

The Business Tables

Although you probably will want to establish your own merchants quarters and the businesses and personalities that populate them, the tables on the following page could be used to quickly generate businesses or could be used to give you a start at developing entire districts. These tables, which do not list all possible businesses, should be used primarily for larger communities; businesses in smaller communities should be hand-picked by you.

The tables can be used to flesh out a merchants district, but should not be used to determine all the businesses in a district. Rolling up a district entirely at random could result in several soap makers, a stable, a barrelwright, and little else. For example, you should establish for a village a blacksmith, an inn, a stable, and perhaps a few other businesses based on the major industries, location, and population of the village.

Table I is a guideline for the number of merchants and craftsmen that a community of a certain size could have. Table II lists a variety of merchants and professions and can be used to randomly generate some businesses, as mentioned above. Table III can be used to randomly determine the quality of the goods, or services, and Table IV determines the personality of the shopkeeper.

BUSINESS TABLES

Table I

Community	Population	No. of Merchants and Shop Owners
Hamlet	50- 250	0- 1
Village	200- 500	1- 3
Village, large	500- 1,000	3- 10
Town, small	500- 2,000	4- 20

MAKING THE FANTASTIC REAL

Because fantasy role-playing games are filled with magical or mythical creatures, places, and events, cities in fantasy campaigns need a touch of the fantastic to make them special and appealing to the player characters.

These fantastic elements should not be numerous, or necessarily obvious, and they should not be present in every community in your campaign. As mentioned before, if the fantastic becomes commonplace in a city, it is no longer special or fantastic. It is routine and given little thought by the players.

There is basically no limit to what you can put in a community to add a touch of magic. Because it is magic, or fantastic, there are no physical laws that have to be observed. In effect, you are limited only by your imagination.

You can use the following objects and situations in your own cities, or you can use them as springboards for ideas.

Making it Noticeable

Some cities have a fantastic element that is readily noticeable by any character entering the city gates. For example, a fantastic or magical guardian that does nothing to conceal itself is pretty noticeable, such as a friendly dragon that sleeps just inside the main entrance to the city.

Other possibilities include a guard force mounted on pegasi or flying carpets, a city wall that is a shimmering, magical barrier, or a stream that surrounds the city and flows backwards after the sun goes down.

These obvious fantastic effects paint a magical picture of the city and could serve as a lure to player character adventurers. They are great fun to describe and could be used as foils to get PCs into city adventures.

Odd Inhabitants

Perhaps the fantastic element of a city is known to the occupants, but is not obvious to first-time visitors.

For example, perhaps a large town is home to a wizards' academy, where budding mages are being schooled in the arts of spellcasting. While the academy has been an economic boon to the town, because the instructors purchase goods in large quantities from the merchants, it is also a continual headache. Miscast spells have resulted in odd-looking animals wandering the street, a miniature mountain springing up in the middle of the central park, and unusual and inexplicable weather. PCs visiting this town could find themselves in the middle of a magical experiment gone awry, or they could be asked to help get rid of a terrain feature that magically appeared or chase down a powerful and dangerous housecat that escaped from the academy.

A feature in town might be something other than what it seems. For example, a supposedly high-level wizard who had a tower constructed on the edge of town is avoided by the general populace because they fear him. In actuality, the man isn't a wizard at all. He's just a wealthy adventurer with a wand of wonder who wanted to build a reputation for himself by building a tower similar to one he saw in another town. That tower truly was constructed by a high-level mage, and the populace of that town really had a reason to avoid him. That tower serves as a gate to another plane and sometimes appears to fluctuate in size.

Some people within a community could be something other than what they seem, and it could take a band of adventurers to reveal their true natures. For example, a troupe of circus performers actually could be a group of monsters polymorphed to look like people. After the performance they could terrorize the city, then be polymorphed back into circus performers and leave town, with no one the wiser.

Shape-changing creatures, which could end up with prominent government positions, also can provide a fantastic element to vex the PCs.

On The Spot

The location of a community could provide the magical quality. If a city is built on a piece of ground that serves as the nexus between planes or worlds, all manner of unusual things could occur and a variety of bizarre creatures could appear and disappear with no warning.

PCs visiting such a community could find themselves walking down a city street one moment and end up in an alternate Prime Material Plane the next.

Or perhaps this nexus point works as a teleporter. Characters adventuring in a dungeon hundreds of miles away walk through a glowing doorway to find themselves in a crowded tavern where the patrons have heard nothing of the complex the characters were previously in.

Perhaps the effects of the nexus vary throughout the year, with the teleporter effect working only during the summer. At night the nexus might take on an entirely different function. For example, it could cause alleys and businesses to magically appear. The businesses can be shopped in, and the alleys can be walked in, but they disappear with the first rays of the sun.

The City is The Magic

You might want to create a city that you will not place on your campaign map because it moves or only appears every so many years or when certain conditions are met.

PCs could come upon such a city by accident, never realizing its true nature. If the city only appears every ten years, and the PCs (unknowing of that fact) decide to spend the night or several nights there, they could emerge to continue their journey—only to find that decades have passed and their friends and relatives have died of old age.

Maybe the city which magically appears is inhabited by spirits from throughout the history of the continent. Chatting with the residents could gain the PCs a lot of important, historical information. But if the PCs stay too long, they could become absorbed into the spirits' world.

Magical Features

Some communities could have a fantastic geographical feature that has been there for decades, and which the populace cannot explain. These features, such as a mighty waterfall that originates from a small, clear pool, could perplex visiting player characters and cause them to seek out the origin of the feature. The waterfall might be nothing more than a decanter of endless water left by a forgetful adventurer, but the search for the origin could provide an amusing adventure for the PCs.

There are so many possibilities when magical or fantastic elements are concerned. And because of the limitless number, you should create a different element each time you want to add something unusual to your campaigns' cities.

HOW TO USE THE FOLD-UPS

A new dimension will be added to your gaming when you use the building fold-ups and street layouts provided with this product. Players will get more enjoyment out of each playing session in a city, because they will be better able to visualize the action their characters are involved in. The buildings are sturdy enough to support figures on upper floors or atop roofs, so that the action can be truly three-dimensional. The fold-ups also introduce the element of surprise, because you can hide figures inside the buildings—only to be revealed after the characters have decided to enter the structure to see what's inside.

Where To Start

Begin by assembling the buildings according to the instructions on the back of the fold-up sheets. The fold-ups are designed to be collapsible, so they can be stored in the box this product came in and easily carried to a gaming session. With proper care, they will last a long time.

Before you start trying to use the buildings and street layouts, take a few minutes to read the rest of this page and get familiar with the components. A good way to “break in” to using them would be to set up a building configuration for one of the mini-adventures in the back of this book, or try to simulate the layout of a section of a city that's described in some other game product you own.

Future TSR products will include additional buildings with different designs and street layouts. These easily can be added to the buildings in this set to create even larger and more complex designs.

Using The Street Layouts

Cut each of the large sheets of street layouts into thirds, but don't trim around the edges of the grid patterns. (If you do, the sheets won't fit together the way they're supposed to.)

For the most part, the street layouts are modular; they fit together so that streets continue from one sheet onto the sheet placed adjacent to it. The biggest exception to this is sheet H, which was designed as a large courtyard surrounded by buildings that are tight against one another, with only one entrance leading into the courtyard. If you butt any of the other sheets against one of the long sides of sheet H, you've created a dead-end street that stops when it runs up against the adjacent building.

Each of the twelve layout patterns is identified by a letter, so that you can refer to any combination layout by a simple key and easily recreate it for a later playing session. Simply take a small sheet of scrap paper and draw a series of rough rectangles to indicate the way the sheets are oriented. Put a letter in the corner of each rectangle, in the place that corresponds to the printed letter on the sheet itself, to identify which sheet is used and how it is aligned with respect to the sheets around it.

When setting out street patterns, be careful not to give away too much information to the PCs too soon. Assuming they're not airborne, they're seeing the city from ground level, so that they won't be able to view enormous sections of the community at one time. Plan out what street patterns you want to use, but don't put them all on the table at once. Start with one section, and don't add an adjoining one until the characters move to a spot from where they would be able to see farther down the street (into the adjacent section). If the PCs do come up with a way to view a large area at one time—by riding flying mounts or using magic—then it would be fair to show them several street layouts at once. But you wouldn't have to worry about filling all the layouts with buildings; since they're viewing the structures from a great distance, they wouldn't be able to discern any details or identify a specific type of building. (In effect, all they can see are rooftops.)

Using The Buildings

Cities of Mystery contains 33 building fold-ups—enough to fill at least two of the street layout sheets with single-story structures. (Sheets J, K, and L contain spaces for 15 buildings apiece, so even if you fill two of those three sheets, you'll still have three structures left over.)

Any building with a flat roof can be used as a one-story structure or as a lower floor in a multistory building; the structures are stackable up to three or four stories tall, or perhaps even higher. However, taller buildings won't have as much stability, especially if you put one or more miniature figures an upper floor or on the roof of a tall structure. Platforms in an inverted V shape are provided so that you can simulate “the positioning of a character on top of a peaked roof.

Instructions for how to fold and assemble each basic type of building are printed on the back sides of the building sheets (where they'll be out of sight after the building is put together). You'll find the construction to be simple and straightforward—not as an insult to your intelligence and dexterity, but because the idea is to spend a lot of time using the finished buildings instead of taking a long time to put them together.

Adding The Adventure

The most important point to remember when using these streets and buildings—when setting up any kind of city adventure—is Plan Ahead.

If possible, set up at least one street layout and put buildings on it before players arrive for the session that's about to take place. Getting ready ahead of time will enable you to “populate” the interiors of buildings with miniature figures to represent the monsters and NPCs that player characters will encounter. As you add new street layouts and buildings during the course of an adventure, you may have to ask players to turn their heads or leave the room so they don't see what you put inside the buildings—but if you've planned out ahead of time exactly what you want to do, the playing session will only be disrupted for the few seconds it takes you to prepare the next section of the city.

In the same vein, be prepared with answers to questions that may come up during play concerning details about the physical environment. If you're using a layout sheet that includes walled-in areas, pools, paths, or other special features (sheet B, for example), decide in advance how high the wall is, how deep the pool, how wide the path.

Of course, it's important for a DM to be prepared, no matter what kind of adventure the PCs are about to undertake. But in some ways, planning ahead is especially important before a city adventure, because the environment is much more complex than a dank dungeon corridor or a vast flat plain in the great outdoors. If you make all of your decisions ahead of time, you'll be able to deal quickly and fairly with the decisions that the players make when the action begins.

ENCOUNTERS IN THE CITY

There are three basic areas within a city in which encounters can occur: on the street, in a building, or in a subterranean location. On a street the action can move quickly from one place to another—down an alley, up the side of a building, across a rooftop. In a building the scope of the action is limited to the size of the enclosure. Encounters in underground places can be as widely varied in nature as those places themselves.

Where you want an encounter to happen is going to play a large part in determining what type of creatures or characters you can use. For example, it is not very likely that a player character walking down the main street of a city will run into a group of trolls. The city guard or army would have alerted the populace if monsters were in the city and would have immediately tried to dispatch the beasts. Of course, there are always avenues you can use to cause monster encounters to occur in the middle of the street; in a fantastic universe, nothing is impossible. But the key words are “not likely”—those types of encounters are not likely to occur, and should not occur with any sort of regular frequency. You have to remember that one of the reasons people live in communities is for safety.

Encounters also must make a modicum of sense. For example, creatures which are solitary and do not like civilization are not going to be found roaming in the midst of a large city. And creatures native to a particular climate wouldn't be found in a city located far from where that climate prevails.

You should examine the creatures detailed in the game system you are using before setting up city encounters. Many fantasy role-playing games, such as the D&D® game and the AD&D® game, have city encounter charts and lists of creatures—other than humans and demihumans—that can be found in cities. Some DMs develop their own charts.

You also can refer to the five city adventures and the adventure ideas presented in this product for suggestions on how to use creatures and encounters in a city setting. And following this section of text, on pages 44-45, are a set of encounter charts based on locations within cities and the time of day.

Encounters should be balanced—some friendly, some hostile, some mysterious. Not everything or everyone the PCs encounter should want to attack them. Using a mix of situations and encounters will keep a city campaign interesting.

ENCOUNTERS ON THE STREET

Encounters occurring on city streets can be a great amount of fun, especially if the building fold-ups from this product are used. You can lay out a section of street, complete with several buildings, and plan an encounter or a series of encounters that can take the player characters in and around buildings, over rooftops, and down dark and dangerous alleys.

When using the fold-ups for encounters, you must decide if the NPCs or creatures the player characters will encounter are familiar with the city. If the NPCs know the streets very well, they can lead the player characters on a merry chase, putting the PCs at a definite disadvantage. However, if the NPCs are as new to the city as the PCs are, no one has an advantage, and any chase that results could be random. And if the PCs are more familiar with the city than the NPCs, they will have the upper hand and could direct the flow of the action.

The building fold-ups should be used to set up elaborate street encounters. For example, an encounter with a NPC on a main street of the city could lead the PCs almost anywhere. If the NPC is a con man or a thief, he could coax the player characters on some wild pretense into an alley across town where an ambush is set up. Or a thief who is caught picking a player character's pocket could have an escape route carefully planned that will take him—and the player character—across rooftops and down side streets, to a spot where the thief has friends who will jump to help him.

Even if you do not have an elaborate street encounter set up, you should consider using the building fold-ups to keep your players from predicting the action. If you only use the fold-ups when you have an extensive and detailed encounter planned, the players will be tipped off that something is up when you get out the collapsible buildings. Using the fold-ups frequently; and for a variety of types of encounters, will keep the players guessing.

Street encounters can be simple occurrences, such as meeting some of the merchants or other city personalities. These encounters can be friendly, casual happenings in which the PCs can learn more about the city and the populace.

ENCOUNTERS IN THE CITY

Simple street encounters also can be much more. A woman selling fruit could be a spy trying to gather information about the player characters. A person in the uniform of a city guardsman could actually be a thief who has stolen the outfit and is strolling around town picking pockets. There could also be people who aren't really people moving through the streets.

Other encounters involving humans and demihumans can be obviously dangerous, such as a gang of muggers or ruffians.

Still other encounters can involve monsters or creatures loose on the city streets—but remember, you'd better have a good reason for why the creatures are there. It should never be commonplace for strange and dangerous creatures to be on the loose in a city. Perhaps a ship in the harbor which is transporting animals to a zoo could catch on fire, and the animals could escape or be let loose to keep them from dying. Or, a group of adventurers could bring a caged monster into town hoping to sell it, but the monster is able to break free and subsequently wreaks havoc. The city's location also can play a part in what kinds of creatures or monsters can be found. An anhkheg or other burrowing creature could erupt into the center of a city located in an arid climate. Or a city on the sea could be visited by friendly creatures, such as sea elves or selkies, or harmful creatures, such as weresharks and sahuagin.

Some street encounters are dependent on the section of town being visited. Player characters walking through a good section of town, where there are several patrols, are not as likely to run into a gang of thieves as they would be in a rough section of town. PCs along a wharf could run into disgruntled sailors, press gangs, and possibly pirates—but those NPCs would not be found in the government quarter.

Further, the time of day will influence the type of encounter found on a street. Merchants, businessmen, common citizens, and visitors will fill a city's streets from early morning to early evening. Late at night there are fewer businesses open and fewer people on the streets. Player characters walking through a city at night might find streetwalkers, sailors, other adventurers, and local residents on their way to their favorite taverns. And in the very early morning hours, the city streets might be nearly deserted. PCs wandering the city streets in the evening or very early in the morning present you with opportunities to use more hazardous encounters, such as vampires, werereatures, and other human-appearing monsters that only come out when the sun is down.

ENCOUNTERS IN BUILDINGS

Encounters in buildings are much more limited because there is a fixed amount of space to work with. "However, there are advantages to having encounters in inns, businesses, warehouses and other buildings within a city.

NPCs and creatures encountered inside a building are probably familiar with the structure, and thus can make use of every dark corner, piece of furniture, and other features of the "terrain" to evade or delay the PCs. Thieves encountered in buildings may have prepared and set traps in the rooms, which can confound and possibly harm player characters coming inside. Creatures in buildings can hide in the rafters and behind doors, ready to surprise PCs who enter unawares.

Using the building fold-ups for inside encounters will help you surprise your players and will add a new dimension of fun to the game. For example, if the PCs say they are following a shady character into a run-down inn, you lift up the building fold-up and place their figures just inside the door, at the same time revealing the creatures or NPCs waiting inside. The fold-ups also will help you run building encounters more easily, since the players can move their miniatures across the floor plan—there won't be any arguments about where their characters are standing when things start to happen.

Encounters inside buildings, although limited because of the fixed space, provide a dimension of freedom not available with street encounters. For example, monsters or magical traps and devices can be hidden from the view of the PCs inside a building, not becoming evident until after they enter the structure. And buildings can be something other than what they seem. For example, a tailor's shop might be the base for one of the city's thieves guilds. The front room of the building could be filled with bolts of material, scissors, thread, and fitting dummies, but the back rooms (which are locked and probably trapped) could be filled with stolen property and bunks for the thieves.

Buildings filled with local residents also can present a fun encounter. Player characters walking into a tavern could find themselves in the midst of a bar fight, where bottles of wine are flung through the air and chairs and tables are being wielded as weapons.

ENCOUNTERS UNDERGROUND

The first underground encounter area that comes to mind is that part of a city that most closely resembles the corridors and chambers of a dungeon—the city's sewer system.

It is not unusual for medieval-style cities to have some form of sewer system, which might have been dug while the city was being planned and built, or (if the city is especially old) might have been excavated after the street layout was in place. Since sewer tunnels generally run beneath streets, you can use the street layouts in this product to simulate the sewer network—or you can devise your own system of tunnels and chambers, similar to the way you might design a unique dungeon.

Sewers can be the home of giant crocodiles, monstrous slimes, dangerous puddings, smugglers, thieves, and outcasts of the city who have built their own society beneath the city streets.

If you are going to have adventures in the sewer, you should take time to populate the area—just like you would populate a dungeon or castle. Adventuring in a sewer system will allow you to use creatures you normally couldn't use in the streets and buildings above.

Unless players are anxious to go underground, it may take a little work to get the PCs into the sewer. They could be lured there while chasing a thief who operates out of the sewers. They could be hired by the city officials to clean out the sewer system (several city workers who were cleaning out the sewers have disappeared). They could overhear rumors of a smugglers' guild operating in the sewers, or they could hear someone say that the sewers lead to some great underground complex filled with monsters and treasure.

Other kinds of underground adventures are possible in a city environment. Perhaps there is a city beneath the present city, an ancient community that was covered over during a great natural disaster, and which the PCs hear legends of. The PCs will have to comb the present city to get information about the ancient complex, and then they will have to search to find a way down below. Maybe there is a network of tunnels (not necessarily sewer tunnels) beneath the city, being used as escape routes and hiding places by thieves and smugglers. Or maybe the tunnels are used by slaves escaping into the wilderness. Other possibilities include secret labyrinths constructed beneath a wizard's home or a series of chambers that were built beneath a warehouse to hold illegal goods.

The location of a city can provide ideas for other types of subterranean encounter locations. A city on the sea could have several sea caves nearby or beneath it. A city built near an abandoned mine could have all sorts of tunnels to explore.

Once you have determined what subterranean places are near or beneath your city, you must populate them with creatures and NPCs which can interact with or pose a threat to the player characters. Catacombs beneath a city will not be very interesting if they are empty.

You will need to vary the encounters beneath a city or beneath buildings so not all of them are hostile. For example, the PCs could have fun encountering a community of gnomes beneath a city of humans. And if the player characters broadcast what they find beneath cities, it could affect their well-being and the state of mind of the populace. If city residents learned there were a group of horrible monsters living underneath them, they might pack up their bags quickly and move to another town. Or if the player characters spread the news that they found thieves in a tunnel under the merchants district, they could soon be the target of revenge from the thieves guild.

Putting Them All Together

Some encounters could turn into mini-adventures and could encompass all three types of areas, taking the player characters from a building encounter, to a chase-scene encounter through the city streets—after which their quarry drops down a manhole and into the sewer system below. Encounters such as this require a little more planning and staging, but will be worthwhile for the players and you.

Remembering The Public

In running encounters in city streets and buildings, you need to think about the city residents who might be nearby. Adventuring in a city is definitely different from adventuring in a dungeon, where the PCs might be the only people around.

PCs who get into a fight in an alley could find there is a crowd forming to watch—members of which might get hurt if too many weapons or magic spells get tossed around. PCs could also find common citizens getting into the fray in an attempt to help.

People are curious; if they hear strange noises coming from a building, they might decide to investigate. This could cause the PCs to split their interest, as they must pay attention to the creatures or NPCs they are fighting, while they must also keep the nosy citizens from getting hurt.

Among the bystanders could be city guards and city officials, who are waiting for the fight to end so all the participants can be charged with causing a disturbance, endangering the public, and destruction of property. This could plunge the PCs right from one encounter into another, and they could realize that city officials are sometimes more difficult to handle than monsters.

Shapechangers in The City

Shapechanging creatures are very useful in developing city encounters and adventures. You should examine the creatures detailed in the game system you are using and list those that have the ability to alter their form to look human or near-human. There are also avenues to make monsters without this natural ability appear as common citizens. Magic items that allow creatures to polymorph, or spells cast on the creatures, will serve to create the desired effect.

There are many ways these creatures can be used in a city setting. For example, a doppelganger could be impersonating a city official and having fun creating all sorts of unreasonable and unusual laws. Or a monster that has assumed the form of the mayor could be stockpiling the city's taxes as its treasure while the public's needs are ignored.

If a group of shapechangers are operating together and are impersonating a variety of people, the PCs could become very confused trying to figure out who are the impostors.

The PCs may even be the targets of the shapechangers; impostors who look just like them are robbing merchants, beating up city guards, and threatening city officials—hoping that the real PCs will be caught and prosecuted.

Using Major NPCs

You also should consider creating major NPC villains for your cities which will provide ongoing encounters. An arch-nemesis, especially one who is a prominent and respected person in a community, can antagonize the PCs anytime they come into the community and can be used in encounters anywhere—in buildings, on the street, and beneath the streets and buildings.

Perhaps the NPCs are responsible for some of the encounters the player characters come across. The arch-nemesis may have been guilty of setting the fire on the zoo ship, which caused the creatures to be loosed on the city.

If the NPC is a spellcaster, particularly an illusionist, the PCs could encounter horrible (illusionary) monsters along Main Street or have to deal with tavern fires that don't really exist.

You might even want to designate a few buildings which are owned by such an NPC, and which the PCs will have to adventure through before they can confront him. Using the building fold-ups for encounters with the NPC will help the players visualize what is going on and will make it easier for you to run the encounter.

Getting Additional Help

If you want further ideas or examples for city encounters, you should refer to published adventure scenarios and articles in gaming magazines, and also should pay attention to other DMs' campaigns. Fantasy and science fiction books are also a good source for encounter ideas.

SAUTER, CITY ON THE SEA

Sauter, a thriving city of 30,000 people, was created using the guidelines presented in this product.

"Personally, I think they would have been much better off if they had used Boliverburg for an example. I mean, Sauter is okay, if you like a city with elves in it. And not that there's that many elves, but give me a town loaded with earthy-minded dwarves and you've got something pretty spectacular. Hmmm. Maybe that's why they didn't want to use Boliverburg as an example. Boliverburg is just too special. They wanted to give you an example of an average city. Okay. That being the case, let's go to Sauter."

This is an outline that can be used to help you create your own cities for your campaign, or this description itself can be fleshed out and easily added to an existing campaign. No maps are provided for Sauter. However, you could easily create maps for the city and surrounding area.

Sauter was established on a sloping hill that leads to the sea. It has a fairly detailed and fascinating history; an oligarchy for a government; wise and intelligent rulers who are not without their faults; a thriving merchants' district; and a promising future.

Sauter's Seasons

Sauter is built on a slowly sloping hillside that reaches to the ocean. A swift-flowing river cuts through the hillside on the north edge of the city and empties into the sea. The city's two major mercantile districts rely on water for transportation of the goods; one district lies at the foot of the hillside near the sea, the other runs nearly parallel to the river.

Because Sauter is located on the northernmost shore of the continent, its residents are exposed to the four seasons. In summer, when the population swells slightly because of the festivals, temperatures reach into the high 80s. However, the summer is short, with warm temperatures lasting only two and a half to three months. The fall is likewise short, but it is considered the most beautiful time of year. Artists flock to the city during the fall to paint pictures of landscapes that they sell in other cities on the continent.

The winters are harsh in Sauter and last four or more months. The cold air that comes off the sea causes heavy snowfalls, sometimes forcing shops to close and ships to remain in port for days. Still, trade activity continues. The river flows too quickly to freeze, and the people are a hardy lot not likely to be stopped or discouraged because of the bad winter weather. Many of the residents welcome the cold and find much sport in revelling on the snow-covered hillside. Residents in the towns to the south are amused at and perplexed by the Sauterians' behavior.

Spring begins abruptly in Sauter, and is called "The Awakening." It is the time when the populace begins preparations for the summer's festivals and the farmers spend weeks planting fast-growing crops.

Sauter's Glorious Past

Sauter, City on the Sea, was founded nearly three hundred years ago by a half-dozen adventurers searching for a lost dwarven gold mine. The adventurers were in possession of a map that supposedly showed the location of a mine rumored to have veins of gold as thick as a man's arm, and which was thought to be located in a cleft of a hillside above the sea. Carefully following the map's directions, the adventurers traversed the continent's northern coast for more than a year until they located the stretch of coastline that matched the drawing on the map. The adventurers spent the next couple of years unsuccessfully combing the face of the hillside and the sea caves, looking for some trace of the gold.

Throughout that time they lived with a handful of fishermen who traded much of their catch to passing seagoing merchants in exchange for furs and other goods. The fishing was very good along this coast because the water never got too warm and was filled with an abundance of plant life that attracted the fish. The adventurers became good friends with the fishermen and found themselves spending a few hours a day helping them catch fish and defending them from wandering monsters. And as the months wore on and their dreams of a gold mine faded, the adventurers realized that the real treasure wasn't the mine that might or might not exist. The treasure was this section of the coastline and the abundant sea life attracted to the deep harbor. They began to devote the majority of their efforts to fishing, using their roping and trapping skills to create large nets that brought in hundreds of fish a day.

Merchant ships began to stop regularly to trade with the fishermen, and the small settlement began to grow. The adventurers were appointed the community's leaders, since they had the strongest personalities and provided the protection. By the time a decade passed, the community had reached a population of 800 and boasted a shipbuilding industry. A small farming industry also started, as farmers who had moved to the area developed fast-growing crops that could be harvested before the cold weather set in.

The adventurers still found time to spend a few days a month searching for the mine, and eventually they found it. News of the gold spread quickly and attracted more people to the village, which was now called Sauter after the adventurers' leader, a tall, blond-haired elven ranger who also was responsible for finding the gold. Several other prospectors struck small veins, but none as profitable as the adventurers' mine. Still, the small mines produced gold for several years and boosted the town's economy. The adventurers invested their newfound wealth back into the town. Merchants, commoners, and adventurers of all races moved to the prosperous community, which began to geometrically increase in size. The adventurers' gold helped support the growth and was used to fund public buildings, a courthouse, and an extensive dock system.

Now the city is the largest on the northern coast. Its primary industries are fishing, trading, shipping, and a little farming. Because there is a river on the city's edge, Sauter can transport goods inland, which further increases the city's importance. The future for the city looks bright, and the city's leaders are confident the population will continue to grow. It is at peace with its neighbors, and its government has served as a model for other communities.

Sauter's Government

As the decades continued to pass, the adventurers faded from view. All but Sauter died, because they were humans and half-elves with limited lifespans. It was rumored that Sauter went off into the wilderness in search of another gold mine. But many of the things the adventurers established remained, such as the strong trading industry and the residents' freedom. The city, which in its early stages had been ruled by a council composed of the adventurers and a few merchants, adopted a form of government that was a combination of an oligarchy and a republic, and which the people called the Sauter Triumvirate. All landowners were given the power to vote, and they elected the three leaders. Under this form of government, the leaders each served a nine-year term, with the terms being staggered three years apart to foster stability. Each of the three leaders held approximately the same amount of authority, with one being responsible for seagoing concerns, another being charged with land-based merchant and trade activity, and the third being responsible for the military, the guard force, and the general welfare of the people.

Together the three established laws and set taxes. Because the Sauter voters were content with the leaders they chose, they only elected a new leader when one of the current three died or chose not to seek another term of office. In the course of the city's history, power has been held by humans, elves, half-elves, dwarves, and even a halfling. Although the mix of rulers might have seemed unusual to outsiders, the Sauter residents were pleased, because their population was made up of a variety of races, and the triumvirate seemed to ensure representation for everyone.

Because of the city's size, several other officials are needed to closely monitor operations throughout Sauter. These officials, who number 27, are appointed by the triumvirate to terms ranging from one to three years. They are usually reappointed when their terms are up—unless their work is unsatisfactory or they did something to offend or upset a triumvirate member.

The current triumvirate consists of two humans and an aging white-haired elf. The elf, one of the major landowners in the city, is responsible for the military, the guard force, and the general welfare of the people. Although the triumvirate seats were designed to be equal, the elf tends to hold a little more sway. He goes by the name of White William, but a few very old elves in the community know his real identity and keep it their secret. He is Sauter, the leader of the adventuring party that founded the city.

leaders and has been on the triumvirate for 20 years. He is generous to a fault, donating his wealth to fund public improvement projects. He is also open-minded, showing no bias based on race, social class, or gender, and he is willing to consider a variety of proposals before pushing to adopt laws or rescind them. However, perhaps White William's strongest trait is his moodiness. Sometimes the leader broods for days, looking out over the sea. Some say White William is restless and yearns to travel; others believe his age is taking its toll. The other two leaders believe his moodiness is linked to the city and the sea, climbing like the surf to an emotional peak when the city prospers and crashing like a wave to the shore when an economic slump strikes.

White William lives in a small manor house, which he commissioned the local builders guild to construct to his exact specifications. Unknown to the Sauter populace, the house sits on top of a vein of gold, the last remnants of the fabled dwarven mine. William takes gold from it when he needs money, or when there is not enough gold in the city coffers to fund a major public improvement. He knows the gold vein will not last much longer than another 50 years, but he is confident by that time the city will not need his financial help. He has willed his property and the cavern beneath it to the city. White William's life is indeed tied to the city. He feels he helped give it life, so he will devote the remainder of his life to it.

Emilia Loring, a 30-year-old human, is the newest member of the Sauter Triumvirate, having been elected two years ago after the death of a half-elf triumvirate member. She is only the fourth woman in the city's history to hold a triumvirate seat. While Emilia claims she was elected because of her wisdom and political ideals, many in the populace claimed they voted for her because the other candidates were too liberal-minded. She is bold and brassy, traits which have helped her lead the land-based merchant and trade business into great prosperity, but she is also very conservative, not making a move until she is certain that all angles of a problem have been studied. She spends several hours every day meeting with merchants and talking to other cities' officials to create new trade agreements. She revels in her authority and obviously favors the landowners who put her into power. Still, she is fair and even-handed and respected throughout the city. Emilia hopes to stay on the triumvirate for a very long time. She has vowed not to marry, so she can devote all of her energy to the city's welfare. However, because of her position and her beauty, she is probably the most sought-after woman in town. While she does not accept the advances of the men who frequently ask her for dates, she does not refuse their gifts, which she enjoys displaying around her neck and on her wrists and fingers.

Tomas Tomathon, a 65-year-old former ship captain, is in charge of Sauter's seagoing activities. He is the most jovial of the three leaders, never having been seen in public without a broad smile. He has been a member of the Sauter Triumvirate for 38 years. His outgoing mannerisms have led him to be the most popular leader. Although he is somewhat domineering when dealing with port workers and ship captains, he is diplomatic and wise, and always puts the needs of the city before his personal goals. He has a wife, 10 children, and several dozen grandchildren, who he claims to never see enough of because of the amount of time he must spend with the city's government. However, frequently several of the grandchildren can be found in the government building, wandering the halls and pestering the officials and Tom. Although White William is in charge of Sauter's army, which includes its sea defenses, Tom is always consulted when plans for sea patrols are being made.

Each member of the triumvirate is given a badge of office—a pendant displaying the city seal, which is a magic item that grants the wearer an armor class of 3. However, White William has other magic items which improve his armor class significantly beyond that. In addition, each member is always accompanied by three bodyguards, even at home. This practice was started about 100 years ago when an assassination attempt was made on a triumvirate member. At public functions, especially those where the Sauter Triumvirate will be out in the open, more guards are present, including some disguised as common residents.

The Sauter Triumvirate's strength lies in the diversity of the leaders and the great care they take in establishing laws and governing the populace. Several nearby cities have adopted this form of government and frequently study Sauter's laws before expanding upon their own codes. Emilia tends to favor adding more laws to the Sauter books, to clarify every aspect of city life. White William, on the other hand, would prefer the city have fewer laws, to make the government seem less stilted. Tom is the balancing force between the two, and makes them consider each proposed law on its merits, rather than thinking about the number of regulations already in existence. Some of the appointed government officials realize how important Tom's role is in the triumvirate and are searching for ways to magically extend his life, such as through potions of longevity.

However, despite its good reputation, the government has a weakness—the voting procedure used to put the leaders into office. Only landowners are permitted to vote, and many of the city's merchants and workers rent living space. These people give much to the community, but they are frustrated because they are given no say in the government. A small and quiet movement has begun to reform the government. It is in a beginning stage, and the landowners and the Sauter Triumvirate are not yet aware what is happening.

The goal of the current Sauter Triumvirate is to expand the sea trade routes and to strike up trade agreements with inland cities far to the south. In addition, the triumvirate members want to take a portion of the profits from these planned ventures and upgrade and improve the wharf area.

The Sauter Triumvirate recognizes all neutral and good religions for human and demihuman deities. However, because of Sauter's location, most of the deities worshiped are associated with the sea, such as Poseidon.

Sauter's Defenses

The city is surrounded by an earth and stone wall on three sides, which was difficult to construct because of the sloping hillside, and is open to the sea on the fourth. However, the sea is patrolled by Sauter forces and a group of friendly narwhales (which White William/Sauter communicates with through speak with animals spells).

Sauter has a standing army of 800, which is trained, paid, and kept up by city taxes. There is no draft in the city, although laws allow for one in time of war. Instead, the army is composed of young to mature male humans, half-elves, dwarves, and a few elves, who enlist as a way to make a living. They are paid a monthly salary and provided room and board. The soldiers are stationed along the city's walls, patrol the coast in six warships, and are responsible for patrolling the land within a seven-mile radius of the city. In addition, frequently the soldiers are used in public works projects and are used to complement the city guard force. In addition to the army, 250 male Sauter residents make up a volunteer force, which trains two to three days each month. This force will only be called into action if the city is attacked.

Many residents believe such a large army is not necessary for a city Sauter's size, especially because the city is at peace with all of its neighbors. At public meetings they have registered their protest of the large army, claiming residents' taxes would be lower if that many soldiers did not have to be supported. However, triumvirate members and appointed city officials are adamant about a strong defense. They contend that one of the reasons Sauter remains at peace with its neighbors is because of the strong army, which serves as a deterrent to war.

Sauter has a city guard force of 250. Unlike the army, the guard force has women members. Many members of the city guard are low-level adventurers who use the guard force for something to do and as a way to make money between adventures. The force also provides them a place to stay as part of the employment arrangement. The city accommodates the adventurers by letting them work in shifts, alternating one month on and one month off, or six months on and six months off (for those who want to plan an extended journey into the wilderness). The city officials believe that the city benefits from catering to adventurers in this way, because they get guards who are more capable than average men and who frequently carry magic weapons.

Unbeknownst to the Sauter citizens; the triumvirate also maintains a small network of spies who operate in the community and in several of the neighboring cities. The spies are usually low- to mid-level adventurers who find working for the city leaders more profitable than exploring dungeons—and sometimes more fun.

Population and Neighborhoods

About two-thirds of Sauter's population is human. The remaining third is composed of (in order of greatest number) half-elves, elves, dwarves, and halflings. There are three gnome families who live on the edge of town, but they are not well thought of because of their small number and because they play tricks on the city census-takers. The races mingle well in Sauter. The city is considered a melting pot of sorts because of its trade base and its seacoast location. It is not uncommon to see dwarves and elves dining together. In fact, the largest ship-building company in the city is jointly owned by a wood elf and a dwarf who used to adventure together.

Despite the camaraderie that the populace tends to enjoy, there are distinctive neighborhoods within the city. A neighborhood composed primarily of dwarves is located at the top of the hillside, while a neighborhood of high elves and wood elves lies to the north of the merchant district on the river. A neighborhood of halflings is located nearly in the middle of the city, although when it originated Sauter was smaller and the neighborhood was on the edge of the city. In addition, there are neighborhoods composed almost entirely of humans scattered throughout Sauter, and they are further segregated based on the wealth of the residents. For example, the wealthiest humans live on the southern edge of the city. And nearly all the neighborhoods along the coast are primarily human. The small neighborhoods in and around the merchant districts are composed of a smattering of all races. The mixture came about in part because the merchants are of a variety of races, and all of them want to live near their businesses. There is even a neighborhood along the river that is composed of adventurers; long-time Sauter residents call it the Adventurers Quarter. It is a collection of two- and three-story apartment buildings, taverns, and small shops that cater primarily to adventurers.

Most of the buildings in town are made of stone and earth; however, many of the buildings along the wharf area are made of wood. A few of the new city buildings, which were designed by a dwarven mason, are being constructed of a stiff clay mixture. City officials will have more buildings made of this material, which is inexpensive to create, if these test buildings hold up well.

Taxes

Sauter has a rather extensive tax system which covers all residents, whether they rent homes or own land. Landowners are taxed based on the amount of property they own, and they are further taxed on the number of buildings on the property. All residents are taxed 10% of their income. This does not sit well with many of the poorer residents, who believe the wealthy should be taxed much more.

Resident adventurers are not excluded from the tax system. And adventurers who live more than 30 days a year in the city are considered residents. The city taxes adventurers 10% of the value of their property and wealth. In addition, they are taxed 50 gold pieces a year for each permanent magic item they own. The adventurers' tax came into being early in Sauter's history. The adventurers who formed the community knew how wealthy their peers could become by exploring dungeons and raiding monster lairs, and they also believed that adventurers rarely needed all the wealth they accumulated. Sometimes it is difficult to tax the adventurers because they are not always honest about their wealth and magic items, and it is difficult to get them to report what they unearth in dungeons and ruins.

Residents who do not pay their taxes, or who cheat and only pay a portion, are subject to heavy fines and jail terms. Sometimes low- to mid-level adventurers, who are known to be truthful in paying their own taxes, are hired to catch those who refuse to comply with the tax laws.

In addition to the taxes, Sauter officials have imposed fees and licenses which also generate income for the community. For example, all merchants must buy a business license, and seagoing merchants must buy dock passes. The license fees are not exorbitant, but because of the large trade industry they generate a significant amount of money.

Sauter's Merchants

The larger of Sauter's two merchant district stretches from the wharfs to a few blocks up the foot of the hillside. There are 150 registered merchants in the city, with 90 of them located in this district. The largest shops deal with sea business, such as the sail makers, shipbuilders, rope makers, and metal workers. Other shops rely on the merchant ships to support their businesses, such as jewelers who purchase pearls, coral, and other valuables from the sea; fishmongers, who in turn export some of the goods up the river; and the trading post dealers, who purchase oddities brought in by sailors, such as old statues, and clean them up and sell them for high prices.

Some of the merchants have brought fame to Sauter. A dwarven jeweler is known throughout the northern half of the continent for the shell necklaces and rings he makes. The dwarf has a knack for selecting certain shells, which when etched will reflect the light and change colors. A rope maker, located in a small building near the docks, is renowned for the strong but thin ropes he makes, which are in demand by merchant ships. And a few of the inns have developed marvelous recipes for seafood.

The Sauter merchants instigated a series of summer festivals, which draw people to the city and boost sales throughout the merchant districts. Although the city officials and guard force find the festivals annoying, they realize the festivals are very important for the economic well-being of the merchants. When winter hits Sauter, most merchants' business drops dramatically, and the extra money they earn from the festivals tides them over until good weather returns.

Crime and Punishment

Despite its large guard force, Sauter has a crime rate which bothers the triumvirate members and lesser city officials. While the number of violent crimes, such as murder and kidnapping, is relatively small, there is a significant number of thefts, especially along the wharfs and near the two merchants districts.

The city officials realize that the large trade industry is a lure to thieves, many of whom they believe come in on merchant ships, steal goods, and leave on other ships. In addition, the officials know that there are many thieves in the Adventurers Quarter.

Part of the problem rests with the city officials, who until the past few years did not adopt harsh enough laws to deter the thieves. In the past, people caught stealing were merely fined or thrown in jail for a relatively short time. Now, however, a person convicted of stealing for the first time is penalized by a lengthy prison sentence with no possibility of parole. For a second conviction, the offender has his hand cut off. Thieves who establish themselves as habitual offenders—who continue to live a life of crime after losing a hand—are put to death. However, a few of the best thieves who are caught are sometimes put to work for the government, such as in the spy network under the supervision of more trustworthy adventurers. Sauter officials are confident that the harsher laws will eventually reduce the crime rate.

Sauter's court system is composed of a council of five clerics, who can often determine the guilt or innocence of the accused through detect lie spells. Although the use of magic to determine the truth of a matter might seem to lead to a lot of open-and-shut cases, in fact there are many occasions when detect lie does not absolutely establish guilt or innocence. It is possible for two people to tell the truth and still leave an issue unresolved; this is where the wisdom of the clerics comes into play, because they must actually hear the case and judge it on its merits.

Offenses that are punishable by death include murder, habitual thievery, brutal assault (attempted murder), and treason. Except for second-time thievery, all other crimes are punished by prison sentences, hard labor, or fines.

Adventures In Sauter

The sea caves that twist and burrow beneath the city, the deep forest to the north of the city, and the vast ocean where the ruins of ancient civilizations are said to be buried are all places that beckon to adventurers who frequent Sauter.

In addition, the city's great number of merchants, who come from many different places, are always a source of rumors and tips that could plunge an adventuring party into the thick of a mystery or into the depths of a dungeon.

Sometimes the city provides the adventure, as the city officials hire adventurers to deal with bands of monsters and creatures that lurk nearby. Because the city is located on the shore of the ocean, all manner of sea creatures—from sahuagin to sharks to marine trolls—could slip past the sea patrols and the friendly narwhales.

Sauter is also a starting point for adventure because of the great many ships that enter and leave port. There are always captains looking for new crew members, and there are always rumors of adventures waiting to happen on the islands miles away from the coast.

There is simply so much potential for excitement and fortune in and around Sauter that adventurers can't stay away.

ADVENTURING IN THE CITY

The following scenarios are written for the AD&D® game system, but can easily be altered for use with the D&D® game or with other fantasy role-playing games. All of these scenarios are intended to be used with the fold-up buildings and street layouts included with this product.

The Maltese Roc, the longest of the scenarios, can take several hours of playing time. The other scenarios — Ike Likes Spiders and Snakes, A Slave to the Music, The Horrible Haunting of Mycky Fynn's, and A Grand Illusion — can be used as simple encounters that can last an hour, or you can flesh them out into adventures that could take up an entire evening apiece. Some of these scenarios can be used for player characters of any level by simply adjusting the level of the non-player characters provided, or by adding additional non-player characters and creatures.

IKE LIKES SPIDERS AND SNAKES

This adventure is for 1st and 2nd level characters composing a party with total experience levels of 6 to 12.

DM Background: Ike Ingleman likes spiders, snakes, insects, and other small creatures which the majority of the populace considers repulsive. Ike, who is a little eccentric, has been collecting these creatures for several years. In his one-story shop he keeps his prized insect collection, which consists of dozens of large, glass-covered wooden boxes filled with a variety of dead insects, each insect carefully mounted with a small pin and labeled. He also has an extensive mounted spider collection, which is kept in a similar fashion. On shelves about his shop are displayed stuffed frogs, lizards, and snakes, which Ike studies and offers for sale (although he gets very few takers). Ike also sells insects and parts of small creatures to help support his habit of collecting. Although his customers are few (consisting mainly of alchemists and mages who use his goods for elixirs, potions, and spell components), they pay well.

A few months ago Ike decided to expand his hobby by keeping live insects, spiders, snakes, and other creatures. He filled his basement with cages, crates, and large glass jars and began to pay adventurers to capture things for him. Of course, the adventurers were above collecting normal-sized toads and lizards, so they began to bring him giant-sized varieties. This delighted Ike, and although his savings dwindled his collection of live specimens grew. His basement became filled with giant frogs, killer frogs, fire beetles, giant centipedes, giant rats, and his favorites—huge spiders and constrictor, spitting, and poisonous snakes.

Ike started bragging to his friends about the big spiders he was keeping at his place. His friends were repulsed, but children in town who heard the stories were intrigued.

One night a few children crept into Ike's basement to make sure that Ike wasn't making up tales about his new collection. When they found the creatures, one of the bolder children thought it would be great fun to let the collection loose. Fortunately for the fast and dextrous child, he was able to unlatch the cages and uncap the jars before the creatures realized they were free. The child escaped and so, eventually, did Ike's collection, taking up residence in the surrounding buildings and alleys and creating a basis for this scenario.

Setup: This scenario requires the use of at least two street layouts, where encounters will occur along side streets; a 2"-by-3" two-story fold-up building to represent Ike's place; one additional 2"-by-3" fold-up building, and two 2"-by-2" buildings that should be placed in the general vicinity of Ike's place (these will be occupied by the creatures from Ike's collection). To draw the scenario out somewhat and provide for other possible encounters along the way, you can set up additional street sections and a few other buildings so the PCs will have to do a little exploring before they find all of the creatures.

How to Get the PCs Involved

1. The PCs are walking down one of the city's streets when they notice a giant centipede run out of a building and down an adjacent alley. The incident quickly will be followed with sobs and shouts of "Oh, no! Not my precious!" coming from inside the building (Ike's home). Ike has just realized that his entire collection has been let out and is in the process of escaping.

2. Ike and a few of his neighbors, who have had their buildings infested with his freed collection, seek the player characters' help in cleaning out the buildings. Ike will beg the PCs to capture, not kill, the creatures; and he will give them nets to use for this purpose. He will caution the PCs that some of the creatures are poisonous, and will give the party enough doses of elixir of health to negate poisoning in each of them once.

Ike's House: PCs entering Ike's house will immediately notice his vast collection of insects and spiders kept in the wooden cases. If Ike is with them, he will expound upon the many varieties of insects and creatures he has accumulated. Almost all of the creatures on the first floor are dead. However, PCs looking through Ike's collection of taxidermied frogs and snakes will encounter two spitting cobras lying on a shelf. The snakes made a meal of a couple of overly large frogs and are resting. They will attack if the PCs get within 5' of them or appear menacing.

Spitting snakes (2): AC 5; MV 12; HD 4+2; hp 21, 23; #AT 1; Dmg 1d3; SA poisonous spittle, which can be sprayed up to 30' at a single target; THAC0 15.

There are no other living creatures in Ike's house. PCs who examine the basement will discover all the empty cages, crates, and large jars. Many of these containers had been painstakingly filled with mud, grasses, and small insects by Ike to make his creatures feel at home. If the PCs appear interested, Ike will explain how difficult it was to recreate their natural habitats. He will tell the PCs (if they are willing to listen) which creatures were in which cages. Crafty players should take note of Ike's list, so they will know precisely what they are up against.

Ike's list includes the following creatures: giant centipedes; awfully long snakes, two of which he thinks are overgrown cobras and one of which he believes is a constrictor; giant frogs; large frogs with teeth (killer frogs); real big spiders, which resemble a wolf spider; a real, real big spider; oversized rats; and big beetles that glow red—he believes they are called fire beetles. Ike will apologize for not knowing the precise names of the creatures, explaining that he has not had them long enough (nor had enough extra gold pieces on hand) to be able to contact scholars who know about these things. He will tell the PCs that if they can return the creatures, he is certain he can find the correct names for their species soon.

Alley # 1: If the PCs have undertaken this adventure during the day, this encounter could prove to be the easiest, and might make the PCs believe that tackling Ike's collection will be a simple task. Their target in this location will be a very large constrictor snake, which will be sunning itself in the middle of the alley. However, if the PCs have undertaken this adventure during the evening, the snake will be curled up next to some trash containers and will be difficult to notice. This snake is not aggressive and will not make a move to attack the PCs unless they approach closer than 5' or appear to menace it.

Constrictor Snake: AC 5; MV 9; HD 6+1; hp 33; #AT 2; Dmg 1d4/2d4; SA constriction; THACO 13.

Alley #2: This alley has become the new home for a dozen giant centipedes, which are hiding among stacks of crates. The centipedes are aggressive and will rush out to attack the PCs if they approach the crates.

Giant Centipedes (12): AC 9; MV 15; HD 1/4; hp 2 each; #AT 1; Dmg nil; SA poison (non-fatal); THACO 20.

Alley #3: Only one member of Ike's collection has wandered into this alley—a hungry giant rat, which has encountered the resident of the alley, a bum named George. George doesn't have any friends and never had any pets, so he has decided to get one of each by attempting to befriend the rat. The rat isn't especially friendly, but George (who is a real pro at scavenging) has been feeding it, so it hasn't attacked him. If the PCs enter this alley, George will try to hide his rat. If the PCs are persistent in checking out the area, they will notice George's new friend. George will do his best to try to convince the PCs that the rat is actually his dog, Spike. The rat will try to run away if the PCs are aggressive. If the rat does escape, George will become belligerent and obnoxious, demanding that the PCs pay him for damages for the loss of his pet.

Giant Rat: AC 7; MV 12//6; HD 1/2; hp 3; #AT 1; Dmg 1d3; SA disease; THACO 20.

Building #1: One giant spider and six huge spiders have made this place their new lair. It is important that you pay attention to where the players place their figures in this building. The spiders will be above the PCs, hidden in webs and scuttling about in the rafters. The spiders will drop on the characters when at least one PC walks to the center of the building's main room. It is up to you whether all the spiders are in one main room or are divided between all the building's rooms. However, a party of all 1st level characters should not encounter all of the spiders at once.

Giant Spider: AC 4; MV 3 * 12; HD 4+4; hp 12; #AT 1; Dmg 2d4; SA poison; THACO 15.

Huge Spiders (6): AC 6; MV 18; HD 2+2; hp 3, 4, 5, 6, 6, 7; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6; SA poison; THACO 16.

The spiders will break off the attack and flee if the PCs kill three of the huge spiders quickly.

Main Street: As the PCs exit Building #1, which contained the big spiders, they will hear screaming and will see a half-dozen commoners being chased down the street by five 2½-foot-long beetles. The commoners are staying ahead of the beetles, but it should be obvious to the PCs that the commoners cannot outdistance them.

Fire Beetles (5): AC 4; MV 12; HD 1+2; hp 4, 5, 5, 7, 8; #AT 1; Dmg 2d4; THACO 18.

Building #2: This has become the hideout of a group of giant and killer frogs. PCs who examine the outside of the building before entering will notice something amiss—two windows are broken. The frogs had jumped into this building to escape the noise and confusion of the city streets. The giant frogs are on the small side, being only 2 feet long. However, because there are six of them, the two killer frogs have left them alone. If the PCs enter this building, the two killer frogs will attack immediately. The giant frogs are frightened by the city and will only attack if the PCs walk toward them.

Killer Frogs (2): AC 8; MV 6//12; HD 1+4; hp 6, 7; #AT 3; Dmg ½d4/½d4/1d4+1; THACO 18.

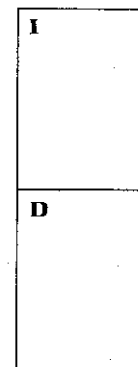

Giant Frogs (6): AC 7; MV 3//9; HD 1; hp 5 each; #AT 1; Dmg 1d3; SA sticky tongue; THACO 19.

Building #3: This building contains a lot of foodstuffs, and for that reason has become the home of Ike's giant rats. The rats are very happy here and will aggressively fight anyone who enters their new domain.

Giant Rats (15): AC 7; MV 12//6; HD ½; hp 2 each; #AT 1; Dmg 1d3; SA disease; THACO 20.

Finishing the Adventure: It is doubtful the player characters will have been able to recapture all of Ike's collection, and likely that they will have been forced to kill some of the creatures. Deep down Ike realizes that some of his pets were bound to die; even if the PCs do not capture a single creature, he will not blame them for what has happened, and will give them 15 gp each for their help. However, if the PCs were able to recapture at least some of his creatures, he will be in better spirits and will offer them a further reward—three of his wooden boxes filled with mounted and identified insects. This is a big sacrifice for Ike, as it took him a while to accumulate and identify them. If the PCs decline this offer, he will not give them anything else in its place, and in any event the monetary reward will not be more than 15 gp apiece because that's all the money Ike can spare. The PCs will eventually benefit if they do take the three boxes of insects. Sold to the right buyer, each box will bring 110 gp.

Suggested Street Layouts

A SLAVE TO THE MUSIC

This scenario is intended for three to six player characters of 2nd through 4th levels, composing a party with total levels of 9 to 14.

DM Background: Ahmal, a retired thief, is a merchant who sells carved wooden furniture, figurines, bowls, and wooden flutes in his rented shop. He has been at this work for nearly a decade, choosing it over his former profession because he was caught once too often and spent a few too many years in prison. His dextrous hands quickly turn out his wooden wares, gaining him a passable income, but not netting him enough to buy his own shop in a better section of the city. His wooden flutes were sought after only by commoners who did not have enough money to buy fine, well-made instruments. Ahmal feared he would never attain the fame and wealth he so desperately wanted and believed he deserved.

However, all of that changed a few months ago when Ahmal accepted a book about djinn and efreet from a customer in trade for a chair. The book explained how djinn can create soft wood and wooden items magically. The book caused Ahmal to become obsessed with getting a djinni. He spent all of his money, traded a few of the magic items he had been hoarding from his past thieving career, and borrowed 2,000 gold pieces from an unscrupulous lender (jeopardizing his business and his life) to obtain a luck blade. With the wishes the blade contained, he learned the location of a djinni and how to enslave it. Under the pretense of making a trading trip, Ahmal accomplished his task. And shortly after his return, his business picked up. Ahmal's djinni-sculpted furniture, figurines, and flutes are now in demand and command high prices, although the customers continue to believe that Ahmal is the craftsman. And his flutes have become sought after by professional musicians throughout the area. Ahmal has not shared the secret of his djinni with anyone.

Neighboring merchants are suspicious of the sudden improved quality in Ahmal's goods. However, the retired thief contends the change came about because he learned a few new carving techniques on his last trading expedition. Because of the suspicion, and Ahmal's usually suspicious nature, he is very careful in protecting his livelihood—the djinni—and has relied on the skills from his former profession to set up elaborate traps in his shop to keep thieves and competitors from learning his secret and stealing the djinni.

Ahmal is nervously happy with his situation. He is confident that he will have enough money soon to pay back his loan, and within several months after that he hopes to have enough to buy his own large shop in the best section of the city. He has promised to the djinni that it will be released when his dream of a large shop and a very prosperous business is realized—hoping that this incentive will spur the djinni to continue producing items of unequalled quality, so as to hasten the day when it receives its freedom again. However, Ahmal actually has no intention of releasing the djinni, which he keeps in a specially magicked box.

To complicate the situation just before the player characters enter the picture, Rourk, the loan shark whom Ahmal borrowed money from, is curious about the merchant's improved business and has decided he wants his money paid back now—and with a higher interest rate than previously agreed on.

Setup: You will need a two-story, 2"-by-3" building fold-up to serve as Ahmal's shop and living quarters. Construct a handmade paper map of the building you select for your own reference, so you can mark where and what kinds of traps are placed inside and outside. In addition, you will need to set up several buildings of varying sizes nearby, spread across three or four street layout sheets to accommodate a chase scene. Create as many traps as feasible for Ahmal's building. However, be careful not to put them where customers normally would walk. Ahmal would not want to draw suspicion on himself by having an ordinary customer break his leg in a pit trap. Suggested traps include a trapdoor/pit trap, the bottom of which is coated with sleep poison (save vs. poison or be knocked unconscious for 1d8 turns); a thin but strong wire that when tripped causes a net or cage to fall down around the intruder; or a pressure-sensitive floorboard, which when stepped upon causes darts or daggers to be propelled at an intruder from a hidden panel in the wall.

1. The PCs are hired by Rourk to collect the money Ahmal owes him. Rourk tells the PCs that Ahmal is long overdue in paying him back 3,000 gp (actually, Ahmal borrowed 2,000 and agreed to a 500 gp interest charge). Rourk says he will pay the PCs 200 gp if they can collect on the loan, and promises (untruthfully) that he will hire them for other collections if they are successful. He warns the PCs that Ahmal has a shady past—he knows that Ahmal has served time in prison for thievery—and likely will try to weasel his way out of paying the loan or will lie to the PCs.

2. A wealthy but jealous merchant hires the PCs to purchase some of Ahmal's best carved pieces. The merchant is upset with Ahmal's upswing in business and wants to carefully examine some of Ahmal's pieces so that he can reproduce them or somehow prove Ahmal stole them from somewhere and is reselling them.

3. The PCs are walking through the marketplace when they notice a crowd around a woodcarver's shop. If they investigate they will see the proprietor, Ahmal, showing off his latest creations and describing how painstakingly difficult it was for him to get the curved surfaces so smooth and shiny. The PCs also will notice a few disgruntled neighboring merchants looking on.

4. A merchant who deals only in musical instruments is suspicious of Ahmal's flutes. He knows the retired thief is no musician and hires the PCs to find out who is producing the instruments or from whom Ahmal stole the instruments.

At the first opportunity the PCs take to closely examine one of Ahmal's pieces of merchandise, you can give the PCs a clue (if you so desire). Have the examining character (or one of them, chosen at random) notice small scratches on the piece in an innocuous place that seem to spell out words. On the bottom of the base of a figurine, for instance, will be the words "help me." Further investigation of pieces will reveal words such as "prisoner" and "slave," scratched just inside the opening of a flute or seeming to be part of the decorative etching on the outer surface. The words are very difficult to read, and it might be very hard to convince a disinterested party that the scratches are nothing more than scratches. If Ahmal is confronted about the words, he will say the PCs are imagining things. Those scrawls are not words, he will contend. They are simply part of the decoration, or (if in a place not normally visible) small scratch marks caused by the equipment he uses to hold a piece of wood in place while he carves it. If he gets a chance to do so out of sight of the PCs, he will gouge at the marks with one of his woodworking tools to blot out the words. If the PCs move away from the shop, Ahmal will begin checking all of his wooden items and removing from his shelves any pieces with scrawled words on the bottom or in some other out-of-the-way place.

The scenario's action eventually will take the PCs farther inside the building, past the shop portion, where they must contend with whatever devious traps you have set up. Ahmal, who can freely move about the building because he knows where all the traps are, will move to the back of the building, attempt to lure the PCs through his traps, grab the small brass magic box holding the djinni, and try to escape. You should run the action of this scenario so that Ahmal can lead the PCs on a chase from building to building, through alleys and side streets, and across rooftops, relying on all his thief abilities and his boots of striding and springing. Ahmal is very familiar with this portion of the city, so he will be able to run down dead-end alleys, using his boots to vault over fences and to propel him to rooftops. You might want to choreograph the chase scene in advance. A well-planned out chase scene will allow you to use several buildings and street plans.

Variation: If the PCs were not hired by Rourk, they could also encounter Rourk and his men, who are trying to catch Ahmal and who may end up fighting the PCs to prevent them from getting the box coveted by the little thief.

Ahmal: 10th level human thief.

Str 12, Int 16, Wis 10, Dex 18, Con 13, Cha 9. Hit points 39, Alignment CN, AC 4 (front), 8 (rear); THAC0 16.

Thieving abilities: PP 70, OL 70, RT 75, MS 70, HS 60, DN 25, CW 95, RL 35.

Ahmal is wearing or carrying a ring of protection +2, boots of striding and springing, a bag of caltrops (to slow pursuers), a bag of marbles (to trip pursuers), a sap, a short sword +1 (the luck blade), three daggers, 6 pp, 12 gp, and 8 sp. Hidden in his shop is a chest containing 540 gp and 2,300 sp (which he was accumulating in case he was forced to pay back his loan).

Ahmal is greedy, but not evil. He will try to avoid killing anyone. If possible, he will flee rather than fight. However, he will fight if provoked. His most valued item is the djinni trapped in the small magic box. If he thinks the PCs are getting too close during a chase, he will stash the box someplace, try to lose the PCs, and come back later to get it. If Ahmal is caught with the box, and the PCs discover what is inside, Ahmal will plead with them, explaining about the loan shark and his need to keep the djinni so he can raise enough gold to pay off his loan. He will use all the trickery he can muster to keep the djinni and the gold and silver he has hidden in his shop.

Since Ahmal has worked as a merchant for several years in this city, he is generally considered a solid citizen. And because of that, the PCs could get themselves in trouble if they handle this situation poorly. If the PCs steal the gold and silver in his shop or break any of his wares, Ahmal will report them to the city guards. If the PCs forcibly take the djinni box from Ahmal with witnesses present, Ahmal will report them to the authorities and ask for a trial. Ahmal has done nothing illegal according to the city's laws.

Noonjab, the djinni: AC 4; MV 9/24; HD 7+3; hp 36; #AT 1; Dmg 2d8; AL CG; THAC0 13.

The djinni will be very grateful to the PCs if they release him. This is not a noble djinni; therefore, he cannot grant wishes. However, he will offer to appear before the PCs the next time they are in need of aid and will offer to make for each of them one of his wondrous flutes. These flutes will be of even higher quality than the ones he made for Ahmal's shop. Each flute will be worth 250 gp.

Rourk, the loan shark: 4th level human fighter; AC 7 (leather and Dex bonus); MV 12"; HD 4; hp 28; #AT 1; Dmg 1d8 (long sword) or 1d4 (dagger); AL CN; THAC0 17.

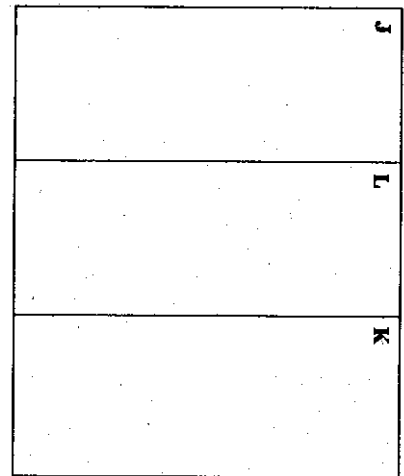

Rourk is a devious and greedy man whose sole ambition is to make more money. He has a ratlike visage with beady eyes and a long nose. Despite his mannerisms, Rourk should not be considered evil and does nothing that is overtly illegal. He is smart enough to order his bullies not to harass people in public and not to beat up on delinquent borrowers if there is someone watching.

Rourk employs five 1st level fighters as bully boys. They are AC 5 (chain mail); MV 9; HD 1; hp 6, 7, 9; #AT 1; Dmg 1d8; AL N; THAC0 20.

These fighters are loyal to Rourk, although they occasionally acquire a few gold pieces on their own from Rourk's customers through their bullying tactics. They dress in clothing of dark brown and gray and look unkempt. Their sinister and slovenly appearance helps to keep borrowers in line.

Suggested Street Layouts

THE HORRIBLE HAUNTING OF MYCKY FYNN'S

This scenario is designed for up to six player characters of 2nd through 7th levels.

DM Background: Mycky Fynn's is a bustling establishment located on the wharfs. Its customers include adventurers passing through town, sailors who have a few hours to spend before their ships leave, and town residents who enjoy the atmosphere and like to watch the sailors and adventurers clash in brash discussions fueled by tankards of ale. Its customers are also a brave and curious lot, as night after night they continue to return to the tavern— even though it is haunted by a very persistent and unpredictable “ghost.” None of the customers know why the ghost appeared, although they speculate that a ship brought the spirit in.

The establishment consists of a large tavern area on the first floor, which includes a stage and a few gambling tables, and several rooms upstairs, which the owner, Mychael Fynnygyn, rents to adventurers for a few silver pieces a night. Fynnygyn, a retired fighter, lives in one of the rooms upstairs. The three newest residents of the establishment—formerly destitute leprechauns—live downstairs behind a wine rack. The leprechauns, which have fabricated a ghost, are the cause of the horrible haunting and the subject of this scenario:

About a month ago, the leprechauns were tricked out of the majority of their treasure by a band of high-powered adventurers. Uncharacteristically saddened by their state of near-poverty (all they had left were a jar of Nolzur's marvelous pigments and a ring of spell storing), the trio wandered into town looking for a way to drown their sorrows. They quickly came upon Mycky Fynn's and overheard a group of adventurers talking about a dungeon they visited which was populated by a variety of undead. The leprechauns intently listened to the descriptions of the undead and the behavior the foul creatures exhibited, and they decided it would be great fun to “haunt” this tavern and the remains of the burned-down shop next door.

Their haunting techniques, which are detailed under the “Mycky Fynn's” and “The Ghost” sections below, have had mixed results. The ghost they created has scared away a few of the regulars, has kept superstitious sailors at bay, and continues to frustrate the city's clerics, who can only seem to “turn” the ghost for a few moments. How(ever, overall the ghost has increased business at Mycky Fynn's, as adventurers and several brave locals come every night to watch the spectacle and make bets on what the ghost will do next.

To complicate matters, Old Pete, the owner of a small tavern a few doors down, has decided to procure his own undead in the hope of increasing his business. He hired a cleric of non-good alignment to bring in several skeletons and zombies. The undead were directed to gyrate in a corner when music was playing. All was going well until a drunken sailor put his fingers in a skeleton's eye socket. The undead attacked, seriously injuring the sailor and resulting in the closing of Old Pete's Place.

Setup: This scenario requires the use of a 2"-by-3" two-story building fold-up to represent Mycky Fynn's, a 2"-by-2" two-story building to represent Old Pete's Place, and a variety of one- and two-story buildings to represent the burned-down store next to Mycky Fynn's. The leprechauns use their illusions to make this burned-down building appear different each time people enter its remains. For example, the first time PCs enter it, the building may appear on the inside to be a very large, once elegant establishment. The next time it could seem to be a one-story cramped business. This will give you an opportunity to use a variety of buildings that come with this set.

When using a two-story building to represent Mycky Fynn's and any building to represent the illusion-generated building next door, it is important to note where players place their miniatures. You must keep track of where the leprechauns are in relation to the miniatures. Certain illusions might not be noticed by some of the player characters, depending on where their miniatures are placed.

1. The PCs are passing through town and decide to stop at a tavern. The tavern just happens to be Mycky Fynn's.

2. If the PCs have a cleric in the group, that cleric is approached by representatives of the character's temple and told about the horrible haunting of Mycky Fynn's and the undead problem at Old Fete's Place. The cleric is asked to do something about the situation.

3. The PCs hear rumors about a friendly ghost at a local tavern and about skeletons and zombies at a smaller tavern nearby which are not so amiable.

Mycky Fynn's: If the PCs visit the tavern in the evening, it will be crowded with sailors, adventurers, and townsfolk. However, the NPC adventurers should not be higher than 2nd level or they could potentially outshine the player characters.

Illusions within the tavern consist primarily of the ghost, in the form of a beautiful woman who looks strikingly like the woman in the painting above the bar. She puts on a floor show on the establishment's stage every night. The female in the group of leprechauns will use her ventriloquism to make the ghost sing and tell jokes. The ghost will assume a horrid visage to customers who insult her or clerics who try to “turn” her. However, the leprechauns are not stupid. They will let clerical turning work once in a while to help maintain the ruse that this is a real ghost. A successful turning attempt will keep the ghost away for at least a half-hour (while the leprechauns, to keep from getting bored, might steal drinks and coins from patrons) and will upset the customers, who have grown accustomed to seeing the beautiful spirit.

To simulate tricks that the ghost might play, the leprechauns use their invisibility to make drinks move from one end of the bar to the other. With their polymorph ability, they will make the woman in the painting appear to change clothes and hair styles.

The Ghost: The ghost appears every night from 7 to 11 p.m., taking breaks when the leprechauns get tired or have too much to drink. The ghost has never attacked a customer, although it once frightened away patrons who became too loud and obnoxious and a cleric who kept trying to turn it. The ghost was able to frighten the patrons because of the leprechauns' ring of spell storing, which contains several fear spells. Player characters asking about those who were frightened by the ghost will learn that the ghost was very kind, because it did not age those people.

Sometimes the ghost can be seen materializing right out of the painting above the bar, floating around the room, and coming to rest on the stage. At other times, the ghost wanders from table to table, sitting on the laps of the best-looking patrons and asking for their drinks. The drinks are consumed by the invisible leprechauns.

When 11 p.m. approaches, or earlier if the leprechauns are especially tired or bored, the ghost will ascend the stairs, yawning, and wave good night to the customers and Mychael Fynnygyn.

Burned-down Building: This is the remains of a small general store that caught fire two weeks ago. There were rumors the ghost had something to do with it. So the leprechauns, not wanting a good opportunity to pass them by, began to "haunt" it, too. Using a portion of their Nolzur's marvelous pigments, the leprechauns one night painted a fancy wooden door, which was the only standing object in the building. Angry at what he thought the ghost had done, the owner of the property tore the door down, only to find a larger, fancier door in its place the next day. This door has remained, and the building's ruins have become a bit of an oddity. One of the leprechauns usually is stationed here, waiting for an unsuspecting person to come near. Using ventriloquism, the leprechaun lures the visitor into the building, which the leprechaun turns into an elegant manor, a bawdy inn, a stable complete with talking (by ventriloquism) horses, or the general store as it appeared before the fire. The leprechauns, of course, had nothing to do with the building burning. You can use as many of the buildings in this set as you want to represent the burned-down building which is covered up by the leprechauns' illusions. Please keep in mind that PCs going upstairs in an illusion-generated building will only think they are going upstairs. The leprechaun or leprechauns present will alter the illusion to make the PCs think they are on another floor. There is actually nothing of interest in the building's burned ruins, although a crafty DM can occupy quite a bit of the players' time with the illusory buildings. If the PCs spend a considerable amount of time here, have a second leprechaun join the action, and feel free to have the ghost from the tavern stop by for a brief visit.

Old Pete's Place: This small two-story building has been boarded up. There is not a window or door visible because of the numerous, thick boards and table tops nailed in place.

Pete, who frequently can be found in a stupor at Mycky Fynn's these days, hired a cleric to bring in eight skeletons and six zombies in an attempt to increase his business. It worked for a few days, until a sailor bothered one of the skeletons. When the undead attacked, the adventurers in the tavern began grabbing tables, chairs, and loose floorboards, which they used to board up the building. The eight skeletons and six zombies remain inside.

If the player characters ask about the boarded-up building or meet Pete inside Mycky Fynn's, they will be told the pathetic story of Pete's attempt to increase business. If the player characters seem sympathetic, Pete will ask them to take care of the skeletons and zombies. He cannot pay them for the task, since he spent most of his savings getting the undead and the remainder of his savings drinking at Mycky Fynn's to forget the undead.

You can place the skeletons and zombies anywhere within Old Pete's Place. This encounter will pose little problem to low-level adventurers and will be easy for mid-level adventurers. However, if the player characters deal with the undead at Pete's, a few residents who don't care for the ghost at Mycky Fynn's and a few clerics who couldn't turn the ghost will ask the PCs to handle that undead menace.

There should be little of value inside Old Pete's Place, as bottles, tables, and chairs were broken by the undead. However, you may feel free to add Pete's cash box, which should not contain more than 100 gp. If the PCs take his cash box, Pete will be very upset but will not press the matter since he was able to get rid of the skeletons and zombies.

#AT 1; Dmg 1d8 + 2 (long sword +2); THAC0 16 (14 with sword).

Mychael, or Mycky as his regulars call him, is an easygoing, pleasant man with broad shoulders and an even broader smile. He is a well-to-do businessman who has been running this tavern for nearly five years. He treats all of his customers cordially. He especially enjoys talking to adventurers and listening to tales of their exploits.

Mycky has never had a problem with ghosts before, and he doesn't really consider this ghost a problem. The ghost has not harmed any of the customers, although it has scared a few of them away. The ghost has been good for business and is pleasing to look at. However, Mycky is concerned about the burned-out building next door. He hopes his ghost had nothing to do with it.

Mycky has given up his career as a fighter; however, he still exercises to keep in good shape. He does not wear armor or bracers. Mycky has a long sword +2 which he keeps behind the bar.

Sherry provides the voice for the ghost.. O'Tule, who has the ring of spell storing, usually fashions the ghost with his illusions. O'Leerie is responsible for keeping the burned-down building next door haunted.

Their current treasure consists of the ring of spell storing (which has 3 charges remaining, all of them fear spells), a half-full jar of Nolzur's marvelous pigments, 210 gp; 300 sp, 100 cp, and a silver and pearl ring worth 800 gp.

If the player characters catch the leprechauns and attempt to get their treasure, one of the leprechauns will try to paint a small pile of gems with the remainder of the pigments in an attempt to pass that off as the treasure. The leprechauns will not want to leave the tavern, since it has become a continual source of amusement, wine, and gold pieces for them.

Mychael Fynnygyn will be very upset to learn it wasn't really a good-natured ghost that was living in his tavern. However, depending on the outcome of the adventure, Fynnygyn could ask the leprechauns to stay—to help his business.

A GRAND ILLUSION

This adventure is designed for four to six player characters ranging in levels from 2nd through 6th, composing a party with total levels of 9 to 14.

DM Background: A strange and horrible new creature has descended upon the town. It hides in alleys, behind businesses, and emerges from the shadows to threaten those who are alone or who are in numbers too small to pose it any threat. The leadership of the town is terrified that the creature will cause some of the residents to move to another city and will keep traders away if news of the attacks leaks out. The creature has been able to elude the city guard and several bands of townsfolk who joined forces to try to put a stop to the foul thing.

But unbeknownst to the populace, the creature isn't real. It is the fabrication of Elisha, a mage, and Thomoth, an illusionist. Elisha and Thomoth are the only surviving members of an adventuring party which used to travel in the lands north of the city. The two chaotic neutral adventurers, who were barely able to drag themselves out of a dragon's lair—leaving their dead comrades behind—decided it would be safer and easier to make a living in town. However, Elisha and Thomoth were not interested in working for their gold, at least not working in the sense of doing physical labor or putting in hours behind a store counter. The two decided to earn their wealth by using deception and magic.

Thomoth "created" a horrible dragon, which was the compilation of all the creatures they had seen in their last fateful outing with their adventuring band. The dragon is gray with sparse patches of black hair growing out of its black-scaled hide. It has dark yellow fangs and dark brown fur that runs in a strip along its back. The beast's great head is as large as two horses, and its emerald eyes are piercing and frightening. Its tail is long and barbed. Its feet end in long, curved claws that are tipped with dark red. Those who have seen the creature believe that the red color is from dried blood. The thing has no wings, but the witnesses are certain it can fly anyway—magically. The thing breathes fire, emits a green-gray gas, causes people to run in fear, and is apparently accumulating treasure somewhere, since the victims who somehow escaped with their lives were stripped of all valuables.

Actually, all of the victims have escaped with their lives; Thomoth and Elisha have no desire to seriously harm someone. There have been a few occasions where an adventurer was burned by the thing, but that was because the adventurer was too close to discovering the mage and illusionist. In addition, Elisha and Thomoth have planted some burned clothes in a few alleys to further add to their dragon's credibility. The public believes there have been fatalities because a few people in town have disappeared. In truth, the people were victims of the dragon and fled town for fear of being attacked again.

The dragon attacks people who are walking alone or people in small groups who do not appear to be heavily armored. It always attacks at night (less chance of Elisha and Thomoth being noticed), and the attacks almost always occur in or near alleys. There is no pattern to the location of the attacks.

Sometimes Elisha and Thomoth have to lure people to an alley so the dragon can attack. To accomplish this, Thomoth on occasion has "created" a gambling game in an alley, "manufactured" a pretty girl who beckons to people, or has placed a sparkling gem in the beam of a street light.

Setup: The setup for this adventure is basically left up to you, since the interiors of buildings are not needed—the encounters will only occur in streets and alleys. However, you must set up at least a few buildings. This will help to give the image of shadowy streets and alleys. In addition, the player characters may want to visit an inn or tavern in an attempt to get more information about the dragon.

1. The PCs are quietly approached by town officials and asked if they can put an end to the threat of this dark dragon. The officials will offer each PC 100 gp and a week's stay in the city's finest inn in exchange for proof that the dragon is dead.

2. The PCs have stopped in this town between adventures and hear a few tales about the dragon. A few of the storytellers talk about the wealth the dragon must be accumulating and about how the town's economy will soon suffer as news of the dragon reaches traveling merchants.

The Dragon: The image of the dragon is the manifestation of a spectral force spell cast by Thomoth. Elisha helps to enhance the apparent reality of the monster. When the dragon emits its green-gray gas, the mage casts a sleep spell. When the dragon breathes fire, Elisha moves close to the target and casts burning hands. And when the dragon radiates its aura of fear, Elisha casts a scare spell or a fear spell. This latter action usually happens when the two spellcasters hear other people coming and don't want to risk having their scam exposed. After the fear is cast, Thomoth casts invisibility on himself (unless he is using dust of disappearance), and the pair leaves.

Fighting the Dragon: If the PCs are dressed in their adventuring garb when they encounter the dragon, Elisha will use the fear spell as the first method of attack. She hopes to get some of the PCs to run away, cutting their numbers so the "dragon" will have fewer people to deal with. If the remaining adventurers appear to pose a problem, she will cast stinking cloud when the dragon breathes its green-gray gas. She and Thomoth will avoid using magic that could reveal their presence, relying on spells that resemble a dragon's capabilities. However, the pair will resort to their other spells if it appears the PCs are going to find them out. In addition, the pair will attempt to flee if there is doubt they can defeat the PCs. This latter possibility could result in a chase scene using the streets, alleys, and buildings the DM has laid out.

Elisha: 7th level human female mage.

Str 9, Int 16, Wis 12, Dex 17, Con 15, Cha 14.

Hit points 17, Alignment CN, Armor class 5 (front), 8 (rear).

Spells carried:

1st level	burning hands (x2), sleep , charm person
2nd level	scare (x2), stinking cloud
3rd level	hold person , protection from normal missiles
4th level	fear

Elisha wears or carries a ring of protection +2, a ring of invisibility, a dagger +2, a potion of flying, a potion of healing, a large carved wooden footprint (which she presses into the dirt in the alleyways to show proof of the dragon's presence), and three dozen black dragon scales (she used to have more, but she leaves a scale or two in the alley after each attack).

Elisha is greedy and is primarily responsi-corner while he manipulates the dragon.

Thomoth is only slightly less greedy than Elisha. He thoroughly enjoys the scam about the dragon and is looking forward to leaving this town to try the setup elsewhere. Thomoth wants to branch out, creating a whole variety of these "city beasts" which attack from the alleys. He plans on spending some of their wealth to purchase more dust of disappearance.

Defeating the Dragon: If the PCs defeat the dragon but let Elisha and Thomoth escape, they will have a difficult time proving the scam, and they will not be able to recover the items the pair stole from the town residents. However, several days later you could leak information to the PCs about a dragon attacking residents in another nearby town. This will give the PCs a second chance at the mage and illusionist.

If the PCs are able to capture Elisha and Thomoth, the pair will initially claim to not know anything and could even try to pass themselves off as victims of the dragon the PCs chased away. Persistent questioning will yield the truth and their treasure: 4,500 gp worth of gems, jewelry, and assorted baubles; 1,000 gold pieces; and 2,000 silver pieces. If the PCs turn the treasure over, the 4,500 gp worth of jewelry will be claimed by the robbery victims, leaving the monetary treasure—along with the townfolks' undying gratitude and any magic items taken from Elisha and Thomoth—to the PCs.

THE MALTESE ROC

This adventure is designed for four to six player characters, each of 5th to 7th level, composing a party with total levels of around 30.

DM Background: The Maltese Roc, an "everything shop," is a bustling business operated by a retired halfling fighter named Samuel Hart. It is a two-story establishment, with the shop on the first floor and Sam's living quarters on the second. A small basement holds pawned items, out-of-season merchandise, out-of-fashion wares, and Sam's considerable stockpile of food.

Sam dubbed the place his "everything shop," since he sells a little bit of everything—used weapons and armor, trinkets, odds and ends, household goods (that he'd get at a low price from traveling merchants), jugs of ale and crates of dried meat (which he had purchased before tasting, and after tasting decided to sell), and sometimes magic items. Sam can handle this great variety of merchandise because many of his customers are adventurers, and adventurers always seem to want to purchase a little bit of everything. Sam likes dealing with adventurers better than any other group of clientele because he likes to hear their stories. He will purchase the goods they find in dungeons, or let them trade their booty for other items he has in stock. Sometimes Sam will buy an ordinary or worthless item from an adventurer, such as a rusty dagger, if there is a good tale behind it.

Occasionally Sam also operates a pawn business, letting an adventurer put up a magic sword or other valued property in exchange for a loan. When the adventurer repays the loan—with interest, of course—the property is returned. Sam usually holds onto pawned items for a year or more, out of sympathy for adventurers who might be down on their luck and unable to come up with the money to reclaim their possessions.

All of the above describes the Sam that the townsfolk and visitors to the city have come to know and appreciate. But, unfortunately for the adventurers in town, Sam's business practices have changed. In fact, Sam has changed, too. He has been replaced by Humphrey, a boggart who (in halfling form) followed a group of adventurers into the city and straight into the Maltese Roc. Humphrey observed Sam's operation and decided that this kind of life would be an interesting change of pace from lurking in his wilderness lair. So he captured Sam, brought in two of his boggart friends, and took over the business. The three boggarts, who alternately assume the role of Sam, began paying adventurers less for their goods, gave them less in trade, and occasionally killed a lone adventurer who wandered into the shop, so they could take all his money and equipment without paying out anything.

To complicate matters, The Maltese Roc's new practices have come to the attention of the local thieves guild—since a few of Sam's regular customers belonged to the guild and had disappeared after visiting the shop. Guild representatives confronted "Sam," fearing he was trying to start up a rival guild, and Sam revealed his true nature. However, rather than fight the guild in a battle the boggarts were certain they could win, Sam proposed that the thieves, himself, and his two boggart friends work together to increase profits. Sam saw this as an opportunity to increase his power and wealth. And he figured if the thieves didn't agree with his plan or became too difficult to deal with, the boggarts would kill them and resume operating the business. The thieves guild, loath to turn down a money-making proposition, quickly agreed to the scam, and a larger operation was created. The guild leaders plan to eventually eliminate the boggarts and take over the entire operation. The boggarts plan to gain the confidence of the guild members, kill the guild leaders, and take over the leadership of the guild.

To maintain the scam, the guild began to station three thieves inside the Maltese Roc. Wearing various disguises, they posed as customers and alternated shifts with others in the guild. When adventurers appeared singly or in pairs and did not accept Sam's new, stingier terms, the dissatisfied customers were followed out of the shop by the thieves, lured into an alley (as the thieves professed interest in the items the adventurers were trying to sell to Sam), knocked out, and robbed, with the wealth being divided between the thieves and the boggarts. Occasionally a fight would ensue. If the customer died, the thieves guild disposed of the body. If the customer escaped and went to the authorities, Sam remained blameless. He could claim he had never seen the customers before, and could not be responsible for them leaving the shop and assaulting someone else.

Adventurers who accepted Sam's terms for their merchandise sometimes had their pockets picked in the store or were followed out of the store and waylaid so the thieves could steal the money Sam had paid them. The thieves are careful not to assault adventurers who seem well-seasoned or who display magic items for sale or trade.

Despite the change in business practices, Sam's shop remained busy. The thieves guild had bullied other merchants into steering some of their customers to The Maltese Roc. A few of the shop owners were charmed by a mage in the employ of the guild to especially direct low-level, yet reasonably wealthy, adventurers to Sam.

Setup: At the minimum, this adventure requires two 2'-by-3", two-story building fold-ups, a 2"-by-2" one-story building, and two street layouts, on which the buildings should be placed. You should also set up a few other buildings to throw players off the track, so they don't immediately realize that all the action of this adventure takes place in the three buildings mentioned above. It is logical for other buildings to be in the area, since the part of the city being portrayed is in the merchants district, where shops and other business establishments are liable to be constructed close together.

The buildings involved in this adventure include The Maltese Roc, a two-story building; the one-story Knife and Dagger Shop, a small weapons emporium operated by the thieves guild (the real Sam is being held in the basement of this shop); and the Blue Dragon Inn, a run-down two-story inn and tavern; which serves as a base for the thieves guild and is located next door to the Knife and Dagger Shop. The placement of these latter two buildings could allow for a rooftop chase, depending on how the action flows. The Maltese Roc can be placed anywhere you desire, depending on how long or complicated you want a chase to be (if one occurs).

How to Get the PCs Involved

"You new in town?" the bartender asks, leaning over the top of the bar and filling your glasses. "You look like adventurers from your garb. Well, if you're thinking about selling anything you picked up on the road or if you're looking to get some equipment, I can point you in the right direction. The Maltese Roc. That's where you want to go. Sam Hart, the proprietor, caters to people like you. He buys things from adventurers and sells the kind of odd things you people like to buy. He's a good, honest sort, to—for a halfling."

"That's not so," interrupts another customer. The customer, wearing a worn suit of banded mail and a carrying a scabbarded broad sword at his side, gets up from his table and approaches you. "Sam's upped the price of his goods, and he doesn't trade much anymore. He's not so friendly as he used to be. And besides, a fellow adventuring friend of mine went there to sell him a dagger, and he never returned. I don't think he ever made it out of the shop. It's like I always said, you can't trust halflings. They're all thieves."

"No. No. Not true!" came a small voice from the far end of the counter. A plump halfling nearly upset his drink as he jumped down from his barstool and joined the conversation. "Sam's a friend of mine. He's a fighter, not a thief. And he's just not himself lately. It's probably some adventurer's fault—sold him a cursed item. That's what happened. Hey, if you guys really are adventurers, why don't you go down to Sam's and do something about it? I betcha Sam would appreciate it if you found out what was wrong. Probably would give you the pick of something from his shop . . . just don't take the cursed item."

"There's nothing wrong with Sam," contradicts a scruffy-looking man cloaked in shadows. "The problem's with all of you." The gentleman gets up from his seat and leaves the tavern.

A setup such as that could spark the PCs' curiosity and make them realize there's an adventure in town just asking to be undertaken. However, there are several other possible ways to get the PCs involved:

1. If the PCs are regulars in this town, they probably have visited The Maltese Roc before. When they visit Sam's place now, they will not be greeted as pleasantly as before, will not get good deals, and should become very suspicious of Sam and the three customers who continue to linger in the shop but don't seem interested in buying anything.

2. If the PCs visit a merchant in town, they will be urged by that merchant to shop at The Maltese Roc. The merchant, who has been charmed, will be very insistent that they should go there.

3. One of the PCs is pickpocketed by a thief who runs into The Maltese Roc. That same thief will escape through the basement and sewer pipes, but the incident should serve to get the PCs into the building. Of course, Sam and the other "customers" in the shop will claim not to have seen anyone run into the shop.

4. The PCs are asked by a party of low-level adventurers if they could try to sell a few items to the proprietor of The Maltese Roc. The adventurers say they just aren't very good at haggling, and they've heard that Sam isn't liable to give them any breaks. They are hopeful the PCs will have better luck.

5. The PCs inquire about buying merchandise or selling something and are directed to The Maltese Roc, where they will be offered less than ideal prices and will be pickpocketed or lured down an alley by the thieves.

Other Merchants: If the PCs visit some other merchants, roll d8 for each visit and consult the following list of outcomes to determine the merchant's status with the thieves guild.

1-2: This merchant has not been approached by the thieves guild and will conduct business as usual.

3: This merchant has been contacted by the thieves guild, but has ignored their bullying tactics. Because of that, his shop has suffered some damage. He will offer the PCs good deals and will treat them fairly. If the PCs ask him about The Maltese Roc, the merchant will tell them to stay away, because he has a feeling that something just isn't quite right there.

4-6: This merchant has given in to the thieves guilds bullying tactics. He will try to conduct some business with the PCs, since he has to make a living, but will recommend that they shop at The Maltese Roc for a better selection.

7-8: One of the guild's mages has charmed this merchant. His business is poor because he refers almost all of his customers to The Maltese Roc. He sells only enough to pay the rent on his shop and cover his necessary purchases of food and clothing. If the PCs ask this merchant about The Maltese Roc, he will brag about the good deals and large selection available there and about Sam's virtues.

The Maltese Roc: The shop takes up the entire first floor of the building in which it is located. Wares are displayed on evenly spaced shelves throughout the center of the shop. Used armor, shields, and boots hang on the walls. Many weapons are displayed on the wall behind the back counter, from which Sam operates his business. A few of these weapons are magical. Sam also has finely crafted weapons on display in a locked glass case at the back counter. The real Sam kept nonmagical weapons in the case, hoping thieves would think common weapons were kept on the wall and magic weapons in the case. The magic weapon inventory consists of two short swords +3, one long sword +1, and a dagger +1/+3 vs. smaller than man-sized creatures. In addition, Sam has a pair of boots of elvenkind and a shield +1 hanging on the wall. The shelves in the center of the store contain clothes, belts, household goods, rope, lanterns, leather barding for horses and other mounts, tack, small statues, other odds and ends collected in dungeons and ruins, and many, many other items—a little bit of everything. Sam carries nearly every item on the equipment lists in the AD&D® Player's Handbook that is small enough to be easily contained within the shop, except for livestock, and there is a 90% chance he will have anything else, except magic items, that the PCs ask for.

Two boggarts are always in this building, one in the shop (disguised as Sam) and one in the basement. A boggart cannot retain a demihuman form for more than 10 to 12 minutes, so if the PCs stay in the shop for close to 10 minutes, "Sam" will excuse himself and go downstairs to get something. The other boggart will replace him, after being briefly filled in on what the PCs have said and done during their time in the shop. The PCs could become suspicious when their conversation with "Sam" resumes; since one Sam won't know the full details of what the PCs said to the other Sam. And the "Sams" will continue to trade off if the PCs stay in the shop for a while.

Boggarts (Humphrey and Bakall): AC -6; MV 18; HD 6; hp 30, 34; #AT 1; Dmg 2d6; SA discharge a bolt of electrical energy every other round for 2d6 (save vs. breath weapon for half damage), confusion; SD invisibility, immune to spells except magic missile, maze, and protection from evil; AL CE; THAC0 13.

Harcourt, 4th level human thief: AC 4 (leather and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 4; hp 17; #AT 1; Dmg 1d8 (long sword); SA double damage on backstab; AL NE; THAC0 19.

Thieving abilities: PP 50, OL 50, RT 35, MS 35, HS 35, DN 15, CW 80, RL 20.

Harcourt carries a long sword, a sap, and 23 gp. He is a hot-tempered bully who hopes to get a lot of personal wealth out of this operation. If he picks a customer's pocket, he will only report 80% of his take to the guild and the boggarts.

Alowishus, 5th level human thief: AC 5 (leather +1 and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 5; hp 25; #AT 1; Dmg 1d8 + 1 (long sword plus Str bonus); SA triple damage on backstab; AL NE; THAC0 18.

Thieving abilities: PP 50, OL 40, RT 40, MS 40, HS 25, DN 20, CW 90, RL 0.

Alowishus carries a long sword, wine skin, 10 gp and 15 sp. He is sly and quiet. He will not talk to the customers or boggarts in the shop. He distrusts the boggarts and is carefully watching them, reporting their actions to the guild lieutenant.

Mergatroit, male half-elf 3rd level fighter/4th level thief: AC 4 (banded mail, shield, and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 4; hp 20; #AT 1; Dmg 1d8 + 2 (long sword plus Str bonus); AL CE; SA double damage on backstab; THAC0 17 (includes Str bonus).

Thieving abilities: not applicable, because he will wear his armor throughout the course of the adventure.

Mergatroit carries a long sword, a sap, 5 gp, 10 sp, and a 120 gp pearl. He is reluctant about being involved in this operation. He is bored with posing as a customer. PCs who stay 20 minutes or longer in The Maltese Roc will notice that Mergatroit figgets and looks uneasy.

If a fight breaks out in the shop, and the PCs appear to be at least holding their own, one of the thieves or one of the boggarts will try to escape to warn the thieves at the Knife and Dagger Shop and at the Blue Dragon Inn that the operation has been discovered and to prepare for a fight.

If either or both of the boggarts are reduced to less than 10 hit points, they will try to escape by turning into their wisp form, going invisible, and darting out through a wall. They will not fight to the death, preferring to run away and set up a similar scam in another town.

The thieves and the boggarts know that the real Sam is being held prisoner in the basement of the Knife and Dagger Shop, but it will be difficult for the PCs to get this information out of them. The thieves will reveal as little information as possible about the operation and the thieves guild. In addition, they will avoid mentioning the third boggart.

PCs searching The Maltese Roc will find the items stored in the basement plus 820 gp, 1,900 sp, three 100 gp base topazes, and a coral necklace worth 900 gp, all kept in a large barrel marked "good rum."

The Knife and Dagger Shop: This shop is managed by three proprietors: a thief, a mage/thief, and a 0-level human who sharpens blades for the thieves guild. The proprietors sell daggers and knives (and run a fencing operation for the guild). Sam is in the basement with the third boggart. The shop contains hundreds of knives and daggers—all nonmagical, stored in locked cases—ranging in price from 1 gp to 500 gp, depending on the quality of the blade and the decoration (gems, etc.), if any, on the hilt. No magical daggers are for sale.

The proprietors will not be immediately wary of the PCs unless a thief or a boggart escaped from The Maltese Roc to warn them. If the proprietors were forewarned, the 0-level human will have gone downstairs to inform the third boggart, and then take the real Sam through the sewer pipe that leads to the basement of the inn next door.

If the proprietors were not forewarned, but become suspicious of the PCs because they ask too many questions or make threats, the 0-level human will attempt to go downstairs and move Sam or have the boggart move Sam to the inn. If he is prevented from going downstairs, he will call out a warning. In this case the boggart will take the real Sam into the sewer pipe and to the inn next door if possible. In either case, the boggart will come back to the basement, ready to look like Sam if the PCs come downstairs. The thief and the mage/thief will attempt to avoid a fight with the PCs, either by professing ignorance about a thieves guild or by ordering them to leave the establishment. If the PCs leave, the thief and the mage/thief will go downstairs and into the Blue Dragon Inn to prepare for a fight. The boggart will head back for The Maltese Roc.

If a fight ensues in The Knife and Dagger Shop and the PCs defeat the thief and the mage/thief upstairs, they will find "Sam" in the basement. This Sam is the third boggart. The real Sam is next door. Sam will appear very grateful and will want to get back to his business right away (to start the scam all over again). Sam will try to avoid staying with the PCs for more than 10 minutes, because he cannot keep his halfling form longer than that. If discovered, this boggart will try to escape rather than fight, because he does not want to take on the PCs alone.

PCs searching the basement will find the sewer grating and marks in the dirt leading up to it, indicating that something or someone has been recently dragged up to the entrance to the pipe. The sewer pipe leads to the inn, where the 0-level human or the boggart will have taken Sam (if successful).

Morris, 6th level human thief: AC 4 (ring of protection +2 and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 6; hp 28; #AT 1; Dmg 1d8 (long sword) or 1d4 (dagger); AL NE; SA triple damage on backstab; THAC0 18.

Theiving abilities: PP 70, OL 50, RT 50, MS 35, HS 30, DN 20, CW 95, RL 30.

Morris carries a long sword, four silvered daggers, 2 pp, 8 gp, and 5 sp. On the surface, he appears to be a very pleasant businessman, always eager to help a customer. He is clean-shaven, good-looking, and has a charming smile. However, Morris is deceptive and underhanded. If a customer appears to have no idea about the value of knives and daggers, Morris will sell him a weapon for 50% to 100% more than the actual price and pocket the difference. Morris is out for himself, having little loyalty to the guild. If his life becomes endangered, he will betray the guild in exchange for his safety.

Lewis, male half-elf 5th level mage/6th level thief: AC 3 (bracers of defense AC 6 and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 6; hp 20; #AT 1; Dmg 1d4 (dagger); SA spells, triple damage on backstab; AL CE; THAC0 18.

Theiving abilities: PP 70, OL 60, RT 45, MS 25, HS 25, DN 20, CW 95, RL 30.

Spells memorized:

1st level	charm person, magic missile, shocking grasp
2nd level	invisibility, stinking cloud
3rd level	slow

Lewis carries five daggers (one of them +1), 10 sp, 5 gp, and wears a silver ring worth 230 gp. Despite his chaotic nature, he is very loyal to the guild—perhaps its most loyal member. The guild leader has saved his life on three occasions, and Lewis is repaying the debt by operating the shop. However, Lewis has no such loyalty to individual members of the guild. Lewis spies on other members to make sure they do not betray the guild leader. He hopes to rise to a position of power within the guild.

Mac, 0-level human: AC 9 (Dex bonus); MV 12; hp 5; #AT 1; Dmg 1d4 (dagger); AL NE; THAC0 20.

Mac is a very young human who wants to be accepted as a member of the guild and taught theiving skills. He works very hard to please Morris and Lewis.

Boggart (Heppbyrn): AC -6; MV 18; HD 6; hp 30; #AT 1; Dmg 2d6; SA discharge a bolt of electrical energy every other round for 2d6 (save vs. breath weapon for half damage), confusion; SD invisibility, immune to spells except magic missile, maze, and protection from evil; AL CE; THAC0 13.

The Blue Dragon Inn: If the 0-level human or the boggart was successful in getting Sam to the inn and warning the thieves there about the PCs, the thieves will prepare for a fight. They will not want the PCs to escape and reveal the scam to the authorities. The thieves will take Sam upstairs, put him in a guest room, securely tie him, and knock him out with a sap. They don't want to take any chances. The thieves will put a "Closed" sign in the window of the inn, pull all the shades, and sit in the establishment waiting for the PCs to come upstairs from the sewer pipe.

There are nine opponents in The Blue Dragon, two of whom will be sprinkled with dust of disappearance (if they had any warning). These two, both thieves, will be hanging on the railing of the steps leading up from the basement, waiting to jump on the backs of PCs entering the main inn room. In addition, the cleric will be preparing a silence spell to cast on a PC spellcaster's robes. The opponents are crafty. They want to fight the PCs in this large room, where all of them can join the fight, rather than in the basement near the sewer pipe, where only four or five could fight. Thieving abilities are not given for the thieves (with one exception; see Opponent #9), since those skills would not come into play in a combat situation, and that is the only circumstance under which these opponents will be encountered.

Opponents #1 and #2, 3rd level human thieves (coated with dust of disappearance): AC 6 (leather and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 3; hp 12, 14; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 (short sword); AL

CE; SA double damage on backstab; THAC0 19.

These thieves are carrying 10 gp apiece. In addition, each has two more applications of dust of disappearance that he can use.

Opponent #3, 5th level human thief: AC 4 (leather and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 5; hp 21; #AT 1; Dmg 1d8 + 1 (long sword +1); AL CE; SA double damage on backstab; THAC0 18.

This thief has 15 gp, 10 sp, wears a bronze and silver wristband worth 200 gp, and carries a potion of flying.

Opponent #4, elven 2nd level fighter/2nd level mage/3rd level thief: AC 3 (leather, ring of protection +1, and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 2; hp 9; #AT 1; Dmg 1d4 (dagger); SA spells, double damage on backstab; AL NE; THAC0 19.

Spells memorized:

1st level charm person, taunt

The elf carries 2 gp and a 110 gp gold ingot.

Opponent #5, 6th level halfling thief: AC 5 (leather and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 6; hp 24; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 + 1 (short sword plus Str bonus); AL NE; SA double damage on backstab; THAC0 18.

The halfling carries 10 pp, 18 gp, and a potion of healing.

Opponent #6, 4th level dwarven thief: AC 5 (leather and Dex bonus); MV 9; HD 4; hp 21; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 + 2 (short sword plus Str bonus); AL CE; SA double damage on backstab; THAC0 18.

The dwarf carries 21 gp and a hunk of coral worth 20 gp.

Opponent #7, 6th level human thief (Mugly, the guild lieutenant): AC 4 (leather, ring of protection +1, and Dex bonus); MV 9; HD 6; hp 33; #AT 1; Dmg 1d8 + 2 (long sword +1 plus Str bonus); AL CE; SA triple damage on backstab; THAC0 18.

Mugly carries 20 gp and a chunk of quartz worth 75 gp. In addition, he has a potion of healing and a potion of sweet water.

Mugly is very crafty, careful in a fight, and very protective of his own neck. He enjoys his position of second in command in the guild, and has no desire to become the guild leader. He will protect the leader (see Opponent #9), and if the fight is going too quickly against the guild he will try to escape with the guild leader in tow.

Opponent #8, 4th level human cleric: AC 5

(chain mail and shield); MV 9; HD 4; hp 23; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 + 1 (footman's mace); AL NE; THAC0 18.

Spells carried:

1st level cause fear, command, cure light wounds, curse, darkness
2nd level find traps, hold person, silence 15' radius

The cleric carries 10 sp and two pearls each worth 50 gp.

After casting silence on the robes of a PC spellcaster, the cleric will cast hold person on two or three PCs, depending on their locations in the inn. He will cast cause fear on a remaining fighter or spellcaster, followed by command ("Sleep!") and curse. If the cleric feels too threatened, he will try to escape with the lieutenant and the guild leader.

Opponent #9, 12th level halfling thief (Drolo, the guild leader): AC 2 (bracers of defense AC 6 and Dex bonus); MV 12; HD 10+4; hp 44; #AT 1; Dmg 1d6 + 2 (short sword of quickness +2); AL CE; SA quadruple damage on backstab; THAC0 15. He has a 95% chance of hiding in shadows, and will use this ability when fighting the PCs.

Drolo carries 5 pp and 5 gp, and wears a platinum and ruby ring worth 8,200 gp. In addition, he has a potion of extra healing, a potion of invisibility (which he will use to escape if necessary), and a half-used jar of Nolzur's marvelous pigments.

Drolo hates to have his plans ruined, and will do everything he can to stop the PCs from revealing his scam and threatening the existence of his guild. Drolo will not initially enter the fight against the PCs, opting instead to spend the first two rounds watching them to learn which characters pose the most threat. He will attempt to backstab the character who appears to be the toughest. However, Drolo is not stupid. If the fight is going too quickly against the guild, he will leave the inn in the company of his lieutenant, and possibly the guild's cleric. He knows it is better to run away and build a guild in another city than to be killed or risk exposure of his guild and his plans in this city.

Aftermath: If the PCs search the inn following the fight (provided they win), they will find a total of 1,800 gp and 13,200 sp. The best treasure consists of the magic items carried by the guild members. The PCs will have to search the inn to find the unconscious Sam. If Sam is rescued, he will be extremely grateful and will offer the PCs a one-time 35% discount on anything in his shop. If the PCs haven't figured everything out, he will tell the PCs all about the bog-garts and the thieves guild's plan and will explain that they didn't kill him because they wanted to find out more information about operating a shop and about his business contacts. In addition, the bog-garts wanted him kept alive so they could study him and better perfect his mannerisms.

ADVENTURES FOR THE CITIES

Here are some basic plots for city adventures which can be used in almost any fantasy role-playing game system.

Looks Can Be Deceiving: The most powerful government official in town is acting strangely. He's implementing odd and unreasonable taxes and planning to start programs which will benefit himself, but will do nothing to better the city or its people. Actually, the official is not himself. He has been replaced by a shapechanging monster that is having fun trying its hand at politics. The player characters will have to catch the shapechanger and rescue the real politician.

Pickpocket Peddlers: A gang of thieves are masquerading as street peddlers. The owner of a trinket shop provides the thieves with goods to sell on the street, and the thieves pick the pockets of the people who look over their wares. The trinket shop owner gets a percentage of the stolen money. The player characters hear rumors about a gang of pickpockets operating in the merchants quarter and are asked to find the thieves and put a stop to their activities.

Feathering His Nest: A merchant has purchased a cockatrice from a band of adventurers and is keeping the thing caged up in his basement. The merchant is using the monster to get rich: he very carefully gathers the beasts' feathers and uses them to turn animals into "amazingly lifelike statues" which he sells to the public. Unfortunately for the fraud, a few of the neighbors have begun to miss their pets. A wealthy pet owner hires the PCs to find her favorite dog, and the PCs must ultimately deal with the merchant and his monster.

A Good Right Arm: A man new to town (a giant polymorphed to human form) has been visiting the local taverns and winning money from the locals in arm-wrestling contests. The citywide arm-wrestling championship is coming up next week, and a few of the locals look to the PCs to find a champion who can best the newcomer.

There Is No Honor: Horton, a thief who has served his time for a series of burglaries he committed 10 years ago, is finally free on parole and intends to lead an honest life from now on. But the thieves guild he used to belong to doesn't like his change in careers. Several members of the guild have begun a series of burglaries—using the same method of operation Horton was known for. Horton is arrested for the crimes, and it is up to the PCs to prove his innocence and bring the real culprits to justice.

Protection Racket: A group of hoodlums have enlisted the aid of a local cleric of non-good alignment to help them with a protection racket. The cleric controls a small group of undead, which he and the hoodlums take to merchants' homes after dark. The hoodlums demand that the merchants pay protection money, or their businesses will be ruined by the undead. Most of the merchants agree to the mob's terms. However, one merchant won't put up with the threats and contacts a group of low-level adventurers to handle the threat.

Defacing The Face: A statue has been made to honor the town's leading official, and it has been placed in the center of the park. The day after the dedication ceremony, the statue's head is missing. It is found a day later, high up in the branches of a large tree in the park. The statue is repaired, only to have it covered the next day with bright red paint, and the next day adorned with leaves and pinecones. The town official hires the player characters to catch the person responsible for defacing the statue. The problem is, no one person or group of persons is responsible. A thieves guild, a group of teenagers, three elderly men who don't like the official, a whimsical leprechaun, and a group of drunks from the tavern across from the park are all responsible for the assorted acts, and the player characters will have their hands full catching all the culprits.

Election Hysteria: The mayor is a very popular man who has been very good for the city. It is certain he will win the next election. However, the mayor's opponent has a few mages working for him, who are charming people to vote for their candidate. The mayor loses by an incredible margin and asks the player characters to look into the voting process.

Monsters in the Street: A bum who "acquired" a pouch filled with a few coins and a beautiful gem from a dead man in an alley has actually acquired a jewel of attacks (or a similar magic item which draws monsters and always returns to its owner). The bum sold the gem to a jewelry shop, which during the night was attacked by a monster. The next morning the gem appeared back in the bum's pouch. The bum believes the pouch is magical and will produce a gem every day. He continues to sell a gem each day to a jeweler, pawnbroker, or some hapless gent he meets on the street. The city begins to be plagued by monsters, and the player characters are called in to find a way to keep the monsters out of town.

The Water Doesn't Work: A few unscrupulous adventurers with potions of animal control have instructed several giant beavers to dam up the river that flows through town. The adventurers are holding the water for ransom, threatening to keep the city dry if it doesn't come up with 5,000 gp. The player characters are asked to find a way to turn the water back on.

There Goes the Neighborhood: A wealthy landowner anticipates the city's business district growing and wants to acquire land next to the business district so he can cash in on the expansion. To accomplish this, he has hired a few down-on-their-luck fighters to bully the locals into selling their property. He has set fire to a few homes—the owners of which would not sell—and has had the fighters threaten that there will be more fires. A few businessmen have noticed that several locals are moving from the area and that the land is being bought up. They ask the player characters to investigate.

Rats, Rats, Rats: A pawn shop owner unwittingly acquired pipes of the sewers and has been playing them to pass the time when no customers are around. This has brought hundreds upon hundreds of rats into the city, and the player characters are hired to exterminate them.

Cities of Mystery

Dungeon delving can be delightful. Wandering in the wilderness is a wonderful way to pass the time. But for the ultimate in opportunity, intrigue, and unexpected danger, try visiting the nearest village, town, or city.

A city is much more than a rest stop, a watering hole, or a place to buy equipment. Any community, from the smallest hamlet to the most crowded medieval metropolis, offers adventuring possibilities that can't be found in any other environment. Cities of Mystery describes for the Dungeon Master how to create realistic, exciting, and vibrant communities—and gives him the tools to make his creations come alive.

Inside this folder are 12 different street layout patterns that can be combined in a multitude of ways, plus 33 buildings of various shapes and sizes that can be cut out and assembled. The components, scaled for use with 25mm miniature figures, allow you to create three-dimensional city scenes for characters to explore. Also included is a 64-page book that takes you step by step through the process of defining and designing the villages, towns, and cities of your campaign world. The book contains five adventure scenarios that make use of the street layouts and fold-up buildings—ideas designed to get you started on the way to making your cities come alive.

INTRODUCTION: THE BLOODSTONE LANDS

Using This Book

This sourcebook is divided into nine sections. These offer the Dungeon Master a solid overview of the region, plus details of some specific places and personalities.

Section 1: Overview of the Bloodstone Lands introduces a Dungeon Master to the region, particularly to Vaasa and Damara. This section covers the history of the region, with a close-up on the last two years—the Year of the Prince and the Year of the Shadows (FR1357 and 1358). Present day is 1359, the Year of the Serpent. Recent events, created by playing the H-series through to a logical conclusion, have reduced Vaasa to its former status as an unclaimed wilderness (rich adventuring territory!). The various provinces of Damara weave a web of political intrigue that should provide plenty for PCs to disentangle.

Section 2: What the Neighbors Think introduces Narfell and Impiltur, neighboring kingdoms with a vested interest in Vaasa and Damara. Narfell and Impiltur could themselves support a fine campaign. For this book, however, and in the context of the Bloodstone Lands, they are treated as icing on the cake that is Vaasa and Damara.

Section 3: Societies of the Bloodstone Lands presents the culture and flavor of the land. This section details religion, currency, races, and classes, all of which transform a campaign from a dice-rolling exercise into a role-playing event worthy of daydreams.

Section 4: Cities, Towns, and Villages, and Section 5: The Geography of the Region look at the physical geography and locales that PCs will encounter. Included are descriptions of various communities, their usual attitude toward strangers, and a general feel of the more distinctive locations.

Section 6: Strongholds, Ruins, and Dungeons goes a step further, providing specific adventuring sites and “home base” locations for the players. In the Bloodstone Lands, knowing where to find trouble, and where to go to escape it, can mean the difference between a successful adventure and disaster.

The next two sections, Section 7: Movers and Shakers and Section 8: Traveling Bands and Organizations, give a Dungeon Master many of the NPCs that his players will encounter in the region (or PCs they may choose to run). These are the characters who might help the PCs out of a jam—put them into one!

Finally, Section 9: The Bloodstone Lands Campaign gives some suggestions for potential adventures. It must be noted that one of these involves having your players run through the H-series of modules, rewriting the last two years of history. This could pose a problem to Dungeon Masters using this sourcebook, as the outcome of the game may alter the situations described herein.

Therefore, this section also offers tips to less-experienced Dungeon Masters. The Dungeon Master may have to deal with his players deciding on different life-courses for the major PCs, particularly for Gareth Dragonsbane who is regarded here as the central power figure of the entire region. Crafty Dungeon Masters will slip around this by focusing on other NPCs. For example, Baron Tranth or Lady Christine can fill in any gaps in the political structures left by an uncooperative Gareth.

Enough said. Let us now explore this dangerous and exciting region called the Bloodstone Lands. All the ingredients are here for a long and enjoyable campaign, or for a welcome diversion from the mainstream events of a campaign set in some other region of the vast Forgotten Realms. Go to it!

Overview of The Bloodstone Lands

The phrase “Bloodstone Lands” refers to the region between the Great Glacier and Impiltur, particularly the two states of Vaasa and Damara. The whole area encompasses roughly 150,000 square miles in a roughly triangular shape, using the southern line of the Great Glacier as its northernmost boundary.

To the west, beyond the Earthspur Mountains, is the wicked land of Thar, the Moonsea, and the independent city-state of Mulmaster. To the south is Impiltur and beyond that, the Sea of Fallen Stars. To the east looms Narfell and the Great Dale.

One might assume that the nickname of this rugged region comes from the quantity of blood spilled in the area, especially in and around the Galena Mountains. There have been numerous battles with goblin and giantkind. The sturdy inhabitants have also faced the relentless forces of the climate, and even fought among themselves over the years. In truth, this would make “bloodstone” an apt label.

However, the phrase refers to the uncountable mineral wealth found in the area, a deep-green chalcedony flecked with red jasper. Bloodstones were once mined throughout the Galenas and the Earthspurs, luring men here in droves. Bloodstones established Damara as a major power in the Forgotten Realms.

Geography and Ecology

The Bloodstone Lands are a cold region. Freezing winds roll down from the Great Glacier and swirl through the mountain peaks, making the long winters of Vaasa and Damara longer still. Yet though their temperature ranges are similar, the geography of these two states is vastly different.

Vaasa

The northernmost of the two states, Vaasa is also the smaller. The kingdom lies in a triangular region bounded by the Earthspur Mountains, the Great Glacier, and the forbidding Galena Mountains. For centuries untold, Vaasa remained an unclaimed wasteland of frozen moors and broken clumps of tundra, a captured pocket of deep winter.

Summer does come here, if only for a few short weeks. Even then, Vaasa feels the edge of its climate’s wickedness. When the moorwaters melt and the top layers of tundra soften, the entire region becomes one vast bog of sludge and mud where "the tallest horse would wet its belly," as the saying goes in Damara.

Even more insidious, many bottomless bogs open up, particularly in the central region, above the Beaumaris River. These deadly moors would do much more than "wet a horse's belly!"

Where small farms have been scratched in Vaasa's rocky soil, harvests show a somewhat fertile land. However, nowhere in all the kingdom has a large enough stretch of arable land been found capable of supporting a large-scale community.

Few people live in Vaasa. Even they probably wonder why.

Damara

More hospitable is the land of Damara. The hardy people of Damara get along fairly well overall, but even so, deadly winter takes its toll among the folk who live here. Summer brings a short but fruitful farming season. Game is plentiful and the rivers tame enough to be useful. Generally speaking, the lands south and east of the Galenas provide a tolerable life, if not a comfortable one.

Damara's northern border runs along the Great Glacier, while the Earthspurs demark most of Damara's western and southern border. Impiltur is an important neighbor around the southern tip of this mighty mountain range.

Natural boundaries separate Damara from Narfell to the east. Huge Rawlinswood, the Giantspire Mountains, and Icelace Lake have kept the two nations further apart than their literal proximity would seem to indicate.

History of The Bloodstone Lands

For centuries, the story of the Bloodstone Lands was simply the story of Damara. The cold wastes of Vaasa attracted little attention from scholars (or anyone else!) outside the mountainous barricades of the region. The people of Vaasa gathered in scattered communities of hunters, trappers, and farmers, all pitifully poor and eking out a squalid, uninteresting existence.

Damara, though, had a different tale to tell. This kingdom traces its noble lines back almost three centuries, to the time when Heliogabalus was founded by Feldrin Bloodfeathers, the first king of Damara. Thereafter, his long, unbroken line of kindly heirs ruled Damara well, only ending with King Viridin's death. Until the most recent generation, the kingdom was a force on par with Impiltur.

Damara maintained strong trade relations with the city-states along the Moonsea and along all the reaches of the Sea of Fallen Stars. The narrow gap between Rawlinswood and the southern expanse of the Earthspurs is still known as Merchants Run, though few merchants use it today.

At the height of Damara's glory, long caravans of merchants transported chalcedony down this pass to the fortress of Ilmwatch along the Easting Reach. They were welcomed and even protected by the legions of Impiltur. Fortified by brigades of Impilturian soldiers, the Damaran merchants then crossed through the Traders Bay region and into the great port of Sarshel. Ships from Thesk and all the nations floating vessels on the the Sea of Fallen Stars met the merchants with open arms and open purses.

A second trade route, shorter but more difficult, carried the precious stone through Bloodstone Pass, the only sensible trail through the mighty Galenas. From there, the stone went to points north and west. Because it crossed through the wilds of Vaasa and through the Earthspur Mountains along Garumn's Climb, this route was not preferred. But Garumn's Climb has proven invaluable to Sembia and the city-states on the Moonsea, especially in times of heavy pirate activity, or on such occasions as when the Moonsea was cut off from the main waterway by a particularly nasty dragon turtle, as happened a few decades ago.

The bloodstone was traded in bars, each measured at 25 gold pieces in value. The crest of a Damaran noble house marked every bar, and on the opposite side was the year in Damaran reckoning. Nearly 1,000,000 gold pieces worth of the stone was taken annually from the mines in the Galenas alone. Particularly rich was the small region surrounding Bloodstone Pass, aptly named the Barony of Bloodstone. This annual yield of raw wealth more than kept the interest of merchants and speculators, and therefore the craftsmen, farmers, and ordinary folk of Damara lived quite well.

Furthermore, Damara had little to fear from its neighbors. Protected by imposing natural boundaries, with the noble houses united under the rule of a single well-accepted king, there was little cause for unrest. The king maintained an army only to protect the caravans, and to defend the outlying rural communities from bands of raiding goblins or other wretched creatures. Certainly, the scattered tribes of Vaasa could never unite or pose more than a marginal threat. Peace was the norm, and the expectation of future prosperity, obvious.

Or so the Damarans thought. The merchants could never have guessed that the bloodstone bars would in time be called "cursed money," shunned by all outside the region for fear that it would bring to the user the same disastrous fate that befell Damara!

The Rise of the Witch-King

Barely twelve years ago, in FR1137, a calamitous event in the wastes of Vaasa rocked the stability of the entire region. In a single night, the evil fortress Castle Perilous arose on a lonely crag only 60 miles north of the Galenas and the Damaran border.

Out from this bastion of wickedness stepped Zhengyi the Witch-King, a lich of unspeakable powers. The Witch-King claimed the sovereign powers of the kingdom of Vaasa. Winning the cold hearts of the countless goblins, orcs, and giants living in the mountains, the Witch-King pulled them all into his fold. Zhengyi enlisted the aid of powerful denizens of the lower planes and surrounded himself with the foul priests of Orcus, who could raise and command legions of undead. With this vast army swiftly assembled, and further aided by the infamous Grandfather of Assassins and his foul guild, the Witch-King prepared for war.

Damara's eyes were blind to the sudden rise of Zhengyi. At the time of the Witch-King's rise, the kingdom was suffering a series of catastrophies—events which, in hindsight, seem suspiciously connected with the Witch-King.

First, a nameless evil awakened in the Mines of Bloodstone, a force that drove the men and dwarves from the place in terror. These mines had been the primary source of wealth for the northern barony. Indeed, up to that time, the wealth rolling out of them—more than 400,000 gold pieces annually—represented nearly half of all the bloodstone flowing out of Damara. Hundreds of brave men tried to reclaim the mines in the next few months, but none returned.

Wolf Winter fell that same year. Early frosts destroyed the harvest and the winter that ensued was therefore doubly terrible. Starvation was common among man and beast alike. Packs of dire wolves swept into northern Damara from the Galenas, leaving little but bloodied snow in their wake. Even worse, many of the wolves were infected with lycanthropy.

The Witch-King's armies roared down to the Galenas the very next year, cutting off Bloodstone Pass and effectively shutting down all the mines on the Vaasan side of the mountains. The horrid army pushed on, driving hard into Damara and committing one massacre after another.

But the people of Damara were a tough people. After they recovered from the initial shock of Zhengyi's lightning attacks, they fought back bravely. For ten brutal years, Vaasa and Damara fought. Neighboring nations, notably Impiltur and Narfell, looked on with more than passing interest, fearing the shape of their own future if Zhengyi proved victorious. Yet though they sided with Damara in principle and for practical reasons, the nearby kingdoms of the region had problems of their own. In turn, they had too many opportunistic neighbors just waiting to gain their own advantage. Neither Impiltur nor Narfell offered Damara any substantial assistance. Their paralysis almost cost them dearly.

In the summer of FR1147, Zhengyi's forces faced off against King Virdin at the Ford of Goliad. Neither side could gain any advantage through the month of June and many thought that the war would hold in stalemate until the next winter, when the river would freeze.

Then came the day that Damarans will ever despise. No one can say for certain what occurred that foul day, but it seems obvious that treachery led the way for Zhengyi. Most scholars agree that the scoundrel was Felix, King Virdin's chief lieutenant. Long afterward Felix was discovered to be a member of the Assassins Guild of the Galenas, Zhengyi's cohorts. Nothing was suspected at the time.

Felix—if it was him—tricked young King Virdin into believing that a magical wand he had acquired would allow the Damaran army secret passage across the river. Actually the “wand” was a cheap stick stacked with twelve Nystul's magic aura spells. Virdin desperately grasped at the chance to end the long and costly conflict. Already aware of the deception, Zhengyi held his forces in check for several tense minutes, coaxing in the Damarans. Then the lich-king struck hard, trapping the bulk of the Damaran army in the river and shattering Virdin's forces. On a hillock a short distance away, the young king watched his kingdom fall. His grief ended when a dagger (wielded by Felix?) found its way into his back.

Zhengyi had spent ten years preparing for this day, and he didn't hesitate. Calling on the forces of the Grandfather of Assassins, the Witch-King instituted the second phase of the destruction of Damara. It took only one bloody night for the most loyal and powerful nobles of Damara to be slain.

The “peace” that ensued was not favorable to the conquered. The Witch-King granted a veneer of independence to the feeble remnants of the Damaran houses, dividing the southern reaches of the old kingdom into six poor baronies—poorer still after paying tribute to their conqueror, the Witch-King.

Zhengyi gave control of the Galenas to the Grandfather of Assassins, then tightened his own evil clutch on the north. A stream of refugees trekked south as best they could.

With Damara spiraling into economic ruin and Zhengyi's power growing every day, the neighboring states could only sit tight and hope that the Witch-King would be content with his new domain.

That was only two years ago. How swiftly things can change!

RECENT EVENTS IN THE REGION

Two Tumultuous Years

“Pray tell, fellow bard, where will thy horse fly?” asked the first. “To Damara to busy my pen. 'Tis said that more has happened in the last two years than in the last two centuries!” The second bard twirled his lute in excitement at the mere thought of entering the Bloodstone Lands.

“Then surely you have missed your time, good fellow,” said the first, “for the Witch-King is dead and his armies scattered.”

“Not so, not so,” argued the second. “The issue is far from settled. And although the new heroes have lived more adventures in two years than most will see in a lifetime, they have many more before them.” He spurred his horse and galloped away. The call, “Many more!” echoed back as he went.

This may be a typical scene among the bards of the Forgotten Realms these days, for indeed the bloodstone region has undergone tremendous changes since the victory of the Witch-King. Still more lie ahead before the situation stabilizes.

After the Witch-King secured his hold on northern Damara, he disappeared for a time, presumably to reevaluate the remaining strength of his forces and to plan out his next moves. Deliberately, he left a nation in disarray.

Zhengyi's decision to divide southern Damara into separate, independent baronies was shrewd indeed. In spite of the hardships descending on the conquered land, the puppet rulers of these baronies squabbled, conspiring against each other. Each one would gladly fight another over whatever might add to his own power and meager wealth.

Combined with the terrible tribute to the Witch-King, this disarray crushed the pride of the people of Damara. Under such ineffective rule, the entire southern region was quickly thrown into chaos, both political and economic.

As he had planned, Zhengyi was left in peace to concentrate on his next moves.

In the security of his arrogance, Zhengyi took no notice of the actions of his cohorts, the bandit army of the Galena Mountains. Led by the Grandfather of Assassins, a High Priest of Orcus, and an Arch-mage who had once been Zhengyi's own personal advisor, a tribute of gold and even slaves was demanded from the poor people of the Barony of Bloodstone.

This proved to be the proverbial last straw. The bandit army's depredations bred an angry resolve in Baron Tranth and in all the people of Bloodstone. Perhaps because arrogance and evil so often go hand-in-hand, Zhengyi did not imagine mighty heroes might arise, but proud people can only be pushed so far. When a group of heroes emerged to lead them, the people of Bloodstone rose up and fought for their homes.

The heroic leaders were Gareth Dragonsbane and his company of six: Emelyn the Gray Friar Dugald, Celedon Kearney, Riordan Parnell, Olwen Forest-friend, and Kane, monk of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose. Men, women, and even children of Bloodstone Village followed them, and boldly faced the bandits, even standing proud against the horrible undead brigades of the evil priest, Banak. The sheer courage of the villagers rallied support, and groups of dwarves, halflings, and centaurs rolled up from the woodland clusters just south of Bloodstone Village. The Grandfather of Assassins was slain by the monk, Kane, and the bandit army was soundly defeated.

The most important result of the battle was that the races of the region had come together and mighty new leaders had been found. Quiet whispers spoke of hope when rumors circulated that Gareth Dragonsbane had fallen in love with the Lady Christine, Baron Tranth's daughter.

But just when Gareth and his friends seemed to have the region turned back toward the right course, bad luck and an unspeakable evil once again came crashing down.

First, torrential rains swept through Bloodstone for a full week in September, and after the storm came a sudden freeze. Unharvested wheat and hay rotted and died in the fields and the town feared another Wolf's Winter of hardship and starvation.

Second, a scream in the night came from the Abbey of St. Sollars, rousing the village. What looked like a simple worg attack was soon found to be something much more insidious when the symbol of Orcus, a horned goat's head, was discovered painted in blood on one of the Abbey's walls.

Everything pointed to the long-closed bloodstone mines as the source of the horror, prompting talks of a heroic adventure. Furthermore, all the people of the barony could see the possibilities of wealth if the mines could somehow be reopened. Although the monk Kane had been called back to the Monastery of the Yellow Rose, Gareth and his five remaining friends went boldly into the mines. With the help of a community of svirfneblin gnomes, they routed the minions of Orcus, a tribe of duergar dwarves.

The mines were promptly reopened and King Ruggedo, head of the svirfneblin, swore eternal friendship to the barony. Baron Tranth, confident of Bloodstone's bright future, gave to Gareth the hand of his daughter in marriage. As a dowry, he turned over rulership of the barony itself.

The people of Bloodstone dug in and fought through the savage winter. Under the leadership of the new baron, they were confident that the spring would bring new growth and hopeful about the wealth to be dug anew from the mines. The very next spring, the dwarves of Clan Orothiar and the svirfneblin brought out a million gold pieces worth of the fabled bloodstones.

With new wealth came new trouble. The promise of riches attracted thousands of new citizens to the barony. Perceptively, Gareth understood what was to come next. He promptly put the newcomers to work building new towns and new fortifications. Then the baron commissioned his friends as generals and bid them to build a great army. He recognized that Bloodstone was surrounded by the jealous lords of the other baronies and, of course, there was still the Witch-King.

William the Lazy, eighth Duke of Arcata, was first to strike. In league with the Grandfather of Assassins, his move began the Bloodstone Wars.

But William and the other leaders had no concept of the resolve of the barony, nor of the strength of its new-found leaders. Arcata fell, then Carmathan, and finally, the minor baronies of Ostel, Morov, and Polten. In a few short weeks, the southern provinces of the old Kingdom of Damara were united once again.

With so much in flux, the Witch-King finally turned his eyes back to Damara. Assessing the problem, Zhengyi sent his vast army south. He pulled the bandit army back into his fold, and attacked across the Galenas. But the swelling army of Bloodstone fought fiercely and drove back the Witch-King's soldiers. The forces reached a stalemate at the Ford of Goliad—ironically, the very site of the Witch-King's first victory over Damara. With each army in firm control of one bank of the river, there seemed no end in sight.

The stalemate was shattered by Gareth, Emelyn the Gray, Dugald, Celdon Kierney, Riordan Parnell, and Olwen Forest-friend. The six brave friends struck out at the heart of the Witch-King's power: at Orcus himself, ruler of the lower planes. The friends traveled to the Abyss and stole the demon-lord's wand, taking the vile instrument to the Seven Heavens where it was ultimately destroyed.

The adventure did not end there. Bahamut, the Platinum Dragon, gave Gareth the Tree-Gem, and sent the victorious heroes back to Bloodstone. Once planted, the gem grew into a beautiful white tree, a symbol of hope with the power to forever banish Orcus and the other monsters of the Abyss from the Bloodstone Lands.

With the defeat of the demon-lord, the Witch-King lost the source of his dark power. Castle Perilous crumbled into ruins, the priests of the goat's head religion lost their strength, and the undead of the Vaasan army fell to dust. Gareth drove the confused remnants of the wretched forces of Vaasa back through Bloodstone Pass and into their dark holes in the north kingdom. Peace seemed, at last, to be at hand.

WHERE THE REGION STANDS NOW

Peace in Damara is far from secure, although the prospects for it seem much more promising. Still, difficult problems face the people of the land.

First of all, although it united under Gareth for the strike against the forces of Vaasa, Damara remains divided, in spirit at least. The petty barons and dukes who tasted power in their pseudo-autonomy under the Witch-King are reluctant to relinquish control of their lands to a single king leading a reunited Damara. Several of them have a claim to the throne left empty when King Virdin was slain, particularly Tranth of Bloodstone and Dimian Ree of Morov. None are of direct descent, however, and the ascension of any claimant would be fraught with uprisings and covert coups.

Perhaps the most popular plan has been outlined by Tranth, the former Baron of Bloodstone. Rather than returning to the old kingdom, Tranth would like to see a new state formed that encompasses both Vaasa and Damara. The new kingdom would be called Bloodstone, and its first king, Gareth Dragonsbane.

At this time, this plan is only a topic of discussion. While retaining full control of the army, Gareth will not even hear of any permanent plans for the region until the business at hand is finished. Still, it seems obvious that the heroes are taken with Tranth's plan. At the very least, they are determined to prevent one of the petty barons from grabbing control.

The northern provinces remain in the clutches of the Vaasan scum. Although twice defeated, the bandit army has yet to be destroyed. Furthermore, Vaasa itself remains unconquered by any, and that forsaken land holds many holes filled with goblins, giants and other reminders of the Witch-King's reign.

Furthermore, two strange events have Gareth and all of his friends worried about the future. First, three flights of dragons—reds, blues, and blacks—have flown high through Damara and over the Galena Mountains, heading generally in the direction of the ruins of Castle Perilous. It is rumored that a flight of green dragons will soon follow, and thereafter they will all be joined from a huge group of whites from the Great Glacier.

The second disquieting situation is that a strange cloud has engulfed the top of Suncatcher Mountain, a tall peak found where the Galenas join the Earthspur range. This cloud seems to defy the winds, for it does not move. Witnesses have said that if the mountain is viewed at the proper angle when the sun is low, the shining spires of an immense castle are clearly visible.

Undeniably, the people of Damara still have much to do before the area settles back down. Gareth and his friends are working to enact a four-part plan designed to stabilize the region.

1. At home:

Gareth and Friar Dugald remain in Bloodstone Village, securing their home base. Gareth is determined to provide the people of Damara with strong centralized power. To do this, he strengthens the ties to his closest allies. Baroness Christine, a druid, has links with the centaurs and halflings of the woodland south of the village. Gareth visits the dwarves and gnomes of the mines every week. On Kane's advice, Gareth has spent some effort soliciting the goodwill of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose. He has invited Cantoule, the new Grandmaster of Flowers, to visit Bloodstone Village. If the Monastery throws its support behind the new baron, as expected, Gareth's power will be greatly increased.

Perhaps the most notable event in Bloodstone is the construction of "the Gates." These two massive fortresses will secure the entrances to Bloodstone Pass and protect the mines. Whatever the future of Damara holds, when the Gates are complete, the valley around Bloodstone Pass will be secured as the mightiest region of the Bloodstone Lands, with a guaranteed source of wealth.

2. The northern provinces:

A large contingent of the Bloodstone army under the command of Olwen Forest-friend has been working to secure the northern provinces of Damara. Never free of the Witch-King, the people of this region have no self-proclaimed leaders and should readily swear allegiance to their rescuers. Gareth is determined to get there before one of the other dukes or barons takes it upon himself to invade. In particular, he seeks to head off the designs of Dimian Ree of Morov.

Olwen's mission is described as the "five S's": squash the remaining Vaasan scum; supply the poor people of the region; secure the region and give it over to the people; seed them with hints of what is to come and with news of Bloodstone; and scout out the happenings over the borders in Vaasa and Narfell.

The first reports from the region indicate Olwen is having great success. He is rallying support for the instigation of the Kingdom of Bloodstone. Cries of "King Gareth!" resound through the streets of every rescued hamlet.

3. Preparations for Vaasa:

Certainly Gareth intends to strike hard into Vaasa after the situation in Damara settles down. ("But not until the region has been reunited—in the old kingdom or the new," Gareth has been heard to say with a sly wink.) The baron and the people he rules do not desire a return to the skirmish-filled days of the past. Formerly, Bloodstone Village and indeed all of northern Damara had to constantly seek out and destroy individual tribes of goblins or giants that had descended upon one of the farm communities, thinking them fair game. The Damarans want Vaasa put down, once and for all, and they envision a line of fortress-cities along the northern edge of the Galenas, each pulling its share of gemstones from new mines and patrolling the border.

For the present, Gareth keeps a wary eye on the scattered forces of his northern neighbor. He wants to make sure that no army can organize against Damara. Moveover, he recognizes the importance of having a full understanding of what he will be up against when he commits his troops to a campaign in the hostile land. He seeks news of the gathering dragons, the bandit army, and that mysterious cloud over Suncatcher Mountain.

To these ends, Gareth has commissioned Spysong, a network of scouts led by Kane, Celedon Kearney, and Riordan Parnell. Spysong has infiltrated the Galenas and traveled far into Vaasa itself. The network relays information back to Gareth and his allies in the form of coded, bard-spun ditties understandable only by the right ears.

4. The baronies:

Arguably, the biggest threat to Damara is the splintered spirit of Damara itself. The people of southern Damara generally aren't so supportive of the goings-on in the Barony of Bloodstone. This is particularly true in Heliogabalus and the other cities of Morov. They see Gareth Dragonsbane mainly as a conqueror, although so far a kindly one. The southern nobles have been capitalizing on their wounded pride to keep them from falling into the "King Gareth frenzy."

Here is where the "Twilight Riders" come in. Led by Emelyn the Gray and his fellow mage, Myrddin Viligoth, this mighty group races through the southern provinces after the sun has set. Astride magically-conjured steeds of light, they aid those in need and spread the truth about the happenings in the north. They take no payment from those they help, and ask for no oaths of allegiance. But their message is clear to the people. Cries of "King Gareth!" do not echo through the village streets in southern Damara, but those words are whispered door to door after the Twilight Riders have passed.

Whatever their official words might say, Gareth and his friends are determined to make Damara, hopefully Bloodstone, their home. Most agree that Gareth desires the kingship of a united nation. But even above that wish, scholars agree that the kindly Baron desires what is best for the people of Damara. He wants no further bloodshed, certainly no repeat of the Bloodstone Wars, and seeks an ascent to the throne on a wave of popular outcry so overwhelming that the other nobles won't dare oppose him. The power-hungry dukes and barons can see what is happening, and they aren't happy with the way the wind is blowing. In truth, though, there is little they can do to turn the tide.

It must be firmly stated that those who know Gareth Dragonsbane best are fully confident that it is not overweening ambition motivating the paladin. If the tide of opinion flowed another way; if the people opposed the formation of a Kingdom of Bloodstone; if they desired the return of the old Kingdom of Damara with one of the blooded heirs sitting on the royal throne, then Gareth would step down. The Baron of Bloodstone and his mighty friends will put their personal desires aside and willingly, faithfully serve the new king in the establishment of his realm.

Ironically, the people's faith only adds to his support. Few are those who think that Gareth and his companions act from self-serving ambition.

Politics of The Bloodstone Lands

The BARONIES

To understand the Bloodstone Lands, a Dungeon Master must have a grasp of where Damara stands among its neighbors, and the dynamics at work within the kingdom itself. Present-day politics in Damara have their roots in the past.

Although the Bloodstone Wars brought the armies of the land together, the people remain divided. Each barony fared a little differently during the recent wars, and therefore everyone has their own opinion about goings-on in the north, and of the rise of the new heroes. The selfish and deceitful rulers Zhengyi put in place have only served to aggravate the already-volatile situation.

Before the Witch-King, and from the days of its earliest origins, Damara was a single harmonious nation. An acknowledged, accepted king ruled all from Heliogabalus. The provinces existed as counties, all solidly behind the trusted decisions that issued from the throne. Each county was ruled by a noble house of long standing.

The counties were of two types: the city provinces and the supply provinces. The city provinces of Morov, Ostel, and Polten serve primarily as trade markets and launching sites for merchant caravans, and here dwell Da-mara's finest craftsmen. Farming is only on a small scale, and there is no raw mineral wealth here. These provinces are wholly dependent on the other regions to keep them from being more than simple trading communities suffering stoically in a cold frontier.

The supply provinces of Arcata, Bloodstone, Brandiar, Carmathan, and Soravia are less densely populated than the city provinces. These provinces support Damara's large-scale farmers and miners, the backbone supporting the cities' economies.

Zhengyi could not change economics, but he shattered the ruling class that kept everything working. After the bloody night when the flower of Damaran nobility was slaughtered, Zhengyi began replacing the nobles, hand-picking his puppets, and he got some doozies indeed!

The Duchy of Arcata

Ruling House: Horgath

Present Duke: William, 8th Duke of Arcata

Family Crest: Diving Dagger and Mountains Three

Province Population: 15,000

Capital: Valls (1,300)

Most of the people of Arcata are either farmers or miners. The farms are predominantly in the south, around Valls. Bloodstone is not common along the Arcatan stretch of the Galenas and the Earthspurs, but several silver and iron mines have been opened.

True to St. Sollars and the ethics of endurance and perseverance, the proud Arcatans work on in the face of any hardship. Tomrav, a mining and farming community deep within the Earthspurs, is a testament to this determination. This tight-knit city is entirely self-sufficient, often cut off from the rest of the land by deep snows for eight full months.

Arcata's House of Horgath had been in decline even before the rise of the Witch-King. The common Arcatans recognized this fact, but they were concerned mainly with day-to-day survival. Little attention was paid to the failings of House Horgath, which seemed harmless enough. William sent House Horgath to the very nadir of disrespect and indecency.

The opening salvo of the Bloodstone Wars was the conflict between Arcata and Bloodstone. In league with the Grandfather of Assassins, Duke William tried to take the wealth of the bloodstone mines by force. More than 1,600 strong, William's army forged straight in toward Bloodstone Village, marching through the foothills between Sleepy Wood and the Galenas. On their first night encamped on the outlying hills, Gareth sent a simple note to the Arcatan generals: "We are of common heritage, common suffering, and common goals. Why, then, do we fight?"

The Arcatan generals did not know of the massive fortifications that had been built in Bloodstone, and they could not appreciate Gareth's magnanimity. They thought the note was a desperate plea for mercy. The next day taught them a bitter lesson.

When the sun rose on the forces of Bloodstone, they were 1,200 strong, fully arrayed, and entrenched in cunning fortifications. There was worse news yet for the Arcatans. Centaurs, halflings, and dwarves had crept out of the tunnels of the Warren to encircle the Arcatan army from behind. Still loyal to the wishes of their duke, the Arcatans attacked the walls of Bloodstone anyway and battle was joined—but only briefly.

In a matter of minutes, 300 Arcatans lay dead or wounded, and the remainder of the army was pinned down in the little vale against the outer wall of Bloodstone Village. Now Gareth and the people of the new Bloodstone showed their true strength of character. The paladin and his friends raised a white flag and rode through the Arcatan lines, unarmed and unescorted, and sued for peace.

The terms were simple. The Arcatan army would collect its casualties and return home, swearing not to renew the attack. Duke William could remain on his throne, and no penalties would be imposed, no reparations demanded. Gareth only asked that the Arcatans allow him to move his forces along the border of Arcata and Brandiar to meet Carmathan, a new threat growing in the south.

The peace was quickly accepted. The new land of Bloodstone based its own hopes on the precept of self-determination. The Baron of Bloodstone gambled that Arcata would realize that its best hopes lay on the same path. The terms of the peace, which have come to be known as "Gareth's Gamble," apparently worked their magic. Nearly half of the Arcatan army fell in behind the marching army of Bloodstone. Three hundred more troops joined in along the trek to meet Carmathan.

William's power has decreased in proportion to the increasing popularity of Gareth Dragonsbane and the proposed Kingdom of Bloodstone. The majority of Arcatans fully support the idea of a new kingdom with Gareth as king of a united, self-directing people. Not too stupid to understand the tide of opinion around him, William does not oppose the populace, covertly or overtly.

It is believed that the Ducal Guard in Valls regularly runs a secret emissary to Bloodstone Village. Although the Guard traditionally bears a fierce loyalty to the Horgaths, they express the Arcatans' desire to preclude even the smallest possibility of renewed conflict.

The Barony of Bloodstone

Ruling House: Tranth

Present Baron: Gareth Dragonsbane, 6th Baron of Bloodstone

Family Crest: Crossed Pick and Sword

Province Population: 12,000

Capital: Bloodstone Village (7,500)

For many centuries, this area in the Galenas was considered merely an extension of the Sunderland of southern Vaasa, unwanted by all but a handful of brave frontiersmen and miners. But the miners had a secret: knowledge of a verdant valley nestled in the sheltering walls of Bloodstone Pass. When the mines' vast potential was finally understood, this valley became the site of Bloodstone Village, and the seat of the House of Tranth.

Bloodstone is the smallest of the Damaran provinces, and the most recently founded. When Gareth Dragonsbane married Lady Christine of the House of Tranth, he became only the sixth baron of this land. Although the people of Bloodstone have always had a high regard for the Tranth bloodline, they were certainly not disappointed when Gareth was granted the barony.

Historically, Bloodstone has experienced dramatic population swings. People flock here in good times, seeking the obvious wealth to be garnered from the mines. Then some disastrous event sends them running southward. The Wolf Winter and the coming of the Witch-King are only two recent examples of a long series of afflictions. However, with the rise of Gareth and his friends, and with the construction of the Gates, the folk of Bloodstone believe their days of running away may be over forever.

Bloodstone will soon surpass its previous glories. In the year and a half since the mines reopened, the population of Bloodstone Village has exploded from less than a thousand to 7,500, making it the fourth largest city in all Damara. It is long overdue for a name change—"village" just doesn't seem to fit any more—and more people arrive daily!

If the new kingdom comes to pass, Bloodstone Village will obviously be the seat of power. With its swelling population and growing prosperity, its gateway controlling access to Vaasa, and its virtual annex of Arcata, the Barony of Bloodstone will certainly play a major role in whatever the future brings.

In addition, two new towns have sprung up. Windless lies in the sheltered valley south of Bloodstone Village. Virdin, named after the last king of Damara, prospers in the foothills near the mines.

The Duchy of Brandiar

Ruling House: Brandebury

Present Duke: None, currently represented by Dormythyrr, Steward of the Duchy

Family Crest: Spear-tipped Windmill

Province Population: 8,000

Capital: Goliad (900)

Brandiar is a land of scattered villages, and farming is the primary occupation of the people. Once loosely ruled by the Duke of Brandebury in Goliad, that position is now empty. Ebelard, last of the Brandebury line, died of a broken heart soon after Zhengyi's ascent, for Ebelard was the first to concede defeat and surrender to the evil forces of Vaasa.

The people of Brandiar had no successor at hand, and the Witch-King never bothered to appoint one. Brandiar remained neutral during the Bloodstone Wars. Armies from Bloodstone crossed Brandiar's borders as freely as those from Morov, Ostel, and Polten. The unorganized farmers could have done nothing to stop either side, even had they tried!

After the Bloodstone Wars, when Vaasa reared its ugly head again, Brandiar did join in the Damaran rebellion. A common farmer from Goliad, Dormythyrr by name, assumed stewardship of the duchy. He gathered an army, then turned his forces over to Gareth, serving thereafter as an able commander in the Bloodstone army.

Today Brandiar is a divided land. More than any other province, Brandiar suffered under the Witch-King. "Eight of the ten" is a saying in the province: eight of the ten long years of the first war were fought almost exclusively within Brandiar's borders. The people won't soon forget what Gareth and the army of Bloodstone accomplished. Moreover, the security promised by the new Kingdom of Bloodstone is deeply appealing.

However, the southern villages of the province retain old ties to Morov and Ostel, who do not favor the new Bloodstone kingdom. Dimian Ree, the Baron of Morov, takes it for granted that Brandiar will support him, but the province is actually leaning strongly toward Gareth.

The Duchy of Carmathan

Ruling House: Devlin

Present Duke: Helmont the 15th, 22nd Duke of Carmathan

Family Crest: Bloodied Scythe

Province Population: 20,000

Capital: Ravensburg (3,500)

Carmathan is one of the southernmost Damaran provinces. Like Polten and Ostel, it shares a long border with Impiltur to the south. Although several mines along the rim of the Earthspurs in the west have shown promise, Carmathan is Damara's chief farming province. In years of good harvests, Carmathan alone can feed all the peoples of the entire kingdom, making it an important province indeed.

The ruling house of Carmathan has been in turmoil the last two years. When the Witch-King set his assassins loose in the night, the first victim was Helmont the 13th, 20th Duke of Carmathan. The assassins killed more than 50 members of the family, leaving only Zhengyi's chosen puppet in line for the succession. He was swiftly appointed.

Thus did Dashard Devlin, an incompetent coward, ascend to the seat in Ravensrock. Dashard was Helmont's fourth cousin, and he took the title Helmont the 14th. The puppet played his role as head of an "independent state" well enough to keep the loyalty of the people of Carmathan. Guided by his overlord, Dashard set up a very successful propaganda network throughout the duchy. He also planned to move against Bloodstone.

When the Bloodstone army learned of Dashard's plans for an invasion, they marched south to meet the evil duke head on. Dashard's propaganda network whipped Carmathan's people into a patriotic frenzy of defense against the invaders.

The armies met 20 miles east of Valls, on the edge of the Brandiar Moor, in a battle that came to be known as the Fight of Three Borders. From the outset it was apparent to the generals of Bloodstone that this battle was going to be much different than the diplomatically-engineered victory over Arcata. Believing Gareth to be the invader and usurper, the Carmathans advanced with fire in their eyes and a song on their lips. Fortunately, the Bloodstone army was equally well-motivated. Battle-hardened, and supported by the remnants of the Arcatan army, the forces from Bloodstone battled the Carmathans for almost three full days.

Finally Gareth achieved a hard-fought victory after the bloodiest battle of the Bloodstone Wars. Five hundred of the Bloodstone forces were cut down. More than two-thirds of the 1,800 Carmathans died on the field. Dashard himself was slain when he got in the way of a lightning bolt conjured by Emelyn the Gray.

Gareth would have continued south to put things right in Carmathan, but the alliance of Morov, Ostel, and Polten had united and was marching to cut off the Bloodstone army's return home.

Thus, Dashard's propaganda network remained intact, as did the internal structure of the court. Then unheralded came Theodorus, the heretofore unknown brother of Dashard. Theodorus took the ducal seat as Helmont the 15th, and quickly rallied the duchy behind him.

The new duke in Ravensrock has used the misinformation network well. Many Carmathans are quite convinced that Gareth was and is a power-hungry dog seeking conquest, not cooperation. Carmathan may prove be Gareth's toughest nut to crack in his quest for a united kingdom.

Also, Carmathan has deep roots in the old kingdom of Damara. Carmathans were, by tradition, deeply loyal to the throne in Heliogabalus. Ravensrock was actually Damara's first settlement, the original home of Feldrin and the founders of the kingdom. Fiercely independent, the Carmathans consider themselves the true Damarans, founders of the kingdom.

	New Kingdom	Quillan's Wall Neutral			Old Kingdom

Carmathan
Morov
Ostel

Soravia

And yet, in the chamber of Quillan the Sage, the standard of Carmathan is placed squarely in the middle of the Measures of Power Scale as an undecided province. There are several reasons to believe that Gareth will yet win over this southern region, detailed below.

Helmont the 15th sees an alliance with Morov as preferable to competing with Gareth's rising tide of favor, but the people of Carmathan have displayed no love for Dimian Ree. The Carmathans do not like the rumors they hear, particularly Ree's apparent ties to the thieves' guild and to the Grandfather of Assassins.

Second, the twilight Riders recently passed through the area, and Emelyn's company helped many. They even rescued the farming region of Halfling Downs from a ravaging bulette without a single life lost. Their aid has been noted and remarked on by all who encountered them.

A third boost lies in Carmathan's close ties with Impiltur. Once Gareth opens relations with Impiltur, he can work on Carmathan from the back door.

But a rumor may have supplied Gareth's strongest potential wedge. When the Twilight Riders were in Halfling Downs, they heard a tale from an old woman claiming to be a midwife to the House of Devlin. This midwife remembered no Theodorus, nor any brother of Dashard ever being born. She doubted the authenticity of the new duke's claim.

Gareth would not allow the Twilight Riders to foster this unsubstantiated rumor. Instead, he brought in the well-respected Monastery of the Yellow Rose. The Monastery's genealogical archives are quite complete but, in fairness, they sent an expedition to Carmathan to investigate on the spot. Early reports seem to lend credence to the midwife's tale. Woe to Helmont the 15th if the proud people of Carmathan learn he is an imposter!

The Barony of Morov

Ruling House: Banacath

Present Baron: Dimian Ree, 27th Baron of Morov, Mayor of Heliogabalus, Presider of the Market, Overlord of the King's Road, Successor-in-line King of Damara

Family Crest: Stones and Scales (the standard of the Kingdom of Damara)

Province Population: 33,000

Capital: Heliogabalus (25,000)

Located in the fertile river valleys of south-central Damara, Morov had always been a major player in Damaran politics. Zhengyi knew the importance of the region, and set up Dimian Ree as the baron.

Dimian Ree's first act was to move the seat of the barony from Morovar to Heliogabalus, once capital of all Damara. Previously, Heliogabalus had belonged to no single province, existing rather as an independent entity. Co-opting the city's status to make it the "capital" of Morov clearly stated Ree's ultimate aims.

Yet Dimian Ree has not openly claimed the throne of Damara, though he is a true descendant of Feldrin—one of only three surviving members of the line. (The others are Tranth, former Baron of Bloodstone, and his daughter, Baroness Christine.) To understand Dimian Ree's hesitation, one must understand the dynamics of Heliogabalus, for fully three-quarters of the people of Morov reside in that city.

Heliogabalus is a city of independent merchants, with no army, only mercenary guards controlled by those merchants. The people of Heliogabalus were loyal to the throne out of simple expediency. The merchants are only concerned with the flow of trade, and they care little whether Dimian Ree or Gareth Dragonsbane rules. Wealth is the key, and any upset of the status quo makes the merchants nervous. When the debate does arise concerning the new kingdom versus the old, the inevitable punchline here is: "Morov the same!"

In the Bloodstone Wars, the merchants' political indifference proved to be a great weakness. Morov and Ostel allied with Polten, and they should have fared better. After all, Morov and Ostel alone counted for more than one-third the total population of Damara! But these three provinces did not raise even 2,500 soldiers to battle the army of Bloodstone.

The wars were also disastrous for Dimian Ree. His first mistake came when he and his allies, the Baron of Polten and the Baroness of Ostel, planned to entrap Gareth and his men as they marched back to Bloodstone. The three-nation alliance set 1,200 men on Gareth's heels, while another 1,000 prepared an ambush ahead of the Bloodstone army.

Unfortunately for the alliance, the ambushers laid in wait in Warrenwood, right on top of that bees' nest called the Warren. In a day, the halflings of the Warren killed 100 men and captured the other 900. When the main body of the allied army attacked Gareth's flank, they found themselves outnumbered two to one. The results can be imagined.

Ree made an even greater blunder after the allies surrendered. By then it was known that the Witch-King was on the move and that Gareth meant to fight him. Dimian Ree would not assist Bloodstone in a battle against his true master. The baron called his forces back to Morov.

But more than 1,000 soldiers of the alliance disobeyed their orders and stayed. These were primarily the 900 who had been spared and treated so well by the halflings. After Gareth's victory, many soldiers went home only long enough to collect their families before relocating in Brandiar or Bloodstone.

Morov would be tricky to fight in any event. Although the province couldn't raise much of an army itself, neither could Bloodstone's forces easily take Heliogabalus. The merchants would oppose any army just walking in, the thieves would hold every alley, and the battle would no doubt devolve to bloody house-to-house fighting. Gareth, therefore, is determined to be patient, waiting for his popular support to force Dimian Ree's hand.

Dimian Ree is also in a predicament. He sits in Heliogabalus with a legitimate claim, but his reign will be short if he cannot gather enough support to revive the old kingdom. Baroness Sylvia of Ostel remains his staunch ally, but Polten is slipping away. The merchants of Heliogabalus will not tolerate uncertainty in the region for long if that uncertainty sends the goods from the supply provinces flowing around, and not into, Morov.

With no substantial army and with a rising tide of support for the new Kingdom of Bloodstone, Dimian Ree's only chance may be to eliminate Tranth, Baroness Christine, and Gareth. It is whispered that he is a personal friend of the Grandfather of Assassins, and he may rely on that bond in the near future.

The Barony of Ostel

Ruling House: Praka

Present Baron: Baroness Sylvia, 23rd Noble of Ostel

Family Crest: Drawn Blade

Province Population: 26,000

Capital: Praka (11,000)

Ostel is a small city province south of Morov and bordering on Impiltur. In the heart of the Damaran waterways, Ostel is rich in farmland, but trade and crafting are the staples. Two major cities, Praka and Portith, are located on the King's Road, and they have always been the first stop for goods arriving from the west.

Before Morov and Heliogabalus combined, Ostel was Damara's most populous province, with more than twice the population of Bloodstone. By itself, it should have been able to raise an army sufficient to defeat Gareth's forces. But Ostel actually provided the least number of men to the alliance, and most of those had to be pressed into service.

Sylvia, Baroness of Ostel, is the whole reason, for she is hated by her people. Appointed by the Witch-King after House Praka was murdered, Sylvia was the most personally powerful of the provincial rulers. (She is a 14th level magic-user.) She consolidated her position quickly by using her magic and her wiles (16 Charisma) to charm the most influential merchants and landowners of the barony.

But among the common folk of Ostel Sylvia is despised. They see her for what she is, an evil, power-hungry sorceress who cares nothing for them. If Gareth does consolidate Damara into the new Kingdom of Bloodstone, he will have to forcibly remove Sylvia. Chances are, the good people of Ostel will lead him to her palace, and help him throw her down.

Sylvia clutches Dimian Ree's coattails for support. On the whole, Ostel remains loyal to the old Damaran kingdom, and as long as Dimian Ree holds some claim to the throne, Sylvia can keep the people under her thumb. With Gareth's popularity rising, though, Sylvia fears that her day of reckoning is approaching fast.

The Barony of Polten

Ruling House: BelMaris

Present Baron: Donlevy the Young, 20th Baron of Polten

Family Crest: The Open Palm

Province Population: 14,000

Capital: Trailsend (8,000)

Completing the river-valley triangle of south-central provinces is Polten, sited across Lake Mogadore from Ostel. Its capital, Trailsend, is the sister city of Praka, though few polite words have been exchanged between the two since the Bloodstone Wars.

Like Carmathan, Polten retains strong ties with Impiltur. Trailsend was once the final stopover for caravans heading to Damara's southern neighbor, and the first stop for Impilturian caravans coming north.

Baron Donlevy the Old was a wise man, beloved in the province before Zhengyi's rise. When the Witch-King's war was joined, the baron understood what it would mean to be defeated by so wicked an enemy. He sent his infant son into hiding. In Tellerth, the young heir Donlevy lived disguised as a farmer's boy. Official word said only that Donlevy the Young had been taken ill and died and a state funeral was even held.

After Zhengyi won the first battle at Goliad, Donlevy the Old's fears were realized. All of House BelMaris was slaughtered and Zorth, a pretencousin, took the seat as Baron of Polten. The impostor wholeheartedly supported Dimian Ree and Sylvia against Bloodstone.

Zorth fell from power when the alliance failed to defeat Gareth's forces. Polten had supplied half of the troops who fought, specifically the contingent of 1,000 who were ambushed in Sleepy Wood. The survivors returned to Polten telling their kin of mercy and great courage of the new rulers in the north—quite a different tale than was heard out of the capital. Many were angered by Zorth's refusal to join Gareth and stand up to the Witch-King. Most of the soldiers gathered their families and left Polten soon after the war.

Still only a boy of 14, Donlevy made his return from Tellerth at this time. To save his own hide, Zorth quickly stepped aside for the rightful heir. However, the youth's Tellerth counselors did not understand the situation in the capital, so Zorth remained as an advisor, as did many of his cohorts. Those faithful to Donlevy recognize the peril, but Zorth has placed himself close to Donlevy. So far, he has deflected all warnings to the new baron. Therefore, Polten remains loyal to Dimian Ree and the throne in Heliogabalus. It is widely believed, however, that if the new baron understood the situation, he would throw his allegiance to Gareth.

The barony's best hope seems to lie in the efforts of the Twilight Riders, and swaying Polten is the group's chief goal. Emelyn seeks to win people's hearts, and to do so, he has led the Twilight Riders all the way to the eastern border, to Tellerth. From there, the group will make its way back across the land, hopefully raising a tide of support behind them.

Additionally, the Twilight Riders have placed an agent inside the castle to keep an eye on Zorth. And if they learn that the former baron plans a coup, they will rush to Donlevy's side, prepared to crush the enemies of the rightful baron.

The Duchy of Soravia

Ruling House: None

Present Duke: None

Province Crest: Ice Mountain

Province Population: 12,000

Capital: Kinbrace (4,500)

Soravia is the newest of the Damaran provinces, created by the Witch-King as a buffer zone between his armies and the more populous sections of Damara. Originally, Soravia was about the size of Carmathan, occupying the southern sections of the wide valleys between the three rivers. But when the Witch-King was defeated, Soravia expanded. It now includes all the lands west of Brandiar and north of Morov and Polten.

This sounds more impressive than it really is. The vast proportion of this province is rough grassland and barren tundra. Although it occupies nearly half of all Damara, Soravia can barely support the 12,000 hardy souls who live there.

The Witch-King set up one Ygor as the first Duke of Soravia, but he was dragged through the streets of Kinbrace as soon as Zhengyi was thrown down. The people are determined to maintain their independence, and they do not want their territory returned to its previous status as squatters' land (see the notes concerning Vaasa, below). Rumors indicate that the dukeship will be offered to Olwen Forest-friend, who is sweeping the last remnants of the Vaasan army from the vicinity.

Whether these rumors are true or not, Olwen and his soldiers are bringing freedom to the province. Where they pass, they spread news of Gareth Dragonsbane, and the scattered villages of Soravia are lining up solidly behind Gareth and the notion of the new Kingdom of Bloodstone.

This could prove quite important to the creation of the new kingdom. Soravia alone borders Narfell, Damara's quiet neighbor in the east. Only the people of eastern Soravia know anything at all about the rugged Nars. Furthermore, if Soravia and Brandiar swing completely into Gareth's fold, the Baron of Bloodstone will have a lock on the north and on all the major river systems in the region.

Looking at the overall situation, Gareth and his friends have to be pleased with what they have accomplished in the few months since the fall of the Witch-King. Arcata is squarely behind them, and Brandiar and Soravia seem only one step from pledging their allegiance to the new kingdom. If the monks of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose prove rumors, the Duke of Carmathan is going to take a hard fall. With Polten slipping away from the three-province alliance, Ostel and Morov are on the verge of isolation from the rest of the kingdom—not a comfortable position for those that depend on the supply lines for their prosperity.

But Gareth is too farsighted to limit his plan to dealing with the internal politics of Damara. Damara is but one nation in the heart of a potentially prosperous, but often dangerous region. Rebounding from the devastating wars with the Witch-King will not prove an easy task for anyone.

VAASA

With the defeat of the Witch-King, Vaasa has quickly returned to its previous state of being unclaimed wilderness. There is no ruler here, and no formal governing body. Vaasa has become again a squatters' land, where people can claim any empty niche as their own. The only price is allegiance to the informal alliance of the people of the Sunderland. Cooperation is essential in this wilderness. Every house is a refuge, and every individual, a soldier in the common cause of survival.

The only true city is the castle of Darmshall (pop. 600) which serves as a waymeet for the miners and farmers, and a launching pad for those taking the road to Bloodstone Pass. Only about 8,000 humans and dwarves inhabit Vaasa, and these live primarily in the Sunderland along the Galena Mountains in the southernmost section of the country. They are a hardy folk, constantly fighting bands of goblins and orcs, and battling horrible weather.

Vaasa holds a goblinoid and giant population in excess of 200,000. Although these monsters are scattered in small tribes often fighting amongst themselves, their numbers alone make them a threat to the well-being of the goodly folk. Moreover, scores of evil dragons have settled in the ruins of Castle Perilous, the former stronghold of the Witch-King, and dragons can only mean trouble.

Gareth Dragonsbane is the only ruler in the south who has any say about what happens in Vaasa. Bloodstone is the only Damaran province which extends through the Galenas, and Bloodstone Pass is the single easy route to Vaasa. For now, Gareth has not the time nor the manpower to undertake an expedition into the Vaasan wastes to formally claim and tame the land. However, construction of the Vaasan Gate at the north end of Bloodstone Pass significantly affects Vaasa's future.

This mighty fortress has become an important home base for adventuring companies looking to probe the northland. The Baron of Bloodstone has even placed a bounty on the heads of the evil humanoids. A goblin's ear will earn 2 gold pieces; a bugbear's, 7; and a giant's as much as 100 pieces of gold. In addition to taming the wilderness, Gareth hopes that adventurers will decide to settle down there. The Vaasan Gate has already attracted a number of hardy souls, many of whom have made their way to Darmshall.

Central and northern Vaasa is home to little but foul beasts, and not much of importance is heard from this area. Gareth is interested, however, in a large tribe of barbarians who stalk the frozen steppes in the shadow of the Great Glacier. This tribe, called "White Worm," fought beside Zhengyi in the war with Damara, but seemed to break away from the Witch-King near the end of his reign. The few adventurers who know White Worm speak of them as fierce but honorable warriors. White Worm may have lost faith in Zhengyi when they discovered his true, evil nature.

Gareth is more interested in opening diplomatic relations with White Worm than in meeting them on the field of battle again. In pursuit of this end, Kane the monk has reportedly used his spirit-walking ability to go among the tribesmen as an emissary. (See p. 50 and 57 for more details about Kane's mission.)

However, the most dangerous threat to peace in the north is not the dragons nor the barbarians, nor even the rise of a giant-king. Gareth and his friends fear that Zhengyi's early success may have drawn the interest of the Red Wizards, a powerful society of evil mages from the distant southern land of Thay.

The Witch-King was himself once a member of the Red Wizards before he broke away, eventually to become Damara's nightmare. Before Zhengyi, the Red Wizards had shown no interest in the Bloodstone Lands. Now, one or two individuals in the order might decide that Zhengyi had the right idea when he consolidated the vast army of Vaasan scum, even if the group as a whole kept its business elsewhere.

Although presently a member of the Twilight Riders, Myrddin Viligoth originally came to Bloodstone Village from the land of Thay. There he had been a member of the Red Wizards himself until he came to understand their vile beliefs. Although unconvinced that Thay or the Red Wizards will take any action in Vaasa, Myrddin has advised the heroes of Bloodstone to be wary.

Gareth and his friends would like to shut the door against the Red Wizards, or against anyone who might have designs in Vaasa. But with energy and resources tied up coping with the politics of Damara, they must rely on less direct methods. Most important are the efforts to establish good diplomatic relations with White Worm, the construction of the Vaasan Gate, and a bounty policy to attract and support companies of adventurers. These are small deterrents to the plans of the ill-intentioned, but vital nevertheless.

WHAT THE NEIGHBORS THINK

The events in Vaasa and Damara have not gone unnoticed outside the two countries. Of the other nations in the area, only Impiltur and Narfell seem likely to directly affect Vaasa and Damara.

Northern Impiltur and western Narfell are also considered “Bloodstone Lands,” though their mines produce nowhere near the quantities taken from either Vaasa or Damara. But Impiltur in particular plays a major role in Damara’s economy. Both Gareth Dragonsbane and Dimian Ree understand the roles that Impiltur and Narfell might play in their struggles. So far, Gareth has made a better impression.

The territories west of the Bloodstone Lands will be detailed in a separate sourcebook. For a Bloodstone Lands campaign, simply consider Thar and the city-states of Mulmaster and Procampur to be secondary to Vaasa and Damara.

Impiltur

Across the rushing waters of the Sidewinder Rivers sits Damara’s most important neighbor, Impiltur. Not a large nation, Impiltur is bordered by the Earthspurs and Damara on the north, the Sea of Fallen Stars to the south; it stretches from the Earthfasts on the west, east to the Easting Reach.

Some two-and-a-half centuries ago, the city-states were invaded by hordes of hobgoblins rolling out of the Giant-spire Mountains. The largest of the four cities took the boldest action. Imphras, War-Captain of Lyrabar, called up an army from all the states. When the dust cleared, the hobgoblins were smashed and Imphras was a hero. Seeing firsthand the value of working together, the four city-states united, forming Impiltur with its seat of power in Lyrabar. Today the crest of Impiltur—crossed sword and wand on a dun field trimmed in flaming scarlet—is a standard to be reckoned with.

Impiltur is a land of 100,000 citizens, more than 90% human. Only scattered groups of halflings and dwarves thrive in the nation.

Impiltur maintains a strong militia, and each of its four primary cities is a veritable fortress. A fifth city, Ilmwatch, houses only a few common folk, but more than 500 battle-ready troops.

The kingdom is ruled by Queen Sambryl, a 17th level magic-user who gained her position by marrying the great, great-grandson of Imphras, Imphras IV. Queen Sambryl has no taste for the duties of rule. She is a lover of knowledge and finds the tedium of day-to-day politics and formal engagements an absolute bore.

Nevertheless, Impiltur is well-ruled. Sambryl willingly acts as a figurehead, relinquishing her power to the council, the Lords of Imphras II, twelve indirect descendants of Impiltur’s noble founder. War-Captains all, each one is known to be of good alignment and all are high level paladins (not less than 11th level). Their leader is Kyrtraun, a 20th level paladin, who advises the Queen on every matter.

The Lords of Imphras II disperse to oversee events throughout the nation. With Kyrtraun are three other War-Captains: Rilimbraun, Limbrar, and Haelimbrar. Haelimbrar normally spends his time in the town of Laviguer, between the Earthspurs and the Earthfasts. His responsibility is to secure the western and northern borders of Impiltur. Presently, however, he is on a secret mission in Damara.

The city of Sarshel is home base to Silaunbrar and Rilaunyr. The cities of Hlammach and Dilpur are home to three paladins each: Imbra, Silmgar, and Lashilaun guard Hlammach. Imbraun, Soargilm, and Sambrar watch over Dilpur.

Impiltur’s wealth lies in trade, for all its major cities are seaports. Before the days of unity, the four cities had close ties with Procampur, Sembia, and with their fellow city-states along the Sea of Fallen Stars. Now the ships all sail under the Impilturian banner, and the traders manipulate the market quite to their own advantage.

Furthermore, Impiltur has become the gateway between east and south.

The nation acts as liaison between the Bloodstone Lands and the powers of the Sea of Fallen Stars. Ashanath, Narfell, and Rashemen beyond the Great Dale also conduct much business through Impiltur. The strange goods that flow into Impiltur from these lands can bring high prices.

Recent events in Impiltur

Over the last few years, the Lords of Imphras II have faced a few challenges within their own borders. In Rawlinswood, strange events have raised a few eyebrows. A bandit-lord called Lothchas has been operating in the area with a small, high-level band of marauders. Rumors also whisper of the Nentyarch, a mighty wizard living at the heart of the wood in a tree-lined fortress called Dun-Tharos.

However, Impiltur’s greatest concerns have undoubtedly been over the recent upheavals in Vaasa and Damara. Impiltur’s War-Captains watched the rise of the Witch-King uneasily, and as Zhengyi smashed through Damara, they kept one hand on their sword-hilts. Throughout the ten-year war, the debate raged over whether Impiltur should come to King Virdin’s aid.

All hoped that Damara would defeat Zhengyi, but officially the nation was neutral. A local rumor implied that some “Carmathan” troops who marched to aid the Bloodstone army were in fact a division sent secretly by Impiltur, but no truth to the rumor was ever found. Privately, the rulers feared that their entry into the war would instigate action by their more opportunistic neighbors.

When Damara surrendered at the Ford of Goliad, many of Impiltur’s Lords regretted their political paralysis. They talked of annexing Carmathan and Polten to be a buffer zone, and this was almost carried out. Impiltur finally opted for patience and discretion, fearing the consequences of angering the mighty Witch-King.

The two subsequent years of Zhengyi’s reign were an anxious period for the people of Impiltur. Those in power understood the limitations on Zhengyi's strength and few feared an immediate invasion. Zhengyi would not risk another campaign against a major power too soon. The knowledgeable in Impiltur expected the Witch-King to strike to the east, where his long arms had already found Icelace Lake and the border with Narfell.

Although it did not fear invasion, Impiltur was still badly hurt, for the conquest disrupted all trade with Damara. Even the value of the now-"cursed" money dropped, and mine production fell off. In the past, nearly all of Damara's bloodstone passed through Sarshel. The Damaran merchants paid a percentage to Impiltur, as protection money, to pay for trading rights-of-way, and for the use of Impilturian port facilities. A substantial proportion of her fleet once sailed exclusively for bloodstone. Impiltur's ready wealth disappeared.

Where Impiltur now stands

Impiltur's official stance toward Damara continues to be "wait-and-see," at least officially. The War-Captains say little of their feelings about Gareth Dragonsbane in Bloodstone, or about his potential conflict with Dimian Ree in Heliogabalus.

After the fall of Zhengyi, Dimian Ree secretly pleaded for Impiltur to furnish him the men he would need to put things aright in Damara. But on unanimous advice from her War-Captains, Sambryl politely refused. Her statement wished Dimian Ree the best, but firmly reminded him that Damara's business was Damara's alone.

Outraged, Dimian Ree saw the refusal as another nail driven into his coffin, even though his closest advisors had told him to expect no help from Impiltur.

But Dimian Ree won't give up easily. Using his elaborate underground network, the Baron of Morov spreads promises of wealth and trading benefits to the merchants of Lyrabar and Sarshel, but only if he is on Damara's throne. Ree hopes that this will encourage them to appeal on his behalf to the leaders of their cities.

In fact, Impiltur's neutrality is still more official than real. One of Impiltur's War-Captains, Haelimbrar, is secretly riding with the Twilight Riders, hoping to learn more of the methods and ambitions of Bloodstone's new baron. Emelyn the Gray denies it—with a wink.

Just like Dimian Ree, Gareth actively hopes to sway Impiltur's opinion into his own camp. To embellish his reputation in the southern kingdom, he has laid the foundations of his own communications network. Furthermore, the Baron of Bloodstone is taking advantage of his relationship with the Monastery of the Yellow Rose. Long respected by the Lords of Imphras II, the Monastery supplied emissaries to speak on Gareth's behalf.

It seems logical that Gareth would be the Lords' first choice. Though from a different order, he too is a paladin and above reproach. Paladins understand and trust fellow paladins, and it is doubtful that cries of anguish would be heard on the streets of Impiltur's cities if Gareth were named the first Bloodstone king.

The people's feelings about Gareth are certainly colored by the parallels with their own hero. But more importantly, the powers of Impiltur want what is best for their neighbor. The recovery of the northern kingdom will restore the traffic of profitable merchant caravans.

Narfell

Beyond the eastern border of Soravia, beyond Icelace Lake and the Giantspire Mountains, lies the kingdom of Narfell. Larger than Damara, Narfell stretches from the Giantspire Mountains north to the far reaches of Icelace Lake, east to the borders of distant Rashemen, and down to the northern shore of the Ashane, the Lake of Tears. Rawlinswood forms Narfell's southernmost boundary, although the Nars consider the waymeet of Bezental and the Great Dale to be in their territory. The Great Glacier bounds Narfell in the north.

Overall, Narfell is a dry, flat grassland. There are a few central lakes called the Teardrops, with some connecting rivers. Other than the Giantspires, the kingdom has only a few lonely mountains, that do little to deflect the biting winds coming off the Great Glacier. These stony lumps are almost always crawling with fearsome monsters, with tundra yeti and hobgoblins poised behind every rock.

The soil in Narfell is not fertile; scraggly grass is about all it will support. The people here live as nomadic hunters, preying on the vast herds of reindeer and wild ox.

Though more tamed than Vaasa, Narfell can best be described as “savagely civilized.” Certainly its culture is far different from that of Damara and Impiltur. The tanned horsemen who ride the tundra, the Nars, live in large tribal communities. Temporary tent villages called waymeets appear along the worn paths the Nars call roads, most often springing up wherever a tribe might be when the sun finds the western horizon and the vicious night wind begins to blow.

Tales speak of at least 20 Nar tribes (see the extended descriptions below). Each tribe is called by the family name of their current chieftain. The largest tribe is Abordabe, numbering 4,000, but most tribes have only a few hundred members.

When unity is required, the Nars will abide by joint decisions made for the common good. Thus, in dealing with representatives of foreign merchants or threats of war beyond the borders, the Nars rely on decisions made by a tribal council led by Chieftain Abordabe.

There are no permanent cities in Narfell, but once a year, the tribes briefly gather in a single location—a huge marketplace they call Bildoobaris, but more commonly referred to as the Trade Fair. This gathering is occasioned by the merchants’ arrival from Impiltur and other lands, an effort which these traders make only once a year. The Trade Fair is a vast tent city that houses nearly all 30,000 men, women, and children of Narfell.

Narfell’s primary wealth is, without doubt, its horses. The Nars are among the finest horsemen in the Forgotten Realms, and they demand much of their steeds. Over time, the tribes have bred exceptional quality into their horses. Tall, sinewy, and tough, these steeds possess an endurance and raw strength unequalled in the region.

The Nars love to deal, and the Trade Fair is one of the great pleasures of every tribesman and woman. They have a weakness for sparkling jewelry and colorful clothes (especially the men), and every year they eagerly trade horses for trinkets. A caveat to those who would make a quick coin: their taste has improved since Impiltur joined the trade circuit.

But in essence life in Narfell remains as it has always been: a day-to-day war against the elements and the monsters. These are a tough people—Nar women can outfight most men of the civilized realms. As it always has been, Narfell is a land where only the strong survive.

Recent events in Narfell

Even the rise of the Witch-King could not bring dramatic changes to this kingdom which has remained much the same since its earliest days. But the Nars did notice Zhengyi, and watched him closely.

The Nars had never involved themselves with Damara, and certainly they had never considered the possibility of war with their western neighbor. Only a few tribes had any contact with the east, and that only with frontiersmen in eastern Soravia. So the people of Narfell were not pleased by Zhengyi’s evident taste for conquest. The Witch-King’s army camped on the banks of Icelace Lake, and there was talk that, with its large numbers of unrecruited humanoid, Narfell would be the focus of Zhengyi’s next campaign.

A group of Nar horsemen were sent on a scouting probe by the tribal council. They crossed over the Frozen Ford into northern Soravia and skirmished with a contingent of the Vaasan army. The fierce Nars thundered through Zhengyi’s goblins, even cutting down several hill giants.

But a cleric of the Order of the Goat’s Head saw the horsemen as barbarians (and it can be argued that the Nars are indeed barbarians). Some say the evil cleric was high priest Banak himself. This priest brought forth a legion of undead against the Nars. Like most barbarians, the Nars have a definite aversion to things they do not understand, and the proud warriors swiftly lost their taste for battle. Although Nars rarely retreat, the few survivors fled back across the frozen expanse of Icelace Lake carrying tales of impending doom to their people.

The tribes gathered in the shadows of the Giantspires preparing for war, and watched the rise of Gareth Dragonsbane with sincere relief. Zhengyi never crossed into Narfell, for the army of Bloodstone arose and threw him down. However, if the second battle at the Ford of Goliad had shifted in Zhengyi’s favor, the Nar army would have charged across the fields of Soravia to oppose the Witch-King.

Where Narfell now stands

Little is known of the Nars’ present feelings toward Damara. It seems likely that these proud and fierce people would lean in favor of Gareth Dragonsbane over Dimian Ree because there is a mentality of survival-of-the-fittest among the Nars. “Deed, not blood,” is the rule, and all Nars are judged by their actions. Even the tribal chieftains constantly face honorable challenges from rivals. The winner of these hand-to-hand battles becomes the newly-accepted chieftain, while the loser (if he lives) willingly takes a lesser standing and pays all honor to the victor. By bravely opposing Zhengyi, Gareth has probably won the approval of those Nar leaders who have noted the events in Damara.

Conversely, Dimian Ree has done nothing to make the Nars think well of him, and he hints that he will claim the throne of Damara by right of blood-not deed. Moreover, Narfell’s closest neighbors, the people of Soravia, owe their freedom and their allegiance to Gareth. Therefore, when they have occasion to speak with the Nars, the Soravians laud Gareth, not Ree.

The Nars know that Dimian Ree did not fight nor even offer support at the second battle at the Goliad ford. Even their own people were more battle-ready than the man who would succeed to the Damaran throne by bloodright. Therefore, Dimian Ree’s only hope would be to dishonor Gareth in the eyes of the Nars: not easy! Gareth has shown himself a man of honor and courage, virtues highly valued by the Nars.

Gareth himself values the Nars' respect, and he has some preliminary plans for a balanced relationship with his eastern neighbor. If he should come to power as the first King of Bloodstone, Gareth sees Narfell as an ally mustering a powerful cavalry. In return, he believes that he can offer much to the tribesmen in the form of mining expertise.

The Giantspire Mountains are known to be rich in certain minerals, bloodstone included. The Nar hunters have never learned to pull ore from the ground profitably, and it seems unlikely that all the tribes would change their nomadic ways to learn. However, for a tithe of gems and jewels, the tribes might allow Damaran companies to mine in the Giantspires. Damara has the people to set up lucrative mines in Narfell, and to teach the Nars who so desire how to do their own mining. Gareth believes the arrangement has the makings of a solid partnership.

The known tribes

For the purpose of this description, each tribe has been categorized as being one of four dispositions: Savage, Hostile, Ambivalent, and Tolerant. A Dungeon Master should keep in mind that these ratings are generalizations.

A tribe rated Savage is likely to attack foreigners on sight, asking no questions. One regarded as Hostile would be more interested in capturing, or at least surrounding, foreigners before attacking. PCs caught in this unenviable position had better do some fast talking if they ever hope to leave. An Ambivalent tribe judges foreigners solely on their immediate actions. This tribe won't take any action, favorable or hostile, toward strangers until provoked—one way or the other. Finally, a Tolerant tribe will accept foreigners unless they do something to anger the tribal chieftain.

Most Nars fit somewhere between Hostile and Ambivalent. Even the most savage tribes come to the Trade Fair each year with open arms and wide smiles, while even the most tolerant would not hesitate to put a pushy foreigner to a slow and painful death.

Tribes are usually difficult for outsiders to identify. They wear no distinctive colors or clothing, and the name of a tribe changes whenever a new chieftain takes command. While tribes are often found at waymeets within their territories, these locations are open to all the tribes and are freely shared. A traveler wandering to Peltarch, south of Icelace Lake, could not be sure whether the Nars camped there belonged to Abordabe or Creel—a dangerous confusion indeed!

Abordabe

Population: 4,000

Locale: Central Narfell between Hark's Finger and the western banks of the Teardrops.

Disposition: Tolerant

The largest of the Nar tribes, Abordabe oversees the Trade Fair each summer. The tribe views foreigners more as a source of added wealth than as enemies.

Aingst

Population: 1,700

Locale: Western Narfell, in the shadows of the Giantspire Mountains.

Disposition: Ambivalent

Aingst has had quite a bit of contact with farmers in eastern Damara. Still, this tribe is friendlier with strangers if they remain outside Narfell's borders.

Creel

Population: 750

Locale: Northwestern Narfell, on the banks of Icelace Lake.

Disposition: Savage

In the past, Creel might have been regarded as merely Hostile, but recent events changed that. The contingent of warriors routed by the Witch-King's undead came from this small tribe. Since their humiliation, Creel sees every foreigner as an enemy and will usually attack on sight. Even the other

Nar tribes make an effort to stay out of Creel's way these days.

Dag Nost

Population: 3,200

Locale: Southwestern Narfell along the borders of Rawlinswood, and as far as the northern fringes of the Forest of Lethyr.

Disposition: Tolerant

Dag Nost is considered by travelers to be the most civilized of the Nar tribes. Members of this tribe have occasionally traveled to the Impilturian village of Uthmerg to gain an edge in trading before the official Trade Fair gets underway.

Far Quey

Population: 2,300

Locale: Northern Narfell along the Great Glacier and on the northern banks of Icelace Lake.

Disposition: Hostile

Far Quey is a powerful tribe of exceptionally tough warriors. While this tribe can be more brutal than others, they are regarded as Hostile, not Savage. They have little contact with outsiders, and it may be that they are simply curious when a foreigner shows up in their inhospitable region. This hypothetical curiosity may be the PCs' only hope, should they wander into the clutches of Far Quey.

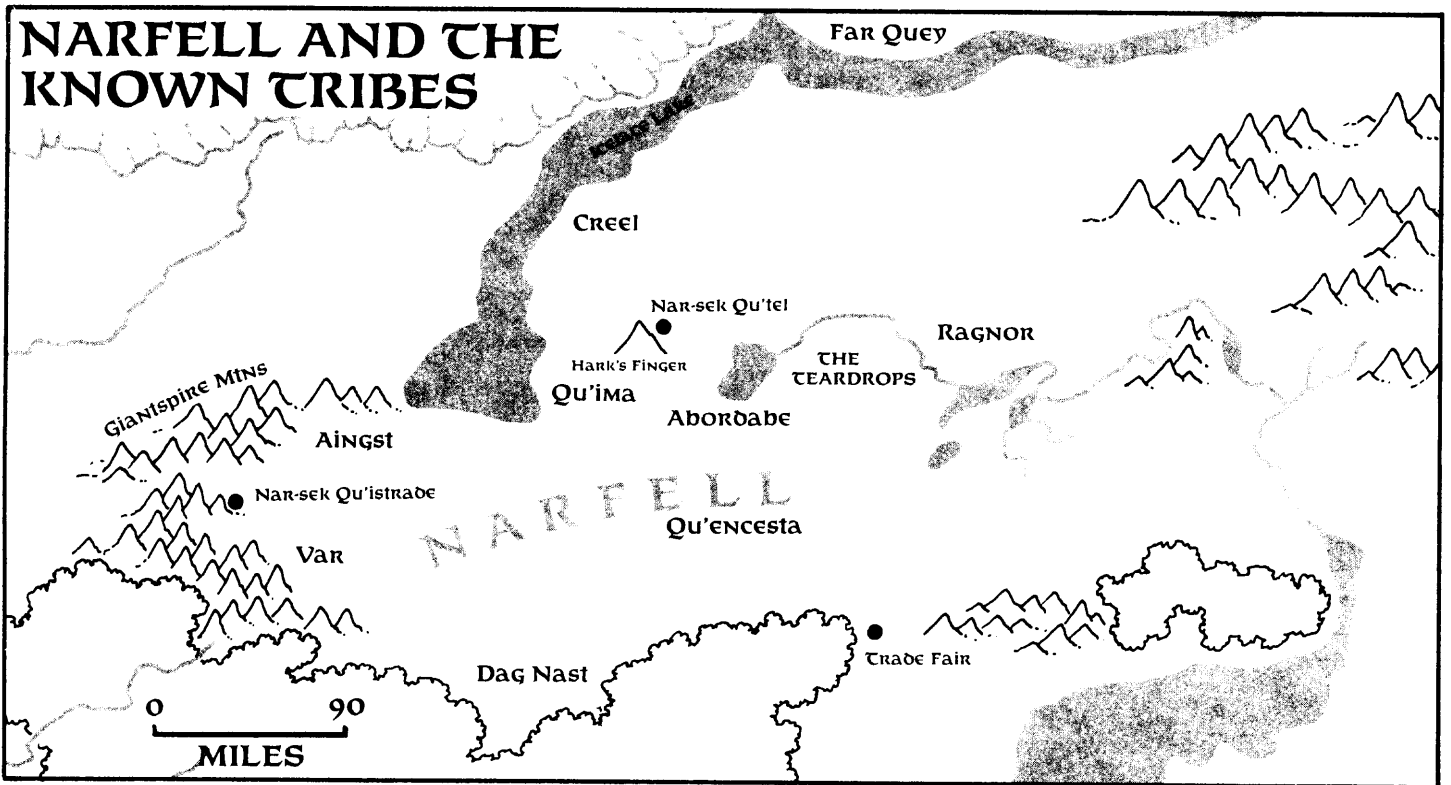

Qu'ima

Population: 1,900

Locale: West-central Narfell between Hark's Finger and the Giantspires.

Disposition: Ambivalent

Qu'ima is a middle-of-the-road tribe in all of their actions, with a tendency to blend into the background of events. Conservative by nature, they carefully weigh situations before acting, and this pause gives PCs a fair chance to walk away from Qu'ima without incident. If the PCs hoped to receive aid from this tribe, the task might prove to be more difficult!

A good example of Qu'ima's actions can be seen in their disassociation with Horse (see Movers and Shakers, p. 50). Horse is a particularly violent and anti-social renegade. Were he in the Abordabe tribe, Horse might have been executed; in a savage tribe like Qu'encesta, he would probably have become the chieftain! In a typically non-committal act, Qu'ima simply cast him out.

Population: 2,700

Locale: Central Narfell, from Icelace Lake to the northern borders of Rawlinswood.

Disposition: Savage

Qu'encesta takes the same hard line toward foreigners as does Creel, although they are on better terms with their fellow Nars. Qu'encesta firmly believes in the sovereignty and purity of Narfell, and accepts no outsiders beyond the formal gathering of the Trade Fair. PCs coming in sight of Qu'encesta will be attacked by tribesmen outnumbering them five to one. If the PCs fight bravely and survive, they might be allowed to flee over Narfell's border. (The PCs should hope the skirmish takes place near a border!) In the worst case, they would be attacked again, this time outnumbered ten to one.

Ragnor

Population: 1,900

Locale: Eastern Narfell along the Tear-drops.

Disposition: Hostile

Most of Ragnor's outside contact is with the warlike people of Ashanath and Rashemen, and there has never been any love lost between the Nars and these groups. However, if the tribe encounters PCs from elsewhere —

Damara, for example—they might talk before attacking. Brave and proud PCs could win them over, but any cowardice or hostility will be dealt with in the severest of terms.

Var

Population: 2,400

Locale: Western Narfell, in the shadows of the Giantspire Mountains.

Disposition: Tolerant

PCs would do best if their first Narfellian encounter was with Var. The large tribe is the one most often seen in Damara, even as far west as Steppenhall. Var may prove to be Gareth Dragonsbane's link to this savage land, for Chief Var appears to be quite interested in the mining gemstones out of the Giantspire Mountains. In this light, the chief eagerly questions anyone he can meet from Damara, which he views as a rich kingdom that Narfell would do well to imitate.

SOCIETIES OF THE BLOODSTONE LANDS

Those who come to the Bloodstone Lands with a self-centered and possessive attitude have learned the errors of their ways—or they have perished.

Humans dominate the region. The other, less-populous races congregate in groups of their own kind. Nevertheless, as in most frontier regions, every house may be a sanctuary to a stranger, and every door is open to a fellow in need. A halfling wandering in the Galenas would find the dwarven village of Clan Orothiar a fine stopover on his travels.

The Races

Centaurs

Centaurs are not normally thought of as one of the goodly races, usually being relegated to a description as “monsters.” The centaurs of Damara have nevertheless played an important role in the recent events of the region, though their numbers are few. Fast and stealthy, the centaurs of Bloodstone Valley provided the Bloodstone army with field communication runners and an effective contingent of archers. This centaur group is presently led by Kiros, Chief of the Council of Elders, and cannot be taken lightly when examining the delicate balance of affairs in this region. The centaurs have the allegiance of the halflings living in the Warren below them, and of the dwarves who control the Bloodstone Mines.

A second group of centaurs inhabits the edge of Rawlinswood, just beyond the fields of Tellerth in the province of Polten. They are led by the Prancer, a 5th level fighter. The Prancer has a reputation as an unpredictable, and some say dangerous, centaur with a definite distaste for the humans who have come to the edges of his domain. He exhibits tolerance only for the druids of Rawlinswood.

Dwarves

More than 5,000 dwarves inhabit Vaasa and Damara, living primarily in that stretch of the Galenas noted for rich lodes of bloodstone. The dwarves claim to have been practically the first settlers in the Bloodstone Lands, a claim that is generally accepted by the other races. They gracefully acknowledge that some folk had arrived before them: specifically, the barbarian tribe that followed the receding ice of the Great Glacier, and the monks of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose.

A number of the bearded folk earn a fine living as craftsmen in the cities of Damara, primarily in Heliogabalus and Trailsend. Armor brings a high price in a land so wrought with danger, and even the least skilled dwarves easily sell their services to those who can afford their inflated prices.

However, most dwarves are miners—wealthy miners. The largest clan, called Hillsafar, operates in the Sunderland, on the Vaasan side of the Galenas. Numbering 2,000, these mountain dwarves take mounds of bloodstone and copper from their mines, bringing most through Bloodstone Pass to Damara. They also move a fair amount through the Earthspurs to points west. Their leader, Garumbelly Hillsafar, is better known as “Grumble.” A 7th level fighter, Grumble is probably the most powerful individual in all of Vaasa at the present. Gareth Dragonsbane is anxious to parley with the dwarf as the baron develops his plans for taming the land.

The region’s only hill dwarves are those of Clan Orothiar of Bloodstone. Led by tribal chief Tokan, an 8th level fighter, this clan has perfected the art of taking and shaping the chalcedony bars, Orothiar’s numbers shrank to under 500 when the duergar closed the Bloodstone Mines. Now that the mines have been reopened, many of Clan Orothiar who wandered away are returning. The community is back to a healthy and prosperous 800 members.

There are smaller, lesser-known clans of dwarves as well. A third clan of the bearded folk operates the great forges of Ironspur, a rugged city in Groavia, on the southeastern edge of the Galenas. A fourth group works in the Earthspurs west of the Arcatan town of Tomrav, in the unclaimed region beyond the Damaran border.

On the flip side, evil duergar are known to tunnel beneath the Galenas. Uncounted but certainly numerous, these gray dwarves remain a constant threat to those who work the rich Bloodstone Mines.

Elves and Half-elves

There are no communities of elves in the Bloodstone Lands, only wandering bands, or lone travelers from the elven strongholds in the forests of Sembia across the Moonsea to the west. Elves have had no role to speak of in the building of any of the four kingdoms of the Bloodstone Lands.

More prominent here are half-elves, who are better suited to live in the company of humans. Two individuals in particular have distinguished themselves: Celedon Kierney and his cousin Rior-dan Parnell. Word has it that if these two swashbucklers had things their way, they would personally account for a dramatic increase in the numbers of their race in the region!

Speaking again of the flip side, rumors identify a large community of drow elves serving the mysterious Nentyarch under the dark boughs of Dun-Tharos. The story remains unsubstantiated, though, and the idea may simply be the logical assumption made by those who fear that the Nentyarch is a mad and evil sorcerer.

Halflings

Although no halfling would prefer this region’s brutal climate, still the small folk have managed to make for themselves a pretty good living in the Bloodstone Lands. Like the dwarves, some halflings work as craftsmen in the cities, but mostly they live in their own communities, concentrated in two distinct groups.

Halfling Downs, along the Impilturian border, is probably the highest producing farm community (per capita) in all of Damara. The tallfellow halflings here pride themselves on hard work and hard play. They live an existence well apart from the tumult of the squabbling politics of the humans.

The Waukeshire lies far to the north, in Bloodstone Valley. It is home to several hundred of the little folk who work in close association with the dwarves of Clan Orothiar and the centaurs of Warrenwood. This community makes a fine profit from the mines and the three races have built a defense pact, the Alliance of Beltwatchers, centered in the miles of formidably trapped tunnels of the Warren.

Half-orcs

Half-orcs fare better and are more plentiful in the Bloodstone Lands than in most areas of the Forgotten Realms. Though not especially favored by the people of the region—certainly the men and dwarves here have no love for orcs!—half-orcs are generally tolerated as a fact of life in every province and every city.

In mountain settlements such as Tomrav and Sudrav, half-orcs live among the humans and act as go-betweens. Their efforts smoothe humans' relations with the goblinoids of the surrounding mountains. Without the efforts of these half-breeds, these settlements might not have survived.

The breed has evolved one step further, with half-orc marrying half-orc. Thus, they are developing a culture independent of conventional orcish heritage. In the blasted ruins of the Vaasan city of Palishchuk, half-orcs are carving out their own independent community, and they live in harmony with their neighbors in Damara. Amazingly, these civilized half-orcs carry on good relations with the dwarves across the Galenas in Ironspur.

Humans

The dominant culture in the Bloodstone Lands is mankind's, with humans comprising more than 90% of all the goodly folk in the region. Damara's wealth attracted fortuneseekers and rogues from every corner of the Forgotten Realms, and the nation has long been a melting pot. Over the years, people from different backgrounds have brought to Damara a piece of their own culture, even as they were assimilated into the general milieu.

The largest group of humans resemble the Dalemen across the Dragon's Reach in both appearance and attitudes. Included in this type are most of the people of Impiltur and Damara, not excluding the noble lines of Damara. Indeed, the line of Bloodfeathers, and that of Damara's founder Feldrin, can trace bloodlines directly back to Sembia.

The tribes of Narfell represent a different group altogether. Short and stocky, their tanned skins are much darker than the average Damaran's. A Nar's hair is almost always raven-black and straight to the shoulders.

The last group of men in the Bloodstone Lands were probably the first humans in the region: the barbarians of the Great Glacier. Their hair is light, usually blond, and they have a tall, strong build.

The barbarians themselves know nothing of their history before coming into the region, and no direct evidence shows them to be related to any of the other barbarian tribes in the Forgotten Realms. However, their customs and physical appearance are too much like those of other known tribes for the similarity to be dismissed. Scholars believe that this tribe is more closely related to the tribes of Icewind Dale, whom they resemble physically, than to the more common Uthgardt tribes of the north.

Like other barbarian tribes, the people of the Great Glacier have an almost mystical symbiosis with Nature. Their totem beast, the white worm, honors a monster that presents a real and ever-present danger to their existence.

This bond with Nature, exhibited by all the barbarians of the north, may be the evidence for a common ancestry. However, all these people live a harsh, savage existence. They may simply have developed similar ideas based on a reverence for and an understanding of the awesome power of Nature such as no "civilized" man could ever experience.

Gnomes

Surface gnomes are an uncommon sight north of the Sea of Fallen Stars. No community of these little people can be found anywhere in Vaasa, Damara, Impiltur, or Narfell. Like elves, those gnomes who come to the Bloodstone Lands are wandering bands or solitary fortune-hunters.

The svirfneblin, the deep gnomes, are a different matter. In a huge cavern under the Bloodstone Mines sits Deep-earth, a city of more than 800 svirfneblin. Ruled by good King Rugardo, these svirfneblin are intricately united with the societies of surface dwellers in the area, and the relationship is one of mutual benefit.

Other groups of deep gnomes are reported to live in peaceful solitude under the Earthspurs.

MONSTERS

Goblinkin and Giantkind

Goblins and orcs are more numerous than all the other races in the Bloodstone Lands combined. Yet they have failed to dominate the region because, like their kin everywhere, they are too petty and self-centered to organize themselves into a united force. The tribes are countless; every mountain seems to support its own clan. Induction into the Witch-King's vast army hardly made a dent in the numbers of potential recruits living in the dark holes of the mountains.

The Giantspire Mountains, on the Damara-Narfell border, are a veritable breeding ground for hobgoblins, bugbears and ogres. Travelers to the mountains in the region had better be prepared to face these formidable enemies. This is their territory, and they tend to travel in groups of a dozen or more.

Giants are also prevalent in the mountains. Most common are the stone giants, and there are a few scattered bands of hill giants. Generally, these monsters don't bother the villages, having enough sport harrassing the goblins and orcs crawling all about them. On the rare occasions that they do come into human territory, the giants create serious problems, because even a small band can do an incredible amount of damage in a very short time. One particularly nasty group of stone giants, called the Thunkers, has been making trouble more frequently in the area.

Tundra yeti

If the uncivilized mountains belong to the goblins and giants, then the empty grasslands and tundra of the north are the domain of the fearsome tundra yeti. Not a gregarious creature, the tundra yeti usually roam alone or in small bands. Their shaggy coats camouflage them, and they hide unseen until it is too late for the victim.

The tundra yeti are a serious, seemingly unstoppable problem. On Narfell's grasslands, they kill more than 200 people and twice that number of horses annually. The Nars have launched numerous efforts, coordinated among the tribes, to clear specified areas. Long lines of horsemen sweep across miles of grassland and dozens of the savage beasts die. In no time, this "newly-tamed land" reverts to being dangerous wilderness, and the yeti seem no less numerous.

Remorhaz

Among the broken blocks at the fringes of the Great Glacier live the remorhaz, the polar worms. They are even more prevalent among the high frozen peaks of the Earthspurs. Rarely seen outside of these isolated areas, the remorhaz remain a popular symbol of the far cold reaches of the Bloodstone Lands. Within the boundaries of their predictable domains, the polar worms are supreme and unconquerable. The people who live nearby survive by understanding and respecting them.

The barbarians of the Great Glacier worship the remorhaz as a patron deity, and the glacier in the Earthspurs is aply named the Glacier of the White Worm. The monks of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose use the remorhaz to test their discipline. The monks share the worms' environment, living not in conflict with the creatures, but in harmony. They have even perfected a technique for riding the beasts!

Dragons

Until very recently, dragons were not a familiar sight in the Bloodstone Lands. An occasional white would come down from the Great Glacier, or some other terror would drift in from the desolate wastelands north of Thar. But these solitary monsters never found much plunder, and they usually flew off before they became much of a problem.

Things have changed. In the ruins of Castle Perilous, evil dragons of all colors are congregating. One estimate puts their number at 50, and a huge group of whites is reportedly preparing to come down from the frozen wastes of the Great Glacier. Such a flight would double that number. The evil dragons are enraged by the defeat of Tiamat, their Queen, and are gathering to seek revenge on Tiamat's conquerors, Gareth Dragonsbane and his friends. Clearly, dragons are about to become a major influence in the area.

Other Nasty Things

The Bloodstone Lands are filled with danger. Gblinkin and giantkind, tundra yeti, remorhaz, and dragons comprise the majority of foes for the daring adventurers to deal with, but these are not the only monsters roaming the region. White-furred snakes, polar bears, white puddings, moon dogs, winter wolves, and nearly every other animal and monster found in a cold wilderness area can be encountered here. Any one of them would enjoy making a meal of an unlucky fool. And, like every other place in the Forgotten Realms that men have not brought the land fully under control, the stench of troll is not an uncommon odor.

Language

Modern common tongue is the predominant language of Damara, Impiltur, and Narfell. A bastardized form of the language, mixing common and dwarvish, is the argot of Vaasa. PCs speaking only common will be understood when visiting in Darmshall and other communities of Vaasa, but they may have a hard time understanding this odd dialect when it is spoken to them.

In remote mountain settlements such as Tomrav, orcish has become the second tongue, taught to every child. This is a simple matter of survival. More than one person from Tomrav has had to talk his way out of an orcan stewing pot! Language eases communication between the races, and has led to a quieter, if not completely peaceful, coexistence between man and orc in this region.

Currency

"If it's good anywhere else, it's good in Damara!" This popular saying spread among Damaran vendors since the currency of bloodstone bars collapsed. Damaran merchants are true traders, and they will deal in almost any country's currency. They will usually accept even the old chalcedony bars, for many Damaran merchants foresee the return of the bloodstone bar currency with the restoration of the kingdom. A few are even hoarding the stuff!

Vaasan attitudes towards currency are similar to those found farther south. However, bartered supplies are more welcome than coins—gold pieces make terrible windbreaks against a winter wind! Similarly, the people of Narfell prefer barter to coins. Recall, however, that the Nars have a definite weakness for gems and jewels, and a crafty jeweller may get twice the worth of his goods in trade for Narfellian stallions.

Impiltur mints its own money in the city of Hlammach. The coins bear the crossed sword and wand on one side, and "Imphras" etched along the border. Like everyone else, the merchants of Impiltur will deal in any currency, but the government levies a 3% Kingdom Tax on all purchases made with outside coinage.

Religion

Religion plays an important role for the people of the Bloodstone Lands. Rare is the individual who, over a span of years, has not seen death close at hand in this harsh territory. But though the people follow their chosen gods with dedication, they generally tolerate the ways of other religions. In this land, deadly monsters and deadlier weather are never far away, and there is no room for religious persecution, or religious separatism.

Baron Gareth Dragonsbane and Baroness Christine of Bloodstone are choice examples of this tolerance. Gareth is a lawful good paladin serving Ilmater; his wife Christine is a practicing druid of Silvanus! Simply put, the people of the Bloodstone Lands never let religion get in the way of living.

Ilmater, god of endurance and suffering, is a favorite of Damarans. The yellow rose, symbol of St. Sollars the Twice-Martyred, is a common sight in the land. Even those who live by other faiths feel a closeness to this long-dead patriarch. Anyone who has lived in this land of hardships knows the virtue of endurance in the face of suffering.

St. Dionysus is also honored here. Recently, construction of a huge cathedral has begun in Goliad. The construction was financed by a gift of gems and gold plundered from the lair of Tiamat by Friar Dugald, who is an associate of Baron Gareth. Some say the church is Gareth's political move to win over the people of Brandiar. However, those who know Friar Dugald do not question his dedication to St. Dionysus, though they might wink at the secondary motives behind the location of the church.

Impiltur sustains numerous sects and factions. The Lords of Imphras II call themselves "Holy Warriors of Suffering," a clear reference to the god Ilma-

ter. However, their choice does not constrain others, and Impiltur is truly a land of choice. Every city has many different places of worship, all tolerated by both the people and the leaders of the kingdom.

Among the fierce Nars it is Tempus, the Lord of Battles, who rules supreme. Speculation proposes that the barbarians of White Worm also pay homage to the Lord of Battles. This would link them yet more tightly with their suspected kin, the barbarians of Icewind Dale, but this preference has not yet been proven.

Evil beings have their own gods and their own interests in the region. Although Orcus and his foul kind have been forever banished from the Bloodstone Lands, priests of the goat's head continue to flourish among the goblinoids and evil humans. Their power structure was simply too entrenched to be thrown down, even with the defeat of their wretched god-figure.

In the wilds of the Galenas and the Earthspurs, another favorite is Skoraesus Stonebones, King of the Rock and god of the stone giants. Travelers in the mountains will often come across huge stone cairns built in honor of Skoraesus. His followers view the numerous stone giants as the true rulers of the mountain passes, and include many goblinoids as well as giants. Those goblinoids whose tribes worship Skoraesus have a longer life expectancy than others in stone giant country, so one wonders how much of their piety to Skoraesus is sincere, and how much is simple pragmatism!

Character Classes

Nearly every character class has made some mark in the Bloodstone Lands, but fighters are particularly noted. After all, everyday life in these lands is an adventure in itself! Almost everyone not practicing some other adventuring profession is at least a 1st level fighter.

PCs of any character class can adventure themselves in this yet-untamed region. Vaasa particularly needs adventurers, and experience is not a hard thing to achieve—though survival might be a different story!

Clerics

Every community in Impiltur and in Damara supports at least one chapel, and often several. As noted in the previous section, religion plays an important role in the lives of these people, and clerics are well-respected even by those not of the same faiths.

Like anywhere else, individual clerics in the Bloodstone Lands differ widely in their views on the proper lifestyle for a man of the cloth. Given their honored status, high-level clerics can pretty much decide for themselves the magnitude of their personal wealth and possessions. Many remain ascetic paupers, going among their flock as friends and advisors. But some, mostly in the larger cities, number among the wealthiest and most flamboyant people in all Damara.

Other pious individuals strike out into the mountain regions as missionaries for their chosen faith. Often they try to convert even the goblinoids to their viewpoint, and sometimes they meet with success. Often, though, missionaries simply disappear.

But whatever their faith or their practices, clerics thrive in the more civilized areas. The people here are eager to establish a good position in the afterlife, and most will go out of their way not to anger anyone in contact with the higher planes.

Among the Nars, shamans are honored even above the tribal chief. Tempus is the sole god of these people, and the Nars do not exhibit the religious tolerance common elsewhere. Clerics of other faiths would be wise to keep their beliefs very private when venturing into Narfell.

Evil clerics, like those of the goat's head religion, now find themselves severely limited in spell selection, especially in the higher level spells. With Orcus banished, there's no one left for them to commune with! Nevertheless, these foul priests continue to recruit promising acolytes.

Druids

Druids are fairly common in the Bloodstone Lands, compared to their presence in other parts of the Realms. They worship Silvanus, and may be even more prominent than suspected, for such people tend to be secretive about their beliefs and practices, and they are rarely interested in the affairs of state. The Baroness Christine seems to be an exception.

Baroness Christine and her friends practice this most ancient religion in the Waukeshire of Bloodstone. A second community of druids is said to operate beyond Tellerth in Rawlinswood.

Fighters

The sword is more common than the hoe in Vaasa, Damara, and Narfell, and even in many regions of civilized Impiltur. This should come as no surprise, since most of this region has been at war to a greater or lesser extent for the last 12 years. Even before the Witch-King, most villages saw trouble from evil humanoids or monsters at least once a season.

So, rare is the person in this region who is unfamiliar with the use of a weapon. "Zero-level" NPCs are unusual, greatly outnumbered by more advanced individuals. Common are first, second and even third level fighters. Training is mostly a thing of trial and error—if you win, you live to fight another day.

Rangers

Foremost stand the rangers among the successful heroes of the land. Wilderness knowledge is a survival trait, and an understanding of goblinkin and giantkind confers a major advantage.

Mining towns treat rangers well, even those that are exclusively dwarven. Town leaders will usually hire wandering folk of this profession for some mission or other. A common saying:

"Goblins are never more than a peak away!" expresses reality of life in the Galenas and the Earthspurs. Thus, knowledge about these creatures, and of how to defeat them, is never treated lightly.

Paladins

Paladins do surprisingly well in both Impiltur and Damara. The Lords of Imphras II are holy warriors, as is Gareth Dragonsbane. When construction is complete, the Damaran Gate will be a fortress of the Order of the Golden Cup, Gareth's order of paladins. According to plan, this immense castle at the southern end of the Bloodstone Pass will house 500 fighters. The more paladins Gareth can attract to his ranks, the better.

Generally, paladins of the Bloodstone Lands are more tolerant of "common folk," than their snooty peers elsewhere in the Forgotten Realms. That might account for their success here, for aloof people in Damara tend to find themselves alone; and people alone tend to wind up dead!

In Narfell, where Tempus reigns supreme, a fighter closely tied to some other god might find himself unwelcome, to say the least. But the Nars are pragmatic, above everything else. They accept the Lords of Imphras II, and don't seem opposed to the rise of Gareth in Damara. This "tolerance" is extended to these rulers just so long as they keep their heresies within their own borders!

Magic-Users and Illusionists

Generally, practitioners of the magic arts tend to thrive in more civilized regions, where day-to-day needs do not outweigh the pursuit of higher learning. Still, those wizards casting spells in the Bloodstone Lands often find great pleasure and support in their unique status among the people.

The cities of Lyrabar and Hlammach in Impiltur both house minor schools of magic. These schools mostly dedicate themselves to the arts that can benefit the trading fleets. A wizard proficient in gusts of wind, for example, can make a small fortune hiring onto a merchant vessel whose captain fears pirates and still air.

No wizards' schools currently exist in Damara, although that may change once the politics of the kingdom are settled. Emelyn the Gray and Myrddin Vili-goth have talked of the need for such a school in the area. Vaasa and Narfell are too wild for such sophisticated arts, although a magic-user could certainly find ways to be useful, and ultimately accepted, on the Vaasan frontier. The clannish Nars might be a bit tougher to win over.

Illusionists here, as elsewhere, are quite rare, but there seems to be some potential for the class. The svirfneblin gnomes of Deepearth are skilled in the art, and they are anxious to tie themselves closer to the surface dwellers of the region. One possibility that has been discussed in their caverns is to open a school for would-be illusionists. Even if there is no school any time soon, an aspiring illusionist could find a willing mentor among the friendly svirfneblin.

Thieves

The hard-working people of Damara and Vaasa and the fighting Nars have little tolerance for common thieves. But sneaky folk using their talents to scout for a community's enemies usually find themselves as much in demand as rangers are. Bloodstone's growing network of scouts, known as Spysong, is always willing to sign on a new thief, providing he or she can stand up to tests of honor and truth. Spysong has no room for double agents slipping into their intelligence organization.

Thieves have strong guilds in Heliogabalus, and in the major cities of Impiltur. Every large city in the Forgotten Realms has come to accept thievery as an unavoidable fact of life, and the cities of the Bloodstone Lands are no different. City-dwellers co-exist with thieves who confine their activities to grudgingly-accepted guidelines, preferring that to battling the miscreants for every inch of turf. On occasion, the connections are less hostile—Dimian Ree, heir-apparent to the Damaran throne, is reputedly a close friend to the thieves in Heliogabalus, specifically the guild called Tightpurse. That tie does not reflect well on the Baron of Morov's reputation among the folk of the outlying rural settlements.

For the more evil thieves and thugs, the assassins' guild remains a prominent force in the Galenas. Even the most optimistic citizens of Damara doubt that the bandit army will ever be completely eradicated from those mountains.

Monks

Only one order of monks exists in the Bloodstone Lands, the disciples of St.

Sollars. High up in the Earthspurs, the Monastery of the Yellow Rose is a massive fortress housing as many as 750 monks. The brothers of this monastery receive the greatest respect wherever they travel, even among the Nars in Narfell. They are known to all as loyal allies and deadly enemies.

Delicate matters are routine to the monks. A contingent of brothers from the monastery traveled to Carmathan to examine the authenticity of Helmont the 15th's claims of royal lineage. Even those with no love for the monastery are careful to keep clandestine any activities directed against the monks, and thus, Helmont had no choice but to accept them with a facade of cooperation.

Generally, the monks of the Bloodstone Lands do not try to force their beliefs on anyone. In this, they are like the clerics and paladins of the region, going about their business secure in their faith.

Wandering monks traveling in the region will usually receive the same high respect given to the Order of the Yellow Rose. That is, unless they act in a way unbecoming one of their station!

Evil monks have never been a factor here. The Grandfather of Assassins would nevertheless be delighted to get someone in his court who could infiltrate the Monastery of the Yellow Rose!

Bards

Bards are somewhat rare all across the Forgotten Realms, and they are not a commonly-seen class eaten today in Damara. However, they are as well represented here as anywhere else in the Realms.

One notable bard, Riordan Parnell, heads Spysong, the scouting network working for Bloodstone. Parnell would be more than willing to recruit others of his profession into the business.

CITIES, TOWNS, AND VILLAGES

With scanty farmland and wide-spread mines, the Bloodstone Lands support numerous small-scale settlements. Farming and mining communities dot the Damaran countryside. Many are unnamed clusters of houses, but others are formally established, and continue to endure as long-standing communities.

Impiltur's population is concentrated in the cities. Once independent city-states, those four large cities house approximately three-quarters of the kingdom's entire population. The Nars of Narfell are nomadic, with no permanent settlements to call home. Untamed Vaasa is mostly uninhabited bogland.

Bay Town

Population: 1,750

Bay Town is the community that the twelve Lords of Imphras II would most like to forget. Dominating Traders Bay in central Impiltur, Bay Town shelters thieves and pirates, smugglers and other unseemly types of every profession. The leaders of Impiltur acknowledge that thieves and rogues will carve a niche for themselves somewhere, so they simply turn their eyes away from the goings-on. In truth, they prefer to keep the scum confined to one area, preferably one of minimal importance, and Bay Town fits that bill. PCs wandering into the town are likely to be "invited" to serve as slaves on one of the many pirate ships—an offer they may find difficult to refuse!

Bloodstone Village

The seat of the House of Tranth, Bloodstone Village is more notably the capital of the Barony of Bloodstone. The city is as rich in heroes as in chalcedony, and undoubtedly the fastest growing power center in the region. Bloodstone Village would certainly become the capital of the Kingdom of Bloodstone if Vaasa and Damarara are so united.

A high wall surrounds Bloodstone Village, but its gates are always open. In the past, the people of Bloodstone Village were either miners or tradesmen, but today the city has a more balanced flavor because of the recent influx of merchants and adventurers.

All the goodly races are welcome here. More than 6,000 of the citizens are human, but halflings and dwarves abound. Even the half-orcs from Palishchuk appear with increasing frequency.

Bloodstone Village keeps no formal militia at this time, except for the Baron's palace guard. However, the most formidable and loyal army in all Damara is only a few hours away, at the Vaasan and Damaran Gates.

Brotha

Population: 400

Brotha is an agricultural community five miles west of Portith in the Barony of Ostel. The farms here are quite productive, making this mid-sized town an important factor in Ostel's independence.

The people of Brotha truly despise Ostel's ruling Baroness Sylvia. These proud and honest farmers view the sorceress as a trickster and a liar, with no allegiance to anything but filling her treasurehouse. Rumor has it that Mayor Tom Haystacks has sent a secret note to the Twilight Riders, asking them to aid Brotha in its struggle to dethrone Sylvia. At the very least, Brotha is developing closer relations with Brandiar, whose people are lining up against Dimian Ree, the ruler who is Baroness Sylvia's closest ally.

Daleport

Population: 125

Daleport came into being when a group of ambitious bargemen saw the opportunity to offer merchants and travelers crossing the Morov-Polten line a better option than to take the King's Road or Dalen's Ford (both of which pass through a stretch of bogland). The road is so bad that the extra ten miles up the Icelace River to the Ford can take a laden caravan as much as two hard days of travel, so until recently the bargemen have done well.

Ever since Polten began slipping away from its alliance with Morov and Ostel, business for the Daleport barges has been slowing down. The people of Daleport fear they may soon be pressed into a more ominous service—transporting troops—if the baronies go to war.

On a lighter side, Daleport is also known for the Barge House, a tavern of wild reputation. Formerly a warehouse, the Barge House is a huge establishment, seating 500 comfortably. The majority of the Daleport population can be found here each night making quiet deals with those passing through. Barge owners are known to engage in some smuggling with certain less-than-reputable patrons. In fact, during a visit to the Barge House, a person can get, or can find out where to get, anything he or she desires.

Darmshall

Population: 600

As much a fortress as a city, Darmshall is a bastion of security in the hostile land of Vaasa. Its usual population is only 600, but Darmshall has sheltered nearly ten times that number for extended periods in times of peril. A towering wall surrounds Darmshall, lined with weapons of war and grim-faced guards. Huge storerooms of food and supplies fill a secret tunnel complex beneath the city, stockpiled against times of need.

The construction of Darmshall was funded by an adventuring band called Tenblades, a group active during the early explorations of Vaasa. After two members of Tenblades were murdered, the group's stubborn leader Romas Thunderclap wanted to get back at the vile inhabitants of the district. He built Darmshall, a mighty fortress, to be a perpetual thorn in the side of those evil beings claiming dominion of the land.

Romas must have been smiling in his grave for the last decade. Although the Witch-King claimed all of Vaasa, he never conquered Darmshall, though 1,000 goblin corpses rotted on the fields surrounding the city.

Dilpur

Population: 15,000

For a very long time, Dilpur was the smallest and least important of the Impilturian city-states. When trade from Damara declined, and Sarshel fell, many of the refugees from Sarshel settled in Dilpur, the next closest city. The population nearly doubled. Dilpur quickly expanded its docks, and a new wall is under construction to encompass the sprawling additions built onto the city over the last few years.

The three lords who rule Dilpur are concerned for the future of their city. The Lords Imbraun, Soargilm, and Sambrar recognize the potential for renewed trade with Damara. While Impiltur as a whole would benefit greatly, a renewed flow of bloodstone from the north might prove disastrous for Dilpur. The lords must wonder how many citizens might return to Sarshel if trade resumes. Therefore, when planning new additions to the city, the lords are proceeding cautiously. Their efforts focus on improving areas like the docks, areas that will prove useful even if the new arrivals do not remain.

Population: 1,100

Dunfee is Impiltur's most important mining town. Located in the southeastern corner of the Earthspurs, Dunfee is barely a stone's throw from the Damaran border. The people of Dunfee have close ties with their neighbors: their fellow miners in Sudrav, the Carmathan nobles in Ravensburg, and the farmers in Zarach. In fact, they are becoming Zarach's principal market for foodstuffs.

Dunfee's proximity to Damara brings watchful eyes and ears into the town. One or more of the Lords of Imphras II are almost always present. If not one of them, then their Heralds are here. They watch the continuing political struggle in the north and patiently gather information.

Population: 900

A closely-walled city amid sprawling fields and scattered farmhouses, Goliad is both the seat of power for the Duchy of Brandiar, and a war-time refuge for the nearby farmers. Only 250 people regularly reside within the walls, but its stated population includes the many farmers who rely on it to be home base and a shelter.

Twice battered, Goliad serves as a testament to the teachings of Ilmater, the god of endurance and suffering, simply because it continues to exist. When the Witch-King proved victorious at the first battle at the ford, Goliad was literally flattened and its people sent fleeing across the land. But they returned and rebuilt—only to have it flattened again when the armies returned for a rematch.

This time, though, the good guys won. The people of Goliad received considerable assistance pulling their city back together for the second time. The Church of Dionysus will soon be completed, and it is sure to be one of the most impressive structures in the region, a symbol of the unyielding will of the brave people of Goliad and all Brandiar.

Heliogabalus

Second-largest city in the Bloodstone Lands, Heliogabalus has long been Damara's center of power and trade. Like large cities elsewhere in the Forgotten Realms, Heliogabalus is a place of many textures. The guilds are here: the Damaran thieves' guild, the merchants guild, and the various trade guilds. Here also may be found the lures of the underworld, easy to contact in the many darkened taverns.

Until the reign of Zhengyi, Heliogabalus enjoyed the singular status of being a separate province of Damara. When the provinces were proclaimed independent, Dimian Ree moved his seat of power from Morovar to Heliogabalus, and annexed the city into Morov's realm.

The people of Heliogabalus raised no objections to Ree's actions. Independent, and loyal to no one outside their respective guilds, the people here rarely object to anything unless it interferes with day-to-day business.

Heliogabalus has its finger on the pulse of Damara's economy. Astride every trade route of road and waterway, Heliogabalus will always have a dominant role in the region's politics, even if the official seat of power moves to Bloodstone Village. The merchants' power, bolstered by their ties to foreign lands, cannot be threatened by proclamation of a new capital city. If the new baron expects his Kingdom of Bloodstone to succeed, he will have to coax the powerful guildmasters of Heliogabalus into his fold.

Helmsdale

Population: 80

Helmsdale suffered greatly throughout the reign of the Witch-King, serving as Zhengyi's base of operations in Damara from his first invasion until his defeat almost 12 years later. Now the town is often referred to as "the cursed village."

Originally a quiet farming community, Helmsdale once harbored a population of 500, mostly farmers whose produce largely went to support the dwarves of Ironspur. The Last Outpost was a favorite tavern for anyone traveling the King's Road north of Goliad.

Helmsdale's population exploded to 4,000 when the Witch-King's army rolled in. None of the original inhabitants of Helmsdale managed to get out before the army overran the city. Of the 500 who surrendered to Zhengyi during the first year of the Vaasan War, only 78 survived to see the Witch-King defeated. Most of those have since remained in Helmsdale, and a few newcomers have trickled in.

Like every other community in Damara, Helmsdale is stubbornly determined to survive. With help from Ironspur and from the Bloodstone army, the final reminders of Zhengyi's vile reign have been swept from the village. On unanimous decision of the people of Helmsdale, the first structure rebuilt was the Last Outpost.

Hlammach

Like all the important Impilturian cities, Hlammach is a major seaport. Walled and compact, the city is home to merchants, tradesmen, and sailors. Her docks are extensive and always filled with laden ships, for Hlammach is the final stopover before the village of Uthmerg and the trade road going east.

Before the unification of Impiltur, Hlammach was second only to Lyrabar in importance, because the city controlled the entire northwestern corner of the Sea of Fallen Stars. Hlammach's principal rival was Sarshel, and relations between the two cities were never friendly. Even today, under the united banner of Impiltur, relations between the people of Hlammach and Sarshel remain cool. (This partly explains why those who deserted Sarshel when trade fell off settled in small, unimportant Dilpur.)

Hlammach retains great importance today as the center of Impilturian economic planning, being the location of the kingdom's mint. War-Captains Imbra, Silmgar, and Lashilaun work to maintain a level of currency proportionate to the true wealth of the kingdom.

Ilmwatch

Population: 560

More a fortress than a city, Ilmwatch stands on the north bank of the infamous Buzzard Beak Harbor. It protects merchants traveling to and from Damara, and those who cross the Easting Reach to Uthmerg. Patrols from Ilmwatch regularly visit Uthmerg and the string of small villages that dot the road north. Mulltown, Guidodale, Maracrath, and Cairnpur are overnight stops along the Merchant's Run, part of the Herald's Road. Contingents from the garrison often accompany merchants journeying south.

Kinbrace

Kinbrace covers more than 25 square miles of land. Nestled in the verdant valley of the Galena River, the city is surrounded by productive farms scattered across the broad grasslands of Soravia. Farmers often informally joined forces in Kinbrace before continuing south with their goods. This gave Kinbrace a solid lock on shipping coming down from the northern reaches of Damara.

Unlike most of the towns in this hostile land, Kinbrace has no wall. Instead, its perimeter is anchored by six impressive castles. Each of these is ruled by an independent landowner. Generally, the owners work together, understanding the advantages of unity. But feuds have occurred in the past, and the ruling families have been as interested in their own profits as in the common good.

This shortsightedness contributed to the ease with which Zhengyi took Kinbrace. He named it as the capital of Soravia, but his puppet-Duke was quickly thrown down. With the Witch-King's fall, Kinbrace has returned to its informal existence, as has Soravia in general.

Lyrabar

Population: 32,000

The great port of Lyrabar is the largest city in the Bloodstone Lands. Impiltur's capital, the city is ruled by the twelve Lords of Imphras II. The castle of Kyrtraun stands within its walls, as does Tower Pureheart. The rising spire of the Tower can be seen for many miles. The most beautiful and dominant structure in the city is the golden-domed palace of Queen Sambryl.

Lyrabar is long and narrow, a strip city arrayed along the waterfront. Her docks are extensive and her fleet is the envy of all the region, floating numerous warships and merchant vessels.

Westernmost of the major cities of Impiltur, Lyrabar maintains good relations with the independent city-state of Procampur. Good relations also exist with the nations bordering the Dragon Reach, and those on the western banks of the Sea of Fallen Stars.

Morovar

Once the thriving capital of the Barony of Morov, Morovar is on the decline. Forsaken by Baron Dimian Ree when he moved the seat of power to Heliogabalus, the city seems to have lost its spirit. Most of Morov's nobles have abandoned Morovar to follow the baron, and no ruling body remains. In times of trouble, the remaining militia are hard to organize and workers are slow to respond.

Not surprisingly, many citizens resent Dimian Ree's move south. They feel deserted and cheated, and malcontents are quite common in this once-proud city. Some even say Morovar should transfer its loyalties to the province of Brandiar, though most know that would be a daring and dangerous move.

Regardless of its present difficulties, the high-walled city retains its importance as a port on the Goliad River. Morovar also serves as a collection market for the produce farmed in the fertile lands of the barony.

Mulltown

Population: 250

Typical of the Impilturian villages is Mulltown, the first stopover for caravans moving south down Merchant's Run from Damara. Many of the smaller cities in Impiltur support the trading routes to and from the four major city-states. Defensible Mulltown offers well-managed inns and skilled smithies, and is a perfect example of a community whose role is service to visitors.

New Sarshel

The recently-completed structures of New Sarshel stand across the water from the city of Sarshel. Built out of defiance for the old city, New Sarshel does its utmost to steal merchants and sailors away from its namesake.

The construction of New Sarshel was financed by a committee of fifteen merchants, disgruntled by the city's apparent indifference to its decline in the wake of the Damaran disaster. The founders of New Sarshel have an aggressive hunger for trade from the east. But convincing trade to come to the new city is not an easy task. Certainly the great port of Hlammach will offer no assistance! Bettors get even odds that the new city will not survive the next winter.

Ostrav

Population: 200

Isolated in the grasslands of Arcata, the small farming community of Ostrav has weathered the winters and the Witch-King without breaking a sweat. Politically neutral, Ostrav has some of the friendliest inns in all the land. The townspeople of Ostrav plod trustingly from day to day, cordial to strangers who wish to stop over and wipe the dust of the road from their boots.

Palishchuk

Population: 750

One of the most unusual settlements in all the Realms, Palishchuk is inhabited by half-orcs. After the fall of the Witch-King, the half-orcs of the region claimed the ruined city of Palishchuk and rebuilt.

What makes this settlement doubly unusual is the half-orcs' determination to integrate themselves with the goodly societies of the land. The rulers of Palishchuk have made peaceful overtures to all their neighbors. They have extended their hands to their Vaasan kin in Darmshall, to the rising powers in Bloodstone, and even to the dwarves across the Galenas in Ironspur. Remarkably, the people of Darmshall and Bloodstone fully accept Palishchuk as a neighbor and ally.

Even most of the Ironspur dwarves have learned to place a little trust in the half-orc community. Only Clan Hillsafar refuses to put aside the long-standing antipathy between dwarves and half-orcs, but even that may be changing. Surly Grumble, head of the Hillsafar dwarves, seems to be mellowing in his attitude, and his fellows are likely to follow his lead. With everything initially against it, Palishchuk may yet become one of the region's greatest successes.

Portith

Population: 1,200

Portith is a medium-sized town on the west bank of Lake Mogador in the Damaran province of Ostel. A convenient stopover between two prominent Damaran cities, Praka and Heliogabalus, Portith is known for fine inns and craftsmen.

Portith may be the only Damaran city that could flourish without help from any other community. In addition to the fine trading and crafting facilities, fishing and farm yields are productive enough support Portith's population in the worst of years.

Praka

Smaller only than Heliogabalus, Praka had long been Damara's second-loudest voice in government. A city of tall walls and sky-reaching towers, Praka is a beautiful settlement, aesthetically pleasing and readily defensible. Here live many of Damara's true artists, and their work touches everything. Even the regalia of the Prakan militia is richly decorated.

In olden times, the head of House Praka was well-beloved by his or her subjects. Usually the ruling Baron of Ostel would be appointed steward to Damara's throne in the absence of the king. Those days are gone.

Today Praka finds itself more and more isolated, even from the cities in its own province. The Baroness Sylvia was put in place by the Witch-King's agents, and she is generally despised. Her arrogant and selfish policies have embarrassed the loyal people of this proud province. She has been particularly criticized for her unsympathetic attitudes toward the brave soldiers who helped defeat the Vaasan army and free Damara from the Witch-King's foul clutches. Huddled and desperate behind Praka's walls, Sylvia and her cohorts find only one hand held out to them: the equally desperate grasp of Dimian Ree.

Ravensburg

Ravensburg, capital of Carmathan, faces a dilemma similar to Praka's: the Duke of Carmathan, Theodorus, is not loved. Now formally named Helmont the 15th, Theodorus has used misinformation to deflect any outward signs of that hatred, but the people are unhappy nevertheless.

In fact, the Carmathans are unhappy with the whole lot of would-be rulers. Gulled by the web of their Duke's constant lies, they distrust Gareth Dragonsbane and his proposed Kingdom of Bloodstone. Yet, for all that the people dislike Theodorus, they hate Dimian Ree even more.

So today Ravensburg is a city of intrigue and whispers. Agents of Dimian Ree and Gareth Dragonsbane stalk the alleys, spreading their tales to anyone who will listen. The monks of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose are closely investigating Theodorus' claim to the duchy. Like Ostel, Carmathan is a proud and noble province with a long history of loyalty to the old Damaran kingdom. The people are determined to do the right thing—if they can find out what it is!

Beyond the intrigue, day-to-day Ravensburg devotes much of its energy to warehousing the produce from surrounding farms. Like Kinbrace in Soravia, which has a similar economic slant, Ravensburg's long, low warehouses sprawl over many square miles. The city proper bustles with tradesmen, mostly leatherworkers and metalworkers crafting farming equipment.

Ravensburg hosts a well-known springtime horse market. A huge equine breed known as the Carmathan Red, or the Carmathan Horse-Ox, is dealt almost exclusively during this fair. The reputation of the Carmathan Red is that of an exceptionally strong and durable plowhorse, and the beasts have been favored by farmers throughout the Bloodstone Lands for a long time. The horses were starting to draw interest from traders and farmers all along the Sea of Fallen Stars until Zhengyi's wars isolated Damara. As conditions have stabilized, that interest has been rekindling.

Sarshel

Sarshel is a walled city with extensive dock facilities. Seaside Palace is the city's main structure and governing house; the palace houses Lords Rilaunyr and Silaunbrar. The 200-room complex includes a covered wharf complex, which harbors Rilaunyr's Warship, the flagship of the extensive Sarshel fleet.

Sarshel is the largest Impilturian city close to Damara and points east, and for many years it served as the primary port for Damaran merchants. Since the Witch-King's rise halted Damaran trade, the city has suffered. Once a flourishing city of 18,000, Sarshel has shrivelled to only a third its former size.

Lately Sarshel has been eclipsed by Hlammach, a city better equipped to handle the east-west trade routes. Still, the people remaining in Sarshel are proud and stubborn. They sail onto the Sea of Fallen Stars often enough to bring them an ample piece of the trading pie.

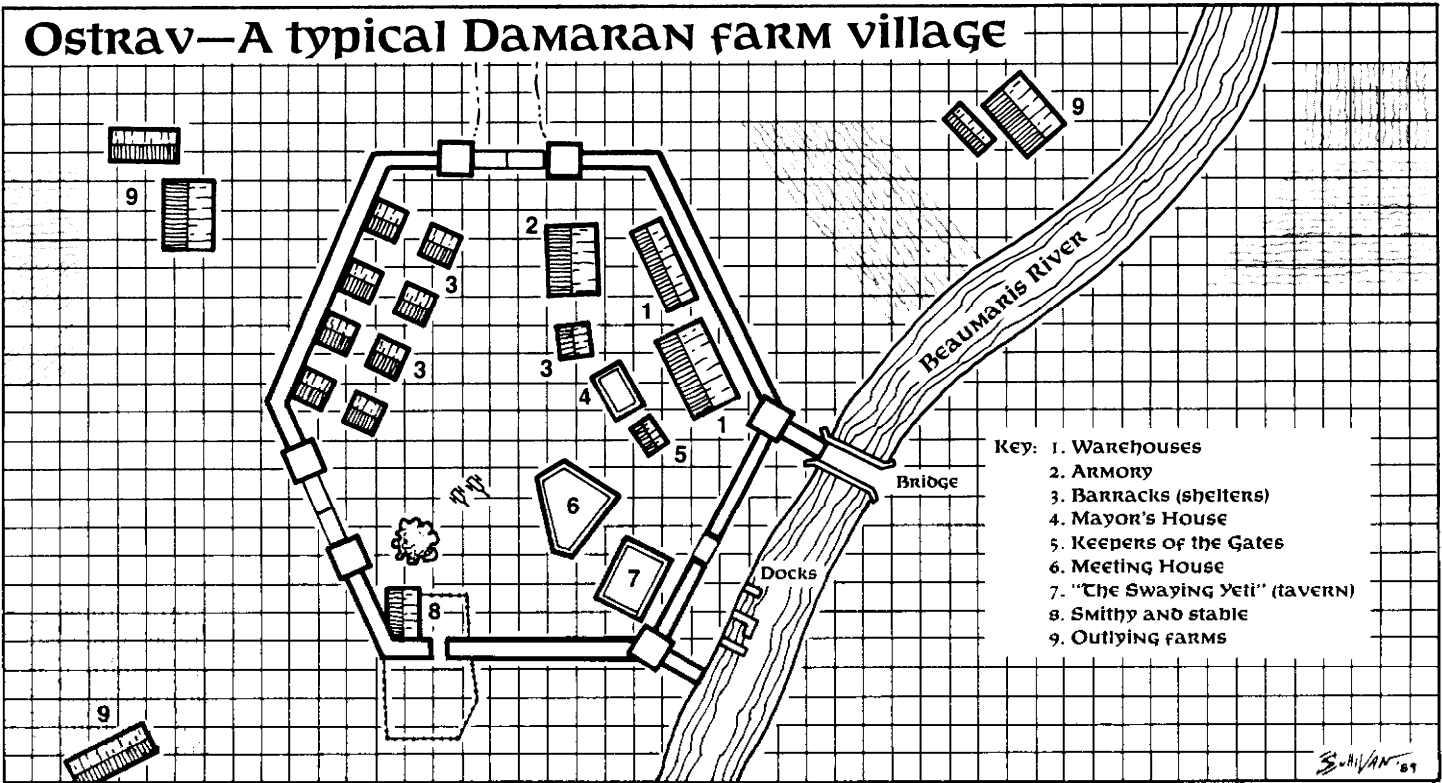

Steppenhall

Population: 70

Steppenhall is often called "Little Narfell" because of its relatively close ties to the Nar tribesmen across the border. The tribesmen of Narfell have actually visited the town on occasion, seeking news of the happenings in Damara. As such, Steppenhall has an important role to play in the future of modern Damara.

The town is an informal gathering-place, a watering hole for Damara's remote northeastern farmers. Many nearby "towns" are just farmhouses loosely clustered together—places like Kinney, Merkurn, Newbelle, and Hinterford—and Steppenhall is where the inhabitants come together. Steppenhall also routes supplies to nearly half the Damaran region, even though this vast wilderness is settled by less than 7,000 people.

Sudrav

Population: 600

Sudrav is the southernmost Damaran city. Formally located in the Duchy of Arcata, the city has stronger ties to Impiltur than to Damara.

The hardy iron miners of Sudrav are generally disgusted with the events of Damara. Effigies of Duke William are openly burned in the city streets, and the miners distrust the petty nobles as well.

Unrest is such that the council of Sudrav sent a formal (and secret) request to the Impilturian rulers, asking them to annex the city into that kingdom. In the interest of good relations with Damara, the Lords of Imphras II refused that request. However, they did promise aid if the lesser nobles of Arcata or Carmathan oppressed the people.

Tellerth

Population: 2,300

Tellerth is the easternmost Damaran city, situated in the Barony of Polten on the fringes of Rawlinswood. Another city of independently-minded folks, the angry people of Tellerth closed down their city when the Morov-Ostel-Polten alliance refused to send aid to the army of Bloodstone. Later, when Donlevy the Young made his way to Trailsend, the people of Tellerth reestablished their ties with the rest of the barony. But even today, the folk of Tellerth are not quick to welcome strangers. They are, however, excited that the Twilight Riders are coming.

Tomrav

Population: 450

Tomrav is a lonely mining settlement high up in the Earthspur Mountains of southwestern Arcata. The secret of this town's success is its ability to coexist with its various neighbors. Tomrav finds it natural to host the monks of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose, but the city also maintains good relationships with neighboring goblinoid tribes!

Tomrav's population is a mixture of humans, dwarves, and half-orcs. The half-orcs act as liaisons between the townsfolk and the nearby goblin tribes. This relationship has been good for all, with only minor skirmishes between the miners and the goblins. In one such battle, one goblin tribe actually came to the aid of the town in its struggle against a second goblin tribe!

Trade Fair

Population: 20,000-30,000

For a few brief weeks each summer, the tribes of Narfell congregate. The massive Trade Fair would hardly be called a "city" by any ordinary standard, but Bildoobaris is as close as the Nars get. Skin tents cover miles of grassland as the entire population of Nars welcome western merchants – the only time of the year that foreigners are welcome in Narfell.

Trailsend

Population: 8,000

One of the mightiest fortresses in the Bloodstone Lands, Trailsend is Polten's capital. The huge castle in the city's center was one of the earliest buildings in Damara, constructed by the associates of Feldrin Bloodfeathers. Donlevy the Young sits in the ruler's seat today.

For many years, Praka and Trailsend were sister cities. Facing each other across the mouth of the Great Imphras River at the southern shore of Lake Mogador, Trailsend provided the muscle protecting Praka's artisans. Today, the two cities go their separate ways. The Barony of Polten has pulled out of its alliance with Ostel and Morov, and Donlevy the Young has no love for Baroness Sylvia ruling across the water in Praka.

Valls

Population: 1,300

A profound hush has fallen over the city of Valls, the capital of Arcata. Once the bustling trailhead to the King's Road and all western Damaran trade, Valls now waits in quiet anticipation. The people watch with great curiosity the ebb and flow of the powers struggling for dominion over the kingdom.

In local politics, Duke William is a mere figurehead, pinned by the constant scrutiny of his own Ducal Guard. If rumors are true, the Guard is now loyal to Baron Gareth Dragonsbane. Strangers are still welcome in Valls, but whispers will follow them down every street. Suspicious townspeople will make every effort to figure out what role a stranger may have in the shadowplay of intrigue.

Viridin

Viridin is named after the last King of Damara, and acts as the natural link between Bloodstone Village and the Bloodstone Mines. The town has one large inn, the Snoring Giant. The inn's best customers are those visitors to the mines who feel more comfortable sleeping above ground than under. A half-dozen supply stores compete for business, offering gear for both mining and adventuring. Marko Orothiar, a master weapons crafter, has put up his forge in Viridin. Although Marko spends most of his time outfitting his clansmen in the mines, the right amount of gold could persuade him to create an exceptional weapon for a stranger.

Wassen

Population: 250

The little farming and river town of Wassen is situated in northern Morov on the Goliad River. Wassen offers river travelers a comfortable alternative to a stop in the larger city of Morovar. This town is firmly neutral, stating no preference among the contenders. Wassen's townsfolk consider themselves independent, a community doing its duty to the concept of kingdom but not as anyone's unthinking serfs. People here are wary but friendly, and always listening for a good story.

The Waymeets

Population: variable

Throughout the Narfellian grasslands are camping grounds known as the waymeets—really, just wide spots along the worn paths the Nars call roads. More than a dozen of these informal campgrounds exist, but the ones most frequented are called Jiyd, Peltarch, and Nobis, just south of Icelace Lake. Bezentil lies along the trade route of the Great Dale.

Windless

Population: 2,500

The newest town in Damara, Windless actually considers itself a sort of suburb of Bloodstone Village. Bloodstone Village bustles with new growth and vitality, but many of the former inhabitants of the Village preferred the quieter times before Zhengyi. The rise of Gareth Dragonsbane has also created quite a clamor. The people of Windless bear no ill will toward the Baron or the changes he has wrought in Bloodstone Village and in the barony as a whole; they simply choose to live a quieter existence.

Windless has a council, but no formal government. This new town retains tight ties to its mother city, and many of its people loyally serve in the Bloodstone army. Windless citizens are particularly well-represented at the Damaran Gate.

Withermeet

Population: 100

The village of Withermeet is highly conservative, resisting change of any kind since its inception more than two centuries ago. The town continues along its chosen path, oblivious to the dramatic forces at work in the kingdom.

Withermeet welcomes visitors, thriving in its role as a stopover between Trailsend and points north. The village proper is no more than three dozen structures: mostly inns and workshops, including several good smithies. Nevertheless, the people of Withermeet own many square miles of land.

Land speculators see Withermeet as another Portith, and some have offered serious gold for Withermeet's land. The townspeople are interested mostly in preserving their peaceful lifestyle, and they have firmly rejected all advances.

Zarach

Population: 600

A flourishing farm community in Ostel, Zarach's biggest problem is deciding which markets to concentrate on. The people here are capitalists in the extreme. Unless Baroness Sylvia forces it, they will show no favoritism to Ostel so long as some other market offers a higher price.

Trade opportunities are good along the King's Road one way to Praka; Ravensburg offers good trade the other way. The Impilturian town of Dunfee sends a constant stream of wagons to the vast warehouses of Zarach. And the community is the first stopover for goods being shipped from Halfling Downs in Carmathan! The people of Zarach have no shortage of work.

GEOGRAPHY OF THE REGION

Nowhere in the Forgotten Realms is the awesome power of nature more prominently displayed than in the Bloodstone Lands. The geography of this area plays a major role in shaping the lives and attitudes of the hardy souls who reside here. All respect the forces exemplified by imposing features such as the Great Glacier and the towering peaks of the Galena Mountains.

Buzzard Beak Harbor

Buzzard Beak Harbor is a sheltered arm of water jutting into Impiltur from the Easting Reach. Weedy and full of treacherous reefs, the place has long offered a treacherous sanctuary to the smugglers and pirates of the region. These evil sailors know Buzzard Beak Harbor like their own back yard, and are always quick to flee there when pressed by a superior vessel such as Rilaunyr's Warship. The pirates and smugglers have come to know the dangerous harbor out of necessity. No sane captain would take the risks to follow them unless he absolutely had to.

Beaumaris River

The Beaumaris River is the longest waterway in the Bloodstone Lands. It cuts across the breadth of Vaasa, through Bloodstone Pass. Thereafter it swings south, then east, finally joining the Goliad River on its way to Lake Mogador. Barely a trickle in the fall and frozen solid through most of the winter, the Beaumaris sparkles with snowmelt in the warmer seasons. Its smooth-flowing waters glisten dreamily under sun and moon, and its taste revitalizes weary adventurers with a bone-chilling tingle.

The river does not run deep. It is suitable only for small rowboats or canoes, and there are many shallow fords around which boats have to be carried. Since the river is frequented by goblinoids and other monsters, only the very hardy or the very foolish follow it when traveling north of the Galenas.

Bloodstone Pass

As the only real pass through the forbidding Galenas, Bloodstone Pass is of vital strategic importance to the kingdoms of Vaasa and Damara. Controlling the pass means controlling trade between the kingdoms. No invading armies may cross in either direction except through the pass.

The pass is in the heart of the Barony of Bloodstone, housing Bloodstone Village and the towns of Windless and Viridin. Also located here are the fabulous Bloodstone Mines and the deep waters of Lake Midai.

Bloodstone Pass was cut by the raging Beaumaris River during the hasty retreat of the Great Glacier nearly 300 years ago. (In fact, the glacier's retreat was so abrupt, only magical interference offers a sensible explanation.) If the river swelled to those proportions again, all would be washed away. Those living in the valley of the pass would be wise to take note should the glacier exhibit any strange behavior in the future!

The Easting Reach

The Easting Reach is a broad, sheltered harbor located on the northeastern shore of the Sea of Fallen Stars. The waters are deep and usually calm, with few reefs and predictable currents. The harbor is the best tradeport for goods coming into and out of the Bloodstone Lands. The city of Sarshel guards the harbor's mouth, and provides extensive docks; many merchant vessels fly Sarshel's banner. The fortress-city of Ilmwatch keeps an alert navy afloat from further up the reach.

Earthfast Mountains

This small range of mountains marks the western border of the Kingdom of Impiltur. Not as high as the Earthspurs, the Earthfast Mountains are equally difficult to traverse, with steep slopes and sudden gorges. Mines in the Earthfasts have yielded moderate amounts of iron and silver in the past. However, none of the mines were productive enough to balance the hardships miners endured. Today, only a few dozen stubborn, solitary prospectors roam the rocky peaks.

Earthspur Mountains

More important are the Earthspur Mountains, the imposing western barrier of Vaasa and Damara. With few trails, numerous monsters, and peaks reaching up nearly four miles, the Earthspurs are dangerous indeed. When the founders of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose sought the most imposing location for their order, it is no accident that they chose the highest peaks of the dangerous Earthspurs.

Mining is lucrative in the Earthspurs, and miners withstand great hardship to delve into lodes of iron and silver that seem endless. The fortunate occasionally tap a vein of bloodstone. The Arcatan towns of Tomrav and Sudrav, and the Impilturian community of Dunfee exist largely because of their mines and miners. Unfortunately, survival is difficult, and many do not live long enough to enjoy the wealth they've pulled from the ground.

Earthwood

Sheltered in a pocket of the Earthspur Mountains is Earthwood, a small, thick forest of evergreens and birch. The soil of Earthwood is stony and rocky, broken and hilly, yet the trees grow thickly. There seems no end to the fertility of the soil, for land cleared by woodsmen just a few years ago is already springing with new life, promising groves of trees even thicker than their predecessors.

Legends say that the land under Earthwood was enchanted by a great druid centuries ago, in defiance of the Great Glacier which then covered the land. The trees prospered in spite of the onslaught of ice. Legend predicts that the forest will thrive in the face of any hardship.

Few people live here, though some woodcutters have made a fine profit. More folk have moved in since Rawlinswood become so unfriendly to outsiders. The place is surprisingly safe: for some unexplained reason, the goblins and other monsters of the Earthspurs avoid the wood.

Forests of The Great Dale

Collectively known as the Forests of the Great Dale, Rawlinswood and the Forest of Lethyr comprise one of the largest tracts of woodland in the Forgotten Realms. The forests encompass nearly 70,000 square miles. Rawlinswood is the larger, but the Forest of Lethyr is "small" only by direct comparison!

These forests once provided lumber for buildings in Impiltur and Damara, but few woodsmen travel here today. Thickly packed with firs and huge, ancient oaks, these woods are darkened by a thick canopy and a pervading aura of doom. Fireside tales speak of the woods as remnants of a past age, and legends tell of sentient trees that stubbornly hold onto the Forests of the Great Dale as their last stand in a world of shrinking woodlands.

Outsiders consider these tales to be fanciful superstitions, but the people living near the woods take the stories seriously, and rarely venture under the thick boughs. Druids reside here in large numbers, and the priests of this ancient order do not welcome strangers—particularly strangers bearing axes.

In the heart of Rawlinswood lies Dun-Tharos, the imposing home of the mighty Nentyarch. It is not known if he is a wizard or druid, or even if he is a man or something dire. Few doubt his disdain for trespassers, however. Hardy souls have ventured into the gloom of Rawlinswood, but only a handful ever came out. These few have expressed no desire to return!

Galena Mountains

If a violent, powerful force brought two land masses smashing together, the result would surely resemble the jagged, broken peaks of the Galena Mountains. Two hundred and fifty miles long, this narrow range averages only twenty-five miles in width and Bloodstone Pass offers the only sensible way through. Adventurers walking in the range find themselves plodding 10 miles up, down, and around for every mile they move in their desired direction.

The Galenas define the border between Vaasa and Damara as sharply as any border in the Realms. The mountains are laced about with ice and snow, with a year-round wind howling down from the Great Glacier. The Galenas are home to hundreds of thousands of goblinoids and giants, and countless other monsters.

But people come to the Galenas by the thousands. They cannot ignore the lure of wealth promised by some of the richest mines in the world. Miners bring out millions of gold pieces worth of bloodstone, and tons of iron and silver.

Dwarves love the Galenas, and have three major settlements well established: Ironspur, the Bloodstone Mines, and Hillsafar Hall. The stone here is hard and pure, and dwarven hammers chime silvery notes worthy for the ears of Moradin.

Only the strongest survive, be they dwarf or human. Mines are often closed down by monsters and other calamities, but many new ones open up. Miners run the constant risk of breaking into the lairs of the dark denizens of the underworld: the duergar and derro, and the drow. But the lure remains, and the hammers ring.

The Galena Snake

The Galena Snake is no reptile, but a twisty river rushing down from the Galena Mountains to link with Icelace River before spilling into Lake Mogador. The river is seasonal, with the melt-off bringing it to life each spring. The dance of bright water twisting across the grassland resembles a glistening snake wriggling through a meadow. Any observer can see where the river got its name.

The Galena Snake is rarely navigable. A canoe can pass during the first couple of weeks of the melt, but nothing larger. Nevertheless, the river is an important route for its brief life. The tiny farming communities of northern Damara rely on it for transportation to Kinbrace, and adventurers use it for a fast trip south from the eastern reaches of the Galenas.

Giantspire Mountains

On the border between Damara and Narfell, the Giantspire Mountains are the least populated range in the region—unless you count the hobgoblin population! The Giantspires would seem to be an appealing hunting ground for prospectors. There are fewer natural barriers and more usable trails than the other nearby ranges, and the Giantspires are reputedly rich in precious minerals and gemstones. But the mountain range is a veritable breeding ground for hobgoblins. The hooting and hollering of savage tribes echoes off every mountain wall and resounds through every pass.

In more prosperous days, the King of Damara tried working with the Lords of Impiltur to sweep the Giantspires clean of vermin. Politics interfered when the wild Nars wanted no part of the invasion. The tribes even warned their more civilized neighbors not to violate Narfell's border. The most optimistic of generals yielded to the litany of difficulties, shuddering at the likelihood of disaster.

In the end, the Giantspires remained unconquered, and may remain so for some time. Even though he hopes to forge an alliance with the Nars, Gareth Dragonsbane shies away from questions about the Giantspires. He would like to be able to exploit the riches of the mountains, but it seems unlikely that he alone could commit the vast army needed to pacify the massive hobgoblin population.

More likely, any reasonable assault on the Giantspires would have to be a joint effort, uniting forces from Damara, Impiltur, and Narfell. Even if that were managed, it's likely the hobgoblins would remain numerous. If the nations want the wealth of the Giantspires, then miners will have to seek out inconspicuous and defensible positions in spite of the dangers. At present, there are only two working mines in the range, struggling on in the northwest corner of Soravia.

Glacier of The White Worm

Draped across the highest peaks of the Earthspur Mountains is the Glacier of the White Worm, perhaps a remnant of the Great Glacier that once covered the land. The altitude of this icesheet does not justify its presence some 400 miles south of the larger ice mass. Some dweomercraft may be involved to maintain its existence.

The glacier gets its name from the pale breed of remorhaz roaming across the vast fields of ice. The remorhaz territory covers the glacier's expanse, some 1,200 square miles, and the beasts occasionally travel in herds of a dozen or more. A variety of other polar creatures make their home on the glacier as well. Of goodly folk, only the monks of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose reside here.

Goliad River

The Goliad River is more important to shipping than the Galena Snake. Except when its waters are frozen solid, the Goliad runs wide and deep, eminently suitable for the network of barges that control transport on the river.

The river cuts through the heart of Damara. Barges run the length of the Goliad, bringing farm goods and minerals south to Morovar and Heliogabalus. From there, the goods move through Lake Mogador, into the Great Imphras River on their journey south to Impiltur.

On the northern half of the river shipping is sporadic. South of where the Beaumaris joins the Goliad, the barges run daily. The city of Goliad dominates this junction, and its opinion influences the people of the south. As Goliad warms to the idea of a new Kingdom of Bloodstone, the city's power hangs like an imminent disaster over the head of Dimian Ree.

Great Imphras River

The Great Imphras River network is comprised of three major rivers. The Great Imphras River itself flows out of Lake Mogador, and the two Sidewinders stream along the Damara-Impiltur border. The rivers are rough, with many dangerous stretches of white water, especially along the southeastern fringes of the Galena Mountains. The rivers end at Traders Bay, a series of connecting lakes that lead into the Easting Reach halfway between Sarshel and Ilmwatch.

The river is frequented by Damaran merchants anxious to beat those who use the more conventional land route down the Merchants Run. The southern stretch of the rivers, and Traders Bay particularly, are much used by smugglers and thieves. The waterway enables these miscreants a route to the Sea of Fallen Stars, and a chance to escape the fleets of Impiltur.

The Great Glacier

The Great Glacier remains one of the major mysteries of the Forgotten Realms, on par with the desert of Anauroch. Whereas Anauroch has expanded, though, the Great Glacier has receded. Just three centuries ago the glacier covered all of what is now Vaasa and Damara, as well as most of the grasslands of Narfell. Today the lands are free of constant ice.

Even though the ice has recently receded, the Great Glacier remains an awesome natural spectacle. It measures more than 1,200 miles across in some places and is fully 700 miles wide.

This vast icesheet plays an important role in the lifecycles of the Bloodstone Lands. Spring meltoff from the glacier waters the grasslands, and makes river transport possible. In winter, the cold winds blowing down from the north keep the nights long and bitter.

Halfling Downs

Halfling Downs is a fertile stretch of rolling farmland in the southeastern corner of Carmathan. Just across the border is the Ostel town of Zarach, and immediately to the south of the Downs is the border of Impiltur.

This farmland is inhabited almost exclusively by tallfellow halflings, with only a few men scattered among them. Per capita, Halfling Downs is the most productive farming community in all of the Bloodstone Lands, and the halflings here pride themselves on their hard work.

Halfling Downs is a relatively closed community. Until very recently, visitors were tolerated but not welcomed. The halflings became more hospitable after the Twilight Riders came through. Those heroes put down a rampaging bulette that had been terrorizing the community, and local folk remember those strangers warmly.

Hark's Finger

Hark's Finger is known as Mount Jiksidur to the Nars. The singular spire serves as a landmark for anyone traveling through the flat, empty grasslands of central Narfell. The mountain is sacred to the Nars, who see its guiding influence as a gift from the gods.

The High Walk

The Galena Mountains are difficult to pass through anywhere except Bloodstone Pass—difficult, but not impossible. The High Walk is the only other trail with a name, and it is a treacherous up-and-down trek. The High Walk is used primarily by the half-orcs of Palishchuk on their way to deal with the dwarves of Ironspur.

This is not a journey for the weak. A barely-marked trail spiders up sheer cliff faces and through boulder-strewn canyons dominated by evil monsters. For every ten hardy souls who begin the journey, whether leaving from Vaasa or Damara, one will not arrive at the other end. No wagons can get through, and riders prefer mules to horses. To add to the troubles, rumors suggest that the new Citadel of Assassins is not far from this trail.

Icelace Lake

Glistening along the northern Narfellian border is the crystalline beauty of Icelace Lake. The waters are sparkling pure, teeming with trout and salmon. Ultimately, the waters can be deadly. Anyone who falls into Icelace Lake will be chilled to death in minutes, even during the warmest months of the year.

In spite of the danger, the Nars come here in summer, venturing out on the lake in deerskin canoes. The nomadic Nars feast on the delicious fish, but many dangerous creatures are equally drawn to the feast. Even the finest boatmen must beware, for the great northern bears consider a man in a feeble boat to be a welcome change, and his catch, a particularly easy meal.

Icelace River

A shimmering run of frigid water, Icelace River floods eastern Damara each spring with melt from the Great Glacier. The river does not run to Icelace Lake; rather, it culminates in the more southerly waters of Lake Mogador.

Icelace River is as dangerously cold as Icelace Lake, but swift with many twists and turns. The Damaran farmers in the wilderness of the province of Soravia have learned to ride its rapids at the end of each summer. Traveling on Icelace River enables the farmers to market their harvest before the frigid winter sets in.

Lake Midai

Situated in the center of Bloodstone Valley, Lake Midai provides fresh water and fish to the folk of Bloodstone Village. The lake is only a few miles long and barely one across. However, it is very deep, beyond the measurements of those who have dropped as much as a mile of line before giving up seeking the bottom!

Midai is mostly seen as a peaceful, pleasant rest area for the miners of Bloodstone. Recently, the lake has taken on a vital strategic role. Bloodstone's farms cannot feed its burgeoning population, nor keep pace with the many newcomers. But the deep waters of Midai, fed by the unharvested waters of the Beaumaris River, promise an endless supply of fish. With Midai close by, Bloodstone is self-supporting in times of trouble. Although a steady diet of fish might prove boring, the people's self-sufficiency is a distinct advantage in these hostile lands.

Lake Mogador

The most important body of water in Damara is Mogador, the large lake surrounded by the city provinces of Morov, Ostel, and Polten. All shipping that comes down Damara's four rivers culminates here, and the lake is a beehive of activity. Merchant vessels zip in and out of the port cities. Any goods leaving Damara by water pass through Mogador, and thence down the Great Imphras River to Impiltur.

With the tense situation in today's Damara, Lake Mogador may become a hotly-contested battleground. Heliogabalus, Trailsend, and Praka all sail fleets on the lake. With Polten slipping out of its alliance with the other provinces, these fleets have become more heavily armed. Ships from Trailsend and Praka have already skirmished on the lake. More violence seems inevitable.

Sidewinder River

The Sidewinder is actually two rivers: the River Lench flowing west from Rawlinswood; and the original Sidewinder, rushing east from the Earthspurs. Both feed into the Great Imphras River network, and are considered part of that network.

Little shipping is done along the Sidewinder. Nothing comes out of Rawlinswood, and the river from the Galenas is too wild and treacherous.

The Sidewinder's primary importance is to mark an indisputable, easily defensible border between Impiltur and Damara. The border has gone unchallenged throughout history. When Zhengyi had conquered Damara, Impiltur massed its forces not know which way the Witch-King would turn. They could only be sure Zhengyi could not cross the Sidewinder. Had he chosen to invade Impiltur, the Witch-King would have had to march west and pass through the difficult Earthspurs, or go far to the east, braving the dangers of Rawlinswood and Dun-Tharos. Clearly, the Sidewinder provided a measure of security to the people of Impiltur in that dark time.

The Teardrops

The Teardrops are a series of lakes lying across the eastern half of Narfell and the northern reaches of the eastern land of Rashemen. Fish and game are plentiful here, and many tribes of Nars spend most of the year in the vicinity. Few monsters lair here except for the ever-present tundra yeti.

Traders Bay

Traders Bay is more commonly known as Traitor's Bay. The boats riding out over the Bay usually carry fugitives or pirates seeking an easy escape out into the Easting Reach beyond the attention of Sarshel and Ilmwatch.

Traders Bay is the only interior waterway in the Kingdom of Impiltur. It encompasses the southern stretches of the Great Imphras River system and two large lakes, Bluefang Water and the Old Water.

The only settlement on Traders Bay, Bay Town, has never gained prominence. The town cannot compete with the major cities located on the seacoast. The harbor of Easting Reach meets the legitimate needs of caravans coming from Damara and through the Great Dale. Bay Town survives by serving best those who do frequent the area: the scum.

The Vaasan Bogs

In central Vaasa, north of the Beaumaris River, one must beware of the many wide stretches of bottomless bogs. More than one party adventuring in this area has simply vanished from the face of the world. But adventurers continue to explore this dangerous wetland, for there are reportedly several magical hot springs in the area. Their waters are said to enhance abilities, restore frail bodies, or even grant an occasional wish!

Warrenwood

A small but incredibly overgrown wood in Bloodstone Valley, Warrenwood is home to the centaurs of the region. The forest takes its name from the nearby Warren, an intricate underground fortress which extends under its boughs.

Warrenwood drew notoriety during the Bloodstone Wars, when an invading contingent of the Morov-Ostel-Polten alliance camped in the wood to ambush the Bloodstone army. The forces of the Warren put a swift end to that threat, aided by the centaurs. The invaders were utterly defeated in a single night.

Warrenwood will have a new celebrity-resident once the situation in Damara settles down. Long ago, Emelyn the Gray had his famed centaur school in this forest, but the original school was destroyed at the coming of the Witch-King. Emelyn has vowed to rebuild the school to be tenfold more than it was, assisted by his apprentice Gabrielle. If it is half that, the school will be the most prominent center of learning and wizardry in all the Bloodstone Lands.

The Waukeshire

Sister-forest to Warrenwood is the Waukeshire, home of the halflings of Bloodstone Valley. The major tunnel-complexes of the Warren lie beneath the Waukeshire, and tunnels cross under the Beaumaris River to connect Waukeshire to Warrenwood.

Unlike Warrenwood, the Waukeshire is a tidy forest of straight-limbed trees and manicured underbrush. Visitors are welcome, and many adventurers traveling to the Barony of Bloodstone stop here for a sorely-needed rest. But visitors must be careful not to litter the grounds or destroy the foliage. The halflings pride themselves on keeping their land neat and orderly, and they do not take kindly to strangers messing things up!

STRONGHOLDS, RUINS, AND DUNGEONS

In a land so filled with monsters, one does not usually have to look far to find some dangerous, enticing dungeon for the adventurous to try their luck in. This section details some of the strongholds, ruins, and dungeons to be discovered in the Bloodstone Lands.

The Black Holes of Sunderland

Along the slopes of the Galenas in the Sunderland of southern Vaasa loom the monster-filled caves known as the Black Holes. Some are shallow caves, others deeper and darker. Still others are long tunnels that lead into vast underground networks of interlocking chambers of horrors.

But whatever the depth and dimensions of these caves, they invariably have one thing in common—unfriendly inhabitants. Monsters in this harsh region need shelter as much as humans do, and many of the vile denizens of Vaasa have made their homes in the Black Holes. Monsters here range from goblins and giants to leucrotta and owl bears.

Many of the Witch-King's troops fled to the Black Holes after their defeat at the Ford of Goliad. Some who fled from that defeat carried treasures they had looted during Zhengyi's better days.

The Black Holes of Sunderland offer hardy adventurers the opportunity to gain experience and treasure. If the adventurers are not as hardy as they believe, the Black Holes offer a cozy place to retire—permanently!

The Bloodstone Mines

The ever-expanding tunnels of the Bloodstone Mines frequently link up with the natural tunnels and holes found under the Galenas. The dwarves of Clan Orothiar and the svirfneblin gnomes of Deepearth understand the danger of delving, but the mines are simply too rich in chalcedony to be forsaken.

Opportunities for mercenary adventurers are as rich as the ore to be found here. The dwarves and gnomes are too busy hauling out the precious gemstone to explore every new tunnel they break into. They leave that work to those better accustomed to it.

In the Bloodstone Mines, adventurers may find the monsters of the darkest underworld. The depths harbor those denizens of the Forgotten Realms who never come out to see the sun. Duergar are often encountered, remnants of the grey dwarf community that was smashed in the battle for the mines more than a year ago. Their derro kin have also been spotted, as have ropers and several of the deadly puddings. Svirfneblin legends speak of even more ominous creatures, such as the kuo-toa and the drow, being found in the lowest chambers.

Castle Perilous

When the Witch-King fell, so did his stronghold, the Castle Perilous. What was once an iron extension of Zhengyi's power crumbled swiftly into ruin. Today, Castle Perilous is just a blasted mound of rubble on a lonely crag in the Vaasan wasteland. But those who believe that the perils of the evil fortress fell away with its iron walls would be rudely awakened were they to venture there!

Evil dragons lair amidst the broken stone and shattered iron. The flights that have been seen soaring northward over Damara chose the ruined castle to be their base from which to hatch their wicked plans. Huge reds occupy the top of the crag, lairing in the rubble-strewn foundations of the castle. The blues, greens, and blacks each have taken a slope of the crag for their own. The northern face of the crag remains unoccupied thus far. Cautious observers speculate that the space is reserved for the enormous flight of whites that is believed to be coming down from the Great Glacier.

Castle Perilous should be avoided by all but the most powerful of adventurers; even these might find themselves overwhelmed. Yet if some group fought their way through the gathered dragons, they would find their work just beginning! Under the rubble of the castle lies a vast underground dungeon. Here Zhengyi housed his darkest champions, creatures of unspeakable evil and power. Many were tied to the lower planes, and so banished by the Treegem that Bahamut gave to the heroes of Bloodstone. But many hideous things remain, monsters of this plane little known among surface dwellers.

Anyone powerful, brave and stupid enough to challenge the foul inhabitants of Castle Perilous will find threats aplenty. Before his demise, Zhengyi laid glyphs and wards and wicked traps throughout his dungeons. One of the Witch-King's favorites is reputedly an oil-slick tilting floor which ends in a pitfall. A high-level adventurer would not find a twenty-foot drop too discomfiting, but when such a pit is blocked, halfway down, by a hungry gelatinous cube...

The Cave of The Whispering Wind

In the heart of the Galenas, entered through a hidden ravine in a secret valley is the Cave of the Whispering Wind. For goodly folk who stumble upon it, this cave represents a haven; for monsters who chance upon it, it offers only disaster.

It is a natural cavern, found by the cousins Riordan Parnell and Celedon Kierney on one of their early treks into the Galenas. They recognized its potential and made it the home base of Spysong, a secret organization.

With the help of their friends, the two master scouts fortified the place. Emelyn the Gray and Friar Dugald laced the area with defensive glyphs and runes. The druid Baroness Christine of Bloodstone altered the nearby terrain to make the pathways, already difficult to find, even harder to discover.

At least two fighters no less than third level are continually on guard at the cave entrance, strategically placed to spot the approach of any friend or foe long before they reach the enchanted areas. If these guards spot unknown travelers of the accepted races, the guards will warn them of the dangers ahead and ask them their business. If the response bears any hostility or rudeness, the travelers will be turned away. Further attempts to approach can only be taken at great risk.

After asking unruly travelers to leave, the guards take up positions at the mouth of the cave, ready to operate a deadly ballista. But the glyphs and wards of Emelyn and Dugald are formidable indeed. Although many evil-hearted beings have approached the Cave of the Whispering Wind, the ballista has yet to be fired. Thus far, the guards have only been constrained to dispose of some blasted and charred bodies.

However, if any traveler is wounded or seems to be in need, or if the response is satisfactorily benign, the guards invite the person in for rest and recuperation. The Cave of the Whispering Wind is fully stocked with fine food and drink, medical supplies, and adventuring gear of every type. Good souls will get a good rest, and find their packs restocked for the road ahead. The guards will not discuss the mission of this unusual mountain refuge, nor even hint that any such a hidden motive exists.

The cave is home base for Spysong, which operates and thrives in secrecy. However, the organization is open to new recruits. If the guards host an individual or an adventuring company that shows the proper demeanor and abilities, Riordan Parnell will be told about them. The bard may visit personally, or send one of his agents to further question the potential recruits. A willing and able character could find thrilling adventures by signing on with this daring organization. And forever after, he or she could be sure of having powerful, loyal allies in the Bloodstone Lands.

The Church of Dionysus

Using the money he looted from the lair of Tiamat in the Abyss, Friar Dugald of Bloodstone has begun construction of a massive cathedral. Dugald does not intend to pastor the church, however, and it is not even being built in his home province. The church is located in Goliad, in the province of Brandiar. Some see this as a political move by Dugald and his close friend Baron Gareth to buy Brandiar's allegiance. But whatever the reason, the city of Goliad is grateful.

As much a fortified castle as a chapel, the Church of Dionysus will provide the people of this region with a shelter from the elements and from rampaging monsters. Dugald has poured more than a million gold pieces into the construction. He has bought assurances from the builders that the cathedral will be able to house the local populace for an extended period in comfort. This represents a considerable effort: there are some 900 people in Goliad, and another 250 or so would come in from the outlying farms. It will take another full year to complete the superstructure of the church, and several more to finish the fine details.

Already the church has attracted a score of clerics to the order, and dozens of applicants for the church guard. Brandiar suffered for so many years under the thumb of the Witch-King, that the province has responded to Dugald's gift with overwhelming support. Even those of different religious persuasions view the Church of Dionysus as both the symbol of and the means to enforce their resolve never to be kicked around again.

The Citadel of Assassins

Hidden in the most difficult terrain of the unconquerable Galenas is the dreaded Citadel of Assassins. Somewhere between Bloodstone Valley and Ironspur, the bandit army has made its home base.

Like the proverbial bad habit, this bastion of wickedness and its foul adherents seem unconquerable. Twice the bandit army has been routed; twice its troops have been cut down, and the survivors sent scampering into the mountains. Even the Citadel itself was blasted. But the bandits, and their home base, have returned.

A new Citadel was built somewhere in the same general vicinity as the old. Rumors say that parts of the old building were magically transported to the site of the new. The Grandfather of Assassins is no fool, either. By observing how his fortress was thrown down by Gareth and his friends, he learned from earlier mistakes. This new Citadel is even nastier than its predecessor, making it a powerful fortress indeed! Every corridor houses at least one trap, and every room is designed to destroy an unwelcome guest as painfully as possible.

The Citadel is no place for a novice burglar to learn his trade. Even a master thief would find himself testing wit and skill against the most devious and dangerous minds in all the Bloodstone Lands.

The bard Riordan Parnell composed a song now popular in northern Damara. Although he has not seen the new Citadel, he describes it fittingly:

*"A series of rooms,
Built in the gloom
With wedges and cracks
To hide all the traps."*

Spysong is presently engaged in a massive effort to locate the new Citadel. Unfortunately, few of the hardy souls who have ventured into the area have returned.

Dun-Tharos

Buried in the ever-evening of the depths of Rawlinswood is a tree-lined fortress known as Dun-Tharos. Knowledge of the place remains more rumor than substantiated fact, but one thing is known: the Nentyarch dwells there. Little more than that is known about this powerful wizard, for he does not take kindly to intrusion. Even the centaurs of the fringes of Rawlinswood take great pains to avoid him.

Dun-Tharos itself is said to be a hundred square miles of permeating evil. Local druids are quick to point out that darkness and evil may go together symbolically, yet they are not one and the same. Still, even the druids agree that the Nentyarch should be viewed with suspicion. Whispers through the trees speak of grim beasts, perverted creations, and horrid slaves of the mighty wizard.

Neighboring nations view the place with suspicion. Impiltur keeps a wary eye on the region, and the Nars will not go anywhere near the forest. With all that has happened in Damara recently, Dun-Tharos remains unexplored by any of that nation's heroes. The twelve Lords of Imphras II would eagerly hire any adventurer willing to delve into the forest and enlighten them on Dun-Tharos and its suspicious and powerful ruler.

Ephran's Skinny Tower

It starts when a thirty-foot high pole appears mysteriously on the outskirts of a city somewhere in Impiltur. A yellow banner flies over it, emblazoned with a picture of a stick man. A few years ago, the people would have scratched their heads and wondered what this was. Now, almost everyone in Impiltur recognizes the home of Ephran, an incredibly thin, cheerful, and eccentric magic-user.

The tower is actually a dimensional trick. What appears to be a pole just inches in diameter is actually a comfortable home on the inside of a cylindrical tower. Fifty guests could congregate without bumping elbows!

Ephran's story is an odd one. While still a simple apprentice, Ephran was ensorcelled by the Red Wizards of Thay, forced to make a harrowing journey through the planes of existence. Sometime during this ten-year trip, Ephran stumbled into a world between the planes, a place where everything and everyone was distorted into nothing more than a series of connecting lines.

In this home of "stick-men," Ephran found a means to escape the wrath of the Red Wizards. He returned home bringing his pole-tower, a gift from the friends he made in the stick-world. Apparently, however, Ephran was personally affected by his stay there! His waist measures a scant ten inches around, his shoulders no more than twelve, and his neck only four! Those who know him say these measurements decrease month by month.

But Ephran retains his jollity, the same gift of mirth that got him into the soup with the grim Red Wizards in the first place. He takes his tower around the land of Impiltur in a cycle of unending parties and merry-making. People smile and nod whenever they wake to the sight of the yellow banner.

The Bloodstone Gates

With barely half of the construction completed, the Bloodstone Gates are already being regarded as one of the wonders of the Forgotten Realms. Even skeptics grumbling over outrageous costs agree that these two incredible fortresses may forever change the complexion of the region. At the very least, the Gates guarantee that the Barony of Bloodstone will remain a major factor in events occurring in the territory. The only sensible route through the Galenas, Bloodstone Pass is soon to be secured.

Baron Gareth Dragonsbane and his friends funded the project with quantities of the treasure they found on their adventures in the Abyss. Thousands of men and dwarves toil long hours every day (and they are well-paid) to speed construction. All the inhabitants of Bloodstone understand that when the Gates are completed, their own existence in this hostile land will be secured.

The Damaran Gate

The most ambitiously-designed of the Gates is the Damaran Gate, which will seal off the southern entrance to Bloodstone Pass. The completed wall will stretch for more than three miles, stand thirty-five feet high and twenty feet thick, and be sectioned by flat-topped guard towers every 300 yards. The entire length of the wall is hollow and will be patrolled. Each guard tower supports a contingent of 50 soldiers. All told, only three entrances are planned for the Damaran Gate. Massive iron doors are well-defended, standing in the shadows of imposing fortresses at the eastern and western ends of the Gate. One much smaller entrance passes between the central guard towers of the wall. This last is designed for small parties, single riders only.

The western end of this construction is anchored by a castle. Three towers and a courtyard are built in the shadow of a tall mountain, and two hundred chambers are cut into the mountain. This castle houses the Order of the Golden Cup, Gareth Dragonsbane's order of hold warriors dedicated to Ilmater. These well-equipped and well-trained paladins represent the cornerstone of the Baron of Bloodstone's militia. The final number of soldiers in the militia is intended to be between 500 and 700. How many will be paladins, and how many ordinary fighters, has yet to be determined.

maran Gate, although it is strategically vital. The eastern Gate has entrances leading into the tunnels of both the Warren and the Bloodstone Mines. The east headquarters will be the primary supply route for the entire Gate in times of siege and severe winter weather. No more than 300 soldiers, militiamen, will be quartered at this location at any given time. These soldiers will rotate among the guard towers along the wall.

The duties of the Bloodstone militia and the Order of the Golden Cup extend beyond the maintenance and security of the Damaran Gate. Patrols ride a 30-to-40 mile circuit to keep a constant watch on the lesser-known tracks leading into Bloodstone Valley from the Galenas. Every day, patrols depart from each end of the Damaran Gate at the same time. They travel opposite sides of the Bloodstone Pass north to the Vaasan Gate, arriving there at nightfall. The two groups meet and exchange news. At dawn, they cross to the opposite side of the Pass, and head south again.

The Damaran Gate is hardly more than a skeleton now, but is expected to be completed by the end of next summer. Already the fifteen guard towers are operational: each bears ballistae and pivoting catapults.

The Vaasan Gate

Counterpart to the Damaran Gate, the Vaasan Gate bars Bloodstone Pass from invasion from the north. It is a smaller structure, but no less sturdy. The wall of the Vaasan Gate is barely a half-mile long, but is fully sixty feet high and thirty feet thick. The top of the wall, from mountain to mountain, is a jumble of heavy weaponry—mostly ballistae and catapults of various sizes. Only one entrance passes through the gate, on the western end.

Like its southern counterpart, the Vaasan Gate is anchored on both ends by fortresses built into the sides of the mountains. Both the wall and the eastern fortress of the Vaasan Gate are complete, except for the little details.

Construction on the western fortress will continue through the coming winter and should be finished by early spring.

The total Bloodstone militia stationed here numbers only 500, but they are superbly equipped. Furthermore, they have few responsibilities but the Gate itself. Only a minimal amount of patrolling is done around the immediate area of the anchoring fortresses.

The Vaasan Gate's primary mission is to block invasions from the untamed kingdom to the north. Its role is more than that of defense, however. The Gate also provides a forum for trade and diplomacy, and serves as a home base to adventurers.

Many interior chambers of the Vaasan Gate house traders, merchants, and craftsmen. The Gate itself has become an important marketplace. Miners and farmers from Vaasa can get fair market value for their goods, which frees up time for more production of those goods. The dwarves of Clan Hillsafar are being encouraged to trade through the Gate. Plans have been drawn for a tunnel fifteen miles long, which would connect the Vaasan Gate to the easternmost digs of Clan Hillsafar. The dwarves could then bring their minerals direct to market without risking surface transportation—a distinct benefit over crossing the wilds of Vaasa!

The Vaasan Gate fulfills another purpose by providing a haven to the hardy people who brave the dangers of the northern kingdom. Food and supplies are stockpiled here, and temporary shelter is always available. All this is offered at no charge. Even weapons can be purchased at below-normal costs.

The baron's generosity is founded in good politics. Gareth believes that through such tempting offerings, Damarara can move closer to taming Vaasa. He is determined to win over the hearts of the people of the Sunderland. Finally, if Vaasa's meager farmland can be made more prosperous, Bloodstone will benefit. Although the Barony can support itself on the fish from Lake Midai if it must, a broader support system is desirable.

The Vaasan Gate serves a related purpose, one that is, perhaps, the most important mission of all. While its counterpart, the Damaran Gate, is manned solely by Bloodstone soldiers, an open invitation has been extended to adventurers and mercenary companies to come to the Vaasan Gate. These folk may use the Gate as a home base for their expeditions into Vaasa. To further encourage these people, bounties have been placed on the ears of certain creatures, as follows:

Goblin: 2 gp
Orc: 3 gp
Gnoll: 4 gp
Hobgoblin: 4 gp
Bugbear: 7 gp
Ogre: 10 gp
Giant: 50 - 100 gp (by type)

Rates for other monsters are negotiable, but usually quite generous. Officials will also pay well for valuable information, such as the whereabouts of a certain bandit army...

The Vaasan Gate truly provides a Dungeon Master with the opportunity to continue a campaign with PCs of any level. The northern slopes of the Galenas are teeming with monsters of every strength and number (see The Black Holes of Sunderland, p. 36). The Vaasan Gate gives PCs a sanctuary at which to resupply and heal up. The Gate even allows for the possibility of mentors and instructors to aid PCs advancing through the levels.

Hermit's Hill

Stories about Hermit's Hill are favorite fireside tales told throughout the small farm villages of eastern Soravia. Though surely exaggerated, these stories of a crazy old man with the strength to throw huge boulders actually have a basis in fact.

On the high slopes of Candle Mountain on the western fringes of the Giantspires lives an old recluse. His only friend is an equally aged stone giant. Their home is a cave atop a steep spur of the mountain. The place has been chosen, then modified, for the inhabitants' solitude, so trespassers had better be wary!

The climb up to the cave itself is a barrier; at times, the way seems almost vertical. Other defenses of Hermit's Hill have been made quite formidable. Three rings of boulders circle the spur below the cave. These may be dropped, section by section, activated by levers inside the cave or by automatic trap mechanisms rigged along the mountainside. Tree stumps and rocks which might have offered cover from such a landslide have been torn away by the stone giant. Trespassers are defenseless in the face of the onslaught.

Quite simply, the two recluses just want to be left alone. No one, man or giant, is welcome. Why would anyone bother these two? It is believed that the hermit knows more about the inhabitants of the western Giantspires than anyone alive. He even knows secret tunnels to some hobgoblin lairs that the creatures themselves don't know about. But a party of PCs would have to do some very fancy talking and creative bribery to reach the top of Hermit's Hill!

Hillsafar Hall

The most impressive fortress in all of Vaasa is not the city of Darmshall nor even Castle Perilous. Hillsafar Hall wins that honor. Hillsafar Hall is the name for the entrance caverns to the mine complexes of the dwarven Clan Hillsafar. These outer chambers were built for just one purpose: defense. A long tunnel leads into the first chamber. The tunnel walls are lined at varying heights on both sides by arrow slits, and murder holes loom above. The tunnel floor holds no less than ten cunning stonework traps. Every section of every floor in the entry is in the sights of some wickedly effective war machine.

Though they are primarily concerned with their lucrative mining operations, this clan of dwarves has lived in Vaasa too long to be caught with their guard down. At least fifty dwarves are always on active guard duty, and usually there are twice that number. Since the clan works the mines around the clock in shifts, several hundred other dwarves are usually in the immediate area. As one might expect of dwarves, their armor and weapons are always close at hand. Even the youngest fighters of Clan Hillsafar have attained at least the 3rd level.

The House of Hurl

An increasingly frequent, always welcome sight in the Galena Mountains is the glowing red chalice beacon atop the House of Hurl. This unusual place is home base of the equally unusual "Thinkers of the Thinkers." This portable tower is a variation of Doern's Instant Fortress, and it has all of the defensive and structural strongpoints of the more common version. However, Hurl takes things one step further.

Hurl uses his place to forget about the hardships of the road as only a dwarf can. To get through the iron door, the password is "Party!" and it must be spoken with gusto. Inside, guests find a lavish lounge and restaurant, complete with magical bartenders and barmaids, and a ten-piece band. Casks of fine wine and strong ale are magically restocked every time the tower is closed down, as are the stores of meat and other good foods.

Hurl sets the place up each night—even if he's in a dungeon complex! He and his companions welcome any who come in the name of fun. Guests will find themselves well-treated (even elves!) but they will be taunted mercilessly if they refuse to compete in the nightly arm-pulling contests. These competitions almost always result in an all-out barroom brawl. Things usually begin with a fight between Hurl and his twin brother Burl. Both dwarves possess girdles of stone giant strength and they therefore wind up in an unresolved draw—which inevitably leads to fisticuffs!

The House of Hurl did not originate in the Forgotten Realms. It was brought here by the dwarf from his original home in some distant world. The Red Wizards of Thay have offered a reward of 50,000 gold pieces to anyone who can obtain it for them.

The Ice Run

Any adventurer wandering to the Vaasan stretch of the Great Glacier would be wise to avoid the maze of ice-walled pathways known as the Ice Run. The twisty Ice Run snakes its way all along the face of the Great Glacier, and encompasses several hundred miles of trails. Most of the paths are open to the sky, but this only makes things worse for a person trapped in the maze, for the light of the sun glitters dizzily off the crystalline walls. The danger does not stop there, however. Anyone trapped in the Ice Run had better be handy with a weapon, for the area is the haunt of northern bears and remorhazes.

The only people who know how to navigate this maze are the barbarians of White Worm. They use the place as a defensive retreat, hiding in the twisty corridors. The White Worm tribe considers the Ice Run holy ground. They would not be kind to uninvited intruders.

The Monastery of The Yellow Rose

Also known as the Citadel of the White Worm, the Monastery of the Yellow Rose was founded before either Vaasa or Damara. The monks who established the monastery more than a thousand years ago crossed over land that would become Damara when that unborn nation was still overlain by the Great Glacier.

Their order is devoted to Ilmater, the god of suffering and endurance. These fanatical devotees sought the most inhospitable and difficult region they could find as the place to locate their temple. Not surprisingly, they eventually came to the highest peaks of the Earthspur Mountains.

The building itself is enormous. Each generation of monks adds new structures and digs out deeper chambers. Built on the stony side of a jagged mountain peak, the monastery overlooks the Glacier of the White Worm. About half of the rooms look out into the daylight; the other half are underground chambers dug right into the mountain.

The monks of the Yellow Rose are ascetic and simple, but they are determined to create beauty in hardship. Their toils are matched by their stamina, and both seem boundless. No monk works less than 16 hours each and every day. The lower initiates are responsible for the bare necessities of survival. They labor in the meager gardens, haul ice to be melted for water, or forage on the bleak mountainsides. Their efforts enable their more skilled superiors time to concentrate on creating sculpture and tapestries.

Few visit this place casually, for the trails are not easily found or followed. Those who do manage it, find the journey worthwhile. The monastery is a spectacular museum, with every room exhibiting artwork and architecture reflecting the supreme discipline of the order. It is a monument to the ages, an ever-growing tribute to the painstaking stubbornness that has allowed mankind to rise to dominance in the Forgotten Realms.

Extensive catacombs twist through the mountain under the monastery, threefold in purpose. Some sections serve as burial vaults for deceased monks. In another wing, a vast cellar holds vats of wine that the monks make from blueberries they collect. Finally, the catacombs house the most complete archives of the Bloodstone Lands to be found anywhere.

Each year, mid-level monks lead expeditions down the mountain to gather data in the cities of Damara, Impiltur, and in even Vaasa and Narfell. They concern themselves with news of local births and deaths, travelers passing through and newcomers settling in the region. It is no wonder that Gareth Dragonsbane asked the Monastery of the Yellow Rose to verify the lineage of the Duke of Carmathan! And it is no more a wonder that the man is just a little worried.

Riding the Remorhaz

The monks of the Yellow Rose have a spectacular and dangerous initiation-adventure. PCs will want their rightful shot at this exhilarating enterprise!

Before any monk can challenge to become a Master of Dragons (8th level), he or she must pass one of the most astonishing initiations ever devised. Armed with magical iron-and-leather spurs and a simple lasso, the monk must attempt to ride on the back of a remorhaz. This is done by lassoing the monster as it rambles past an appointed outcrop of rocks. The monk leaps to the white worm's back, plants the spurs firmly, and rides along (still standing, of course!) for a distance of at least one hundred yards.

In game terms the procedure is straightforward. The monk must make a "to hit" roll with the lasso against Armor Class 10. Failure does not mean the attempt to ride has been botched, simply that the monk must wait for another remorhaz to come by. However, if the monk misses three times, he or she loses experience. The monk is reduced to the middle of the 7th level, and cannot challenge for the 8th level until the lost experience has been re-earned. The monk may, however, attempt to ride the white worm again after one week has elapsed.

Once the monk has lassoed the beast, he or she leaps on, stamping the spurs into the white worm's back. This means two separate attacks. A remorhaz is normally Armor Class 0 in this area, but due to the special design and magic of the spurs, the monk need only hit Armor Class 8 to plant a foot.

At least one spur must be planted for the monk to have any chance of success. If one or both are planted (doing damage equivalent to the monk's open hand damage: 3-9 for 7th level), the chance for success is determined by the extent of damage. Ten points of damage offers a base 40% + 5% per point of dexterity over 15. For every point of damage over 10, add 5%. (This gives a 7th level monk with an 18 Dexterity a maximum 95% chance of success, doing total damage of 18.)

Conversely, for every point of damage under 10 inflicted by the spurring attacks, subtract 5%. (Thus, a 7th level monk hitting with both spurs but doing minimum damage of 3 points each, for a total of 6, would have only a 20% + Dexterity bonus chance of success.)

If only one spur is successfully planted, or if the monk attempting the manoeuvre is lower level, the chance might be less still. The proposition gets even more grave, for any monk missing with both spurs, or failing the ride, takes the full consequences of touching the back of a white worm: 10-100 hit points of damage with no saving throw! Generous Dungeon Masters may allow PC monks of the Yellow Rose to score double damage on an attack roll of 20 when spurring.

It should come as no surprise that the burial catacombs under the Monastery of the Yellow Rose house the remains of many would-be Masters of Dragons.

Riding the remorhaz is one of the toughest tests of skill and courage in the Forgotten Realms. Yet no monk at the monastery who had earned enough experience has ever refused to attempt the challenge. Most monks will try their skill at least once, even if they are of a much lower level. Many of the younger masters ride the remorhaz on a regular basis, sometimes as often as once a week! For the monks, this is more than a test. To them, the white worm symbolizes the courage and determination that marks their order. Conquering the beast, riding inches away from death or serious injury, is a statement of their devotion to St. Sollars the Twice Martyred. This inner strength is greatly respected by everyone in the Bloodstone Lands.

Nar-sek Qu'istrade

Nar-sek Qu'istrade is one of the few neutral meeting grounds among the tribes of Narfell. Also called Horseshoe Canyon, it is located on the northeast spur of the Giantspire Mountains, a circular bay of waving grass, sheltered by high, sheer cliff walls. Five square miles in area, the single entrance to the place is a crack only wide enough for two riders to go abreast.

Shallow caves line the rear walls of the canyon. The hardy Nars frequently sleep out under the open sky and put up their horses in the caves. Superbly defensible and protected from the harshest storms, Nar-sek Qu'istrade is often visited by the various Nar tribes. In the coldest days of winter, several tribes may congregate together, despite being fierce rivals out on the open grassland. An unbroken truce exists in Horseshoe Canyon and peaceful friendship is the norm.

On the occasions when a tribe comes under attack by a foreign invader, the people try to make their way to Nar-sek Qu'istrade where they light special arrangements of fires. These beacons signal an SOS to other tribes in the area, and help is sure to come quickly. When the Witch-King began massing his armies along the banks of Icelace Lake, the Nars gathered their own forces, using Nar-sek Qu'istrade as their home base.

Nar-sek Qu'tel

Similar to Nar-sek Qu'istrade, Nar-sek Qu'tel is a smaller canyon, only a few hundred square yards of area. It is located on the western slopes of Hark's Finger, the solitary mountain jutting up from the flatlands of central Narfell. Nar-sek Qu'tel is used by tribes caught unexpectedly in exceptionally bad storms on the open grassland. There are no caves here, and the entrance is wide, allowing both the wind and enemies easy access. Although the canyon is so small, the same principles of neutrality hold here and no tribe is ever denied access, no matter how crowded the canyon becomes.

The Pit

Strange indeed is the nasty phenomenon known as the wandering pit of Vaasa, or simply, the Pit. The Pit is believed to be a creation of the Witch-King's, let loose when Castle Perilous crumbled. No one has determined the Pit's true nature. It may be a portable, inanimate trap, or several separate but similar traps, or some weird living being. Whatever its nature, the thing cannot be ignored. Even the dwarves of Clan Hillsafar, ever doubting and suspicious, recognize the thing's existence, and they have put up a bounty of 500 gold pieces for information leading to its destruction.

Apparently, the Pit can blend into any landscape. It has caught people walking, and even riding. It has appeared in the bogs of Vaasa, in the grassland of Sunderland, and in the rocky foothills of the Galenas. The Pit shows up as a 20' square hole that opens abruptly underfoot, as if spring-loaded. Victims drop ten feet to a floor of spikes dripping with poison, and then the trap's ceiling springs shut.

One adventuring party saw their point man fall in and land on the spikes. But before they could get to his aid, the trap closed. Desperately they dug for their friend, cutting a trench fully eight feet deep. But they never found the Pit, or their doomed friend, again.

Rilaunyr's Warship

Now in dry dock at Sarshel, Rilaunyr's Warship was once known as the scourge of the Easting Reach. Swift and strong, it patrolled the length of the Reach and out into the Sea of Fallen Stars.

In the heyday of the Impilturian port city, the ship protected merchant vessels putting into or out of Sarshel. Then the shipments of bloodstone bars stopped flowing down from Damara, and Sarshel's importance waned. The Lord Rilaunyr could see how the winds were blowing, and brought his pride into dry-dock for refurbishing.

Rilaunyr longs to get back to sea. He hopes that the flow of bloodstone will soon resume, and restore his city to its former prominence. When trade is restored, Impiltur's crossed wand and sword banner will once again fly proudly above the deck of this formidable vessel, to the dismay of pirates hungry for merchant prey.

The ship herself is a three-masted ninety-footer. She carries a sailing crew of thirty, and a hundred fighting marines. Mini-ballistae line her ironbound sides; a catapult shoots from the flying deck in the rear, and two massive ballistae are directed over the prow.

The real power of Rilaunyr's Warship lies in magic. When fully manned, she carries six magic-users, levels 7-13, and a complement of twelve clerics of Poseidon, one of whom is a 15th level high priest.

Three of the magic-users possess rings of air elemental control; they keep the sails filled with enchanted wind. The other three handle the offensive and defensive chores, surrounding vulnerable areas in globes of invulnerability and laying low pirate ships with fireballs and lightning bolts. The clerics provide supplies and heal the crew when they are ill or wounded. Daily, they commune with their deity to keep Lord Rilaunyr informed of the fickle attitude of the god of waters, and of his domain.

The Ruins of Monte Veldelio

One of the first mining towns run by humans in Damara was Monte Veldelio. The rugged community was located in the mountains of Arcata near the junction of the Galena and Earthspur ranges. For ten years, Monte Veldelio prospered, with miners trading large hauls of silver and iron each spring and fall.

But then something happened. Like all mountain mining communities, Monte Veldelio spent each winter in isolation, cut off by snow-blocked passes. But one spring, the miners did not return to market.

An expedition was sent out from Valls, but when the few survivors of that party returned, they had literally aged with terror. The winter, the wolves, or something more evil had apparently killed every person in Monte Veldelio. The group found no survivors of the devastated community, and no bodies. Nevertheless, they said that the people of Monte Veldelio returned to dwell in the empty buildings of their town every night—as ghosts.

The empty town stands in the mountains still. Some of the buildings are falling down, but most are still in fair condition. The town offers a false welcome to weary travelers passing through the mountains. PCs might find Monte Veldelio a pleasant and convenient campground . . . until the sun goes down.

The Warren

The Warren is one of the most ingenious and defensible complexes in all the Forgotten Realms. Located in Bloodstone Valley, the Warren encompasses more than three hundred miles of interconnecting tunnels.

The Warren was dug during the reign of the Witch-King by the Alliance of Belt Watchers, a partnership of the dwarves of Clan Orothiar and the halflings of the Waukeshire. The industrious little folk worked day and night, completing the initial network of tunnels in less than a month.

The dwarves of Clan Orothiar have moved on to reopen the Bloodstone Mines, but the Warren's defenses are no less formidable for their absence, and more tunnels are always being added. One now being worked on will connect the Warren to the eastern fortress of the Damaran Gate.

The main nest of tunnels lies under the woods of the Waukeshire. A secondary labyrinth leads through three connecting tunnels to Warrenwood. These tunnels delve under the Beaumaris River and include several flood pits to destroy invaders. Fredegar and his halfling militia now run the place, and their primary goal is the perfection of the interior traps and defenses.

Though an extensive project, construction of the Warren was kept secret for more than a year. Only the dwarves and halflings, and the centaurs of Warrenwood and the Waukeshire knew of it. The diggings only came to light during the Bloodstone Wars.

The Polten-Morov-Ostel alliance sent a force to Bloodstone Valley, to ambush the returning army of Bloodstone. The invaders camped beyond the banks of the Beaumaris, in Warrenwood. Centaur sentries alerted the forces of the Warren, and a plan, drawn up months before, was immediately put into motion. Sneaking up to ground level through trapdoors disguised as tree trunks or boulders, the halflings cut the invading army into isolated groups. The invaders' threat ended in a single night when 100 southerners died, and 900 were captured and held in underground caves. Not a single invader escaped.

The Warren is well-defended still. Any would-be invader would be smart to raise an army of kobolds or pixies. The tunnels of the place are designed for little folk, and most are cramped even for halflings. Orcs or men would have to crawl—an unpleasant position from which to face a halfling warrior specifically trained to fight in tight places.

Catching the halfling community unawares would prove equally difficult. This is a wary bunch, who learned bitter lessons in the past. At the first sound of trouble, be it a centaur horn or a halfling shout, the folk of the Waukeshire disappear into tunnels within their own homes—tunnels which all connect by a single passage to the Warren. This long entry has more than 20 doors leading out of it, 19 of which are cunningly trapped. Only the halflings and their allies know which is the right entrance.

The centaurs have formally allied with the halflings, and centaur sentries constantly patrol the two woodlands. In return, the defensive needs of the centaur community have been attended to. Two secret chambers have been recently constructed, one in Warrenwood and one in the Waukeshire. With their entrances hidden under brush, these chambers provide the centaurs with a shelter for their weak and young, or for all of them in times of desperation. Iron doors seal off the chambers from any menace outside. Once these are bolted, only the halflings within the Warren can approach, making their way through back tunnels to their centaur allies.

Watcher's Mounds

The Watcher's Mounds are a series of encampments built by the monks of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose through the southern stretches of the Earthspur Mountains. Construction of new campsites continues along the trails down from the monks' mountain home. The exact number of these places is not known, but is estimated to be well over a hundred.

The Watcher's "Mounds" are not necessarily mounds at all. They might be a lean-to, or a hidden firepit in a tiny cave overhung by a cluster of boulders. In whatever form, Watcher's Mounds remain an open invitation to travelers in the Earthspurs. To goblins and orcs, these are simply pre-built, defensible campsites, which they often use.

The goodly folk of the surrounding kingdoms know that a Watcher's Mound might provide much more than just a place to stay for the night. Somewhere on every site lies a secret cache of dried foods, water, even adventuring supplies such as a tinderbox or a knife. These goods might be hidden under a stone or perhaps in a tree hollow. Even PCs unfamiliar with the Bloodstone Lands are likely to have heard of this, at least as a rumor.

Aside from the monks, rangers are the most common visitors to a Watcher's Mound. Rarely short of supplies, rangers are more apt to leave goods behind than to deplete the stores. Thus, any mound visited by PCs is likely to be well-stocked (90% chance that this is so).

Dungeon Masters should note that supplies in the mounds are intended for necessity, not convenience. PCs of Good or even Neutral alignments should not simply loot a mound. In fact, if they have extra supplies, they would be wise to leave something behind. The rangers and monks take note of looters, and often form opinions about parties being considered friend or enemy based on their behavior at one of the mounds. Although the rangers and monks have better work than to seek retribution on a party of casual looters, they would be quick to come to the aid of a party in danger who previously had behaved better.

MOVERS AND SHAKERS

This isolated region is so filled with interesting and powerful individuals that it would require a sourcebook much larger than this to list them all. Most of the Damaran provinces, all of Impiltur's great cities, and each tribe of fierce Nars are led by noteworthy individuals who have surrounded themselves with mighty friends. Add to this the large number of colorful adventurers now roaming the opening frontier of Vaasa, and you have an impressive group indeed!

For the purposes of this work, then, here are the leaders and wanderers most likely to add color to an adventure or campaign in the Bloodstone Lands. They might appear as NPCs, or even as PCs (in the case of those characters which first appeared in the H-series of modules).

Abordabe

Central Narfell
30th level fighter
LN, Tempus
Human male
ST 17, DEX 18, CN 16

As leader of the largest tribe in Narfell, Abordabe supervises the massive Trade Fair each summer. He is at least 65 years old, but seems in no way ready to relinquish his command to a younger, stronger warrior.

Abordabe is not a big man, only 5'3" and 145 pounds. What he lacks in size he more than makes up for in skill and experience. His tribe numbers nearly 4,000, but few would even imagine challenging him for the throne. All the folk of Abordabe rightly believe that their leader is the finest warrior in Narfell. However, when time finally takes away their venerable ruler, at least 100 warriors will vie for the chieftainship.

Abordabe is as wise as he is battle-skilled. He is slow to anger and quite tolerant of outsiders (for a Nar). PCs caught by tribe Abordabe will have a fair chance of being released. They may even get permission to continue adventuring in the region, so long as their actions are honorable, with no malice.

Afrafa

Wanders (Arcata)
11th level monk
LG, Ilmater
Human female
WIS 16, DEX 17, CHA 17

Afrafa is the highest ranking female ever among the monks of the Monastery of the Yellow Rose. She is also the youngest monk ever to ride the remorhaz, a deed accomplished when she was 15 years old and only 2nd level! But that is only one feat in a long line for this courageous and energetic woman. Now 25, she is Master of the South Wind and preparing to challenge for 12th level.

Afrafa idolizes the monk Kane, viewing him as the epitome of what it means to be a monk of St. Sollars. She has followed Kane's lead and now wanders the foothills of the Galenas and the Earthspurs in Arcata. She lives a subsistence-level existence and helps wherever she might. Her dark hair and saucer eyes shine past the squalor of her lifestyle, and her looks often get Afrafa into trouble with scoundrels. But her beauty obscures her toughness and inner strength, and she can take care of herself. At heart a romantic, Afrafa does not hate men, but those who pursue her with twisted smiles and beery breath find themselves much the worse for the experience!

Bahooa Shortsleeves

Wanders (Impiltur)
3rd level fighter/4th level thief
LN, Brandobaris
Halfling male
ST 17, DEX 18, CN 16

Bahooa Shortsleeves, "Bahoo," is the best friend and traveling companion of the gnome Bistro Battenrooj. Unlikely as it seems, Bahoo fancies himself a barbarian fighter. Folks in the know believe that the illusionist gnome uses hypnosis spells to foster Bahoo's delusions.

Whatever the cause of his fantasies, Bahoo is extremely gifted for one of his race. Strong, agile, and tough, Bahoo has the physical attributes to back up his boasts, although he is bravest before the fight begins. His mentality remains pure halfling. For all his huffing and puffing, Bahoo would rather run than fight.

Banak

Citadel of Assassins
20th level cleric
CE, Orcus?
Human male
WIS 18

Banak was once the reigning evil priest in all the Bloodstone Lands. He had attained 24th level, but his power has declined with the fall of his vile deity. Nevertheless, his experience and obsessively evil nature keep him in power and he remains one of the commanders of the Grandfather of Assassins' bandit army. Banak retained his 1st through 3rd level spell abilities in full when Orcus fell, and somehow he still manages to use a higher level spell now and then. No one knows whether he found a new god-figure to replace his deposed deity, whether he had a stockpile of scrolls hidden away, or whether some magic item empowers him with the more important spells. His associates never doubted that Banak would find some way to reclaim his lost power.

Banak's speciality and love is for the realm of undead. Every day he casts animate dead spells on whatever corpses he has managed to acquire. The Grandfather of Assassins and his chief advisor, Knellict, are worried that Banak is trying to create his own separate army. The Grandfather and Knellict have simple plans: they pursue wealth and security working with the thieves' guild of Heliogabalus. Banak's agenda would first see the bandits conquered, then he could claim Vaasa as his own. The evil priest craves another try at conquest.

PCs wandering in the Galenas east of Bloodstone should be wary of Banak. While the cleric is unlikely to risk a personal face-to-face battle, he might order his zombie and skeleton forces against an encampment. Alternatively, he might send his staff of the adder to crawl in unnoticed among a sleeping group. In his endless quest for cadavers, Banak is not averse to creating a few on his own!

Bistro Battenrooj

Wanders (Impiltur)
4th level fighter/4th level illusionist
NG, Garl Glittergold
Gnome male
INT 16, DEX 16

One of the few surface gnomes in the region, Bistro Battenrooj is possibly the most colorful character PCs will ever encounter. He is a fighter/illusionist by trade, but proclaims himself a monk. He does manage to look the part, despite his diminutive stature and his outrageous hat—yellow and green, wide-brimmed, and feathered. He wears plain clothing and travels light, thanks to a belt pouch that is really a bag of holding. For weapons, he uses only a dagger, a crossbow, or his walking stick (jo stick), all suitable for a monk.

But under Bistro's plain robe and cape is a form-fitting, custom-made suit of fine elven chain mail (+3). Bistro is quick to cast a phantasmal force if the armor is in danger of being discovered. Thus he explains his incredibly hard skin as "a testament to his deep levels of concentration."

Typically, Bistro utilizes all his illusionist tricks to support his disguise. In battle, he will try to slip in on the enemy's flank and launch a color spray. Then he will wade in among his stunned and unconscious opponents, punching and running about. His allies get the impression that he took down his opponents with his deadly open hand combat style, as Bistro camouflages this maneuver with phantasmal force spells. If his allies are also engaged in combat, they have very little chance of discovering his tricks.

When Bistro first encounters adventurers, he will play his other favorite game, especially if the party shows any doubt of his claims to be a monk. Casting a phantasmal force, Bistro goes through an open hand and jo stick attack routine. The spell makes him appear as if he had six arms, all moving in a coordinated blur.

Whether Bistro really believes his claim, or whether he just enjoys the challenge of maintaining the disguise has never been determined. Insiders suspect the latter. After all, Bistro is responsible for the hypnosis spells that delude his halfling traveling companion, Bahooa Shortsleeves.

Cantoule

Monastery of the Yellow Rose
17th level monk
LG, Ilmater
Human male
ST 17, WIS 17, DEX 18, CHA 16

At 40, Cantoule is young for his station as the reigning Grand Master of Flowers. He was pressed into the position when Grand Master Poke died, and Kane professed no desire to hold the station for any extended period. Even then Cantoule was not the next most obvious successor. Unfortunately, the man who was next in line, a 15th level monk named Temmenische, was also 95 years old. Kane and Temmenische realized that Cantoule would be the most appropriate successor, so they put him through a crash course of the higher level lessons.

Cantoule continues his lessons even as he presides over the monastery. Times are peaceful, tradition keeps things running smoothly, and the young Grand Master seems up to the task. His first serious test will come in the near future when he must decide who the monastery will support among the would-be kings of the Damaran region. All indications point to Gareth Dragonsbane as his choice.

Cantoule freely accepts visitors to the monastery. If they are worthy (Good alignment), he might give them a private audience. Cantoule will be directly or indirectly involved with any significant actions that PCs take in the southern Earthspur Mountains.

Cat One-eye

Wanders (Damara)
21st level thief
NE, None
Half-elf female
IN 16, DEX 18

Cat One-eye is a dangerous agent of the Assassins Guild. She is a "snuffer," a contract murderer who finds the most difficult hits the most appealing.

Cat One-eye is a diminutive woman, standing only 4'6" and weighing perhaps 85 pounds soaking wet. She is not unattractive, with long dark hair and deep brown eyes, but anyone looking closely will spot the coldness within, the passionless void common to one of her vile trade.

Unlike many professionals in her trade, Cat One-eye simply enjoys killing, whether or not money is involved. If she encounters a band of PCs on the road, she is apt to attempt their demise for the challenge of it, or for any attractive treasures they might be carrying.

Whenever she is about to make a hit, Cat One-eye dons a magical eye patch. This item casts a continual silence 10' radius when worn. It also has the power to hypnotize one victim (save at -4).

Given Cat One-eye's penchant for dangerous challenges, it is feared in Bloodstone Village that her latest target may be Gareth Dragonsbane himself. When she has a target on the agenda, she is less likely to engage in casual killing. No one knows where this killer is now, but she was last seen in Heliogabalus.

Celedon Kierney

Wanders (Galena Mountains)

8th level magic-user/

24th level thief-acrobat

CG, Dionysus

Half-elf male

IN 18, DEX 18, CHA 16

Handsome, young, and adventuresome, Sir Celedon is a hero in the truest sense of the word—he always shows up when he is most needed. A master thief and a skilled magician, Celedon is a powerful ally. He possesses many magic items, including an ebony fly figurine of wondrous power and a defender sword +4.

But when the trouble is over, Celedon's true character shines through. He is a lover of wine and women, a prankster who often enrages his closest friends, particularly the somewhat stuffy Gareth Dragonsbane. Celedon has little regard for titles or station, and views "etiquette" as an invitation to have fun.

An original member of the company of heroes that rose against the bandit army in Bloodstone, Celedon served as Commander and Chief Scout in the Bloodstone Army throughout the war years. In the final battle with the Witch-King, when Gareth and company traveled to the Abyss, it was Celedon who stole the Wand of Orcus and delivered it to the Seven Heavens for its final destruction. This heroic act effectively ended the war.

Today Celedon continues his heroics as a leader of Spysong, the Bloodstone scouting network. As chief spy in the Galenas, Celedon has been working to discover the whereabouts of the new Citadel of Assassins and the bandit army. However, he is presently encamped on Suncatcher Mountain investigating the strange cloud that has enveloped the spire. Celedon suspects that the cloud is a magical kingdom of cloud giants, but he wants a closer look before reporting to Riordan Parnell. He tells himself, "It's not wise to make assumptions," when he feels the need to justify his delay. In fact, he knows that cloud giants might have a bauble or two he could take before the army rolls in.

Christine Dragonsbane

Bloodstone Village

7th level druid

N (G), Sylvanus

Human female

CHA 17

Lady Christine, Baroness of Bloodstone, is possibly the most influential woman in Damara, even above Baroness Sylvia of Ostel. Somewhat aloof and haughty with most people, Christine nevertheless understands the diplomatic demands of her station. She is the wife of Gareth Dragonsbane and would become Queen if the new Bloodstone kingdom comes to be.

Christine inherited her title when her father, Baron Tranth, gave the throne of Bloodstone to her new husband. Had she not married, Christine would soon have become the Baroness anyway. Tranth could see she was ready to rule, and no one in Bloodstone doubted her ability to lead them. When the bandit army first appeared, before Gareth and his friends arrived on the scene, Lady Christine was the first to stand up to them. By the time Gareth and company rolled into town, she had already organized the militia.

Gareth knew when he married Christine that she would be his partner, not a subservient wife. Christine has taken an active role in Bloodstone's rise to power, acting as the principal emissary to two very important allied groups, the centaurs and halflings of the region. She is a druid, and Gareth a paladin, but neither one considered that either of them should change their religious callings. Gareth and Christine have a wonderful marriage and plan on a large family as soon as the situation in Damara settles down.

Dimian Ree

Heliogabalus
11th level thief
CN, Ilmater?
Human male
IN 16, CHA 16

As Gareth Dragonsbane's principal rival for the throne, Dimian Ree is deeply and firmly rooted on the seat of power in Heliogabalus. He bears the title of the Baron of Morov and is a rightful, though distant, heir to the title of King of united Damara. Cruel and ruthless, Dimian Ree wants power and will stop at nothing to achieve it. To this end, the Baron of Morov surrounds himself with powerful but vile allies, and enthroned behind a wall of murder and intrigue.

It is no secret that Dimian Ree is first cousin to Tarkos Ree, head of Heliogabalus' infamous thieves' guild. This tie hurts Ree's esteem in the farm communities, but actually strengthens his position in the city provinces. Few wish to cross the thieves' guild, especially not the merchants of Heliogabalus.

Dimian Ree claims Ilmater as his god, as he must in order to win the allegiance of the Damaran people. He attends services regularly, but actions speak louder than ritualized words. It is apparent, to his critics at least, that this man is a godless tyrant, without concern for punishment to come in some unknown afterlife.

Ree blundered badly when he refused to send his army to support the army of Bloodstone in their struggle against the Witch-King. Ree expected Zhengyi would prove victorious once again. When the Witch-King fell, Gareth was hailed as a hero, and the Baron of Morov had to work furiously to salvage his position.

Presently, Dimian Ree appears to have recouped his losses; his position is strong once again. His primary ally after the thieves' guild is Baroness Sylvia of Ostel. Sylvia's allegiance is assured by her certainty that, if Dimian Ree falls, she will surely follow.

While Gareth's support swells, Dimian Ree cannot rest. He has reached out to a third ally, the Grandfather of Assassins.

This move is a gamble—many of Ree's followers would turn away from him if they knew he was associating with the wicked Citadel of Assassins. But Dimian Ree seeks a way to strike out against the rise of Bloodstone, as he must if he hopes to reestablish the Kingdom of Damara with himself as its king.

Dormythyrr

Goliad
5th level fighter
LG, Ilmater
Human male
ST 17, CHA 16

When times seemed darkest for Brandiar, when the Witch-King had once again sent his forces crashing through the province, a single man rallied the Duchy into unity and brought precious reinforcements to the army of Bloodstone. That man was Dormythyrr, a simple farmer tilling his fields on the outskirts of Goliad.

Brave and handsome, and wise beyond his 25 years, Dormythyrr won the hearts of Brandiar's people, and the friendship of Gareth and company alike on that fateful day. He assumed the stewardship of the empty Ducal seat, and he remains there today. But the Witch-King completely eradicated Brandiar's noble line, and it is increasingly obvious that soon Dormythyrr will be officially declared Duke of Brandiar.

He is a thoughtful man, slow to anger, one who trusts his common sense. Most importantly, Dormythyrr is absolutely dedicated to the Duchy and to its place in the region as a whole. He is firmly behind Gareth Dragonsbane and the proposed Kingdom of Bloodstone.

Emelyn The Gray

Wanders (southern Damara)
21st level magic-user
LG, Ilmater
Human male
IN 18, DEX 16

The most powerful mage in the region, Emelyn the Gray would like nothing better than to settle down among the centaurs of Warrenwood and pursue mild scholastic challenges. This is quite a change from his youth, when he was an ardent adventurer looking for excitement and the acquisition of knowledge and spells. When age started to catch up with him, he retired to teach magic in the centaur academy he founded.

The war with Vaasa destroyed the school, and ended his hopes for a peaceful place in which to pass his twilight years. Nearly 60 at the time, Emelyn took up his staff of the magi and set out. He joined up with Gareth and company soon after, rounding out the group with his powerful magic.

During the ensuing rise of Bloodstone, Emelyn took as his apprentice the daughter of a baker, Gabrielle, who hopes eventually to become Emelyn's wife. With the help of Lady Christine, they began rebuilding the centaur school, seeking the quietude Emelyn desires.

Events continue to interfere, however. Gaunt and white-haired, Emelyn finds himself chasing adventure once again. As leader of the Twilight Riders, he rides through southern Damara delivering Gareth's hopes and promises to the people.

It is a testament to his loyalty and intelligence that Emelyn is able to pull off this often difficult diplomatic mission, for he has never been known as a tactful man. He is and always has been a complainer, to say nothing of being absent-minded and sometimes bumbling. But in times of true danger and need, Emelyn is as powerful an ally and as deadly a foe as anyone would ever know.

Friar Dugald

Bloodstone
22nd level cleric
LG, Dionysus
Human male
WIS 18

Bald, immensely fat, and with a constant smile stamped on his face, Friar Dugald's appearance hardly hints at the man's power. Always up for a good meal and a good drink, the friar has waded into more than one barroom brawl in his days. Of course, his behavior is frowned upon by the more stodgy members of the clergy. But while those stuffy ministers remained secure behind their chapel walls, Friar Dugald was out fighting for the cause of good, even traveling to the Abyss to thwart the rulers of the lower planes!

Dugald resides in Bloodstone these days, supervising the growth of the barony and ministering to his swelling flock. He is arguably Gareth's closest advisor, and in his own simple manner he has done as much to solidify the possibilities for a new and better kingdom as has the Baron paladin himself. The funds he has donated to the city of Goliad will build the greatest church in the land. If the loyalty of the Duchy of Brandiar had been in doubt before, Friar Dugald's actions guaranteed the province's earnest enthusiasm. The money was given anonymously, although his identity leaked out (conveniently).

Now Dugald walks among the common people. He inconspicuously listens for any news indicating an attempt might be made against Gareth's life. He is anxious about the bandit army, and eager for word of their whereabouts. With his mace of disruption comfortably in hand, he wants to personally end the threat of the evil priest Banak and his undead legions.

Gareth Dragonsbane

Bloodstone
21st level paladin
LG, Ilmater
Human male
ST 18/30, CN 17, CHA 18

Gareth Dragonsbane, Baron of Bloodstone, is undoubtedly the most important and impressive man in all of Damara, perhaps in all of the Bloodstone Lands. A holy knight of the Order of the Golden Cup, Gareth had a glorious and prosperous adventuring career until he settled on a large estate in northern Damara. But then arose the Witch-King, and Gareth Dragonsbane's life would never be the same. His comfortable home was destroyed while he was fighting the war as a Brigade Commander in the Damaran army.

When the first phase of war was over, and the Witch-King victorious, a despondent Gareth met six special friends: Olwen Forest-friend, Friar Dugald, Celdon Kierney, Riordan Parnell, Emelyn the Gray, and Kane, the wandering monk. This powerful group came to Bloodstone where they spearheaded the defeat of the bandit army, the fall of rival provinces, and finally, the overthrow of the Witch-King himself.

During this period, Gareth fell in love with, then married Lady Christine, daughter of Baron Tranth of Bloodstone. Tranth was weary of rule. Seeing the mettle of his new son-in-law, he abdicated, relinquishing his title to Gareth.

The new baron remains as energetic a ruler as he was a fighter. He has engineered the unprecedented rise of Bloodstone, and on him lie the hopes that this once-flourishing kingdom may be restored. It is no accident that Gareth would rise to such heights. Unlike many of his profession, he is quite tolerant of others, viewing the range of goodness as wide enough to include those who may falter occasionally. Gareth has won the hearts and the loyalty of people all across Damara, a devotion that grows as his reputation spreads. He understands the value of his friends and his allies, and takes great care not to offend those whose ultimate goals are also directed toward the overall benefit of the kingdom.

Despite the protests of his over-protective friends, Gareth refuses to rule from the security of an "ivory tower." He frequently rides among his people on his warhorse Glendan, crying out for the cause of good. He bears Crusader, his holy sword, raised high above him (see below).

Crusader

- +5 holy avenger long sword
 - All holy avenger abilities as described in the Dungeon Master Guide, plus:
 - Heal 1/day
 - Strength 1/day
 - Charm person* on contact 1/day
- Furthermore, Crusader will disintegrate any minor creature from the lower planes on an unmodified "to hit" role of 20.

Garumbelly Hillsafar

Sunderland, Vaasa
7th level fighter
LG, Moradin
Dwarven male
ST 18/50, CN 18

As leader of Clan Hillsafar's 2,000 sturdy dwarves, Garumbelly "Grumble" Hillsafar wields great power indeed. Gruff and surly in appearance and attitude, Grumble is really a generous and compassionate leader. He is always thinking of the good of the clan and ready to help out wherever he is needed.

Grumble got his nickname through his habit of constantly mumbling to himself mostly complaints or uncomplimentary comments. He is a straight-shooter, saying exactly what is on his mind and the consequences be damned! If he doesn't like someone, he'll tell them so in no uncertain terms. Conversely, if a PC makes a friend of Grumble, that character will have gained the most powerful and loyal ally in all of Vaasa.

Hedweck

Wanders (Vaasa)
14th level barbarian fighter
LG, Tempus
Human male
ST 18/00, DEX 18, CN 18

An incredibly impressive physical specimen, Hedweck stands 6'5", weighs 260 pounds, and has 125 hit points. White Worm's "spirit hunter," the barbarian spends his days roaming the Vaasan bog. A spirit hunter is always the greatest warrior of the people, sent out by the shaman to battle "evil spirits" that would invade the tribe's domain. As it happens, a spirit hunter considers any one he meets to be an evil spirit! Thus this magnificent man is doomed to a solitary life of endless battle by his own physical prowess, and by such enhancements as are worked by the shaman.

Hedweck wields Bonecrusher, a gigantic +3 magical maul (damage 2-20), and wears the sacred wormskin vestments of White Worm (treat as AC2, not including dexterity bonus). The shaman's tinkering makes matters even worse for potential enemies: the barbarian is under deadly hypnotic influences. He fights in an absolute rage: +2 to initiative, +2 to hit, and 3 swings/round. He will continue battling for three rounds after reaching 0 hit points, regardless of the extent of further damage.

If Hedweck is defeated, his corpse transforms into the semblance of a remorhaz then dissipates to be carried on the cold winds back to the tribe on the edge of the Great Glacier. Another spirit hunter will then be chosen and augmented by the shaman's hypnosis (raising his ability scores appropriately). Naturally, this new warrior's first mission will be to hunt down and kill the slayer of his predecessor.

Hobart Bracegirdle

Wanders (Damara)
5th level fighter
LG, Yondalla
Halfling male
ST 18/00 (gauntlets), CHA 17

Snorting commands from astride his prized war-pig, Hobart Bracegirdle and his fellow Kneebreakers scour the Damaran countryside in search of wrongs needing righting. This tough-talking halfling warrior inspires his fighters to new heights of bravery—almost to the point where they will engage in combat even when they're not actually cornered!

In truth, Hobart is a fine leader for his band. He is a long-spittin', rootin'-tootin' ruffian (in the halfling context) and he wants to make his name rank with the names of such heroes as Olwen Forest-friend or Kane the monk.

PCs encountering Hobart's band will be in for an adventure for sure. Once it is decided that the groups are on the same side, the Kneebreakers will join up with the PC party, bringing with them endless tales of heroism and courage. In the end, Hobart will probably lead the entire group into a complete mess and then fight a retreating action with his band as the PCs scramble to put things right. When the fighting is winding down, the Kneebreakers will roar in from the flank, crying out their goddess' name, waving shining weapons above their heads.

If forced into honest battle, Hobart and his companions will actually prove themselves to be able fighters. Hobart wears gauntlets of ogre power and wields a +4 defender short sword. (He always uses the bonus for defense!)

Horse

Wanders (Narfell)
8th level fighter/12th level thief
NE, None
Human male
DEX 18, CN 16

Horse has been the bane of many individuals caught out on the open Narfellian grassland, and even small groups are not safe from him. Small and dirty, Horse was named for his smell. Even his fellow Nars, brutal people in the truest sense of the word, cannot fathom the depths of this man's cruelty. He was kicked out of the tribe because of his unbridled savagery. His people would have killed him, but they fear he is possessed by some mighty evil spirit.

Horse is as proficient in camouflage as a tundra yeti (surprise on a 1-5). He will attack whenever it is convenient to him, day or night. If the day grows long, or if a party outnumbers him by more than 3 to 1, he will wait for darkness.

If the sun is high, Horse often employs deadly hit-and-run tactics. His favorite move is to spring up right in the midst of a traveling band and plant a poisoned, barbed spear in the back or side of the nearest rider. This spear will be attached by cord to a nearby rock or stump. Having little slack, the cord pulls taut within a round, dismounting the rider nine times out of ten. Horse disappears into the landscape before the party can even get their mounts turned around.

If caught in open battle, Horse fights with two hand axes. His weapons are doubly deadly, whether axe or spear. Horse has learned the secret of passawaw grass, the primary ingredient in a very virulent poison. The barbarian dips each and every one of his weapons in this evil concoction before battle. The gummy substance remains on the speartip or axebled for one full turn + 3-12 rounds. Anyone struck by these coated weapons must save vs. poison at + 2, or take an additional 4-24 points of damage.

Kane

Wanders
17th level monk
LG, Ilmater
Human male
DEX 17

Taken in as an orphaned infant by the Monastery of the Yellow Rose, Kane became their most successful student. Life among the monks of the Order of the Yellow Rose is an exercise of self-restraint and self-sacrifice, and Kane is devout even by their high standards. He spends no less than four hours meditating and four hours practicing his skills every day.

Shortly after he attained the Master of Spring rank, the second highest in the order, Kane took a vow of poverty and set out into the world. No one seeing him on the road would ever guess at the real power of the man. Dressed in rags and leaning on his walking stick (jo stick), he deliberately works at the most menial and physically demanding jobs to earn his daily bread.

Kane's lifelong quest is to discover a higher plane of existence. It seems that he is reaching this goal, for rumors say that he has attained a "spirit walking" ability. In his meditative position, Kane can send his mind across any physical distance or into any plane. Then, through sheer concentration, he brings his corporeal body along.

Kane distinguished himself at the Battle of Bloodstone Village. He joined up with Gareth and company in their struggles against the bandit army. Dodging wizards' lightning bolts and boulders cast by giants, Kane cut through the hand-picked bodyguard of the Grandfather of Assassins and brought the man down with his bare hands. After the battle, Kane left Gareth's entourage because he was called back to the Monastery of the Yellow Rose. The monastery's leader had died suddenly, and Kane was considered next in line. The monk accepted the responsibility thrust upon his shoulders and temporarily took over the leadership of the monastery until a new Grand Master of Flowers could be trained.

That duty done, Kane is back on the road again, working as Spysong's principal agent in Vaasa. Using his carpet of flying and his spirit walking ability, he has traveled to the farthest reaches of this desolate land. Presently, he visits the barbarians of White Worm, the only foreigner to do so since the downfall of Zhengyi. Kane used his talents at riding the remorhaz to awe the superstitious barbarians into accepting him as an emissary.

Knellic

Citadel of Assassins
21st level magic-user
NE, Orcus
Human male
IN 18, DEX 17, CHA 16

There may be no more dangerous a man in all the Forgotten Realms than this quiet, unassuming wizard. Perhaps the biggest regret of Gareth and his friends is that, although they have twice routed the bandit army, the Arch-mage Knellict continues to elude them.

Knellict rose to power over years, or perhaps centuries, of obsessive study. Nevertheless, he remained fairly anonymous until he became the Witch-King's principal advisor. Zhengyi himself learned to fear this emotionless mage, and shipped him off to the Grandfather of Assassins.

Knellict enjoys his present role in the Grandfather's organization. It was Knellict who first suggested that the Citadel go underground and knit ties with Tightpurse, the thieves' guild in Heliogabalus. His advice is never taken lightly, even by the Grandfather of Assassins, and Timoshenko rapidly set the plan into motion. The Grandfather might have seen the wisdom of the mage's plan, or perhaps he was simply afraid to argue the point. Knellict has a very free reign, and the whole bandit gang is devoted to the service of evil.

Kyrlraun

Lyrabar
20th level paladin
LG, Ilmater
Human male
ST 17, WIS 17, CHA 18

Leader of the Lords of Imphras II, Kyrlraun is, in effect, the governor of all of Impiltur. Queen Sambryl, less interested in affairs of state, rarely makes decisions or even a public statement without Kyrlraun's knowledgeable advice.

Kyrlraun's success stems from the same traits that serve Gareth Dragonsbane so well. He is a paladin, but tolerant and understanding of those of an inferior station. The present situation in Damara is his biggest concern. If PCs of any importance came into Impiltur from Damara, Kyrlraun would surely arrange a secret meeting, probably in the mining town of Dunfee, to seek current information from them.

Marco Wildfeet

Soravia
8th level ranger
LG, Ilmater/Mielikki
Human male
ST 16, WIS 16

Marco Wildfeet finds himself in a situation similar to that of Dormythyrr, the Steward of Brandiar. Both men have been unofficially placed in a position of power and, like Dormythyrr, Marco has come to fame through deed, not blood. Leader of the Soravian Talebringers, Marco draws the hopes of the people of Soravia. They look to him to unite the province, a task he seems well on his way to accomplishing.

A humble man, Marco wants to do his duty to his countrymen and then fade into the background of peacetime politics. He is not comfortable being in the public eye, and has every intention of nominating Olwen Forest-friend, the general from Bloodstone, to be the next Duke of Soravia. PCs in Soravia would benefit greatly from any meeting with Marco and his charges. They will find Marco pleasant and engaging, a valuable source of information and a loyal ally.

Mariabronne The Rover

The Vaasan Gate
? level ranger
CG, Mielikki
Human male
DEX 17, CN 18

Mariabronne the Rover is a wandering ranger who knows the Vaasan wilderness as well as any man alive. Dark and rugged-looking, his face wears a perpetual scowl although he is really an easy-going, unjudgmental man. Mariabronne can often be found at the Vaasan Gate, looking to sell his services as a scout to parties venturing into Vaasa. He believes in the policy of taming this wild land and will adjust his fees to accommodate the wealth of the party involved.

Mariabronne's level is flexible, giving Dungeon Masters an opportunity to bring this NPC into any campaign. As a general rule, he should be two or three levels above the party average. For inexperienced Dungeon Masters, this can serve as a convenient "out" if they create foes who overmatch the PCs. Mariabronne's magic can likewise be manipulated to fit the campaign.

Whatever his level, this scout's most important aspect is his knowledge of the Vaasan wilderness. Mariabronne knows where to find adventure, and if the party gets in trouble, Mariabronne will know the fastest route to a sanctuary such as Hillsafar Hall or the Cave of the Whispering Wind.

Mykros

Valls
10th level fighter
LG, Ilmater
Human male
ST 18/26, CN 16

As Commander of the Arcatan Ducal Guard, Mykros is Duke William the 8th's right-hand man. However, Duke William does not control the man, for Mykros' undying loyalty is directed to the kingdom as a whole. He feels that its brightest hopes lie with the heroes who threw down the Witch-King and Mykros is actually in league with Baron Gareth of Bloodstone.

Commander Mykros is a quiet, observant man. He will take an interest in a party of any note who comes into the Arcatan capital. If he judges a party to be honorable and worthy, he will inform them of the opportunities awaiting them at the Vaasan Gate and steer them toward Bloodstone.

Myrddin Viligoth

Myrddin Viligoth was raised in the strange eastern land of Thay and came to practice magic in the towers of the vile Red Wizards. Like so many of their very young recruits, Myrddin did not realize the true nature of these evil wizards until he had been among them for many years.

Unlike many others, Myrddin had the strength and courage to flee this evil band and their wicked land. He came to Damara shortly after the fall of the Witch-King and sought out the heroes who had defeated Zhengyi. Powerful beyond his years, he carried warnings to them of the potential threat represented by Thay. Emelyn the Gray took the still-young wizard under his wing.

It was Myrddin who saw that Gareth's plan for a new kingdom needed grassroots support in the south. With Emelyn, he founded the Twilight Riders. The Riders straddle magical steeds which Myrddin creates using a sunhorse spell, magic he devised while in Thay. With this spell, Myrddin creates enchanted steeds from the last rays of sunset or the first rays of dawn, one for every level of his experience. These magical mounts last 24 hours, until the next respective setting or rising of the sun.

Myrddin is a very private person. He only recently took the god Ilmater as his patron deity and is enthusiastic, if not preachy, about his new faith. He accepts those whose ways deviate from his own personal code, but he has no tolerance whatsoever for evil.

Olwen Forrest-friend

Soravia
21st level ranger
LG, Mielikki
Human male
ST 18/24, DEX 17

A hearty outdoorsman with a bushy black beard and a laugh that shakes the walls of inns, Olwen Forest-friend wandered into Damara at the kingdom's darkest hour and helped bring back the light. Olwen was no stranger to battling evil wizards when he joined up with Gareth and the others. He had lost all his followers in a desperate battle to save the race of treants and had taken to the road alone and despondent. But sorrow could not bow down this boisterous ranger for long. Tidings of evil days in Damara brought new fire to his deepset eyes.

Olwen always remained in the background of the exploits of Gareth and company, but they acknowledge his value as the solid anchor to the group. Presently, Olwen leads a large contingent of the Bloodstone army on its rescue mission through the last Vaasan strongholds in northern Soravia. The ranger makes friends wherever he goes, particularly among the children of these war-torn villages. He presents a very positive image in Soravia, an example of what the new Kingdom of Bloodstone might have to offer. There are even rumors that Olwen will be named the next Duke of Soravia, a position he secretly desires.

Olwen bears boots of speed, a cloak of elvenkind, and a longbow of the forest (+1 strength bow with double normal range). His favorite battle tactic is to run all around his enemies, hiding in optimum positions and raining destruction upon them from afar. From the treants he rescued, Olwen learned the secret of creating magical arrows, even arrows of slaying, so he is particularly deadly in this type of guerilla warfare.

His current exploits are not quite enough to engage all his attention. Olwen hopes that he will meet up with Hurl and Burl and Rangers Three (the Thinkers of the Thinkers) before they engage in their climactic battle with the rampaging band of stone giants known as the Thinkers.

Quillan The Sage

Sage
N, Sylvanus
Human male
IN 16

More than 70 years old but hardier than he looks, Quillan the Sage is an advisor to Gareth Dragonsbane. His pride, though, lies with the time he has worked with Lady Christine, now Baroness of Bloodstone, for it was he who trained Tranth's daughter in the druidical ways.

Quillan's areas of knowledge include legends and folklore, history, and flora of the Bloodstone Lands. While the legends, folklore, and history of the region are the most valuable to the reigning Baron, it is the flora of the Bloodstone Lands which most fascinates Quillan. When asked any question, he will undoubtedly work in some remark about local plants.

Riordan Parnell

Wanders (Galena Mountains)
21st level bard
(8th level fighter/9th level thief)
Half-elf male
DEX 16, CHA 16

Handsome and dashing, Riordan Parnell is as mischievous and adventurous as his cousin, Celedon Kierney. His life has been a rollercoaster ride between riches and poverty, but whatever his present financial state, Riordan is always ready for adventure. He enjoys equally stealing a kiss from a fair lass or hunting down the bandit army. He is a thrillseeker, living his life to the fullest and always on the edge of disaster.

Riordan's value to Gareth and company over the last few years cannot be underestimated. In addition to keeping a short rein on Celedon (something only Riordan seems able to accomplish), the bard's rousing songs kept the fires of hope burning in the face of the most terrible setbacks.

Riordan continues to serve the cause today. His melodies echo off the rocky mountain walls as he wanders the passes of the Galenas. He is the cornerstone of the Spysong scouting network, and considers himself personally responsible for all of its members. As if he weren't busy enough designing the infrastructure of the spy network, Riordan also weaves most of the ditties that carry the coded messages back down to his allies in Damara.

PCs encountering Riordan in the mountains will probably find him alone or with one other member of Spysong. He will be pleasant and friendly. Because he is so knowledgeable in regards to the goings-on in the region, he might have a suggestion for those who are seeking shelter or adventure. In spite of his overwhelming workload with Spysong, Riordan might also be tempted to tag along with a party—just for the fun of it.

Sylvia

Praka
14th level magic-user
LE, Ilmater?
Human female
IN 16, CHA 16

Like her closest ally, Dimian Ree, Baroness Sylvia of Ostel proclaims Ilmater as her god. Most people seriously doubt this, for the wicked baroness hardly behaves like a follower of the god of suffering. She surrounds herself with luxury at the expense of her hard-working people, and has personally witnessed more than two dozen executions of her political opponents. Others present at the time report she wore a vile look of satisfaction on her face.

Sylvia's power in Praka is firmly rooted; she has charmed or frightened all the landowners in the city to her side. But outside of that city, the baroness is truly despised, especially within the boundaries of her own province. Sylvia is not blind to the opinions around her, nor is she stupid enough to believe that the shelter of Praka's walls will protect her forever. She is a desperate woman, grabbing onto Dimian Ree's coattails as though her own life depended on his success—as it probably does.

Similarly, the baroness will grasp for any party of PCs near Praka who have attained any notoriety at all. If they are obvious supporters of Gareth Dragonsbane, she will seek to have them captured or killed. If they have professed no allegiance, Sylvia will try to use her considerable wiles to woo them into her court.

Tarkos Ree

Heliogabalus
24th level thief
LN, none
Human male
IN 16, DEX 16, CHA 16

As Guildmaster of the thieves of Tightpurse, Tarkos Ree wields as much power in Heliogabalus as his cousin Dimian, and possibly more. Merchants allow him free run of the city, and most Damaran nobles fear to cross him. The underground guild's defensive structure has withstood all attacks and sabotage for more than two centuries.

Tarkos leads his guild with simple logic, an attitude which is not so much evil as purely pragmatic. If someone gets in the way, Tarkos will have him eliminated in the most efficient manner possible. The fighters and thieves of Tightpurse are expected to follow the Guildmaster's lead in their approach to business, and if is a guild member steps too far out of line, he will survive no longer than anyone else. If the miscreant remains within the city walls, that won't be for very long. The thieves' guild has its limits. Tarkos must keep the merchants somewhat appeased, and so he cannot afford to protect renegade rogues.

Tarkos will, however, throw the full weight of his organization in the path of anyone moving against Dimian Ree. His cousin has dangled a large carrot before his eyes, promising the guild a greatly expanded sphere of influence. If the old Kingdom of Damara is reinstated with Dimian Ree on the throne, Tightpurse will greatly prosper.

Timoshenko

Citadel of Assassins
19th level fighter
LE, Orcus
Human male ST 18/90, CN 18

Before the rise of Bloodstone, Timoshenko served the bandit army as the commander of a brigade dedicated to punitive expeditions. This savage and cruel fighter was perfect for the role! With his imposing size and strength, and a perpetual snarl on his lips, he fights with a wickedly-edged two-banded sword (+5!).

When the bandit army was thrown down and the monk Kane killed the Grandfather of Assassins, Timoshenko rose to new heights of power. Backed by Arch-mage Knellict, the mighty fighter stepped in as the new Grandfather of Assassins ahead of the cleric Banak. With his power diminished by the fall of his deity, Banak could not openly challenge the awesome power of Knellict and Timoshenko together.

As Grandfather, Timoshenko has outperformed even Knellict's expectations. He has proven thoughtful and conservative, making each move carefully in an obviously delicate situation. He is wise enough to heed Knellict's advice, and tactful enough to keep Banak appeased, although he is ready to have the priest killed if Banak shows any hint of revolt. Moreover, Timoshenko is strong enough to keep his legions squarely in line.

Presently, Timoshenko's main concern is protecting the secrecy of his new Citadel. He knows that Gareth's eyes are watching for him, but he is not sure what the Baron has already learned. He dearly wants a member of Spysong captured for interrogation.

TRAVELING BANDS AND ORGANIZATIONS

Just as there are many strongholds in the hostile Bloodstone Lands, so there are many alliances and defensive pacts. Friendships may be built long and lasting among allies facing a common foe, and certainly the people of the Bloodstone Lands have enough foes in common to go around.

Those with ill intent also band together for strength. After the demise of the Witch-King and the ensuing chaos, adventure and booty have been easier to locate, if no easier to take! Damarara and Vaasa have attracted many traveling bands, adventurers both good and evil.

Alliance of Belt Watchers

The communities of halflings and dwarves lived in Bloodstone Valley long before any organized settlement of humans arose. It is only natural that the centuries of co-existence would forge a strong bond between the two peoples. This bond was made official with the formation of the Alliance of Belt Watchers, an organization for mutual defense set up during the first year of Zhengyi's reign. Mayor William of the halflings of the Waukeshire worked with Tribal Chief Tokan of Clan Orothiar to draft an official document spelling out each side's responsibilities and expectations. All the halflings and dwarves accepted the terms; all hoped the alliance would help secure their prosperity against an otherwise dismal-looking future.

The Witch-King eventually fell, but the Alliance of Belt Watchers has not been weakened. Both groups have signed separate treaties with Bloodstone Village, both groups also consider their mutual relationship as the cornerstone of their security. Clan Orothiar had an extensive agenda when they returned to the Bloodstone Mines, but the dwarves' first move was to construct a connecting tunnel to the halfling burrows of the Warren.

The halflings have brought into the alliance a third powerful group, the centaurs. This move met grudging agreement from Clan Orothiar, but even the dwarves are looking to expand on the alliance's strength. King Ruggardo and the svirfneblin of Deepearth are on fine terms with Clan Orothiar, and the gnomes may soon come into the fold as well.

The Alliance of Belt Watchers is a significant force, one to be reckoned with. Gareth Dragonsbane pays particular attention to keeping the favor of Tokan, William, Ruggardo, and Kiros of the centaurs. With nearly 500 toughened dwarven fighters, 200 halfling archers and trained tunnel fighters, 150 mobile and deadly centaurs, and possibly 500 svirfneblin warriors, the army of the alliance is superior to forces mounted by most of the Damaran provinces!

In spite of their apparent power, the pact is strictly intended for defense. No group has designs beyond their own borders; the halflings and centaurs did not even travel south with the Bloodstone army during the wars. They simply do not want intrusion into their homelands. Their defensive strategies are intricate, cunning, and well-rehearsed.

Moreover, their defenses strengthen every day. The groups' leaders are brilliant tacticians. Gailan commands the Dwarven Guard, Fredegast is Sheriff of the Halfling Militia, and Valon is the centaurs' War Chief. The centaur leader is particularly able. These three have the responsibility and the reserves to improve security in Warrenwood, the Waukeshire, and the Bloodstone Mines. These communities have seen too much hardship and devastation to let down their guard again.

The Bandit Army

The bandit army provides perhaps the greatest impetus for keeping the Alliance of Belt Watchers together. This resilient force continues to exist, even to thrive, in their secret valleys of the Galena Mountains, even though they have been twice defeated, with their fortress reduced to rubble. The leaders of the bandits continue to elude pursuit from the Bloodstone army, and they have even managed to reclaim many of their losses.

Nevertheless, they are significantly weaker than they were during the reign of the Witch-King. Two factors in particular the bandits' leaders cannot wholly undo.

First, some of their most powerful troops deserted when the stone giants left, taking along many ogres to form an independent force called the Thinkers. Second, when Gareth and company crushed Orcus, the bandits' High Priest Banak literally lost his god. The evil cleric lost his higher level spells, and the Amulet of Orcus crumbled into dust when the foul god was banished. This powerful magic item had allowed Banak to raise hosts of skeletons, zombies, ghouls, and wights, and to summon more powerful allies from the lower planes. Its loss eliminated the Undead Brigade, one of the primary fighting brigades of the bandit army.

Like the army itself, Banak is weakened but he still remains a powerful figure among the bandits. He has used simple animate dead spells to rebuild the skeleton and zombie contingent of his once-mighty brigade.

Today's bandit army consists of approximately 100 goblins, 50 orcs, 12 bugbears, 15 ogres, and 6 hill giants, along with the 50 fighters and thieves who make up the assassins' guild. The bandit leader Timoshenko, a veteran fighter, understands that only disaster awaits if the bandit army tried to operate as openly as they had when the Witch-King stood behind them. Gareth and the unified forces of Bloodstone are simply too powerful for the bandits to face. By going underground, the bandit army has managed thus far to keep a profile low enough to elude Bloodstone's determined search.

Banak cannot see this. He dreams of reorganizing the scattered forces of Vaasan scum and subduing the region. Many around him think Banak has slipped a bit from reality since Orcus was banished.

Therefore Timoshenko has followed the advice of Arch-mage Knellict, much to the dismay of Banak. Always an opportunist, Knellict showed the Grandfather of Assassins a better way to restore the bandits' prominence. Calling in some old debts, the bandit army has strengthened its ties to Tightpurse, the powerful thieves' guild of Heliogabalus. Rumors say that Tightpurse actually fronted the money for the new Citadel of Assassins.

Linking up with Tightpurse has given Timoshenko and Knellict new hope for the future. Tightpurse stands solidly, if secretly, behind Dimian Ree. Should the Baron of Morov actually become the new King of Damara, the bandit army and their allies in Heliogabalus stand to benefit greatly. Thus, Timoshenko is determined to clear the way for the would-be king. Many of his plans are directed to the elimination of the Baron in Bloodstone.

Gareth and his friends suspect the dark truth about Dimian Ree, and they have figured out the probable intentions of the Grandfather of Assassins. Therefore, Gareth's friends have made Spysong's primary mission to locate the bandits' new base, so the Bloodstone forces can deal with these evildoers once and for all. But even the optimistic Gareth doubts that the bandit army will ever truly be eradicated. A force like that will forever remain a thorn in the side of the goodly people living in and around the Galenas.

The Circus of Dr. Trundles

Traveling a circuit through the four major Impilturian cities, the Circus of Dr. LL. McV. Trundles provides the hard working people of the land with a welcome diversion. The highlight of this sideshow is an extraordinary collection of monsters, each held in a specially-designed cage of imprisonment which resembles a circus wagon.

Bundles has nine wagons of monstrous wonders: an ancient huge blue dragon, capable of speaking and spell using; a chimera; a foxwoman; a gibbering moulder; a lamia; a pair of leucrotta; a manticore; an umber hulk; and a xorn.

The special cages prevent any magical or breath weapon attacks and abilities from inconveniencing onlookers. Thus, the blue dragon cannot blow away the spectators with its breath, nor can the xorn transmute through the cage floor.

Unfortunately, the cages are not infallible. Two years ago, Dr. Trundles traveled in Damara, earning a good living visiting many of the scattered towns each spring and summer. But disaster struck in the Arcatan town of Valls when a bulette tore through the magical bonds of its cage. In its rage, it then ripped open the cages of the other monsters. All were recaptured except for the bulette, which subsequently terrorized Halfling Downs in Carmathan for nearly two years. Valls suffered only minor losses, but Trundles' reputation went sour. Hoping to regain his dignity and his way of life, Trundles moved south to Impiltur.

The Lords of Imphras II accepted Trundles and his traveling show on the condition that he strengthen his security. The circus now employs 27 medium to high level (6-13) fighters. Three are assigned to each cage, and all are specifically instructed in efficient ways to battle the monsters currently on display.

After the Valls incident, Dr. Trundles stepped aside as ringmaster to take a more passive role in the operation. He is a 7th level illusionist and possesses a wand of wonder, so he performs feats of illusion and wonder. The leader of the circus now is Trundles' faithful assistant, Tamaroo Quinson, a gnome fighter/illusionist (levels 5/5) with sparkling blue eyes and a knack for exciting a crowd.

Garuk One Ears

Dozens of goblin tribes haunt the slopes of the Galenas and the Earthspurs, but one merits special attention. Growing rapidly in membership, the Garuk One Ears have quite a scam. Every goblinoid who joins, even an ogre or bugbear, is paid cash upon initiation. Goblins and orcs receive a gold piece, bugbears and ogres as much as five.

The payment scheme was the brainstorm of Garuk, a huge and cunning goblin (treat as a 5HD monster), and also exceptionally opportunistic for his race. The initiation upon joining the tribe is glossed over as a show of loyalty and savagery. Each new member cuts off his left ear and presents it to Garuk. The ears are then supposedly brewed into a foul stew shared by all.

Insiders know better. The stew is a concoction of rodents and roots, while the ears provide the wealth of the tribe. Garuk has half-orc connections from Palishchuk who regularly visit the Vaasan Gate. It is no coincidence that the money paid to new members is approximately one-half the bounty offered at the Gate for goblinoid ears.

Heralds of Imphras II

The leaders of Impiltur consider communication a key ingredient in successful rulership. Their policymakers, the twelve Lords of Imphras II, are dispersed among the four major cities in the kingdom. These officials keep in contact through the aid of magic-users. But the Lords of Impiltur also consider it vital to keep their common people apprised of important situations in the kingdom.

This is the main reason the Heralds of Imphras II ride the countryside. These bands of couriers serve as representatives of the Lords. They regularly bear news to the outlying villages from the major cities, but the Heralds are much more than simple messengers. They are always led by a fighter of not less than 7th level, and they are empowered to enforce the laws of the land, even if it means doing battle.

On their routes, the Heralds patrol Impiltur's main roads all the way to Haelimbrar's Watch located in the pass between the Earthspur and Earthfast Mountains. Travelers are likely to meet up with these men and women, and when a patrol of Heralds hears of newcomers, they seek them out. Generally, the Heralds are courteous and helpful, but if they find the foreigners undesirable, their warnings will be both stern and unyielding. More than one rowdy adventuring party has been put out of Impiltur by the Heralds of Imphras II.

The Kneebreakers

One of the more interesting traveling bands in the Bloodstone Lands is the Kneebreakers. Comprised entirely of halflings from Halfling Downs in southern Damara, the dozen rowdies who make up the Kneebreakers charge across the countryside on saddled war-pigs.

The group was started by youngsters bored by the unchanging routine of a sedate halfling existence. These halflings are thrillseekers and brave warriors, at least by their own estimation.

In fact, the Kneebreakers are far more often boast than deed. They stand up to anyone—until anyone stands up to them! But they manage to hold onto their pride, rationalizing cowardice as “good tactics,” and vowing severe retaliation “someday” against those who chase them off.

Backed into a corner, the Kneebreakers could actually be quite formidable. They are led by Hobart Bracegirdle, a 5th level fighter who wields a +4 defender short sword and wears gauntlets of ogre power. Where this 16-year-old halfling got these powerful items has not been determined, and Hobart isn't talking (for a change). One theory supposes that the eccentric wandering wizard Ephran gave them to Hobart. Ephran is the sort to enjoy the irony of such a little fellow endowed with such strength.

The rest of the Kneebreakers include two 3rd level fighters, six 1st level fighters, and one 2nd and two 1st level clerics. They are the progeny—the sons and one daughter—of some of the more prosperous farmers of Halfling Downs, and therefore all are well-outfitted. All wear chain mail and are competent archers. Besides the telltale war-pigs, they are easily identified by their large, purple hats, stylishly plumed, and their rich purple capes.

The Rocktappers of The Earthfasts

Roaming the mountain wilderness of western Impiltui are the Rocktappers of the Earthfasts. This is a very loose-knit association of solitary prospectors and trappers. The Rocktappers travel alone, but leave signs or supplies for their fellow Rocktappers to find. This is not altruism, but something more like a long shot at insurance.

The number of Rocktappers varies, depending upon how many new mountain men have recently climbed into the Earthfasts, how many oldsters have given up and left, and how many have been killed.

Each fall, the Rocktappers gather at a certain outcropping on the southwest corner of the Earthfast range. From this vantage point, they are within view of Tower Pureheart and the city of Lyrabar. After a week of high rowdiness, the band stumbles down to the port to sell their season's take, be it valuable ore or furs.

The Rocktappers generally take on colorful names like Bearface Giltch or Goldsniffin' Hoots. These people are typically outcasts or hermits, living in the unpopulated Earthfasts to get away from a society that shuns them, or one that they would themselves prefer to shun.

Soravian Talebringers

Similar to the Heralds of Imphras II are the Soravian Talebringers. This group, though, is self-appointed and has no official backing. An informal band of horsemen riding the eastern farmlands of Damara, the Talebringers are accepted by most Soravians, and are well treated wherever they go.

The Talebringers are led by Marco Wildfeet, an 8th level ranger, and his closest friend, Pastor Michael, a high priest of Ilmater. The band numbers 23, all battle-hardened fighters and clerics. They seek no trouble, but are quick to aid Soravian citizens. They are quicker still to attack any Vaasan scum they find, for their hatred is high against those who devastated their homeland.

These last few weeks the Talebringers have been riding hard to spread the news of freedom. Because many of the group fought beside the army of Bloodstone as it liberated village after village, the Talebringers are great supporters of Gareth Dragonsbane. Moreover, many of them have come to know Olwen Forest-friend and consider him their friend and ally.

Because Soravia has no Duke nor any other formal leader at this time, the people of the scattered villages of Soravia look to the Talebringers for their direction. They are particularly heedful of the opinions of Marco Wildfeet. With his customary attention to diplomacy, Baron Gareth has formally invited Marco Wildfeet and Pastor Michael to an audience in Bloodstone Village. That Gareth has Alamo and company on his side will not hurt support for a new Kingdom of Bloodstone.

Spysong

The Barony of Bloodstone's scouting network has quickly become the envy of all the power groups in the Bloodstone Lands. Because of this organization, Gareth Dragonsbane is undoubtedly the best-informed leader in Damara, with a considerable edge over his rivals.

The cornerstone of Spysong's strength is the association of three powerful adventurers, each with abilities that perfectly complement the others'. With his carpet of flying and his spirit walking abilities, the monk Kane handles most of the long-range missions, especially those into Vaasa. Witty and resourceful, the magic-user/thief Celdon Kierney keeps an eye on situations closer to home, particularly the doings of the Grandfather of Assassins and his evil clan. Bringing it all together is Rior-dan Parnell, the master bard. Parnell meets with his partners to exchange information, usually in the Cave of the Whispering Wind. He transforms their reports into coded songs that will be sung throughout the land. Thus, the news is conveyed to Gareth and Dugald in Bloodstone, and even to the Twilight Riders in the distant south.

The Grandfather of Assassins is particularly worried about Spysong, and has placed a 1,000 gold piece bounty for the head of either Celedon Kierney and Riordan Parnell. In Heliogabalus, Dimian Ree fears Spysong will sabotage his own spy network if they can infiltrate it.

These two would be even more concerned if they understood that, like the Barony it supports, Spysong is growing more elaborate daily. Fifteen bards are working alongside Riordan to convey the coded songs throughout the land. Celedon Kierney is only one of 50 thieves and fighters searching the Galenas and the Earthspurs. As protection, a number of rangers keep as close an eye as possible on the whereabouts of Kierney and the others.

If a ranger reports that one of his people is in trouble, Riordan Parnell has the means to rush to the rescue. A mobile strike force of 100 fighters has been commissioned in Bloodstone Village under the bard's exclusive command. The force includes a cavalry of 20 centaurs. This strike force has no set home base and is being trained in wilderness survival. This will enable them to remain in the vicinity of the expected hot spots.

Spysong's primary mission remains discovery of the location and the defenses of the new Citadel of Assassins. However, two of its chief scouts are engaged in adventures which may prove equally important. Celedon Kierney has camped on the slopes of Suncatcher Mountain in hopes of learning more about the mysterious cloud that has engulfed the peak. Meanwhile, Kane is somewhere up along the Great Glacier, acting as an emissary from Bloodstone to the barbarians of White Worm. The monk hopes to recruit the tribe as Bloodstone's allies, but the tribe is difficult to deal with. At the very least, Kane wants White Worm to agree not to interfere with adventurers from the Vaasan Gate on their excursions into Vaasa.

The Thinkers

The Thinkers are, literally, one of the continuing headaches plaguing the people living in or near the Galenas. The dwarves of Ironspur are particularly beset by this gang.

This rogue band is led by stone giants who broke away from the bandit army after its first defeat in Bloodstone Village. The three stone giants who founded the Thinkers were once loyal servants of the Grandfather of Assassins. The Grandfather had promised Rocktooth, Boulderhead, and Bearcrusher they would win great wealth and have fine sport in the winning. However, the bandits' defeat at the hands of the Bloodstone army wasn't fun, and it wasn't very profitable!

The disgruntled stone giants deserted, taking a dozen ogres and a hill giant with them. They slipped back into the mountains, and little was heard from them for some time. Eventually, they became discontented with a peaceful existence foraging in the wilds, and the Thinkers were formed. They have traveled the length of the Galenas, raining rocks on towns from high peaks and burying adventuring parties in unnamed mountain passes.

The strength of the band has grown in proportion to its reputation. Many young stone giants have flocked to join the fun, and ogres and goblins who go along for the ride are living quite well. Recent reports speak of two dozen stone giants, two score ogres, and fifty or more goblins now calling themselves Thinkers.

Of course, notoriety has its flipside, too. The Thinkers pulled off a successful bombing of Bloodstone Village when the army was away in the south battling with Carmathan. This prompted Friar Dugald to place a high bounty on the heads of any Thinker. The gang was already marked by a considerable bounty offered by the dwarves of Ironspur, who are actually the Thinkers' favorite target.

Neither Ironspur or Bloodstone has the resources to deal with this pesty group right now, but both want the Thinkers put down soon. Bounties have attracted a few adventurers, notably the party described below.

The Thinkers of The Thinkers

The Thinkers of the Thinkers are an odd band of five hardy adventurers who came into the Bloodstone Lands recently. This group did not originate in the Forgotten Realms; rather they came from some alternate world in the multiverse. They seem normal enough, if a bit eccentric. For the last six years, the group has wandered across the land, all the way from the Sword Coast, seeking adventure and fun and leaving hundreds of dead monsters, particularly giants, in their wake.

With their unusual view of giants a objects of fun, the group naturally found its way into the Bloodstone Lands, an unrivalled playground for giants. In the wilds of the Galenas and the northern stretches of the Earthspurs, the Thinkers of the Thinkers have found almost daily enjoyment for the last few months.

The twin brothers Hurl and Burl are both 8th level dwarven fighters. They have befriended fellow dwarves, exchanging tales from their own lost world and comparing the histories of the parallel races. In the bloodstone region, they have become allies of Clan Hillsafar, and close friends with Grumble, leader of the clan.

But Hurl and Burl have no intention of settling down. They continue to lead a nomadic existence through the Galenas, and the red beacon of the House of Hurl is now a common sight east a Bloodstone in the vicinity of Ironspur. (See p. 40 for the description of the House of Hurl.)

The group's original name is "Hurl and Burl and Rangers Three." They have taken on the mantle "Thinkers of the Thinkers" in accord with their latest exploits. They make no secret of their intention to hunt down and destroy the Thunkers, and they hope that spreading their reputation under their new taunting name will bring their intended victims out into the open.

If this seems a bit cocky and arrogant, it is true to the nature of this fearless bunch. They'll fight anything, any time, without the slightest hesitation. The three rangers, Andovar, Healthrow, and Heditrue, are the calming influence that maintains at least a bit of control over the wild dwarves. But the rangers, too, enjoy mixing it up with a goblin tribe or a giant clan.

Master tacticians, the band perfectly adapts its fighting style to its terrain, and to the type of monster they battle. In the mountains, especially when facing stone giants, Hurl and Burl engage the giants in rockthrowing volleys (both dwarves have girdles of stone giant strength). Andovar, Healthrow, and Heditrue then sneak in for a melee assault. All three rangers are high level (16th, 17th, and 18th respectively), are exceptionally strong (18+), and possess giant-slayer swords (Andovar's is a bastard sword). Once the real battle begins, Hurl and Burl rush to get in before the deadly rangers finish the job.

The group has yet to be truly challenged in the Bloodstone Lands. The largest band of stone giants they have yet encountered numbered six, and the rangers took them out before Hurl and Burl ever got close—which didn't sit well with the eager dwarves! The group heard about the powerful Thunkers while in Hillsafar Hall, and set out straightaway, with wide smiles stamped on their faces.

Tightpurse

Tightpurse is the most powerful thieves' guild in the Bloodstone Lands. The guild has been around longer than the Kingdom of Damara, a natural human reaction to the wealth represented by the merchants who flocked into the area to deal for bloodstone bars. Housed in Heliogabalus, this underground society numbers several hundred, with branch organizations operating in every major Damaran city except Bloodstone Village. There is even an associated group in Sarshel in the Kingdom of Impiltur. The rumors imply that every Damaran town and village houses at least one scout who owes allegiance to the guild.

Only recently has Tightpurse become a political entity. The Master of the Guild is Tarkos Ree, first cousin of the Baron of Morov, Dimian Ree. If Dimian Ree wins the kingship of Damara, the implications for Tightpurse are grand indeed. "Truly," say Dimian Ree's opponents, "the thieves shall have free run of all the cities, without the normal restraints respectable thieves' guilds usually impose on themselves!"

It is no secret that Tightpurse backs Dimian Ree. Tightpurse spies for Ree, like Spysong works for Gareth Dragonsbane, and it even tries counterintelligence.

But Tightpurse may be overreaching its abilities. Severely limited outside Damara's borders, it is only truly effective in the major cities of the southern provinces even within the kingdom. Tightpurse lacks the wide-ranging network that serves Spysong. The thieves have no contact with the Monastery of the Yellow Rose, nor with Impiltur beyond the city of Sarshel. They know nothing of the Nars in Narfell, and they haven't a single agent in all of Vaasa. Their only move has been to open communications with the Grandfather of Assassins and his dark band. That gamble could cost them dearly, and could bring Dimian Ree crashing down if the truth is ever exposed.

The Twilight Riders

Every night at sunset, the wizard Myrddin Viligoth dances through the somatics of an enchantment; he catches the last light of day and transforms it into seven magical steeds. Myrddin and his six companions mount up and thunder off, searching for wrongs to right.

These seven are the Twilight Riders, emissaries of Gareth Dragonsbane in southern Damara. Their mission is to ride across the southland, helping wherever they may, and spreading the word about the rise of Bloodstone and the proposed kingdom. Even beyond that, they proclaim the return of pride and prosperity to the battered kingdom.

Now and again, their rescues are dramatic and heroic. Overall, though, the Twilight Riders concern themselves as much with little deeds as with great ones. A good night's work might be finding a lost puppy for a tradesman's son, or showing a farmer a more productive method of tilling his fields.

The Twilight Riders do not trade good deeds for allegiance. They help wherever help is needed. Only afterward do they speak up, and spread the word to those who wish to hear.

Alongside Myrddin rides the Archmage Emelyn the Gray, who is closely followed by his apprentice Gabrielle, a 5th level magic-user. The other members of the company include dwarven prince Tamal (6th level fighter/5th level cleric), the son of tribal chief Tokan of Clan Orothiar; Justin M'Dael, an 11th level paladin and long-time friend of Gareth; Tamarin Moonwisher, Justin's soon-to-be bride and a 14th level ranger in her own right; and Agarelth, a nomadic paladin who is really Haelimbrar, one of the twelve Lords of Imphras II and a 16th level paladin.

Haelimbrar sought out and signed on with the Twilight Riders deliberately to study Baron Gareth's emissaries secretly. By getting to know some of the people closest to Gareth, Haelimbrar hoped to learn more about the man who would rule if the proposed Kingdom of Bloodstone comes to pass. Haelimbrar has not been disappointed by the group's activities thus far.

The Twilight Riders set out from Bloodstone just ten weeks ago. Since then, they have come to the aid of many and never asked for political allegiance. Everywhere they've passed, they have set the fires of hope burning brightly all across the south. First, they charged through Arcata, crushing a rogue band of rampaging hill giants. Then the Riders came through Carmathan, where they destroyed the bulette that had been terrorizing Halfling Downs for months. And finally they rode into Polten. There, with no more pressure than their presence, the Twilight Riders convinced two bands of highwaymen to see the light and turn their hands to a more respectable calling.

Haelimbrar's reports to his fellow Lords in Impiltur speak highly of the heroes of Damara, who he considers potential leaders all. The paladin has enjoyed his stint with this band of do-gooders, a fall back to his own adventuring youth.

Emelyn and Myrddin, of course, suspect the true identity of this mysterious paladin. They are more than willing to have him along for as long as he wishes to remain. In addition to his fine tales and worthy blade, Haelimbrar provides a kind of insurance policy for the group. Dimian Ree knows of the Twilight Riders and would pay very well to have them eliminated, but with rumors that a Lord of Impiltur rides among the band, no one would dare to strike at them, not even Ree himself.

Emelyn the Gray is the true leader of the Twilight Riders, and certainly the most powerful member. But the group works harmoniously, and each member strives to pick up where another leaves off. Even Tamal, a young and wacky dwarf, has become an integral and valued member of the group. Tamal's father, Tokan, cautioned Emelyn about including his inexperienced son, though he felt certain that joining the band would do Tamal some good. Emelyn brushed away all doubts, confident of the youth's potential. If anyone back in Bloodstone could see Tamal now, they would be amazed by his progress.

Presently, the Twilight Riders are heading for the town of Tellerth in the eastern part of the Barony of Polten. Emelyn the Gray wants to learn more about the druids and centaurs inhabiting the fringes of Rawlinswood. He hopes to forge better relations between them and the people of Tellerth.

Word about the Twilight Riders' destination has spread faster than the speeding strides of Myrddin Viligoth's magical mounts. The people of Tellerth look to the west each night, each one hoping to be the first to catch a glimpse of the telltale glow of the enchanted horses of the Twilight Riders.

The Watchers

Anyone who spends more than a few days trekking through the southern peaks and valleys of the Earthspurs is or has been under the quiet eyes of the Watchers. These monks from the Monastery of the Yellow Rose roam the mountains day and night. They know how best to survive here by learning the ways of this forbidding land. They pay particular attention to strangers, especially adventuring bands they see in the region, though they rarely come into face-to-face contact with any of these folk.

The Watchers' ranks are the Brothers, Disciples, and Immaculates (3rd, 4th, and 5th level) of the monastery. These monks endure long stays in the wilds as their penance, and their ticket to earning experience enough to become a Master. They are always alone and never in the same place two nights in a row. A Watcher will travel 20 to 50 miles every day, regardless of the weather. The season, too, is of no consequence. Watchers are as likely to be encountered among the deep snows of winter as they are in the few weeks of high summer.

Typically, Watchers leave the monastery for three to six months at a stretch. Often, their only contact during this extended sabbatical is with the animals of the wilds. Many Watchers surround themselves with animal friends, using their Speak with Animals ability to broaden their vision and knowledge. Watchers have been known to spend nights in bear's dens (with the bear!) or running among wolf packs. At this stage of their development, their mission as monks is to build a symbiotic relationship with the wild world around them. It is a testament to the discipline and training of the monks of Monastery of the Yellow Rose that 99 out of every 100 Watchers return to the monastery unharmed.

White Worm

The land bordering the length of the Great Glacier is the territory of White Worm, covering the northernmost reaches of Vaasa. This tribe of savage barbarians is unlikely to welcome strangers, except at the end of a spear.

Three hundred strong, the White Worm people are nomadic within the boundaries of their realm. They rarely stray more than fifty miles from the Great Glacier, and most often travel among the winding turns of the glacier tunnel maze known as the Ice Run.

The tribe is led by Hea-Rem, a huge, tough veteran of fifty winters. Surrounding the chieftain is an elite guard of five warriors called Kura-winter, the Worm-Victors. Fierce and strong, each of these warriors has defeated a remorhaz single-handedly at least once in his lifetime.

The Ulk, or tribal shaman, actually wields more power than the chieftain, a situation often seen in barbarian tribes. The shaman has all the powers and spells listed in the Dungeon Masters Guide, and in addition, can call upon the spirit of the remorhaz to bring on an extraordinary trance. In his trance state, the shaman exudes the heat of a polar worm's back, and has been known to execute prisoners with a single hug. (Like touching the back of a remorhaz, damage from such a hug is 10-100.) In a typical tribal spiritual, the shaman evokes this heat power and kneels in the center of a warrior ring. The warriors then spend the night in prayer, heated against the vicious glacier winds only by the warmth of their priest.

White Worm sets no regular patrols, but hunting bands are often roaming the region. If they happened upon a stranger in trouble they would be unlikely to offer any aid. Injured or not, strangers are considered a threat. The barbarians treat injured strangers like they treat healthy ones: at best, they are to be captured, but more often killed on the spot.

The monk Kane is presently trying to change this hostile attitude while acting as an emissary from Bloodstone. He is working to change White Worm's ways, turning them into a helping hand for adventurers wandering into their lands. Though Kane seems to be having some success, the traditions of the barbarians have not yet been forsaken, and visitors are still not welcome. For now, the wilds of northern Vaasa remain a dangerous place to go.

White Worm's first line of defense is their present spirit-hunter, their wandering champion (see the description of Hedweck, p. 47). Chosen for his physical prowess, this spirit-hunter roams the Vaasan wilderness just south of the Great Glacier, hoping to intercept and destroy any threats to his tribe. He is magically strengthened, magically outfitted, and intent only upon faithfully executing the duties of his position. His determination is fanatical to the point of willingly attacking a superior foe without regard for his own death.

Weird Wingham's Wacky Weapon Wielders

A wandering troupe based out of Palishchuk, Weird Wingham's Wacky Weapon Wielders travel throughout southern Vaasa and northern Damara. Their collection of unique and unusual weapons gives the band its name. The members trade for weapons and tales, and put on shows.

The troupe is all half-orcs, and all aligned to "good." Like most of the half-orcs from Palishchuk, they strongly opposed the Witch-King. In all, the troupe numbers perhaps a dozen young half-orcs, all acclimating themselves to Damaran ways, and working to better their lives.

Wingham is the half-orcs' leader and exceptionally intelligent for his breed. He has a penchant for rare weapons and, being quite wealthy, he has the means to pursue his collecting hobby. (His riches are said to have come from the abandoned loot of the Witch-King's crushed army.) Wingham's greatest treasure is a staff-mace, which he acquired on one of the many adventures of his difficult youth. Wingham says that this strange and magical weapon is what initially fostered his love of the unusual, and the surprising abilities of the staff-mace certainly have gotten him out of more than a few jams!

Wingham's tact cannot be underestimated. He has established a fine relationship with the dwarves across the Galenas at Ironspur. That the dwarves of Ironspur talk to a half-orc at all is amazing, but Wingham goes even beyond a superficial trading relationship. He is openly welcomed by the bearded folk, and has spent many months living among them. Their relationship is mutually satisfactory, for the dwarven craftsmen love the challenge of creating unique weapons to Wingham's strange designs, and the half-orc pays them well.

The Wacky Weapon Wielders love to barter with adventurers. They have literally hundreds of uniquely-crafted weapons, and the half-orcs usually offer adventurers a fair deal. There is a mace headed by the sculpture of some unknown animal, a spear tipped with a real dragon's claw, and a sword with an invisible blade, to name only three. There is an 80% chance that the troupe will have in their possession any weapon listed in the expanded lists of the Unearthed Arcana (99% for the more common weapons such as swords, spears, and maces). Ten percent of the time they will have some magical weapon for sale.

Wingham's troupe has another aspect as well. They are minstrels and performers, re-creating battle scenes in dramatic fashion. Audiences pay well and have yet to be disappointed. The troupe has performed from Ironspur to Darmshall, and even in Hillsafar Hall. In pursuit of this line of work, the troupe has occasionally sold a weapon for a pitance plus a good tale of battle. They have turned many such deals with the Thinkers of the Thinkers. The Wacky Weapon Wielders can often be found performing at the House of Hurl.

The troupe no longer wanders throughout the year. Recently they traded a holy avenger to the Commander of the Guard of the Vaasan Gate. In return, the troupe was granted the rights and the chamber space to open a trade shop at the Gate during the winter months.

THE BLOODSTONE LANDS CAMPAIGN

As was noted in the introduction, the recent history of the Bloodstone Lands and the region in general was developed through the four H-series modules.

Thus, Dungeon Masters planning a Bloodstone Lands campaign are put in a unique situation. If you start with those modules, your players' characters can literally rewrite the history of the region. Gareth Dragonsbane and the other pre-generated characters might be used, or players might prefer their own high level PCs. The events of the last two years leading to present-day Vaasa and Damara can be re-cast by playing the modules. And woe to the region if the Witch-King should prevail!

However, the H-series modules are broadscale and high-level, and may be difficult for inexperienced Dungeon Masters or players. A more conservative approach, and one which should prove equally enjoyable, would be to introduce players to the Bloodstone Lands in the Year of the Serpent, which is present-day. Events in the region are as described in this sourcebook. After all, like the hypothetical bard said, "The issue is far from settled." The PCs will have no trouble finding wealth and adventure in the present-day Bloodstone Lands.

In this context, you should consider using the Barony of Bloodstone as the home base for your players. Bloodstone is a compact province, with everything a PC would need (including adventure) within a day's walk. Remember that the Vaasan Gate was designed specifically to be a base for adventuring bands.

Of course, other areas also have much to offer, from the other provinces of Damara to the other three kingdoms of the region. Heliogabalus and Lyrabar are as full of excitement and intrigue as a city like Waterdeep, but on a lesser scale which could be more easily handled. And Impiltur has plenty of heroic work to be done with the problems represented by Traders Bay and Buzzard Beak Harbor.

Wherever you choose to base the PCs, the following suggested adventures offer some exciting game-playing potential. The adventures are organized in ascending order of recommended character level, from low-level (levels 1-5), to mid-level (levels 5-10), to high level (level 10 +). No specific level is listed with each adventure because these scenarios can be adjusted to accept characters who have a wide range of experience.

1. INTO THE CATACOMBS

(low-level)

Visiting the famed Monastery of the Yellow Rose, your PCs suddenly find themselves in an unexpected adventure. Their initial motivation could be something basic, perhaps a mission directed by Gareth Dragonsbane to help determine the lineage of Helmont, Duke of Carmathan. While scouring the catacomb complex underneath the monastery, one of the party accidentally stumbles onto a secret stairway, blocked off for many years. The party descends into catacombs even more ancient, the burial tombs of the earliest monks of the monastery. Then the long and twisty stairway that led them down crumbles behind the party.

This place was sealed off deliberately, for evil broods here. A magical amulet somehow found its way into these dark and dusty tombs. This amulet is evil and, working of its own accord, continually casts raise dead across the level. The place has therefore become saturated with skeletons and zombies, and even worse horrors from the netherworld. Since no monks have come here in centuries, other monsters have inevitably crept in, with carrion crawlers and spiders being only the most likely examples.

With the party effectively trapped in this chamber of undead, their mission and their only hope is to find and destroy the evil amulet. To be fair, be sure they have previously heard of the item. Before discovering the staircase, they could have read an ancient book scribed by one of the monks who helped to seal off these lower catacombs.

Of course the party will eventually find another way out: an underground river or a second secret stair. Before that happens, their days (or weeks?) lost in the hostile darkness of this evil place should give them a moment's worry, or even two. Imagine a group of second or third level characters running blindly through a maze of cobwebbed corridors after accidentally opening a crypt and finding a mummy!

2. THE HIGHWAYMEN

(low-level/mid-level)

Traveling through the Damaran southland on a pleasant sunny summer day, the party meets up with an interesting band. Riding their hardy war-pigs are the halfling heroes known as the Kneebreakers (see p. 55). The Kneebreakers are out to find and destroy a band of highwaymen who have been operating in the region. After they learn a bit about the PCs, they invite the party to join them on their heroic quest.

The PC party should be somewhere between 3rd and 6th level. Consequently, the Kneebreakers' offer leads to more trouble than the party might anticipate, for the halflings are more bluster than action. When the bandit lair is finally discovered, the party should believe that only with their new allies are they capable of taking on the bandits. But when the charge begins, they will find themselves rushing in alone, as the Kneebreakers embark on one of their deftly convenient flanking maneuvers!

Actually, this should give the PCs a chance to shine. They might valiantly overcome the suddenly-unfavorable odds on their own, but if they seem to be losing, the Kneebreakers will return. Hobart Bracegirdle and company are not the bravest lads in the land but, when the chips are down, they will help out.

3. BATTLE OF MOGADOR

(mid-level)

For a change of scenery and a different approach to warfare, send your PCs to Trailsend, capital of the Barony of Polten, as Gareth's emissaries. Once in the court of Donlevy the Young, the good Baron of Polten, the PCs will find an opportunity for adventure.

Relations between Polten and Ostel, the province across Lake Mogador, continue to deteriorate. The fleets of Trailsend and Praka have had several skirmishes over the last few weeks. Since neither side possesses true warships, these naval battles are inevitably resolved in hand-to-hand combat. Donlevy would be eager to hire experienced adventurers to serve as armed soldiers on his ships, whether or not they have any previous shipboard experience.

This lake battle offers a break from the normal routine of land adventuring, and could lead the PCs into Ostel. There they would find further adventures against the evil Baroness Sylvia.

4. The Secret of Hark's Finger (mid-level)

Traveling in the northern wilderness of the province of Soravia, the PCs link up with Olwen Forest-friend and the Bloodstone army making their final sweep through the farming communities. After a few minor skirmishes with remnants of the Vaasan scum, the army comes to the town of Steppenhall.

Here the PCs meet Tremaine, owner and barkeep of the Freezing Fox, a local tavern. They'll also meet his beautiful daughter Meg, who has a Charisma of 18—at least! (If the party is all female, change Tremaine's daughter to a son to make the subsequent events sensible.)

From Tremaine, they learn about the Nars and the fierce land of Narfell to the east. The picture he presents should make the kingdom a tempting locale to any true adventure. After many meetings and toasts, shared tales and raised mugs, Tremaine takes a liking to one of the party and asks a personal favor.

He explains that his daughter Meg plans to marry a local "hero," a 5th level fighter named Thrund. Thrund has all the personality of an animated stone. He is overbearing and brutish (ST 18/86) and Tremaine can't stand the sight of him. But the gentle barkeep does not wish to anger his precious daughter, who he loves more than life itself. If one of the PCs could woo the girl away from Thrund...

Winning Meg should not be a difficult task for a PC with any charisma at all, for Meg cares little for Thrund. She is only interested in him because he is the local hero and she thinks that her father would love to have him as a son-in-law! If a more dashing PC came courting, especially one who is obviously in her father's favor, she'd drop Thrund in an eyeblink.

The PC may have to fight a duel with Thrund before all is done, but his reward will be well worth the effort. Meg is a beautiful and intelligent woman, and Tremaine will be grateful. Out of sincere gratitude, he will present his new son-in-law with his second most-prized possession: a map of Hark's Finger, the solitary mountain in central Narfell. Tremaine gives this in part because he would like to see his daughter married to a rich man. Tremaine is no adventurer, but for a hero, the map promises considerable wealth. It is a treasure map, detailing a cache of gems, jewels, and gold hidden on Hark's Finger by one of the most successful pirates ever to sail on the Easting Reach in Impiltur.

Between the tribes in western Narfell and the ever-present tundra yeti, the journey to Hark's Finger will not be an easy one. Things won't get any more pleasant once the PCs find the secret pathways, for the long-dead pirate left many deadly traps behind to foil treasure hunters. Ultimately, the pirate's ghost protects his trove as he haunts the mountain.

5. Darkest Tunnel

(mid-level/high-level)

The dwarves of Clan Orothiar are working in a frenzy to bring out enough bloodstone to solidify the economy of the swelling population of Bloodstone Valley. They have broken anew into a deep tunnel complex. Having neither the time nor the manpower to explore this shaft, the dwarves have, as usual, posted for the services of willing adventurers. Previous expeditions have found the work simple, a matter of expelling a wandering monster or two. Even when mercenaries have come back with no battles to report, the wealthy dwarves have paid them handsomely.

And since your party has gained some renown, Baron Gareth himself suggests that the PCs have earned the right to an easy and profitable adventure. Gareth thought he was doing the PCs a favor...

This new shaft will prove to be more than a simple expedition to relocate some solitary wandering monsters. The dwarves have breached a long-rumored, but never substantiated, lair of horror in the deepest bowels beneath the Galena Mountains: a city of drow elves.

The drow is one of the most dangerous opponents ever to come out of TSR's long list of monsters. The presence of the black elves here should bring excitement (and possibly terror) to the players' hearts. If the PCs show any intention of fleeing back to the Bloodstone Mines after their first encounter with a small patrol, stress the importance of their actions. Neither the dwarves nor indeed the barony could hope to defeat this new menace without more information, information that the PCs are well-positioned to learn.

Make sure that your players witness the terrible splendors of the black elves, the lightless cities and the evil societies that make the most deadly assassins' guilds of the surface world pale by comparison.

A Dungeon Master wishing to run this scenario might find Dungeon Module D3: The Vault of the Drow to be an excellent source of background material. Many ideas from the module could be incorporated into this adventure.

6. Cloud on Suncatcher

(high-level)

Returning from yet another mission in the western reaches of the Galenas, the PCs stumble upon the Cave of the Whispering Wind, home base of the Spysong scouting network. Because they have been on the road for many days, they accept the guards' invitation to come in for a rest.

The remainder of the day is spent eating fine food and exchanging tales of the road. Slowly, the PCs get the impression that the three guards of the cave seem a bit nervous, although they remain polite. Soon after dusk, a new visitor enters the cave. From the bard Riordan Parnell, leader of Spysong, the PCs learn the cause of their hosts' anxiety.

Riordan's cousin, Celedon Kierney, is long overdue for a meeting at the cave. Celedon had been investigating a mysterious cloud hanging over Suncatcher Mountain, where the Galenas meet with the Earthspurs. During his last contact with Riordan's agents, Celedon requested a meeting, but he never showed up.

Unfortunately, Riordan's forces are tied up on the other end of the mountain range, searching out some promising leads to the Citadel of Assassins. The bard does not have the manpower available to go after his cousin—at least, he didn't until the PCs came wandering in.

Of course, if the PCs have worked with Riordan or the Spysong network previously, the prelude to this mission should be handled differently. Either way, the end result is the same: Celedon Kierney seems to be in trouble, and may need a rescue.

The mysterious cloud is a magical kingdom of cloud giants, a huge lair of the monsters and their pet cloud dragon(s). Dungeon Masters can vary the numbers according to the relative strength of the players. For added color, Riordan Parnell might lead the mission personally.

Actually, there's no proof that the sneaky Celedon is actually having a tough time. He just might be having a little fun in the cloud city, and could even show up at an opportune moment if the party gets into a jam.

7. Castle Perilous (high-level)

The most dangerous spot in the Bloodstone Lands remains the Castle Perilous, the shattered bastion of the Witch-King. Everyone in the land knows about the place, yet even the hardiest adventurers work hard to avoid it.

The dungeons of the castle are known to be filled with horrors beyond the imagination. Even if they were empty, the ruins above ground are populated by large numbers of angry evil dragons. That would dissuade all but the most brave or most foolish from entering. (See Strongholds, Ruins, and Dungeons, p 37.)

Yet the castle lures the lionhearted. Zhengyi's spellbooks are in the castle, along with many powerful magic items and perhaps even a relic. Not surprisingly, there is also a huge hoard of gold and gems.

To further pique the interest of hardy adventurers, even a single dragon's head will bring its taker great rewards and honors. Many of the mining moguls and landowners throughout Damara and Vaasa have offered great prizes, including Gareth Dragonsbane and Garumbelly Hillsafar of Clan Hillsafar. The problems rooted in the ruins of Castle Perilous are growing, and must soon be effectively dealt with if the people are not to sink into the darkness once again.

Anyone who disrupts the gathering dragons would earn a high place of honor and respect throughout the land. If they have the strength and the wiles, your players could take this opportunity to make the subtle shift from active adventurers to revered nobles and legends in the Bloodstone Lands. Of course, this dangerous adventure might also allow them to make the not-so-subtle shift from active adventurers to not-so-active cadavers.

8. The GiantSpires (high-level)

After your players have spent some time in the region and distinguished themselves as heroes, they will probably be offered a position of command in the army (the Bloodstone or the Damaran army, depending on the present situation in the kingdom). Since the army is so highly regarded by the folk of the land, accepting a commission would be in the best interests of any PC who has long-term designs on making a good life in this region.

In this scenario, the hobgoblins of the GiantSpires have apparently found a powerful leader capable of banding their vast numbers into a singular purposed fighting force. Hordes of hobgoblins stream down from the GiantSpires, and the tribes of western Narfell have gone to war against them.

Three full tribes of Nars—Var, Aingst, and Creel—have been pushed into Nar-sek Qu'istrade (Horseshoe Canyon) and they are in desperate straits. It may be weeks before other Nar tribes can arrive to rescue their kin.

Gareth and the other leaders of Bloodstone desire better relations with their eastern neighbors, and mining rights to the GiantSpires. Therefore, they view the hobgoblin invasion as a wonderful opportunity to gain the trust and respect of the Nars by sending assistance.

The troops are already assembled in Steppenhall, but they lack a leader. Olwen Forest-friend cannot be spared to lead the expedition. Not only was he wounded in a recent skirmish, he is enmeshed in negotiations with Marco Wildfeet and the temporary leaders of Soravia. (If the PCs would be in over their heads, Olwen can lead and the PCs serve as Undercommanders.)

The army marching into Narfell can be adapted to fit the scope of your campaign, but it should include at least 750 troops, mostly 0 and 1st level fighters. There should be a contingent of 50 or more centaur cavalry, and 100 specializing as archers. To spice up the army, you can create colorful NPC squad leaders of medium (5-10) level.

The hobgoblin forces initially encountered on the southeastern slopes of the GiantSpires should outnumber the army by 3-to-2. The hobgoblins will be anchored by ogre, troll, and hill giant squads. This will be a tough fight. Roused by their new leader, the morale of the hobgoblin army is quite high. The Bloodstone army may seem to be outgunned, but the high-level PCs must be tested and forced to use their considerable strengths and skills to optimum advantage if this adventure is to prove enjoyable.

Assuming that the PCs are victorious, they must continue along the foothills of the GiantSpires to meet the second force of the hobgoblin army, which is camped outside the entrance to Nar-sek Qu'istrade. This force will be even larger than the first. The PCs key to victory will be the characters' ability to slip messages into Nar-sek Qu'istrade and coordinate their assault with a breakout by the Nar warriors. If this maneuver is handled properly, the Bloodstone army and the Nars will hit the hobgoblins from both sides and should effectively smash the evil force. If victory is attained, the Bloodstone army will have served its kingdom well, for the three Nar tribes will swear allegiance to their rescuers.

If you wish to continue this adventure, have the PCs take a smaller contingent up into the mountains to investigate the true source of the trouble. It would be wise to include some Nars as guides. The hobgoblins leader is Tem Redeye, an Arch-mage. Tem has a fortress set up in a tunnel complex high in the mountains. (The hermit of Hermit Hill—see p. 40—might be able to provide the PCs with further information.) A third contingent of the hobgoblin army, similar to the first group encountered, will be camped on the northeastern slopes. This force still must be dealt with.

The Bloodstone Lands

Setting for the Icewind Dales trilogy of novels (The Crystal Shard, Streams of Silver, and the upcoming Halfpling's Gem), and the H-series of adventure modules which culminated in a battle with Orcus himself, the Bloodstone Lands are one of the wildest areas of the Forgotten Realms.

In this sourcebook, the author of the Icewind Dales trilogy explores this frozen region. Presented for players and DMs alike are people, places, and events that shaped the Bloodstone Lands—the political movers and shakers who carved their own brand of civilization from rocks and ice. In addition to this insider information, there are 10 new adventure scenario suggestions for all levels of play, from beginner to advanced, allowing campaigning in the Bloodstone Lands to continue long after exploring the mines themselves and conquering Orcus.

Prepare then to enter the barbaric kingdoms of Vaasa and Damara—the Bloodstone Lands.

INTRODUCTION

“The span of earthly things is as a dream; but a fair welcome is given he who has reached the South.”

—Old Mulhorand saying

The South, the ancient South, is the place where mankind first reached greatness in the Forgotten Realms at the beginning of the age. The remnants of this greatness are the three kingdoms of Mulhorand, Unther, and Ches-senta, kingdoms of mystery and ancient empires.

This book tells of the rise and fall of great realms, of god-kings and ancient magic whose power is unmatched anywhere in the Realms. This is the story of the Old Empires.

The ancient south can be termed “a slumbering giant.” It is an extremely powerful land that wishes to be left alone to engage in its own self-indulgent, decadent pursuits, not caring what goes on beyond its borders.

Still, many of their neighbors do not see them this way. When a plague occurs elsewhere in the Realms, you can often hear whispers of Southern magic. The South is considered to be a place of twisted power, better left untouched. Even the most reckless adventuring parties give the South a wide berth.

Yet it is rich in magic, and on occasion outsiders venture to Mulhorand or Unther and become entangled in the labyrinthine politics of their gods.

Many things are unique to the Old Empires. They have strange gods. They wield weird and powerful magic. And there is a hint of the weirdest magic of all—technology, a word that causes hardened sages to shudder. There are strange monsters and strange men, great treasures and unknown delights, and life-ending perils. In short, nearly anything that an adventurer could want. This book documents all of these.

How To Use This Book

This may be the hardest section of this supplement to write, perhaps because the answer is so easy that you have to be careful not to miss the forest for the trees. There are two ways to use any RPG supplement. One is to read through it solely for pleasure, enjoying the work for its own sake. The other way is to use it as a source of background and adventure in your campaign.

If you are running a campaign outside of the Forgotten Realms, this book can still be useful. This book contains dozens of new spells, magical items, characters, and monsters that can be taken out of this supplement and used in any campaign, regardless of setting. Cityscapes may be redesigned for use in other campaigns. Adventure ideas and rumors can be transferred to other settings. This is meant not just as a Forgotten Realms book, but as a source book for any inventive Dungeon Master running campaigns in any world.

The other use, of course, is as a FORGOTTEN REALMS™ game supplement. If you are running characters from outside the Old Empires who travel in these reaches, please make sure you read through the book carefully. Any land has its customs and taboos that seem strange to outsiders, and the Old Empires is no exception. How a character deals with culture shock can be as interesting as how a character handles a new monster, as both are unfamiliar challenges that test his ability.

If you are running characters from the Old Empires, be sure that the characters realize that the attitudes of their homelands are often quite different than other places in the Forgotten Realms. They should understand their homelands, and be able to imagine what it was like to be a child there, what they were taught, and what they were brought up to believe.

The Old Empires is known as a high-powered area. There is lots of magic, much of it quite strange. There are also major challenges in obtaining this magic, which is how it should be. The essence of an adventure is not casually fulfilling a quest, but discovering a major challenge and using every resource you have, including your intelligence, to succeed.

As you read through The Old Empires, you will find that this supplement places a strong emphasis on the politics and the personalities of these kingdoms; this book is full of strange names and devious political factions, all scheming to achieve their ends. There are two reasons for this.

First, one distinguishing feature of the Forgotten Realms is the number of distinct and interesting characters that player characters can interact with; as it says in the Source Book of the Realms (p. 17) “more than anything, these individuals are the Realms.” In the same way, these characters are the essence of the Old Empires.

The second reason is the nature of high-level campaigns. Many high-level campaigns collapse very quickly when the emphasis is solely on monster bashing and treasure snatching. The secret to a successful high-level AD&D® campaign is to get the PCs to interact with the campaign world in ways other than combat. There is a lot of fun in getting involved in politics, making plans and alliances, and outwitting truly clever NPCs. It isn’t easy to run a good political campaign (and most players don’t want a campaign where the action consists only of political maneuvering), but when it works, it’s a real thrill.

If the details in the political sections seem too trivial, you can feel free to ignore them, but you might want to give it a try. It can be a lot of fun. The politics of the Old Empires, like its characters, operate on a grand scale.

HISTORY OF THE OLD EMPIRES

Toward the end of the previous age, tribes of humans were pushed out of the Great Kingdoms of the southeast, which were covered in desert. Legends speak of a great war in which powerful humans fought against the gods to wrest away their power. The humans won and became god-kings, but the war destroyed their kingdoms. These god-kings, Re and Enlil, led the shattered remnants of their peoples into Mulhorand and Unther. The two god-kings and their spouses became the leaders of the royal houses of these two nations.

The people of Unther, who prided themselves on the purity of their race, warred against “barbarian” peoples and drove them from their lands, but the god-kings of Mulhorand, who were openly worshiped by these people, took them in as full citizens. Since then, the peoples of Mulhorand have primarily been racially mixed Turami and Mulan (the race of Unther and Mulhorand).

Two thousand years before the start of the current age, Mulhorand and Unther began to develop huge cities in the river deltas of their lands. Magic increased the fertility of the already rich soils and the two nations prospered. Prosperity enabled the god-kings to build larger states and, over the course of centuries, large empires were established. The two lands clashed occasionally, but the rulers of Unther and Mulhorand both realized that warfare would result in mutual destruction, so all conflicts were carefully limited and the border of the Alamber Sea kept the peace.

Mulhorand expanded to the north and east, conquering the Priador Plateau (which is modern Thay), Thesk, and beyond even into Ashanath and Rashemen.

Lands farther north paid tribute to Mulhorand and its god-kings. At its peak, the Mulhorand Empire stretched as far east as Semphar. While the empire was not the kindest of masters, it did bring laws, culture, and magic to thousands of people who had not known these things before.

Unther was somewhat less kind to its conquests. It expanded north as far as Yuirwood, where it warred for centuries against the elven tribes. It reached west as far as Chondath, swallowed most of the eastern Shaar, and even went to war against the southern dwarves in the Great Rift. Unther gained a reputation for having fierce and ruthless warriors who were hated by those they conquered.

At their peak, 1,000 years before the start of the current age, the First Empires of Mulhorand and Unther were at a level that has never been equalled since. Their magic was extremely powerful, and they had learned a new science—technology—that gave them greater power.

Two events brought the first great Age to an end. One was the rebellion of the archmage Thayd (after whom the later-day Red Wizards named their kingdom), who challenged the might of the god-kings, along with that of many of the most powerful wizards of Mulhorand and Unther. Thayd’s goal was to overthrow the god-kings and unite the empires into a single grand Overempire that would be able to achieve limitless dominion over the Realms. After much destruction, the god-kings triumphed and the wizards were slain. After that time, in Mulhorand, the god-kings placed magic under their strict control, and created a bureaucracy of priests to maintain its control. Mulhorand became the bureaucratic theocracy that it remains to this day.

The people of Mulhorand and Unther might have rebuilt their losses, except for the Orcgate Wars. Five years after the deaths of the wizards, a huge gateway opened in southwestern Thay. It was a gateway from a world of orcs. Millions of orcs had come from another world, seeking a new place to live. They immediately clashed with the empires of Mulhorand and Unther, and overran their northern and western possessions. The god-kings themselves stirred into battle, and orc-shamans summoned their pantheon in response. Gods died, cities were laid waste, and entire regions were devastated. In the end, the orcs were either slaughtered or driven into the far north, but the holds of Mulhorand and Unther on their far-flung provinces were broken, and the two empires dwindled. The god-kings withdrew into their towers, creating continually reincarnating incarnations to lead their cities. Thus the First Empires of Mulhorand and Unther ended.

The lands lost by the southern empires were quickly retaken, but not by them. Instead, two new powers rose to prominence after the Orcgate Wars, the powers of Narfell and Raumathar. These were warlike nations that coalesced out of the migrating northern tribes that were paid to fight as mercenaries in the Orcgate Wars. They had weapons of iron (as opposed to the bronze weapons that Mulhorand and Unther used at the time) and soon developed powerful magic of their own. They quickly subdued large tracts of land, replacing Mulhorandi culture with their own.

Unther was never able to regain its southern empire after the Orcgate Wars, and soon its holdings in Chondath collapsed.

So proud Mulhorand and Unther were now reduced to small kingdoms, once-great powers that were twilight kingdoms in the brilliant shadows of Narfell and Raumathar, the two new great powers.

And, for the most part, the two nations were content, for both still prospered; their rulers still built great monuments, and their peoples never starved, and wise men prophesied that the fiery powers of the north would soon consume each other.

The prophecy came true. Eventually, Narfell and Raumathar went to war. It was a bitter and bloody struggle, full of the tales of great heroes: Rauthok, Jesthren, Halduplac, and many others who were naught but names to the kingdoms of the south.

Several times, the two northern giants tried to convince Unther and Mulhorand to join in the war, but the lords of the south merely shook their heads and fortified their borders, waiting for the inevitable.

It came. Narfell and Raumathar held one final cataclysmic battle and destroyed each other. Netherworld fiends fought against dragons, cities were burned. One hundred and fifty years before the founding of Cormyr, the nations of Narfell and Raumathar were dead, their people scattered into tiny enclaves, their lands in ruins. Mulhorand and Unther decided to pick up the pieces.

Unther leaped across the Eastern Reach and founded cities on that body of water's northern coast. Mulhorand expanded northward under the military leadership of Anhurtep, a vigorous incarnation of the god-king Anhur, and founded the cities of Bezantur, Tyraturas, Amruthar, Delhumide, and Nethjet. Mulhorand offered to take in the survivors of the war and bring prosperity to the starving victims of the great war. Mulhorand heroes slew many of the monsters summoned by the wizards of Narfell and Raumathar, and once again the standard of Mulhorand flew over the battlements of the Priador. Thus began the Second Empire of Mulhorand and Unther.

Unther, which had declined greatly, could not reach the elves of Yuirwood with its traders or its armies. The cost of expansion bankrupted its treasury, and taxes were raised. Rebellions against the taxes were ruthlessly crushed, and harsh laws were brought down to preserve public order. Some of the hardest hit by these taxes and laws were adventurers, who were beginning to bring wealth from the ruins in Narfell and Raumathar and complained most bitterly against the confiscation of most of the fortunes that they fought so hard to acquire. Some of these adventurers turned to freebooting, becoming pirates in the Sea of Fallen Stars. Others led rebellions in a number of cities hard hit by the tax: Delthuntle, Laothkund, and Mourktar.

Eventually a large group of cities on the southern coast of the Wizard's Reach also broke away to form what is known as the Union of Chessenta, though using the word "union" to describe Chessenta is a joke.

Chessenta achieved brief glory early in its history under the great general Tchazzar, the war god, who was actually a polymorphed red dragon. The Chessentan Empire held sway as far west as Chondath, and even subdued Unther and held it as its vassal. After the death of Tchazzar, the Empire broke up; Unther tore free from its influence, and its distant outposts were ruined. The union's confederation of city-states swore fealty to a central monarch, but each city-state seemed to have a different idea about who the monarch actually was. The union eventually deteriorated into a constantly changing network of warring factions; it remains this way to this day. There have been two Cimbar vs. Airspur Wars, an Akanax vs. Soorenar War, an Akanax vs. Luthcheq War, and three Mordulkin vs. Luthcheq Wars.

There has been so much warfare in Chessenta that mercenaries from all over the Realms have flocked to join; there is almost always at least one major war going on there at all times. For the last century, Chessenta has been reputedly one of the best places to go to get mercenaries; even Mulhorand regularly relies on their services.

And what of the other two lands? Mulhorand kept its Second Empire together for a little longer, until the Red Wizards rebelled four hundred years ago and created the nation of Thay.

Mulhorand made a half-hearted attempt to take Thay back, failed, and decided to concentrate on its bitter internal politics. Unther is even worse: Its military is gutted by corruption and archaic weapons and tactics, its immortal ruler (Gilgeam son of Enlil) has become embittered by misfortune and rules a small, wasted, overtaxed tyranny, aided by greedy administrators. As a result, Unther is on the brink of revolt.

Current Operations

At this time, there are a number of notable schemes and events taking place in the Old Empires: Mulhorand, the oldest empire, is suffering from a recent spate of assassinations that climaxed in the assassination of Pharaoh Akonhorus. The assassins have not been identified and are known to use magic to charm the victims' friends or bodyguards into becoming their murderers. The new pharaoh is Horustep III, who is a child of 11. In most nations, this would mean that he would be easily manipulated by his advisors, but in Mulhorand it means that a Pharaoh is finally young enough and energetic enough to want to make changes. (The Fangs of Set, an organization responsible for Akonhorus's death, also has plans to deal with Horustep, and the priests of Horus-Re are not happy about the situation either.)

There is a major confrontation brewing between the priests of Horus-Re and the priests of Anhur in Mulhorand. The priests of Horus-Re, who have been the de facto rulers of Mulhorand for centuries, are blaming Anhur for past defeats and are trying to destroy his priesthood by stripping its leaders of lands and traditional power and appointing its greatest members to extremely dangerous positions. Anhur's followers are becoming more bitter in their opposition to the priesthood of Horus-Re. The priests of Anhur are also going to embark on a private enterprise to purge the Alamber Sea of pirates and the influence of the Thayvian fleet.

Unther is collapsing. The alliance of the bandit chief Furifax and the cult of Tiamat are plotting to overthrow the government, which is extremely unpopular. An incarnation of Tiamat schemes in the small town of Firetrees. Other factions are trying to align themselves with whomever they believe will be the winning side. Messemprar is in revolt; the palace is under siege, and the armies of Unther have been turned back, forcing the god-king to hire a force of Chessentan mercenaries to crush them. There is trouble even in Unthalass, the capital of Unther.

In Chessenta, the rulers of the city of Luthcheq are waging a war of terror against wizards. They have invented witchweed to prevent magicians from operating in their city, and they have hired mercenaries to assassinate wizards across Chessenta. Their goal is to clear Chessenta of all wizards and march in with their army, unopposed. (This is a ludicrous notion, but the lords of Luthcheq are considered to be lunatics.)

Cimbar is under attack by an alliance of warriors from Airstpur and Soorenar, who plan to destroy the city and divide the spoils evenly.

Timeline

- 2488 DR The great kingdom of Raurin destroyed. Exiles flee into the west, eventually settling on the shores of the Alamber Sea.
- 2135 DR The god Re founds the city of Skuld and gives it the name "City of Shadows". This is Year 1 of the Mulhorand calendar.
- 2087 DR The god Enlil finds pearls on the west coast of the Alamber. He founds the city of Unthalass ("City of Gems").
- 1967 DR Unther and Mulhorand clash at the River of Swords. The first Mulhorandi/Unther War begins.
- 1961 DR Gods agree that the River of Swords will be the eternal boundary between Mulhorand and Unther. There are occasional clashes, but there is never a major war between the two southern powers again.
- 1500 DR Expansion of Unther and Mulhorand.
- 1250 DR Unther battles against the elves of Yuirwood and the dwarves of the Great Rift. Mulhorand, for the most part, ignores them.
- 1087 DR The Thurgist Adept Thayd rebels, along with most of the wizards in Unther and Mulhorand.
- 1081 DR Thayd and his conspirators defeated. Thayd is executed, but prophesies that Mulhorand and Unther will never be as great again.
- 1076 DR Orcgate opens.
- 1075 DR First battle of the Orcgate Wars. Orcs overrun many northern settlements, slaying thousands.
- 1071 DR Battle of the Gods. Re is slain by the orc-deity Gruumsh.
- 1069 DR Orc pantheon defeated. Orcs driven from the south.
- 1050 DR Power struggle between Osiris and Set to succeed Re. Set murders Osiris.
- 1048 DR Osiris resurrected by Isis. Horus-Re battles Set, casts him into the desert and becomes chief of the Mulhorand pantheon. Set worship is abolished. The tower of Set in Skuld is destroyed.
- 900 DR Rise of Narfell and Raumathar.
- 734 DR Enlil decides to leave the Realms. Gilgeam, son of Enlil, becomes King of Unther. This is Year 1 of the Untheric calendar.
- 623 DR Narfell attempts invasion of Mulhorand and Unther by sea. The two southern nations defeat the Narfell fleet. Neither northern empire attempts to invade the Old Empires again.
- 150 DR The great conflagration. Narfell and Raumathar destroyed in one final battle. Monsters and minor powers summoned in the last battle invade the south after the battle ends.
- 148 DR The god-kings' final battle. An alliance of the Summoned is defeated and they are sent back to their home planes.
- 135 DR Founding of Bezantur. Other cities soon built on the coastal areas of the Wizard's Reach as Mulhorand and Unther once again expand northward.
- 1 DR Founding of Cormyr. This year is 2134 on the Mulhorand calendar.
- 108 DR First Great Flood of the River Alamber nearly destroys Unthalass.
- 202 DR Tribes of "barbarians" from the south invade southern Unther and Mulhorand.
- 205 DR Mulhorand and Unther chase defeated barbarians back to their base settlement and exterminate them. A dying shaman prophesies that their empires shall soon crumble.
- 482 DR Delthuntle and Laothkund break free of Unther.
- 504 DR Teth and Nethra declare their independence. Unther begins a long campaign against the North Coast Cities.
- 643 DR The wizard Nezram leaves his tower on the shores of Azulduth.
- 679 DR Unther forced to recognize the independence of the North Coast Cities. Unther never recovers from this long, costly, and bloody campaign. End of Second Untheric Empire.
- 681 DR Nezram's tower destroyed by the green dragon, Chathuulandroth. Nezram's children scattered or slain.
- 731 DR Second Great Flood of the River Alamber devastates Unthalass.
- 823 DR Mourktar breaks free of Unther.
- 922 DR Battle of Thazalhar. The Red Wizards ensure their independence from Mulhorand. End of Second Mulhorand Empire.
- 929 DR Alliance of Chessenta drives Unther back beyond the Riders to the Sky Mountains.

- 976 DR Mulhorand invasion of Thay defeated at the River Thazarim.
- 1018 DR Death of King Tchazzar in battle against the sahuagin. His body is never found.
- 1030 DR Establishment of Zulkirs as ruling body of Thay.
- 1098 DR Thay attempts first invasion of Mulhorand. Thay is defeated at Sultim and withdraws.
- 1117 DR Mordulkin defies the king of Cimbar, beginning the break-up of Chessenta into squabbling city-states.
- 1154 DR Siege of Cimbar by the Lords of Akanax and Soorenar. The king is unable to get assistance from his allies and is forced to sign a pact imposing harsh limits on his power. Akanax refuses to sign, recognizing its lord as the true king.
- 1161 DR The Kurunak clan become the Lords of Luthcheq under suspicious circumstances.
- 1183 DR Paladins in the service of Osiris clear the River of Swords of werecrocodiles and Sebek worshipers. Werecrocodiles relocate to Adder River delta.
- 1248 DR Rehorusteb II becomes Pharaoh of Mulhorand.
- 1280 DR Thay's second invasion attempt overwhelms Mulhorand. Sultim is besieged and nearly falls before reinforcements arrive. Priests of Anhur are made scapegoats.
- 1301 DR First recorded resurgence of the Cult of Tiamat in Unther.
- 1311 DR Rezim becomes vizier of Mulhorand. He begins to persecute the church of Anhur. Chessentan mercenaries replace Anhur worshipers as guards of the city.
- 1317 DR Great Plague of the Inner Sea begins. Chessenta is decimated, Unther suffers, but Mulhorand is largely unaffected.
- 1320 DR Akonhorus II becomes Pharaoh of Mulhorand. Resurgence of the Cult of Set, as Seti is born. The Simbul becomes Queen of Aglarond.
- 1323 DR Great Plague ends.
- 1324 DR Luthcheq invades Mordulkin to take advantage of heavy losses in the plague years. Luthcheq loses war; losses are blamed on wizard-spies in the service of Mordulkin. Luthcheq begins persecution of wizards.
- 1346 DR Cult of Tiamat summons the Dark Lady.
- 1350 DR Cult of Set gains control of Sampranasz, though this remains hidden. Seti forms the Fangs of Set.
- 1357 DR The present. Fire elementals ravage the coastal cities. The Pharaoh of Mulhorand is assassinated by the cult of Set, leaving Horustep III, the boy-king, on the throne. Riots in Messemprar.

LANDS SURROUNDING THE OLD EMPIRES

"An old neighbor is a good neighbor."
—Old Mulhorand saying

During the course of their long history, the slumbering giants of the south have interacted with many different races and nations. This section details these nations and their current relations to the Old Empires. Note that several of these powers were dealt with in more detail in FR6, Dreams of the Red Wizards; a brief description of these nations is offered for readers who do not have that supplement, which is recommended for DMs running campaigns in that corner of the Realms. More information on the eastern sections, Raurin in particular, will be revealed in a future supplement.

Thay

The land of the Red Wizards has been the chief enemy of Mulhorand for centuries, ever since the Wizards overthrew its control. Thay is a magocracy, ruled by powerful wizards. The nation is divided into 11 provinces, known as Tharches; each Tharchion has virtually absolute authority over his province.

Overall, the nation is governed by a council of Red Wizards, whose authority supercedes that of the Tharchions. One wizard from each school of magic (necromancy, conjuration, enchantment, etc.) is represented on the council. These representatives are known as Zulkirs.

There are two factions in Thay: Imperialists, who want to expand their territory (at the expense of Rashemen, Aglarond, Mulhorand, or the nine cities of the coast), and the Researchers, who believe that a wizard should not engage in a military enterprise unless he can gain immediate benefits. Neither faction is well organized; most political results come from the actions of individual Zulkirs.

Thay has tried to invade Mulhorand twice, and has been soundly defeated on both occasions, but a Mulhorand invasion of Thay in 976 DR was also defeated, and the two powers are stalemated. At present, only one of the Zulkirs harbors an ambition to destroy Mulhorand. Lauzoril, Zulkir of the school of Enchantment and Charm, has allied with the Cult of Set to assassinate the incarnations of the god-king. His activities are not sanctioned by the other schools of Red Wizardry, but they would not mind if he succeeded.

In Mulhorand, the priests of Anhur and Nephthys both actively advocate the destruction of the Red Wizards and the seizure of Thay. The priests of Osiris are also favorable to an invasion, but they do not press their opinions. The priests of Thoth are uncertain, and the priests of Horus-Re and Isis are against it.

There is some trade between Mulhorand and Thay, mostly in foodstuffs (which are sold back and forth) and slaves (which Mulhorand buys from Thay). Neither nation trades magical items or weapons with the other.

Semphar and Murghom

To the east of Mulhorand are two nations that have had many dealings with the great power through its history: Semphar and Murghom. Both nations were part of the great Mulhorand empire long ago. They have since won a certain degree of autonomy.

The people are renowned for their skill with horses; they boast one of the most skilled cavalry forces in the Realms. Each nation consists of semi-autonomous farming villages ruled by a single chief (usually a respected elder) known as an ataman. The atamans gather together only in times of war, plague, or other catastrophes.

Murghom is semi-independent. The god-kings of Mulhorand may demand food from them in times of famine, and men and horses in times of war. Mulhorand has not demanded either in centuries, leaving them in peace, and indeed most see Murghom as a nation with no ties to Mulhorand whatsoever. Semphar, though claimed by Mulhorand as its easternmost province, is entirely sovereign.

Murghom and Semphar are rivals; they have had many territorial disputes and minor wars in their histories, typically for the disputed lands between the River Ghaast and the River Haqar.

The lands on the north shore of Brightstar Lake are heavily infested with undead and other monsters, which have spread as far north as Shalhoond, "The Great Wild Wood."

To the east of Semphar are the historic eastern boundaries of the empire of Mulhorand at its height, the Godswatch Mountains. It is said that on the highest peaks, it is possible to find The Road to the Gods. None have been able to confirm this legend.

Aleaxtis, Kingdom of The Sahuagin

Perhaps the most predatory neighbor of the Old Empires is Aleaxtis, the Kingdom of the Sahuagin.

While the exact location of the kingdom is unknown, it is believed to exist somewhere north of The Ship of the Gods, a large volcanic island. The greatest concentration of sahuagin in Aleaxtis is the city known as Vahaxtyl, which is home to about 13,000 sahuagin. The ruler of Vahaxtyl is Kromes, an absolute tyrant who believes in sinking any ship, be it Mulhorandi, Untheric, or Thayvian. He also continuously raids the Unther cities of Messemprar and Mourktar. Kromes is a sahuagin prince with 8 + 8 Hit Dice, 8th-level shaman ability, and many magical items.

While the Cults of Set and Tiamat have approached the sahuagin for an alliance, the surly creatures have refused all overtures. Certain lords of Thay have paid them regular tribute to ensure that they do not bother Thayvian vessels, but the sahuagin do not often keep this bargain. The sahuagin are widely feared even by the pirate-chiefs and the Red Wizards.

Plains of Purple Dust

South of Brightstar Lake and west of the Sword Mountains is a vast, windy desert that extends southward to Raurin. Elminster says that the forefathers of the god-kings of Mulhorand and Unther lived here, and this once-fertile land's destruction was the punishment meted out by other deities after victory in the god-wars. Other sages have other explanations, though Elminster's is likely the most credible.

By all accounts, though, the Plains of Purple Dust is a land as wonderful as it is terrifying.

The plain floor is covered with (as one might guess) purple dust, which radiates a faint magic (though no use has been found for it). This dust constantly blows into the air, giving the sky a reddish tint. Many giant animal bones can be found on the floor of the plains. The fierce winds howl as they whip through these remains of the long-dead. Those who enter the plains must cover their mouths with a wet cloth in order to breathe.

Very few creatures are native to the plains. Purple worms can be found burrowing through its surface, though other burrowing creatures, such as brown dragons, dislike its composition and avoid it. A nomadic tribe of sludar (mongrelmen) wanders the deep wastes and barely survives in these inhospitable lands. Human nomads stay close to the western border.

There are two oases in the plains: the Grinning Skull, where a large pool of water is shielded by the skull of a dead great wyrm, and the Lonely Lake, which lies to the east of the Sword Mountains. The Grinning Skull is usually frequented by mongrelmen, while the Lonely Lake is held by a family of wizards descended from the great Mulhorand mage Nezram, who disappeared mysteriously centuries ago. The Nezramites, as they are called, are suspicious of strangers, especially adventuring companies; their only friends are the human nomads that live in the western section of the plains.

There are many stories about hidden magic and wealth in the plains. The most famous is the story of the traveler who came upon the Purple Stair, an entrance to a mysterious land under the earth.

This land was allegedly full of strange beasts thought long-dead. It was ruled by a race of cruel lizard people, twice as tall as normal lizard men, who wielded powerful magic. None have confirmed this legend, but the story of the Underrealm has scared many a child at bedtime.

The Coastal Cities

When Unther expanded to the north coast of the Wizards Reach following the fall of Narfell and Raumatathar, they rebuilt many of the cities of their previous empire, which had fallen in the Orcgate Wars. But Unther was not strong enough to hold them, and, like the other members of Unther's empire, the Coastal Cities declared their independence.

These cities are Delthuntle, Nethra, Teth, Laothkund, Hilbrand, Lasdur, Taskaunt, Escalant, Murbant, and Thasselen. They have been under the control of Thay at one time or another for most of the last 400 years, but they are currently free of Thay's control.

Each city is independent, but there is a loose association for purposes of mutual defense and some trade pacts. The western cities are usually slow to respond to a threat to their eastern neighbors from Thay.

Most of these cities are actually towns. Only Delthuntle, Laothkund, Hilbrand, and Escalant have populations over 5,000 people. Delthuntle and Laothkund have populations of about 50,000 each, while Hilbrand and Escalant have about 20,000 each.

Historically, these cities have been in conflict with Chessenta, pirates, Thay, and each other, in that order. Until this year, Chessenta was considered the biggest threat to the continued security of the Coastal Cities.

Recently, a plot has been hatched by several Thayvian nobles, the Zulkirs of Conjuraton and Summoning, and Hargid Tenslayer, Tharchion of Lapendrar. They plan to rid Thay of competition from the Nine Cities of the North Coast by creating a gate into the elemental plane of Fire and making a deal with certain lords of that plane to destroy the cities. So far, Lasdur, Taskaunt, Murbant, and Thasselen have been destroyed, and Escalant is under siege. (For more details, see "Fire Time" in FR6, Dreams of the Red Wizards.) The future of the Coastal Cities is uncertain.

Aglarond

Originally, only satyrs and sylvan elves inhabited this forest west of Thay and north of the Nine Cities. Except for occasional skirmishes with the ancient Unther empire, this land had few encounters with men. It was shielded by Mulhorand and Unther during the Orcgate Wars, though the battles with the surviving orcs of that war took their toll on Aglarond's inhabitants, and evil monsters began to invade the depths of Yuirwood, Aglarond's forest.

At the beginning of the current age, human fishermen and pirates from the west moved into the area, settling on the rocky shores. They began to chop away at the Yuirwood, and over the course of generations eventually made their way into the heart of the forest.

Here they encountered the elves. The elves had been devastated by plague and by monster attacks. They felt that these humans, primarily hunters and adventurers, were their best allies against the drow and the trolls that threatened to destroy them. One generation later, the drow were driven underground, the trolls all but eradicated, and the satyrs driven westward out of the forest, where they settled in the Chondalwood.

The Yuirwood is now controlled by a strong and energetic tribe of half-elves. Aglarond remains under half-elven rule; its current monarch is the Simbul, the mysterious and powerful sorceress who has been linked with the Harpers and who is considered the greatest enemy of the Red Wizards of Thay. The Simbul has been seen in Mulhorand only once; while none know truly what her business was, many guess at an alliance between the Harpers and the priests of Anhur.

Aglarond is too far from Mulhorand and Unther to trade directly, but some of its products are shipped through merchant sailors of the Nine Cities.

The royal banner of Aglarond is three white stars against a blue field.

Raurin

The great southern desert is a vast wasteland of stone, sand, and dust. Two ages ago, it was the home of the first great kingdoms of Man, who grew to such power that they challenged the gods and triumphed. In that conflict, the entire region was ravaged, and the land is now virtually uninhabitable. The survivors of that conflict fled to the west, to the shores of the Amber Sea.

The land is home to a number of wandering tribes. Some of the sludr mongrelmen from the Plains of Purple Dust also inhabit Raurin, as do human nomads. On its far western edge is the chain of high mountains known as the Giant's Belt, a group of nearly impassable mountains. In the center of this chain is Fuirgar, home to hundreds of stone giants. Two passes allow travel through the belt—the treacherous Rolling Stone Gap and the supernaturally cold Midwinter's Pass (named because it feels like midwinter all times of the year).

To the south are the Dustwall Mountains, which shield Durpar and Thommar. To the north are the Plains of Purple Dust. To the east are legends—no account yet exists of someone returning from a land east of Raurin.

A number of creatures that originated in Raurin are known throughout in the Old Empires.

Brown dragons thrive. Blue dragons scour the skies near the Giant's Belt. There is known to be at least one settlement of efreet—in the ruins of an old city, whose riches they guard with extreme diligence. Then there are human and humanoid nomads.

There are many ruins, some containing artifacts of great power, lost and forgotten in the ancient god-wars. Many of these magical items have been gathered for use by the Cult of Set. Somewhere in these lands is the great tower of Set, in which the manifestation of the most evil deity of the Mulhorandi pantheon sits and schemes. Many who have entered the desert have come out transformed into minions by his power.

Durpar

South of great Raurin is a much blessed body of water known as the Golden Water, the inland sea of the south. Surrounding this long, narrow waterway are a number of kingdoms, either long forgotten by the west, or the subject of wild myths.

Certainly the kingdoms of the southeast are very different than those of the west.

Durpar is a nation of traders. They make finished goods and specialty items, such as soap, spice, fine cloth, and rope, then sell it to the rest of the Realms. The merchants of Durpar travel in large caravans, moving north along the edge of Raurin, first into Mulhorand, then into Unther, and finally into Chessenta. These merchants thus distribute Durpar goods to the other nations of the Realms. The merchants of Durpar charge high prices for their goods, and each journey has the potential to make a fortune, or to get everyone in the caravan killed. Chessentan mercenaries are usually hired to guard the caravans on their journey.

The people of Durpar are a practical people, and they often provide Mulhorand and Unther with services that are normally beneath the two ancient powers (making soft goods). Durpar is reputed to be impossible to make "fair" bargains with (the merchant always wins in the end), but the merchants are unimpeachably honest and always produce goods of unequalled quality.

Durpar tends to keep its political and religious structure a closely guarded secret, even from the Chessentan middlemen. It is known that Durpar is governed by a council of merchants, that illusion magic most heavily predominates, and that Durparians worship the Creation Spirit. They claim that this being created the world, lives in all things, and is more powerful and wise than all the other gods combined. That they do not share this belief among other peoples is a testament to their ability to judge the reactions of others.

The cities of Durpar are small but thriving, and they always keep a well-defined and defended boundary with their eastern neighbor, Ulgarth. The capital of Durpar is called Heldapan.

Veldorn

In the far southwest corner of the Golden Water, the inland sea to the south that is home to a number of kingdoms, is the nation of exiles, Veldorn. Veldorn is a kingdom of monsters: beholders, dragons, vampires, half-orcs, were-creatures all dwell here.

No one knows how Veldorn came to be. The premise behind Veldorn is that each type of creature could establish a large domain where they could do as they pleased. Any who attempted to interfere in the affairs of one Beast-Chieftain, as the leaders became known, would incur the wrath of all of the other lords of Veldorn.

Several times, the peace of Veldorn has been violated, and in all cases, the invader has been destroyed.

The ruler of Veldorn, whose chief responsibility is to arbitrate disputes, is Saed, a centuries-old vampire. Saed is respected and feared by all of the other Beast-Chieftains, including the beholder-twins Xaoch and Veoyh, his main rivals.

Traders come to Veldorn on the Great Southern road and provide the Beast-Chieftains with goods and slaves at the city of Lastarr, a free city of the edge of Veldorn. The Beast-Chieftains have divided the kingdom into small city-states, each ruled by a different chieftain, with some enclaves of humanoids tolerated in the Bluetip Mountains and on the Beas-tlands Plateaus (home to many wild lycanthropes). Saed rules the nominal capital of Veldorn, Vaelan.

Eastern Shaar

West of the Golden Way is a huge expanse of grassland and rolling prairie, known as the Shaar. The Shaar has two sections; the rich and fertile Western Shaar (known simply as the Shaar), and the sparser Eastern Shaar, which is more of a wasteland. The Eastern Shaar is located directly south of Mulhorand and Unther. When the empire of Unther was at its height, nearly 2,500 years ago, the Eastern Shaar was under its control, and there were many great cities. Now its roads are buried under grass, and its cities are dead things, homes for nomads and bandits.

Many bandit tribes use the Eastern Shaar as a base, raiding southern Unther and Mulhorand or the rich farming towns of the Shaar. The largest bandit tribe is the Grey Ghosts, led by the outcast Chessentan mercenary Furifax (12th-level fighter). The Grey Ghosts have struck as far east as Durpar and as far north as Chessenta. Furifax has been trying to unite all the bandits in the Shaar into a consolidated fighting force and launch an attack against Unther; he has had limited success, but he has attracted the attention of the Cult of Tiamat.

Furifax's base is a fortress south of Unthangol Pass; his bandit tribe numbers at least 5,000 trained soldiers, each of whom rides one of the fine steeds that run wild in this region. He is the de facto lord of the lands between Hardcastle and Azulduth. The small trading towns of this area pay tribute to him.

In the northeastern portion of the Eastern Shaar is Azulduth, the Lake of Salt. This place is renowned by wizards for its healing properties. Many have made the journey southward to bathe in its waters, which are said to be so buoyant that it is impossible to sink.

This lake is the source of the River of Swords that forms the border of Mulhorand and Unther. On its far northeastern shore is the ruined tower of Nezram, who is accounted the greatest Mulhorand mage of this age. The tower was destroyed by the green dragon Chathuulandroth seven centuries ago. There are, of course, rumors of untouched chambers in the tower's foundation that may contain Nezram's greatest secrets.

In the center of the Eastern Shaar is a huge rift, larger in size than Sembia and almost 1,000 feet below sea level at its deepest point. This is Underhome, the home of the southern dwarves. This very proud race lives by mining rare substances from deep under ground and trading them at the trading village on the outskirts of Eartheart, a city on the western edge of the rift whose thousand-foot towers rise from the floor of the rift to loom above the cliffs.

The dwarves raise domestic animals by the surface of the Riftlake, a large lake in the center of the rift.

Their greatest city is Underhome; its gates are sealed by a strange white metal called hizagkuur. None but dwarves are permitted to enter Underhome. The dwarves dislike outsiders; they are cold even to the traders to whom they sell their metals. They distrust adventurers and dwarves from the north. They have a historic enmity against Unther, due to the wars two millennia ago. The adage about dwarves never forgetting or forgiving a wrong done to them is especially true when it concerns the dwarves of the Great Rift.

These days, the dwarves mine their mines and forge weapons and other tools in peace. Occasionally, duergar nations from deep in the earth come across the tunnels of the southern dwarves and there is battle, but in the last two centuries, the dwarves have had no enemies.

Chondath

Chondath is a nation west of Chessenta, on the south coast of the Vilhon Reach.

It consists of a loosely federated group of towns and cities bound together in a defense and trading alliance; each city and town in Chondath is obliged to provide men for the nation's militia and free food and board for the army should it pass through. Goods from Chondath may pass through each town without tax or tariff, though goods from other nations are subject to these charges.

There are two major cities in Chondath. Hlath, the eastern port, some 130 miles from the Sea of Fallen Stars, is a trading city specializing in wood products and lumber from the Chondalwood. It is heavily fortified to protect it from pirates and bandits. It has a population of 2,000.

The central government of Chondath is in Arrabar, a city of 5,000. Its economy is based on the trading that occurs in its large, open market. People come to Arrabar to buy goods from wandering caravans from the south, and then resell them to other people to the north and west. Arrabar is heavily fortified and has a small town militia as its guard.

Each town in Chondath sends representatives to Arrabar, who hold a week-long meeting once each year to discuss national problems. A lottery determines who chairs the meeting. In times of crisis, there are emergency meetings, and people from other nations (such as Turmish) are also invited.

Most of Chondath is covered by a dense forest called the Chondalwood. It is a thick, hot section of woods, home to treants, lone druids, and satyrs. Many of the satyrs that were driven from Yuirwood settled here, and the Chondalwood is also known as "the Satyr Wood."

Recently a fiend named Yrkhetepe, a powerful mage from the lower plane of Hades, entered Chondath and Turmish and began wreaking havoc. A number of major battles have taken place, and mercenaries from Chessenta have been hired by several towns for defense.

See I14, Swords of the Iron Legion, for more details.

PEOPLE AND SOCIETY OF MULHORAND

“Compared to all other known nations, Mulhorand is paradise. The gods created Mulhorand to show the mortals of other lands what the afterlife could be like.”

—Old Mulhorand saying

The people who inhabit Mulhorand come from three racial stocks. The rulers of Mulhorand come from the tribes of ancient Raurin; they are sallow, tall (almost as tall as western men), and thin. They do not have much body hair. This racial type is called the Mulan.

The original inhabitants of Mulhorand were a mahogany-skinned people similar to those in Turmish. They are tall and muscular, with dark skin, flat faces, and short hair; this racial type is called the Turami. This race occupies positions in the upper hierarchy of several priesthoods and is renowned for its skill in architecture, art, and stonemasonry, which are considered middle-class skills in Mulhorand.

The third racial type is that of Amn, Tethyr, and the western nations of the Inner Sea. People of this racial type, which the Mulhorandi refer to as Tethens, make up the bulk of Mulhorand's slaves, since they usually come to Mulhorand through the slave markets of Thay.

The Population of Mulhorand

When a new pharaoh takes the throne, typically his first act is the commissioning of a census, which takes several years to complete. Since the last census was nearly 40 years ago, the following figures are only estimates.

There are about 900,000 sentient people within Mulhorand, including slaves (who are counted as 7/10 of a person in the census). The vast majority of these people are humans, as the god-kings long ago discovered that demihumans were unwilling to give their total loyalty to the god-kings; the god-kings thus expelled them from the land.

Approximately 250,000 people live in Mulhorand's cities and towns; the rest dwell in the countryside. In the cities, there are nearly equal numbers of slaves and freemen, while slaves outnumber the landholders and their families in the countryside by a five-to-one ratio.

In general, there are three social classes in Mulhorand: the nobility, the middle class, and the slaves.

The Nobility

Bureaucrats are the most mobile of the group; it is possible to advance from a slave to a bureaucrat if one is in a position to get a good education. Bureaucrats include tax-collectors, scribes, messengers, and even spies. They take directives from the priesthood and generally carry out the priesthood's deliberately vague orders with great efficiency. For example, if a priest of Horus-Re wanted to discredit a rival, the priest would mention aloud that it was fortunate for him if something unpleasant happened to the rival; the bureaucrat is expected to interpret this order and carry it out without implicating his master.

Bureaucrats enable their masters to fulfill their ambitions without getting their hands dirty.

Wizardry is considered to be an honorable profession. All mages must swear allegiance to the god-king and to temples of Thoth and Horus-Re. They spend most of their time researching new magical items or examining old artifacts, so they stay out of the majority of the political affairs of Mulhorand.

The priests are the major power brokers in Mulhorand. They control vast tracts of land and thousands of slaves.

The pharaoh allows them to determine the policies of the land. By far the most powerful priesthood is that of Horus-Re, but other groups control large areas of land and slaves. Some of the more ambitious priesthoods, such as the priesthood of Anhur, have engaged in a number of secret enterprises devised to promote their visions of a more aggressive Mulhorand. (If it seems as though religion is the least important concern of the priesthoods, well, it is.)

The pharaoh, the incarnation of Horus-Re, sits on the throne in Skuld. He is more of a figurehead than a ruler, and this is mostly by choice, for reasons explained earlier. Theoretically, the priesthood, mages, and bureaucrats must obey every whim of the pharaoh, but he has yet to exert his authority. One notable quote from the priesthood is this: “The pharaoh wishes to be involved in the important affairs of the land. Design him a new temple so that he will take his mind off such a foolish notion.”

The pharaoh is always male and always an incarnation of Horus-Re [except for a brief time after the loss of Thay, when an incarnation of Thoth took the throne (all of the other incarnations of Horus-Re were dead)].

The priesthoods are hereditary; their members are almost always the descendants of incarnations of various deities, which are known as the divine houses. The houses are usually referred to by their Thayvian names, as listed below:

House of Horus-Re: House of Helcaliant
House of Thoth: House of Tholaunt
House of Osiris: House of Osriant
House of Anhur: House of Ramathant

Descendants of female incarnations are not given a House name, nor are descendants of Set incarnations.

Mulhorand is a thoroughly patriarchal society. The first two sons of a House are said to be nobles; the eldest is entitled to at least 2/3 of the father's land and slaves, while the younger son can have no more than 1/3. Other sons, and all daughters, must fend for themselves.

Nobles of all varieties must shave themselves bald, and typically paint one to three blue circles on their foreheads. These indicate learning, knowledge of magic, and familiarity with the laws, customs, and religious rituals of the land. (Very roughly, one circle means that the man is an educated freeman, two circles mean he is a mage, and three circles mean he is a priest.)

If a noble wishes to maintain his power in Mulhorand, it is almost always necessary to have friends in the priesthood of Horus-Re. However, as it is possible to strike at a priest through his friends and the power struggles in that priesthood can be extremely treacherous, it is best to avoid having too many close connections. On the other hand, it is usually a good thing to help a person rise to power.

Priests regularly strip or reduce the landholdings of their enemies, and increase those of their friends.

Some of the current influential powers include the following:

- Horustep III, House of Helcaliant, Pharaoh of Mulhorand, incarnation of Horus-Re. Horustep is only a child; he tends to be demanding and more domineering than adult incarnations of Horus-Re. He ascended to the throne in the summer of this year, following the assassination of his father Akonhorus.

He seems determined to exercise power far more decisively than his predecessors.

- Rezim, House of Helcaliant, 14th-level priest. Rezim is the vizier of Mulhorand, its most powerful political position, and uncle to the current pharaoh (Rezim is not an incarnation). He is infamous for his ruthlessness and his cunning. He is sometimes called "the best vizier that treasures can buy," though he values political support and loyalty above all.

Lately, his recklessness has bordered on megalomania. His most recent proposal would allow the direct sale of slaves (who are normally leased) to noble families, who would be free to do what they willed to them without interference from the temples (working conditions are monitored by the priesthoods on a regular basis). Rezim argues that slavery would be more efficient without interference from the temples; critics believe this is a gift to the wealthy landowners who placed him in power. The new pharaoh does not approve; Rezim's influence is on the decline, but he is still a very powerful man.

- Brathes, 11th-level fighter, bodyguard of the new pharaoh. Brathes is a worshiper of Anhur and is actively working to seal the breach between the pharaoh and that priesthood. This dismays the priests of Horus-Re, who hope to destroy the priesthood of Anhur. Brathes has been a friend of Horustep's since early childhood and is trusted by the pharaoh, but most believe he will eventually overstep his bounds and be destroyed. Few follow his fortunes, but the priests of Anhur are counting heavily on his influence.

- Mardikan, 10th-level priest, House of Helcaliant. He has been the chief rival of Rezim for years. Tall, proud, and impulsive, Mardikan is not nearly as shrewd as Rezim, and he has a vengeful streak that has played into Rezim's hands many times. Mardikan has been allowed to survive politically because he draws opposition to Rezim into the open and prevents him from being dethroned by more devious conspirators.

Lately, though, Mardikan has learned from his mistakes and senses that Rezim is no longer invulnerable. He intends to gather together a majority of priests of Horus-Re to follow him, thus preventing Rezim from giving the pharaoh to the Anhurites. It may work.

The political scene in Mulhorand is more unstable than it has been in centuries. Should Rezim be dismissed as vizier, there will be many factions rising from within the priesthood of Horus-Re to take his place. It is a situation that may be exploited by outside forces, most notably the priests of Set and the Red Wizards.

Noble Titles of Mulhorand

Mulhorand does not have a formal hierarchy of titles that are passed on from father to son. People who are recognized as nobles are referred to as "Lords," while their spouses or chosen concubines are referred to as "Ladies."

Provincial governors and the rulers of cities are referred to as "Precepts." Incarnations are referred to as "Divine Precepts." Since the internal politics of Mulhorand can be volatile, these titles are not hereditary.

The major honors given in Mulhorand are bureaucratic positions. Such titles as "Keeper of the Royal Comb," "Master of the Pharaoh's Horse," etc. are the major honors and sources of pride; without some sort of bureaucratic responsibility, no matter how trivial, a nobleman is said not to matter in Mulhorand.

Wizards are referred to as "Lord Wizards"; wizards that also belong to the priesthood of Thoth are referred to as "Lord High Wizards." Priests are referred to as "Lord Priests" and important priests as "Lord High Priests."

The Middle Class

There is a sizable middle class in Mulhorand. While the middle class owns only small tracts of land, it includes many skilled craftsmen whose talents are in demand. Artists, builders, traders, mercenaries, and scribes are the most noted members of this class (with horse groomers, navigators, and military commanders added to this list in times of war). There are also freeman farmers who lease slaves from the church to serve as their work force.

Because members of this class are often wealthy, they are seen as marriage prospects for the daughters of noble families.

Adventurers, often considered to be members of the middle class elsewhere, are treated with disdain in Mulhorand. Adventuring is seen as the same thing as grave robbing; no one honors adventurers in Mulhorand, and few consort with known adventurers. City guards and Preceptual militia keep a watchful eye on all adventurers.

Some craft guilds exist in Mulhorand, of which the Scribes' Guild is the most famous. Compared to the priesthoods, the guilds are honorable groups that fight to protect the rights and security of their members. They have a reputation for pushiness and making unreasonable demands in an attempt to get their own way. Some craftsmen attempt to work independent of the guilds, but they are subject to the whims of Mulhorand politics, since one needs good connections to survive without (and against) the guilds.

Nearly all professional soldiers and guards in Mulhorand are Chessentan mercenaries. These are paid by the cities and precepts in which they are stationed. The priesthood of Anhur has purchased many slaves and is training them to be a military force, but this is not approved by the pharaoh.

Slaves

Most of the people of Mulhorand are slaves, the official property of the churches. Landholders are not permitted to buy slaves (yet) but may rent them from a temple. Each temple buys its own slaves, which it trains for its own purposes.

Slaves in Mulhorand are reasonably well-treated. Food is plentiful and no one starves. Killing a slave is a capital crime, and any slave who is unfairly punished is able to make a complaint to the priests of Osiris, who judge how slaves are treated in Mulhorand. Punishment for abusing a slave usually involves forfeiture of some lands and possessions. Work is hard and sometimes dangerous, but few masters are willing to be responsible for the accidental death of a slave.

All slaves must take an oath to obey the gods and whatever master the gods see fit to give them. It is not uncommon for a master to pay his slaves when they are returned to their priesthood; this often favorably impresses the priests who own the slaves. Life as a slave in Mulhorand is not easy or particularly pleasant, but it is better than a slave's life in other lands, especially Thay.

The Society of Mulhorand

Mulhorand is a lawful neutral society. It believes in order and discipline, and despises change. Each member of society is expected to obey the law without question, respect the authority of the priests without question, and honor the gods without question. Mulhorand represents paradise on earth—stability and security for all eternity. These concepts, in the eyes of a faithful Mulhorandi, cannot be challenged.

Underlying the society, however, is a great deal of corruption. The priesthood is an object of political domination rather than religious worship, and each priesthood suffers from infighting, power struggles, and useless bickering.

The unifying forces of the god-kings, tradition, and isolation from external forces prevents Mulhorand from disintegrating into petty city-states, as happened in Chessenta, or into an impotent has-been, as happened to Unther. While Mulhorand lacks the will and the manpower to regain its lost empire in the near future, it still is a power to be reckoned with in the eastern section of the Inner Sea.

Mulhorand is a land of arrogance. The nobles of the realm consider themselves superior to the people of every other nation. They believe Mulhorand to be more civilized, more prosperous, more creative, and (if they were ever interested in conquest again) more powerful than all of the nations on the outside. Of all the lands in the Realms, they reason, only Mulhorand is ruled by gods.

They do not hide this arrogance from outsiders; even the slaves are haughty, for they are not the property of men, but of gods. Mulhorand is hidebound in its belief that it will be eternal, that no enemy will ever be able to destroy it.

Customs of Mulhorand

Mulhorand has a number of unique customs, which are generally adhered to by all classes.

First, beyond all other things, Mulhorand is a theocratic state, ruled by the priesthood. Mulhorandi are supposed to be willing to submit to the authority of the priests in all things, and most of them do so willingly.

Mulhorandi always show great respect whenever a priest walks by, usually by bowing their heads or by turning away so as not to interfere in the priest's journey. Priests expect these shows of respect.

Mandatory prayers occur four times daily: at waking, at mid-day, at dinner time, and at bed time. There is one holy day each week, when all men, nobles and slaves alike, are expected to congregate under the balconies of temples and listen to the priests.

Priests are the only ones permitted to slay cattle for the consumption of meat. This must be done while performing holy rites (almost always by acolytes) or the meat is considered to be unclean.

Mulhorandi often seem to have an obsession with death, spending much of their time constructing their tombs and preparing for the afterlife. This is not as morbid as it sounds. Mulhorandi believe that the afterlife is a continuation of life, not a journey to paradise or damnation. Thus the people of Mulhorand do their best to prepare for the next existence.

Language of Mulhorand

The Mulhorandi language comes from a language family known as Rauric. Only Mulhorandi and Untheric survive from this linguistic family; Mulhorandi has preserved much of the old tongue, while Untheric has evolved greatly over the course of the millennia.

Mulhorandi is an inflected language with many verb tenses and cases; word order is relatively unimportant. It often sounds thick and slow compared to other languages; some say this is due to the heavy influence of priestly rituals on everyday speech. Basic Mulhorandi writing consists of complicated picture-glyphs, each of which represents a different idea; it has become somewhat more abstracted over the course of the last thousand years and consists of a vocabulary of tens of thousands of pictographs. Most Mulhorandi know a basic vocabulary of about 3,000 pictographs, while scribes, wizards, and priests learn a more extensive vocabulary.

GEOGRAPHY OF MULHORAND

General Description

"Mulhorand is the gift of its rivers. No other force of nature, not even the gods, is responsible for its greatness."

—Old Mulhorand saying

Present-day Mulhorand is only a fraction of the size it was when its empire was at its peak, but it is still a large and powerful kingdom. Its northern border is the River of the Dawn, though it claims the Priador and all of Thay as its rightful domain, and Mulhorand could march into Thazalhar unopposed if it so chose. Its eastern border is not established, but Mulhorand is thought to have mastery of lands as far east as the Sunrise Mountains and the River Murghol, though Mulhorand has no towns or outposts east of Ganathwood or the Fields of Ganath. The eastern border extends southward to the Sword Mountains, at the eastern edge of the Great Vale, as far south as Azulduth, the lake of salt. The western border extends from Azulduth along the River of Swords.

Within this expanse are desert, ruins, mountains, fertile fields, and cities that were great 2,000 years before the first stone was placed on Waterdeep, before the Zhentarim ever unleashed an evil scheme, before Bane was even aware that the Realms existed, a time when the world was young, even to the elves. The words Mulhorand and "eternity" are the same in the language of the Mulhorandi.

Mulhorand lies within a series of plains, plateaus, lowlands and valleys. There are four distinct geographic divisions:

The Menesankh, or Plain of Life, extends in a crescent around the southern tip of the Alamber Sea as far north as Skuld; this is a mainly dry area of flat plains, irrigated by rivers, with occasional marshland.

The Asanibis is the Mulhorand name for the Great Vale, which is a land of hills and plains that lies between the Sword Mountains and the Menesankh.

The mountainous areas, which include the Sword Mountains in the south and the Sunrise Mountains in the north, are called the Furitep. These rugged peaks are said to be impassable, though this not quite true; one can get through them in the summer, with the help of a donkey.

The fourth distinct region, the Taranoth, is a series of high plains that rises from the sea between Skuld and Sultim; this area is known for its gloomy climate and spectacular cliffs and falls.

Despite its arid climate, there is a great deal of cultivated lands in Mulhorand along the edges of the rivers and in the Great Vale. Farmland is either owned privately by a noble or run by the church. Laborers on church farms are slaves owned by the temples.

Mulhorand usually saves its excess produce for times of famine, so it exports very few crops. Crops grown include wheat, hay, and barley, with figs, dates, grapes, oranges, and other fruits grown in the Great Vale. Cattle and pigs are the typical herd animals.

There are trees that are felled along the edge of the Sword Mountains, typically cedars and beech. One major forest, Ganathwood, lies along the border of the Murghom-Mulhorand border in the gap between the Sword and Sunrise mountains.

The River of Swords

This long river forms the border between Mulhorand and Unther. It is divided into two portions: The Lower Swords, which flow in two parts from their sources to their junction by the ruins of Sekras, and the Upper Sword, which flows from Sekras to the Alamber Sea.

The Lower Swords are named the Blue Sword and the Green Sword. The Blue Sword River lies entirely in Unther and has as its source a fresh water spring in the southeastern portion of that country. The Green Sword River flows from its source in Azulduth, the Great Salt Lake, and carries a considerable amount of salt with it. The Green Sword is undrinkable.

From the junction at Sekras, the river flows northward to the Alamber. This water is bitter but drinkable, and it carries a lot of sediments. A machine that pumps the river and filters the salt still operates at Sekras, though none but a handful of priests of Thoth know its workings. The river floods in summer time, though it is somewhat less predictable in its floods than the River of Spears, which lies to the east. Large, flat-bottomed boats carry cargo between Unther and Mulhorand settlements on either side of the river, and a canal bypasses the pumps and allows access to the upper river.

Sekras is a small city. It was once the center of the cult of Sebek, but now it is infested with werecrocodiles. Paladins in the service of Osiris, with the tacit approval of the priests of Horus-Re, destroyed the city and scattered the inhabitants.

Alongside the upper river are many small farms. The lower river is mostly uninhabited, except for hermits and wizards who choose to sequester themselves from the control of the priests of Thoth. This area is known to be the home of a number of sphinxes.

The River of Swords was given that name because it was here long ago that the god-kings of Unther and Mulhorand laid down their swords and swore an oath of eternal peace between the two kingdoms.

The Great Vale

The Great Vale, or Asanibis, is the breadbasket of Mulhorand. Here on great farms slavers and freeholders labor to produce food to feed the cities of Mulhorand. The Great Vale begins in the shadow of the Sword Mountains, where the god-kings and their servants are buried in elaborate tombs on the vale floor and on the mountainside. Ancient step pyramids mix with obelisks as 3,000 years of the honored dead find housing to continue their existence in the afterlife.

Ancient pumps provide continued irrigation for these farms, and the flooding of the River of Spears provides these farms with much-needed sediment.

Priests of Osiris and priestesses of Isis travel into the Great Vale and use their magic to enhance the fertility of this land. Slave farms are owned by the churches, with individual faiths allowed to build their own farms and compete in the selling of goods, though the majority of these farms belong to Horus-Re and are sublet to the priests of Osiris (which gives the priests of Horus-Re the threat of revoking the leases on the farms if the priests of Osiris should turn against them).

Crops grown here include wheat (emmer) and barley (this is also the center of Mulhorand's ale, beer, and winemaking); sheep, goats, pigs and cows are the principal animals herded in this region.

The Great Vale is primarily a dwelling place of humans. There are four towns, Surbroar, Klondor, Ulzel, and Mishtan, each of which have between 2,000 and 5,000 people. Towns serve as a place of gathering during celebrations and trading; there are some slave farms with more people than the towns.

Near Mishtan is the Land of the Dead, to which thousands of slaves and freemen are brought at flood time to help with the construction of new tombs. Transportation in this region is by horse (for nobles), by river, or by foot (poorly tended roads lie some distance from the river in a parallel course, and a road connects Mishtan and Klondor). At the present time, Klondor is threatened by an attack of the dreaded Skriaxit (see the scenario "Rage of Dust" in the adventures section).

Sword Mountains

This chain of high, allegedly impassable mountains (no one in Mulhorand climbs mountains—"because they're there" has never occurred to them) separates Mulhorand from the Plains of Purple Dust; when the wind is very active on the Plains, it blows red dust over the mountaintops and onto the western slopes. Within these mountains are a number of fierce monsters that plague southern Mulhorand, most notably Gestanius, a great wyrm blue dragon that has fed on the slaves working in the Land of the Dead for well over 600 years, the descendants of the wizard Nezram, and dracosphinxes.

On the edge of the Sword Mountains, in the Great Vale, are some of the tombs of the dead god-kings. The greatest tomb, that of Horuseres II, was carved out of the very mountainside and is said to lead into a treacherous series of natural caverns where the pharaoh and his riches were entombed. None have ever sacked his tomb, but several minions of Horus-Re (see new monsters, Divine Minions) guard it at all times.

River of Spears

This fast-flowing river has its source in the Sword Mountains and its mouth at Gheldaneth. It has two tributaries, the Mishtan and Klondor, named for the two towns nearest their sources. The river provides water for the Great Vale and its many farms. For large craft, this river is only easily navigable near Gheldaneth, though small vessels regularly race along the water near Ulzel and Surbroar, carrying small cargoes and passengers. It is considered a risky ride. The River of Spears floods regularly in the summer, providing new soil for the farmlands and moisture that lasts most of the year; these lands are irrigable ten months of the year.

River of Shadows

This long, winding river has its source at a spring near the Sword Mountains. It does not flow as fast as the River of Spears, but its waters are rocky and treacherous. It is also less predictable in its floods. At the delta, near Skuld, are large slave farms that raise flax and papyrus and herd sheep. The major cities along this river are Jhalhoran, which is connected to Maerlar and Surbroar by the Great East Road, and Skuld (City of Shadows), the capital of Mulhorand. It is from Skuld that the River gets its name.

The Cliffs of Leaping Horses

This is the horse land of Mulhorand, where great brown and white steeds run along the plains; some are captured and used as draft animals; since the decline of the priesthood of Anhur they are no longer taken for charioteering. This is a large area of high plains, several hundred feet above sea level. These plains are arid, but hardy plants thrive here. A number of less welcome beasts—hippogriffs and griffons—also use this area as hunting grounds. There are no major human settlements here, though some Mulhorandi have small outposts where they capture horses.

This coastline is also dotted with a number of sea caves that serve as bases for some of the pirates that roam the Alamber Sea.

River Rauthenflow

North of the Cliff of Leaping Horses is the great river Rauthenflow. It begins at Brightstar Lake in eastern Murghom, flows swiftly to its union with the River Murghol, and then rushes into the Alamber Sea at Rauthgor. These rainbow falls are considered to be one of the most spectacular sights in all the Realms, and the area is known to be a haven for mermaids. The Rauthenflow is an extremely swift river, noted for its cataracts, rapids, and whirlpools. Few boats attempt to ride the rapids of Rauthenflow; the river cannot be forded and the only bridge is at Rauthil, on the great Eastern Trading Road. Most of the countryside around the Rauthenflow is quite arid, inhabited only by the most nasty of monsters.

This river is considered to be part of the highland plain region called the Taranoth.

River of The Dawn

The River of the Dawn is the northern border of Mulhorand, though Mulhorand still claims to rule the Priador (Thay). This river separates Mulhorand from Thazalhar, the region of Thay that was devastated when Thay broke free of Mulhorand 400 years ago. Thay has a small settlement in this region where the Tharch and his bodyguard enforce Thay's claim on this land, though Mulhorand regularly sends troops here to enforce its own claim. There are occasional clashes, but Thay does not wish to prod Mulhorand into a full-scale war, so conflicts are carefully limited.

The river is an extremely swift one, even faster than the Rauthenflow. There is but one bridge, which is part of the Great Eastern trading road; merchants use this to bring their goods into and out of Thay. Though both nation's rulers disapprove, there is active trade between Thay and Mulhorand.

The Alamber Sea

This body of water is the easternmost part of the Inner Sea. It serves as a border between Mulhorand and Unther and is the home of a major sahuagin kingdom, the Aleaxtis, which is at best an undependable ally of Thay. Many trading vessels use the Alamber Sea on the profitable trade route between the ports of Sultim and Bezantur. Unther and Mulhorand recognize this sea as open water, free for either nation to use, but neither country controls it.

The northernmost island in this sea is the Aldor, which is the Thayvian naval base. Currently, the dominant naval and merchant power in this area is Thay; both Unther and Mulhorand find it more convenient to ship their goods in Thayvian hulls and accept Thayvian goods than build their own ships and find their own markets.

There are also many pirates that live in small remote coves hidden along desolate stretches of the coast of both Mulhorand and Unther, and on islands south of the Aldor. They prey on smaller coastal trading vessels and occasionally surprise the crews of larger vessels who bring their ships into shore or make emergency repairs. Thayvian navy crews regularly raid these pirate bases; sometimes the pirates disguise themselves as fishermen and try to avoid their notice, though Thayvian marines are not noted for caring who they kill, capture, or throw into slavery. This has resulted in a considerable number of Mulhorand fishermen being kidnapped by Thay.

Recently, the priests of Anhur have secretly built a large fleet, moored near Sultim. They have bought many slaves and have trained them in seacraft; they intend to sail against the Aldor and break Thayvian naval domination in the Alamber Sea. The priests of Anhur hope to persuade the new pharaoh to support this enterprise, as they believe Thay is now weak with internal strife and the Alamber is ripe for the taking. The result of this battle is yet to be seen.

The priests of Horus-Re are alarmed. The priests of Anhur are determined to sail in the spring; Thayvian spies have warned the ruler of the Aldor of the attack, but the administrators do not believe that Mulhorand, "the senile giant," has the will to fight.

Ship of The Gods

This small island in the Alamber Sea is an active volcano. Its last eruption was 400 years ago, killing thousands (the island was settled by Unther at the time). Now, it is used as a haven for pirates. The volcano has begun to come to life again, and the diviners in Skuld predict that it will issue a cloud of darkness within the next three years that will cover the city in ash.

Main Cities

Skuld

Skuld, City of Shadows, City of Eternity, is the oldest surviving city in the Forgotten Realms, with the possible exception of Underhome, the dwarven city in the Great Rift. In nine years, the city will celebrate its 3500th anniversary. It boasts that in that time no invading army has ever breached its walls, and that no invading army ever will, for Mulhorand is eternal.

While it is generally agreed that Waterdeep is the most splendid city in the Realms, an inhabitant of Skuld would argue heatedly with that statement. The Skuldians say that no place in the Realms can match the grandeur of the City of the Gods, the great towers in which the manifestations of the gods are housed. This may be true, but the rest of Skuld is squalid and decrepit, especially by comparison to the inner city. Ancient homes with patchwork repairs line the city streets. The markets are small and cluttered in comparison with those of the northern cities; even the palaces of city officials are rundown. And, probably most damning of all, Skuld is not a cosmopolitan city.

Elves, halflings, and gnomes are forbidden in its streets, unless they have a letter of entry issued by city bureaucrats or one of the temples.

Half-elves and dwarves may enter, but they may not bear weapons or armor unless a special (and expensive—ten gp and up) permit is issued by the city authorities. As most half-elves and dwarves who do enter Skuld come as part of mercenary companies, this is a good revenue-generating rule.

Visitors to the city are confined to either of the two merchant's wards or the shipyards, and they may not enter the rest of the city. All wards are surrounded by high walls and heavy, well-guarded gates.

Trade comes in by sea or by the road to Maerlar. A low seawall serves as a break against tidal waves, natural or otherwise, and protects the city at a distance of three miles from shore. On the eastern side of the city, there is a large cluster of tenements that have built up around the walls. This is the slave section; though it's outside the main wall, it is considered to be part of the main city.

Entering through the sea gate, there are two shipyards: the naval yard, which contains Skuld's fleet of 20 old and rotting ships, and the merchant yard. Seagoing traffic docks at the merchant yard. Visiting crews are housed in inns located near the docks; this is a rough-and-tumble place.

Licensed merchants may operate businesses and store cargo in the adjacent warehouse district. The warehouse district was once accessible by drawbridges over the River of Shadows, but that gate has long been closed.

The merchant district contains shops, inns, moneychangers, and stores that supply adventurers, except for weapons and arms; only priests of Horus-Re or Osiris are allowed to sell weaponry.

The eastern gate leads to the road to Maerlar. This is the most heavily guarded of the gates. A garrison of 500 mercenaries from Chessenta are housed between an outer and inner gate as a precaution. The greatest threat to Skuld, in the opinion of its leaders, comes from adventuring parties, not armies. Adventuring parties can find some inns and stables, but at inflated prices. This opens into the palace district, where the wealthy of Skuld live, and the palace itself, from which the vizier of Mulhorand and his bureaucrats rule the city and advise the pharaoh. To the south of the palace district is the crafts district, where goods are manufactured (often by licensed foreigners), and the eastern merchant ward, where more goods are bought and sold.

The central ward is the people's ward. Here more than 40,000 people are housed—20,000 slaves (mostly slaves to the privileged) and 20,000 freemen. The dwellings can only be described as a sprawling slum, with a few dwellings preserving the distinctive decorative style of Old Mulhorand. There are temples and shops intermixed with the dwellings in this area.

The temple of Osiris, on the southern wall adjacent to the merchant and warehouse districts, is the gateway to the catacombs, where the dead of the city are buried. A number of monsters are known to live in the catacombs and, most notably several families of werecrocodiles and rakshasas. The most impressive building is the twin temples of Horus-Re, whose huge pillars rise well above the surrounding houses. Between the temples is the gate to the City of the Gods, shaped in the symbol of Horus, and a large prayer tower from which the god-kings make pronouncements, usually once every century.

The god-kings dwell in huge towering palaces in the city where only priests may go. Each palace is an architectural marvel, built thousands of years ago by long-dead slaves. The tallest tower is that of fallen Re, where the corpse of his manifestation is entombed. A secret passage connects the palace of the pharaoh, incarnation of Horus-Re, with that of his manifestation, and here the incarnation comes for counsel. There are reputed to be arsenals of magic within this inner city.

Goods coming into the city are heavily taxed, unless the merchant is chartered by the god-king of Mulhorand, in which case his goods are exempt from taxes. The priests of Horus-Re control the charters and line their pockets with the moneys gained from them. Guards in the city are all mercenaries from Chessenta. They may not possess weapons or armor within the city unless they have a permit from the bureaucrats; they may not cast spells without permission from the temple of Thoth, which charges heavily to grant this right.

There are no establishments that cater to adventurers, though one can usually find work at taverns in the merchant district as a bodyguard or armed escort for caravans. It is possible to join the city guard, though one must swear total fealty to the god-king and his priests.

The punishment for crimes is often death by decapitation, performed publicly in front of the temple of Horus-Re. Capital crimes include murder, blasphemy, entering a forbidden area, lying to a priest of Horus-Re, assault against a priest, theft from a priest, cursing a priest, killing a slave without due cause, theft of a lord's property, entry onto a lord's estate without permission, and assault against a guard.

There are trials, and sometimes the defendant can get off with forced expulsion from Skuld and a bane spell (see new spells).

The city is supposed to be ruled by the vizier, the strong right hand of the pharaoh. In truth, the vizier is too busy to run the city, so its affairs are handled by a high-level priest of Horus-Re; it is not considered to be a very great honor.

The current chief administrator of the city is Ceianre of the House of Horus. The captain of the guards is traditionally appointed by the priests of Anhur, but the priests of Horus-Re have usurped that function, giving it to Teldartham (8th-level fighter), a champion of the Horus-Re priesthood. The city itself has an unofficial brotherhood of guardians from the priesthoods of Anhur, Osiris, and Isis: its leader is believed to be Halcaunt (13th-level paladin), a worshiper of Osiris. This brotherhood believes that the cult of Set has a base somewhere in Skuld, from which it is conspiring to destroy Mulhorand. The Brotherhood of Skuld has made some contact with famous adventuring parties and personalities, most notably the Simbul.

Skuld has a total population of about 95,000.

Gheldaneth

Gheldaneth is the second largest city in Mulhorand. Where Skuld is a contrast of high towers and ugly sprawl, Gheldaneth is mostly sprawl. There is a large port facility, as goods come by ship from Unthalass and foodstuffs come from the Great Vale by water or by land.

The city is governed by the priests of Thoth, and the largest building is not the palace but the great university whose towers line the northern wall of the city. It is compulsory for every citizen of Gheldaneth to learn how to read, write, count, and to be able to answer simple questions about the history of Mulhorand and its deities.

Even slaves are taught to read and write. The very best students in Gheldaneth may be accepted as apprentices to the Scribes' Guild, which is one of the most prestigious positions in Mulhorand. Social class is not a barrier to entry.

Adjacent to the university is the wizards' college, which is open only to initiates of Thoth. All new candidates for admission to the college are magically screened to ensure that they are not Thayvian spies trying to learn the secrets of Thoth. All wizards in Mulhorand must travel here or to the temple in Skuld to study wizardry.

Major temples in Gheldaneth are dedicated to Thoth, Nephthys, Horus-Re, and Isis. The population of this city is about 80,000.

Neldorild

The fourth largest city in Mulhorand is the coastal city of Neldorild. This is a city of the rich, where noble families who wish to get away from the politics and woes of the realm come to retire. It is a relatively new city and slaves and masons still work endlessly on new structures. It is ruled by the priesthood of Nephthys. There is also a small port, Rasolind, five miles down the coast, which is used as a supply station for the Mulhorand fishing fleet based in Delgora (the docks used to be in Neldorild, but the fleet was forced out of the city once it became a place for the wealthy). Theft is a capital offense in Neldorild.

Including its slaves, the population of Neldorild is about 40,000.

Mishtan

One of a number of small towns in the Great Vale, Mishtan's major claim to importance is that it is the gateway to the Land of the Dead, the burial grounds of the Pharaohs and their families. New constructions are constantly being built, and the tombs of the pharaohs for the next three generations have been planned; at flood time, the town teems with masons, artisans, and slaves.

Mishtan is ruled by the temple of Osiris, which oversees the Land of the Dead. It has a population of 2,000, but booms to over 30,000 at construction time; these temporary workers are housed in makeshift dwellings that surround the town.

Sampranasz

This small town is important only because it is the real center of the cult of Set. Sampranasz has been destroyed three times in its history (first during the Orcgate Wars, and twice since then by natural disaster).

There are many hidden ruins within these walls; these are used by the cult as meeting and worship places. The town ruler is a military governor (Sanuet, 13th-level LE fighter) who was appointed and trusted by the priests of Horus-Re but is secretly in the service of Set.

The town is a fishing port. Its coastline has some marshland where papyrus can be found in abundance. The town has a population of 3,000; those who do not serve Set disappear very quickly.

CURRENT ECONOMY OF MULHORAND

“Mulhorand prospers, as it has always prospered, depending not on the unreliable fortunes of other powers.”

—Pharaoh Akonhorus II

Mulhorand is a slave-based agrarian economy. Foodstuffs are grown on slave farms in the Great Vale. There are small farms that are owned by landowners, but the costs of slave leasing makes them prohibitively expensive. The slave farms are not an efficient system, but they provide more than enough food for the country's needs.

Food grown in Mulhorand is used in Mulhorand; food exports are almost nonexistent, though when the north suffers from drought some traders have bought grain from freeholders to sell elsewhere. While Mulhorand often has a food surplus, it is usually preserved by magic for years of drought, which, thanks to the interference of the Red Wizards of Thay in the weather of the eastern Inner Sea, come more frequently these days. Mulhorand is content to grow for its needs and does not try to compete economically with Thay; this is in perfect harmony with most of its political policies for the last three centuries.

Each slave farm is controlled by a temple, and temple bureaucrats carefully count and monitor distribution of grain. Some temples are bribed by freeholders to put them down as having less grain than they possess, thus enabling them to sell the surplus to traders and avoid taxes.

Mulhorand produces papyrus, a reed that can be spun into a variety of products including paper. Over the course of centuries, Mulhorand has increased the efficiency of this process, and Mulhorand paper is considered to be of extremely high quality, sought after by wizards throughout the Realms. The slave farms of papyrus harvesters in the delta of the River of Spears are run by the temples of Thoth and Nephthys; both temples have waxed rich from the proceeds. Flax grows in the north, from which fine linen is made; this has made certain temples of Anhur and Osiris quite rich.

While Mulhorand imports slaves (usually from Thay), it never exports them. Selling Mulhorand citizens into slavery, or even selling Mulhorand slaves to foreigners in Mulhorand, is a capital offense. The general belief is that being a slave in Mulhorand is better than being a freeman in other nations. It is considered an insult to the pharaoh to assume that temple property can be resold to outsiders. This is yet another example of Mulhorand arrogance.

Mulhorand does export wood to Thay, usually from the edges of Ganathwood. It is not a major business, and Mulhorand must rely on imports from the south for truly fine woods that are finding increasing popularity in furnishings.

Mulhorand has several major mines. Gold is plentiful in the rivers, particularly in the Great Vale, and there are several gold mines in the Sword Mountains. These mines are perhaps the most ancient ones ever devised by humans, using dwarven shaft-mining techniques. A good number of precious stones are mined in Mulhorand: agate, amethyst, and jasper are the most valuable. Granite is also plentiful; many foreign sculptors insist on Mulhorand granite for their works.

Mulhorand imports iron, fine timber, silver, incense, spice, and perfume. These scarce commodities are provided by traders from the south.

Coinage

Coinage in Mulhorand has been around for many years. Coins are primarily made of gold, dated and engraved with the face of the current pharaoh as a symbol of authenticity; the edges have demarcations to prevent further shaving. There are two major coins: the precept, a small coin worth three to five silvers elsewhere, and the pharaoh, worth one to two gold crowns elsewhere. The Mulhorand rate of exchange is six precepts to one crown.

Only nobles and the middle class use coins. Most goods in Mulhorand are bartered, especially among the lower classes and slaves, who are permitted to own property if given as gifts for good service (the temples are allowed to confiscate this money since technically the slaves are their property and therefore anything that belongs to them belongs to the temple).

Real property in Mulhorand comes from two sources, first being the ownership of cattle and livestock. Meat is considered to be a valuable commodity, and cattle farmers are among the most honored freemen. However, diseases plague herds and flocks on frequent occasions, so it is not always a stable source of wealth.

The second source of wealth is ownership of land. The drawback to this form of wealth is that the temples can confiscate land at any time. Were it not for the priesthood of Osiris, which allows a displaced freeholder to challenge the temples in a just court, the power of the priests of Horus-Re would be virtually absolute.

CURRENT POLITICS OF MULHORAND

“All thy affairs are sound and prosperous; every responsible incumbent has reported to me, saying that all the Pharaoh’s affairs are sound and prosperous.”

—Rezim, typical report to Pharaoh Akonhorus

There are two forms of government in Mulhorand—a central government based in Skuld and run by the vizier (who may be overruled by the pharaoh, but usually isn’t), and preceptual governments in cities and over wide areas. There are 16 precepts in Mulhorand, each of whom is appointed by the vizier, though in areas that are controlled by a priesthood, the vizier appoints precepts recommended by that priesthood.

The vizier is the most important individual in Mulhorand. He is always the most dominant priest of Horus-Re. He appoints or approves of the appointments of all high-level bureaucrats and all major officials. He can strip people of land, titles, and freedom as he wills. He is virtually a dictator, though sometimes a vizier who is too unpopular is removed by the pharaoh.

Aside from the pharaoh, the only challenge to the absolute authority of the vizier is from the justices, who are chosen from the priests of Osiris. It is a duty of Osirian priests to uphold the law, and a complainant may challenge even the vizier in a court of law. The burden of proof, of course, lies with the complainant. However, the judges in Mulhorand are honest and honorable men.

Because the leader of each priesthood wields a lot of political power, fighting for the high priesthood is the source of bitter rivalry in all orders, with the exception of that of Osiris. Favoritism and political opportunism is rampant in Mulhorand. The political leadership in Mulhorand is often extremely ruthless; there are few assassinations of person, but many of character.

The incarnations are mostly spectators to these power games. Incarnations are the religious heads of each priesthood, but they consider politics to be too mundane to be the pursuit of gods, so mortals are given tacit approval for their political in-fighting.

Each priesthood can be roughly divided into three factions: conservative, mainline, and radical. There is often fighting for leadership of each of the factions of each priesthood. The conservative faction wants as little change as possible. The radical faction believes that change is essential. The mainline faction wants to preserve the power of its priesthood by avoiding violent disagreements between the conservative and radical elements.

Each faction of each priesthood plays a part in determining the goals and direction of Mulhorand. It is not uncommon for a faction of a priesthood to have more in common with a faction of another priesthood than the other factions of its own priesthood. These factions can be lumped together according to their general goals, as follows:

Status Quo: These people want to preserve the current state of Mulhorand and refrain from wars against foreign powers, including Thay. They believe that Thay will eventually rejoin Mulhorand on its own volition. Factions in this camp include the conservative and mainline factions of Horus-Re and Isis and the conservative factions of Thoth and Osiris.

Consolidationists: These people believe that a war should be waged against Thay, but that now is not the time to wage it. This faction wants to build up the Mulhorand nation and make careful preparations, which they believe will ensure that Thay falls quickly. Factions in support of this include the radical factions of Horus-Re and Isis, the mainline factions of Thoth and Osiris, and the conservative factions of Anhur and Nephthys.

Expansionists: This group believes in restoring Mulhorand to the property boundaries that existed at the height of the Second Empire. They wish to purge the Realms of all traces of Set, to destroy the Red Wizards, and to reclaim Thay as part of Mulhorand. They want to restore Mulhorand’s army and march on Thay as soon as possible. Factions in support of this include the radical factions of Thoth and Osiris and the mainline and radical factions of Anhur and Nephthys.

Current political issues in Mulhorand include the following:

- The Thayvian problem.
- Rezim’s plan to sell slaves directly to freeholders instead of leasing them. (This has raised strong opposition from the priests of Osiris, and there is growing strain between those two traditionally friendly priesthoods.)
- The sahuagin problem.
- The cult of Set problem.
- Complaints by traveling merchants about poor road conditions and lack of protection against bandits. Rezim wants to enact a stiff road tax (as in Thay) and promises to repair the roads later. The merchants do not trust him.
- Attempts by freeholders to expand their trade and produce more items, so they can compete more effectively with Thay. This is supported by Rezim and the church of Nephthys, but many within the church of Horus-Re see it as an attempt to destroy the traditional approach to handling goods in Mulhorand that keeps the nation safe from shortages.
- Attacks by monsters on the Eastern Road and in the Great Vale have been increasing, and the people are beginning to demand that the dangerous areas be cleared.
- Major conflicts between the priests of Horus-Re and Anhur are leading to increasing violence between their followers. The priests of Horus-Re have stripped the Anhurites of their traditional dominions, embarrassed them at every opportunity, and would like to destroy the priesthood outright.

The precepts in Mulhorand often have their own political struggles. The precepts are listed below and rated as major, minor, or no importance in political terms:

Aina (no): Includes the town of Aina, and the farms at the mouth of the River of Swords. Precept is Alakin (8th-level priest of Thoth).

Gheldaneth (major): Includes Gheldaneth and the area at the mouth of the River of Spears. Precept is Derlaunt (13th-level priest of Thoth); Tholaunt, Divine Precept of Thoth (his incarnation) can overrule Derlaunt's decisions.

Surbroar (no): Includes area around Surbroar. Precept is Kesia (5th-level fighter who serves Isis).

Klondor (minor): Includes area around Klondor and east to the Plains of Purple Dust. There are many monsters in this region, so there is a large garrison of Chessenta mercenary guards. Precept is Haskrayth (12th-level fighter, chief of the mercenaries, who serves Assuran).

Ulzel (no): Serves area around Ulzel and the immediate south. Precept is Nessisi (10th-level priest of Isis).

Mishtan (major): Serves Mishtan and the Land of the Dead. Precept is responsible for the tombs of the pharaohs and other important Mulhorandi. Its precept is Temis (12th-level priest of Osiris).

Jhalhoran (minor): Serves Jhalhoran and lands west; responsible for road patrols on the Great Eastern Trade Road. Precept is Ulara (13th-level priest of Nephthys). Nephita, the current incarnation of Nephthys, also dwells here.

Skuld (minor): The reason the precept of Skuld is only a minor position is that the vizier has the ability to overrule the precept on any matter, and the precept is really only second-in-command of Skuld. The current precept is Ceianre (11th-level priest of Horus-Re).

Maerlar (no): The main job of this precept is to make sure that the crossroads are continually guarded. Attaining this position is usually considered to be the vizier's way of telling a henchman that the vizier is disappointed in him. It currently has no precept; one is expected to be appointed within the next six months, though Rezim may keep it open for a while longer in case someone disappoints him.

Rauthil (no): This position is identical to that of Maerlar, except that this precept has less territory to guard. Rezim likes to keep either Rauthil or Maerlar without a precept at all times, to have a place to put his enemies. Its current precept is Ethnestus (4th-level priest of Horus-Re).

Rauthgor (no): This precept looks at waterfalls all day, lives in a small isolated keep, and if the pirates don't get him, the sahuagin will. This position is given to an enemy that the vizier wants to eliminate. The current precept is Bokasin (10th-level fighter/6th-level priest of Anhur).

Ganath (major): This is a major post because it is located in Murghyr, capital of Murghom. It is mostly a diplomatic post, as the precept of Ganath is also the Mulhorandi ambassador to Murghom. It is considered a nice place to get away from the infighting of Mulhorandi politics, and is typically given to old, respected priests of Horus-Re. The current precept is Imthalos (17th-level priest of Horus-Re).

Sultim (major): This was once a minor post, but as Sultim is the fastest growing city in Mulhorand, the importance of this post is now equal to that of Gheldaneth. The precept is responsible for the safety of Mulhorand's largest port and is supposed to try to bring order to the chaos of Outer Sultim. None have come close to succeeding in the latter responsibility.

This was typically the post held by the high priest of Anhur, but Rezim has stripped the priests of Anhur of that privilege; the current precept is Koramon (10th-level fighter who serves Horus-Re).

Thazarim (minor): This precept has one major responsibility—to ensure the integrity of the northern border, since Thay has invaded twice. The precept lives in a small citadel just south of the River of the Dawn.

This was also traditionally an Anhur post, but they have been stripped of this as well. The current precept is Mulhortep (15th-level fighter). Mulhortep is a competent general and probably the best man for the job.

Sampranasz (minor): This precept is really in the service of Set. The precept controls the town of Sampranasz and the surrounding area. The current precept is Sanuet (13th-level fighter).

One may wonder whether a person can refuse the position of precept, given the lack of honor or the certain danger of various precepts. The answer is yes, but those who refuse have ruined their political careers. When a person refuses the vizier, tradition has it that he is expected to leave the bureaucracy forever.

In the case of Rauthgor, where an Anhurite holds the post, Bokasin felt that the priesthood needed to hold at least one precepthood to maintain a sense of honor; refusing would have been a serious blow to the integrity of the priests of Anhur. To protect Bokasin, the Anhurites are spending a lot of flax money on improving the fortifications.

LAWS OF MULHORAND

“The justice of a god is a lack of partiality. When you see one whom you know, treat him as though you know him not, and those who are close to your person as those who are distant from you. Do not avoid the petitioner, but hear his case with eagerness. Be not angered without justice. Great is justice when its justices are great; in the eyes of truth, a slave and a pharaoh are as one.”

—The Code of Justice of the priests of Osiris

In Mulhorand, there is no uniform code of justice; each precept has its own laws, which are for the most part similar but sometimes have unusual variations.

There are both good and bad aspects to Mulhorandi justice. The bad aspects are that punishments are very severe. They consist of banishment from Mulhorand with a curse, imprisonment, or execution. Property and goods are usually confiscated and lost forever. There are many deaths over what would elsewhere be trivial offenses.

On the other hand, the system of justice is very good. Justice is handled by the priests of Osiris, who often send priests from town to town to hear cases and render judgments. The judges are genuinely fair, reasonable, and incorruptible. On the other hand, the burden of proof is usually on the accused to prove his innocence, not on the accuser.

Capital crimes include murder, killing a slave, damaging church property, theft from a church, using a god's name in vain, grave robbing, teaching Mulhorand magical spells to foreigners, assaulting a priest, building a dam on the River of Spears, and espionage.

Imprisonment or banishment crimes include theft, insulting a priest, assault, selling weapons to foreigners, leading foreigners to grave sites, stating malicious falsehoods about the nobles of the realm, hurting a slave, lying to a priest, cursing a priest, and wearing armor without a permit. Wizards are never banished.

Civil disputes are handled by a tribunal of the priests of Osiris. Anyone may request that a tribunal be called to settle disputes of property and marriage. They charge a rather expensive fee for this service.

The greatest power that a judge of Osiris has is the ability to call an independent inquiry. If a judge views any political situation as suspicious, he can call up to two other judges and determine if any laws were broken. The results of this inquiry are given to the vizier, who has the right to ignore them if he feels like it.

Magical spells and divinations are frequently relied on to determine the truth in Mulhorandi courts. Most recently, following the assassination of Akonhorus II, there was an inquiry to determine whether the guards who killed him were responsible for their actions.

ADVENTURERS IN MULHORAND

“Adventure? Ha! Excitement? Bah! A Mulhorandi craves not these things!”

—Yeda, high priest of Akonhorus I

Mulhorandi, being residents of paradise, are scornful of the idea that professional adventuring companies can do anything other than create chaos.

Most precepts and officials persecute all treasure hunters and adventurers, with the exception of mercenaries that have been specifically hired to guard or patrol the cities. The general belief is that adventuring companies do not fit into Mulhorand society, and thus they threaten its traditions.

There are a few ways that a PC adventurer can come from Mulhorand.

First, an adventurer might be a banished Mulhorandi (but a wizard is killed rather than banished so that he cannot reveal the secrets of Thoth to the enemies of Mulhorand).

Mulhorandi might be banished for minor crimes like spitting in the sight of The inquiry concluded that they were magically controlled, had no awareness of their actions, and therefore weren't responsible. It was concluded that the cult of Set was responsible. In other nations, as the priests of Osiris are quick to point out, justice would have consisted of a summary execution and the real culprits would never have been discovered.

The major threat to the system of justice in Mulhorand is Rezim, the vizier. He eventually plans to strip the priests of Osiris of their ability to put any of his servants on trial; all crimes committed by the priests of Horus-Re would be tried by priests of Horus-Re. Given that Rezim has enough political problems at the moment, it's not likely he'll push this; he would very much like to free himself of the legal yoke of the Osirisians.

a priest, or saying an obscenity in a temple, which can be interpreted as affronts to the temple.

Second, a Mulhorandi can be an escaped slave; the life of a Mulhorand slave is better than a slave's life in most other places (especially Thay), but it still isn't that pleasant.

Third, a Mulhorandi might be sent by his priesthood (especially the priesthood of Anhur) to make allies in the west.

Fourth, a Mulhorandi might be intrigued by the different lifestyles of the west and wish to experience them firsthand.

It is not recommended that a wizard of Mulhorand be allowed outside of Mulhorand. If the DM allows this, the wizard shouldn't have access to the new spells listed in the Appendix of this book; player characters who want these spells must be very conniving and work very hard to wrest these secrets from Mulhorand.

RELIGION OF MULHORAND

“The gods are content and happy-hearted, and life is spent in glad laughter.”

—Old Mulhorand saying

From their very beginnings, the people of Mulhorand used the Egyptian pantheon as their own; the pantheons of Mulhorand and Unther are the only lands where worshipers venerate families of deities in the Realms. The gods of Egypt are for the most part god-kings of Mulhorand. The pharaoh of Mulhorand is almost always an incarnation of the god Horus, and the other members of the royal family are incarnations of the other gods of this pantheon.

To understand the gods, it is necessary to understand a number of basic concepts. The true gods of Mulhorand, Egypt, and the other cultures on other worlds that employ this pantheon live in the outer planes.

However, this pantheon prefers to dwell physically at a holy place within this plane. This physical form of the deity is called a manifestation. It is immortal, very powerful (sometimes of Greater Power status), and is the master of that deity's affairs on the plane.

For most purposes, the manifestation of a deity can be considered to be the deity, with one essential difference. A deity who leaves the plane may pass on the power of his manifestation to another; when the manifestation of Re (also known as Ra) was slain during the Orcgate Wars, he passed on his power to the manifestation of Horus, who took the name Horus-Re.

In more extreme circumstances, a deity who clashes with another deity and who has a greater following among mortals may demand that the rival manifestation surrender his power; if a war deity who had a greater number of worshipers than Anhur arose, he might force Anhur to surrender the power of his manifestation. When a manifestation is successfully challenged for his worshipers or destroyed in combat, he is forever banished from the plane, though a gate spell might summon the deity's true form.

Another important concept is that of an incarnation. The incarnation is a mortal form of a deity. An incarnation is very powerful, equal to a high-level character, occasionally possessing minor divine powers, but still capable of being slain (Tholaunt, an incarnation of Anhur, was slain 30 years ago by Valerios of Pyardos, one of the Tharchions of Thay). Incarnations compose most of a pharaoh's royal family, but the eldest is always an incarnation of Horus-Re. An incarnation has the general temperament of a manifestation, but it is not under the direct control of the deity and can be affected by mortal weaknesses and foibles.

A third term that is used in Mulhorand is the cult of a god. A cult is a group of worshipers devoted to a single god within a pantheon of deities. Thus a cult of Isis recognizes all deities of the pantheon but focuses devotion on the goddess Isis.

Mulhorand is an absolute theocracy. The priests are the instruments of the government of the pharaoh, who is responsible only to the gods for his action. All land that is not privately owned belongs to the god-kings. All slaves are the property of the god-kings and must be rented from the church of Horus. They must be treated well, for they are the property of the gods. All commands of the god-kings must be obeyed. This arrangement gives great power to the priesthood.

In spite of this, the deities of Mulhorand are not fanatics devoted to absolute control over the people. Most of the real power in Mulhorand belongs to the priests. The gods generally believe that mortals should be in charge of most of their daily affairs. They do not believe in exporting their worship to other nations: in Mulhorand, one worships the gods of Mulhorand, and in other nations, one worships the gods of that nation. This is seen as a reasonable and tolerant philosophy. The gods of Mulhorand place their trust in the priests to run the nation, intervening on very rare occasions, which gives the world the impression that the god-kings are “slumbering” and “in their dotage.” It should be noted that Horus-Re and the other members of this pantheon consider Mulhorand to be a paradise that rarely needs the intervention of deities. It will be noted more than once in this text that the priests do not share their masters' disinterest in the day-to-day affairs of this land.

The goal of a Mulhorand citizen, of any social or economic class, is to have a good life and to make preparations for the afterlife. It is the belief of those who worship the gods of Mulhorand that life after death is merely a continuation of life; when one expects to die, one must prepare for a journey. This belief shapes much of Mulhorand culture, art, and architecture.

Mulhorandi worship many gods, but most of these are local cults that spring up and disappear every few generations. There are seven major deities, however, who have extensive priesthoods and influences. The following section is a brief description of this pantheon, their names, titles, and symbols, the spheres and weapons allowed their priests, and the power of their manifestations and incarnations.

CENTRAL PANTHEON

Anhur

(Ramathant in Thay, Rumathep in Unther)

God of War, Champion of Physical Prowess, General of the Gods of Mulhorand, Supreme Marshall of All Armies

Status: CG, Lesser Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: A cord bound with a khopesh

Spheres: Major — All, Charm, Combat, Guardian, Protection; Minor — Divination, Elemental, Healing, Necromantic

Weapons Allowed: Any (though lance is the only allowable polearm)

Special Requirements: Minimum STR 13, DEX 14, CON 12

Special Abilities: At 10th level, priests of Anhur get 3/2 attacks with melee weapons. At 20th level, priests of Anhur get two attacks per round.

Ethos: Priests of Anhur are obliged to defend the territory of Mulhorand, out to its historic boundaries. They are to smite the enemies of the realm, and keep its people, high-born or slave, safe from evil.

In the days before the Orcgate Wars, at the height of Mulhorand's power, the god Anhur was one of the most respected in Mulhorand; he had a cult that was second only to Re's in size. After the death of Re, Anhur retained his title of general of the gods, but he gradually fell from favor. Horus-Re is the god of eternity and perpetual order, while Anhur is an aggressive advocate of change and conflict; the two gods do not get along well. Priests of Horus-Re have blamed Anhur and his priesthood for many of the losses suffered by Mulhorand (the priests of Horus-Re have hired Chessentan mercenaries to replace the armies, as most Mulhorandi soldiers worship Anhur).

Today, the cult of Anhur is small but extremely vigorous. Priests of Anhur have converted many of the Chessentan mercenaries to his worship, and the priesthood is growing. The bitterness between the priests of Anhur and Horus-Re has created more than its share of conflict, and there is much court intrigue between these two factions, though the priests of Anhur are not yet powerful enough to openly challenge Horus-Re.

The center of Anhur's worship is Sul-tim, though he has temples across Mulhorand and in Chessenta, where his cult is growing in popularity.

Horus-Re

(Helcaliant in Thay, Hokatep in Unther)

Lord of the Sun, Master of Vengeance, Ruler of Mulhorand, Protector of the Priador, Overseer of Thesk, Guardian of Semphar, Pharaoh of the Gods.

Status: LN(G), Greater Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: A hawk's head with a pharaoh's crown surrounded by a solar circle.

Spheres: Major—All, Astral, Charm, Combat, Sun, Summoning; Minor—Creation, Divination, Elemental, Guardian, Animal, Healing, Necromantic, Protection, Weather

Weapons Allowed: Mace, Staff, Staff-Sling

Ethos: Priests of Horus must provide leadership. They are sworn to use church property honestly. They are to guard the persons, property, and hallowed places of Horus-Re with their lives. They are the sworn enemies of Set.

Horus-Re is the chief deity of Mulhorand, a fusion of the gods Horus and Re. When the manifestation of Re was slain during the Orcgate Wars, he bequeathed his power to the young god Horus, who took the name Horus-Re.

Horus-Re then assumed the position of chief deity of the Mulhorand pantheon, banishing the usurper Set.

Horus-Re is a confident deity who believes strongly in the concept of maat (justice, honor, order, and righteousness). Horus-Re believes that Mulhorand is eternal, and to promote eternity, one must deny change, so Horus-Re tries to discourage change. The manifestation of Horus-Re is said to exist everywhere throughout Mulhorand.

The center of Horus-Re's worship is in Skuld, but there are many temples throughout Mulhorand devoted to him.

Isis

(Isharia in Thay, Ishtar in Unther)

Goddess of Weather, Lady of the Rivers, Mother of the Harvest, Lady of All Love

Status: NG, Lesser Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: Ankh and Star

Spheres: Major—All, Animal, Charm, Creation, Guardian, Healing, Necromantic, Plant, Protection, Weather; Minor—Divination

Weapons Allowed: Staff, Flail

Special Requirements: Isis is served only by priestesses. No men may be priests of Isis.

Special Abilities: At 10th level, a priestess of Isis gets a bonus spell: control weather (as per 7th-level priest spell).

Ethos: Priestesses of Isis are charged to protect the heroes of Mulhorand. They often fashion charms for those whose deeds have won her favor.

While Osiris is the god of the harvest, it is to Isis that Mulhorand prays at planting; her priestesses use their weather control spells to ensure a bountiful harvest.

Isis, wife of Osiris and sister of Thoth, is the most beloved deity of the common people. She has many aspects: wise woman, dutiful wife, joyful lover, mother of children, benign rainstorm, and nurturer of babes and harvests. Isis is always seen as a woman of even temper and great dedication.

The center of Isis's worship is in the Great Vale. There are many temples devoted to her elsewhere, including in Unther, where the manifestation of Ishtar surrendered her power to Isis (the people of Unther worship in the name of Ishtar, but their devotion really goes to Isis).

Nephtys

(Nesharia in Thay, Neselthia in Unther)

Goddess of Commerce, Wealth, and the Dead, the Devoted Lady, the Avenging Mother of the Gods

Status: CG, Lesser Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: Horns around a lunar disk

Spheres: Major—All, Astral, Charm, Creation, Healing, Necromantic, Sun; Minor—Divination, Guardian, Protection, Weather

Weapons Allowed: Staff, Flail

Special Requirements: Nephthys is only served by priestesses. No men may be priests of this cult.

Ethos: Priestesses of Nephthys are charged to be faithful to their husbands and to encourage faithfulness in others. Priestesses of Nephthys are sworn to avenge the death of those Mulhorandi killed by the Red Wizards of Thay.

While Isis, Nephthys's sister, is goddess of love, Nephthys is the goddess of devotion and trust. Her trustworthiness also makes her popular with the wealthy, who pray to her to protect their fortunes. Nephthys is a sworn enemy of the Red Wizards of Thay, as the Red Wizards slew many of her followers in the fall of the Priador.

Thus Nephthys has assumed "the Avenging Mother" persona, that of a mother who will do anything to protect or avenge her children.

The center of Nephthys's worship is in Neldorild. Most housewives build a shrine to her in their homes, and they store goods for the afterlife in a chest or cupboard dedicated to her.

Osiris

(Osriant in Thay, Ozrikotep in Unther)

Lord of Nature, Guardian of the Dead, Judge of Mulhorand

Status: LG, Lesser Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: White Crown

Spheres: Major—All, Animal, Combat, Creation, Guardian, Healing, Necromantic, Plant, Protection, Sun; Minor—Charm, Divination, Protection, Summoning, Weather

Weapons Allowed: Staff, Sling, Hammer, Mace, Flail, Staff-Sling

Special Requirements: WIS 15

Special Abilities: Priests of Osiris may take an extra spell at each spell level, provided that it is in the Plant sphere

Ethos: Priests of Osiris are sworn to judge and mediate disputes honestly. They must use their powers to assist in the harvest. They must live by the code of maat, and perform all burial rituals for the dead.

Osiris is a respected deity in Mulhorand, but his cult is small. He was slain by Set but brought back to life by Isis and Nephthys, so he is the god of death, as opposed to Horus-Re, god of life. Priests of Osiris are the justices of Mulhorand, so a high Wisdom is a required attribute.

The priests of Osiris must follow the concepts of maat (justice, honor, order, and righteousness). Should a priest act in a manner contrary to maat, he is stripped of his powers and authority (much as a paladin who has gone off the path loses his paladinhood). Paladins and rangers in Mulhorand are all devotees of Osiris.

The priests of Osiris avoid court intrigue and adventure, preferring to deal with everyday concerns.

The centers of Osiris's worship are in Jhalhoran and Mishtan. While there are not many temples elsewhere devoted to Osiris, most tombs contain shrines dedicated to him, and decorations that venerate him.

Set

(Typhon elsewhere)

God of Evil, the Desert, and the Night, Lord of Carrion, Father of Jackals, Brother of Serpents, the Outcast of the Gods, King of Malice

Status: LE, Lesser Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: Coiled Cobra

Spheres: Major—All, Animal, Charm, Combat, Elemental, Guardian, Necromantic, Protection, Summoning; Minor—Creation, Healing, Weather

Weapons Allowed: Spear, Staff, Mace, Whip, Flail, Hammer, Composite Bow

Special Requirements: Priests of Set must shave their heads.

Special Abilities: At 5th level, a priest of Set may create poison in the same quantity as a create water spell. At 10th level, he may summon one minion of Set (as per new spell summon minion, once per day). At 15th level, any pointed weapon they wield is automatically poisonous (opponents' saving throws vs. poison suffer a -2 penalty; those who fail die in 1d4 rounds).

Ethos: Priests of Set are charged to destroy the priesthoods of Horus-Re and Osiris, to bring Set to his rightful place as god-king of Mulhorand, and to spread the cult of Set throughout the Realms. They are to sacrifice sentient creatures and wealth to him.

Set, brother of Osiris, is the most evil deity worshiped in Mulhorand. He is said to have challenged the authority of Re and Osiris for the leadership of the gods, slew Osiris (who was later brought back to life by Isis), and was then defeated by Horus and cast into the desert. While only evil people venerate Set, sometimes those who travel in the desert make offerings to him to appease his wrath.

The center of Set's worship is in Sampranasz (this is a closely guarded secret). There are many enclaves of Set worship, some of them outside Mulhorand. The manifestation of Set is said to reside in a tower somewhere in the desert Raurin.

Thoth

(Tholaunt in Thay, Thalatos in Unther)

Lord of Magic, Scribe of the Gods, Knower of All Secrets, King of Knowledge, Protector of Murghom

Status: N, Greater Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: An ibis head superimposed against an ankh

Spheres: Major—All, Astral, Charm, Creation, Divination, Elemental, Healing, Necromantic, Summoning, Sun; Minor—Animal, Guardian, Plant, Protection

Weapon Allowed: Staff

Special Requirements: Priests of Thoth must have Wisdoms of 17. Before entering the priesthood, they must have advanced to 5th-level wizard, then they must switch classes.

Ethos: Priests of Thoth are commanded to research magic, to protect the secrets of Thoth, and to spread magic throughout Mulhorand. They are commanded to protect Mulhorand from the traitors and necromancers of Thay. The priests of Thoth are to use weaponry as little as possible, for magic is their weapon.

Thoth is the lord of magic, one of the oldest deities of the Mulhorandi pantheon. He is also one of the most vigorous.

Thoth is vizier of the gods and scribe to the pharaoh Horus-Re. Incarnations of Thoth have been given credit for the creation of many of Mulhorand's unique magical items and its experiments with technology.

The center of Thoth's worship is Gheldaneth, but he has temples across Mulhorand and in some parts of Unther.

The priesthood of Thoth is smaller than all other major deities, due to the difficult entry requirements.

Other Deities

Other deities from the Egyptian pantheon have very small cults or centers of worship, and do not play a part in the politics of the Old Empires. These deities include the following:

Hathor (Goddess of Childbirth, NG): Depicted as a woman with a cow's head, this is the goddess venerated by mothers. She is also the goddess of folk music, dance, and poetry. This goddess is worshiped in the farmlands by serfs and slaves, whereas Nephthys is worshiped in the cities and by the rulers.

Geb (God of the Earth, N): This god is mostly worshiped by miners, who set up crude shrines; his image adorns the openings of mine shafts.

Sebek [God of Rivers, N(E)]: This crocodile-headed deity is worshiped in the wetlands, away from the cities. This cult has been persecuted for several centuries. All crocodiles are said to be his children.

Mask (God of Thieves, N): This is the one deity not native to Mulhorand who has achieved any amount of popularity; his following is small and limited to thieves.

The God-Kings: These are blood relatives of the incarnations, but no divine spirits reside within them. They are mortals with exceptional god-given abilities (high stats and levels), but they do not possess divine power. There are many god-kings in Mulhorand (see "Personalities," page 30).

Powers of The Gods

In their physical forms as manifestations and incarnations, the gods of Mulhorand have a number of special powers that are available only to them. These are not as powerful as the abilities available to true Powers in their otherworldly forms.

Following is a listing of these abilities. A number in parentheses indicates how many times each day that power may be used. These are guidelines; all deities may not have access to all of these powers.

Manifestations

All have the following abilities:

- All Divination Spells (at will)
- Planar Travel/Survival
- Comprehend/Speak All Languages/Magic
- Continual Light/Darkness (at will)
- Geas (at will)
- Infravision
- Polymorph Self (at will)
- Remove Curse/Fear (at will)
- Teleport (no error)

Greater Powers have the following abilities:

- Command (three-round duration)
- Control Weather/Temperature (at will)
- Death Spell (2)
- Dispel Evil/Good/Magic/Illusion (6)
- Gate (2)
- Heal (2)
- Holy Word/Unholy Word (1)
- Improved Invisibility (at will)
- Polymorph Any Object (1)
- Polymorph Other (3)
- Protection From Evil/Good, +3, 30' radius
- Quest (2)
- Restoration (3)
- Resurrection (1)
- Time Stop (1)
- True Seeing (3)

The manifestation of Thoth appears as a thin but muscular man with the head of an ibis or a baboon. The incarnations of Thoth are human in appearance but have facial features that suggest an inquisitive and thoughtful mind.

Special Note

During the Avatar series of modules (Shadowdale, Tantras, Waterdeep), all of the gods of the Realms are affected by certain events that strip them of their abilities. This includes the gods of Mulhorand. All of the incarnations of the gods are in a coma while that series takes place, and the manifestations of the gods are reduced to the power of their incarnations.

Following that series, the gods are likely to be shaken from their complacency, seeing that events elsewhere can affect them, and that they may not be as eternal as they believe.

As usual, this is a matter for the DM to decide.

PERSONALITIES OF MULHORAND

The information on notable personages presented in this section is listed in the following order:

- Name
- Base of Operations
- Level and Class, and Title
- Alignment, Deity Served
- Race, Sex

This section details only those prominent fighters and adventurers and nobles who are not involved in the center of the political struggles in Mulhorand; the people in this section prefer action to politics. Information on Vizier Rezim, Pharaoh Horustep III, and other politically active people can be found in the "The Nobility" part of the "People and Society of Mulhorand" section.

Derlaunt

Gheldaneth
13th-level Mage, Precept of Gheldaneth N, Thoth
Human male

Derlaunt, cousin to Tholaunt (the current incarnation of Thoth) is the ruler of the city of Gheldaneth. He is a wizened old man, having attained the power he sought after many years of struggle, and now finds himself too old to enjoy it in the way he desired.

Derlaunt has found himself bored of late, and turned to alleviate his boredom through archeology. Hundreds of Statues-That-Walk (see "Colossus, Stone" in the "New Monsters" section) dot the landscape in Mulhorand; Derlaunt thought he found a way to animate one of them and put it under his control. If he had been successful, it would have given him a lot of prestige; unfortunately the ritual backfired and all of the statues were animated at once. And Derlaunt controls none of them (see "The Statues That Walk" adventure).

Derlaunt is an easily irritated old man. He is extremely snobbish toward all but Mulhorand nobles. Any attempt to accuse him of wrongdoing will likely cause him to order the town guard to throw the accusers in prison.

Derlaunt is a wrinkled old mulan who wears wizard's robes adorned with a scarab of life.

The Fangs of Set

The current incarnation of Set is Seti, who lives in disguised form in Skuld; he is a merchant who travels the coast of the Alamber Sea, corrupting those he contacts. His will is primarily carried out by four noted henchmen: Hodkamset, Nekiset, Hamsetis, and Sulyar, together referred to as the Fangs of Set.

This adventuring company exists to further the will of Set, sometimes independently on minor tasks, and sometimes as a single unified force on major endeavors. Each commands a number of high level henchmen (1-2 fighters, levels 7-12, 1-2 wizards, levels 7-9, and 1-3 priests, levels 5-11) and six minions of Set.

Hodkamset

Wanders
22nd-level Necromancer, Lord of Set
LE, Set
Human male

Hodkamset is the most powerful wizard in the service of Set.

Originally, his name was Sesostris; he was one of the most powerful wizards in the service of Osiris—a powerful necromancer in the service of the Lord of the Dead. He made enemies in the priesthood of Horus-Re, who feared his power and attempted to discredit him.

Sesostris's reputation was ruined, and since he received no help from his own priesthood, he faked his own death, changed his appearance and turned to the cult of Set. Since then he has become the right hand of Seti, the current incarnation of Set.

Hodkamset is an ambitious man. He has many contacts in Sampranasz, and he has spies throughout Mulhorand. He has an alliance with Zhentil Keep. He sends followers of Set throughout the Realms in search of items of power. Hodkamset has quite a few of his own, including a staff of the necromancer (see the "New Magical Items" section) and a jewel of Karathoth.

Hodkamset's major schemes are twofold.

First, he intends to kidnap the boy pharaoh and replace him with an evil shapechanger, a rakshasa in the service of Set. This rakshasa would create chaos in the priesthood of Horus-Re, and allow Seti to take the throne and lead Mulhorand to its rightful place as the sole power in the Realms.

Second, Hodkamset has put together a team of resourceful and powerful servants of Set. This group travels the Realms in search of lost magic; he hopes to have enough powerful artifacts at his command that he could wage war against the manifestations of the gods themselves. This adventuring company is detailed later.

As one might guess, Hodkamset is something of a megalomaniac. He is determined to lead Set to glory, destroy the priests of Horus-Re, and bring down the gods themselves.

Hodkamset is also extremely devious; he should never be underestimated. He always travels in disguise and always makes his contacts under an assumed name, so that no one knows that Hodkamset really exists. He has magical items that prevent scrying, detection of alignment, and true seeing. Hodkamset uses spells to disguise his appearance; typically he travels as a little old lady, leaning on her staff. In his true form, he is middle aged, with long silvery hair that suggests age, but he has a young face. He is of mulan racial stock.

Nekiset

Wanders
19th-level priest, High Priestess of Set
LE, Set
Human female

Nekiset is a turami female of great beauty and evil. She is the leader of the Fangs of Set, an adventuring party in Set's service, which she controls by sheer ruthlessness. She is very close to Hodkamset; the few people who know them both well have speculated that they are lovers.

Nekiset was raised in Sampranasz and spent her early days as a slave. She terrorized the other children and became the leader of the slave group when she was very young, a fact that impressed her master. While passing through Sampranasz she came to the attention of Seti, incarnation of Set, who was impressed by her devotion and her capacity for evil. Nekiset was ordered freed from her life as a slave so that she could join Set's priesthood. Nekiset proved to be extremely gifted; she rose in a remarkably short time to be one of the most powerful priests in Mulhorand.

Nekiset's goal is the same as Hodkamset's; to overthrow the pharaoh and the priests of Horus-Re. She was responsible for organizing the assassination of Pharaoh Akonhorus II, through careful use of charm magic on the pharaoh's bodyguards while the pharaoh slept. There are times when she wonders about Hodkamset's sanity, but she admires his brilliance and his cruelty. Eventually, she realizes that she will have to destroy Hodkamset to take her rightful place at Set's right hand, but she is willing to work with him until they achieve domination over Mulhorand.

Nekiset is a tall, dark-skinned turami female with a bald (shaven) head. She wears dark robes with the insignia of Set.

Hamsetis

Wanders
22nd-level fighter, Strong Arm of Set
LE, Set
Human male

Hamsetis is the third of Seti's three powerful human servants. He is probably the greatest fighter in the south. He was a slave of the Red Wizards, who used him as a gladiator. He constantly rebelled against their brutal treatment and was beaten severely. Nevertheless he continued to win his fights, even when nearly crippled. The priests of Set were impressed by his physical prowess and purchased him from his masters. His spiteful former master decided to maim Hamsetis and make him useless to his new masters.

The priests of Set are not kind, but they know how to handle their commodities. Hamsetis was fully healed.

The young fighter swore vengeance against the Red Wizards, but he also swore an oath of loyalty to Set, who occasionally allies with the lords of Thay. Hamsetis has been encouraged by Seti to pretend to help the other priest-hoods of Mulhorand against Set; they consider him to be a good and honorable man and a matchless warrior, and he is trusted by the vizier and other high-level bureaucrats.

Hamsetis is an honorable man, but very bloodminded in his vengeance. He enjoys killing, especially in one-on-one duels, but treats worthy adversaries with respect. He has no political ambitions, except for a keen desire to destroy the Red Wizards. He belongs to the cult of Set out of a sense of gratitude. He is short, muscular, and dark-skinned, seemingly a mix of rashemi and turami.

Hamsetis typically attacks with long sword and dagger, which gives him three attacks per round. Attacks with the long sword suffer a -2 penalty to the attack roll, while attacks with the dagger suffer a -4 penalty to the attack roll (these penalties partially cancel the weapon bonuses and Hamsetis's Dexterity bonuses). In extreme circumstances, the dagger and the sword are poisoned.

Suliyar

Skuld
Rakshasa Lord in the Service of Set
LE, Set
Rakshasa male

Suliyar is a rakshasa rajah (lord), out-cast from its homeland east of Raurin. He was the ruler of a great tribe of rakshasas, but he was deposed and sent to wandering. He was found by Nekiset, who recruited him into the worship of Set.

Suliyar is a proud and savage creature; he believes that serving Set will bring him the power and the prestige that he is due. He believes that Set has influences that extend beyond the Realms, and that one day he will conquer a large dominion and rule as a maharajah. Suliyar enjoys hunting and playing with humans, and regularly stalks the streets of Skuld.

He especially enjoys killing initiates of Horus-Re. He doesn't particularly care for the other members of the Fangs, but sometimes finds their deviousness amusing.

Suliyar is always accompanied by four rakshasa bodyguards. One of these rakshasas is to be used by Hodkamset to replace the child pharaoh Horustep III in his current scheme. Suliyar typically disguises himself as a young mercenary soldier.

Gestanius

Sword Mountains
Great Wyrms Blue Dragon
LE, Set (very loosely)
Dragon female

Gestanius is the greatest of the blue dragons of the south. Her lair is on the eastern edge of the Sword Mountains.

She is one of the most foul-tempered beasts in the Realms; she enjoys razing trading caravans and small villages for fun. One of her paws was crippled in combat with a brown dragon long ago, and she walks with a noticeable limp.

What drives Gestanius is her burning need for revenge against the brown dragons who murdered her children (even though the blue dragons started the battle, Gestanius still blames the brown dragons for the results). She will do anything to get back at them. She has a loose alliance with the cult of Set, but they haven't gotten the results she wanted.

Game Mechanics: Gestanius has 95 hp. Use the blue dragon statistics in volume I of the Monstrous Compendium. Due to her injury, her ground movement is reduced to 6, and she suffers a -3 penalty to her attack and damage rolls with her second claw attack.

Halcaunt

Skuld
13th-level Paladin, leader of the Brotherhood of Skuld
LG, Osiris
Human male

Halcaunt is the most tireless fighter against the cult of Set in all of Mulhorand. He continually warned pharaoh Akonhorus and his servants of the threat of Set; he is something of a pariah among the bureaucracy after his prediction came true. Nonetheless, Halcaunt continues to urge for Mulhorand to be purged once and for all of the influence of Set. He has formed the Brotherhood of Skuld, a group of adventurers, to assist in this purpose.

Halcaunt is known to be a grim, overly serious individual. In many ways, he's more like a Westerner than a Mulhorandi.

He is fanatically driven in his quest to purge Mulhorand of all traces of the cult of Set.

There are other members of the Brotherhood of Skuld, including Urius (11th-level wizard, based in Gheldaneth) and a number of low-level priests of Osiris who see Halcaunt as a leader. The main priesthood of Osiris treats Halcaunt as a fanatic, a source of embarrassment.

Halcaunt is a tall muscular mulan. He wears armor that has been painted blue and a helm shaped like the hawk-symbol of Osiris.

Hethhab

The East Road
Incarnation of Anhur (secret), Defender of the Eastern Way
CG, Anhur
Human male

Hethhab is the current incarnation of Anhur. He has disguised himself as a warrior of Anhur and has distinguished himself as a slayer of monsters. To prevent a personality cult from forming around him, Rezim, vizier of Mulhorand, has appointed Hethhab Defender of the Eastern Way. This post confers the responsibility to protect the eastern sections of Mulhorand from bandits and monsters. It is a job with a very high turnover rate due to death, as the monsters in the region are quite deadly.

Hethhab rides with a company of six disguised divine minions of Anhur, wandering the east to protect Mulhorand from monsters.

That Hethhab is still alive is a source of considerable annoyance to Rezim, who does not suspect his true identity.

Hethhab is present in the "Rage of Dust" scenario. Use the statistics for the incarnation of Anhur given in the "Religion of Mulhorand" section (under "Anhur" in "The Gods").

Knesha

Sultim (outer)
16th-level Bard
N, Hathor
Human female

Knesha was a scribe for the bureaucrats in Skuld when she made a mistake in calculating the taxes. This mistake cost the treasury thousands of pharaohs.

Knesha was imprisoned for her error, but she escaped and fled to the north. She is considered an outlaw, but as no law exists in Outer Sultim, no one bothers her.

Knesha's chief talent is satirical poems. Knesha's most frequent choice is Rezim (of course). She is rather bored with her life as a bard; she would rather go on great adventures. Knesha's favorite pastime is studying the places where magical items were lost in battle long ago. There is no greater authority (save for the incarnation of Thoth) on the lost relics and artifacts of the south in the entire Realms.

Knesha is a beautiful turami female known for high-pitched laughter (which has earned her the nickname "Hyena").

Knesha is willing to show parties of adventurers where these items are located, but her price is steep.

Shutep

The Great Vale
6th-level Thief
N, Mask
Human male

There are many people who have tried to rob the graves of the god-kings. Some have tried to use brute force, others have employed stealth. Few of these thieves have been as resourceful as Shutep of Jhalhoran.

Shutep is a confidence man. He likes to manipulate parties of non-Mulhorandi, especially greedy adventuring companies.

Typically he joins up with such a party, earns their trust, tells them a wild story that involves them breaking into a major tomb in the Land of the Dead, then he grabs a major treasure and leaves the company stuck with the consequences. He's not malevolent, just greedy and somewhat cowardly.

Shutep is a well-built mulan male with curly hair and a scar on his chest. He typically passes himself off as a merchant, and is skilled at disguise.

Shutep wears a ring of dishonesty on one of his toes; it enables him to tell lies that seem like the truth to detect lie spells.

CULTURE OF MULHORAND

Mulhorand has a distinctive culture that has developed over thousands of years. There is, however, a reluctance to experiment with new and foreign styles.

The Arts

Paintings in Mulhorand tend to be flat and well-detailed, but with very little sense of perspective. Many paintings deal with religious scenes, depicting the gods and their deeds. The most impressive aspect of these paintings in recent centuries is their sheer size; the belief is that the gods must be portrayed as fundamentally greater than humans or they will be insulted.

Therefore, the gods are usually much taller, more handsome, more heroically proportioned, than the humans in their paintings. This tradition does give the gods a rather bland and uniform appearance; the smaller, more varied humans are usually the most interesting figures in these paintings.

Sculpture has been a major art form in Mulhorand, though the last great period of sculpting was hundreds of years ago.

Stories and poetry in Mulhorand have evolved from great epics about the gods at the time of the First Empire, to household fables in the Second Empire, to the present-day hymns and chants of praise to the deities. These psalms, as they are sometimes known, possess a great deal of literary power. The latest trend is toward "realism"—mixing the old fables with hymns of praise to produce works of great diversity and beauty. Many verses are put into song. Mulhorandi music typically relies on flutes and reed instruments; stringed instruments are considered strange in Mulhorand.

Architecture

Great monuments line the streets of Skuld, support the roofs of major temples, and stare at pharaoh's graves in the Land of the Dead. The greatest sculpture is the tomb of the pharaoh Houserer II, which is carved out of an entire mountain face. The great dracosphinx of Klondor is also an awesome sculpture. Monument building is as constant in Mulhorand as the flooding of the River of Spears.

While the majority of buildings in Mulhorand are made from bricks, there have been a number of monuments made from granite, sandstone, and limestone.

The earliest monuments were step pyramids, with a central crypt concealed by tiers of granite or limestone. By the time the First Empire reached its peak, the step pyramid had been replaced by the slope pyramid, of which the 600-foot-tall Tomb of Re in Skuld is the largest.

Pyramid building thrived for hundreds of years, even making its way into Unther. However, the First Empire was soon to come to an end following the Orcgate Wars, and Mulhorand's vigor for great projects diminished. The tomb of their god was the last great achievement.

But centuries later, at the beginning of the current age, Mulhorand had re-established its dominance in the eastern Inner Sea, and the Second Empire was born.

This new empire brought with it a new vitality. Monuments were again constructed, including the Face of the Gods, the previously mentioned tomb of Houserer. The main style of architecture was the Untheric style, which emphasized obelisk building. Tall towers rose into the air, and soon the gods in Skuld were building vast prayer towers to house their manifestations.

Following the loss of Thay and the end of the Second Empire, the building of prayer towers in Mulhorand ceased. It was more important to fortify the cities of Mulhorand. After about 100 years, the military period was over and Mulhorand once again went back to building monuments, trying to recapture its lost glory. The new fashion, which remains to the present day, consists of tall, broad buildings of granite for ornate temples.

Tombs are no longer grand, but consist of underground chambers with elaborate interior decoration. The temple style of architecture, as it is called, borrows heavily from Unther, with huge stone columns supporting a massive roof. In typical Mulhorand fashion, the columns are sculpted to resemble the gods, and temples are painted with huge scenes commemorating the deities.

Athletics

Mulhorand is sometimes called the Land of Feasts, and this tradition is one that never stops. In Floodtime, there is a five-day festival in which eating, drinking, music, and sports are mixed in great celebrations. People flock to the cities to engage in and watch athletic competitions, typically running, wrestling, and charioteering.

Athletics have always existed in Mulhorand, but have never been as prominent as they are at this time.

Chessentan mercenaries have brought the Great Games from their land, and mercenary companies compete biannually in the Great Arena of Skuld, along with Mulhorandi who have a mind to compete.

The Chessentans usually win, but the Mulhorandi, stung by the challenge, are improving rapidly, especially in wrestling.

Clothing

Most Mulhorandi wear simple unadorned clothing, typically a white tunic, black headdress, a belt, and sandals. In colder weather more colorful garments may be worn, but the fashion in Mulhorand is for clothing to be plain.

TECHNOLOGY OF MULHORAND

Throughout its history, Mulhorand has been a tool-using culture. The invention of magic has substituted for some of the functions of tools, but magic is rare.

Only the dwarves can call themselves more technically advanced than the ancient Mulhorandi. Between the First and Second Empires, political stability and a historically secure border with Unther enabled the Mulhorandi to develop new technologies.

At this time, the ancient khopesh became a sturdier, scimitar-like weapon, and a number of swords were developed. Sages of Thoth, interested in the development of Mulhorandi weaponry, examined the ruins of Sekras and discovered that experimentation in weapons thrived between -700 and -200 DR. By the beginning of the Second Empire, the sword had become firmly established as the weapon of choice for the Mulhorandi armies.

Furthermore, there is evidence to suggest that trading between the dwarves of the Great Rift and Mulhorandi gave the humans the secrets of forging steel. It was steel weapons that enabled Mulhorand to carve out an empire in the north. This more or less ended Mulhorandi developments in weaponry. Meanwhile the gods, who were more conservative than their followers, still used weapons of highly enchanted bronze.

Most of the weapons employed in the west, with the exception of the pike and other polearms, are used by warriors in Mulhorand. The preferred ranged weapon has always been the composite bow, which came into prominence during the First Empire. It played a major role in the victory in the Orcgate Wars.

Armor in Mulhorand was typically scale mail, but has since evolved to include chain and plate mail. Full plate armor is exceedingly rare, possessed only by the greatest fighters. Armor may be worn only by authorized guards or by soldiers in wartime; if others are caught in armor, they are required to surrender it immediately. If they resist, they are imprisoned or exiled. Armor was traditionally made from bronze, but now it is constructed from steel.

A number of other technical innovations occurred between the First and Second Empires, notably the invention of the wheel and the block and tackle. The wheel led to the invention of the chariot, which gave warriors additional protection in battle and enabled them to maneuver on the battlefield far more quickly. The block and tackle enabled buildings to be constructed more easily (the great pyramids of the First Empire were all constructed without these tools, relying instead on human strength and teamwork).

The most interesting of the technical innovations, though, was the invention of the pressure engine. The priests of Thoth devised a way to use dams and engines to harness the power of Mulhorand's rivers, which they used to grind grain and pump water into far reaches of the desert, fertilizing the desert soil. A period of desert settlement followed. It ended when the pharaoh disapproved of a plan to build a huge dam on the River of Spears, feeling that technological innovation had gone too far. He ordered all development on river and steam technology ended.

Eventually the engines fell into disrepair, though a few steam engines, powered by stones of everburning, yet pump water into isolated areas. There has recently been a rebirth of interest among a small faction of Thoth priests, known as the Technologists. They are defying the ancient order against working with steam technology and are trying to rediscover the secrets of the ancients, master them, then see what else can be done with this weird form of magic.

The traditional form of magic continued to thrive in Mulhorand. Even before the founding of the Old Empires, the mages of Raurin had discovered the existence of Great Magic—8th- and 9th-level spells. Like many others, their descendants in Mulhorand tried for centuries to discover 10th-level spells, but they eventually became convinced that spell effects for mortals and immortals alike cannot go beyond the 9th.

Instead, the mages researched many spells, which eventually became part of their legacy to the Old Empires. Recently, they have developed numerous new spells (see the "New Spells" section), but they have altered the language of their magic to make it extremely difficult to teach these spells to non-Mulhorandi. Even the mages of Set, who have learned these spells, do not teach them to outsiders (they believe that they are destined to rule Mulhorand, and they have no wish to see these new spells fall into the hands of the Red Wizards, their arch-enemies).

PEOPLE AND SOCIETY OF UNTHER

“How great are the Mulan, of which Unther is the purest! How great are their works, how cunningly wrought! How skilled are their minds and how mighty is their magic! Let all nations praise the Mulan, of which Unther is the purest!”

—A hymn of the priests of Gilgeam

The people of Unther are divided into a number of different racial types. The most common race is the Mulan, which is also the race of the god-kings of Mulhorand. As mentioned earlier, a race of tall, slim, sallow-skinned humans known as the Mulan fled the destruction of their parent civilization in Raurin and settled around the Alamber Sea and the Wizard’s Reach. The Mulan cleared their land of demihumans, humanoids, and the native humans, the dark-skinned Turami. Many of the latter were taken in by Mulhorand, where they were responsible for most of the great achievements of that culture.

The upper classes of Unther consist almost entirely of Mulans, descendants of the lords of all. They have bred almost exclusively within their own families and claim to be “pure” Mulan (as opposed to those of Mulhorand). The middle classes of Unther consist of merchants and freeholders, whose forefathers were originally traders from many lands; they are always human, but vary greatly in racial type. The lower classes are either poorly paid servants of freeholders or slaves. These can be of any race—human, demihuman, or even humanoid (enslaved ogres are sometimes used to construct buildings).

The Population of Unther

There are three social classes in Unther:

The Nobility

The chief noble of Unther is the king, who is currently (and has been for over a millennium) Gilgeam the Great, the manifestation of an extra-planar Power.

Unlike the god-kings of Mulhorand, who are known to treat their dominions with benign neglect, Gilgeam is neither benign nor neglectful.

The administrators and major landholders of Unther are the priests of Gilgeam. Priests and prominent followers of Gilgeam hold every major position in the cities of Unther, in its armies, and in its bureaucracy. To worship another deity, even Ramman or Ishtar, whose worship is (reluctantly) approved by Gilgeam, is to exile one’s self from any possible position of political power.

Members of the noble class live very luxurious lives in the Palace District of Unthalass; their every whim is satisfied by their slaves—and by the treasury of Unther. It is a tradition in Unther that the gods are not always kind, that life is hard, and that one must worship the gods in spite of this, rather than relying on their beneficence. The idea that the people of Unther would not appreciate being taxed to pay for the extravagance of the nobility has not occurred to them. Their attitude is: yes, the cities of the North Coast and Chessenta did rebel, but they were ingrates with too much foreign blood in their veins. The words “it could never happen here” are often heard in the palaces of Unthalass.

The number of nobles in Unther is much smaller than in other nations. This is unusual, especially given the long history of the kingdom. Many noble families have fallen from favor; in a period of a few months a family could change from being the king’s favorites to having all of its lands confiscated and all family members sold into slavery. Families frequently fall from favor; someone must take the blame for the catastrophes that befall Unther (the blame cannot be directed at the king, as he is never wrong).

It is very rare for members of the underclasses to be promoted into the nobility. In these cases, the new nobles were all servants of the priesthood of Gilgeam who rose to favor (they must also be pure-blooded Mulan). Usually the new nobles were grandchildren of fallen nobles and are being restored to their ancestors’ status after decades of faithful service.

Nobles in Unther wear the badges of their house and station and often paint their faces silver, especially on ceremonial occasions. They once used the forehead circles still displayed by nobles in Mulhorand, but those fell out of fashion.

Noble Titles in Unther

Titles in Unther include “Great Lord” (for the favorites of the King), “High Lord” (for the high priests of the King), and “Lord” (for other Mulan nobles). The first-born male in Unther is the heir of the estate and known as “Young Lord”; other children are sent into the priesthood, the military, minor posts in the bureaucracy, or the wizardry schools.

All nobles and their children are taught how to read, write, and do basic calculations.

The Middle Class

The middle class in Unther consists of low-level bureaucrats (scribes), guards and military commanders, traders, teachers, and freehold owners.

Unlike the situation in Mulhorand, the government of Unther does not have a stranglehold on its economy. It considers operating trading companies and mining operations to be a task beneath the dignity of any civilized Mulan, so it has allowed freeholders, who are wealthy foreigners, to run these operations, which are taxed heavily. There are about an equal number of freehold farms and temple-run farms. Due to recent drought conditions, Unther imports about 30% of its food from Thay, and there are often severe shortages.

The freeholders run their operations to make money and would rather let their slaves go hungry than buy enough food to give them a reasonable meal. Freeholders force their slaves (or hired freemen, in times of slave shortages) to work hard hours for little pay. It should be noted that there are more sensible and humane managers, especially near Shussel, but these are the exception and not the rule.

Traders are more compassionate. A number of trading companies from Durpar and the far south travel through Mulhorand into Unther, but the expenses and risks of traveling make these goods very expensive. Most traders pay protection money to Furifax and some of the other prominent bandit chiefs of the Eastern Shaar. There are a number of trading companies stationed in Unthlass that buy goods from southern traders, then sell them in Chessenta or Thay.

A third middle class career is that of a soldier. A livable wage can be earned as a city guard, bouncer, bodyguard, or as an escort for a merchant caravan.

Most members of the Untheric middle class who enter the army become officers, although their battle tactics and methods are considered to be old-fashioned by the standards of the west (the army of Unther still uses mostly bronze weapons).

The middle class is generally incapable of prospering in Unther due to restrictive taxation. Those with contacts in other lands who still see potential business in Unther have been encouraging certain idealistic adventurers to come to Unther and fight against the government, in the hopes that Gilgeam and his priests will be overthrown and a more favorable regime will come to power.

Slaves

Slaves are the lowest form of life in Unther. Unlike Mulhorand, where slaves have the protection of the law and sometimes seem to have favorable treatment as church property, the slaves in Unther have no rights. If a freeman murders a slave, he may have to pay financial compensation to its owner, or give him a new slave, but the slave's life is not considered to be very important.

Slaves may belong to either freeholds or the temple of Gilgeam. It is a common practice to brand slaves on the backs of their left arms. This identifies the person as a slave (in the event he es-capés) and who he belongs to. If the slave is purchased, he is branded again below the original mark. Some slaves may have as many as five or six brands. They are typically bought from other nations, or are given slavery as a sentence for some crimes. When there is a shortage of slaves, officials of the temple of Gilgeam sometimes convict people of nonexistent crimes and then sentence them to slavery on the spot. This is known as "Gilgeam's Justice."

Slaves perform nearly every function necessary for Unther to survive, from growing food, to mining, to building monuments.

The Society of Unther

In essence, the society of Unther is one of the most miserable tyrannies that the Realms have ever known. The Overall, the governing powers in Unther, are lawful evil, but many of their enforcers are chaotic evils with no respect for the law. Ruling this society is a once beneficent deity who has been corrupted by long years of absolute power. At his sides are his lackeys, who have no regard for human life and less regard for non-humans. The vast underclasses have no hope; their goal is not to prosper but to survive. They have finally begun to see that the only way to ensure their survival is the one thing their ancestors considered unthinkable—the forced removal of the god-king Gilgeam from power and the destruction of the nobility of Unther.

Thus at present Unther is an extremely chaotic society. Each member of the society is either trying to figure out a way to come out on top in the new regime, or how to survive the coming bloodbath. The only possible exception to this might be the king, who is so enthralled with his own personal pleasure and so convinced that he is invincible that he feels no force in the Realms could topple him. Perhaps even worse for Unther are the number of foreign powers that are looking on and waiting for the resolution of this civil strife, in the hopes that they can plunder the ancient secrets of this once great land.

Current Economy of Unther

"It is Fate that wills that slaves must labor all their lives for the good of Unther. I know that it is folly for the gods to challenge Fate."

—Gilgeam

Unther is a slave-based economy that produces minerals for sale, serves as a trade route for southern merchants, and a market for foodstuffs.

While there are farms in the Greenfields that produce barley, rice, and other staples of Unther's diet, 25% of the food consumed in Unther is produced elsewhere. Half of the food in Unther is bought by the priests of Gilgeam for their use and the use of their slaves, and the other half is bought by freemen to feed themselves and their slaves. When food is in short supply, the slaves go hungry first.

The major products produced by Unther are raw metals, most notably iron, which is extremely valuable in its pure form, as well as some gold. It is this trade that allows the nation to survive. Although there are forests in Unther, they are too far from the trade routes to make lumber a profitable resource, and there are fierce monsters that would need to be eliminated first. This may become a commodity for Unther at some later date.

The coin of Unther is the sheka, a much-debased gold piece. It is not worth much to foreign merchants. True wealth in Unther is foodstuffs and cattle, which can be traded for virtually anything.

Politics of Unther

The center of power, as it always has been, and as the rulers claim it always shall be by the decree of Fate itself, is the god-king, currently Gilgeam.

Gilgeam is a symbol of eternity and constancy; even the oldest man in Un-ther remembers Gilgeam as his king, and Gilgeam has not changed. The philosophy of Unther has always been that life is hard, and the ability to endure hardship is the greatest virtue, no matter how unfair that hardship may be. It is this philosophy of life that has allowed Gilgeam to survive as the king of Unther for so long, and it is this philosophy that makes Gilgeam so confident that he can continue to survive.

Since even a god cannot administer every affair in the entire realm, he gives much of his power to administrators. The priests of Gilgeam are the administrators of Unther. Much of Gilgeam's time is given to pursuing personal pleasures, so the priesthood does the majority of the day-to-day work, though the king insists that every major decision be made by him.

The nation is divided into 13 fiefs, each of which has a Great Lord who oversees that territory. Followers of Gilgeam who own large tracts of land are Lords, and they are expected to assist the Great Lords in the administration of the realm.

This is the nation's political structure in theory. In fact, many of the Great Lords live in Unthalass and rely on reports from administrators stationed in outposts to give them reports from their fiefs. Great Lords often maintain residences in each of the major towns and cities of their fiefs, but they usually ignore them, allowing the lesser Lords to bully the people whenever they want. The Great Lords' chief responsibility is to make certain that all taxes are paid. Great Lords are notorious for charging even more than the recommended tax and pocketing the difference.

At present, Unther is extremely unstable and may collapse. Here is a list of the major factions, the leaders of each faction, and their intended plans for the future.

Gilgeam: This faction includes the followers of the deity Gilgeam, who is the traditional god of Unther. Gilgeam doesn't believe that there is a political problem in Unther, and that if there was one, he would defeat whoever challenged him in battle and then destroy their followers with great ease. He laughs at the cult of Tiamat and doesn't know about the Dark Lady. He is filled with hatred for the bandit Furifax, whom he wishes to kill with his bare hands.

His followers include the Great Lords of the cities:

Gudea (13th-level fighter, ruler of Ssintar): He knows that it is suicide to tell the king the truth about how desperate the situation is, so he's been talking in secret with Furifax and the cult of Tiamat trying to ensure his continued survival if Gilgeam falls. He is a natural pessimist who deals in worst case scenarios. He has no leadership ambitions.

Tukulti (10th-level mage, ruler of Firetrees): Tukulti is a fool who feels that the rebellions are minor problems, mainly because he hasn't been touched. He is jealous of all the other Great Lords, with good reason. He wants to be the King's right-hand man, but he hasn't a chance.

Teumman (6th-level fighter, ruler of Dalath): He is mostly concerned with lining his pockets from freeholders' money and crushing all local trouble. He doesn't care about what's going on elsewhere, and he has no ambitions.

Annunaki (10th-level cleric of Gilgeam, ruler of Messemprar): Annunaki is one of the most brutal of all the Great Lords, as well as the most scheming and ambitious. He would like the king to settle down and leave governing Unther to him.

At present, he is more concerned with surviving the siege of the palace district. He is too proud to negotiate with the "underclasses" and will never surrender.

Ekur (8th-level cleric of Gilgeam, ruler of Shussel): He is a marginally competent but vicious ruler. Ekur is promising concessions to the priesthood of Isis should they give the king their support in case of a rebellion. The priestesses of Isis are too smart to believe him. He believes that a catastrophe is at hand, and he wants to ally with someone who can protect him in case Gilgeam is destroyed.

Karigulzu (4th-level cleric of Gilgeam, ruler of Red Haven): Karigulzu is a minor priest sent as a sacrificial lamb to the most dangerous town in Unther. He believes that he's more clever than he actually is. He sees himself as one day being the most powerful man in Unther, though he is too stupid to dream of being disloyal to Gilgeam.

Zimrilim (10th-level cleric of Gilgeam, ruler of Unthalass): Zimrilim is a brilliant man, the right-hand of Gilgeam. He is aware that he has a lot of rivals for his position and that he is the most likely scapegoat for the current difficulties that Unther is experiencing. Zimrilim plans to import as many Chessentan mercenaries as needed to crush all opposition, and then he hopes that the mercenaries will go away when the rebellion is crushed.

Shuruppak (20th-level fighter, 7th-level mage): Shuruppak is the executioner and assassin of Gilgeam. He wants to kill people. He doesn't have any ambitions, as long as he can kill his enemies. (See "Personalities of Unther" for his statistics.)

The Gilgeam faction controls the army, is loyal to Gilgeam, and is by far the richest faction in Unther.

The Cult of Tiamat: This cult believes that the gods are evil and therefore the mythological enemy of the gods, the Dragon Queen Tiamat, must be good. This is a rather simplistic view, but in harsh times, people tend to look at things in black and white. This cult is getting widespread support throughout Unther as the only ones willing to stand up against Gilgeam, though the priests of Gilgeam do not yet realize how powerful the cult is becoming, or that an incarnation of Tiamat is present in Unther. Its leadership and major allies are as follows:

Tiglath (14th-level cleric of Tiamat, Firetrees): Tiglath is a rather pleasant if vengeful woman. She isn't interested in political power, she just wants to destroy Gilgeam, and the cult of Tiamat is a means to an end. (See “Personalities of Unther” for more detailed information.)

Shudu-Ab (10th-level cleric of Tiamat, Unthalass): Shudu-Ab is the leader of the cult of Tiamat in the city of Unthalass. She is a vicious woman who sees the cult as her means to power. She plans to assassinate Tiglath when the rebellion is over and take control of Unther as Tiamat’s regent.

Furifax (13th-level fighter, Eastern Shaar): While not a servant of Tiamat, he has allied his vast band of bandits (2,000 elite troops with horse, plate mail and shield, and long sword) with the cult and has already fomented revolt. (See “Personalities of Unther” for more details.)

Skuthsiin (Green dragon, Methwood): This beast has been ordered to be Tiglath’s mount in battle. (See “Personalities of Unther” for more details.)

The Priesthood of Ishtar: This priesthood is based in Shussel. At present this faction is trying to stay neutral in the growing rebellion against Gilgeam, but the recent attacks against her cult by Gilgeam’s priests have not endeared her to the group. The leaders of the priesthood are as follows:

Ibalpiel (10th-level cleric of Ishtar, Shussel): Ibalpiel is the high priestess of Ishtar. She is dismayed by any prospect of bloodshed and wishes to keep the cult away from the fighting. She is the most powerful priestess of the cult, but she has lost much of her authority since she took an unpopular stand on this issue.

Utuhegel (6th-level cleric of Ishtar, Unthalass): She is the chief priestess of Ishtar in Unthalass. She believes very strongly that Ishtar must oppose Gilgeam, and is trying to rally together the priestesses around her.

The Priesthood of Ramman: This priesthood is based in the Greenfields but has a large temple in Unthalass. They really don’t care about the revolt; they believe the priests of Gilgeam will crush it easily and sell the survivors to Thay. They are not a factor in the politics of Unther.

The Northern Wizards: This is one of the two factions of wizards in Unther; this order is based in Messemprar. Historically they have seen themselves as the protectors of Messemprar. They have sworn an oath to protect it and its citizens from those who would do them harm. When the revolt started in Messemprar, the wizards realized that their enemy was now the army of Unther.

Their goal is to keep the army out, try to quiet the rebellion, then negotiate with Gilgeam for a peaceful settlement and a guarantee of an increased food supply. Given that the Reaper is in Messemprar to hunt and kill down the members of the Northern Wizards, their efforts are probably doomed to failure.

There are six wizards of 10th level or higher, and about 30 apprentices of 5th-8th level. The leaders are as follows:

Shurlash (16th-level mage, Messemprar): Shurlash is easily the most powerful wizard of northern Unther. He is renowned for his honor and his honesty, but tends to be blinded to the wickedness of others, believing that everyone is really good inside.

Larsa (13th-level mage, Messemprar): Larsa is Shurlash’s closest friend and very much like him in philosophy.

Nimrud (12th-level mage, Messemprar): Unlike the other wizards, Nimrud is pessimistic and believes that Gilgeam is going to butcher everyone he can once the rebellion is done. He believes that Gilgeam must be overthrown for the continued survival of Unther.

Ziusudra (11th-level mage, Messemprar): A rather cowardly wizard, he would like to leave Messemprar as soon as possible and find someplace safe.

Asshurat (11th-level mage, Messemprar): This sorceress believes that a peaceful solution is the only sane answer to the problems of Unther. She also realizes that they should be wary of possible treachery.

Tammuz (10th-level mage, Messemprar): Tammuz is having fun; he thinks that the rebellion is much more exciting than studying spells all day. He’s childish, immature, and no one pays much attention to him.

Borsipa (7th-level mage, Messemprar): This apprentice, one of the most powerful, is actually a spy for Gilgeam and his priesthood. She frequently sends messenger birds to a Gilgeam outpost, and is the Reaper’s contact in Messemprar. Her current duty is to help him assassinate the Northern Wizards, and she has no qualms about carrying out that duty.

The Slave Revolt: There are a number of prominent leaders of the revolt against the rule of the Gilgeamites. These leaders are as follows:

Dama (10th-level fighter, Messemprar): Dama is a former gladiator from Chessenta who was captured by Thavian slavers, then sold to a wealthy freeholder in Unther.

He is a highly charismatic demagogue (Charisma 17) with great strength (Strength 18/84). His goal is to create as much trouble as he can and bring the priests of Gilgeam to their knees; he is ruthless in dealing with people who have more moderate views. He is chaotic neutral, with some evil tendencies.

Ruduk (8th-level enchanter, Messemprar): Ruduk is an agent of Lauzoril, one of the Red Wizards of Thay. Lauzoril wishes to destabilize Unther, in the hopes that Thay may capture permanent bases on the South Coast.

Lauzoril does not wish, however, for the Red Wizards to be associated with the current unrest, so he has given Ruduk a great deal of autonomy. Ruduk is working behind the scenes, using charm spells to sit up unrest. Ruduk isn’t really interested in Unther; he’s trying to advance his fortunes with the Red Wizards.

The Traders: The merchants of Unther form the bulk of the foreigners that live in the country at the present time.

The traders wish for lower taxes and tariffs, in the hopes that can buy and sell more goods. They have not, however, taken a united stand on the current unrest. Some merchants believe the only way to make things better is to overthrow Gilgeam; these traders are sending agents to hire mercenary companies from Chessenta to aid the rebels in Messemprar. Others believe that if they support Gilgeam and he wins, they'll have greater influence in Unther. The majority, however, are taking a "wait and see" position. Some important characters among the traders are as follows:

Avid (1st-level mage, wanders): This young wizard is from Durpar. His father's largest caravan was confiscated by the priests of Unther due to "a local emergency." This caused his father's trading company to collapse and his father to take his own life. Avid has come to Unther for the sole reason of getting revenge on the priests of Gilgeam by encouraging the rebellion. He has been a leader among the foreign traders who want Gilgeam removed from the plain.

Jehokim (5th-level fighter, Unthalass): Jehokim is an old adventurer who found a great treasure and retired to run several inns across Unther. (There is at least one Grey Chimera inn in each major city of Unther and Mulhorand; Jehokim is the owner of each of these and rents them out to others for a share of the profits.) Jehokim is the leader of the "let's get on Gilgeam's good side" movement. He is willing to do anything he can to improve his fortunes, including naming traitors to the priests of Gilgeam.

The Enclave: This is the most powerful cabal of wizards in Unther; only the priests of Thoth rival them in the south. The Enclave feels that it should stay neutral in this conflict, but not all members agree. For more information, see "Personalities of Unther," Isimud and Esarhadden.

The Laws of Unther

"Justice is dead in Unther! The priests of Gilgeam mock its corpse and, drunk with blood, dance upon its grave!"

—Dama the Demagogue of Messemprar

It may seem like there are no laws in Unther; in practice, this is correct. Essentially nobles may do what they want, including breaking agreements (just refusal of services), confiscation, murder (summary execution), and even more hideous deeds.

However, this has not always been the case. The ancient law of Enlil was the code that Unther has followed, at least until the last two centuries. Its principles called for "justice, the destruction of evil and wickedness so the strong shall not oppress the weak, and the land shall be enlightened." The code of Enlil is a collection of case laws, describing all sorts of crimes and the appropriate punishments.

Most of these punishments are of the "an eye for an eye" sort. Murder is punishable by death, in all cases. Thieves would have a hand removed if caught in an act of thievery. The code of Enlil also enforced the idea that a laborer was responsible for any accidents caused by the imperfections of his labors; if a house collapsed on a man because it was poorly constructed, the builder would be put to death. The code of Enlil was severe, even by the standards of the Realms, but at least it was consistent and fair. Laws applied to all classes of society, including slaves (who are now far more numerous than they were even in the days of the Second Empire). In the days of the Second Empire, slaves could be rewarded with money, and might even borrow money to purchase their freedom!

Justice was the province of the priests of Enlil. Upon Enlil's departure from the Realms, this duty passed to the priests of Gilgeam. Regional justices were appointed by the king to oversee justice and to protect the code of Enlil; these justices are still appointed and still swear an oath to uphold the code, but at best the judges of Unther are indifferent to injustice, and at worst they use their position to bully, steal, and murder as they will.

If two nobles have a quarrel, they take their dispute to the king, who has the right to decide the issue. The king generally supports his favorite of the two nobles, though he is lenient in his punishment unless he dislikes the losing noble. If a foreigner has a dispute against a noble or freeholder, the foreigner always loses. If, on the other hand, two foreigners have a dispute in Unther, they may both end up as slaves for wasting the time of the king and his servants with trivial matters.

Because there is no real law in Unther, most freeholders and traders rely on assassins to resolve their disputes. These assassins are usually Chessentan mercenaries and cutthroats, many of whom are skilled poisoners. Some traders use mercenaries as hired muscle to threaten those who do not pay their debts on time.

The Army of Unther

The ultimate form of justice in Unther is the army. Lately the army of Unther has increasingly relied on Chessentan mercenaries (as does Mulhorand), but Unther still keeps a standing army.

The army of Unther is considered to be backward and poorly trained; its soldiers are little better than slaves and its officers are often bullies, second and third sons from noble families who were forced into a military career because they did not stand to inherit anything. The weapons and armor used by Unther are bronze swords and plate mail; missile weapons include a composite short bow that fires flight arrows. The only cavalry units are charioteers. There is no air cavalry.

The standing army of Unther is 10,000. Of these, 2,000 are bowmen and 1,000 are cavalry. The main force numbers 4,000 and is based in Unthalass, though recently it fought in Messemprar against the Northern Wizards. The army is typically divided into units of 60; 1st- to 3rd-level fighters lead each unit. There are also 12 mages, of levels 3-6, with the main force; these mages have sworn allegiance to Gilgeam.

The main fleet in Unthalass was attacked by pirates three years ago. All but five ships were destroyed or captured; one of the captured ships was one of the greatest magical relics of the realm, the Ship of the Gods.

GEOGRAPHY OF UNTHER

General Description

"This land is nature's plaything, one lives or dies according to her whims."

—Saying of the priestesses of Ishtar

Mighty Unther's land holdings are now only a fraction of what they used to be. Once they extended far to the west, north, and south. Unther was once considered greater than Mulhorand, for Unther was larger and more aggressive. Unther still cannot be considered to be a small nation, but it is truly a nation in decline.

Unther's eastern border is the Alamber Sea, which it shares with Mulhorand. The border extends from the west coast of the Alamber Sea down the River of Swords to Lake Azulduth, the Lake of Salt. West of Azulduth, Unther controls territory to Unthangol Pass, then the border turns north to the Smoky Mountains and Methwood. The Winding River and Lake Meth form the western boundary, which winds its way north to Messemprar at the mouth of the River of Metals, on the edge of the Alamber Sea. The Riders to the Sky Mountains are claimed by both Unther and Chessenta, though Chessenta is not in a condition to contest the claim.

Topographically, Unther is divided into a number of different regions. The lowlands around the crescent of the south end of the Alamber Sea, known as Menesankh, the Plain of Life, are shared with Mulhorand. These are fertile fields that are irrigated by the rivers at the southern end of the Alamber Sea, most notably the River of Swords and the River Angol; this region extends as far north as Red Haven.

The second region is the Marthessel, the Smoky Mountains, which extends in a chain as far east as Chondath, and includes the Adder Mountains. This is an area of rough hills, rugged coast, and active volcanoes. The mountains are high, but are not as high as the Sword Mountains in Mulhorand. There are frequent earthquakes in the southern portion of this region, and few humans live there. The Ship of the Gods, the island in the Alamber Sea, is considered to belong to this chain.

The third region, which covers most of the realm, is the Methtir, or Northern Plains. These lowlands extend east from the Riders to the Sky Mountains to the Alamber. It is an area of wild woods and arid grasslands.

There are a number of agricultural products grown in Unther; the Turami peoples that first inhabited the Greenfields had been farmers and had farmed the Menesankh lands for thousands of years before the Mulan emigrated from Raurin. The primary grains are barley and rice (which was only recently introduced into Mulhorand). Sesame seeds are grown and made into oil, and flax is grown to make cloth. There are many herd animals; sheep (there are over 200 words in Untheric to describe sheep), oxen, cattle, goats, and donkeys are all raised for domestic use. Lately the fields have been less productive, and the Untheri have been forced to buy foodstuffs from Thay at high prices.

There are few trees in Unther, with the exception of the Methwood. None are felled, if only because the monsters of the Methwood make the practice highly unsafe.

River of Swords

This long river forms the eastern border of Unther. The western tributary, the Blue Sword River, lies entirely in Unther, as its border extends as far east as the Green Sword River and Lake Azulduth. There are no Untheric settlements or farms on this river, aside from a few small outposts. These outposts were recently captured by the bandit chief Furifax.

For more information on the River of Swords, see Mulhorand.

River Angol

This swift waterway has its source in the springs of the Unthangol Mountains. It is famous for its unpredictable floods. Near the mouth of this river are large farms tended by slaves owned by the king. Dikes have been built to contain floods, but at least once in every ten years there is one flood that spills over, and at least once every 50 years there is a major catastrophic flood.

Recently the slaves of the River Angol farms were freed by Furifax, who intends to use them as part of his invasion force of the Greenfields.

The Greenfields

Historically, the Greenfields have been the breadbasket of Unther, especially now that the fertility of its extremely rich soil is enhanced by magic. The farms in this region are generally privately owned and tended by slaves. About 70% of Unther's food comes from this region.

This region is also known for being the home of androsphinxes and gynosphinxes, which occasionally raid cattle farms whose herds graze in this area. Large bounties are placed on the heads of sphinxes, but the moneys offered are so small that no one who has the power to challenge these beasts will accept the risk. Slaves are sometimes sent to hunt them; few that run into a gynosphinx return home.

This area is frequently raided by bandits, and a garrison of 1,000 militia soldiers is permanently stationed in the area. They are generally considered not to have the resources to challenge the strategically superior and better armed bandits.

On the west side of the Greenfields is a group of mysterious mages known as the Enclave. They have no known loyalties to any of the factions in Unther, though they have angered the king by refusing his summons on several occasions and not paying their taxes. It is said to be one of the most knowledgeable cabals of wizards in the entire Realms, but none have entered their chambers or knows their true power.

River Alamber

This very long and swift river forms the western boundary of the Greenfields. Its source is a network of streams on the northern side of the Unthangol Mountains. It provides needed sediment for the Greenfields, but, like the River Angol, it is unpredictable in its floods (except that its major floods usually occur in the same year as the River Angol's). Its floods are so severe that the city of Unthalass has nearly been destroyed twice by them in recorded history.

East of Alamber is the Greenfields, while west of Alamber is the desolation known as the Black Ash Plain. There are two settlements along the Alamber river: Unthalass, capital of Unther, lies at its mouth, while the town of Firetrees is downstream.

Black Ash Plain

This large area extends south from the Smoky Mountains as far as the Alamber River. The region gets its name from the ash spewed onto the plain by the Smoky Mountains, though "grey soot" would be a more appropriate name, except directly after an eruption, which occurs frequently.

There are no human habitations here. Brown dragons tunnel happily through the soot and through the rocky volcanic soil, and a tribe of black-skinned stone giants (locally referred to as ash giants) lives in the dormant mountains on the eastern edge of the plains. The soil is not fertile, though ash from these plains mixed with irrigable soil has been known to increase the soil's fertility.

The Smoky Mountains

The Smoky Mountains is a chain of volcanoes that run across Unther from west to east. There are two branches of these mountains. The eastern branch is dormant, with occasional puffs of steam exiting its vents, but few eruptions. The western branch is more active, with two volcanoes in particular, Mt. Fussel, and Mt. Temmikant, erupting frequently. A venerable red dragon lives on Mt. Temmikant; its name is Guy-anothaz. It is as harmless as a venerable red dragon can be—centuries ago, an adventuring company known as the Dragon's Bane attacked it, blinded it, and stole most of its hoard. It guards what few gems and coins it has left and survives by eating pumice stones. It knows every inch of its lair, but it is too frightened to venture into the open.

Mount Fussel is known to be the home of a number of flocks of dreaded pyrolisks, and it is said that salamanders swim in its molten core.

Methwood

This large, hot woodland is filled with cypress, date palms, cedar, juniper, and mulberry trees, with lots of vine growth. The vegetation is very thick and difficult to travel through without using a blade to cut the thick vines. In ancient times, Unther had a number of druids and nature worshipers who built great, tiered homes in the trees; now there are no intelligent creatures native to these woods.

Near the center of the forest are quite a few groups of vicious chimerae, each of which guards its territory fiercely. The old green dragon Skuthosiin scours the edges of Methwood and beyond in search of food.

There are a number of elephants, monkeys, leopards, and other, less dangerous, creatures within the confines of this forest.

It is said that within the heart of Methwood are the ruins of a great lost city of the original Turami inhabitants of Unther. If so, it has never been found, not even by the adventurers of Unther at its zenith, and most dismiss this legend as mere fancy.

Methmere

This long, narrow lake has a winding coastline. It is a clear blue lake, backed on the west by the Riders to the Sky Mountains. Several plesiosaurs swim in the depths of this lake, and bandits use isolated settlements on this coastline as bases. A number of fishing vessels also ply the waters; at least two dozen registered craft sail the lake at peak time. The lake is known for its large population of salmon, trout, and bass. There are no major settlements near Methmere. The Winding River, an extremely swift and treacherous waterway, flows into Methmere, and the River of Metals, which is far slower than its western counterpart, flows from Methmere into the Alamber Sea at Messempar.

The Winding River

This is the longest and wildest river in the Old Empires; even the bravest of navigators refuse to travel on its churning white waters. The lands around the river are desolate, home only to monsters and beasts. There are rumors of hermits and trolls living near the water, but none have confirmed this. Its source is in the Adder Peaks.

River of Metals

This river flows from Methmere into the Alamber Sea at Messempar. It gets its name because there are large deposits of metals, especially gold, within its muddy waters. There have been at least two gold rushes at various points in the river, but few try to pan it these days. Messempar is its only settlement.

Cities of Unther

Unthalass

An age ago, Unthalass was the greatest city in the Realms, a town of flowering gardens, white streets, and beautiful homes. The city boasted of magnificent vistas of the Alamber Sea. The people of the city were confident and rich, dressed in bright clothing. Beneath the great ziggurats of the gods, there was neither poverty or misery.

What changes an age makes! Certainly no inhabitant of the City of Gems at its zenith would recognize Unthalass now.

Twice floods have nearly destroyed the city, and both times the city never fully recovered. The buildings are worn and cracked, and the paint of its ancient decorations has long since faded.

The city is divided into three districts: the port district, the main district, and the Palace. The port is sheltered by a sea wall that extends three miles from shore; there is one breach in the sea wall where ships may come through two at a time (depending on the size of the ships). The wall was recently damaged by pirates, but it is now nearly as good as new. The port district is relatively clean and well stocked with services for trading ships and their crew, including hostels and taverns.

There is, however, a heavy port tax that discourages many traders from using Unthalass.

The main district is also known as the Great Slums. Slaves and their masters alike operate in their rundown buildings, built on the ruins of previous tenements destroyed by flood.

The only bright objects on the streets are the idols of Gilgeam that dot every corner. All citizens who walk the streets are obligated by law to bow their heads at his image as they pass.

These slums were built on top of the original city of Unthalass that was destroyed by flood; there are legends of great treasures buried in these ruins, but the undercity is also the home of a number of very nasty monsters, notably wererats. The undercity is said to be ruled by a tribe of lamia, led by the lamia noble Ereshkigal. None have encountered her and escaped alive, so the stories of the Queen of Tortures remain only hushed whispers that are usually spoken in barrooms.

The most spectacular section of Unthalass is the central mound of Gilgeam, which is raised above the city on the ruins of previous palaces. Behind the Imperial Wall are beautiful homes for the privileged, lush gardens, and the ziggurat of Gilgeam itself. This structure is a step pyramid whose levels are covered in gold, silver, brass, bronze, and other metals. At its peak is a shrine of blueenameled brickwork, capped by gold. The edges of the ziggurat are decorated with floral designs and studded with precious stones. The ziggurat of Gilgeam rises for 16 tiers and is nearly 800 feet in height, one of the largest structures in the entire Realms. Here Gilgeam lives in luxury while the rest of the nation crumbles.

The city is governed by Zimrilim (10th-level cleric of Gilgeam). The population of Unthalass is about 70,000.

Shussel

Shussel is a city on the northern trade route of Unther. It serves as a supply station for fishermen and other dwellers by the sea. It used to be a mining community, as there were large deposits of iron in nearby hills, but these were exhausted long ago. The plains to the north were once good farmland, but they are now desert.

Shussel is a city in decline. Three centuries ago its population was about 70,000; it has now diminished to 25,000.

The city is largely slums. It is ruled by Lord Ekur (8th-level cleric of Gilgeam) and a large force of Chessentan mercenaries. There is a major temple of Ishtar here; only their intervention prevents most of the inhabitants from starving. The port facility is small and does not receive much traffic, but is heavily fortified to guard against the sahuagin.

Messemprar

This city was once the largest city in Unther and was a regular stop on a trade route between Sultim, Bezantur, and Mourktar. Now ships avoid the west coast of the Alamber entirely.

The city is currently in chaos. The royal palace has been under siege by an angry mob for several weeks, as a tax revolt escalated into food riots and then a full-scale revolt. Many city guardsmen have been killed. The city is divided into several factions: The lord and his guard control the palace district, the Northern Wizards control the southern section (and the city gates to the outside), and the "non-slaves" (ex-slaves who have renounced their freedom) control the dock district.

Ships from Mourktar have been paid by certain adventurers in league with the slaves to keep supplying the city with food. A small army from Unthalass was turned away by the wizards' guild.

Gilgeam has sent his assassin, the Reaper, to kill off the wizards; he is also hiring a mercenary army from Mordulkin to march on Messemprar. He does not have the money to pay the mercenaries, which means the mercenaries will have to exact their payment from the treasures of the city. The army will arrive at Messemprar in three weeks' time. It is likely that the army will destroy the city, unless the slaves get some high-level assistance and arms.

In normal times, the leader of the city is Lord Annunaki (10th-level cleric of Gilgeam). The population of Messemprar (for now) is 30,000.

FireTrees

This small town is noted for the fire-trees, from which it takes its name. These deciduous trees have red blossoms that shine at night with a natural phosphorescence.

Firetrees is a farming community on the edge of the Greenfields; it has warehouses where grain is stored, as well as facilities to load caravans (the River Alamber is too fast for cargo to be shipped by water). The city holds feasts and festivals where the people of the Greenfields may relax from their labors. Firetrees is also the center of the cult of Tiamat, the most powerful group in opposition to Gilgeam.

The city's ruler is Lord Tukulti (10th-level wizard, in the service of Gilgeam). Tukulti is not a strong ruler; most of the people of Firetrees ignore him and his edicts, or insult them openly.

The population of Firetrees is about 7,000.

Dalath

Dalath is a small mining town in the interior of Unther, near the eastern Smoky Mountains. These mountains and the surrounding hills are rich in metals, gold, iron, copper, and lead. These are Unther's largest exports; without the income from these minerals, the economy would collapse.

Dalath is a rough-and-tumble place that distrusts strangers and despises the king and his taxes. Most of Dalath's inhabitants are slaves or freeholders who have left their families behind in the large cities to work here for several years. The mines are run by freehold merchants who do not care for the safety of their miners. The town is chronically undersupplied; it went on strike ten years ago over lack of food, and the freeholders brought in mercenaries to slaughter the miners and then replaced them with more slaves.

The town is governed by Lord Teuman Bloodletter (6th-level fighter), who serves Gilgeam but is really under the thumb of the freeholders. The town has a population of about 6,000.

Ssintar

This is a small trading post set up near the edge of Methwood. The King has a garrison of about 1,000 troops stationed here. These troops are here to protect the coast from invasions from Methwood and to march into Shussel in times of trouble. There are mines on the edge of Ssintar with substantial deposits of copper and some iron. The town is governed by Lord Gudea (13th-level fighter) who is known for his toughness but is considered the most humane and honorable of Gilgeam's Lords.

The population of Ssintar is about 4,000.

Red Haven

This is a small fishing village that lies on the trade route between Shussel and Unthalass. It was once a much larger town, but recent attacks by sahuagin and pirates have decimated the population and sent many others fleeing to the safety of the large cities. It is ruled by Lord Karigulzu (4th-level cleric of Gilgeam), commonly referred to as "that fat fop." The population of Red Haven is about 1,500.

RELIGION OF UNTHER

"I am All Religion, I am All Worship, none may breathe in Unther without blessing Me."

—Gilgeam

In the beginning, the people of Unther used the Sumerian pantheon as their own; these were the manifestations claimed by the god-kings who fled the ruins of Raurin to settle in Unther.

Unlike Mulhorand, which cherishes eternity and unchanging continuity, religion in Unther experienced major changes during its history.

The first big change occurred when many of the Sumerian deities died in the Orcgate Wars. The Untheri found many new gods and goddesses to worship, all belonging to the Babylonian pantheon.

Enlil himself retired; he appointed his son, Gilgeam, as his successor as king of the gods. At first, Gilgeam was a just ruler. But sometimes even the gods can go mad.

Gilgeam was a proud god-king. As the centuries passed and Unther declined in prosperity and influence, as taxes rose and the people's hatred grew, Gilgeam became a cruel and jealous lord.

All other deities, with the exception of Ishtar and Ramman (who were too popular to persecute) were banished from the plane. Limits were eventually set on the number of worshipers that Ishtar and Ramman could have (and their temples would turn over half of their funds to Gilgeam), and all other Untheri were obligated to worship Gilgeam alone.

However, trade with the other Realms has imported a lot of foreign deities into Unther, which are worshiped in secret.

CENTRAL PANTHEON

Gilgeam

Master of Wars, Father of Victory, God of the Sky and the Cities, Supreme Ruler of Unther, Chessenta, Threskel, Chondath, Turmish, the Shaar, and Yuirwood

Status: LE, Lesser Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: A red fist backed by a gold sun against black

Spheres: Major—All, Charm, Combat, Elemental, Guardian, Protection, Summoning, Weather; Minor—Creation, Divination, Necromantic, Weather

Weapons Allowed: Mace, Staff, Staff-Sling, Flail

Armor Allowed: Scale

Ethos: Priests of Gilgeam are to obey their lord without question. They are to enforce his will. They are to slay his enemies. They are to persecute all who will not worship him. They are to smite the enemies of Unther.

Gilgeam is the supreme leader of the gods of Unther (what few are left) and ruler of the land. His manifestation lives in Unthalass and has emerged from the citadel many times to smite his enemies with divine power. He is a god known for his jealousy, cruelty, and pride; he is covetous of wealth, taxing the people heavily.

Gilgeam himself is a god of physical prowess; if a warrior of great strength and fighting ability is captured, Gilgeam will offer him freedom if the warrior can defeat him in a wrestling match. Then Gilgeam will kill him with his bare hands.

Gilgeam has no incarnations, if only because an incarnation of Gilgeam might be filled with the sense of justice and honor that he himself lost long ago. Nor does Gilgeam have any heirs, though he enjoys the company of women (a son could prove to be a threat to the security of his throne).

The cult of Gilgeam is the most powerful in Unther, if only because few other cults are allowed. Idols to Gilgeam must decorate every street corner and every home, and those who deface his image will die. Gilgeam is a tall, handsome, very muscular man with long, golden hair and beard. He typically wears kingly robes, but goes into battle with his mace and a bronze skirt that covers his lower torso and his upper legs.

The power of his manifestation is as follows (see the "Religions of Mulhorand" section for the abilities of a manifestation):

Armor: None; natural armor class without Dexterity bonus is 2.

Ishtar

(Isis in Mulhorand)

Goddess of Weather, Lady of the Rivers, Mother of the Harvest, Lady of All Love

Status: NG, Lesser Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: Female hand clutching a glowing crystal rod

Spheres: Major—All, Animal, Charm, Creation, Guardian, Healing, Necromantic, Plant, Protection, Weather; Minor—Divination

Weapons Allowed: Staff, Flail

Armor Allowed: None

Special Requirements: Ishtar is only served by priestesses. No men may be priests of Ishtar.

Special Abilities: At 15th level, a priestess of Ishtar gets a bonus spell: control weather (as 7th-level priest spell).

Ethos: Priestesses of Ishtar are charged to aid farmers and the common people of Unther, to protect them from starvation. They may not directly attack the injustices of Gilgeam, but may try to soften their effects.

Ishtar is the goddess of love and fertility. She is the most beloved deity in Unther, but her priesthood has little power. Long ago Ishtar gave the power of her manifestation to the Mulhorand goddess Isis, and so the goddess worshiped in Unther is not the real Ishtar, but she allows them to use her name. Ishtar has one incarnation in Shussel, which is the site of her major temple.

Gilgeam is quite jealous of Ishtar and her popularity. He has recently decreed that neither she nor Ramman may train worshipers to learn priest spells of 6th level or higher. The priesthood of Ishtar is quite upset, and is considering giving support to the growing rebellion against him.

Ishtar is portrayed as a beautiful female with golden hair and blue eyes; her incarnation takes on this form and has the following statistics:

SA: The incarnation of Ishtar may use any weather spell at will, as an 18th-level caster. She may, at will, stun up to 6 HD (or levels) due to divine awe.

SD: The incarnation of Ishtar is immune to 1st- to 5th-level illusion/phantasm spells, and to the following spells due to high Wisdom: cause fear, charm per- son, command, friends, hypnotism, forget, hold person, ray of enfeeblement, scare, fear, charm monster, confusion, emotion, fumble, suggestion

Ramman

God of War, Thunder, Rain, Storms

Status: N, Lesser Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: Lightning bolt through a storm cloud

Spheres: Major—All, Combat, Elemental, Guardian, Protection, Weather; Minor—Divination, Healing, Necromantic, Summoning

Weapons Allowed: Sword, lance, staff, short bow, spear, javelin

Armor Allowed: Chain

Special Requirements: Minimum STR 13, DEX 14, CON 12

Special Abilities: At 10th level, priests of Ramman may fire a 10d6 lightning bolt, once per day.

Ethos: Priests of Ramman are obliged to help defend Unther against weather magic used by other nations (notably Thay). They are to protect Unther from foreign invaders and to serve the King.

Ramman is a relatively new deity, introduced into Unther during the height of the Second Empire. The worship of Ramman complements that of Ishtar; Ishtar is the deity of fertile soils, while Ramman is the deity of the skies whose rains help crops flourish. Ramman is considered to be a less than caring deity. Recent limits on the spells usable by the priests of Ramman have severely hurt the ability of Unther to defend its crops from the Red Wizards, who are using weather magic to concentrate the available clouds in the eastern region of the Inner Sea over their territory.

Ramman is portrayed as a man with a homely face but a massive build. His incarnations are typically farmers and soldiers, and he is worshiped in the Greenfields. There is often confusion between Ramman and Ramatep, the Untheric name for Anhur, but they are not the same deity (though confusion over names has caused other deities to merge their manifestations).

The statistics for Ramman's incarnation are as follows:

AC: -2

SA: The incarnation of Ramman uses a mallet of lightning (it returns to him if thrown). This mallet always inflicts 20 points of damage per attack, even against targets that have protection against lightning.

SD: Ramman is immune to all 1st- to 4th-level spells. He is immune to the following spells due to high Wisdom: cause fear, charm person, command, friends, hypnotism

Weapons: Typically wields a magical mallet
Armor: Scale mail +3

Tiamat

Queen of Chaos, Nemesis of the Gods

Status: LE, Lesser Power, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: Five-headed dragon

Spheres: Major—All, Animal, Charm, Combat, Divination, Guardian, Necromantic, Protection, Weather; Minor—Animal, Elemental, Summoning

Weapons Allowed: All priest weapons
Armor Allowed: Any

Special Requirements: WIS 14

Special Abilities: 16th-level priests of Tiamat may summon a young adult dragon as a mount.

Ethos: Priests of Tiamat are sworn to destroy the power of the god-kings of Unther, to seize the realm for themselves, to get as much treasure as possible and sacrifice it to the Dark Lady.

Tiamat is a cult deity, born in opposition to the god Gilgeam. The gods taught the people that Tiamat was their major enemy, so when the gods became unpopular, veneration of their greatest enemy grew as a protest. In Unther, people of all alignments belong to the cult of Tiamat, even people of good alignments, because Gilgeam is such a tyrant they cannot see how Tiamat could be worse.

Tiamat's manifestation in this plane was destroyed long ago by the god Marduk (who is no longer in the Realms), but because of the summoning rituals performed by various priests, she has been able to send an incarnation. Her incarnation has added power in Unther because of the strength of her cult. It can change form at will, and usually poses as the Dark Lady, a sorceress with long, dark hair and dark robes, who lives in Firetrees. The other form is a three-headed dragon (all five heads are only available to the manifestation of Tiamat; the incarnation has the heads of a red dragon, a blue dragon, and a green dragon).

SA: Each head may breathe once every three rounds, and no more than one head may breathe at a time. Breath weapon per head is the same as a great wyrm of each species (24d8 + 12 for the blue head, 24d6 + 12 for the green head, and 24d10 + 12 for the red head). The dragon form of Tiamat horrifies all with 4 HD (or levels) or less. She has the following spells, cast as if she is 24th level: two each of 1st-, 2nd-, 3rd-, 4th-, 5th-, 6th-, and 7th-level wizard spells and one 8th-level wizard spell; and two each of 1st-, 2nd-, 3rd-, and 4th-level priest spells. Each head has the choice of breathing, spellcasting, or biting. Tiamat cannot attack with her claws, but can wing buffet and tail lash. Tiamat's tail stinger can also strike one creature; those who are struck must roll successful saving throws vs. poison (with a -4 penalty) or die in one round; those who succeed with their saving throws are slowed for 2d4 days, or until the poison is neutralized.

SD: Each head of Tiamat has 48 hit points; when full damage is inflicted on the head, it becomes useless and cannot attack. When two heads are immobilized, Tiamat teleports away.

Other Deities

There are a number of other deities worshipped in Unther; these deities were introduced by merchants from the other parts of the Realms or by immigrants. All worship of these deities is illegal and subject to persecution. These deities are worshiped by only a small fraction of Unther's population.

Anhur (CG): This war deity is worshiped mainly by a few Chessentan mercenaries who were converted to Anhur worship in Mulhorand, then journeyed to Unther to serve on freeholds. This deity is not as popular among the mercenaries as Tempus, but his following is growing fast.

Bane: There are agents of the Zhen-tarim everywhere these days, and Unther is no exception. A small group of Bane worshipers have set up in Unthar, trying to extend their contacts into Mulhorand and learn the secrets of the south for Zhentil Keep, as Manshoon has expressed an interest in learning southern magic and the secrets of the priest of Thoth.

Mask (God of Thieves, N): The number of thieves in the cities of Unther is increasing rapidly (especially when the riots in Messemprar provide excellent looting opportunities). Thieves usually pay homage to Mask.

Mystra (LN): This goddess of wizards is quite popular among the wizards of Unther. She is believed to be the patron of the mysterious Enclave.

The Old Gods (LN, LG, NG): This cult worships gods from the golden age of Unther: Enlil, Marduk, Nanna-Sin, and Utu. The cult of the Old Gods is mostly nostalgic; its priesthood cannot gain spells beyond the 2nd level. Gilgeam does not persecute members of this cult because he sees them as madmen with no power.

Sebek [God of Rivers, N(E)]: This crocodile-headed deity is worshiped in the wetlands, away from the cities. This cult has been persecuted for several centuries. All crocodiles are said to be his children.

Tempus (CN): This is the chief warrior god worshiped (aside from Gilgeam of course) in Unther. He is a favorite among the Chessentan mercenaries that many of the freeholders have brought in to protect their farms from bandits.

Umberlee (CE): Not commonly worshiped, pirates on the Alamber do pay homage to her, though usually their sacrifices consist of cargos they cannot salvage.

Waukeen (N): This god is worshiped, in private, by merchants who travel into Unther from abroad. A recent attempt to build a secret temple was foiled by the priests of Gilgeam, who razed the building in which the services were held. Since then, there have been a great deal of bitter feelings between the priests of Waukeen and those of Gilgeam.

PERSONALITIES OF UNTHER

"Can the gods make men mad in the land where the gods themselves are mad?"

—Isimud, leader of the Enclave

Isimud

Greenfields
24th-level Mage
LG, Mystra
Human male

Isimud is the leader of the Enclave, a group of wizards in the western Greenfields. He is an old man, nearly blind, relying on magical aids to help him continue his quest for new magic.

Isimud seeks the location of certain artifacts of the Old Unther Empire and wishes to recover them to prevent them from falling into the hands of Gilgeam, or the Cult of Tiamat, or Furifax and the bandits. He laments that there is no force of a more benevolent nature that promises to take control of Unther. He would be willing to support any benign faction that gathers public support, but none have as yet.

He appears as a wizened old man with a long, white beard and a cap with many mystic runes. He wears strange lenses on his face, and his familiar, a talking owl named Ibuth, reads aloud for him when his eyesight fails.

Shuruppak

Wanders
20th-level Fighter/7th-level Mage
NE, Gilgeam
Human male

Shuruppak is referred to as "The Reaper" in Unther, for his approach is death. He is a great fighter-mage, clad in black robes, protected by bracers of defense AC 2, who wanders from city to city, killing anyone he feels is an enemy of Gilgeam. Shuruppak is a psychopath prone to fits of extreme violence, known to take his sword to anyone when he's in a bad mood.

When Gilgeam orders him to kill someone, Shuruppak takes a group of high-level mages and priests in Gil-geam's service with him. He has failed only once—when he was ordered to bring in the Enclave; he killed several of the order before he was driven back by the most powerful wizards of that order. He is currently in Messemprar trying to put down the riots, mostly by taking hostages and executing them in public until the people quiet down. This strategy has not worked.

Shuruppak wears black robes and a hood adorned with a red skull mask that covers the top half of his face. It is said that he was horribly scarred in battle long ago, but this is untrue. He has been a figure of dread for so long that he considers himself to be The Reaper.

Shuruppak has been given a number of special powers by Gilgeam. As there are plenty of opportunities for player characters to encounter him, his statistics follow:

AC: -3
HIT POINTS: 135

Shuruppak typically wields a two-handed sword +3 and wears bracers of defense, AC 2.

Tiglath

Firetrees
14th-level Priest
N, Tiamat
Human female

Tiglath is the current high priestess of Tiamat. She was once part of Gilgeam's harem; she does not speak of her experiences there, but she is filled with hatred and a desire for revenge against the king. Tiglath's face has a large star-shaped scar that surrounds her eyes, nose, and mouth.

Tiglath is not an evil woman, which may eventually lead her into conflict with her deity. For now, Tiamat is willing to accept her service, using her hatred to corrupt her and change her to Lawful Evil. She has been close friends with the bandit Furifax for many years and often rides to the eastern Shaar to coordinate his actions with that of the cult of Tiamat.

Furifax

Eastern Shaar
13th-level Fighter
LE, Tempus
Half-elf male

Furifax is the most famous bandit in the southern Realms; he is known for both extreme bravery and ruthlessness.

His plans are meticulous; he is an excellent leader who is respected and loved by his followers. He is also extremely cruel to his enemies, believing that the end justifies the means.

Furifax is a half-elf who strongly favors the human side of his heritage; he has no idea who his parents were, except that they were travelers slain by bandits in the eastern Shaar. He was not slain but raised by the bandits and eventually became their chief. On a raid into southern Unther he was captured and sold into slavery in the royal palace in Unthalass.

When he fell into disfavor with his master, he was slated to face Gilgeam in the arena, but he escaped before the match could take place. He vowed that he would decide the time and place for their contest. He returned to the eastern Shaar, killed several rival bandits, and became the leader of the largest and most successful bandit group.

Since then, he has placed agents in every major city in Unther, inciting dissent and spying on royal activities. He has begun his plan for rebellion, which may succeed. He needs a group of high-level adventurers to face the manifestation of Gilgeam and expel it from the plane. He has allied with the cult of Tiamat, but he feels that this is not enough.

Furifax is tall for a half-elf, nearly the height of an average man, slim but wiry and muscular. His hair is sandy brown, and his eyes are auburn. He wears a sandy brown tunic and carries a long bow, a long sword +3, boots of striding and springing, and a ring of armor, AC 0.

When opponents surrender, he strips them of most of their weapons, arms, and treasure. He usually leaves them some food and sufficient weapons for them to defend themselves in dangerous territories.

STR 18/06 (+1, +3) DEX 17 CON 14 INT 17 WIS 17 CHA 16

SD: Boots of Striding and Springing

Furifax has access to more powerful weaponry, but because he has had The Companion for many years, he would prefer not to have any other weapon; he also calls it "my brother of arms."

Esarhaddon

Greenfields

8th-level Mage

LG, Mystra

Human male

Esarhaddon is the youngest of the members of the Inner Council of the Enclave, the wizards who live on the edge of the Greenfields and attempt to preserve Untheri magic. Esarhaddon is Isimud's apprentice, but he has none of his master's patience. He is filled with hatred for the king and is trying to push the Enclave into military action to overthrow Gilgeam and take control of Unther and rule it as a magocracy.

Esarhaddon is the only one who wants to pursue this; the other wizards, looking at the example set by Thay, wish to avoid politics. Esarhaddon does have a considerable following among the younger apprentices. His long-range plan is to get control of the Enclave and turn it into a political instrument, but he is so impatient that he may decide to join in Furifax's rebellion and aid them in their battle against Gilgeam. With the permission of the other wizards, he made contact with Furifax. He has solicited a promise that the Enclave's holdings will not be touched, in exchange for a promise that the Enclave will not intervene on the side of Gilgeam.

Esarhaddon is young and impulsive, brilliant but impatient. He is less interested in the pursuit of knowledge than politics, but his elders dismiss this as youthful exuberance. Esarhaddon is a golden-haired Mulan with blue eyes and a somewhat homely face.

Shulgi

Messemprar

5th-level Thief

CE, Mask

Vampire male

Shulgi was once a thief from Cormyr. He was searching an ancient tomb for treasure when the roof collapsed, trapping him with a sarcophagus opened, trapping him with a vampire. The inevitable result was that Shulgi also became a vampire. Shulgi was under his master's influence for several years, until an adventuring company called the Destroyers of Ghosts killed his master, setting Shulgi free. Fearing that he would be next on the adventurers' list of victims, Shulgi fled Cormyr, making his way east. Eventually he settled in the city of Messemprar.

Shulgi poses as a retired businessman, but he still enjoys thieving. Since freed from his master's influence he has not partaken of human blood, but he steals enough money using his vampiric abilities to pay for livestock, whose blood he drains. Shulgi enjoys thieving even more now that he is a vampire. He has begun to set up a Thieves' Guild in Messemprar.

He is not a particularly evil vampire, but if anyone really annoys him, he'll kill in a slow and evil fashion.

Since he remembers how poorly his master treated him, he doesn't create other vampires. So far no one has noticed that Shulgi is a vampire. He has taken advantage of the riots to loot several places of value, but he feels that the situation is getting so out of hand in Unther that he may leave for Chessenta.

Shulgi is a short, fat vampire, with pale skin (he uses make-up to make himself appear more human) and a stutter.

Skuthosiin

Methwood

Very Old Green Dragon

LE, Tiamat

Dragon male

Skuthosiin, nicknamed "the Venomous" (for obvious reasons) is the greatest dragon alive in Unther at this time (with the exceptions of the incarnation of Tiamat and Guyanothaz, the blind red dragon of Mt. Temmikant). It claims to be the offspring of the infamous Chathuulandroth, who razed the tower of the archmage Nezram in Mulhorand, but no one believes this. Skuthosiin is an extremely egotistical beast that considers itself to be the most powerful creature in Unther, though it is somewhat more humble when Tiamat is around.

Skuthosiin has recently been forced by the cult of Tiamat to join them in their attacks; it serves as the personal steed for Tiglath. This is a recent development. The dragon and its rider are not close friends. Skuthosiin is not interested in politics, just food and a large hoard. The dragon bears a grudge against an archer from Ssintar that once pierced its armor and gave it a pain that lasted for weeks; it intends to destroy every living creature in that city when the time comes.

Skuthosiin is a wily creature. In battle it likes to lure its victims into an unsafe mountainous area, then start an avalanche. It has destroyed several adventuring companies this way.

CULTURE OF UNTHER

“For now, and forever, the world shall look upon the works of Unther and be filled with wonder.”

—Old Untheric saying

Unther is, despite its current low points, one of the richest cultures in the Realms.

In ancient Raurin, even before the war against the gods, there were two distinct nations, which scholars name proto-Unther and proto-Mulhorand. The proto-Unther culture was a more aggressive culture; it believed in achieving absolute supremacy over its dominions. The gods of Unther have, since their beginnings, been uncaring entities (as opposed to the gods of Mulhorand, who are merely neglectful). The philosophy of Unther has always been that life is hard and cruel, and only through hard work and submission to one’s deity can one survive. This seems to be its philosophy throughout history, even before the coming of Gilgeam.

Yet art and culture flourished in Unther, almost as well as in more-prosperous Mulhorand. Scholars debate how a culture whose major concern was survival could possibly produce such art. The answer seems to be that in struggling to survive, the Untheri created tools that enabled them to flourish and develop a wealthy civilization.

Arts that flourished in Unther include ceramics, sculpture, and architecture. The Untheri were not great workers in metals, nor is their land rich in precious stones, like Mulhorand, but in many ways the Untheri were more creative with their resources. Everyday objects like jugs were decorated in beautiful patterns and overlaid with colorful enamels. Walls were covered in mosaic tiles. Glazed inlaid patterns of great animals adorned city gates. There were statues in even the poorest of homes; most of these were idols of local gods who were worshiped in household shrines.

For the most part, art and architecture in Unther was smaller in scale but more inventive than in Mulhorand.

Early in its history, Unther developed the ziggurat, a step pyramid that was sometimes elaborately decorated with art and enamel plates.

Temples were square buildings supported by columns. There were a number of obelisks, tall narrow towers meant to mark important places, commemorate the gods, and serve as look-out posts.

Cities were built with high walls and ramparts on hills overlooking the sea, surrounded by moats of water from nearby rivers.

Horticulture and irrigation was also important to the people of Unther. There are accounts of elaborate gardens, watered by dams on the rivers, which covered many square miles. These arts have been lost, and the ancient dams were swept away by the force of the swift rivers they tried to control.

For centuries, all Untheri except slaves have learned how to read and write. Poetry is especially important to the old peoples of Unther. In Unther, poems are meant to be chanted, along with musical accompaniment (typical instruments include drum, lyre, harp). The lamentation, a verse full of melancholy expressions of sorrows, is an extremely popular verse-form in Unther.

Another popular form of literature in Unther is the epic poem. There are epics that describe the birth of the gods (highly dubious in their authenticity, but beautifully written). The most famous epic is the Epic of Gilgeam, which describes the life of the current king of Unther, and is required to be taught to all of the Untheri.

Gilgeam’s current unpopularity has led to a new and previously unknown form of poetry in Unther—the satire—as poets secretly parody many of the famous passages of the Epic of Gilgeam.

The Untheri are also noted for many books of proverbs and wise sayings.

In many cultures, the works of the ancients are valuable treasures. This is especially true in Mulhorand, whose jewelry and metalwork are considered to be valuable by the peoples of the west. In Unther, the major treasures—pottery, buildings, and sculpture—are not considered to be valuable by most people.

There are those who admire art for its own sake, however, who consider the sculptures and pottery of Unther to be without equal.

Pursuit of the arts—and war—has always been the foremost recreation of the Untheri. In recent times, athletic competitions have been introduced by Chessentan mercenaries and are becoming popular in Unther. Gilgeam often portrays himself as a perfect athlete as well as a perfect king. In Unthalass, Gilgeam has recently instituted gladiatorial games, in which criminals fight each other for sport. This cruel practice has sickened even some of the nobility.

Clothing in Unther is similar to that in Mulhorand. Nobles do not wear as much jewelry, but their raiment is usually multicolored and displays elaborate patterns to reflect their high social status. Nobles also wear elaborate headgear. The skirt worn by both males and females is often frilled. Untheri males wear long, well-groomed (often braided) beards.

Language of Unther

The language of Unther is called Untheric. It belongs to the same language family as the language of Mulhorand, but it so greatly changed over the course of many centuries that there are now very few similarities between the two languages.

The runes used by the Untheri are entirely different from those used by the Mulhorandi; these runes pre-date their migration from Raurin. Early Untheric writing consisted of syllabic hieroglyphs (runes that represent one syllable, as opposed to the hieroglyphs of Mulhorand, which represent one word) and seems to have had at least minor influence on the alphabet of Thorass (Old Common).

PEOPLE AND SOCIETY OF CHESSENTA

“In Chessenta, the people are incapable of living a quiet life, or allowing others to live quietly.”

—Heptios the Archmage

Unther and Mulhorand are relatively stable and united societies, and the social structure does not vary much from region to region. In Chessenta, this is not the case; each city is a different society and may contain substantial differences in social mix, laws, and character. The peoples of Chessenta are of many races: common humans are the Mulani (Unther/Mulhorand), Turami (Turmish), Rashemi (Rashemen), and Amnite (Amn); there are also more than a few elves, half-elves, half-orcs, orcs, dwarves, and halflings mixed in the cities. Airstpur and Mordulkin are particularly well-known for their cosmopolitan mix of races.

As in the other nations of the Old Empires, there are three social classes: nobility, middle class, and slaves/serfs. The rulers are usually Mulan humans, descended from those who originally rebelled against Unther.

The Population of Chessenta

Chessenta is an ancient land, in many ways the most energetic of the Old Empires. While large sections of the country remain unoccupied (the Adder Peaks, for instance), it is estimated that the population stands at close to 1.2 million sentient beings, including the Flaming Spike orc tribe of the Akanapeaks, whose population is estimated at 50,000 (though they suffered heavy losses in the recent wars in Chondath). Of this population, about 300,000 live in the cities and 900,000 in the countryside.

Given its political divisiveness, there is no standing army to represent Chessenta as a nation. When outsiders threaten Chessenta, the armies of Cimbar and Akanax threaten each other into cooperating; so far this has only occurred on one occasion—when Unther tried to reclaim Chessenta 300 years ago and failed miserably. There is no central council to discuss Chessentan affairs, though Cimbar sends ambassadors to all coastal cities except Luthcheq. This keeps a dialogue going among the Chessentan cities to discuss trade threats from the North Coast cities.

The social classes of Chessenta are as follows:

The Nobility

The nobles of Chessenta live in rich palaces in large cities. They can be of any class, though given the large number of wars that plague Chessenta, they usually belong to the warrior group.

Whereas Mulhorand worships the divine, Chessenta’s obsession is with physical conflict. Rulers are often retired warriors who place their sons at the heads of the army. They typically rule the city and send troops out into the surrounding countryside to collect taxes; taxes are kept and used by the city, not sent to a central authority.

To be cast out of the noble class, one must be outlawed. The punishment of banishment requires a public trial.

Noble Titles of Chessenta

There is no hierarchy of titles in Chessenta. The rulers of cities are generally known as kings; the Sceptanar of Cimbar uses the title Overlord or Great King to signify his claim as the one true ruler of Chessenta. (Of course, the other kings of Chessenta do not refer to the Sceptanar as the Great King.)

People who perform great deeds on the battlefield are officially known as “Hero of...,” with the name of the battle added to their title. This is considered to be part of their name; those given this title are permitted to add heroic emblems to their shields and wear a copper ring on the third finger of their left hand. It is possible to be a hero in more than one battle, and heroes often receive additional pay as a matter of respect for their deeds. Most importantly, a hero is considered to be part of the noble class; it thus is possible for a slave to be elevated into the nobility.

To be a hero, one must perform great deeds in battle that are witnessed by a commander of noble rank. The title is not given out as a whim, and there is rarely more than one hero in a battle. Heroism is sometimes given out posthumously; the only benefit such heroes receive is a grave in the noble burial grounds with a marker to recognize their deeds.

There are no special titles for priests or mages, which are not the most respected classes in Chessenta. Both are considered to be less than noble professions, except in Cimbar, which recognizes teachers and philosophers from these classes as the pinnacles of human achievement. There is nothing particularly honorable or dignified about being a member of these classes; it is the act of teaching or philosophizing that is seen as dignified in Cimbar. One must also engage in public discussions and debates between philosophers to gain proper recognition.

The Middle Class

The middle class in Chessenta bears a greater resemblance to the tradesmen, merchants, and farmers of the western Realms, rather than the tightly controlled realms of Mulhorand, Unther, or even Thay. The middle class controls most of the money in Chessenta, and the city governments believe that it is in their best interest to let the middle class thrive so the governments rake in the taxes.

The majority of farmers are freeholders with serfs to help in the fields. Slaves typically fulfill household duties, while serfs are paid minimal wages and given land of their own to use while providing a portion of crops produced on the land to the owner. In actual practice, the differences between serf and slave are minimal.

The only city that places major restrictions on the merchant classes is Luthcheq. Businesses in that city are forbidden to use wizards, shelter wizards, or even have dealings with wizards outside of the city. The penalties for violating this law are confiscation of all property and possessions and death by witchweed burning as a witch-friend. Merchants usually get around these restrictions by setting up other companies in other cities, selling to their other companies, and then hiring middlemen to sell to wizards. The lords of Luthcheq typically persecute one merchant every ten years or so to demonstrate that their laws may not be flouted. Then they move on to matters of greater interest. Naturally, many traders in the Inner Sea are extremely nervous during their visits to Luthcheq, and some merchants avoid that city altogether.

Members of the middle class in Chessenta typically dress in upper class style, but without royal insignias or signets of heroism. They are clean-shaven and their hair is cropped short. They wear short, white tunics with capes that fall to the knees and cover the shoulders. Only mages and the crippled are permitted to carry staves.

Slaves

Slavery in Chessenta is less widespread than in Mulhorand or Unther; farm workers are typically serfs, not slaves, though the differences are minimal. Slaves are often criminals who are forced into service in dangerous places, such as the mines, or serfs purchased from slave traders (some are Thayvian in origin).

Slavery is considered part of the natural order; philosophers claim that some men are naturally servile, and many of these servile men are slaves. Work conditions among slaves vary greatly.

Slaves in the mines work in a wretched, unsafe environment, but most slaves live hard but not unpleasant lives. It is considered a virtue to reward slaves for hard work or jobs well done; masters can give slaves their freedom at any time. Slaves are not branded as in Unther, but they are forced to wear a thread around their wrists to identify them as slaves. The threads are easily broken, but escapes are for the most part a very rare occurrence. Slaves may shave or cut their hair, but most masters require them to wear a beard, at least until they are sure the slave will not escape.

Most slaves are kept illiterate, except in the city of Cimbar, where it is compulsory that all citizens and slaves be able to read and write.

Demihumans in Chessenta

The major enclave of nonhumans in Chessenta is the Flaming Spike tribe in western Chessenta. This tribe has a reputation, which seems to be exaggerated, for barbarism and cruelty.

These orcs often raid the cattle and sheep herds on the north shores of the Akanamere, but they rarely attack humans. Most battles between the Flaming Spike and Chessenta have been initiated by Chessenta; the garrison at Rodanar is especially eager to kill them. The Flaming Spike tribe is more aggressive in Chondath.

A number of orcs have left the tribe to become traders in Airspur, where half-orcs are fast becoming the dominant members of its society. Because of this, a large dwarven mercenary company has offered its services to Cimbar, which is currently at war with Airspur. For the most part, however, the orcs of Airspur have adopted human values and compete with human traders for business, not racial reasons. The archmage Heptios says that orcs who adopt human values may be the greatest threat the Realms have ever known.

The second source of demihumans in Chessenta are the mercenaries. While all of the peoples of the Old Empires share a congenital wariness of and unease with all things elven, half-elves are considered to be fully human and are rarely the object of discrimination. Dwarves are also commonly found in mercenary companies, though southern dwarves consider Chessenta to still be part of Unther and thus an enemy. "Even the most drunken dwarf never forgets, even when he does not remember correctly" is a common (if unfair) saying in Chessenta.

One city that does not like demihumans, as one might expect, is Luthcheq. While orcs, half-orcs, and half-elves are tolerated, full elves are considered to be creatures of magic; any caught in Luthcheq are burned. Dwarves are considered to be earth magicians and also subject to burning.

Naturally, most demihumans avoid Luthcheq, and some demihuman companies have joined in battles against Luthcheq out of vengeance, which has only deepened the prejudice of the lords of Luthcheq against demihumans.

The Society of Chessenta

Chessenta is generally considered to have a neutral society, subject to regional variations. Cimbar is probably best described as lawful good, while Akanax is lawful neutral, and Luthcheq is lawful evil.

In Chessenta, there are a number of motives that drive people. The people of the outside see the Chessentan's feasts and wars and often view them as a riotous, drunken people. While it is true that Chessentans feast and fight often and long, this description misses the fundamental facet of a Chessentan's character-passion. Chessentans are an extremely energetic people who rarely do things except to an extreme. Competition is very important to their way of life, as is art. The Chessentans live for today, but without the fatalism or desperation of those who believe that the world will soon end.

This tendency toward excess and driven behavior enables them to create works of beauty that cannot be found elsewhere in the Realms. It also encourages them to engage in savage warfare with appalling frequency. Chessenta is a land that does not believe in doing anything half-way.

GEOGRAPHY OF CHESSENTA

“Chessenta is a mosaic of a nation that was made by ten different artists, all of them blindfolded.”

—Heptios, mage of Cimbar

In physical size, the alliance of Chessenta is the largest of the Old Empires. However, Chessenta is really a collection of city-states with no unity whatsoever, though each state has ambitions (some would say delusions) toward being the center of this virtually nonexistent nation.

Historically, the border of Chessenta in the west begins at the coast on the edge of the Akanapeaks, the mountains that border the Akanamere. This border goes south to the Adder Peaks, and then runs along the Winding River, Methmere, and the River of Metals to its mouth on the coast of the Alamber. The Untheric city of Messemprar lies across the border on the south side of the river.

The border then shifts northward, following the coast, as far west as the city of Reth. The region between Messemprar and Mt. Thulbane, Threskel, considers itself to be an independent nation, but most consider this area to be part of Chessenta.

Chessenta has numerous geographical regions. In the west are the Akanapeaks, and to the east are the Riders to the Sky Mountains. Between these two mountain ranges are the hills of Maerth, which separates the Adder River valley to the east and the Akanul Plains on the west. Threskel is low plains and beaches, with the exception of the lonely mountain, Mt. Thulbane.

The Riders To The Sky

This mountain chain is on the southeastern border of Chessenta. These are mostly hills ranging between 3,000 and 5,000 feet in height. On the southern end are a number of cliffs that are home to the tuuru, a race of giant bird-like lizards (pteranodons).

Legends exist that in ancient days these huge birds were used as mounts by the warriors of Unther. Given the size, weight, and strength of the pteranodons, it is doubtful that they could support a human rider; either larger varieties once existed or the legend is a hoax.

There are also the ruins of an ancient aarakocra civilization on the slopes, but this tribe was hunted to extinction a century ago for sport by mercenaries from Chessenta.

The eastern portions of the Riders to the Sky have mostly been cleared, though some bandit and outlaw tribes use them as bases to wage raids on Unther and Chessenta. The western portions, along the edge of the Winding River, are much wilder. There are troll villages, and duergar inhabit underground caverns.

Half-drow who were exiled from Yuirwood long ago are rumored to live among the trolls.

Adder River

The Adder River is a wide, slow, muddy river that runs from the Adder Peaks to the Bay of Chessenta. It is known for the lush vegetation that surrounds it, and its deadly snakes (the king of Unther was once bitten by an adder while crossing this river). It would be easy to navigate, except for the Adder Swamp, which blocks the mouth of the river. The Adder Swamp is known to be home to a community of werecrocodiles, who are very protective of their territory. They are currently at war with a community of wererats.

The Hills of Maerth

Between Akanamere and the Adder River are the Hills of Maerth. These low but rugged hills are known for their rare minerals; a large number of ancient mines dot the surface of the hills.

Recently large tracts of the hills of Maerth were purchased by the well-known plane-wandering archmage Azurax Silverhawk (23rd-level mage), who is seeking a philosopher's stone.

The Akanul

The Akanul is the most fertile region of farmland within Chessenta. Large plantations of cash crops line the shores of the Akanamere; these crops are delivered by ship to Akanax and Soorenar. These lands have been farmed for centuries; they deliver over 50% of Chessenta's food supply. Many of the wars that have been fought in Chessenta have been over these lands and access to their crops.

Akanamere

This great fresh-water lake is the largest in the Old Empires. The lake is rich in fish, and its shores are fertile. There is also at least one active pirate vessel active in this area, as well as a family of vodyanoi and a small community of lizard men. Two small trading villages, Oslin and Maerduuth, are situated on the southeastern coast of the lake, while the town of Rodanar sits on the northern shore. The mercenary company, Lords of the Inner Reach, is stationed in Oslin; it has been employed by farmers who wish to displace rival farmers and take over their lands. The river Akax, which runs between the Akanamere and the Bay of Chessenta, is navigable down its entire length by small- and medium-sized ships.

Akanapeaks

These are the highest peaks in Chessenta, with the exception of Mt. Thulbane. The only known passage through the Akanapeaks is the gap of Reth. The western slopes of the peaks are home to a large orc tribe, the Flaming Spike, which inhabits ancient dwarven mines that were carved in the mountains over three millennia ago. The orcs raid into western Chessenta and Hlath and Nun in eastern Chondath.

Bay of Chessenta

This great bay is considered by many to be the best natural harbor in the eastern Inner Sea region. At its northeastern end is the Watcher's Cape, on which stands a lighthouse that is nearly 800 feet high. This light, known as the Drakelight, is lit whenever a fleet of pirate ships is spotted entering the Bay. A garrison of 300 troops, 100 each from Luthcheq, Soorenar, and Mordulkin, maintain the lighthouse and guard against pirate and other attacks. This garrison is well supplied; by treaty all three of the cities maintain their troops here, even if the cities go to war against each other.

Mount Thulbane

This extinct volcano is the highest peak in Chessenta; it is said that the god Asuran, patron of Chessenta, lives on this peak. At the foot of the mountain are the fields of Pryollus, where competitions are held every two years to determine the finest athletes in Chessenta. These grounds are currently being used by the king of Mourktar, who is having an athletic competition to determine who will succeed him (see the "The Name of the Game" scenario).

Cities of Chessenta

Reth

Reth is the westernmost city of Chessenta—a fast-growing port and trading center. It forms a loose alliance with Hlath and Nun to protect each other from attack from the sea, though Reth failed to protect Hlath in recent battles against a powerful netherworld mage named Yrkheteq (see I14, Swords of the Iron Legion). To the west of Reth is the forest of Nun, which is inhabited by the Autunuk tribe of hybsil.

Reth is ruled by a council of merchants, who keep tariffs here lower than in any other city in Chessenta, which makes it an extremely attractive port. Its disadvantage is its distance from the major production centers, though iron is mined in the Akana-peaks. The city is separated from the rest of Chessenta by the Gap of Reth, which is spanned by a wall (with a gate for traffic to pass through) to protect from invasion. Being good merchants, the Lords of Reth wish to stay out of armed conflicts. The Wraith of the Inner Sea, a mercenary complement of four large vessels, uses this port as its home base. The population of Reth is 35,000.

Airspur

This trading port was once one of the most important in western Chessenta, but has since been overtaken by Reth. It is still a powerful presence in the region.

Airspur is known (some say infamous) for the many half-orcs that populate it—30% of the population of the city is half-orc. The city is currently in an aggressive phase, having allied with Soorenar in its current war against Cimbar. The city fields an army of 3,000 troops, of which 500 are archers and 500 are cavalry. The city has a population of 20,000. Three notable mercenaries use Airspur as its base—the Sailors of the Crimson Sea, the War-dogs, and the Sunlords. Many of these have fought recently in Chondath and have sustained heavy losses. The lord of Airspur is Khrulis (8th-level half-orc fighter), a crafty and pragmatic, though greedy, ruler.

Cimbar

Cimbar is commonly thought of as the capital of Chessenta, the place set down by the war god Tchazzar as the center of his nation's power forever (or at least for as long as the city's kings could prevent Chessenta from deteriorating into a group of warring city-states).

Cimbar is known for its rich culture. Participation in the arts, philosophy, and music is compulsory for its citizens. The way to eternity, it is said in Cimbar, is through a sound body, an inquiring mind, and a creative spirit. The streets are clean and the buildings are beautiful. Cimbar is the quintessential symbol of a rich, prosperous city in its golden age.

The city is divided into two major sections: Old Cimbar and New Cimbar. Old Cimbar was built as a port by the Untheri 500 years before the founding of Cormyr. This section includes the Great Palace, the home of the Sceptanar in the shadow of an old Untheri pyramid, many libraries where books and works of art are kept, and the University, the largest center of learning in the Old Empires, larger than even the schools of Thoth in Gheldaneth. Cimbarians brag that it is the largest center of learning in the entire Realms.

There are three sections to the University. There is the college of mages, where magic is studied, the college of sages, where bestiaries and books of facts describe (with some contradictions) every known part of the Realms, and the artist's college, where poetry, painting, and music are taught to dozens of eager students. Studies also include mathematics and astronomy. Cimbar boasts one of the largest literacy rates in the Realms; even slaves are taught to read and write.

New Cimbar is a large cluster of residences and thriving shops. The port is the largest of any in the region. On the outskirts of the city are theaters, where plays are performed, the hippodrome, where horses and chariots race, and the arena, where athletes test their skills.

In spite of its tradition of arts, Cimbar is also a city of warriors. It has the second largest fleet in the eastern Inner Sea (only Thay's is larger), and the largest number of warships at any port in the region. The main enemy of the Cimbarian navy is not Thayvian vessels, but those of the cities of the North Coast; there have been numerous sea battles between Cimbarian and North Coast vessels as both attempt to dominate the seas and the valuable trading route.

The army of Cimbar numbers 15,000, of which there are 100 air cavalry (griffon), 100 mage artillery (3rd to 5th level), 1,300 marines, 9,000 infantry, 2,000 archers, and 2,500 cavalry. The population of the city is 90,000. There are usually at least six mercenary companies in Cimbar as well.

The king of Cimbar is the mage known only as the Sceptanar (15th-level mage); he holds the ancient scepter and crown of Tchazzar and is considered to have the best claim of all who claim to be king of Chessenta. He rules with absolute authority, though a senate elected from the land-holding males of Cimbar meets frequently to make proposals; the king usually at least listens to their advice.

Akanax

South of Cimbar is its philosophical opposite, the harsh city of Akanax.

Akanax is a city of warriors; its male citizens are bonded into the military and trained to be warriors; those incapable of fighting are slain. Men are forbidden to marry before the age of 20 and cannot live with their wives until the age of 30. Akanax scorns the arts of Cimbar but admires its fighting spirit.

The city is organized like a military camp. Women exist to serve the men, who eat at a common mess and train together constantly. Buildings are simple, practical structures without much ornamentation. Much of the population of Akanax lives outside of the city, in fields that have been converted into military camps. Children in Akanax are not raised by families, but belong to the state. Throughout its history, Akanax has had many wars; the Akanul pays regular tribute to Akanax.

Maerduuth was once a large city, until it was nearly totally destroyed in a war against Akanax 50 years ago.

Strangers are only barely tolerated in Akanax, and are generally viewed with extreme suspicion. Because of this, no mercenary companies are based in Akanax.

Occasionally warriors of Akanax desert to form their own mercenary companies; many of the mercenaries in Mulhorand are of Akanaxian origin.

The city has a population of 20,000; this is deceptive, as many of its citizens live in the camps outside of the city on its southern plains. The actual number of people in the region is 70,000. Much of the city was destroyed ten years ago in a war against Soorenar.

The army of Akanax numbers over 20,000; there are at least 5,000 archers and 15,000 infantry. It has a very small navy of ten warships. The ruler of Akanax is the absolute tyrant Hippartes (19th-level fighter); he is considered to be the finest soldier in the south.

The city is currently at peace, though it expects war with Luthcheq any time now. Soorenar has invited Akanax to join in Soorenar's attack against Cimbar; Akanax is considering the proposal, as well as an invasion of Soorenar that would give Akanax control of the River Akax.

Rodanar

Rodanar was founded by the war god Tchazzar, as Chessenta needed a fort to defend itself against incursions from the orc tribes of the Akanapeaks. Two centuries ago it was a large city, but a war against Akanax destroyed it, and the small town that was rebuilt on the site is a vassal of Akanax. It serves as a trading center for the western interior of Chessenta, and as a garrison loyal to Akanax. It is run in stoic military style by Hyurkes (8th-level fighter).

The town's population is 5,000, of which 1,000 are in the direct service of the garrison.

Soorenar

This large, aggressive port city is at the mouth of the river Akax. The lords of the city are related to the Lords of Luthcheq (though without the latter's homicidal hatred of wizards). They are currently planning a grand alliance to destroy Cimbar and unite Chessenta under Soorenar's rulership. Its allies in this enterprise are Luthcheq and Airspur. It is trying hard to persuade Akanax to join the alliance, though many grudges remain from their last war.

Soorenar is divided into two sections: East and West Soorenar, which are separated by the Akax River delta. Only a ferry service across the Akax provides transportation between them, as there are no bridges on the river. East Soorenar is the smaller of the two sections; it contains docks, storage facilities, and amenities for adventuring parties and mercenary companies. Most of the people in Soorenar live on the western side, which is heavily guarded.

Soorenar's attitude toward warfare is to purchase victory with money and treasure. It likes to buy the services of high-level wizards and use them to devastate the enemy; it is somewhat at odds with Luthcheq over this practice.

Soorenar's standing army is 5,000, of which 1,000 are cavalry, 1,000 are archers, and 3,000 are infantry. The army has been boosted to 15,000 for the current war against Cimbar. This huge increase has been accomplished by forced induction of its citizens and slaves, as well as the service of 5,000 mercenaries. The lords of Soorenar are Lord Thurik (10th-level fighter), Lady Yashur (8th-level mage), and Lord Brolkchant (8th-level fighter). These are the representatives of the three leading noble families. Any decision regarding Soorenar must be unanimous.

Luthcheq

This "city of madness" is one of the most troubled and destructive in the entire Realms. The lords of this city, the family Karanok, are devotees of the strange deity named Entropy, an entity that is devoted to the destruction of magic. As priests of Entropy, the lords of Luthcheq feel that it is their responsibility to hunt down and slay all wizards, not only within Luthcheq, but all over the Realms.

The lords of Luthcheq pay large bounties for captured wizards, who they burn at the stake in witchweed fires. Assassins in the pay of Luthcheq are stalking a number of prominent targets, most notably Elminster of Shadowdale. The lords have had secret talks with agents of the Zhentarim, in which the destruction of Elminster occupied most of the discussion, though the use of magic by the Zhentarim and the Red Wizards prevents (fortunately) the formation of two dangerous alliances.

Luthcheq is a member of the northern alliance with Soorenar and Airspur. They have not yet, however, provided troops to the war against Cimbar; secretly the lords of Luthcheq hope that the alliance and Cimbar will destroy each other and allow Luthcheq to take control of the north. Luthcheq claims that it needs all of its troops to defend against Mordulkin incursions; Mordulkin is its historic enemy even from the days before the Karanoks obtained power.

The city is divided into the Port Section, the Trading Section, the Palace Section, the Temple of Entropy, and the Slave Farms, where witchweed is grown.

Priests of Entropy wander the streets carrying censers filled with burning witchweed to purge the city of magic.

The population of Luthcheq is believed to be about 50,000; there is no accurate counting made of the citizens except for the slaves. The army of Luthcheq consists of nearly 10,000 troops, with 8,000 infantry, 1,000 archers, and 1,000 cavalry. The navy consists of 15 large warships. No mercenary companies (or sane adventurers) use Luthcheq as a base; those suspected of associating with wizards are also burned. The current lord is Maelos, high priest of Entropy (18th-level priest).

Mordulkin

This city sits on the eastern shore of the Bay of Chessenta. It is a family enclave, ruled by the Jeeda ever since the rebellion that ousted Unther from Chessenta. The city is ruled by the most powerful mage in the Jeeda family and is a haven for wizards. These things alone would earn it the enmity of the lords of Luthcheq, but the city of Mordulkin has been Luthcheq's major enemy on the trade routes and on the battlefields, and there is a good deal of enmity between the two cities that predates the rise of the Karanoks in Luthcheq.

Mordulkin is divided into sections which are run by guilds: The merchants' guild runs the merchant district, the craft guilds organize the crafts district, and the builders' guild runs the residential district. There is a central mercenary guild, and all adventuring companies and mercenary forces that enter Mordulkin must register with the guild within 24 hours or face imprisonment.

The city is wealthy and is subsequently home to the largest organized thieves' guild in the south. The second largest port facilities in Chessenta (only Cimbar's are larger) are located here. Mordulkin tries to keep its relations with the North Coast cities cordial, unlike other Chessentan cities. The king of Mordulkin is not interested in uniting Chessenta and will not willingly join an alliance against Cimbar.

The population of Mordulkin is about 35,000. The army of Mordulkin has 8,000 members—6,000 infantry and 1,000 each of archers and cavalry.

For every 100 members, there is also one mage, level 1-5 (roll 1d6, subtract 1, treat all results of "0" as a 1st-level mage). The city has an extensive school of mages, but not as large as Cimbar's. The current king of Mordulkin is Hercubes (12th-level mage).

Mourktar

The city of Mourktar is a free city on the edge of the flat, sandy plains of Threskel. Mourktar claims to be independent of Chessenta, while the other cities claim that Mourktar is part of Chessenta. Since the other Chessentan cities are generally too far from Mourktar to threaten it, Mourktar is for all purposes an independent city.

Mourktar is a small but aggressive trading city. It has a large port facility to handle goods for the farmers and herdsmen of Threskel. Small mining communities in the Riders to the Sky Mountains sometimes ship their goods to Mourktar, as it is closer than Mordulkin to the major trade centers of Bezantur and Sultim. Troubles in Unther, however, have made the Sultim-Messemprar-Mourktar trade route less attractive to traders in the last century. There have also been major problems with pirates and the sahuagin.

Mourktar is full of traders and mercenaries who hope to profit from the riots of Messemprar, as well as from what they hope will be an upcoming civil war in Unther.

Mourktar's population is 10,000. It has a permanent army of 500 soldiers, and it drafts a force of 2,000 from the city's population and the surrounding region. In spite of its mercantile character, political power in Mourktar is held by the king, who is descended from the lords who led Mourktar's break from Unther. The current ruler of the city is king Theris (8th-level fighter). Theris is dying without an heir, and his god has instructed him to call a tournament to decide who will be his successor (see the "The Name of the Game" scenario).

Thamor

Thamor is a small trade city in the interior of Threskel. It was founded by merchants from Mourktar and Messemprar as a free city where goods could be exchanged between Unther and Mulhorand without duty or tax. Both Unther and Mulhorand objected, so Thamor was forced to abide by the trade laws of the two neighbors.

This certainly hurt its growth, but Thamor is still a sizable settlement of 3,000 people, mostly merchants trading goods with the miners in the Riders to the Sky Mountains and farmers in southern Threskel. The city is subject to controls by Mourktar. Its leader is Leppidon (3rd-level fighter).

CURRENT ECONOMY OF CHESSENTA

“The fields are rich with grain and fruit, the cattle are fat, the mines are rich, and the traders to the North are angry.”

—The Sceptanar of Cimbar

Were Chessenta a united nation under a wise king, it is said that it would easily dominate the Inner Sea area through economics. With the exception of the Greenfields of Mulhorand, there is no region of the Old Empires that is more fertile than the Akanul. The hills and mountains are teeming with valuable metals—iron, silver, copper, and gold. There are forests of fruit—trees and fields of grapevines. In short, Chessenta has all of the materials to be a trading power of the first rank.

However, given the disunity of Chessenta, it is unlikely that this potential southern super-nation will ever emerge; even if a conqueror did unite the city-states again as Tchazzar once did, he could only do so with a war that would devastate Chessenta for years to come.

There is no nationalism. Chessentans pride themselves on being members of their city-states, not of Chessenta. The city-states continue to fight, against each other as well as against their rivals on the North Coast.

This independence applies not just to city-states, but to individual farmers and merchants. Farms are run by a freeholder, who uses slaves and serfs to perform his labors. A farm in Chessenta emphasizes quality over quantity, which makes the produce more valuable. Much of the foodstuffs produced in Chessenta comes from the Akanul; the Akanul feeds Reth, Airspur, Cimbar, Soorenar, and Akanax. (Most cities keep a reserve of magically preserved food in case of war; this reserve can last up to three years.) There are farms north of the Akanamere, but they produce cattle and grapes for export, which brings great wealth to these farmers.

Merchants form merchant companies in one city, and try to ally themselves with the merchant guilds in other cities so they may have a broader market to sell their goods.

Chessentan governments usually place a 15% tax on all exports, which accumulates as traders travel from city to city. This tax ensures revenue for the cities of Chessenta, which enables them to commission artists to make great statues—or mercenaries to tear them down.

The major imports of Chessenta include horses, which are used by the cavalry of various armies and mercenaries. (Oddly enough, many people think of Chessenta as a center of mercenary activity, so when mercenaries pass through to Mulhorand or Unther, they are always thought of as “Chessentan mercenaries.”) In times of shortage, Chessenta purchases food from Thay. Chessenta also imports slaves and occasionally exports its criminals to Thay to work there. The nobles of Chessenta also import foods and products not common to their land: cheese, pork, glass, and perfumes. Chessenta relies on other nations to supply the bulk of its magical weaponry, and enchanted trinkets from Thay (such as dancing figurines with musical accompaniment) are popular among the nobles.

Most cities have a reserve of treasure consisting of a large supply of gold, silver, and jewelry from the days when Unther first built the cities. This reserve is used in emergencies and enables the cities to pay for high-level wizards to assist them with magic in times of wars. Some reserves of treasure are hidden or inaccessible (see the “The Eater of Magic” scenario for one example).

Some cities have been plundered and have lost their treasure (most notably Akanax). Others are spending it so quickly that they will likely soon run short of funds (Luthcheq is paying large bounties for mages).

The Crafts of Chessenta

Chessenta has several interesting exports. The first is Chessentan wine, which is said to be among the finest in the Realms and is heavily in demand in the west for its rich character. The second is statues and art. The people of Chessenta, especially those in Cimbar, believe that great art is the highest triumph of humanity. Sculptors in Chessenta venerate the human form, boasting that they have “taken man and made him as the gods.” Chessentan artists receive large commissions to make statues of prominent individuals and give them heroic qualities. Chessentan sculptors typically work in granite, which is imported from Mulhorand; the sculptures are painted when they are finished.

The quality of Chessentan iron is considered to be quite high. It is in demand from smiths in the west. There are also talented smiths in Chessenta who make finished products, most notably in Akanax and Maerduuth. Chessentan gold and silver are major exports.

Sheep are raised for their wool on the plains north of Akanamere. Olive oil is also a major export.

Chessentans rely on a network of merchants to provide them with their goods. Chessentan merchant companies place agents in distant lands to look for new products and markets and to represent the Chessentan merchant guilds to their nobility. There is an alliance between Chessenta and Durpar merchants; since a journey across the Inner Sea is considered to be too long even for industrious merchants, Chessentan merchants buy the surplus of the Durpar merchants and then resell it in Cormyr and Sembia for a large profit.

Coinage

The governments of each Chessentan city-state mint their own coins, typically from silver and gold. The silver piece is called a talent, and the gold piece is known as a drake. The coins are usually traded by merchants; any attempt to debase coins results in the merchants refusing to accept them as payment. Coins are minted with a ruler’s face on one side, and a divine symbol (usually commemorating a battlefield victory) on the reverse.

CURRENT POLITICS OF CRESSENTA

Regional Rulers

The land of Chessenta is controlled by the city-states, which do not accept a central governing body or ruler; the rulers of Cimbar, Akanax, and Mordulkin all claim to be the true Overlord of Chessenta and add this to their other titles; except for the purposes of protocol (where it creates strains between the governments), this claim is meaningless.

There are no regional divisions in Chessenta; city governments claim as much territory as they can reasonably govern, and sometimes more. Where territorial claims clash, there is frequently war. Territories and small communities are usually ruled by a local strongman or council. These territorial governments sometimes offer allegiance to city governments in exchange for troops in times of need. In wartime, the territories are expected to provide troops to the central government, but few ever do (though they complain quite violently when they are neglected by their parent city).

Cities are ruled by their traditional rulers, who are known as kings. The kings must usually listen to the advice of a council, which discusses the city's problems in a private forum. Council members are usually elected from property-holding male citizens. The king can ignore their advice, but when the advice is ignored too often, that king may be ousted from power. Akanax and Luthcheq do not have traditional councils, but they are run as absolute tyrannies with lip-service paid from military subordinates (in the case of Akanax) and family members (in the case of Luthcheq).

The politics of the cities in Chessenta are subject to frequent change. The current relationships between the cities can be described using the following terms:

Subjugated means that another city has gained control over the city being described.

Enemy means the city is at war with the city named.

Adversary means the two cities are traditional enemies, but they are not currently at war.

Neutral means the cities have no particular historical hatred.

Rival means that there is a historic trade competition between the two cities, but no significant history of military conflict.

Allied means that they are currently allies, but not necessarily strong allies.

All the cities not mentioned in each city's listing are neutral to that city.

The current major political question in Chessenta involves the position of Mordulkin and Akanax regarding the current war. Mordulkin is strongly tempted to attack its traditional enemy

Luthcheq, and should Akanax take the opportunity to avenge its losses in the last war against Soorenar, there could well be full-scale war in Chessenta between the Northern Alliance (Airspur, Soorenar, and Luthcheq) and the Triangle (Cimbar, Akanax, and Mordulkin) Alliance. Most military experts believe that such a war would certainly result in the defeat of the Northern Alliance and a hastening of what is viewed as an inevitable conflict between the two major powers of Akanax and Cimbar.

However, the city-states are not each other's only enemies. The cities of the North Coast are bitter trade rivals, but they have their own problems with an attack from Thayvian fire elementals (see the scenario "Fire Time" in FR6, Dreams of the Red Wizards).

Unther would like to avenge the loss of its territory, but the Untheric army also has more pressing problems. Should the Triangle Alliance decide to attack, they would probably defeat the Northern Alliance. Such a conflict would divide Chessenta into three powerful political regions: the West Coast, ruled by Cimbar, the East Coast, ruled by Mordulkin, and the Interior, ruled by Akanax.

The following is a brief description of the politics of each of the city-states of Chessenta.

Reth

Reth is ruled by a council of merchants, the leader of which is Murzig Hekkatayn (3rd-level mage). There are a number of important issues that concern Reth at this time:

Separatism: There is a groundswell of support for formal separation from Chessenta to officially become part of Chondath. This initiative is not supported by the council, which believe that the status quo works and that Reth doesn't need closer ties with Chondath.

Orcs: Raids from the orcs of the Akanapeaks are becoming more frequent. There are a number of people who wish to strike back at the orcs. The rulers realize that Reth would be destroyed in a war with the orcs.

Airspur: A number of traders would like Reth to ally with Cimbar against its old enemy, Airspur, in the current war. They believe that they would get a larger share of the merchant traffic with Delthuntle and Altumbel if Airspur suffered a major defeat. The council is strongly against a war with Airspur, if only because wars are expensive.

Likely Course: Reth will stay neutral in the Cimbar-Airspur conflict. They will not attack the orcs, though they will bolster their defenses. Reth will not join Hlath at this time, but close ties will continue between the two cities.

Airspur

This city is ruled by a military council led by the half-orc Khrulis (8th-level fighter). The town was previously a theocracy, belonging to the priests of Bhaelros (known as Talos in the north); these priests sacrificed a maiden every month to their deity and were extremely unpopular. Khrulis and his half-orcs are actually a considerable improvement, though there is a great deal of discontent in this city. Sources of dissatisfaction include the following:

The half-orcs: Many refugees of a bloody civil war between the orc tribes from the Akanapeaks came to live in Airspur. They are not particularly beloved, though they hold a lot of political power. Many humans oppose the war with Cimbar, and believe the half-orcs are sending the humans to die in battle so the Flaming Spike orcs can take over the city. This is actually nonsense, but human bigotry against orcs runs quite deep.

The war with Cimbar: There are many people in Airspur who have friends in Cimbar, and the war is not popular. So far pressure from the military, which is firmly controlled by Khrulis, has kept the peace. But this is not a popular war.

The priests of Bhaelros: To alleviate his present troubles, Khrulis is using the hated priests of Bhaelros as scapegoats. People opposed to his programs are accused of being supporters of the sacrifice. People who are vocal in their opposition to Khrulis are sometimes charmed into performing Bhaelrosian ceremonies in public. In this way Khrulis can easily discredit his enemies. So far this has worked, but there is a danger that the cult of Bhaelros may become an acceptable opposition force (i.e., Khrulis may force people to join the cult of Bhaelros because it provides the only opposition!). All of the real priests of Bhaelros were killed long ago or fled into the wilderness.

Likely Course: Khrulis is already discovering that he is not likely to win the war against Cimbar. He is also starting to realize that it's ludicrous to wage a politically unpopular war for no gain.

He will probably sue for peace with Cimbar, perhaps offering them military assistance against the Northern Alliance. Half-orc tension will continue to grow, and refugees may flee to Reth or build a new city on the northern shores of the Akanamere. Khrulis will likely survive, though certain anti-orc factions may hire adventurers to assassinate him "to free Airspur from half-orc tyranny."

Cimbar

Cimbar is one of the most stable cities in Chessenta, with very few internal dissents. It is led by a king known as the Sceptanar (15th-level mage), who is advised by a large council.

Despite its relative stability, Cimbar has a few problems:

The war with the Northern Alliance: The current strategy of the Sceptanar is to let the enemy come to Cimbar, use Cimbar's naval advantage to keep the food supplies coming in, and wait for the alliance to fall apart (or for Mordulkin and Akanax to join the war against the Alliance). This is a good strategy but not a popular one, as many feel that the city should go on the offensive.

The Mob: This is a group of peasants and mercenaries and young people who like to get together to listen to demagogues, shout, and occasionally riot, pillage, and murder. This is the dark side of Cimbar's enlightenment. The Mob members don't see themselves as a problem; instead they think everyone else is the problem. It is fairly easy to manipulate them into violent acts, though they have a strong distrust for foreigners.

The priests of Tchazzar: These priests are proclaiming that Tchazzar will return soon to lead Chessenta into a new golden age. Few people take them seriously, though their demagoguery makes them a hero to The Mob.

Slavery: A number of noted philosophers have been calling for a ban on slavery, which they view as immoral. Most people ignore them.

Likely Course: There is no real challenge to the Sceptanar's authority, unless Tchazzar did come back, which is not outside the realm of possibility since he is not dead (see the "Religion" section).

If no one comes to their aid in the current war, it is quite likely that Airspur will pull out and that Cimbar will then go on to crush Soorenar. The Mob and slavery will continue as they have done for many years.

Akanax

The city of tents, as it is referred to in contempt by the victorious Soorenar, is a military dictatorship. Any who disobey the orders of King Hippartes (19th-level fighter) is either executed or banished. Hippartes wants to stay out of the current conflict for as long as possible, in the hopes that Soorenar and Cimbar will weaken each other. Some generals support an attack on Soorenar, while a few view Cimbar as the major threat and are pushing for Akanax to join the Northern Alliance.

Hippartes's goal is to improve Akanax's markets and complete the rebuilding of the city.

Likely Course: There is no one who even remotely threatens the control of King Hippartes; unless he should die of a disease or in battle, Akanax will remain stable. Akanax will eventually join Cimbar against Soorenar, but the two cities will argue over the future of that port. There are two possibilities: 1) Akanax allows Cimbar to control Soorenar with the condition that Akanaxian goods pass through without tariffs, and that Soorenar provide financial assistance for the reconstruction of Akanax or 2) Cimbar and Akanax go to war, with the winner becoming the dominant power in Chessenta for at least one generation.

Luthcheq

The city of madness has many political problems, all of them having to do with the mad Karanoks. This clan is determined to push their plan to destroy all mages in the Realms, regardless of how impossible their task may be.

To understand Luthcheq, it is necessary to know the Karanoks. Here is a brief summary of prominent family members and their abilities.

Maelos (18th-level priest of Entropy): He is a bitter old man who sees magic everywhere and knows only one way to deal with it. While he is the figurehead ruler of the city, most of the affairs of the city are run by his son.

Jaerios (13th-level priest of Entropy): Jaerios is the real ruler of Luthcheq. He loves to exercise power. He is not as driven to hate wizards as his father Maelos (though he still believes in the creed of the Karanoks), but he enjoys watching them burn. He is a debauched megalomaniac in the classic CE mold.

Naeros (12th-level fighter): Naeros is Jaerios's son. He is arrogant beyond belief. He loves to walk the street with his personal guard of high-level fighters and priests of Entropy, watching people run away.

Naeros is known as the Marker, because he likes to disfigure his victims before they die. Naeros believes that it is impossible for him to die, and that he can do anything he wants. He is an absolutely evil monster who particularly hates members of adventuring parties. He has been badly spoiled by his father and his grandfather; if anyone should harm or kill him, the wrath of the entire Karanok clan would fall upon them.

Saestra (vampiress): Saestra, known as the Lady of the Night, was locked in a crypt by her brother as part of a cruel joke and left there for nine days and nine nights before the crypt was opened again. By the time she exited, she was a vampiress. She has successfully concealed this fact from her family even when she manipulated them into killing her vampire master. She has two personalities—one is sweet and totally innocent and loving, and the other is a savage killer. Either personality can come out at a moment's notice, depending on her hunger.

These are only a few of the members of the enchanting Karanok family. The DM can always come up with new members; as one Karanok is killed, a new Karanok will surface to take his place, each more repulsive than the last. There are a number of specific problems that Luthcheq faces that go beyond the Karanoks:

Merchant Revolt: The taxes in Luthcheq are quite high, and the merchants are tired of it. They may soon go on strike and withdraw their services unless the Karanoks agree to lower taxes to the same level as other cities in Chessenta.

The Magus Society: This is a group of mages and mage-friends devoted to the destruction of the Karanoks and to the destruction of the witchweed fields.

They are a secret society; unfortunately they have already been discovered by spies for the Karanoks. The spies are planning to trap the mages, as soon as they make a contact with a powerful foreign wizard.

Border Disputes with Mordulkin: The major enemy of Luthcheq, Mordulkin, is active on the borders of its territory. This could easily escalate into full-scale war.

Likely Course: The Karanoks have made too many enemies. They will be killed, most likely by adventurers trying to rescue or avenge friends. Luthcheq will be conquered by Mordulkin, which may destroy the city to prevent it from bothering anyone again.

Mordulkin

This is one of the most stable cities in Chessenta, ruled by the mage Hercubes of the Jedea family (12th-level mage). This is a large city with powerful guilds, which makes it perhaps the most "western" of all of the cities in the entire Old Empires. Politically, it wants to become the largest power east of the Adder River and develop the region into a city state that will rival Cimbar in wealth and culture. Luthcheq is seen as its major enemy, and the lords of Mordulkin would love nothing better than an opportunity to burn Luthcheq to the ground and sow its fields with salt so nothing could grow there again.

There are a number of important issues in Mordulkin. The most important is the war; even though Mordulkin is not yet involved, the people of Mordulkin for the most part believe that there can never be peace while a stone of Luthcheq stands.

Every day, a mob of hundreds of people march on the royal palace, chanting "We want war!" King Hercubes is hoping that Luthcheq will overextend itself in its war against Cimbar, and then Mordulkin can strike with a decisive advantage.

Likely Course: Mordulkin will declare war and suffer heavy losses. Luthcheq will be destroyed, but those Karanoks who escape the destruction will hire assassins to kill the lords of Mordulkin.

Mourktar

The city-state of King Theris has been a quiet place until very recently, when the king announced his imminent death and a tournament to replace him (see the "The Name of the Game" scenario).

The Tournament: The majority of the guilds believe that a tournament to replace Theris is insane, as Mourktar could be stuck with a totally inept ruler and quickly end up as part of Unther, Chessenta, or even Thay. The army, however, is fiercely loyal to Theris and is willing to put up with the successor produced by a tournament; if he's the wrong man for the job, they feel they can always replace him later.

The Sahuagin: The sahuagin of the kingdom of Aleaxtis are a major threat to the continued safety of Mourktar. They sink trading ships and raid fishing boats and coastal farms. The people (especially fishermen and farmers) are demanding that the sahuagin be stopped.

Theris knows that the city does not have the military might to stop an attack by the sahuagin.

Likely Course: Anything could happen with a tournament deciding the fate of Mourktar. A great leader could bring about a rebirth of trade with Mulhorand and Thay, resulting in renewed prosperity; a terrible leader might destroy the city.

SOORENAR

The rulers of Soorenar are descended from the three founding families that defeated the armies of Unther and pushed them out of Chessenta. Soorenar is an aggressive city whose lords believe that it is destined to rule Chessenta; it is a city of grand, unrealistic designs. Its rulers view Soorenar as the dominant power of the region due to its recent triumphs against Akanax. They believe that once they conquer Cimbar, the rest of the nation will bow to them.

Given that Airspur and Luthcheq are willing to follow its lead, this isn't a total fantasy, but the lords of Soorenar have underestimated the might of Cimbar. They have also seriously underestimated the resolve of Akanax, which Lord Brolkchant believes is a conquered people who will obey their masters in Soorenar when ordered to attack Cimbar. Fortunately for Soorenar, the other lords are less provocative and believe that the cooperation of Akanax can be acquired through diplomacy.

There are no major centers of internal dissent in Soorenar. There is a family of werecrocodiles that inhabits the sewers and comes up to eat people; so far the werecrocodiles just eat peasants and tradesmen, so the nobles have ignored them.

Likely Course: With the war against Cimbar stalled and Airspur's support uncertain, Soorenar will hire high-level mages to attack Cimbar itself. This will likely alienate Luthcheq and antagonize Akanax by bringing back memories of their own bombardment. The war will end in a crushing defeat for Soorenar, the lords will flee, and the city will either be destroyed or occupied. Akanax and Cimbar may go to war over its control.

Laws of Chessenta

The legal system in Chessenta uses a revised version of Unther's Code of Enlil. There is a long list of punishable offenses, but Chessenta adds the concept that a man convicted of a capital crime has the right to defend himself before a jury, which must render a unanimous verdict. According to the laws of Chesenta, when a tyrant oppresses the people, a person who slays him is blameless. Some say this is the most enlightened concept of justice in the Realms.

Unfortunately, not all of the cities in the Old Empires follow this code. Sentencing in Luthcheq is decided by the whims of the Karanoks. Sentencing in Akanax is decided by a less-than-unbiased military tribunal. However in Reth, Airspur, Cimbar, Soorenar, Mordulkin, and Mourktar, the revised Code of Enlil is applicable.

Punishments for crimes are not as harsh in Chessenta as in Unther; they consist of four levels: fines, imprisonment, banishment, and execution. Murder and treason are punishable by execution; public troublemaking is punishable by banishment (starting a fight or causing a riot are examples of troublemaking).

RELIGION OF CHESSENTA

"The gods forgive Chessenta, but we have better things to do with our time than pray."

—Hercubes of Mordulkin

Chessenta has no basic alignment; religion is not as important to Chessenta as it is to theocracies such as Unther and Mulhorand. Nonetheless, religious worship has its place in this society.

Anhur

God of Might, Warrior of the South

Anhur is the same deity as in Mulhorand. He has been brought back into Chessenta by mercenary companies who have spread his worship. Mordulkin is its center, but many of the soldiers of Akanax have adopted him as well, though he is chaotic by military standards. His Chessentan worshipers portray him as a southern power, not a Mulhorand deity, and the current persecution of the cult of Anhur in Mulhorand has bolstered his image as a non-Mulhorand deity elsewhere. The priests of Horus-Re do not like this, as it will be harder to displace Anhur from Mulhorand if he has a broad base of worship.

Assuran

Lord of the Three Thunders, God of Revenge, Doombringer, Hoar

Status: LN, Lesser Power, Nirvana

Symbol: Three lightning bolts

The worship of Assuran is an ancient one; he is an Untheric deity whose worship was driven from that realm by the priests of Ramman, but who was revived in Chessenta. The center of his popularity is Akanax, among the officers (many of the soldiers are turning to the worship of Anhur).

Azuth

The High One, Patron of Mages

Status: LN, Demipower, Arcadia

Symbol: A human hand, forefinger pointing upward, outlined in a nimbus of blue fire

Azuth is worshiped by mages in Cimbar and Mordulkin, the two centers of magic in Chessenta. Once every year, his worshipers sacrifice specially created magical items in his honor. His form has only been seen once in Chessenta, in the company of the archmage Heptios. The main temple of Azuth is in Cimbar.

Entropy

The Great Nothing, Swallower of Gods, Magechill

Status: NE, Greater Power, Unknown

Symbol: A field of pure black

Entropy is the deity of the Karanoks. It is an extremely weird entity, a gigantic sphere of annihilation that no force—divine, magical, or mortal—may stop.

Worship of Entropy consists of eldritch rites and human sacrifices, preferably of wizards. Priests of Entropy are brought up to hate magic.

The only known temple in the Realms dedicated to Entropy is in Luthcheq; the temple is encased in a large hemisphere of black glass.

Lathander

Morning Lord, God of Youth, Vitality, Self-perfection, Athletics

Status: NG, Greater Power, Elysium

Symbol: A wooden disk of rosy pink hue, or a statue of two wrestlers

Lathander is worshiped in Chessenta, though not as the commander of creativity (that sphere belongs to Melith) but as the perfect athlete.

Sacrifices to Lathander begin all athletic competitions, and athletes pray to him to ensure that they perform at their best. Lathander is portrayed in statuary as a runner or a wrestler, competing against great heroes. He sometimes comes to test great athletes; he never loses, but if his opponent demonstrates great ability, he grants a boon. Lathander's priesthood is small, but many pray at his shrines.

Tchazzar

Father of Chessenta, the Invincible Warrior

Status: CE, Demipower, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: Red dragon against a mountain

Tchazzar was the father of Chessenta. He was also a polymorphed red dragon, who began an interesting experiment.

Tchazzar believed that if he were to take on human form, unite and rule Chessenta for a time, and then disappear mysteriously, a cult would be created to worship him. It did.

Tchazzar is still alive, and he feels that the power of his followers beliefs will give him god-like powers. Tchazzar is a great wyrm red dragon with the abilities of a demipower (use the incarnation abilities in the "Religions of Mulhorand" section). Priests of Tchazzar may cast only 5th-level or lower spells. Tchazzar's worship is concentrated in Cimbar and Soorenar.

Waukeen

Merchant's Friend, Goddess of Trade, Money, Protector of Traders

Status: N, Lesser Power, Concordant Opposition

Symbol: A woman's full face or profile within a circle of gold

Waukeen is the most popular deity of the middle class in Chessenta. She is worshiped as the protector of traders by traveling merchants, who have spread her worship as far south as Durpar.

There are temples to Waukeen across Chessenta; the largest is in Reth.

PERSONALITIES OF CHESSENTA

Heptios

Cimbar
17th-level Mage
NG, Lathander
Human male

The most powerful native magician in Chessenta is Heptios of Cimbar. Heptios sees himself as a philosopher; he has abandoned the wizard's life to wander the streets of Cimbar and speak to the crowds. Heptios believes that rational thought must always overcome emotion, that passions lead people along irresponsible and dangerous paths.

Heptios is despised by the Mob (and the feeling is mutual); the Mob has tried to kill him several times but, due to his cube of force, they have never been able to touch him.

Heptios leads a small band of philosophers, known as the Heptain. They teach about the importance of rationalism and philosophy over superstition. Heptios has been linked to a secret society known as the Numbers Cult, which attempts to translate magic into mathematics and then create equations that will conquer the world. Heptios has disavowed any involvement in this cult, whose basic premise is based on a fallacy.

Heptios lives with his friends in small homes, moving from house to house. He has his own quarters in the University where he keeps his magical items and spells, but he rarely visits it; he prefers the company of people and interesting conversation to the isolation of magic. He is a short old man, fat and bald; he wears brown robes and a hood.

Hippartes

Akanax
19th-level Fighter
LN, Assuran
Human male

The current king of Akanax is its greatest warrior—Hippartes. He first distinguished himself in a number of wars against Maerduuth, and he was responsible for the final victory of Akanax that brought the city to its supremacy in the Akanamere region. But then Hippartes became involved in politics, fell into disgrace, and was banished from the city. He worked as an adventurer for a time (a profession that he holds in contempt these days).

Eventually he learned that Akanax was faring badly in its war against Soorenar. He gathered together a small army and marched across Unther and Chessenta to join in the battle.

Hippartes then saved Akanax from being totally burned by Soorenar. The ruling council, against the advice of Hippartes, sued for a shameful peace against Soorenar; they were soon ousted by soldiers who made Hippartes their king.

Hippartes believes that through discipline and courage, Akanax can become the major power in Chessenta. He is taking steps to guide Akanax to that destiny over the long term. He will bring Akanax into the Cimbar-Soorenar war, but not before it is to Akanax's maximum benefit. He would like control of Soorenar when the war is over, but if that isn't possible, he'd settle for improved access to trading markets.

Hippartes is a gruff man who tends to intimidate people. He has three sons, Phillipus (10th-level fighter), Cassarian (8th-level fighter), and Themothys (7th-level fighter), who serve as his chief lieutenants. He is a strong man in his early 50s with dark red hair.

Kreodo

Reth
9th-level Fighter/6th-level Thief
N, Assuran
Half-orc female

Kreodo is the leader of the Wraith of the Inner Sea, which is essentially a group of privateers. She began her long career as a slave of the Flaming Spike orc tribes, then escaped and fled to Reth.

After numerous adventures, she made her way to Mordulkin and joined the thieves' guild. She decided that she would like to live on the sea, so she purchased a ship, hired a crew, and became a pirate.

Kreodo appears to be almost entirely human, with long, black hair and blue eyes (very rare for a half-orc). She is a cruel enemy, but usually treats her victims with courtesy; if they surrender, she'll make certain they are treated fairly until they can be returned home.

Therescales

Luthcheq
3rd-level Mage/10th-level Thief
NE, Entropy
Human male

Therescales is an agent of Jaerios Karanok; though he is a practiced mage, he is a mage who is willing to betray the Mage Society for the promise of power. Therescales (pronounced Thur-ESK-el-eez) poses as a lawful neutral mage in the society. He is urging the society to bring in powerful mages from other nations to deal with the Karanoks (of course he's leading them into a trap).

Therescales enjoys betraying people for fun and profit; he is also a coward who will cringe and confess to anything if threatened with physical force. Since it is likely he will meet characters involved in rescuing friends from Luthcheq, here are his stats:

AC: 1
HIT POINTS: 30
THACO: 16
#AT: 1
DMG/ATT: By weapon
STR 12 DEX 17 CON 14 INT 16 WIS 11
CHA 12
SD: Ring of false alignment

Therescales wears bracers of defense, AC 4 and has a ring of false alignment tuned to lawful neutral; this masks his true alignment and makes any alignment detection magic read lawful neutral.

Therescales is a young, thin blond man (he claims to be a half-elf) with a dark cloak and a dagger at his belt.

MERCENARY COMPANIES OF CHESSENTA

Chessenta is famous for, among other things, the large number of mercenary companies that flock from across the Inner Seas to fight in its conflicts.

Some of the mercenary companies have achieved reputations that have gone beyond the borders of Chessenta. These companies are detailed here.

The Wrath of The Inner Sea

This is a fleet of four ships that serve as privateers along the coast of Chessenta. Their commander is the half-orc "Sea Queen" Kreodo, who is documented in the "Personalities" section.

Her ships are the following:

Sea Queen (dromond): 200 Crew, 50 Marines, and eight 3rd-level mages and five 6th-level mages. This Kreodo's flagship, captained by Kreodo herself. The first mate is Rutters (8th-level fighter).

Sea Horse (dromond): 200 Crew, 30 Marines, and five 4th-level mages and one 9th-level mage. This ship is commanded by Captain Morgalshym (11th-level thief), and its first mate is Brawn (8th-level fighter). The mage is Curnetheres, an outlaw of Luthcheq who decided to join the crew to get revenge against the city.

Sea Jewel (dromond): 200 Crew, 100 Marines, and three 5th-level mages. This ship is a heavy marine support vessel. Its captain is Bendensar (6th-level thief), ex-thieves' guild assistant of Mor-dulkin, and his first mate is Lorien (5th-level mage), a female elf who ran away from Yuirwood for a life of adventure.

Sea Quest (dromond): 200 Crew, 50 Marines, and two 7th-level mages. This is a fast attack vessel whose mages have gust of wind spells for the sails; the ship has a reinforced hull for ramming. This vessel is meant to cut off a ship if it tries to flee. Its captain is Sturion (10th-level fighter) and his first mate is Perithor (7th-level fighter).

When the Sea Queen's fleet gets within attack range of a vessel, they fly her colors (a black crown against a blood red field) and attack. Their favorite tactic is to try to surround their prey from all sides, then close in for the kill.

The Renegades

This mercenary group is formed from soldiers exiled from Akanax. It is led by the infamous Helyos (13th-level fighter, see the "Name of the Game" scenario for his stats). The full complement of the renegades is as follows: 70 cavalry (F3, lance, AC 2 with shield), 20 infantry (F2, long sword, AC 4), and 90 archers (F1, long bow and broad sword, AC 8). Lieutenants of the company include Pyrimestes (10th-level fighter) and Hamilcar (8th-level fighter). There are ten 1st-level mages who stay behind the infantry and cast sleep spells behind a shield wall. The company uses heavy warhorses.

The Renegades are known for their ruthlessness when they pillage their victims, and for demanding a high price (double normal price for mercenaries). Their reputation makes them the subject of fear throughout Chessenta. They have no base city; they wander Chessenta in search of opportunity and plunder. They have most recently been employed by Soorenar, though they are currently at Mount Thulbane for the Mourktar tournament, where Helyos hopes to become king of Mourktar.

Sailors of The Crimson Sea

This mercenary company recently saw action in Chondath at the battle of Thurgabanteth and had many casualties.

Their name is an elaborate metaphor: "the crimson sea" refers to a bloody battlefield, and "sailors" refers to soldiers who ply their trade on that crimson sea.

Their current complement is as follows: 60 cavalry (F2, lance, AC 2), 20 infantry (F2, long sword, AC 4), 60 infantry (F3, long sword, AC 2), and 40 archers (F1, long bow, AC 8). Their leaders are Lhrek Jarsyn (7th-level fighter) and his assistant Iarnan Chall (7th-level wizard).

The Sailors pride themselves on being on the "right side" of the conflicts they become involved in, though they never work for free.

The Society of The Sword

This is the largest and most famous mercenary force in Chessenta, currently based in Cimbar. Its complement includes the following: 200 cavalry (F4, long sword, AC 2), 100 infantry (F4, long sword, AC 2), 500 infantry (F2, long sword, AC 2), and 200 archers (F2, long bow, AC 7). There is also a complement of five 5th-level and ten 3rd-level mages, and the wizard Belvorides (11th-level illusionist). The company is led by Stilmus (13th-level fighter) and his lieutenants Thareus (10th-level fighter) and Aronidas (8th-level elven fighter/mage).

The society's first rule is that a good mercenary should be worth twice the price he charges. Stilmus is obsessed with honor and challenges to that honor. He is a hated enemy of Helyos, who was his lieutenant in one of his old mercenary companies; Helyos tried to kill Stilmus to gain control of that company.

CULTURE OF CHESSENTA

“Our love of things of the mind and things of beauty should not lead to extravagance, nor to softness of the mind or body. In Chessenta, we avoid all excesses.”

—Heptios

Of all of the human nations in the known Realms, no other nation has ever achieved the cultural level that Cimbar and many of the other cities in Chessenta have attained. This may seem like an outlandish claim, but even in Waterdeep, philosophy, astronomy, poetry, theater and other forms of culture seem backward compared to the achievements of Chessenta.

The people of Chessenta are known for their confidence and energy. For the most part, this energy is spent on useless wars, as the city-states try to avenge long-ago defeats, or fight to acquire access to trade routes. On the other hand, the peoples of Chessenta, especially those of Cimbar, are filled with a tremendous love of literature and beautiful things, of knowledge and free-thinking.

In the west, exploring the nature of the universe is done in a very practical style: one travels to the outer planes, makes observations, and then writes a treatise to be kept in the dusty library of a sage such as Elminster. In Chessenta, study of the nature of the universe is done in an abstract, philosophical way. One need not wander the planes to discover the nature of things; one can find it in the structure of a blade of grass.

Theater, which is not a major art form elsewhere in the Realms, thrives in Chessenta. Authors produce plays (tragedies, comedies, etc.) for acting companies, which perform for large audiences in the theater districts of Cimbar, Soorenar, and Mordulkin. Poets read poetry in public squares, and philosophers debate in the centers of busy streets.

For warriors, the major pastime is athletic competition, which is extremely important for the people of Chessenta; all wars cease during the one-week period every two years that the Thulbanian Games take place.

Competitions are always individual events, as Chessentans prefer solitary heroic figures to teams. Champions of the games are great heroes in their home cities; a slave can become as famous as a noble if he performs well.

The most popular sport is wrestling, which comes in two styles: traditional (equivalent to modern greco-roman) and the pankration, which is a combination of wrestling and kick boxing in a fight to the finish; only biting, eye-gouging, and breaking fingers is illegal. Other sports that are popular are chariot racing (over a grueling obstacle course), boxing, running, long jumping, javelin throwing, and the discus. During the nights, poets and theater groups entertain crowds, and there are great feasts. In feasting, even the Mulhorandi are not as adept as the Chessentans.

Though Chessentans are not great monument builders, they are nonetheless considered the most skilled architects in the Realms. Their main palaces are built in what is known as temple-style: a large square roof supported by elaborately decorated columns. These buildings are typically made from marble or granite.

As Chessenta has a slightly cooler climate than the other nations of the Old Empires, its people are usually clothed in long, flowing robes and tunics. Athletes compete in the nude, which non-Chessentans believe to be very strange (this contributes to the widespread perception that Chessenta is a nation of wild men).

Language of Chessenta

Chessentans once spoke Untheric, but abandoned that language 200 years ago for the common tongue of the west (using a variation on Untheric writing in their written records, though they have reduced the runes to an alphabetical writing scheme). Untheric is often known as a second language, if only to understand ancient writing.

ADVENTURES IN THE OLD EMPIRES

Snake Dance

Location: This scenario takes place in a large city in the west. It is meant to introduce the players to some of the conflicts of Mulhorand.

The Rumor: There is a strange, evil southern cult making its presence known in the west. This group is rumored to be making contact with the Zhentarim and the Cult of the Dragon.

The Facts: The cult is the Cult of Set, of course. Hodkamset, leader of the Fangs of Set, has sent a number of operatives into the west for the purpose of spreading the Cult of Set, and to acquire magic.

In the course of one of their thefts, Mefraset, a female mage, put a ring of reverse alignment on her finger, which suddenly transformed her to chaotic good and filled her with loathing for the Cult of Set. She knows many of Hodkamset's diabolical plans and intends to stop them. The other cult members, on the other hand, have figured out what happened to Mefraset and want to capture her and reverse the effect of the alignment switch.

Encounter: The encounter can be one for characters of any level; just adjust the levels of Mefraset and the pursuers accordingly. Low-level characters will be facing ordinary fighters and clerics who are either in the service of the Cult of Set or whose services have been bought by the cult. High-level parties can face minions of Set and a rakshasa.

The characters are walking down the street when a tall, bald woman pushes them aside and runs past them. She is being chased by men who obviously don't have her continued health in mind.

If the player characters do nothing, then they've blown the scenario. Move onto another encounter. If the characters rescue her (and it should be an easy fight at this point), the woman identifies herself as Mefrahur, a mage of Mulhorand, who has been gathering information on the activities of the Cult of Set outside Mulhorand. (This isn't really true, but Mefraset has no idea what she's doing outside Mulhorand in the company of someone as evil as the Cult of Set; she has made up this story because it seems like the only logical way to explain what happened. She also changed her name, because she cannot see herself as having anything to do with Set.) She mentions the name Hodkamset as the leader of a company of high-level adventurers in the service of Set. She says that they have a scheme to overthrow the pharaoh of Mulhorand and replace him with Set, and that they are looking for magical items to aid them in their conquest. She also tells the characters the location of her hiding place.

At this point, a larger party of assassins attack. Use as many as you need to engage the entire party; Mefraset will run away during this fight. After the fight, the characters can track Mefraset to her hide-out.

In the meantime, the Cult of Set found Mefraset and neutralized the alignment switch. She realizes that she told the PCs too much, and that they must die to protect the cult.

When the PCs find Mefraset, she will pose as Mefrahur, doing her very best to appear convincing in the role. A member of the Cult of Set will appear to be holding a sword to her throat. She casts a spell on the PCs when she feels she can achieve surprise, and the rest of the cult joins in the ambush.

If the PCs have a recurring nemesis from within the Zhentarim, then he may be substituted for the Cult of Set member as the one holding Mefraset "hostage." Or, if you don't want to employ the nemesis here, use one of his chief minions.

This should be an extremely tough fight that the PCs will be very hard pressed to win, all the more so because Mefraset will be using weird southern magic (see the "New Spells" section). If the PCs win, they find Mefraset's spell book, in a totally undecipherable language (Mulhorandi magic, which non-Mulhorandi can read only with a Mulhorandi read magic spell), and the ring of reverse alignment in a box. They will also have had their first taste of the south.

The Eater of Magic

Location: Chessenta, centering on Cimbar.

(Note: This rumor was first mentioned in the DM's Sourcebook of the Realms, p. 43. It is dated Eleasias [August], Year of the Prince [DR 1357].)

The Rumor: The Sceptanar, self-proclaimed ruler of Chessenta (his home city is Cimbar), has sent an envoy to Sembia, Cormyr, and the Dalelands, seeking word of those who unleashed the magic-eater in Scornubel two winters ago. The Sceptanar has a similar creature imprisoned in an ancient globe in the Crypt Royal. He is offering gold, magical treasures, griffins, or noble maidens of his realm to anyone who can safely unleash the magic-eater without harming the people or treasures of Chessenta. He also wants it returned to its own home plane, or controlled to do his bidding in a certain task.

The Facts: The Sceptanar is less interested in dealing with the creature than in luring adventurers to Cimbar, where he hopes they can be persuaded to help defend the city against its current enemies. If he could get the magic-eater under his control, though, he would be very happy.

The magic-eater is really a hakeashar (see the "New Monsters" section). It is trapped in the heart of a pyramid built in the days when the city was under the control of Unther; the pyramid was a deliberate attempt to recreate the Mulhorandi style.

The hakeashar is trapped in a glass sphere that is welded to the floor; no physical force can release the sphere.

The sphere is directly over a concealed plate in the floor that leads to the treasure vault, which the Sceptanar would like to get into. The plate cannot be opened by physical force or by magic (thanks to a wish spell) — this includes phase door and passwall spells. There is a tiny engraved impression with the coat of arms of Cimbar imprinted into the floor. The plate can only be opened by pressing the royal signet ring of Cimbar into the floor plate (it is currently on the left hand of the Sceptanar). What riches and dangers lie beneath the plate are for the DM to decide; they should both be very great.

The Sceptanar would like to use the hakeashar as a weapon in the current war. He is also worried that the creature might fall into the hands of the lords of Luthcheq, who hate magic and would do anything to get their hands on a creature capable of destroying magic. If the characters succeed in their quest, they will find that the Sceptanar is a fair man, but rather stingy; he would prefer to short-change the characters as opposed to cheating them entirely out of their reward.

Rage of Dust

Location: Klondor, Mulhorand, Plains of Purple Dust

The Rumor: A swirling sandstorm has formed in the heart of Raurin, the great desert, and is said to be heading northeast into the Plains of Purple Dust. The storm is nearly a dozen miles across. Some say this is the coming of the dreaded skriaxit, the storm of death, and some are leaving the Great Vale for safer ground.

The Facts: The dust cloud is indeed the skriaxit; in fact, it is a full strength skriaxit storm with 18 members.

The black storm has generated a large sandstorm around it. It is carrying that dust with it as it heads toward the Great Vale. It will strike the town of Klondor in a week's time, undoubtedly killing everyone in the town unless it is stopped.

The skriaxit has a reputation for slaughtering mages and warriors of extreme power. The PCs should be warned, very strongly, that the skriaxit has been known to swallow parties of extremely well-armed, high-level adventurers. If the PCs ignore that warning, well, it is their choice to walk into almost certain death.

There is an easier way to still the skriaxit. The skriaxit loves to cause death and destruction, but is not necessarily very discriminating about what it kills, except that the victims should be reasonably intelligent mammals. If the PCs were to drive a very large herd of cattle or pigs into the heart of the storm (at least 5,000 head), that would be sufficient to quiet it.

Where can the PCs get this information? The priests of Thoth might know. To get access to the priests of Thoth, the PCs may need the assistance of Hethhab, the Defender of the Eastern Way, a man in the service of Anhur who is very concerned about the skriaxit.

Hethhab is really an incarnation of Anhur (see the "Personalities of Mulhorand" section); as such, he can get the players access to Tholaunt, incarnation of Thoth, in Gheldaneth.

The answer is not written in the tomes of Thoth, but Tholaunt, incarnation of Thoth, says that there is a legend that the archmage Nezram once quieted a skriaxit without being harmed; this knowledge might be known to the Nezramites, the descendants of Nezram.

The PCs would have to travel to the Plains of Purple Dust, where the Nezramites live, and persuade them to tell them how. There is one problem—the Nezramites don't like strangers! It is up to the PCs to figure out a way to deal with their hostility, then get enough animals together to stop the skriaxit.

Optional Complication: When the PCs feed the skriaxit a herd of animals, it is not enough. That is when Hethhab, the incarnation of Anhur, reveals himself for what he truly is. He and his minions ride into the heart of the storm; before he rides he asks the PCs to stay out of the storm, but to ride to Sultim to tell his priesthood of what happened. A minute after Hethhab rides into the storm, it is stilled. The deity and his minions are dead.

Rezim's spies learn what happened. Rezim worries that if the priests of Anhur learned that an incarnation of Anhur died a heroic death while on a suicide mission that Rezim gave him, there will be open warfare as the Anhurites try to avenge their martyr's death. Rezim will try to bribe the PCs not to fulfill Hethhab's dying request; failing that, he'll hire assassins to deal with them. If this also fails, he will have the PCs outlawed to make their words seem less credible. It is up to the PCs to escape with their hides and integrity intact.

Magic Quest

Location: Outer Sultim

Rumor: A rather shady merchant named Verdegond claims that he has a spell book with translations of over a dozen Mulhorand magical spells into the magical language of the west. He is willing to sell this book to the highest bidder. He is currently in Outer Sultim, where he plans to make the sale.

The Facts: The majority of these spells are variation of the cantrip spell, which has no real value. However, there are at least five Mulhorand magical spells, including the extremely valuable read Mulhorand magic. It is worth a lot.

There are several complications. The priests and mages of Thoth are after it, and they are very upset. Agents of the Thay Zulkir Lauzoril are also after the book. The player characters are going to have to deal with them and Verdegond, who has a habit of stealing back his sales and selling them twice.

This scenario should keep the player characters on their toes, as fake spell books, angry mages, and deadly assassins await at every turn. Every time they turn around, there is someone with a sword or staff pointing at them saying: "Okay, pal, where's the book?" If the DM desires, the chases can take on comic overtones, but the scenario—and the prize—is a very serious one.

Terrible Swift Sword

Location: Shussel, Unther

Rumor: Mysterious murders have been taking place among the merchants in the city of Shussel. There is one report which claimed that a sword without a wielder slew one of the merchants, then flew into the shadows and could not be pursued.

The Facts: Havell (4th-level fighter), a merchant from Shussel, has a fanatical hatred of travelers from other lands (such as Durpar) who exposed him as a fraud and drove him out of business. He discovered a cache of magical potions that enable him to turn ethereal for 1d4 +1 hours. These potions also enable him to handle objects that are not ethereal as long as they remain in the Prime Material plane.

Thus Havell can wield a sword and the sword appears to be wielding itself.

Merchants may hire player characters to serve as bodyguards. The characters will be hard-pressed to defeat a sword whose wielder is ethereal, whom they cannot harm except from the Ethereal plane (give Havell a +4 attack roll bonus with the sword while he's ethereal).

They might talk to relatives of the sword's victims, who would likely name Havell (among others) as someone who held a grudge against the victims. A search of Havell's quarters uncovers the potions.

City On The Edge of Oblivion

Location: Messemprar, Unther

Rumor: There is trouble in Messemprar, one of the major ports in Unther, due to severe food shortages. Ships bearing food to Messemprar can make a big fortune, if they can get past the sahuagin and the pirates and make it into port.

The Facts: This scenario can begin at any coastal city on the Inner Sea, such as Selgaunt, Suzail, Procampur, or Telflamm. The player characters could purchase a ship, buy lots of grain and other foodstuffs, and then make the perilous voyage to Messemprar. Or the player characters might sign on for such a voyage with a merchant captain.

During the voyage, the player characters have to deal with the dangers of the Inner Sea. The crew could have an evil sailor on board who is urging them to mutiny and sell the cargo to his masters (the pirates or the Red Wizards). Pirates might attack, sahuagin might try to board the ship and capture it. This is up to the DM.

When the ship gets to Messemprar, there are two Unther naval boats with orders to board any ship that tries to enter the harbor of Messemprar. They are also instructed to sell the survivors of its crew into slavery (the crew knows of this policy). The ships are too far away for the Northern Wizards to assist; the PCs must defeat the Unther vessels on their own.

If the ship makes it into Messemprar, the PCs find that they are already too late. The food riots have escalated into a full-scale revolt; the authorities of the city are either dead or under siege in the palace district. The hungry townspeople try to seize the ship, distribute its cargo, and impound the vessel.

Any resistance results in the player characters becoming hunted by the rebels. The player characters might find sanctuary with the Northern Wizards' Guild, but then maybe the elders of the guild are murdered one by one. The PCs are (naturally) the prime suspects. Can they clear their names? Can they escape the madness of Messemprar? These questions can only be answered by the ingenuity (or lack of it) of your players during the campaign. "City On The Edge of Oblivion" is intended as a novel-sized adventure for the characters.

The Weed That Kills

Location: Luthcheq, Chessenta

Rumor: The lords of the city of Luthcheq in Chessenta are mad (in Chessenta this is not considered to be rumor, but fact). Their goal is the destruction of all magic, and the painful deaths of all who wield magic.

Their agents are suspected of kidnapping some of the most powerful mages in the Realms, intending to burn them to death in a big bonfire.

The Facts: This rumor is absolutely accurate.

This scenario is a "friend in need" scenario: the PCs are friendly with a mage who has been kidnapped. The kidnapers were spotted chartering a ship to somewhere east in the Inner Sea region. To rescue their friend, the PCs must get their own ship and chase after the kidnapers. They may pick up the trail of the kidnapers at several ports, but for maximum dramatic effect the chase should end in Luthcheq, with the PCs arriving just hours before the burning is to take place. The PCs then have to sneak into the castle where the wizards are being held captive, free them, and escape.

Aggressive PCs might want to slay the royal family of Luthcheq, which will create a rather large vacuum in the politics of Chessenta. But this wouldn't be the first time that adventurers changed the destiny of a nation, and it would be hard for any new ruling family to be worse than the old one.

The Name of The Game

Location: Mourktar, Threskel, Mt. Thulbane

Rumor: Theris, king of Mourktar, is dying and he has no heir. On the instructions of his god, Assuran of the Three Thunders, he is leaving his throne to the most worthy successor. To find this successor, he is holding a tournament of athletic skills at the base of Mount Thulbane. This tournament is open to any who choose to participate. The winner of this tournament will be the new king.

The Facts: There is indeed a tournament to be held by the slopes of Mt. Thulbane. It is open to both human and half-elven men and women; women are forbidden to compete in boxing and wrestling and thus labor under a handicap. To qualify, one's Strength and Dexterity must both be 14 or better; each competing character must also roll a Strength check and a Dexterity check (roll 1d20 for each). If either roll fails, the character fails to qualify.

The events in the tournament are wrestling, discus-throwing, running, chess, boxing, swimming, jumping, riding, archery, and charioteering.

Whoever gets first place in each event receives five points, whoever gets second place gets two points, and whoever finishes third gets one point.

The two competitors with the highest point total must then meet in a duel to decide the winner.

The winners of these events are usually judged by rolls against their proficiency scores. A failed skill roll means that the character loses the event. If the character succeeds with his roll, he records how much he exceeded what he needed to roll. If, for instance, Sir Jheol needed a 16 to make his Charioteering proficiency, and he rolls a 5, he made his roll by 11. If no other person made his roll by more than 11, Sir Jheol would win the contest.

Throughout the event descriptions, the term "Difference Score" (DS) will be used to mean the difference between the score needed to succeed and the actual roll of a successful check. In the preceding example, Sir Jheol's DS is 11.

Some characters have no proficiency with the skill in question. In this case, take the appropriate ability score and halve it (round fractions down) to get such a character's score in the proficiency. For example, a chess player needs the gaming proficiency. Tendros doesn't have it. He has an Intelligence (the necessary attribute) of 15. His proficiency score is therefore 7.

Since there should be 64 competitors (including any PCs who are in the contest; see the "Running the Tournament" section) entered in each event, this rolling could get very tedious. As an alternative, assume that each PC entered has a 2% chance of finishing in each scoring position (i.e., roll percentile dice; a roll of 01-02 means that PC came in first, 03-04 means he came in second, and 05-06 means he came in third. If more than one PC ends up in a particular scoring position, just give each PC the points for that position).

If no PCs are entered in the competition, then it really doesn't matter who wins (unless the PCs know someone in the contest). Just give the players the impression of exciting contests and many deeds of skill and valor, then just make up a winner and move on to things the players are more interested in.

Magical aids are forbidden in this contest. All contestants are forbidden from having magical assistance. If such is discovered, the character is disqualified. All characters are inspected for magic before the contest (with a weapon or wand that has the detect magic ability); if magic is detected, the character is disqualified.

Rules for Competition

Wrestling: This contest is resolved using the nonlethal combat system (2nd Edition Player's Handbook, pages 97 and 98).

These matches are of a very brutal style called the pankration. When an opponent is knocked unconscious, the match is over. All damage sustained is healed by priests.

This event is done tournament-style, with winners fighting winners until the final round, and a consolation match between the two semifinalists. The losers in the first round of the wrestling match are eliminated from the entire tournament.

An optional rule: One round after being put in a hold, a character may break out of it by rolling a Strength vs. Strength check. Both competitors must roll Strength checks; if the person in the hold succeeds and his DS exceeds his opponent's, the hold is broken.

Discus-Throwing: This is purely a Strength check. There are three throws; any who fail even one check are out of this event (any who fail two checks are out of the competition entirely). If all three checks are successful, the Difference Scores are added together, plus the character's level if he is a member of the fighter class. The highest score wins.

Running: Characters must make a long distance running check. Highest DS wins.

Note: Unless a runner is protected by his comrades, friends of one of the other competitors will try to cheat, giving a -5 penalty to the unprotected character's roll.

Chess: This contest is a straight gaming proficiency check (1d20 vs. each character's Charisma).

Boxing: This contest uses the nonlethal combat rules on pages 97 and 98 of the 2nd Edition Player's Handbook. The object is to knock the opponent unconscious. This event is done tournament-style, with winners fighting winners until the final round, and a consolation match between the two semifinalists. The losers in the first round are eliminated from the rest of the tournament.

Swimming: Those competitors without the swimming proficiency cannot compete. Each contestant makes two swimming proficiency checks; if either fails, the character is out of this event. The two DS's are added together to determine the winner.

Jumping: Competitors are performing a running broad jump (see the jumping proficiency in the 2nd Edition Player's Handbook, page 61). Highest jump wins. Characters without this proficiency cannot win.

Riding: This is a long-distance event; characters must ride bareback and unarmored. They may provide their own horse, or ride steeds provided by the Mourktarians. There is an assassination attempt against the current top two leaders of the competition. They must fight against the assassins, and suffer a -1 penalty to their proficiency check for each round they spend in battle.

All except those prominent characters who are designated as cheaters have a -3 penalty to their riding check; highest DS wins.

Archery: This competition uses the composite long bow (appropriate non-proficiency penalties apply).

Characters must hit AC -4 to score a bull's eye; the character with the most bull's eyes in 20 shots wins.

Charioteering: The eight highest scoring contestants qualify for the final event—the chariot race. It can be resolved by making charioteering checks and seeing who has the highest DS, or it may be resolved using a more complicated system.

The DM uses a copy of the chariot race oval provided on the back of the cover. Place figures or other pieces to represent each rider and position them on spaces 1 to 8 (starting positions go by DS score totals coming into this event—highest total in position 1, etc.).

There are ten laps; after each lap, each chariot's position changes as follows:

Successful Charioteering Checks *

DS 	Position Change
12+	Gain 3 Rows
7-11	Gain 2 Rows
3-6	Gain 1 Row
0-2	No change

Failed Charioteering Checks *

Roll Failed By	Position Change
1-2	Lose 1 Row
3-4	Lose 2 Rows
5-6	Lose 3 Rows
7+	Crash!

* A roll of "20" always fails and always loses at least three rows (and may cause the chariot to crash, if a roll of 20 indicates failure by 7 or more). A roll of "1" always advances the contestant three rows.

 This is the DS for this lap's roll only.

For example, Milfur of Chondath has a Dexterity of 13, which (with the charioteering proficiency's +2 modifier) gives him a charioteering proficiency of 15. He is in 5th place at the start, which means his marker is on the #5 space. After the first lap, he rolls a 4, for a DS of 11. Checking the above chart, Milfur advances two rows, to the row of position 3.

Up to three chariots can be in each row, one per lane. If there is another chariot already in lane 1 of row #3, then Milfur can move to lane 2 or 3 of row

#3. If there are already three chariots in row #3, Milfur cannot advance (by the same token, if a chariot loses ground but the row it is supposed to fall back to is filled, it does not fall back).

Charioteering checks are made in order from the front of the pack to the back (i.e., the lead contestant rolls first and moves, then the second-place contestant, etc.).

Contestants can advance beyond row #1 and they can fall behind row #8.

If two chariots are in adjacent lanes, they may attack each other after all contestants have rolled their charioteering checks for that lap. The only weapons available are whips, which are supposed to be used on horses. Due to the difficulty of the attack (chariots bumping, opponents also attacking, having to steer, etc.), the targets of whip attacks are considered to be AC 0). If an attack is successful, the victim must roll a successful charioteering check to prevent the chariot from crashing.

Example: Murzul of Thay is in Position 1, Lane 1. Milfur of Chondath is Position 1, Lane 2. They may attack each other. Naturally, they both do. Milfur misses but Murzul hits. Milfur rolls a successful charioteering check and avoids crashing.

A charioteer, if he wishes, may voluntarily reduce any gains made on his charioteering check or even move back one row to make an attack against another charioteer. For the chariot to voluntarily move back, it must be able to fall back to the position directly behind it, staying in the same lane, to make the attack.

It is possible for someone in lane 1 and someone in lane 3 to both attack someone in lane 2.

If a chariot crashes, the charioteer suffers 1d4 points of damage, plus 1d8 points if there is a chariot in the lane directly behind him.

If all but one contestant are out of the race before the last lap, the last remaining contestant is the winner. The last contestant eliminated would come in second place, and the next to last to be eliminated would end up in third place.

If two or more chariots are tied for a position, the inside chariot wins.

The Final Duel: This is meant to test the combatants' ability in a real fight.

Both contestants must agree beforehand that the loser's body will be burned and placed in an anti-magic field so he can never be resurrected; this fight is to the death. A contestant may back out of the duel beforehand and forfeit his claim. Theris, king of Mourktar, believes that the crown should be worth the ultimate risk, and that anyone who wants it must be willing to accept that risk.

If one of the contestants forfeits, the character who is in third place may challenge.

Running The Tournament

DMing a tournament of this size is a major undertaking. A DM must have a roster of at least some of the major contenders for the tournament; examples of four of these competitors with all necessary information is provided below.

Allow 64 competitors to compete in the tournament at the start. At least 32 will be eliminated in the wrestling, and another 16 in the boxing. A list of at least 16 contenders, including PCs, will be useful. When running the first two rounds of boxing and wrestling for the PCs, use the following table. After that, roll randomly and fill out the final 16 positions:

- 01-60 Easy opponent (1st- to 3rd-level fighter, Strength 14-15). Should be a victory.
- 61-85 Tough opponent (4th- to 6th-level fighter, Strength 16-17). A tough fight.
- 86-00 Major opponent. Roll randomly on the list of tough guys.

If the DM trims down the list to an elite of 16 competitors, it should be less cumbersome to score the tournament, and easier for each competitor to come across as a distinctive personality.

It should be noted that this need not be the only thing happening during the tournament. Players who are not involved can make deals with other non-competitors, make friends, place bets on the competition, pick pockets, or watch out for sneaky plots. The throne of Mourktar is at stake, and there are a lot of people who will do anything to get it.

The tournament is an opportunity for the DM to introduce new friends and enemies to the player characters. Let the characters role play and interact with other characters.

Prominent Contestants: The following are men who are major contenders for the crown:

Therihab (Mulhorand, 9th-level paladin): He is cousin to the current incarnation of Osiris. He is an extremely honorable man, if aloof, and a fierce competitor. LG, STR 17 (+1, +1) DEX

16 CON 14 INT 13 WIS 16 CHA 17, hp 79, THAC0 12, NWP: Riding 19, Charioteering 18, Swimming 17, Etiquette 17, Riding (airborne) 14. No missile weapons. Will not cheat.

Helyos (Chessenta, Akanax, 13th-level fighter): Helyos is a mercenary for hire. He is considered one of the toughest fighters in Chessenta, and one of the meanest too. Under his rule, Mourktar would become a haven for pirates. N, STR 18/70 (+2, +4) DEX 14 CON 17 INT 10 WIS 12 CHA 14, hp 89, THAC0 8, NWP: Riding 15, Charioteering 16, Swimming 18, Blind-fighting, Gaming 10 (with chess). Weapon specialist in long sword, proficient with composite long bow. Will cheat.

Nebuseddar (Unther, 11th-level fighter): While Gilgeam didn't wish to leave his kingdom, he welcomed the opportunity to add Mourktar to his kingdom once again, and he sent one of his finest champions. Nebuseddar's high characteristics are a divine gift. LE, STR 19 (+3, +7) DEX 18 CON 17 INT 14 WIS 10 CHA 13, hp 104, THAC0 10, SA +2 to attack roll with all wrestling moves, -2 on initiatives for wrestling, NWP: Charioteering 20, Riding 13, Swimming 19. Is not proficient with composite long bow. Will cheat.

Sorn (Thay, 14th-level fighter): Though he is posing as a simple trader, Sorn is really a servant of Lauzoril, a Zulkir (Red Wizard) of Thay. His orders are to win the crown or assassinate the winner. CE, STR 18/55 (+2, +4) DEX 16 CON 15 INT 10 WIS 12 CHA 15, hp 74, THAC0 7, NWP: Charioteering 18, Riding 14, Swimming 18. He is proficient with composite longbow. Will definitely cheat.

SOUTHERN MAGIC

"Magic is the essence of life"

—Saying of the priests of Thoth

Spells from southern nations, such as Thay, Mulhorand, and Unther, have always been a source of dread and superstition to the peoples of the north. The reasons for this fear are clear. Southern magic is strange and powerful; northerners who battle a party of southern mages should be ready to face spells they have never seen before.

There is one fundamental difference between the magic of the south and that of the north: its writing system, known as the Thoth mage-script.

Following the rebellion of the Red Wizards of Thay, the priest-mages of Thoth decided to create a new magical script with which to write their spells. This writing was meant to prevent the Red Wizards from learning the priests' secrets.

This writing is undecipherable to a standard read magic spell. A read southern magic spell is required to perform this function; these can be learned only from southern mages. Since the creation of mage-script, it has spread and been adopted as a standard by all mages of Mulhorand and Unther, and by some in Chessenta. While southern mages also have standard read magic spells, these are rarely used.

Southern mages have all spells listed in the Player's Handbook, but none listed in the Magister or other FORGOTTEN REALMS™ modules.

Southern mages have developed many spells that are not known elsewhere in the Realms. Most of these spells were devised by the priest-mages of Thoth during the reign of the Mulhorand Pharaoh Thothibistep II, following the loss of Thay to the Red Wizards. Some of these spells are described in the following section:

Duration: 2 rounds/level
Casting Time: 1
Area of Effect: 10' radius
Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the caster to create a magical barrier that protects him from damage. This barrier is a magical wall that surrounds the wizard in a ten-foot radius. This wall can withstand 5 points of damage per level of the caster, to a maximum of 25 points, before it goes down and attacks may go through. The wizard may not cast spells that cause hit point damage through the barrier, nor may he physically attack through the barrier.

The barrier is considered to have the caster's Armor Class, but it does not get a saving throw against spells—it automatically suffers full damage from spells. (But, if a spell knocks down the barrier, the wizard within is entitled to a saving throw vs. the excess damage.)

The material component for this spell is a piece of jade or amethyst worth 50 gp or more; this is consumed in the casting.

Breathe (Alteration)

Range: 0
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 2 rounds/level
Casting Time: 1
Area of Effect: The caster
Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the creature touched to breathe normally in places where it would normally suffocate (in water, under an avalanche, while buried by a sandstorm, etc.).

The material component for this spell is a cloth that must be held over the caster's mouth during the casting of the spell.

Ignite Flame (Evocation)

Range: 10 yards
Components: V, S
Duration: 3 rounds or less
Casting Time: 1
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: Negates

With this spell, a wizard can create a small area of hot flame, typically a three-inch-square area. If cast on exposed flesh, this causes 1d3 points of damage per round for three rounds before being extinguished. The victim may put out the flames by spending one round smothering them (he receives damage for that round, but the flames are automatically put out).

If this spell is cast on flammable material, it grows into a small fire, automatically destroying flammable materials such as paper, causing exposed flasks of oil to explode, and creating a bonfire. These targets still receive a saving throw.

The fire produced by an ignite flame spell is considered to be normal, not magical, fire.

Ladder (Alteration)

Range: 20 yards
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn
Casting Time: 1
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

By means of this spell, the caster creates a firmly anchored ladder of force, one foot wide, and ten feet long, + ten feet per level of the caster, to a maximum length of 60 feet. This ladder is easy to climb (no Dexterity check is required). This ladder may be used to climb walls and pits, or it may be laid horizontally and used to cross chasms.

The material component for this spell is a knot of wood.

Ward (Enchantment)

Range: 0
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 2 rounds/level
Casting Time: 1
Area of Effect: 10-foot cube
Saving Throw: Negates

This spell enables the caster to set up an area with an invisible magical barrier. Those who enter the warded area have a strong compulsion to turn back and not pass through again (a successful saving throw vs. spell is required to avoid retreat). Creatures of 5 Hit Dice (or levels) or more are unaffected.

Anyone with magical protection from fear may pass through without having to roll a saving throw. This spell does not affect undead of any level.

The material components are the feathers of a vulture.

Second-Level Spells

Damage Mirror (Alteration)

Range: 0
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level + Special
Casting Time: 2
Area of Effect: 10' radius
Saving Throw: None

This spell is the bane of those who like to melee wizards. If a damage mirror spell is active, the wizard is not protected against attack, but if the wizard is struck by a weapon, every creature within a ten-foot radius of the wizard suffers an identical amount of damage. Thus an archer firing at range against a wizard is not affected, but a swordsman ten feet away from the wizard is. This spell affects all creatures within that ten-foot radius, including the caster. The spell is canceled once it has been triggered; if the opponent has multiple attacks in that melee round, only the first successful attack triggers the damage mirror spell. This spell is not affected by spells or magical attacks, except for dispel magic, which has a normal chance of negating it.

If the caster is somehow immobilized and then assassinated by an instant kill attack (e.g., slitting his throat), the assassin is also affected (he will kill himself as well as the wizard), but he may roll a Dexterity check to avoid killing the wizard when he realizes what is happening.

The material component for this spell is crushed glass from a broken mirror.

Move Object (Alteration)

Range: 10 yards
Component: S
Duration: Special
Casting Time: 2
Area of Effect: 1 object
Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the caster to point to a single small object and move it. The wizard may move an object weighing up to two pounds per level. He cannot perform complex movements with this spell (he can pull a dagger from its sheath, provided that it is not chained, but he cannot unbuckle and unloop a belt). A wizard can use this spell to activate levers from a safe distance. This spell cannot be used to animate weapons and make them attack from a distance.

Run (Alteration)

Range: 60 yards
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 2 rounds/level
Casting Time: 2
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: None

This spell causes a single creature to run at triple ground movement. Thus a creature with a normal running movement of 12 will have a ground movement of 36 while under the effect of this spell. This spell can affect any creature, including horses and summoned creatures, but it is not cumulative with haste spells.

Creatures moving at their maximum movement gain a -2 bonus to their Armor Class while under the effect of this spell. This spell does not affect other movement rates, including flight, burrowing, swimming, and climbing.

The material component is a rabbit's foot.

Thunderball (Evocation)

Range: 10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: Special

Casting Time: 2
Area of Effect: 20' radius
Saving Throw: Special

The thunderball spell is an explosive burst of lightning accompanied by a clap of thunder. This spell causes 1d6 + 1 points of damage to all creatures within its area of effect (no saving throw) and all within its area of effect must roll successful saving throws vs. spell or be deafened for 1d4 rounds. In addition, the caster may elect to target this spell against a single creature. This creature is automatically deafened, and it must roll a successful saving throw vs. spell or suffer double damage.

The material component for this spell is an amber rod.

Tumble (Enchantment/Charm)

Range: 10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 3 rounds +1 round/level
Casting Time: 2
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: Negates

This spell causes a single creature to trip and fall to the ground. The victim continues to tumble and roll about for the duration of the spell. The target cannot attack or cast spells while under the influence of this spell. The target retains all Dexterity bonuses to his Armor Class. The victim is allowed a new saving throw each round; a successful saving throw negates the spell.

The material component for this spell is grease, which is consumed in the casting.

Third-Level Spells

Foothold (Alteration)

Range: 10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level
Casting Time: 3
Area of Effect: 900 square feet
Saving Throw: Negates

A foothold spell causes stony hands to appear from the ground. These try to grab the legs of all creatures in a 30' by 30' area or 90' by 10' area (depending on the desire of the caster). Creatures successfully held by this spell cannot move, but they may attack normally and cast spells. Characters trapped by this spell are considered to have an effective Dexterity of 1.

The foothold spell cannot affect airborne or invisible creatures. A successful saving throw negates the effects of this spell on a target, but a new saving throw must be rolled every round the target is in the area of effect.

The material component for this spell is a vulture's claw.

Protection From Telekinesis (Abjuration)

Range: Touch
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level
Casting Time: 3
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: None

This spell protects the target against magic that moves its physical form, most notably levitate, repulsion, and telekinesis spells, but not reverse gravity, which is a fundamental alteration of the laws of nature. This spell adds a +4 bonus to any saving throws involving these kinds of magic, or allows a normal saving throw against attacks that have none, such as repulsion. This does not protect individuals from spells that involve teleportation.

The material component is a block of black granite.

Target (Alteration)

Range: 50 yards + 10 yards/level
Components: V,S
Duration: 1 rounds/level
Casting Time: 3
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: Negates

This spell enables the wizard to affect a single target. If the victim fails his saving throw, he becomes marked so that all missile attacks, including arrows, bolts, javelins, and ballistae attacks gain a +2 bonus to attack and damage rolls against him.

Witchweed (Evocation)

Range: 50 yards +10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 3
Area of Effect: 40' radius
Saving Throw: None

This spell creates a cloud of smoke that is utterly inhospitable to wizards. All wizards caught in this cloud cannot cast spells; they also suffer 2 points of damage per round they remain in the cloud. The cloud is stationary; once in place, it may only be moved by a gust of wind spell.

The material component for this spell is burning tobacco (or some other noxious, fume-producing plant).

Fourth-Level Spells

Agitate Wounds (Necromancy)

Range: 10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: Special
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: Special

By means of this spell, the caster can affect a creature that has been wounded by an edged weapon. This spell reopens bound wounds (or causes unbound wounds to bleed severely), inflicting 2d6 points of damage. Those who roll successful saving throws vs. spell suffer no further damage from this spell. If the saving throw fails, however, the victim suffers 1d3 additional points of damage per round until the wound is dressed and bound (or bound again, as in the case of reopened wounds).

Creatures without blood, such as skeletons, are unaffected by this spell, as are those with regeneration abilities and those under the effects of a periapt of wound closure.

The material component for this spell is a pinch of salt.

Command Elementals (Enchantment/Charm)

Range: 40 yards + 10 yards/level
Components: V,S
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: Negates

This spell enables the caster to command (or wrest command of) a single creature from one of the elemental or para-elemental planes.

The target is permitted a saving throw, but elementals of low intelligence or lower suffer at -4 penalty to the roll. If the saving throw is failed, the wizard can maintain his control over the elemental for the duration of the spell, overriding all other controls on that elemental, including other command elemental spells.

Dune (Conjuration)

Range: Touch
Components: V,S
Duration: 1 hour/level
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

When this spell is cast, the wizard creates a magical sand dune that can carry one man-sized creature per two levels of experience of the caster (e.g., 3 creatures at 6th and 7th level, 4 creatures at 8th and 9th level, etc.) through any sandy area with a movement rate of 4 per level of the spellcaster. This dune can move only through sandy areas.

The material component for this spell is a pinch of sand.

Slumber (Enchantment/Charm)

Range: 60 yards
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 5 rounds/level
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

When a wizard casts a slumber spell, he causes a comatose sleep to come upon one or more creatures (other than undead and certain other creatures with immunity to sleep effects). All creatures to be affected must be within 50 feet of each other.

The number of creatures that can be affected is a function of Hit Dice or levels. This spell affects 4d10 Hit Dice (or levels) of monsters. Monsters from other planes of existence and monsters with more than 9 Hit Dice are unaffected.

The center of the spell is determined by the spellcaster. Creatures with the least Hit Dice in the area of effect are affected first; creatures that would be only partially affected are not affected at all.

The material component is a pinch of dust.

Fifth-Level Spells

Deathguard (Abjuration/Necromancy)

Range: Touch
Components: V,S
Duration: 2 rounds/level
Casting Time: 5
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: None

This spell creates a guardian spirit that protects the character from attacks from the Ethereal plane.

The guardian has one function: Should any attack reduce the hit points of the creature it has been assigned to guard to zero or below, the guardian intervenes and suffers the damage instead of the character, saving the character from death. Once the guardian saves its master's life, it is destroyed.

The character does not suffer any damage from the attack that would have killed him, be it damage from falling from a cliff, dragon breath, or a weapon strike. Note that if the attack doesn't bring the character to zero hit points or below, the character takes full damage (the guardian prevents only lethal blows).

Etherealness (Alteration)

Range: Touch
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level
Casting Time: 5
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: Negates

This spell temporarily sends one creature into the Ethereal plane.

The target must remain in the Ethereal plane during the duration of the spell; any attempt to return to the Prime Material plane will fail, except by the intervention of Powers or a wish spell. If the wizard attempts to shift the target into the Ethereal against its will, the target is entitled to a saving throw.

The material component for this spell is a drop of oil of etherealness, or oil from a creature native to the Ethereal plane.

Mummy (Necromancy)

Range: 50 yards
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level
Casting Time: 5
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

With this spell, the mage can animate up to one corpse per four levels of experience he possesses (all fractions are rounded down). These corpses have all of the abilities, including hit points, of a mummy (see volume I of the Monstrous Compendium).

When the spell has run its course, or when the mummies are slain, the corpses crumble to dust.

The material component is mummy dust.

Sandstorm (Evocation)

Range: 10 yards/level
 Components: V,S,M
 Duration: 1 round/level
 Casting Time: 5
 Area of Effect: 60' radius
 Saving Throw: None

By means of this spell, the caster creates a vortex of violently churning sand. All creatures within the area of effect suffer 3d10 points of damage. The sand also blinds creatures while they are within its area of effect, and there is a 50% probability that any creature trying to move in the area falls down.

The sandstorm also extinguishes torches and small fires.

The material component for this spell is a fistful of sand.

Sixth-Level Spells

Enfeeble (Necromancy)

Range: Touch
 Components: V,S,M
 Duration: Permanent
 Casting Time: 6
 Area of Effect: 1 creature
 Saving Throw: None

This spell enables a wizard to weaken the physical characteristics of his target, making him weaker and less agile. The wizard must touch the victim within three rounds of casting the spell. If he connects, the victim loses 1 point each of Strength and Dexterity, permanently. Characters with exceptional Strengths have their Strengths reduced to 18. One point of Strength or Dexterity may be restored by a restoration, limited wish, or wish spell. Characters who have either characteristic reduced to 0 become shadows.

The material component for this spell is essence of shadow.

Javelin (Evocation)

Range: 80 yards + 10 yards/level
 Components: V,S,M
 Duration: Instantaneous
 Casting Time: 6
 Area of Effect: 1 creature
 Saving Throw: ½

This spell causes a javelin to become filled with deadly energy. The caster may hurl this bolt at any creature within range of this spell. The javelin strikes without error and inflicts 1d10 points of damage for every two levels of experience of the caster, to a maximum of 10d10 at 20th level. The target is entitled to a saving throw vs. spell with a -3 penalty; success indicates that the target suffers only half damage.

The material component of this spell is a javelin.

Reverse Missile (Abjuration)

Range: 80 yards + 10 yards/level
 Components: V,S
 Duration: 3 rounds/level
 Casting Time: 6
 Area of Effect: The caster
 Saving Throw: None

This spell reflects attacks from all missile weapons, including spells such as magic missile and Melf's acid arrow, and large missiles such as ballistae attacks (but excluding non-missile ranged attacks, such as fireball and disintegrate spells). The missile returns to strike the person who fired it, as long as that person is within the range of the spell (if he is beyond range, then the missile drops to the ground upon reaching the range limit). All reflected missiles automatically strike their targets (no attack roll is needed) and always inflict double damage.

Worship (Enchantment/Charm)

Range: 0
 Components: V,S
 Duration: 2 rounds/level
 Casting Time: 7
 Area of Effect: Special
 Saving Throw: Special

The worship spell raises the effective Charisma of the caster to 22. Characters of 3 Hit Dice (or levels) or less who are in clear view of the caster automatically fall to their knees and praise the caster. Creatures of 4-6 Hit Dice (or levels) get a saving throw to avoid the effect. Creatures above 6 Hit Dice are unaffected. Unwilling victims of this spell roll a reaction check when the spell is finished, with a +8 penalty to the roll.

Using this spell to impersonate a Power is very dangerous.

Seventh-Level Spells

Resist Injury (Abjuration)

Range: 0
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 2 rounds/level
Casting Time: 7
Area of Effect: The caster
Saving Throw: None

This spell protects the caster from injury, so that all attacks cause only half damage against him (rounded down). For instance, if a warrior inflicts 13 points of damage with an attack against a wizard who has an active resist injury spell, the attack is reduced to 6 points of damage. (Attacks that already get a saving throw, such as a fireball spell or dragon breath, inflict half damage if the saving throw fails, or one-quarter damage if it succeeds).

This spell does not help the caster against attacks that charm, drain life levels, or totally destroy (such as death or disintegration spells).

The material component for this spell is an amethyst or jade pendent, which must be worn for the duration of the spell.

Time Loop (Alteration)

Range: 0
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 7
Area of Effect: 20-foot cube
Saving Throw: Special

This spell creates an area within which the flow of time repeats itself continually, until the duration of the spell (as timed in the outside world) expires.

Creatures caught in the time loop see the world as flickering chaos, and are unable to affect it in any way. Characters outside the loop perceive those trapped as endlessly repeating one set of actions; those outside may affect the characters within the time loop with ranged spells and attacks, but if they physically enter the loop, they too are trapped.

The material component for this spell is a powder of crushed diamond, ruby, emerald, and sapphire dust, with each crushed stone being of at least 100 gp value.

Trick (Alteration/Illusion)

Range: 80 yards + 10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level
Casting Time: 7
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

This powerful illusion enables the wizard to exchange his appearance and position with that of any target within range. The wizard and the target are both teleported to each other's positions. To others, the target and the caster seem to have the voice and physical appearance of the other; in effect, none knows that a switch occurs unless the caster has warned them beforehand. A true seeing spell will detect this. Note that the teleport is not without error, and thus this spell entails some risk on the part of the caster and the target.

The material component for this spell is a ball of wax.

Eighth-Level Spells

Bombard (Evocation)

Range: 10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: Special
Casting Time: 8
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: ½

When this spell is cast upon a single creature within spell range, giant stones appear and bombard the target, inflicting 10d6 points of damage per round. A successful saving throw vs. spell reduces the damage by half. Each successive round, a new bombardment strikes the target, causing 10d6 points of damage.

This spell lasts one round for every four levels of the caster, rounded down (thus a bombardment from a 16th-through 19th-level wizard lasts four rounds, a bombardment from a 20th-through 23rd-level wizard lasts five rounds, etc.). Each new bombardment strikes before any other actions take place in the round.

The spell is ended if the target moves out of range. A successful dispel magic spell cast on the target also negates this spell. A creature with magic resistance checks this each round—a successful magic resistance roll ends the spell; this check is rolled before the damage for the round is rolled.

The material component for this spell is a piece of meteoric iron.

Deathbolt (Necromancy)

Range: 10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: Instantaneous
Casting Time: 8
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: Special

This spell causes a bolt of death energy to strike its target, which may be any living Prime Material creature. When this bolt strikes, the target dies unless it rolls a successful saving throw vs. spell. Even if the roll succeeds, the victim suffers 10d6 points of damage.

The material component for this spell is vampire ichor.

Devastate (Alteration)

Range: 0
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 8
Area of Effect: The caster
Saving Throw: None

This spell causes all of the caster's spells to strike with devastating effect. All targets suffer a -5 penalty to saving throws against the caster's spells, and all damage done by the caster's spells is increased by +2 per die (but the total damage cannot exceed the maximum possible rolled damage without the bonus—e.g., a fireball spell cannot cause more than the 60 points of damage that is the maximum possible to roll on the fireball spell's limit of 10d6).

The material component for this spell is a solid gold pendant with the insignia of the caster, which must be worn around the caster's neck for the duration of the spell.

Ninth-Level Spells

Army (Conjuration/Summoning)

Range: 500 yards
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 2 turns/level
Casting Time: 9
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

By means of this spell, the caster is able to create an instant army, which rises from the ground in the form of earth, stone, or sand soldiers. These soldiers are AC 4, have a movement rate of 3, have 2 Hit Dice each (THAC0 19), have one attack per round, inflict 1d6 + 2 points of damage per hit, and have 20% magic resistance. They are immune to all enchantment/charm spells, and they serve only the summoner. It requires a +1 or better weapon to affect them. The caster can summon one unit of ten soldiers for every four levels he possesses (round all fractions down). The units must appear within a 250-yard radius, placed as the caster sees fit. When the spell duration expires, the units vanish.

The material component of this spell is a diamond of at least 5,000 gp value, which must be crushed in the casting.

Call (Conjuration/Summoning)

Range: Special
Components: V,S,M
Duration: Instantaneous
Casting Time: 1 round
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: None

This spell is a variant of the gate spell. It attracts the attention of a single native of the Prime Material plane. The caster calls the name of the being, who becomes aware that someone wants him to appear. That individual is free to accept or reject the call. If the offer is accepted, the being is instantly teleported without error to a spot of the caster's choosing, within 200 feet of the caster. If the offer is rejected, the call is silenced, and no teleportation takes place. A demand spell may be used prior to this spell to persuade the target to accept.

The target need not be known to the caster, but his exact location must be; this spell does not provide the caster with that information. A call can only affect Prime Material creatures on the Prime Material planes. (It can reach parallel Prime Material worlds, but cannot reach into the Ethereal, Astral, or other planes of existence.)

The material component is a miniature wax statue of the target.

Soul Shift (Necromancy)

Range: 10 miles
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level
Casting Time: 9
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: Special

This extremely powerful spell will transfer the soul of the necromancer from his own body into a previously prepared corpse. This corpse must be within the area of effect of the spell and be unmarred by disease, wounds, or injury. At any time during this spell's duration, the necromancer may choose to abandon his body and travel into the corpse. The necromancer's true body remains alive, but in a soulless, zombie-like state.

When the necromancer's soul reaches its new home, he must immediately roll for resurrection survival; he dies if he fails. If the necromancer succeeds, his new body is restored as it was before death, except for the loss of 1 point of Constitution, which is sacrificed in the transfer. The necromancer retains the knowledge of all of the spells he knew prior to transfer. This transfer is one-way; he cannot return back to his former body.

The material component for this spell is a crushed ruby of at least 1,000 gp value.

Priest Spells

First-Level Spells

Beckon (Conjuration/Charm)

Sphere: Animal
Range: 1-mile radius
Components: V,M
Duration: Instantaneous
Casting Time: 1 round
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: None

This spell affects one creature of semi-intelligence or lower. This creature must either be able to be affected by an animal friendship spell, or be a domesticated pet of the caster. When a beckon spell is cast, the creature hears the caster calling and rushes to his side as fast as possible. If the creature is farther than one mile from the caster, it will not come.

The material component is a piece of food that is favored by the pet.

Cleanse (Alteration)

Sphere: All
Range: 0
Components: V,S,M
Duration: Instantaneous
Casting Time: 1
Area of Effect: The caster
Saving Throw: None

This spell causes all grime, dirt and stains to be removed from the caster and his vestments, enabling the priest to present himself to his congregation in immaculate condition. All clothing that the caster wears is restored to its original color. If the caster was exposed to any minor, incidental diseases, the diseases are cured, provided they had not already reached a noticeable level. This does not affect diseases such as mummy rot, rat bites, or lycanthropy. Even wounds are cleansed and infections are purified (healing 1 point of damage, if no cure wounds spells had been applied previously).

The material component for this spell is a piece of soap.

Stumble (Charm)

Sphere: Combat
Range: 20 yards
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: Negates

This spell causes one creature within its area of effect to stumble. While the victim is affected by a stumble spell, he suffers a -4 penalty to his attack rolls, his movement rate is halved, and he loses all bonuses due to Dexterity. If the target roll a successful saving throw vs. spell, he is completely unaffected.

The material component for this spell is a drop of oil.

Second-Level Spells

Inscribe (Alteration/Conjuration)

Sphere: All
Range: 10 feet
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 1 round
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the words of the caster to be directly etched on a piece of paper, vellum, or papyrus. All the caster need do is speak the words, and they are inscribed in the appropriate language on any appropriate writing surface within ten feet.

The material components for this spell are squid ink, a hawk's feather, and papyrus.

Note: In Mulhorand, this spell may be used only by the priests of Thoth who are appointed to be scribes.

Omen (Divination)

Sphere: Divination
Range: Special
Components: V,S,M
Duration: Instantaneous
Casting Time: 2
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

When a priest casts this spell, he is asking for the approval of his deity regarding an action. This does not tell the caster whether the character is in danger, merely if the deity approves of him performing the action. For instance, a good character may want to know if bribing a government official into adjudicating a land dispute in his temple's favor meets with his god's approval. The deity disapproves of bribery, so the answer is "no."

The caster has a chance equal to 60% + 2%/level of getting a correct answer. The answer is an obvious "yes" or "no," though it is likely to be expressed by a symbol; seven swans flying overhead may mean "yes," while a clap of thunder in a clear sky may mean "no."

The material component of this spell is a gem of at least 100 gp value, which must be sacrificed to the deity in the casting.

Stormvoice (Alteration)

Sphere: Weather
Range: Special
Components: V,S
Duration: 1 round
Casting Time: 2
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: Special

This spell enables the caster to speak with the voice of a storm. The caster can be heard clearly at ten times normal distance. All creatures within a 20-foot radius of the caster must roll successful saving throws vs. spell or be deafened for 1d4 rounds and be knocked from their feet.

Third-Level Spells

Detect Ambush (Abjuration)

Reversible

Sphere: Divination
Range: 50 yards +10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level
Casting Time: 3
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: Negates

This spell detects people of hostile intent who mean to do harm to the caster by lying in ambush. It doesn't detect traps that will surprise the caster, or individuals who might do harm to the caster if they were encountered; the target of this spell must be expecting the caster to come and be lying in wait to harm him.

The target gets a saving throw, modified by the caster's Wisdom bonus; for instance, if the caster has an 18 Wisdom, the target suffers a -4 penalty to his saving throw.

The reverse of this spell, undetected ambush, makes a person waiting in ambush proof against this spell.

The material component for this spell is a possession taken from an enemy (not necessarily the one who is lying in ambush).

Detect Curse (Divination)

Sphere: Divination
Range: 10 yards
Components: V,S
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 3
Area of Effect: 1 object
Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the caster to magically examine an item or creature to see if it has been subject to a curse spell. At 12th level, the caster is able to determine if the spell is bestow curse, major curse, dying curse, or bane. This spell does not detect magical items that are designed for malign effects, such as a necklace of strangulation, which was designed to have a lethal effect.

Chill (Alteration/Evocation)

Sphere: Combat
Range: 50 yards + 10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 5
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: ½

This spell creates a 30-foot-radius area of cold air. The caster can center the coldness on one creature in that area, causing 1 point of damage per caster level, to a maximum of 10 points. A successful saving throw vs. spell reduces damage by ½.

Each succeeding round, the caster can continue inflicting 1 point/level of damage to any creature that is still within the area of effect. If all creatures leave the original area of effect, this spell is negated.

The material component for this spell is a feather.

Fourth-Level Spells

Animal Vision (Alteration)

Sphere: Animal
Range: 100 yards + 20 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level
Casting Time: 1 round
Area of Effect: The caster
Saving Throw: None

This spell links the vision of the priest to that of a single animal, be it mammal, reptile, or insect. Typically, the animal is one sacred to the priest's religion, but it need not be.

As long as the animal remains within the range of the spell, the caster can see through its eyes, using whatever special visions it possesses. There is no other link between the caster and the animal: The priest has no control over where the animal goes (unless he employs other spells for this purpose), and he suffers no damage if the creature is killed.

The material component for this spell is a morsel that is desired by the animal (e.g., if it is a cat, then catnip is a suitable component).

Thunderstroke (Evocation)

Spheres: Combat, Weather
Range: 40 yards + 10 yards/level
Components: V,S,M
Duration: Instantaneous
Casting Time: 1 round
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: ½

This spell enables the priest to call upon the wrath of his deity and summon a bolt of lightning to strike a single target.

This bolt causes 2 points of damage per level of the cleric, to a maximum of 40 points. If the target rolls a successful saving throw vs. spell, the damage is halved.

The material component for this spell is the priest's holy symbol, which is not destroyed in the casting.

Weapon Immunity (Abjuration)

Sphere: Protection
Range: 0
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 2 rounds/level
Casting Time: 7
Area of Effect: The caster
Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the priest to become immune to one particular weapon. This may include such weapons as long swords, bastard swords, maces, or heavy crossbow bolts; it must be a specific weapon.

When the priest is struck by that weapon, it will do no damage to him. This protects the priest even from magical weapons. Monster attacks, such as claws and fangs, are not included in the effect of this spell, nor are magical attacks, such as fireball spells. Only one weapon immunity may be active at a time.

The material component for this spell is a piece of amethyst, jade, or lapis lazuli.

Fifth-Level Spells

Major Curse (Abjuration)

Reversible

Sphere: Protection
Range: Touch
Components: V,S
Duration: Permanent until dispelled
Casting Time: 7
Area of Effect: 1 creature or item
Saving Throw: Special

This spell is similar to the third-level remove curse, except the spell effect is permanent. The curse can have one of the following effects (roll percentile dice):

- | | |
|-------|--|
| 01-50 | Reduces one ability score to 3 (the DM determines which randomly) |
| 51-75 | -4 penalty to victim's attack and saving throw rolls |
| 76-00 | Makes victim 50% likely to drop whatever he is holding (or do nothing in the case of creatures that don't use tools); roll each round. |

If the victim fails a saving throw vs. spell, the curse becomes permanent; if the saving throw is successful, the curse lasts only one turn per level of the priest who cast it.

The spell can be cast on an item, typically in a tomb where the item is not to be disturbed. Those who touch it fall victim to the curse.

The reverse of this spell, remove major curse, removes the effects of a major curse or bestow curse spell.

Summon Minion (Conjuration/Summoning)

Spheres: All, Summoning
Range: 10 yards
Components: V,S,M
Duration: 1 turn/level

Casting Time: 1 round
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the caster to summon one divine minion (see the "New Monsters" section for a description of divine minions). The divine minion serves the priest faithfully, performing any command that does not violate the dictates of its deity; this includes giving up its life in combat. Only one minion may serve a priest at a time.

The material components for this spell are the priest's holy symbol and a large gem of at least 1,000 gp value, which must be sacrificed to the deity in the casting.

Sixth-Level Spells

Dying Curse (Abjuration)

Sphere: Protection
Range: Unlimited
Components: V,S
Duration: Permanent until dispelled
Casting Time: 2 turns
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

When the priest casts a dying curse spell, he is avenging himself against future death. Anyone who kills the priest, even if the priest is later resurrected, becomes the victim of a major curse, with no saving throw. Only a wish or a remove bane spell can remove this curse.

Resist Magic (Abjuration)

Sphere: Guardian
Range: 0
Components: V,S
Duration: 2 rounds/level
Casting Time: 8
Area of Effect: The caster
Saving Throw: None

This spell grants the priest 2% magic resistance per level of the priest, to a maximum of 40%. This magic resistance functions identically to the magic resistance possessed by certain monsters and bestowed by certain powerful artifacts and relics. This spell effect can be cast only upon the priest, not upon others.

Seventh-Level Spells

Bane (Abjuration)

Reversible
Sphere: Protection
Range: Touch
Components: V,S
Duration: Permanent until dispelled
Casting Time: 9
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: Special

When a priest casts a bane spell, he bestows an extremely powerful curse on the target.

After casting the spell, the priest must touch the intended target within one turn, or the spell expires. If he makes contact, the target gets a saving throw. If the saving throw is successful, the victim receives a major curse, which only a re- move curse spell (if cast by a Power), or a reverse bane or a wish can remove. If the saving throw fails, the victim suffers the following effects: a -5 penalty to all attack and damage rolls, while opponents receive +5 bonus to their attack rolls against the victim; the victim fails all saving throws, and all attacks against him cause maximum damage.

The reverse of this spell, reverse bane, removes the effect of any curse spell, except for instantaneous curse effects (e.g., it won't teleport the party back to the dungeon after they've opened the cursed scroll).

Timewarp (Alteration/Divination)

Sphere: Divination
Range: 0
Components: V,S
Duration: Instantaneous
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: 1 creature
Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the priest to send a being back in time. The timewarp has a maximum range of two minutes, which enables the character to go back to an action he made in the previous round and negate it. It also grants new saving throws, attack and damage rolls, and forces opponents to make similar rolls. Note that this affects only those directly involved with the target; it does not give everyone in melee new rolls, just the target and those attacking him. This spell ages the caster one year.

The material component is sand.

MAGICAL ITEMS

“An item of great utility is one to be cherished into eternity.”

—A saying on the tomb of Pharaoh Ramenhorus III in the Great Vale

Potions

While not renowned for their skill in alchemy, the mages of Mulhorand and Unther have long experimented with devising potions, oils, and other similar products. Here are a few of them:

Oil of Agelessness: This oil is made from the nectar of roses from the gardens of Ishtar in Unther. When one vial of this oil is applied to the body of a human or demihuman, the normal aging process halts for six months.

Continued applications, therefore, can keep one young indefinitely. The secret of this oil is known only to the priestesses of Ishtar. It is one of the most eagerly sought secrets of southern magic.

XP Value: 800

Oil of Armor: This thin, nearly invisible oil is applied to skin to give it the toughness of armor. Each application lasts 6 + 1d6 hours. Its base AC is 4, modified by Dexterity and rings of protection. There are no cumulative effects with armor.

Oil of armor is used in Unther, where certain priesthoods forbid the wearing of armor.

XP Value: 400

Oil of Beauty: This oil, a mixture of olive oil, crushed pearl, and ash from the Purple Plains, is used by the priestesses of Ishtar. When this is placed on their bodies, their Charisma increases by 1d4 points for 1 + 1d3 turns. This does not ensure that those who view them will fall madly in love with them, but it does enable them to make a good impression.

XP Value: 400

Powder of Obsession: This pink powder is used as a defense by the priestesses of Isis, though only on rare occasions. This magical powder is cast into a ten-foot-radius sphere, at a range of 30 feet. When it is cast, those who are caught in its area of effect must roll successful saving throws vs. spell or they pursue their actions mindlessly. If they fail the saving throw and are in combat, they do not care who they attack, even if it one of their comrades; they continue to attack the nearest target for 4 + 3d4 rounds.

If the target is eating or drinking, he continues that activity for the duration of this oil's influence, even to the point of eating or drinking other people's beverages, not stopping even if attacked.

XP Value: 500

Rings

Rings are a common decoration among the nobles of Mulhorand, and most wear at least one magical ring. Rings are often handed down from generation to generation as a token of remembrance, though in Mulhorand many of the most powerful magical rings are buried with nobles at death.

Ring of Dizziness: This cursed magical item is sometimes found in the tombs of Mulhorand, placed there to punish grave robbers. This appears to be a normal magical ring, perhaps a ring of protection. When used in an actual combat where the wearer may be hurt, the wearer becomes violently dizzy. The wearer must roll a successful saving throw vs. spell or be unable to attack. Even if the saving throw is successful, all of the victim's attacks suffer a -4 penalty to the attack roll, and all attacks against him gain a +4 bonus to the attack roll.

XP Value: None

Ring of Immunity: When this ring is worn, the wearer becomes immune to all diseases and infections. This includes magical diseases, such as lycanthropy and mummy rot. The character regains the maximum number of hit points per day (3 hit points) from rest, as he need not be bothered by fever or infection, regardless of his level of activity.

This ring is a simple silver circle, and is another creation of the incarnations of Thoth.

XP Value: 1,000

Ring of Protection From Undead:

This charged magical item is a band of white gold, with the insignia of Horus-Re on its front. When any undead tries to touch the wearer, the wearer has the option of using one charge to prevent contact. Use of a charge must be declared before the undead rolls its attack against the wearer. Each charge prevents the wearer from being struck by any undead in that round (if the wearer is being attacked by two wights, one charge prevents contact from both of them).

This does not protect the character when he is surprised. The ring contains 25 + 3d10 charges.

XP Value: 2,500

Ring of Strength: This ring, made from the finger bone of a stone giant, gives its wearer exceptional strength. Those who wear a ring of strength gain the following Strength (depending on which ring they have):

D100 Roll	Strength	XP Value
01-35	18 (00)	1,500
36-65	19	2,000
66-80	20	2,500
81-00	Cursed!	—

A ring of strength may be worn by all classes. A cursed ring has the equivalent Strength of 21, but if the wearer is in melee, he sees his friends as his enemies (and vice versa) and attacks his friends. A ring of strength is not cumulative with other forms of Strength enhancers (girdles, gauntlets, etc.)

Ring of Thunder: This charged magical item was a gift to Jurnail, a high priest of Anhur, from his friends in the priesthood of Thoth several centuries ago. It was almost certainly crafted by Azonthoth, an incarnation of Thoth. The ring is silver with a lion's face engraved in gold with a topaz mane.

This ring is a powerful defensive and offensive weapon. It can emit a bolt of lightning that inflicts 10d6 points of damage (successful saving throw vs. spell cuts this damage in half) per round to all creatures in a ten-foot radius except the ring wearer. Each charge lasts one turn; a ring of thunder typically has 25 + 6d6 charges.

XP Value: 4,000

Ring of Windwarding: When this ring is worn, a ten-foot-radius area around the bearer is protected from all winds. All within its area of effect are shielded from wind storms, gust of wind spells, attacks by air elementals, etc. If the wearer is caught in the middle of a sandstorm or a blizzard, this ring prevents the wearer from being affected.

XP Value: 1,000

Rods, Staves, and Wands

The staff was the original symbol of authority in the Old Empires, so it is not surprising that many of these items were first developed in this part of the Realms.

There a number of new and deadly staves, rods, and wands that have recently seen use:

Rod of Generalship: This magical rod is a two-foot-long scepter of pure gold, decorated with rubies, diamonds, and pearls. When this rod is raised in battle, the troops commanded by the general gain a +2 bonus to their attack and damage rolls and morale, and a -2 bonus to their Armor Class.

This effect lasts 3d4 turns and may be used only once per day. This rod may be used once per day; it has a 200-yard-radius area of effect. It is a favored battlefield item of the priests of Assuran of the Three Thunders. It has also been used by the priests of Horus-Re and Anhur. Three of these items are known to exist.

XP Value: 5,000

Staff of Fury: This staff is used in conjunction with a wizard's normal arsenal of spells. When a wizard casts spells and holds this device, all spells add +1 to their casting time, but become devastatingly powerful. Damage spells gain +1 per die, even exceeding maximums. All saving throws against the wizard's spells suffer a -2 penalty. Each time this function is used, it drains the staff of a charge.

This staff can also be used as a defensive weapon. In this case, the caster cannot perform any offensive action that round, but he may use the staff to block up to three successful attacks each round, be it with a weapon in melee, or at range with a missile weapon. Each block drains the staff of one charge; the wizard must specify how many potential attacks he is blocking at the start of the round. The staff is rechargeable.

XP Value: 8,000

Staff of the Necromancer: This staff belongs to Hodkamset, the most powerful mage in the service of the god Set (with the exception of his incarnations). Hodkamset made this alabaster staff from the spine bones of a dragon.

Hodkamset pursued the art of necromancy and built this item to aid in his spellcasting. It was stolen from him by the priests of Osiris in battle two years ago, but assassins of Set retrieved it before the priests could destroy it, and once again Hodkamset wields it.

It has a maximum of 25 charges, and absorbs magic as a staff of the magi. In addition, it has the following powers, which cost no charges: detect magic, speak with dead, protection from good.

The following powers cost one charge per use: animate dead, darkness 15' radius, dispel magic, hold person.

The following powers cost two charges per use: command undead, enfeeble, feeblemind, life level drain *.

* This attack drains one life level, has a 100-foot range, and automatically strikes one target within that range, no saving throw.

XP Value: 13,000

Wand of Salt: This evil wand is used by the followers of the Cult of Tiamat.

This item produces powerful cramps and thirst pangs in any who are struck by its beam, so they suffer 2d6 points of damage per round (half if a saving throw vs. wand is successful, with a new saving throw applicable each round). This continues until they spend one full round drinking water, in which case the cramps stop. This wand can also render a 50' by 50' section of land infertile. This wand is made of saltsteel, a magically hardened salt whose making is known only to the mages of Unther. The surface is overlain with sand to give it a sparkling appearance. Only two of these cruel weapons are known to exist.

XP Value: 5,000

Wand of Sleep: This wand is constructed from green willow vines from Ganathwood that are entwined and enchanted to become hard as stone. When the command word is spoken, the wand emits an 80-foot-long cone of sleeping gas, ten feet wide at its base and 30 feet wide at its end. All caught in this cone must roll successful saving throws vs. wand or fall asleep for 3d4 rounds.

Creatures with immunities to sleep have their normal resistance against the effect of this wand. This wand may be used only by a wizard.

XP Value: 4,000

Wand of Water-Finding: This useful item has saved many travelers in the desert heat. If this wand is activated within 50 miles of any source of drinking water, the wand begins to vibrate; the closer the wand is to water, the stronger the wand vibrates. If water lies beneath the surface at a depth of 500 feet or less, the wand shoots a beam into the earth that draws water to the surface. The water found by this wand is always drinkable; it may not be pure, but it generally does not adversely affect the health of the character.

XP Value: 2,000

Miscellaneous Magic

As one might expect, miscellaneous magical items of new and unusual types are plentiful in the south. Here are only a few examples:

Amulet of Protection From Alignment Change: This magical talisman has a ruby as its centerpiece. This amulet protects the wearer against the effects of magic designed to fundamentally alter a person's alignment. While this does not protect a character from spells that charm the character into actions that he wouldn't normally do, it does prevent the effects of a helm of opposite alignment and similar items. It cannot stop the alignment reversal process of an artifact or relic, but may (at the DM's option) slow it down.

XP Value: 3,000

Book of Thoth: This is not one of the three famed tomes of the god Thoth, but rather a tome written by his incarnation. It is a large, worn, leather-bound brown volume without a title, fixed with a lock in the shape of a baboon's head. Once per day, it can perform a legend lore spell on any item that is placed on its cover; when this occurs, the book opens and turns to a page where the legend of the item is described. The book closes once the entry is read and locks itself. Should the book be forced open, the caster finds that all pages are blank, and the book is never useful again.

XP Value: 3,000

The Claw of Nezram: The great wizard Nezram made a number of unique magical items before he left the Realms for parts unknown. One of the most unusual is the claw of Nezram. It is a replica of a humanoid hand made from ivory, studded with rubies, with sharp claws instead of fingers.

The claw has several functions. Its mundane function causes it to scratch any part of the wielder's body on command, to relieve an itch. If ordered into combat, the claw has two options. First, it may slash at an opponent, causing 1d6 points of damage; if it inflicts maximum damage on any attack, it grabs the target around the throat and causes 2d10 points of damage per round until the target is dead. Second, it may grab at a target's weapon hand, negating one attack each melee round (e.g., if a victim has 3/2 attacks, he loses his first-round attack and one of his second-round attacks). The claw is AC 0. If 50 points of sharp-edged damage is done to it, it stops attacking for 24 hours; 200 points of such damage completely destroys it.

The claw is intelligent; any new master trying to control it must battle against a neutral alignment, 12 Int, and 16 Ego (as per intelligent swords). The hand glows red if rubies (other than the ones embedded on the hand) are within 50 feet.

Nezram is known to have constructed at least five claws, one of which is in the possession of Hodkamset, the most powerful wizard of the Cult of Set.

XP Value: 3,750

Dice of Chancelessness: This insidious magical item was created by Huriot, an enterprising follower of Mask and the greatest Prince of Thieves that Skuld has ever known. Five centuries ago, he was captured, convicted of grave robbing, and brought to the pharaoh for his final justice. Huriot persuaded the pharaoh to let a game of chance decide his fate: If he won, he would be sold into slavery, and if he lost, he would be executed. He brought out a pair of dice.

These dice were magical, created by a great wizard. They would roll any number that the owner desired; in the hands of the owner, they would roll what he wanted, while in the hands of another, they would roll as the original owner desired. The pharaoh detected the magic, discovered what they were, and used his divine powers to reverse the effect.

Huriot had planned to lose the game, gambling that a display of honesty might earn a pardon from a magnanimous pharaoh. He won instead and was placed in slavery for the rest of his days.

No one ever heard of Huriot again, except for an inscription in that pharaoh's tomb: "Huriot was here."

XP Value: 500

Gloves of Lightning: This magical item, usable by all classes, is a powerful weapon. Once every three rounds (up to three times a day), the wearer may point at a single target and fire a strong burst of electricity that automatically strikes. This burst inflicts 8d6 points of damage (a successful saving throw vs. wand cuts this in half).

Gloves of lightning cannot be worn with gauntlets; both gloves are necessary to fire the lightning.

XP Value: 2,000

Horn of Command: This horn amplifies the sound of one's voice so that it can be heard three times farther than normal.

The greatest ability of this item, however, is its suggestion power. Once each day, a person using the horn can issue a suggestion to all within a 60-foot radius. A successful saving throw vs. spell negates this effect (but only for that individual). The person using the horn may direct the command at a single being (giving a penalty of -3 to the saving throw) or at all of the beings within the radius (each gets a saving throw). The suggestion must be in a language the affected beings understand.

XP Value: 2,000

Jewel of Karathoth: This powerful item, one of the greatest creations of the incarnations of Thoth, is a jewel with 1d3 + 4 facets. Activating this jewel creates an exact duplicate of the activating character, which under the character's complete control. This duplicate fights, casts spells, and uses magical items as the user wills. This duplicate lasts for 3 + 1d4 turns, then vanishes.

Once a duplicate is killed, or once he disappears, one facet of the jewel cracks and cannot be used again. Once all facets are cracked, the gem is useless. Only one character can be summoned out of the jewel at a time; a new duplicate cannot be summoned until 48 hours have passed. When a duplicate disappears or is killed, all of his magical items disappear.

The effects of all spells cast by the duplicate disappear with the duplicate, excluding spells with an instantaneous effect (the effects of a duplicate's fireball spell do not disappear, but the effects of his haste spell do). A duplicate is also forbidden to use any sort of creation magic, including wishes.

The jewel is typically one of the more valuable gemstones (no specific variety is needed), and when one glances into it, one can see the faint impression of an ibis, Thoth's symbol.

XP Value: 5,000

Necklace of Protection Against Charm: This beautiful item is worn by the Precepts of Mulhorand. It is a gold collar that hangs down to the chest, studded with gems. It provides a +4 bonus to all saving throws against charm/enchantment magic. Furthermore, by looking into the gems of this necklace, the wearer is aware of the identity and location of the spellcaster. Protections against scrying prevent this effect.

XP Value: 2,000

Robes of Protection: These robes were typically worn only by the priests of Horus-Re, but they are now worn by priests of many different religions. They are said to be sewn by priestesses of Nephthys.

These robes, soft to wear but solid against the blows of the enemy, are emblazoned with the symbol of the appropriate deity. They provide protection for Mulhorand priests in battle and in places where it is not acceptable to wear armor. Roll on the following table to determine the Armor Class protection of a particular robe:

D100 Roll	Armor Class	XP Value
01-05	6	2,000
06-15	5	2,500
16-35	4	3,000
36-50	3	3,500
51-70	2	4,000
71-85	1	5,000
86-00	0	6,000

Only members of the priest class may wear these robes. They are almost never seen outside of Mulhorand.

Scarab of Life: This is a jeweled beetle inset on an ankh. When this is worn on the brow of a priest, it enables him to cure critical wounds, once per day, and raise dead once per week. Any use of this item has a 10% chance of rendering it inoperative; command words are necessary to use either function.

XP Value: 3,000

Scarab of Venom: This is a scarab-shaped gem, much favored by warriors in the service of Set. When placed on the hilt of their swords, it coats the blade with a poison, up to two times per day (wielder decides when). This poison causes an extra 3d4 points of damage immediately (no saving throw), and the victim must also roll a successful saving throw vs. poison or die in 1d4 rounds.

This poison lasts 1d4 rounds on the blade, then evaporates.

XP Value: 2,000

Stone of Everburning: This stone is unremarkable, except that it radiates searing heat at all times. If a stone of everburning contacts exposed flesh, it inflicts 1d3 points of damage for each round of contact. The stone's most remarkable property is its longevity; some have stayed hot over 3,000 years, even when continuously immersed in water. These items are used in the steam engines of Mulhorand.

XP Value: 500

Talisman of the Beast: This item was created by the Beast-cults, which were quite popular in Mulhorand and Unther at the height of their second empires (circa 1 DR), but have since been forgotten.

These talismans have two functions: first, they enable their wearers to communicate with animals at will, and second, they enable the wearers to change into the form of an animal three times per day. These animals cannot be monsters or giant-sized animals, simply normal beasts, from the size of a fly to that of an elephant, bear, or tiger.

While in animal form, the character has the hit points and Armor Class of his human form, but all the special abilities of the beast that he has transformed himself into. The wearer must revert into his human form (or demihuman or humanoid form) before taking on the characteristics of an animal again.

The talisman is a string of multi-colored beads strung on papyrus reeds, which spin to form animal pictures. Only two of these talismans are known to exist.

XP Value: 2,500

Talisman of Tongues: This medallion enables an individual to understand all languages and their writings, as per a tongues or comprehend languages spell. The talisman of tongues also enables the wearer to speak these languages. Furthermore, it enables the wearer to read magic and read Mulhorand magic, at will.

Only one of these talismans is known to exist, since the priests of Thoth have been hunting them down and destroying them to prevent foreigners from being able to decipher the secrets of Mulhorandi magic.

XP Value: 3,500

Talons of the Danse Macabre: These items were created by the priests of Hoar/Assuran in Chessenta; eight pairs are known to exist, most scattered among treasure hoards across the Realms. These magical items appear to be eagle's talons, plated in a dull silver that resembles pewter. When two of them are thrown down, and the proper command word is given, they immediately attack, causing 2d4 points of damage per round for one turn before they become inactive for 24 hours. They can be stopped with the proper command word, or a successful dispel magic spell cast against 12th-level magic (which also neutralizes them for 24 hours). No weapon can touch them in combat and they appear to be indestructible.

XP Value: 3,000

Weed of the Witch (Witchweed): The foul fumes of this weed affect all wizards. When burned, it produces a 30-foot-radius vaporous cloud. Any wizard within its vapors begins to cough violently, is unable to cast spells, and suffers 2 points of damage per round. The weed burns for 10 + 1d6 rounds.

This long green weed is grown and used frequently in Luthcheq, a city in Chessenta where wizards are forbidden. When burned, it produces a foul stench similar to burning tobacco.

Witchweed is typically bundled in shipments of 13 stalks.

XP Value: 1,000

Swords, Daggers, Miscellaneous Weapons, and Armor

While the people of the Old Empire are powerful mages, they are not renowned for creating weapons of might. Nonetheless, a number of noteworthy weapons have been produced in Mulhorand over the course of time.

Armor of Horus: This armor is scale mail +4. It is the equivalent of AC 2, and also gives the wearer resistance to all fire and lightning attacks (fire and lightning attacks automatically inflict only ½ damage, ¼ damage if the appropriate saving throw is successful).

XP: 3,500

Dagger of Set: This horrible, snake-shaped blade is a throwing dagger used by warriors in the service of Set.

It is a dagger +2, with a typical range. Should it roll a natural 19 or 20, it has found a vital organ of its victim and kills him instantly. Furthermore, it remains in the wound and continues to inflict 1d4 + 2 points of damage each round, until it is pulled free (an 18 or greater Strength is required to pull it from the wound; the action takes one round). For each round it is in the wound, roll 1d20; if a 19 or 20 is ever rolled, it has found a vital organ and killed its target.

The number of daggers of Set that exist is unknown.

XP Value: 2,000

The Bladeless Sword: This sword was created by the smith Holin. It has a hilt of solid silver (a much rarer metal in the south than gold) and is encrusted with opals. The blade itself is magical; it is invisible and intangible, seemingly without existence. The blade is really in the Ethereal plane; it harms only those creatures that require magical weapons to strike them.

It causes double damage to any creature affected only by magic, and it inflicts triple damage to undead. For the purposes of calculating damage, it is considered to be a khopesh sword +4.

XP Value: 4,000

Staff of Osiris: This staff is made out of dark brown mahogany and is covered with painted hieroglyphs. It is a quarterstaff +3. It is a favored weapon of the priests of Osiris; at least 20 are known to still exist today.

In addition to its attacks, the staff blocks one successful attack each round; the first successful melee attack against the wielder is automatically negated. This does not prevent ranged attacks, such as missile weapons and spells, from causing damage but it does stop sword thrusts, other staves, daggers, and other melee weapons.

In spite of its name, a staff of Osiris may be used by any priesthood, including Set's.

XP Value: 1,500

Staff of Stunning: This is a quarterstaff +3, with the added benefit that, on a natural roll of 18-20, a blow from this quarterstaff knocks the opponent unconscious (no saving throw) for 3d4 rounds. If a natural 18-20 is not a successful attack against the opponent, the staff has no effect.

These staves are typically made from yew; many of them are used by sailors on the Alamber Sea.

XP Value: 1,000

Artifacts and Relics

There are many artifacts and relics native to the Old Empires; this entire book could easily be filled with these items. Here are only a few of the most famous ones:

Ankh of Life: This powerful symbol of divinity was lost millennia ago in the Orcgate Wars. It was the holy symbol of the manifestation of Re. It is a worn and dirty rod of birch wood, without any ornamentation, one foot long, in the shape of an ankh.

It has the following powers: resurrection (2/day), restoration (3/day), regenerate (3/day), destroy undead, 30' radius (3/day), continual light (at will).

The destroy undead power slays all undead of less than 7 HD (or levels), and inflicts 12d8 points of damage (no saving throw) to all undead of 7 Hit Dice or higher.

If used by a mortal, the ankh drains one level of experience each time a power is used (and only a wish directly granted from a deity can restore the lost level).

This relic is sought after by the priests of Horus-Re and Osiris, as they wish to place it with the mummified body of the manifestation of Re in the Tower of Eternity in Skuld. Any who present it to an incarnation or manifestation of either god would be richly rewarded.

Chariot of Re: There were originally three of these artifacts, the chariots of the gods Re, Horus, and Osiris, in the days before the Orcgate Wars. Only one is known to still exist; the Chariot of Re is the oldest of the artifacts of great magic still in active use in Mulhorand. Legend speaks of it being constructed by a god named Ptah, who has never been worshiped in the Realms, even in the old days of Mulhorand.

The Chariot of Re is constructed from gold, emblazoned with Re's solar disc against an ankh. The chariot can move, without horses, at a speed of up to 96; any who fight from it receive a bonus of -4 to their Armor Class, and those attacking them receive a -4 penalty to their attack and damage rolls. Those who ride in the chariot are 75% magic resistant. Anyone struck by an attack from the chariot has to roll a successful saving throw vs. spell or suffer blindness for 2d4 turns. The chariot also grants a +4 bonus to the morale rating of all friendly troops within a 200-yard radius, and it gives a -4 morale penalty to enemy troops within that radius.

Font of Time: This powerful artifact is located somewhere in eastern Mulhorand. Little is known about it, except for a few words in the Unique Mageries, a book of spells belonging to the wizard Nezram:

"Of all the artifacts created by the ancients, the most marvelous and terrifying was the great Font. This was a pearl-white pool, contained in a milk-colored crystal that appeared in a mirage in the eastern wastes. The waters were too bitter to drink. But if one looked into the font in the light of a full moon, one could see scenes from the antiquity of Mulhorand that one would swear were real. And indeed they are. For if one concentrates on that image—...but I shall say no more, in hopes that none shall follow where I have traveled."

No knowledge exists about the origin of the font, except in the archives of Thoth. The font of time can enable any who look into it, during a full moon only, to see images of Mulhorand in the days of its original empire. It is possible to possess the body of an individual from that image, and thus experience life in Mulhorand at the height of its power. To return home, one must find one's way to the font at the time of the new moon, when it is possible to look back at one's self, and return to one's own form.

Galley of the Gods: This ship was used by the people of Unther in several naval battles, most notably in the defeat of the Narfell Armada. It is said to have been constructed by a deity named Enki, though he has never been actively worshiped in the Realms. This galley is 200 feet long, 30 feet wide, and requires 150 oarsmen. It has a cargo capacity of 250 tons and can support up to 300 marines for an extended trip.

The ship has a 95% seaworthiness rating, and a movement of 15 mph when fully crewed (450 yards per round), or 25 mph at emergency speed (750 yards per round). In extreme emergencies, the ship can sprout dragon wings and lift off the water at emergency speed.

This flight lasts a maximum of one turn. At least 120 oarsmen are required for the ship to fly.

The ship has a dragon prow with multiple heads chained together (the symbol of the ancient gods' victory over Tiamat). The prow is magical; it can shoot a 6d6 lightning ball (20-foot diameter) up to 400 yards, once per turn. The lightning ball can be fired only when the prow is facing its target. Those caught in its area of effect can roll saving throws vs. spell; success means that the victim suffered only ½ damage.

The ship and those within the ship are immune to fire and lightning. The ship itself has a 35% magic resistance. In times of war it is armed with four ballistae (two on each side) and a rear catapult. The Lords of Unther have used this as a military and a cargo vessel.

Recently, this vessel has been stolen from its berth in Unthalass by pirates. It is believed to be hidden somewhere in the waters near the Ship of the Gods.

Long before the coming of the lizard folk, a race of giants walked the Realms. They were destroyed by a great plague, but during their days of glory they built many magical marvels, among which were magical warriors that fought their battles for them. These warriors would defend their monuments, of which they were extremely proud, so that no creature who came after them could destroy the memory of their race.

Of the magical warriors, the only ones that survive are the Statues-That-Walk, also known as stone colossi. Each colossus is really an extremely powerful stone golem.

Combat: The colossus is similar to a stone golem, except that it is larger and cannot cast a slow spell. A colossus is programmed only to attack with its fists; it never uses a weapon. It has a Strength of 23 for the purposes of breaking or throwing things.

A +2 or better weapon is needed to harm a colossus. A rock to mud spell slows them for 2d6 rounds. Its reverse, mud to rock, heals all damage inflicted upon the colossus. A flesh to stone spell does not harm a colossus, but it renders the colossus vulnerable to normal attacks in the following round. All other magic has no effect against it.

The stone colossus has one special attack form. Its march is so terrifying that all creatures of less than 3 Hit Dice immediately flee for 2d6 rounds, dropping whatever they have in their hands, while those between 3 Hit Dice and 5 Hit Dice must roll successful saving throws vs. wand to resist this fear. Any creature above 5 Hit Dice (or levels) is automatically immune.

Habitat/Society: A colossus is an automaton, artificially created and under the direct control of whomever is able to manipulate the runes of its creation. Once it is activated, a colossus tries to destroy any edifices it discovers that were not constructed by its creators; this is part of its programming. Its programming may be altered, but none have discovered the ritual as yet. To stop it when it is on a rampage requires a ritual that takes days to perform and glyphs to be drawn on every single colossus, active or inactive.

Ecology: Colossi are not natural creatures. Thus they play no part in the ecology of the world. They neither eat, sleep, nor really live. They perform their assigned tasks until they are destroyed, deactivated, or the tasks are completed.

Brown dragons, also known as great desert dragons, migrated from the desert Raurin and now frequent much of the wastes in Eastern Mulhorand. Brown dragons prefer to tunnel deep into the desert sands, where they sleep in a burrow at night, surfacing to attack prey. While they can survive indefinitely on a diet of rock and sand, live meat is their preferred game.

Brown dragons are ferocious beasts; while they are intelligent, they view human beings as food, and they believe that it is strange to talk with one's meal.

Brown dragons do not have wings and cannot fly.

Brown dragons have a coloration similar to that of desert sands, ranging from dim brown at hatchling stage to almost white at great wyrms stage. They have small, webbed claws that are well developed for digging, and very large, long mouths. Their scales are leathery and not as hard as other dragon armors.

Brown dragons have their own tongue, and they speak that and the language of blue dragons. They have a 5% chance per age category of being able to communicate with any intelligent creature.

Combat: Brown dragons prefer to dig deep trenches in the sand, waiting for prey to appear so they may ambush them.

When absolutely still, they have a 9 in 10 chance of hearing a man-sized creature's footsteps on the desert sands, even from a depth of 500 feet below the surface.

When they breach the desert sand, they do so with incredible silence, imposing a -5 penalty to opponents' surprise rolls. Older brown dragons use illusions, or even invisibility spells to conceal themselves from unwitting prey.

When brown dragons grab their prey, they hold it in their jaws, taking it to their lairs to be eaten when it is most convenient.

The brown dragon's breath weapon is a powerful acid, which it spews in a five-foot-wide spray that extends in a 60-foot-long straight line from the dragon's head. All creatures caught in this spray can roll a saving throw vs. breath weapon for half damage.

A brown dragon will use this spray against large numbers of individuals, but not against mounted foes, since it knows that horses are good eating and don't put up as much struggle as humans. Brown dragons cast spells as 8th-level wizards.

Brown dragons are born immune to acid and the effects of the desert heat. They may survive in airless environments nearly indefinitely.

Dragon, Brown

As they age, brown dragons gain the following abilities:

Age	Abilities
Young	Cast create sand to cover up their burrows
Juvenile	Cast create water once per day
Adult	Cast sandstorm , as per the Mulhorandi spell, once per day
Venerable	Can summon a 12-HD earth elemental
Great wyrm	Cast disintegrate once per day

Habitat/Society: Brown dragons are found in deserts, often close to settled areas. They are fierce and savage creatures, who equate their own cruelty with that of the desert heat. They typically dwell in deep burrows nearly 1,000 feet beneath the sand, where they carve out vast chambers, often looting ancient forgotten treasures for their hoards. During the day, they tunnel upward, listening silently for hours, waiting for food to come.

The brown dragon mates and raises a family for only a short period of time; all parents encountered are in the mature adult stage of development. Many brown dragons do not mate, but live their lives in solitude.

Man is the main enemy of brown dragons. Humans hunt them for their hide and treasure. Blue dragons, which like to burrow into the desert sand, also attack brown dragons.

Battles between brown and blue dragons are legendary for their ferocity. The people of the desert have a curious respect for the brown dragon, so these tales often make the blue dragons look more evil than the brown.

Ecology: Brown dragons are able to digest sand and other mineral materials to sustain themselves over long periods of time. However, meat is their preferred diet, with horseflesh being a particular favorite.

A hakeashar, also known as an eater-of-magic, appears as a bright red sphere. Their bodies pulse and glow as they drift about. They can seep through finger-width cracks with great ease.

Hakeashar are relatives of the nishruu. These weird, thankfully rare creatures are believed to come from an alternate Prime Material plane. Within the red mist comprising the body of a hakeashar are hundreds of grasping hands, probing eyes, and gaping hungry mouths.

Combat: Hakeashar have no attacks. Fire and physical attacks affect them normally; those who are wrapped in a hakeashar are automatically hit by these attack forms.

Hakeashar can sense magic within a 600-foot radius; they always move toward the greatest concentration of magic within that area. Hakeashar move fearlessly and relentlessly toward sources of magic, taking full damage from physical attacks. Mind control spells and illusions have no effect on them.

Spells cast at a hakeashar are absorbed by it, having no effect except to give the creature hit points of life energy equal to the damage the spell normally does. A non-damaging spell gives a hakeashar extra hit points equal to the spells level.

Chargeable magical items are drained of 1d4 charges upon contact with a hakeashar. If contact is continued, the 1d4 drain occurs at the end of every second round.

All magical items and artifacts are nonoperational while in contact with a hakeashar. Artifacts do not function for one round after such contact ceases; magical items have their powers negated for 1d4 rounds after contact ends. If a potion or scroll is used while in contact with a hakeashar, it does not take effect until 1d4 rounds after the contact is broken.

Spellcasters of all classes who are enveloped by a hakeashar lose one memorized spell, determined randomly, at first contact, and one per round after.

Each time a loss occurs, the spellcaster must roll a successful saving throw vs. breath weapon or become feebleminded.

When a hakeashar is slain, its body dissipates, losing luminosity and hue, seeming to sink to the ground. Any magical item within its body area when it is slain, or any magical weapon slaying it, even if no longer in contact with the body, receives a magical bonus of 1d6 additional charges, or a second use in the case of a one-shot item, such as a scroll or an arrow. Potions, memorized spells, artifacts, and items that do not have charges are not augmented.

Habitat/Society: Hakeashar are not native to this Prime Material plane.

They are solitary creatures.

A hakeashar has the ability to give 20% of the number of spells or charges absorbed to a person. This is done very unwillingly, usually in exchange for being brought to this Prime Material plane.

Ecology: Hakeashar feed on magic. Their life spans are measured in centuries.

Werecrocodiles are the creations of Sebek, a crocodile-headed minor deity in the Mulhorandi pantheon. Very few Sebek-spawn remain in Mulhorand, having been driven off by the servants of the god-kings five centuries ago, but they thrive in Chessenta's Adderswamp.

In their human form, werecrocodiles are tall, thin creatures with sharp features, a long nose and chin, and a thin face with a noticeable overbite. In their crocodile-form, they are very long, big, and powerful monsters. They speak Mulhorandi and the common tongue, and can speak with crocodiles at will.

Combat: In combat, werecrocodiles prefer to assume their human form. They try to trick their prey into assuming they are harmless. Werecrocodiles are infamous for playing on people's sympathy by pretending to be grieving. Once the prey is in close range, they change to crocodile form and attack. They can bite with their huge jaws and sharp teeth for 2-12 points of damage, and lash out with their tails for 1-8 points of damage.

Werecrocodiles have an 18 Strength. They use this to sometimes grab their opponents, drag them deep underwater, change to crocodile form, and attempt to drown them. Every point of damage received from a werecrocodile bite equals a 1% chance of turning into a werecrocodile at the next full moon (if a victim takes 20 points of damage, there is a 20% chance of contracting lycanthropy).

Werecrocodiles are able to summon 1d3 regular crocodiles, which obey their every command.

Habitat/Society: Werecrocodiles live in small family groups. The mother is usually the leader of the family pack.

Mating occurs within their own kind, and werecrocodiles are born live from the mother's womb; they attain the ability to transform into a crocodile at the onset of puberty.

Werecrocodiles live in mud shacks by the edge of rivers or in swamps. They usually assume crocodile form to find prey, then assume human form at night to sleep. They are very territorial and attack any human, demihuman, or humanoid that enters their territory, though they will try to be as subtle as possible before springing their trap.

Werecrocodiles worship the god Sebek. Clerics of Sebek can advance to 5th level as priests; they receive 1d4 extra hit points per level.

Werecrocodiles do not collect treasure or possessions. They stay away from populated human settlements. They do not particularly enjoy killing humans, but humans are too tasty to resist.

Ecology: Werecrocodiles are biologically identical to humans, except for the curse of lycanthropy. They prey on both warm-blooded creatures and fish native to the swamps. They eat any wererats native to the swamps. No one preys on werecrocodiles except humans, so werecrocodiles try to have as little conflict with large bands of humans as possible.

Each divinity of the Mulhorandi pantheon has a number of magical servitors, known as minions. Each minion is a fanatical follower of the deity and serves his ends at all costs.

Divine minions serve as messengers of the deities. In the case of the minions of Set, they also serve as assassins and as military assistance for his mortal worshipers. They appear as great warriors, well over six feet tall and quite broad, in bronze plate armor that is decorated with the symbol of their deity.

Combat: Divine minions are capable of taking a number of different forms. Armor Class, Hit Dice, and hit points remain the same, while they acquire the movement rate, attacks, and special attacks of each form. The stats of these forms are as follows:

Form	Move	#AT	Dmg	SA
Baboon	12	1	1-4 +1	Nil
Bear	12	3	1-6/1-6/1-8	Hug
Crocodile	6, Sw 12	2	2-8/1-12	Nil

Lion	12	3	1-4/1-4/1-8	Rear claws
Scorpion	12	3	1-8/1-8/1-4	Sting
Snake	15	1	1-3	Venom

All minions roll their attacks and saving throws as 10th-level fighters; this is reflected in the THACO stat above.

The minions of each deity in the Mulhorandi pantheon can assume a number of different forms, as follows:

Anhur: Lion
 Horus-Re: Hawk, Lion
 Isis: Hawk
 Nephthys: Hawk, Crocodile
 Osiris: Hawk, Bear
 Set (any 3): Bear, Jackal, Snake, Scorpion, Crocodile
 Thoth: Ibis, Baboon

Habitat/Society: Divine minions are creatures touched by divine power. They serve the deities of the Mulhorandi pantheon; hundreds live in the deities' towers in Skuld. With the exception of Set, all minions are willing volunteers to divine service; they forfeit life in return for the honor of working for their deity throughout eternity.

Set's volunteers are less willing, as his touch can transform its victim into a minion of Set. These lawful evil creatures are by far the most active divine minions, as the others prefer not to be noticed by mortals unless specially called by magic.

Ecology: Divine minions are supernatural creatures; they need not eat or drink.

Their armor and all possessions disappear when slain, and they carry no treasures.

Skriaxits, the blackstorms, the living sandstorms, are the most feared creatures in the deserts of the east. When the ancient gods were defeated by those lords of Raurin who would later become the god-kings of Mulhorand, the ancient gods summoned spirits of retribution that destroyed all that had not been demolished in the war. When the god-kings fled Raurin, these spirits took the land as their own domain, with each pack stirring from slumber every century to wreak havoc on all that oppose them.

Skriaxits are powerful and intelligent air elementals that take the sand and dust of the desert and whirl it to create their ten-foot-tall forms. It is as a pack that they create their greatest terror, generating huge winds and a fierce sandstorm that can render a human fleshless in minutes. They speak the tongue of air elementals and their own language, a howling, shrieking tongue that frightens most humans who hear it.

Combat: Skriaxits move by creating a large vortex of wind that propels them at tremendous speed. If there are one to six skriaxits together, their speed is 12; if there are seven to 12 skriaxits, their speed is 18, and if there are 13 or more skriaxits, their speed is 24. The skriaxit vortex creates a sandstorm in a 200-yard radius around them; those caught in this storm suffer 1 point of damage per round per skriaxit (thus if there are 12 skriaxits, those caught in its whirlwind receive 12 points of damage per round).

Within the confines of this sandstorm, the skriaxit group continuously dispels magic, as a 16th-level wizard.

Each skriaxit can form its winds into a razor sharp lash, inflicting 2d10 points of damage on a successful strike.

Though skriaxits were originally summoned from the elemental plane of Air, the Prime Material is now considered to be their home and they cannot be dispelled.

Habitat/Society: Skriaxits are a society of highly intelligent, but extremely evil, air elementals. They feed on causing destruction and terror; once they have caused enough catastrophe, they sleep for 1d3 centuries. While asleep, they have removed themselves from the confines of existence and not even the gods can affect them. They reawaken when hungry. They view humans, demihumans, and humanoids as playthings, with the same sadistic attitude as a human child playing with a fly. They hate nothing and fear nothing; they just delight in destruction. They may amuse themselves by listening to humans bargain with them, but humans have nothing to offer them of interest. The skriaxit pack is ruled by the Great Skriax.

Ecology: Skriaxits are creatures of magic, now considered to be native to the Prime Material plane. They feed on the feelings of superiority they gain by destroying and killing. No known magic is has been able to control them, though they are susceptible to wards against air elementals.

The Great Skriax

The leader of the skriaxit pack is the Great Skriax. It has 24 + 24 Hit Dice and attacks with a +4 bonus to all attack and damage rolls. The Great Skriax is considered the most evil of the pack.

The dracosphinx is native to the desert highlands, where it competes with the more numerous hieracosphinx for territory. This fierce, sly predator scours the wilderness for prey, be it small game or humans.

The dracosphinx has a lion's body, a red dragon's head, and a mane of colorful feathers. Its long paws have very sharp dragon claws. The dracosphinx speaks the language of red dragons, to whom it is distantly related.

Combat: A dracosphinx attacks with its large claws and its teeth, causing 3d4 points of damage with a successful claw strike and 5d4 points of damage with their fangs. They have a breath weapon that they can use once per turn; this spews forth flaming gas in a 100-foot-long cone that is 20 feet wide at its far end. This gas inflicts damage equal to the number of hit points possessed by the dracosphinx when it is uninjured (e.g., a dracosphinx with an uninjured total of 65 hit points inflicts 65 points of damage with its breath weapon, regardless of its current hit point total). A successful saving throw vs. dragon breath cuts this damage in half.

Dracosphinxes are excellent wizards, specializing in illusions; they have the spells of a 9th-level wizard but cast as 12th-level spellcasters.

They like to use their illusions to fool prey into a false sense of security, then strike when it is least expected.

Habitat/Society: Dracosphinxes live solitary existences on bleak cliff sides. They spend their days looking for prey and lying in the sun.

Each dracosphinx carves out a territory of approximately five miles in diameter. It does its best to keep out major predators from that territory: dragons, men, hieracosphinxes, and the occasional wyvern. Its philosophical ideas include "only the strongest deserve to survive" and "the weak get what they deserve."

Dracosphinxes know that humans like to seek them out, talk to them, then slay them; they enjoy tricking humans with riddle contests and conversation that leave the humans unaware for a sudden attack. Dracosphinxes pride themselves on their cunning. Like dragons, they like to hoard coins, jewels, and other valuables.

Ecology: Dracosphinxes are egg-laying mammals. They mate once in a lifetime, with the female flying away to raise a clutch of three to five large, brown eggs. The eggs are laid in separate areas and buried, since hatchlings are likely to eat each other. The hatchlings are one foot long at birth and are capable of hunting small game. They grow to nearly full size within a year. They have life spans of about 60 years. Dracosphinxes cannot be tamed except through magical means.

Creatures killed by skriaxits are animated three days later as desert wraiths, malevolent spirits of the sands.

These creatures have two forms—that of a human and that of a jackal. Their goal is to destroy any living creature that they encounter.

Combat: The desert wraith shifts between its two forms as it sees fit; it uses its jackal form to charge at its prey, then transforms itself into human form to attack. The human form inflicts 1d4 points of damage on a touch and drains the victim of one life level (no saving throw allowed), as per a wraith, with appropriate reductions in hit points, spell abilities, etc.

A desert wraith is undead and can be turned, on the same column as a spectre. Daylight destroys them utterly, and holy water inflicts 2d4 points of damage per vial.

While they have only low intelligence, they are capable of cunning (e.g., burying themselves in the sand, then attacking their prey by surprise).

They can see in total darkness as if it were noon.

Habitat/Society: A desert wraith is totally evil. It lives only to feed off the life forces of others. Desert wraiths dig barrows for themselves in the sand; they retreat to these during the day.

Ecology: Desert wraiths feed off life force energy. No creatures exist that prey on them. Creatures brought to 0 life levels by a desert wraith are transformed into zombies within 48 hours, even if raised, unless their bodies are washed in holy water.

DWARVEN NAMES

Dwarves in the Realms bear only a first name (for example, "Dorn"), to which are attached qualifying names and phrases. Humans can find dwarven names both long and complicated, so a brief exploration of how they come about is both valuable and necessary.

A clanless or outlaw dwarf, or one ashamed of his clan or wishing to conceal its identity, commonly uses only the name of his kingdom to distinguish him from others with the same name. Surprisingly, the legitimate reasons for concealing one's clan, especially from nondwarves, are many. To a traveling dwarven merchant, for example, revealing his or her clan only affords competitors a chance for blackmail, deception, and time-wasting entreaties—false or hopeless—to others in the clan, attempting to use the merchant as a go-between, spokesdwarf, or agent.

If our Dorn was a traveling merchant, he might call himself "Dorn of the Deep Realm." The kingdom is commonly used only when the dwarf is not within it. Inside the kingdom, the dwarf must be more specific (e.g. "Dorn of the Firecaverns"). Use of a mythical or extinct kingdom may be either a matter of pride, or an attempt to deceive. Among nondwarves, some dwarves merely use the name of a known location ("Dorn of Amphail").

A dwarf deliberately concealing information (i.e. to a hostile questioner) will often say he is merely "of the dwarves," which to another dwarf is an insult. For example, "I am Dorn, of the dwarves," typically delivered in a flat tone that adds the unspoken, "Any problems with that?" or "Want to make something of it?"

Among dwarves, it is more common to use one's clan name ("Dorn Bladebite"); the kingdom name is necessary only when a clan is established in more than one realm—a very rare thing, today.

Dwarves are proud of their heritage; if a dwarf is descended from a dwarven hero, he or she will use the qualifier "son of" or "grandson of" ("Dorn, son of Tyrtaar"). Females sometimes use "son of" when trying to conceal their sex from nondwarves, but usually prefer "daul of" (dwarvish for "daughter of"); thus, "Dorna, daul of Tyrtaar."

If the descent is further removed than two generations, the phrase "blood of" is employed—but only in the case of the most famous heroes or rulers. Thus, "Dorn, blood of Gordrimm."

In all cases, a personal descriptive qualifier is added if two or more dwarves can be confused. This is a common situation in the ranks of a clan dwelling in one spot, where two dwarves with the same first name also share bloodlines, clan, and location. The qualifier may be something as simple as "The Younger," or "One-Eye," or may refer to a deed or interest ("Worldwalker" or "Wyrmhunter").

Some of the most common qualifiers are: the Bloodaxe; the Dauntless; Dragonhunter; Fardelver; Firebeard; Foeflayer; Forkbeard; Giantsbane; the Grim; Hammerhand; the Older; Orcslayer; Wildbeard, and the Younger.

One last wrinkle: some dwarven families use combined names as an alternative—or even in addition—to qualifiers. The clumsiness that can arise from this practise has made it little practised today, but some dwarves still bear its results.

For example, in a large dwarven family, two or three of eight sons may be called "Dorn." As the father is probably also called Dorn, qualifiers such as "the Younger" are avoided; instead, the three sons each receive another dwarven name, tacked onto their "Dorn." The three brothers could be "Dornadar," "Dorndaggan," and "Dornidrin." An examination of the Dwarven Name Tables provided herein can turn up unwieldy or ludicrous examples fairly quickly; DMs are advised to use these only for comical NPCs, such as unscrupulous and colorful peddlers and others who want their names to travel far and acquire a reputation.

All of these name-phrases may of course be strung together (along with any titles the dwarf gains along the way). Looking back at our example, Dorn, we see that in full he could be "Dorn 'the Younger' Bladebite, son of Ahrdagh, blood of Gordrimm, of the Firecaverns of the Deep Realm."

This ensures that challenges, messages, and bills belonging to Dorn don't arrive at the door of his uncle, "Dorn 'the Old' Bladebite, blood of Gordrimm, of Glitterdelve in the Deep Realm."

Adventuring companions of dwarves usually find it easier to give a dwarf a nickname, to use commonly as a surname when among humans; thus, Dorn is "Dorn Firedrake" when on the trail with the Company of the Crown of Stars. If he wasn't so ashamed of the Company's ribald exploits, Dorn might call himself simply "Dorn Bladebite" when among them, but he doesn't want to anger or shame his clan.

Dwarves who wander the Realms or dwell exclusively in the company of humans, and who are outlaw or have no clan affiliations from birth, usually adopt human last names (see the section on Brotherhoods; most of their leaders are so named).

In short, the fragmentation of the dwarven kingdoms in the north allows players and DMs to adopt any name they choose for a dwarven character—the only names that need explanation are obviously elven names, or clan names used when the dwarf is not part of that clan (a dwarf of the right clan will always happen along or get wind of it, and there will be trouble; trouble that no dwarf would willingly bring about).

Literary and game sources have given us a wealth of names accepted as "dwarven." Every player will have favorites. For those looking for something less familiar, the Dwarven Name Tables in this sourcebook list some of the dwarven names in use in the Realms, concentrating on lesser-known ones, to give players and DMs alike a reference source of new character names (with a bit of twisting, these can be applied to gnomes, halflings, humans and other beings as well).

For ease of use in naming "innocent bystander" NPCs during play, the tables of dwarven names are provided here for DM reference.

INTRODUCTION

"Greeting, unknown dwarf. I am Elminster of Shadowdale, friend to six clans, bloodbrother of the clans Rucklebar, Deepaxe, Gallowglar, Horn, and Worldthrone. I come in peace, no blood to spill save in answer. May your axe be ever bright. Reveal yourself to me, if you will."

It was with these words that Elminster recently greeted one of the Stout Folk, whom he encountered atop the Hill of Lost Souls. The dwarf, by the way, turned out to be Rallagar Blackbeard of the Wanderers, a clanless adventurer who recently explored lost Gauntulgrym.

This sourcebook begins to explore the present state of dwarves and dwarven society in the Realms. Elminster stresses that it cannot be all-encompassing. Much remains to be learned about the very private Stout Folk, sometimes also known as the Deep Folk of the Realms. They are definitely a race in decline, crippled by a low birthrate and many enemies. Much of their past greatness is now lost and mysterious even to the dwarves themselves.

Dwarves in The Realms

Despite their dwindling numbers, dwarves are an important and influential race, who have by and large forced other beings in the Realms to take them on their own terms. The works and inventions of dwarves are everywhere in the human societies of Faerun, and dwarves remain in the forefront of explorers and craftsmen in the Realms today.

It is impossible to overestimate the importance of their gods to the dwarves. Much of the space herein is devoted to the deities and their priests, because the lives of dwarves are dominated by the deeds and directives of the gods, more than any other intelligent race of Faerun.

This work explores something of the magic and deeds of the dwarves, and the nature of their societies. A dwarf reading this work would be enraged not only by the laying out of far too many of his Folk's secrets, the long and colorful past of the battling dwarven races on Faerun in The Lost Kingdoms chapter, and more practical information on spells, priests, magical items, and so on. Elminster knows this to be true: He had a dwarf of Faerun that he knows well read it. It's a good thing he dodges hurled axes and tankards quickly!

What's New FOR Dwarves

In these pages, a DM will find details of dwarven priests and gods, dwarven spells and magical items, current news and important dwarves, and background information on the dwarven realms. The emphasis here has been to provide rules and lore likely to be useful to a DM in running dwarves in a campaign set in the Realms.

If a DM is interested in running a

"dwarves-only" campaign, or adventures delving extensively into dwarven society and doings, he may easily do so. Much of the information in this Realms sourcebook can be combined with, or used alongside, the information in D&D® Gazetteer 6, The Dwarves of Rockhome, by Aaron Allston. This sourcebook is intended for Dungeon Masters, who can 'screen' the information in it, passing on to players only what fits the campaign or characters.

Dwarves—like humans, or any other race of intelligent beings—are far too big and complex a topic to ever fit entirely between the covers of any book. In these pages, I've tried to set down what is most useful in starting to use dwarves and their holds in play, gleaned what I could from the often spotty information Elminster has given me.

Fun and good times—even for dwarves—are what adventuring careers in the Realms are all about, or should be. Don't we agree?

Axe high, friend. I go.

WHAT IT IS TO BE A DWARF

"A grudging, suspicious race."

—Alaundo the Sage

Grim mystery, laced with sadness and pride—these are the images that come to mind when one thinks of dwarves. They are the images that should come to players' minds when dwarves come onstage during play in the Realms. In this chapter we'll look at some things that help bring a dwarf to life in play.

Dwarven Character

Dwarves are dour, proud, taciturn, and markedly inflexible. They hold grudges and lust after gold. Dwarves have a deep-seated, morbid dislike and mistrust of all strangers, nondwarves in particular: More than simply wanting to greedily amass all the wealth they can, which is the common human and halfling view of dwarves, the Deep Folk love worked beauty. They prefer beauty through skill, somehow improving on nature, rather than the beauty of nature "as is," the beauty prized by "lazy" elves.

Dwarves are also a devout folk, a race in decline that looks often to its gods who, in turn, serve their steadfast worshippers diligently. Dwarven traits such as grim defiance and greed are not implanted or forced upon the dwarves by their deities, but are things inherent in a dwarf that the gods recognize and play upon.

Dwarves are usually pessimists, as is revealed by their common sayings "every fair sky hides a lurking cloud" and "the gold you have yet to win gleams the brightest". As such they always prepare for the worst, preparing back-up weapons, food caches, escape routes, and 'booby traps' for potential enemies.

Some even see the hand of fate as a real, powerful force that acts upon their lives. Some dwarves have been known to feel their own deaths approach. Others have glimpsed tantalizing images of important scenes in their lives to come. These images are given, it is said, by the gods, to ensure that each dwarf knows when an encounter, decision, or deed is especially important to the Folk as a whole, so he might act accordingly. These fateful images make the dwarves respectful and obedient to the gods, willing to obey their laws and rules.

Dwarves therefore tend to keep their word, whatever the cost. By way of example, the village of Maskyr's Eye, in the Vast, is named for a wizard who asked the dwarven king Tuir for land. The king, not wanting to give up any land to humans, but also not wanting to face the attacks of an angered wizard, said the land would be Maskyr's only if the wizard plucked out his right eye on the spot, and gave it to Tuir. Maskyr, to the astonishment of the court, did so, and Tuir then respectfully kept his end of the bargain.

The dwarves have always had close relations with gnomes, and workable relations with halflings. They have always harbored a special hatred for orcs and other goblin-kin, and they have never gotten along with their own deep-dwelling kin, the duergar.

Everyday Beliefs

The deep religious beliefs of the dwarves—that their gods are real beings who will aid them if they have performed acceptably, and who want them to do thus and so—are not dealt with in this chapter. For religious topics, see instead The Gods of the Dwarves and The Priests of the Dwarves. Rather, we look here at things that most dwarves believe to be true about life and Daerun, whether these beliefs are true or not. Player characters may, or may not, know the truth of these matters, or may learn them during their careers, at the DM's option.

All giants, orcs, and halflings are liars.

Humans and orcs both mate constantly, whenever they have opportunity and with any partner. That's why they are so numerous, where we are so few.

Elves secretly lust after beautiful things fashioned of metal as much as dwarves do. They only pretend they don't, so as to get the best price-or opportunity to steal—such things in their dealings with other races.

Elves can steal magic out of items simply by touching them.

Humans can tarnish some metals merely by touching them.

Drinking the blood of a dragon heals wounds, banishes disease and poison, and may add a year or four to a dwarfs life. Hot dragon blood, freshly taken from the dragon, is best.

Somewhere deep beneath the earth is a river of pure, molten gold. Those dwarves who find the River of Gold can simply dip out all they can carry, but they must use stone containers, for the molten gold is so hot it will melt all other metals. The river is dangerous; it seems to take dwarven lives in payment if too much gold is taken. It will never be found in the same deep caverns twice, but must be hunted anew in the deepest and most remote delves and cracks.

Some dragons excrete gems, and these fall about the dragon's lair and the terrain under which the dragon flies. The gems can usually be found on mountain pinnacles.

Dwarven Manners In Brief

To call someone a 'longbeard' means that he or she is wise, experienced, a dependable veteran, and is a compliment. To call someone a 'no-beard' or 'shorthair' is an insult. All dwarves grow beards, male and female, but some dwarves, usually females, shave.

To call a dwarf 'little' or 'human' (or to combine the two, as in 'little man') is to issue a nasty insult. Conversely, 'standing tall,' as in 'You stand tall among us, Thorgar,' is a term of admiration and respect. Strangely, the actual height of a dwarf does not influence his or her treatment by, and relationships with, other dwarves in any way.

A dwarf may introduce himself to a stranger of another race, as 'Narnden, of the dwarves' If Narnden is his real name, this is only a subtle insult, reflecting that the dwarf doesn't trust the stranger well enough to give his clan (last) name. If the stranger is a dwarf, it is an unfriendly greeting. If the dwarf gives the name 'Narnden' falsely, it is meant as an insult.

Customs

Dwarves have many customs that appear strange to humans. Those immediately apparent to any visitor to dwarven habitations is that dwarves prefer to live underground or, if aboveground, they prefer dark, massive stone structures that mimic conditions underground. Dwarves seem to hate and fear the sea.

Dwarves also speak as little as possible, and tend to be surly or sarcastic. Dwarves tend to like games even gambling, of all sorts. They enjoy rhythmic drumming in music, disliking flutes and other wind instruments. Dwarves enjoy dancing, either among themselves or watching others when in human-dominated communities.

Dwarven Nature

Dwarves are hardy by nature, resistant to magic and toxic substances, as described in the ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS,[®] 2nd Edition, Player's Handbook. However, there is at least one substance especially poisonous to dwarves and duergar: dwarfbane. Dwarfbane is a rare, gummy oil that is poisonous only to dwarves. Insinuating, it is commonly smeared on weapons. It does not dry out, but prolonged exposure to air lessens its potency; it is effective only for 26-31 (1d6 + 25) days. Upon contact, dwarfbane does 1-8 points of damage with a pain "like blazing skewers," and a further 1-6 points on each of the following three rounds. A successful saving throw will halve all damage suffered by a dwarf from dwarfbane.

The Doom of The Dwarves

The tragic 'secret' of the dwarves is their low birthrate. Fear of clan extinction sometimes drives dwarves to raid human settlements for mates, or even to deal with slavers. The dwarves are usually in search of human women, because the low dwarven birthrate is thought to be due to low fertility among dwarven women.

The offspring of a human and a dwarf is always dwarven enough to pass for a true dwarf (although it may be a foot taller than other dwarves). Any offspring it may in turn have with a dwarven mate will be fully dwarven, reverting to usual dwarven height. The taking of human mates is "the secret salvation of the race" referred to by some dwarven elders.

Festivals and Moots

Moots are business meetings between dwarven clans or professions, or between dwarves and nondwarven traders. Current known moots in the Realms include periodic Tradesmoots near Baldur's Gate, the annual High Moot northeast of Waterdeep, and the Deep Moot in the Great Rift, held every ten years and open to every dwarf.

Dragonmoots are a proud but vanishing tradition, in which bands of adventuring dwarves are called together to fight specific dragons, and plunder their hoards. They were once something of a ritual of passage for young dwarves aspiring to be warriors.

Festivals are annual celebratory feasts which tend to involve lots of drinking and dancing. The most famous festivals include the Festival of the Forging (in honor of the great smithies), the Night of the Thirsty Axe (in honor of great warriors), and the Remembering (in honor of dead dwarven ancestors).

Professions

Dwarves have professions not unlike those of other races, so visitors from human or even elven communities will not be completely lost in the dwarven realms. However, several honored dwarven professions are unique to their culture. These include loremasters, diplomats, and smiths.

Loremasters are the Keepers of the High History of the Dwarves. Their task is to remember dwarven genealogies, history, and decisions down the ages. In the Deep Realm, the most sacred, central part of Underhome is the Vault of Mutterings, where old dwarves endlessly tell each other the lore they know, in a sort of endless chanting and drinking party.

Diplomats are also honored professionals among the dwarves. Skilled diplomats are either negotiators or messengers. The latter memorize messages exactly and can deliver them in precisely the voice and tone in which they were first enunciated. They can't deliver spells this way, but can impart command words. Messengers are used throughout the Deep Realm as a matter of course, and on the surface when matters of import must be communicated (i.e. news of the death of a dwarf to his or her kin). Dwarven messengers carry small iron bucklers as badges of their office, and may also bear a circle-inside-a-circle tattoo at the base of their throat.

Far and away the most important profession among the dwarves is, of course, the smith. Smiths vary widely in skills and specialties, and not all of them can fashion magical items. These skills are not detailed in this sourcebook, because it is recommended that smiths not be player characters.

To advance in smith-craft, a dwarf cannot spare the time for adventuring. Nor would a smith voluntarily risk his skilled hands and other faculties to the dangers of battle—they are simply too valuable to the smith and to his people.

There is a dwarven saying: "Smiths die rich, but warriors die with only what they've managed to seize and hold onto." It vividly illustrates the relative lack of profit in being an adventurer, compared to the sure gains of being a dwarven smith.

Most human fighters in the Realms know the basics of forging weapons and armor; the favored and necessary metals, what tools are commonly used, and so on. They can tell when someone is trying to deceive them over the making of a blade, but would probably produce a brittle, unbalanced weapon unable to hold an edge if they tried to make a sword themselves.

Most dwarves can do a little better than that. They can tell you exactly what metals and tempering substances their local smiths used, and know when a forge or blade-in-progress is hot enough simply by its hue.

A player character dwarf may not be able to turn out a fine, tempered sword if he is not a smith. However, virtually any dwarf can, if given time and the right materials, produce a serviceable blade, of the proper weight, size and balance for a given user, that can be sharpened to a cutting edge. It may not, however, hold an edge or take the battering a good weapon could without shattering. The DM must adjudicate such situations on a case-by-case basis.

Magical forging is also a matter for the dungeon master to rule on, to match conditions in a particular campaign. Dwarves are intensely secretive when it comes to smithy-work; no player character dwarf will be able to learn how to make and enchant a weapon from any dwarven tutor. A few hints may be picked up from crumbling texts, examination of magical items, and the last gasped words of dying dwarves indebted to the PC, but by and large PCs of any race wanting to learn the dwarven ways of creating magical things are going to have to experiment for themselves.

The player character must prepare a process, with ingredients and conditions, and submit it to the DM. The DM will rule on what occurs. While creating a magical item under such conditions is a thing to be proud of in itself, if properly run, eat up so much time and wealth that the character effectively retires from adventuring, even if only temporarily.

As the dwarven sage Holoengor of Earthheart has said, "Adventuring is one grand career and craftwork is another. It's a rare dwarf that's tall enough to manage both."

The Handsome Dwarf

Almost all dwarves are hirsute, covered with at least some hair all over their bodies. Jungle dwarves have the least hair, and shield dwarves the most. Dwarves of both sexes may shave, perfume, trim, and comb all their hair, or tattoo themselves. Their growth may be inhibited by treating areas of the body with a paste of secret ingredients, then searing the area in open flame. Tattoos also inhibit the growth of hair.

Many dwarves, particularly females, oil and shave their bodies regularly. A non-dwarf seeing a shaggy-bearded dwarf in heavy armor and furs that conceal the betraying lines of the female figure may have trouble determining the dwarf's sex.

Most dwarven females dress, walk and fight as males do, and have similar low-pitched, gruff, husky voices. Like males, they naturally grow beards, and only some shave. Dwarves of both sexes may trim, perfume, or even hang their beards with gems or gold ornaments. The latter is particularly true in the south, among surface-dwellers near the Rift.

Metals Most Marvelous

Much of the wealth of dwarves, envied and sought by those of other races in Faerun, exists in the form of fine metals. Understanding the metallurgy of the dwarves would be absolutely enormous undertaking, taking a lifetime or more. The devising of alloys is one of the chief dwarven sciences, and it would take a book thrice the size of this one even to name and describe the various successful and failed amalgams and alloys tried by the dwarves. Interestingly, some sages believe the low fertility of dwarves is due to exposure to heat, bizarre alloys, and metal toxins.

Any good library can tell those interested the sources (and the differences between) copper, bronze, electrum, gold, and so on. A library in the Realms (Elminster has a good one, I've been led to believe) will yield lore about more than a dozen metals unique to the Realms—and alloys made from them, besides. Perhaps another day....

Here we note only a few bare basics:

Mithril: Mithril, a pure, silvery-blue, shining metal especially prized by dwarves, who call it "truemetal," is astonishingly resilient (durable and flexible under stress), and very resistant to corrosion. It is mined in various places throughout the Realms, in veins and pockets, and is always rare. Dwarves have become experts in smelting pure mithril from its glittering, soft silvery-black ore.

Mithril is combined with steel (to the dwarves to us, varying alloys of iron and carbon, which have always yielded the greatest strength and hardest edge in metal-work) to create an extremely hard and durable known as adamantine.

Adamantine: This alloy, a stable metal in its own right, is found (very rarely) in nature: in hard jet-black ferrous ore known as "adamantine," and occasionally (in hardened volcanic flows) in deposits of purier metal, known as adamant. The god Hephaestus, in his volcanic mountain abode on the Outer Plane of Olympus, prefers to work with adamant.

The hardness of adamant is approached only by another alloy (whose precise make-up is—or perhaps was—a secret of the Ironstar dwarven clan): darksteel.

Hizagkuur: One other metal used by the dwarves is so important as to demand note: a rare white metal known as hizagkuur after its long-ago Gold Dwarf discoverer. It reflects back all magic cast at it (or items plated or sealed with it, such as the Gates of Underhome) 100 percent, and deals a 2d12 electrical damage per touch (or round of continued contact) to all beings touching it, once it is cast, worked, or forged, and has cooled and hardened.

Metal Saving Throw Bonuses: When items fashioned of these special metals must make saving throws, the DM should modify the "metal" scores needed according to the Item Saving Throws table by the following factors (to a minimum of 1):

Adamantine/Adamant: -4

Darksteel: -3

Mithril: -2 (-4 for "Crushing Blows and Falls" saves)

Hizagkuur: -1 (-6 for "Magical Fire," "Lighting Bolt" and "Electrical" saves)

Treatments

Dwarven smiths know many treatments for metals, chiefly concerned with inhibiting oxidation and other forms of corrosion, or in altering appearance (shine and hue). Two deserve mention here: the common blueshine treatment, used for all metals to resist acid (+1 bonus to saves) and rust (especially "blood-rust") and to give them a beautiful gleaming deep blue appearance, and the everbright treatment. This gives all metals an enduring, bright shine (like chromium) and absolutely prevents any tarnishing, discoloration, rusting (even by a rust monster), or corrosion of a blade, unless the blade is actually broken, or subjected to forge-fire, earth-fire (lava) or dragonfire.

LOVE AND MARRIAGE

Dwarven courtship is a mystery to most other races. Others see dwarves as a hard, grim, largely humorless race. To outsiders, dwarves never appear to show love, kindness, or caring if they can help it.

These misconceptions only substantiate how intensely dwarves value their privacy, and how well they guard it. Dwarves are slow to strong emotion, but their feelings run deep. When moved to anger, hatred, love, or friendship, they hold steadfast throughout their lives. In fact, their low birthrate and dwindling numbers makes dwarves pursue love more fiercely now than in elder days.

Changing Roles

Dwarves were once more carefree. Though they lived in danger, beset by enemies in the Deep Realm, they were far more numerous. No dwarf thought of his Folk as a people in decline, or that someday there might be no dwarves. Clan rule was stronger, and females were kept busy in the home, all the while guarded by males who mined and fought.

Some say the heat of the forges and the strange metals dwarves have experimented with over the years have made many of them barren. Others scoff at this notion. Whatever the truth, dwarven fertility has steadily declined.

The rule of clan elders over everyday dwarven lives has also waned, particularly in the north, where once-proud dwarven kingdoms are gone, the Folk scattered in lands now held by men.

Females, who from a cold-blooded view of breeding to preserve the race should now be guarded more than ever, have taken advantage of failing clan power to achieve equality with their malefolk. She-dwarves today fiercely hold roles as warriors and adventurers, often paying with their lives. As fertile mothers grow fewer, dwarven power continues to fade.

Today, male and female dwarves are identical in rights, except in the clergy. Strong personalities of either sex dominate family and clan life.

Courting

Courting, romance, and fertility are sacred to the goddess Sharindlar. Courtship begin with a time of living apart, exchanging poems and gifts, the latter often battle-spoils or personally-crafted jewelry. This may last for years, as participants try to impress each other. If interest grows sufficient, the two live together for a time, often adventuring side-by-side or working together as artisans. This allows both to fully learn the personality of their chosen one. If deep love develops, marriage follows.

Marriage

Betrothal and married life are the province of the goddess Berronar. Lawful good dwarves follow her custom of exchanging rings with those for whom they feel deep, mutual trust and love. The rings are often of silver, matching Berronar's symbol, are treated by dwarven smiths to be everbright (never to tarnish), and are blessed by priests of Berronar. If one of the parties participates with deceit in his or her heart, Berronar's power makes one of the rings crumble during the blessing (both rings, if both are false!). Both participants must be lawful good, and the ceremony is never entered into lightly.

Rings are also ceremonially exchanged between betrothed royalty of different dwarven kingdoms, regardless of their alignments. Dwarves almost never exchange rings with nondwarves, although there have been cases, especially in the north, where human females and male dwarves have united in happiness, to further dwarven bloodlines and preserve what remains of crumbling dwarven clans and holdings.

Dwarven marriage need not involve a ring exchange. An older, more popular ritual, particularly among adventurers and wanderers, is blood-betrothal. The participants may be of any alignment, and require only a noble of any race as a witness. The witness should be a dwarf, and preferably a clan chief, elder, or priest, but could technically be any noble. The two mingle blood, while they kiss, and whisper their truenames to each other. They then solemnly declare themselves, by their full public names, as mates for the benefit of the witness. They are then considered married in the eyes of all dwarves. Divorce is unknown.

Adventurer-dwarves have always been the Folk of widest experience and tolerance, being most likely to meet and marry dwarves of other clans and interests. Nonadventurers, especially in the past, tend to marry others of their own profession, which can prove to be a weakness; when sudden death comes to dwarven holds, a whole field of expertise could be irreclaimable with the loss of a single family. Marriage does not, these days, mean living together thereafter-many couples carry on separate careers, meeting only a few times a year.

Having Children

A pregnant wife is cared for by her husband, seeks clan midwives, or returns to a clan hold to live until the birth. This last practice is common when married dwarves live apart, and the male is a roving adventurer or otherwise difficult to get word to. Once the wife is safely in clan care, a messenger is sent to inform the husband. It is considered great good luck for the child if the father is present at the birth. In some clans, an axe or other item of his is brought to the birthing to represent a dead or absent father.

It is rare for dwarves to give birth to more than one baby at a time. About 70% of all births are males. Only about 55% of dwarves, of either sex, are fertile.

Halfbloods

Humans, gnomes, and halflings are cross-fertile with dwarves. Elminster says elves and dwarves can have issue as well. Common in Ardeep, Eaerlann, and Myth Drannor of old, this is unheard-of today.

Mates who respect dwarven customs and traditions are honored for their courage (in entering a strange society), loyalty (to the customs of dwarves) and aid (in preserving the Folk).

"Half-dwarves" are not a distinct race. Save for their height (a head taller than most dwarves) all offspring of unions between dwarves and other races look and act (and are treated in the rules) as pure-blood dwarves. Dwarven halfbreeds always have the stocky build and hirsute appearance of purebloods.

If halfbloods mate with pureblood dwarves, the offspring will be a pure-blood. If halfbloods mate with another halfblood or a nondwarf, the offspring will be a halfblood.

DWARVEN RACES

The dwarves of Faerun are of four distinct races, only two of which are widely known in the surface Realms. These are the Northern (Shield) Dwarves, the Southern (Gold) Dwarves, the duergar (Grey), and the Wild Dwarves.

Shield Dwarves

The Shield, or Northern Dwarves are of mountain dwarf stock. They are wanderers, their kingdoms lost long ago in endless struggles with successive orc hordes, which weakened both the dwarves and elves of the North so that they were unable to withstand the coming of men to the region. So weakened, they were forced into hiding, flight, or bloody defeat.

The surviving Shield Dwarves are of two types. The first type, known as "The Hidden," are isolationists who shun all other dwarves except in emergencies, and keep to the mountain heights. These are the classic "Mountain Dwarves" described in the Monstrous Compendium Volume 2, under "Dwarf." The second type are "The Wanderers."

The Wanderers are the most numerous dwarves in the Realms-but they never gather together or share the same interests for long. Friendly with gnomes, and tolerant of humans, halflings, and even elves by necessity, the Wanderers are self-reliant craftsmen, most often smiths, but sometimes merchants, guards, and adventurers. A player character Shield Dwarf is almost certain to be of this stock.

Attitudes: The Shield Dwarves of today are slow to trust and slow to forget slights, but they will ally with, and even fight alongside, anything up to an including elves and half-orcs. If clan elders or the pompous Gold Dwarves of the south are too stiff-necked to see how close the dwarves are to extinction, the youngest and most traveled of the Shield Dwarves are not nearly so blind. To the Wanderers, the urgency of the dwarven plight is as plain as an axe in hand. To them, the time for racial prejudices, clan bans, and hard-headedness is past; the Stout Folk must bend or perish.

Wanderers are generally dour and cynical, and tend to speak little when in the presence of large numbers of humans or other races. Those who really do live adventuresome lives tend to be rugged and world-wise, experienced in living off the land and in fighting. They are practical and self-reliant folk of action.

Tolerance. It is clear, especially so to Wanderers, that the dwarves must have younglings—many younglings, and soon. They must hold high their traditions while at the same time plunging with energy and good will into the daily life of the human-dominated Realms, or dwarves will become but a memory. It has become common knowledge that dwarves are cross-fertile with other races, and that dwarven blood predominates to make the offspring wholly dwarvish in two generations. Many young Shield Dwarves regard it as their duty to find a mate of any race that will have them-not, as in the old days, a dwarven mate of the right age and family connections to please all the parents and clanmasters involved.

This new and sudden interest in survival is coupled in many young Wanderers with a heightened awareness of how godly balances and the lives of all creatures work in the lands. This ecological understanding, once very foreign to dwarves more comfortable with stone and metal and working with them to the exclusion of all else, has been fostered and furthered by the Harpers, particularly through the High Lady Alustriel of Silverymoon, who rules elves, humans, dwarves, and other races alike.

In turn, this companionship between many young adventuring Wanderer dwarves and other races has brought increased mutual tolerance and an increased easiness among the demi-human races. This is true among elves and humans, who have learned that cruel sarcasm is natural speech for most dwarves, not to be taken at face value as an insult.

There are dwarves who believe that this tolerance and peaceful interracial cohabitation in the north will soon bring a weakening and submergence of the dwarves, and hasten their extinction. However, as clan law and power loses its grip on the minds and actions of the young dwarves, so, too, do such opinions lose their weight, and more and more dwarves find themselves as friends, shield-companions, and even mates to folk of races their grandfathers would have slain upon first meeting.

Appearance: A typical Wanderer dresses simply, is tall (for a dwarf; standing just over four-and-a-half feet in height), has white or suntanned skin, and brown to fair hair. The hair of Wanderers is prone to go grey and white early in life, unless they are of the rare red-haired sort. As Wanderers age, their skin tends to go grey in hue, until, after three hundred years or so, they match granite and blend in with it. In game terms, they become 75% undetectable to normal vision when standing motionless against granite and not wearing armor or brightly-colored clothing.

A typical adventuring Shield Dwarf wears furs and a horned helmet, and uses crude but well-made weapons.

By choice, most of today's dwarves would go into battle in full plate armor, but would otherwise generally dress as humans do. Just about every established dwarven smith or drover active in human cities has a hidden suit of plate armor and several good weapons, even if they are only modified human gear.

Dwarven females, especially if burly and bearded, tend to dress and act as males when outdoors in human cities. They tend to receive better treatment than they would if visibly female.

The active lives of most younger Shield Dwarves (200 years old or less) makes them hardened, fit, and experienced in dealing with danger. If the DM deems it appropriate to the campaign, a bonus of +1 to the initial hit points roll is suggested (do not apply this if the maximum possible hit points are rolled).

Gold Dwarves

The Gold, or Southern Dwarves are of Hill Dwarf stock, as described in the Monstrous Compendium Volume 2, under "Dwarf." They are powerful, proud, and xenophobic, shunning even other dwarves, and traveling little in the surface world. Southern Dwarves hold grudges longer than Northern Dwarves, and know (and care) much less about happenings in the world around them.

Gold Dwarves dwell in the Great Rift, the Deep Realm and the Deep Lands that fan out beneath the Shaar for many thousands of miles. They are seen little outside these areas. Southern Dwarves delve deep in search of new gems and ores, and have loosed several fearsome monsters, as well as training other monsters to their service. Some of these are described later in the chapter The Deeps.

Appearance and Wealth: Their collective name comes from their habit of wearing lots of gold—bracers, gorgets, pectorals, belts, multiple rings on the fingers, toes, and ears, and all manner of other accoutrements—as everyday clothing. Such apparel is always intricately chased and fluted, and adorned with gems and inlays of other precious metals.

Almost all Gold Dwarves are rich beyond the wildest dreams of most humans, but one can't eat gold. Gold Dwarves of the Deeps have grown accustomed to many foods that cannot be grown below the surface (especially fruit), and spend money constantly on such produce.

A typical Southern Dwarf will have long, luxuriantly braided hair and beard, wear many rings, gold earrings and toe-rings. Their beards are hung with a net of dangling teardrop pearls or other gems, and they will wear gold armor enamelled with fantastic curlicued designs and a clan marking or personal totem.

Gold Dwarves are dusky-skinned and dark-haired—their hair is usually black. Some have mahogany-hued, brick-red or even deep-red skin instead of cinnamon-brown. They tend to be both shorter and more heavysset than Shield Dwarves, and most are fatter through good eating and a more indolent lifestyle.

Even their warhammers tend to be plated with gold, and both armor and weaponry tends to be upswept into curling horns at every corner or projection. These things a Northern Dwarf would regard as a waste of good gold. To this a Southern Dwarf would reply, "This? We pick our teeth with it!"

Dwindling Numbers. The low birthrate of the Gold Dwarves is even worse than that of their northern cousins, the Shield Dwarves. This is due in part to the unwillingness of Gold Dwarves to take anyone as a mate who is not also a Gold Dwarf, of the right clan, family, social position, and agreeable to both sets of parents and the clan elders—a collective gauntlet that makes happy marriages few.

Elminster and some other sages concerned with things dwarven believe that the birthrate may also be low because the fertility of the race may have been harmed by exposure to underground radiations. 'Glowstone' and 'hot-melt rifts' (lava flows) can both be found in the Deeps, and Elminster believes that both can have invisible but harmful effects on all races long exposed to them.

Most Gold Dwarves don't know this, wouldn't believe it if told, and wouldn't care even if they were somehow convinced that they were being told something that might 'lengthen their beards'.

Intolerance. Southern Dwarves are the most proud (no help needed, thank you) and inflexible (the dwarves' way or no way) of dwarves. Their elders, called the Loremasters, preserve the lore of the race in deep caverns, collectively known as the Vault of Muttering, continually instructing junior scribes as to the dwarven decrees—most importantly, who the dwarves are beholden to, and who they hate and will never aid or deal with. They see themselves as the oldest and wisest culture in the Realms, ages advanced beyond the barbaric humans, effete elves, weakling gnomes and halflings, and their degenerate northern dwarven cousins.

The Gold Dwarves are the proudest of dwarves. They are slow to forgive and unable to forget an offense against them. They treat all nondwarves except gnomes coldly, especially those of proud pretensions or manners, such as the men of Calimshan. Men, particularly proud men who rely overmuch on magic, are thought of as overblown, tasteless lackwits. Halflings and adventurers (who are, of course, all brigands or thieves) are regarded with suspicion. Even visitors of their poor-cousin race the Shield Dwarves are suspect—why come to the rich realms of the south, if not to steal?

Gnomes are the exception to this general contempt. Gold Dwarves regard gnomes as useful hirelings for dirty work, and well-meaning if inferior folk. A human analogy would be how some human nobles think of their trained war-dogs. Their usefulness earns them polite, if distant, treatment. Elminster reports dryly that the gnomes he's met all seem overjoyed by this.

Gold Dwarves generally live far safer lives than their northern cousins, and so live longer. However, careful scrutiny of dwarven records indicate that the race as a whole seems only a little more long-lived (425-475 years) than Shield Dwarves. Such a careful scrutiny is possible because Gold Dwarves are very concerned with social status, which is linked to personal wealth, influence, and birth. They keep careful genealogies that reach back thousands of years.

A typical Gold Dwarf knows the full name of his great-great-grandmother, and her social standing. If asked, he will also probably be able to tell you where his clan originated, in a hold now dust, some twenty thousand years ago! If annoyed, he will probably add, "When your ancestors were hairy things crawling in the mud!" If merely irritated, more subtly snide variants will be uttered.

Gold Dwarven names tend to be longer, more elaborate, and more of a touchy subject than those of other dwarves. Ralython Shaversham "The Elder" du Undergarr, blood of Alathann, blood of Murueen, of Upper Goldgate Caverns is a full head shorter than Dundold Battlehammer of Fireshear. However, Dundold might snort if you pronounced his name wrong, whereas Ralython would coldly correct you, challenge you over the insult if he thought it was deliberate, and place a careful mental black mark against you in any case, just to be sure. And that's if you're a dwarf!

As the Shield Dwarf Berinthar Deepdelve remarked wearily, after a recent diplomatic meeting in Eartheart with the haughty envoys of the Gold Dwarf Clan Ghalkin, "Those of us who live in the real world have less and less time for this sort of nonsense, know you."

Gray Dwarves

The duergar are not dealt with in these pages. Elminster warns that much more needs to be learned about the evil 'Gray Dwarves'; their aims and powers outstrip those generally known.

Wild Dwarves

The little-known "Jungle Dwarves" are described in this book in Monstrous Compendium format, on the next page.

Wild Dwarves are a reclusive race of dwarves. Also known as "Jungle Dwarves," they are found only in remote, hot jungle areas in Chult and the nearby lands to the east.

Wild Dwarves are dark-skinned, short, and stout. Their bodies are covered with tattoos and grease which serves to keep off insects, and also makes them hard to hold (reflected in their armor class). They wear nothing except their long, woven hair which serves as adequate clothing, which they plaster with mud into crude armor when going to war.

Wild Dwarves forge weapons and tools from mined metals. In this and in infravision, 'underground skills,' and lifespan, they are like other dwarves. Sturdy (+1 to Con scores) and muscular, they distrust intruders and will avoid confrontations unless they are attacked or provoked. Wild Dwarves speak their own clicking, trilling tongue, a smattering of the common tongue, and the language spoken by most Wanderer dwarves. They use and understand Dethek runes.

Combat: Wild Dwarves are armed with blowguns that can fire 2 darts per round (ranges 1/3/5). Each dwarf carries 1d10 +6 barbed darts which do 1d3 (1d2 vs. large creatures) damage and has a sleep-inducing venom-save vs. poison or be slowed for 2 rounds, then fall asleep for 2-5 rounds; slapping does not awaken. Each dart can be used twice before venom is exhausted. All adult Wild Dwarves are specialists with their darts; at short range they gain an attack bonus of +2, whether using a blowgun or tossing it. They are immune to the effects of their venom. Each Wild Dwarf also carries a spear (1d6 damage) and a spiked throwing club (1d6) or hand axe (1d6).

Wild Dwarves like to use pits, snares, deadfalls, and other traps to defend their home caves. All of these are tailored from the jungle surroundings and are very effective, even against victims of high levels, especially those uninitiated to jungle combat. They prefer to attack in large groups, firing darts from behind cover until an angered target charges them—whereupon they attack from all sides.

Wild Dwarves have the same poison saving throw bonuses and magic-handling abilities as a normal dwarf. Centuries of battling poisonous snakes have given them a natural poison/venom resistance; they make all poison saving throws (against poisons and poisonous vapors) at an additional +1. They are less likely to suffer from debilitating disease or parasite effects than those who aren't jungle dwellers (DM must adjudicate), and receive a bonus of -1 per die damage on insect swarm and heat-related attacks, even if magically induced.

Habitat/Society: Wild Dwarves dwell in jungle trees and caverns, calling themselves "dur Authalar" (the People). They are polygamous and do not form tribes or clans, but live in hunting bands with ever-shifting membership. Each group carries a large water-bladder and a 'talking drum,' to call other bands to a 'big kill' or 'great danger.'

A typical hunting band knows of three or four watering-holes, a bathing-place, a shaded eating area with a firepit and several lookouts, a sleeping-cavern and several sleeping-trees hung with nets of interwoven vines. They also know of at least five 'refuge-caverns' that run deep into the earth.

Wild Dwarves think of themselves as one big family, "dur Authalar." They follow their "talkers" (planners and tacticians, of both sexes, all ages, and all levels), "war leaders" (treat as 5th to 7th level warriors), "bloods" (experienced warriors of 2nd through 4th level), and "priests" (clerics of all levels up to and including 10th). All Wild Dwarves worship Thard Harr, but rarely make offerings to other dwarven deities.

Wild Dwarves wear carved bone earrings, bracelets, and necklaces for adornment, reserving mined metal only for use in weapon- and tool-making or barter.

Ecology: Wild Dwarves eat certain fruits, berries, roots, leaves, and saps, and all manner of insects, worms, jungle birds, reptiles, and animals. Some have been known to eat humans, but they are not cannibals and do not usually eat intelligent beings. They consider most snakes delicacies, and make fermented fruit-wines in earthenware jugs.

Wild Dwarves are cross-fertile with all demi-human races, and with humans. They mistrust folk of other races, though, and rarely leave the confines of their hot, shady jungles willingly.

DWARVEN CRAFT

Dwarves are famous throughout the Realms for their mastery of technology. Their gifted hands have shaped stone and metal to form elegant and sturdy monuments of engineering: elaborate pumps, sluices, elevators, taps, bridges, locks, and other feats of mechanical skill and handcraft. The dwarves are peerless experts at draining or pumping water into underground areas, and at providing fresh air and sunlight to their deep domains. Their forebears developed gigantic “engines” that still power enormous mechanical devices in use today, some constructed as much as two thousand years ago!

Feats of Dwarven Engineering

The great old dwarven engineering feats include the Chasmleap Bridge, the Wailing Dwarf (called by some “the battered dwarf”), and the Pumps of Pyrad-din.

The Chasmleap Bridge

This railless, smooth stone arch is over a thousand paces in length, but only six paces wide. It spans The Long Chasm, a great gorge in the Northdark, those subterranean realms that underlie the Sword Coast North. The Long Chasm runs for some sixty miles, roughly northeast to southwest, from west of Everlund to under the Woods of Turlang.

The Chasmleap Bridge is smooth to the touch, so cunningly finished that it appears to be fashioned of a single, solid piece of stone. Here and there along its deck are carved old and intricate runes, their meaning unknown to the dwarves of today. Legends hold that these runes mark the sites of gates to other worlds or planes, or the locations of storage cavities hidden in the bridge itself—cavities holding powerful magical weapons.

If these legends are true, the means of activating or entering these magical openings is forgotten. Still, some adventurers still vanish on the Chasmleap Bridge from time to time, and not all are found to have simply fallen the half mile down to their deaths. At the same time, their disappearances cannot all be attributed to the monsters that lurk on or fly near the bridge, waiting for dinner to come trudging up towards them. Undoubtedly the Chasmleap Bridge holds other sinister secrets that have cost many their lives.

The Wailing Dwarf

On the eastern face of the Troll Mountains (north of Eshpurta, in eastern Amn) is the huge, crumbling stone statue of a helmed dwarf, holding an axe and looking east. Of great antiquity (the time and specifics of its making lost to the memory of the dwarves), this 4,000-foot wonder has been carved from the side of an entire mountain. It contains numberless chambers, staircases, and elevators, all now deadly, the shafts inhabited by spiders and flying things, cloak-ers and stirges of huge size. The Wailing Dwarf is in fact an entire abandoned dwarven city.

The male dwarf stares east towards Breakback Pass in the Giant’s Run Mountains, across Giant’s Plain. The massive statue is so carved that when the wind is from the east, gusts enter his ears and the pupil-holes of his eyeballs, and escape from his lips in a deep, eerie moaning—hence the statue’s name.

The statue’s nickname, ‘the battered dwarf,’ comes from its weather-torn, yet defiant, appearance. Some say that it looks towards a lost dwarven homeland, others that it marked a sentinel-post against orcs or other enemies who lived to the east—perhaps the long-vanished giants for whom the mountains and plain are named.

No dwarves live there today, but for many wanderers traveling to it their journey is a pilgrimage. Such a trek to the Wailing Dwarf is sometimes to be made with dwarven fellows or adventuring companions of other races when a dwarf’s apprenticeship is ended. In searching its empty rooms for lost secrets and treasure, they rid them of some of the present monstrous inhabitants. Among these, it is said, are the trolls for which the mountains in which the Dwarf stands in are named.

The Pumps of Pyrad-din

Located deep under Azulduth, the Lake of Salt, these gigantic, deafeningly noisy devices continually drain the welling springs that ring the lake. They then filter the water through lakes of chalk and charcoal, settling basins and airjet bubble-rakes, and finally pump it down to the Deep Lands below, on the northeastern edge of the Deep Realm.

There, the water forms a river, Seldar, ‘the River of the Depths,’ and flows away southeast to eventually rise in Aerialpar Forest, Land of the Korred. The Pumps (named, it is said, for the long-ago chief engineer and supervisor of their making) introduce enough air into the descending waters that breezes constantly blow southwest through The Deep Realm, keeping its air fresh and moist.

Passive vent-shafts located in the mountain heights of Fuirgar, Land of the Stone Giants, far to the east, bring air down into the Deep Lands.

Dwarven engineers have also had spectacular failures, in which bridges have collapsed, aerial ships have crashed, etc. By and large, however, the evidence has survived the ages, testifying to dwarven ingenuity through the generations.

Individual Abilities

The mining “detection skills” given in the Player’s Handbook shared by dwarves of all races, the average Northern Dwarf of today can unerringly identify various ores, in their natural state.

The average Gold Dwarf of today can evaluate the fair market price of worked metals and gems, within 10%, and detect forgeries, flaws, and counterfeits with a 95% degree of success.

The average Wild Dwarf of today can, given sufficient light, unerringly find groundwater in jungle regions by following the water table. They also have tracking ability (-3 on proficiency checks outside jungle areas).

However, it should be noted that these racial feats do not mean that any dwarf is able to walk up to a strange lock and devise a foolproof lockpick on the spot. Nor can one fell the only two trees on a mountainside and make from them a safe, and roomy bridge capable of taking wagons across a wide chasm. Dwarves have inherent capabilities and traditional interests, but these do not bestow expert status upon every individual.

DWARVEN LANGUAGE (DWARVISH)

The dwarven language in use today is descended from the Elder tongue, a speech of great antiquity. The Elder tongue is thought by some to be the source of the word “Faerun,” derived from the word “runedar,” meaning home or familiar place. It has a long and complicated vocabulary—little used by any dwarf alive today, save for the record-keeping elders. The most commonly-heard words of present-day dwarvish are presented on the opposite page.

Some of the words given there are of use to humans deciphering dwarven place-names, some of which survive in present-day use. Those trying to interpret old treasure-verses or dwarven lore are in even greater need of an elder dwarven vocabulary.

Dwarven speech can be simulated in play by speaking as most Wanderers do these days: that is, they use human common-speech, studded with words of dwarvish.

RUNESTONES

Dwarves prefer to write on stone rather than on more perishable materials. Stone walls, pillars, cairns, and standing stones all over the Realms today bear the Dethek runes used by dwarves down the long ages since history in Faerun began. A few dwarven writings are in ‘dead tongues’ or in clan codes rather than Dethek runes, which, thankfully for the scholar, few clans use nowadays.

Most often, dwarves write on flat stones, known as ‘runestones.’ A typical runestone is flat and circular or diamond-shaped, about an inch thick, and of a hard, durable rock. One or both faces of the stone are inscribed with Dethek runes in a ring or spiral around the edge. Runestones are usually read from the outer edge to the center along the spiral. This spiral encircles an identifying rune or picture, such as a clan mark or personal rune. Occasionally, runestones have been made of metal, but only the finest metals of the most pure and perfect manufacture will do.

Runestones telling a legend or tale of heroism usually bear a picture of the climactic scene described in the script. Grave markers or histories usually reproduce the face or mark of the dwarf or dwarves described. The central symbol may also be a commonly-understood rune (e.g. a foot for a ‘safe trail’ marker, or an inverted helm to denote safe drinking water), or may be a simple decoration. Some runestones have pictures in relief, and are used as seals or pressed into wet mud to serve as temporary trail markers.

The Dethek runes are reproduced on the gatefold of this accessory for easy DM reference during play. They can readily be used to decipher the message on the “typical runestone” shown there. It reads: “This place is Dhurri’s Bridge. Here forty-two of the best warriors of (the House of Helmung) fell, to keep orcs from the Halls. We slew six hundred and eight. (Day) 218, (year since the founding of the House) 377.”

The central rune of a hammer identifies the writer as a warrior, the shield indicates he was of the House of Helmung, a house now thought to be extinct. The writer’s name, “Nain,” is written, as is the custom, above the shield. A dwarf of greater importance would use his personal rune instead.

No punctuation can be shown in Dethek, but sentences are customarily separated by lines crossing the script. Words are separated by spaces, and capital letters have a horizontal line over them. Numbers enclosed in boxes are dates, the day preceding the year by convention. Clan, kingdom, family, and individual runes are incorporated into Dethek script. If any runes are painted, the names of beings and places are commonly picked out in red, the rest colored black or left uncolored.

Runestones can serve as genealogies and family burial markers, portable tombstones, to which additions are added each time a new burial is made in a family crypt. They can also serve as inventories of the wealth of a clan, family, or brotherhood, as private messages, and as records of great events and deeds of valor.

One stone was found in a labyrinth of dwarven caverns, serving as a very plain warning—plain to those who knew the script, that is-of a pit trap just beyond. Another, somewhere in the same abandoned mountain dwarf-halls in Delzoun, is reputed to hold a clue to the whereabouts of the Hammer of Thunderbolts, a terrific weapon once borne in the Battle of the Drowning of Lornak.

The runestones most eagerly sought by nondwarves are ‘treasure stones’ According to Elminster, these tend to give treasure directions “hidden in those cryptic verses that the Stout Folk write when they think they’re being clever”

Some rare stones are adorned with gems, or are themselves magical. Magical runestones may function as arrows of direction, as the Book of Passing Years in Elminster’s library tells us. Others might, as many folk tales and ballads of the North attest, speak messages by magic mouth when certain persons are near, or when certain words (sometimes nonsense words, carved on the stone) are said over it. Some of these magical stones chant warnings or poetry, but most utter treasure-verses. A few such verses are given on the gatefold of this accessory. As far as Elminster knows, the treasures these hint at all await an adventuring band that is strong and brave, of keen wits and good luck. (“That’s why,” he added dryly, “they haven’t been found yet.”)

ae: gold

aelin: gold-work

agland: sword

alagh: battle-glory, valor

ar: to cut, slash, or lay open arglar: to butcher; “a proper arglary” means a proper butchering, or a good fight, and is often used to describe vicious struggles with orcs arau: great, huge, gigantic arauglor: sea, ocean (literally, ‘great-lake’) barak: backbone, strength, shield

bedorn: disbelief, lies, mistakes, exaggeration, distortion beldarak: treachery (hence, “beldarakin” means treacherous beings)

burakrin: way through, passage calass: thief, miscreant, untrustworthy one caurak: cavern (large size, underground only) corl: to kill

corlar: killer

daern: familiar, known (place, feature, or being) dauble: treasure or valuable (plural "daubles") deladar: to descend, to go down (hence, "deladaraugh" means to die in battle; literally, 'to go down to the death')

delvar: to dig (hence "delve" means a digging; mine, tunnel, or underhome)

DWARVEN CLANS

The clan was once all-powerful in dwarven life in Faerun, but over the last thousand winters, the power and influence of all clans, particularly in the North, has dwindled. Many are now little more than drinking societies or clubs, with virtually no influence over their member dwarves' lives, though clans do not allow members to also belong to another clan. Many isolated dwarven communities, particularly in the North, are now clanless, or have only the weakest clan affiliations.

Clan Organization

All dwarven clans have chiefs. In the north, dwarven chieftains are sometimes known as "clanmasters" or "lairds." Their southern counterparts are often known as "ardukes." These ranks give us "the word of the laird shalt be the whole of the law," "for the arduke," "all honor to the chief," and other sayings. The term "house" refers to the ruling family in a clan, or the ruling clan of a land. This term is most used when there is no single monarch, the ruler uses a lesser title (such as Iron Duke), or when a king is elected rather than inheriting the title.

Almost all positions of clan leadership are obtained today by election from among, and by, the clan's elders. In olden days, dwarves had kings who could trace lineage through generations of previous hereditary rulers. A few kingships survive today, but all rely on the monarch's personal popularity and fitness to rule, not on an automatically-acknowledged blood-right to rule.

Every clan has its elders; dwarves of influence, wealth, and personal might—and almost always, distinguished age. Their thoughts and plans aim and shape the lives of clan members; their votes determine clan policy, laws, and justice. Clan elders once held the right to approve or deny marriages in a clan, renouncing the membership of any who married against their will, or married out of the clan. However, the dwindling birthrate of the Deep Folk has put a stop to such influence by the elders.

Most clans have clan champions, who offer themselves in tests of personal combat in the clan's name. They also maintain the clan's police-forces, gathered clan warriors, often called "the fists of the clan," or "the hammers of the clan."

Outcast dwarves remain, however, outcast to this day. "The memory of a dwarf is long and strong," as the old saying goes.

Clan Law

Dwarves value law and order above all else; usually content with their place, they see an iron maintenance of the status quo as the best way to preserve the Folk. In the eyes of a dwarf, clan rules and law must prevail. The DM should devise local dwarven laws (often rigid and harsh) which are always built on the following principles:

A dwarf shall not speak falsely to another dwarf.

A dwarf shall not steal from another dwarf, nor keep from another dwarf that which is his or hers by right, whether through force or deceit.

A dwarf shall not conceal personal injury or illness from fellows of the same clan.

A dwarf shall never act against any other dwarf, of any clan, by aiding or using the aid of nondwarven creatures.

A dwarf shall not refuse to aid another dwarf of the clan, when the life or health of the needy dwarf is in danger.

Clan justice is done through trial by at least twelve dwarven elders, none of whom can have a blood-interest (direct relationship to either the accused or injured parties). Verdicts are limited to "innocent," "not proved" and "guilty." Obtaining "not proved" verdicts is far from an acquittal, however; they are a black mark against a dwarfs name—those who collect more than six such verdicts are cast out of a clan. Punishments for a "guilty" verdict range from service to injured families to death, and are at the whim of the elders—there are no set sentences for given crimes.

Clan Professions

Clans usually specialize in particular crafts or skills, but dwarves skilled in almost anything can be found in the ranks of every large clan. Specialties include blacksmithing, silversmithing, goldsmithing, armor-making, weapon-making, gemcutting, soldiery, and diplomacy (negotiators and messengers).

The Known Clans of The Dwarves

There is no space here to list the specialties, current chiefs, and all important holds of clans. All clans practice vigilant patrolling of their territories against surprise orc-horde onslaughts that annihilated many clans in the past. Such patrols will do their utmost to ensure that intruders (such as player characters) never actually see or discover the location of important clan holds and settlements.

In the lists below, references to other Realms source material are given when clans have been mentioned elsewhere. The strongly-held privacy of dwarves forces any list of clans to be incomplete.

Most clan names resemble dwarven nicknames—many probably originated as the nickname of a famous dwarf who founded the clan.

Wild dwarves are polygamous and do not have clans. They see themselves as one big family, "dur Authalar," or, 'the People.'

The Ironstars

The Ironstar clan is believed to have become extinct when the Fallen Kingdom passed away (see the entries for Besilmer and Ironstar in the chapter on The Lost Kingdoms). Yet rumors persist that some few dwarves bearing the Ironstar name have a secret hold-caverns on Mintarn, perhaps, or beneath Mount Helimbrar, or even in Evereska, allied with the elves still in that misty, mysterious land-somewhere in the Realms. Ironstar dwarves, it is said, take other names when they go adventuring, to conceal the existence of their clan.

The Ironstar clan sign is (or was) a four-pointed white star gleaming atop a ritged black iron anvil. Ironstar maces are said to shatter armor at a blow.

BROTHERHOODS

Dwarven adventuring bands are known as “brotherhoods,” and have a long and colorful history in Faerun. Traditionally crossing clan boundaries and memberships they give other dwarves heroes to look up to and, occasionally, scapegoats. They are a source of news to talk over with tankard in hand, the crux of endless stories, rumors, and entertainment. Like sports teams, they have their fans and supporters, and some dwarves bet on their anticipated successes.

The term ‘brotherhood’ originated when young dwarven men began banding together to seek dangerous adventures in the world beyond dwarven lands. Their exploits were intended mainly to impress dwarven females during courtship. However, the fiery-spirited dwarven females saw no reason why their mates should have all the fun. They rapidly gained adventuring experience themselves, rescuing dwarven men who’d gotten into trouble while adventuring. Some founded their own bands, and have found great success as the increasingly rare dwarven women have gained power and influence to become equal partners to the menfolk in every way. There are now all-male bands, all-female bands, and mixed bands. Most bands tend to have several pairs of mated or courting dwarves in their ranks, as well as a few more unattached males.

It is understood that brotherhoods stand apart from clan law, and that their rights, earned by naked battle-might, include the right to temporary refuge and lodging in dwarven holds as guests. Brotherhoods who ‘break their honor’ by wantonly killing hosts or other dwarves, stealing from dwarves, or committing other crimes against dwarves are branded outlaw. However, other clans may continue to hold an outlaw brotherhood in high regard, such as in the case of northern brotherhoods raiding southern holds, and vice versa.

Famous Brotherhoods

The names of famous brotherhoods are many, especially those now dead and gone, part of the glorious dwarven past. These are a few brotherhoods currently active in the Realms.

The Blades of The Axe

This adventuring group is based in an old, half-ruined keep near Triel. The Blades of the Axe is active on the High Moor, into Amn, and throughout the Sword Coast North. Usually 16 to 20 in number, they explore subterranean ways, seeking old treasures—particularly in lost dwarven delves. Occasionally they take on a dragon for its hoard, or, when in need of cash, hire on as caravan guards and guides. They work throughout northern Amn and on the dangerous overland run from Amn or the east through Scornubel, or the coastal downs to Waterdeep and the cities of the North.

The general alignment of the Blades varies from chaotic good through lawful neutral. They are presently led by Snorogh Blackhelm (a CG dwarven male F9) and his lady Thriia Bressildan (a CG human female W8).

The Glittering Sword

Active in the Sword Coast and Dragonreach northlands, this band is famous for its daring exploits. They’ve accomplished much, from seizing the ships and loot of pirates in the Inner Sea to robbing Zhentilar pay-caravans bound for the Citadel of the Raven. Its wild and colorful adventurers are currently 14 in number, and use aerial steeds won in their adventures. They flit about the Stonelands and the Inner Sea, raiding evil merchants on the Zhentish overland routes and taking especial delight in tangling with wizards of Thay, orc slavers selling to them, and Calishite slavers operating into Westgate.

They include at least two halflings, a gnome, a half-elf, and three humans, and is led by Artham “Darksmite” Evercloak (a CN dwarven male F12).

The Holy Hammer

This band is not affiliated with any single deity, despite its name, and does not follow the dictates of any clergy. Rather, it is an ever-changing vigilante group, who rally at specific locations to work deeds outside the normal behavior of dwarves. For instance, they pillage human settlements, raid other dwarven holds, and ambush dwarven allies suspected of treachery.

Members of the Holy Hammer can be dwarves of any age, class, and clan. The leaders of the Hammer are three: Muragh Thomador (a middle-aged, wary CN male F15), Aungaeril Whitehawk (a young and fierce-tempered CN female F11), and Sondaerl Thunador (a silent, cunning CN male T12). All are dedicated to the survival and improvement of the dwarven races and the lot of dwarves, at all costs.

Twice in the past the Holy Hammer has moved to slay merchants of Lantan who had begun to sell Lantanese inventions that threatened to compete with artifices of the dwarves. They have also on several occasions meted out harsh justice to satraps of Calimshan who thought dealing with the dwarves for gold was not enough, and secretly laid hands on dwarves to sell elsewhere as slaves.

The leaders of the Hammer travel quietly about the Realms from one dwarven settlement to another, gathering support for their latest causes. Rallying-points for the Hammer vary across the Realms: the Stone Bridge, the Halls of the Hunting Axe, and the Halls of the Hammer (abandoned dwarf-holds) in the Sword Coast North; the Hill of the Helm northeast of Triel (north of Scornubel in the Sword Coast midlands); a stone plateau at the foot of Needle Peak, which overlooks the eastern end of Breakback Pass, above the Lake of Snows (south of Teziir); the summit of Firesleap Pass (south of Innarlith, on the road linking it with the Shaar); the Council Hills in the Eastern Shaar; and a secret landing-place and cavern-network on the southern side of Cape Dragonsfang, northwest of Milvarune.

Any rallying-point of the Hammer can be identified by the upright, carved black stone (usually slate or obsidian) image of a warhammer. These are usually 7 feet or more in height. Rallying-points are also given away by encamped dwarves, whose sentinels usually attack nondwarven intruders without hesitation!

Members of the Holy Hammer engaged in actual missions (“blood-runs”) can be recognized by their upraised open-hand signals (“the Hammer”) and by the black or purple hoods they wear to conceal their identities.

THE GODS OF THE DWARVES

The gods of the dwarves are a pantheon of powerful beings whose line-up and powers vary slightly from clan to clan in the Realms. Their powers vary widely between the Realms and other fantasy worlds. Details of avatars and manifestations of the most important dwarven gods are given here, presented in rough order of importance to dwarves in the Realms.

The differences in dwarven pantheons from clan to clan and world to world allow a DM to easily change anything about the pantheon presented here, as desired. He may even introduce new dwarven gods (particularly demigods).

Dwarven gods tend to be concerned with the earth and its natural powers, smith-craft and other dwarven activities (such as warfare) and attributes. There are no dwarven deities known in the Realms concerned with the sea, air, stars, clouds, rain, plant and forest life, or animals. Lightning has been controlled on occasion by the greater dwarven deities, but never evoked by them. The DM can freely modify the minor powers of avatars used in play to explain spectacular magical effects, physical feats, powers, and so on.

Avatars

Avatars are earthly forms of the gods themselves; they are the gods, albeit with limited powers but all of the god's knowledge. If slain, the god's power in the Realms is temporarily lessened, but the 'true' body and essence of the deity survives on its otherplanar home.

All dwarven avatars have automatic regeneration, like a vampiric ring of regeneration, except that the hit points gained equal 100 percent of the hit points lost by a victim to the avatar's attack. Avatars also have their physical attacks and their magical abilities. An avatar may use any one of these three abilities (regeneration, physical attack, or magic) one at a time and one per round.

Magical abilities unique to an avatar are listed in the deity's avatar entry; abilities shared by all the dwarven avatars follow. These powers can be bestowed on any being by the touch of an avatar, for a single use; this is done only rarely, and only to dwarves (unless there is no dwarf at hand when needed). Unless otherwise noted, all avatar magical powers are wielded as if by a 14th level spellcaster.

Avatar Abilities

wish

The DM should note that no truename, glyph, or symbol spells or other magics have any effect on avatars (except to attract their attention). All avatars can hear any of their names spoken anywhere in Faerun, and the next nine words spoken by the speaker, along with the speaker's voice-likeness, distance, and direction. However, they usually ignore the ceaseless babble this creates in their minds.

Avatars can be slain, but unless energy drain, wish, or similar spells are employed to drain the avatars of their divine energy, magical safeguards prepared beforehand by most deities enable them to survive a 'death' that destroys their physical form. The scattering of their energies may, however, prevent them taking another avatar for 1-6 weeks or even longer.

The deities Moradin, Clangeddin, Sharindlar, and Gorm, upon the death of their avatar form, become entities akin to ghosts. Such ghost-like 'anima' forms cannot be turned, and can become invisible at will. They can work magic, have a ghost's attacks, and have half the avatar's hit points.

It is recommended that a DM use direct appearances by avatars in play sparingly, to preserve the awe they should evoke in true role-players.

Abbreviations. Abbreviations used in the avatar entries are as follows.

AL: Alignment. This indicates the deity's behavior, as per the AD&D® Player's Handbook and Dungeon Master's Guide for notes on the various alignments. A second listing in parentheses after the alignment indicates a deity's tendency to stray from the primary alignment.

Symbol: This is the sign by which the deity is known. An avatar may or may not choose to display it.

AC: Armor Class. This is the avatar's frontal armor class, taking into account dexterity, magical protections, and innate durability. The AC may be worse if the avatar is attacked from behind or from the flank.

MV: Movement. This is how fast the avatar moves, per round.

HP: Hit points. This is the number of hit points possessed by the deity's earthly avatar (usually less than the deity's full hit points).

THAC0: Acronym for 'to hit armor class 0': the score needed on a 20-sided die to hit an opponent who has an Armor Class of 0. The score needed to hit other Armor Classes is easily calculated from this number. Note that THAC0 does not take into account 'to hit' adjustments due to strength, skills, or magic.

#AT: Number of attacks. This is the number of physical attacks that the avatar can launch in a single round.

DMG: Damage. This is the hit points of damage inflicted by a single physical avatar attack.

MB: Magic Resistance. This is the percentage chance of a spell failing when used against the avatar.

SZ: Size. An avatar can cause its body to grow larger (or shrink smaller) by 50% of its normal size at will.

CL: Classes. This is deity's powers, expressed in character class form. These determine attack and saving throw tables to be consulted and define minor abilities.

Str, Dex, Con, Int, Wis, and Cha: These are the standard abilities.

SA: Special Attacks.

SD: Special Defenses.

Manifestations

Manifestations are signs or effects of a deity's power. They occur either as unusual magical or physical happenings, or as temporary aid infused in the body of a worshipper, or even into an item such as a warhammer. They usually occur as the result of fervent prayer or entreaty by a dwarf (who need not be a dwarven priest, although clergy are more likely to attract the attention of a deity). They might, however, occur spontaneously, through the ready will and attention of the deity, who is able to work through any being whose blood has mingled with that of a dwarf, or any object a dwarf has crafted, altered, or repaired.

Typical manifestations are accompanied by a white radiance, and sometimes by a deep, echoing clangor-somewhat like the sound of a great metal hammer falling upon an anvil far, far away.

Manifestations include:

- healing or raising one who is serving dwarven causes,
- temporary enchantment of a weapon, conferring a +3 bonus,
- conferring a temporary +3 protection from good/evil aura, as well as immunity from a specific attack form (e.g. fire) or spell,
- temporary fly, feather fall, infravision, or invisibility powers conferred
- magical mending of normal or magical items,
- the shattering of a barrier or prison

- levitate and/or telekinesis of objects, particularly holy objects of the dwarves,
- communicating the deity's wishes by actions or by writing actual messages.

Favored manifestations (those most commonly used by deities) are listed in the deity descriptions that follow.

The Dwarven Gods

Moradin

The Soul Forger, Dwarffather
Greater Power

The tallest and most powerful of dwarven deities, Moradin is the leader of the dwarven gods. He is said to have created all dwarves, forging them from metals and gems in the fires that lie at the "heart of the world," and breathing life—the first dwarven souls—into the cooling forms.

Moradin is said to inspire dwarven inventions, and to be constantly seeking to improve the race—increasing dwarven good nature, intelligence, and ability to exist in harmony with other living things. At the same time he battles the pride and isolationist tendencies that naturally occur within his elite creations.

Moradin seldom appears in the Realms, preferring to work through manifestations rather than avatars. His usual reason for an appearance (in either form) is to encourage dwarves to follow the correct paths or make the best decisions, at critical times. He will also appear to aid or inspire dwarves that he wants to survive to serve the race in the future, or as an example or encouragement to nondwarves who aid the dwarves.

Favored Manifestations: Moradin prefers to create a white radiance that surrounds a being to be healed or aided or an object that is animated. He projects his power by temporarily imbuing the individual, who is almost always a dwarf, with the ability to use one of Moradin's avatar spell abilities. Moradin will always choose a warhammer over all other objects for manifestations, if one is available. Animated objects serve as weapons, such as battering rams (to free imprisoned folk or reveal a hidden way), or guides floating along to show a route.

Avatar: Moradin appears as a 20-foot-tall dwarf, plainly-dressed and with a long white beard that reaches his knees. He wears furs and a smith's leather leggings and aprons, plus bracers of pure gold on his forearms. He exudes an aura of power that is visible as a faint white radiance, though he can cloak this if he wishes.

SP: all combat, creation, divination, healing, protection, sun, astral*, elemental (earth), necromantic.

SA: Moradin wields a huge, glowing warhammer +5. If touched by any other being, it vanishes and returns to the god. If his avatar is slain, the hammer returns to Moradin's home—a great cavern beneath the mountains in Solania, in the Seven Heavens.

Twice per day, Moradin can work imprisonment on a being by touching him. By the same means, he can also banish, as the wizard spell, but effective on the Prime Material plane and not requiring any naming or components.

When Moradin himself leaves a plane or teleports, he can at will leave a fire storm (as the priest spell) behind him, centered on his last location. This effect does 2d8 + 15 damage.

SD: No forged weapons of any type or source can harm the avatar of Moradin.

Moradin wears magical armor of his own making. When encountered in the Realms he never bothers to carry his shield, and the power of his armor is lessened, giving him less than his usual AC of -9.

Any weapon striking his bracers will transmit an energy discharge causing 2d6 points of damage to the wielder. Any frontal attack roll that misses by 1-3 points is deemed to have been parried by Moradin's bracers. The bracers vanish if removed from Moradin, or if he is "killed."

Clanggedin Silverbeard

The Father of Battle
Intermediate Power

Patron of dwarven warriors and their exultant leader in war, Clanggedin is a resolute warrior who never backs down from danger and who refuses to surrender even when all seems lost. He is known for often snatching victory from the narrowest of margins in battle.

Clanggedin watches over the battle-related skills and the performances of dwarves from his mountain fortress in Arcadia. There, he is attended by his Host, the souls of the finest dwarven warriors. He encourages valor in battle, weapon-mastery and training, wisdom in war, and most often manifests his powers only to further these aims. The aptly-named Father of Battle especially hates giants, and has taught the dwarves-and the gnomes, through their gods-special ways of fighting giant-type creatures.

Clanggedin uses his magic only to influence events indirectly, never in battle. He will only resort to influencing a battle with his magic when the very existence of his avatar in the Realms is threatened. He always prefers force-of-arms to spells.

Favored Manifestations: Clanggedin's power is usually seen as a flickering amber, red, or white radiance around a dwarf or weapon that is temporarily imbued with the god's power. This power typically gives any or all of the following benefits:

- double damage, or triple against giant-type creatures;
- immunity to breakage or other damage, (automatic successful item saving throws). This power can give any or all of the following for one turn;
- first strike in any combat round;
- an increase in Armor Class of 8;
- a temporary level increase for warriors of 7 levels, with resultant saving throw and THAC0 changes. The warrior also receives 'temporary' hit points-all damage taken is subtracted from these points first;
- the immediate breaking of any charms or other magical controls, recognizing them for what they are;

- the ability to stand upright and unmoving against any charge, force, magical effect, or blow-damage suffered, but falling or overbearing impossible;

Avatar: Clanggedin appears as a tall, burly dwarf, fierce and indomitable in his battered, bloodstained, and rusty chain mail. Bald and silver-bearded, he is always alert, his eyes darting here and there, his gaze as sharp as that of a hunting hawk.

He is merry in battle, roaring appreciation of shrewd strategies, bravery, and feats of skill even when directed against him. He often sings, both stirring battleballads and taunting little ditties to unnerve enemies, in the midst of a fight, and dwarves have learned to listen for hints, cues, and warnings in his lyrics. He is a master at turning the tables on enemy armies by anticipating their movements on the battlefield, and singing directions to dwarves fighting with him.

Like most dwarves, Clanggedin admires most those who help themselves. He typically appears at a battle only to right hopeless odds against dwarves, to balance treachery (and punish the treasonous), and to aid the weak of all races against evil, especially the acts of giants.

His touch can, at will, mend any metal weapon or armor as though it had never been broken, even restoring missing pieces. Any nonmagical weapon that he touches will strike at +9 to hit (normal damage) for seven rounds thereafter; this power is typically used to aid dwarves he is fighting alongside, or as a manifestation when Clanggedin does not choose to appear directly.

SD: Giant-class creatures attack Clanggedin at a -4 penalty to their attack rolls. He wears steel chain mail +5.

Sharindlar

Lady of Life
Intermediate Power

This dwarven lady is widely known as the goddess of healing and mercy. Dwarves wounded in battle are often healed in her name, and sick dwarves pray to her. However, kept secret from nondwarves as much as possible is her more important role in the eyes of today's dwarves: her patronage of love, courtship, and fertility.

When dwarves dance, they pray to Sharindlar to guide their feet, for she is said to be the greatest dancer the dwarves have ever known.

Favored Manifestations: Sharindlar rarely appears in avatar form in the Realms, but quite often aids dwarves by manifesting as an amber or rosy radiance and warmth. If healing herbs or plant antidotes are required and exist nearby, Sharindlar will illuminate them with her radiance, to mark them for searching dwarves. If a sick dwarf seeks shelter or water, Sharindlar's radiance will guide them. If dwarves are cold and lack shelter, Sharindlar's warmth and light can keep them comfortable while they rest, even on glaciers or rock ledges in blizzards. Her light is bright enough for wizards to study by, and for maps and books to be read.

At dances, moots, and other meetings when dwarves may be conceived, Sharindlar will often attempt to sway the thoughts and actions of dwarves by her warmth and radiance. Dwarven sages still argue over whether this is purely the result of her presence, serving as a hint and sign of her approval, or if she can manifest subtle aphrodisiac powers.

Avatar: Sharindlar appears as a slim, spirited, full-bearded and flame-haired dwarven maiden. She possesses arresting eyes that seem to change color often—different observers down the centuries have reported them as being of differing hues. To human observers, Sharindlar's beard may seem to vanish, or appear and reappear like a flickering flame.

She never wears armor, and is usually barefoot and clad in diaphanous gowns. Occasionally she will appear at parties wildly garbed in boots or high-heeled shoes, with rich gowns and ornate accoutrements.

If Sharindlar is attacked, flames rise around her body to armor her in flame. Her clothing always vanishes, reappearing unharmed as the flames die.

She fights with a whip + 6 that is studded with adamantine barbs and chaotic good-aligned, and a mace +2 that never makes any sound when it strikes. The mace forces ethereal and invisible creatures into full presence and visibility on the Prime Material Plane by touch, for at least two rounds.

Sharindlar cannot be charmed or fooled by magic that works on the mind or senses. Her touch is said to neutralize poison, which she can do thrice a day. Sharindlar herself is said to be immune to all known poisons.

Vergadain

God of Wealth and Luck
Intermediate Power

Vergadain is sometimes called 'the Trickster,' though not by dwarves who worship him, and even 'the Laughing Dwarf,' though a dwarf would never use such a term.

The patron of dwarven merchants (and most nonevil dwarven thieves), Vergadain is a schemer and a rogue. His home plane is that of Concordant Opposition, but he seems to spend little time there. He instead restlessly roams wildspace and the worlds that can be found in it. He concentrates his efforts wherever there are humans, giants, demi-humans, and humanoids to be bilked of their belongings by his tricks, and dwarves to appreciate his cleverness and daring—and to profit by it.

Vergadain delights in showing up at desperate dwarven settlements with exactly the unique, rare, or hard-to-find object or substances they are lacking. If the dwarves are not in dire straits, the treasure gained by Vergadain will also be hidden by him, and he will give the dwarves clues to its location—often hidden in the lyrics of a song or two, as he poses as a traveling minstrel.

Favored Manifestations: Vergadain likes to appear in avatar form in the Realms; he manifests only rarely, and always in one of four ways:

1. Vergadain may appear as an unseen dwarven singer or musician, whose song, drumming, or piping leads lost dwarves to safety, an escape route, or treasure.

2. He may appear more subtly, seizing control of a singer, prophet, or sage for his own purposes. That person will utter, speak, or sing words to leave clues or directions to the whereabouts of great treasure. At times, Vergadain will signal his presence by animating a gold piece, his symbol, to orbit the head of the possessed being; he does this particularly when the being is not a dwarf, and he wants only dwarves to notice the message.

3. Vergadain can appear as an animated, endlessly-rolling gold coin that travels along the floor or ground. It can travel even uphill, or bounding up steps, to lead beings to treasure; the coin will settle only to mark a hiding-place or route onwards (a loose flagstone leading to a tunnel, for instance), and gives no warning of guardian monsters or traps.

4. Finally, he can appear as a long rope that comes to hand unexpectedly when a dwarf needs it most (e.g. to escape down a cliff or castle wall, or to rescue a fallen companion). The rope later vanishes.

Avatar: Vergadain appears as a tall dwarf clad in brown and yellow merchant's clothing, which is often tattered or dusty. Underneath these garments, he wears armor, and often carries musical instruments, disguises, and treasure (such as gems) in sacks. He guards these sacks by thrusting poisonous snakes and similar creatures into them with his valued belongings.

He has a great singing voice, is a master of disguise and mimicry. Vergadain smiles more than any other dwarf deity—or living dwarf! His eyes are actually seen to twinkle enigmatically more often than he shows his smile to the world.

Vergadain delights in con games, even simple tavern-tricks, and admires someone who bests him rather than punishing them or trying to get even. He is always looking for new techniques, and when he detects a 'con artist,' will often watch and follow for a time, to see what he can.

His footwear always contains concealed weapons (such as knives or garrotes), or hiding places (such as hollow heels), or both.

SA: Vergadain can use improved invisibility, lasting for up to one turn, once per day. He can mislead once a day. He can also see invisible creatures at will, but only if they are living (not dead or undead) and within 20 feet.

Vergadain wields a broad sword +4 that detects all treasures within 20 feet of his person when grasped. It has a normal, well-used appearance, and communicates the precise location and rough size of treasures telepathically. The weapon can be used by anyone, but Vergadain is very attached to it, and will seek to regain it from anyone who takes it from him.

SD: Vergadain wears a concealed suit of golden chain mail +5, and a necklace that allows any wearer to change his or her height at will between one foot and 15 feet. Vergadain can always tell where this necklace is, even several planes distant (he helped to enchant it, and it is linked to him) and can override the control of any other being wearing it when he is within a mile of the necklace. The necklace is of nondescript appearance, apparently limitless powers, and changes to fit the wearer with the change in body size. It cannot be made to power or enact any other magical effect, and does not alter the wearer's appearance or the size of any clothing or gear.

If someone stole the necklace, it might go something like this:

A human female thief who stole the necklace could shrink to a foot in height, but would probably be instantly entangled in her clothing, or even pinned under her own falling dagger, belt, or boots. At that point, Vergadain would probably instantly force her to 15 feet in height, ruining the clothing as she shot up through it, attracting his and everyone else's attention to her exact location, and braining her (1d2 points of damage plus 1d2 rounds stunned) on any normal ceiling present.

If the thief was smart enough not to wear the necklace or allow it to touch her bare skin anywhere, only the necklace would change size. Attention-getting and harmful to any clothing concealing it, of course, Vergadain could still track her by the necklace, until she got rid of it.

Vergadain can spider climb at will. Nine times a day, he can by will create silence in any 20 foot-radius or smaller area, altering the size of the area at will. Such silence remains in effect for one turn (or less if dispelled by the avatar; it will resist all mortal dispel magic spells and abilities).

Dumathoin

Keeper of Secrets Under the Mountain
Intermediate Power

"The Silent Keeper" never speaks, although he may set subtle clues as to his purposes and the nature of the world beneath the surface, for those with keen eyes and wits to perceive them. Du-mathoin is the protector of all mountain dwarves, and the keeper of all metals. His priests believe that he lays veins of iron, copper, gold, silver, and mithral where they will most benefit his followers, when found. He is said to hide the secrets of the earth until they are ready to be uncovered by the diligent and the deserving.

Dumathoin created a paradise under the mountains for the mountain dwarves, when Moradin named him their protector. He shaped natural caverns of great beauty, studded with rich and beautiful deposits of shining metals and glittering outcroppings of crystalline gems. He was angered when the dwarves began to mine the mountains, destroying the beauty he had created.

Dumathoin was pleased, flattered, and a little awed, however, when he saw the finely crafted items the dwarves produced from the ores they had mined. He no longer objects to tunneling, mining, or the keeping of treasures underground.

The Keeper frowns, however, on clumsy or crude rock-cutting, activity that does not smooth and follow the natural flows and highlight the natural features of the rock. Cutting that causes cavern collapses and floodings are even less to his liking, and he is openly angered by those who pillage. He will typically manifesting his displeasure in small earthquakes or dreaded 'rumblings in the deep: Pillagers, in Dumathoin's eyes, are beings of all races who take the earth's riches away (i.e. to the surface) for unfair or selfish purposes, taking more than their share, and leaving rubble and other messes in their wake.

Miners of all races in the North (and dwarves south of the Sea of Fallen Stars) regard Dumathoin as their patron, and often carry a small diamond, agate, or other gemstone (of about 10 gp value) with them, to attract his favor. (Certain types of gemstones are not used for this purpose: see Berronar, below.)

Dumathoin is friendly with Hephaestus and other nondwarven gods of the earth and smithcraft. He supplies nondwarven gods of blacksmiths with adamantine ore, and sometimes does business with the other gods (through his and their priests) for metals and ores as well.

Although Dumathoin spends much of his time in his home plane of Concordant Opposition, he uses a unique power to keep underground and mountainous areas of several worlds under almost constant surveillance. This power is stone seeing, in effect a wizard eye usable from Dumathoin's own plane into any location on the Prime Material Plane, with unlimited range so long as it can extend through solid rock. Dumathoin can 'see' various veins and inclusions in solid rock, including moving xorn. However, he can only see as well as humans or dwarves do from a rock surface; i.e. from any cavern floor, wall, or ceiling.

Favored Manifestations: The Keeper of Secrets commonly manifests in two helpful ways and two harmful ways, treating dwarves and nondwarves equally.

Often when miners or other creatures are lost underground, particularly when their light sources are all gone, the power of Dumathoin will guide them to safety by causing rock crystals exposed in the stone walls to silently and suddenly sparkle or wink in sequence, beckoning and outlining a route. Where crystals are lacking, areas of bare rock may glow for a time.

Many miners pray to Dumathoin in thanks for another underearth phenomenon: the sudden, spontaneous shifting of wedged boulders or rubble blockages that have trapped miners or prevented their further exploration.

In the same way, they call rumblings and other earth tremors 'the warnings of Dumathoin,' and heed them when they occur as a cavern is first entered, or a rock-face first struck with pick or hammer. If warning tremors are ignored, or Dumathoin's anger is severe, a cave-in will occur above the offenders, typically a minor one doing 4d8 damage (a successful save vs. petrification reduces this damage to 2d8). Dumathoin also uses this technique to punish individuals who offend him by their actions. In such cases, the Keeper typically causes a "localized rockfall" (i.e. down on the head of one offending character), from either a rock ceiling overhead, or, if on the outside of a mountain, from a peak or ledge above. The damage is the same, but no saving throw to reduce it is allowed, and there is no chance of other characters being hit, or a further collapse occurring; Dumathoin's power is precise.

Avatar: Dumathoin appears as a tremendously powerful dwarf. His shoulders are as broad as most barn doors, and his arms are knotted and bulging with corded muscles. His skin is earth-brown, his hair and beard the hue of grey stone, and his eyes are of silver fire.

He gestures rather than speaking, and has never been known to do more than grunt in exertion or pain, or sigh, in the presence of mortals. The Keeper has a stolid patience and tolerance of nondwarves and hasty behavior lacking in most other dwarven deities, but he is just as patient and implacable an enemy, when angered. Most who offend Dumathoin and realize what they have done set at once to loudly and fervently pray for his forgiveness. They often offer to make amends by bringing back gems and metal treasures to the place where they offended him-immediately, if possible, or by a specified time, if not. If they keep this promise, Dumathoin is usually appeased. If they seem forgetful, they'd better not ever go near a mountain or cave again!

Once per day, the Keeper can instantly summon 3-18 earth elementals at will. They will fight for him to the death and will all have 16 hit dice.

The Keeper himself wields a great, two-handed mattock of solidified magma, a mattock + 5.

Dumathoin also has the power to use all earth-, stone-, and metal-related wizard spells as if he was a 30th level wizard, but can't use any other wizard spells.

SD: A magical weapon enchanted to +3 or better is required to hit Dumathoin.

AbbaThor

Great Master of Greed
 Intermediate Power

Although his home is a gold-lined cavern complex, the Glitterhell, deep in Oinos, the first gloom of Hades, this fell and evil dwarven god sometimes roams the Realms in search of more treasure. He is governed by his lust for treasure, and is treacherous in his dealings with dwarves. He will never help any nondwarven deity or being.

AbbaThor was once interested purely in the natural beauty of gems and metals, but became embittered when Moradin appointed Dumathoin the protector of mountain dwarves, a position AbbaThor felt should be his. From that day onward, AbbaThor has become ever more devious and self-serving, in a continual effort to wreak revenge on the other gods by establishing greed, especially evil greed, as the driving force in all dwarven lives. He especially hates and works against both Dumathoin and Moradin.

Abbathor's greed governs him: should he see treasure worth more than 1,000 gp, or any magical item, he will attempt to steal it outright or slay the owner and then take it anyway. If frustrated in an attempt to steal an item, Abbathor will try to destroy it, so as not to be tortured by the memory of his failure.

Abbathor maintains an uneasy truce with the god Vergadain, and sometimes roams the Realms or other worlds (such as Oerth or even Krynn) in search of treasure.

Favored Manifestations: Abbathor manifests purely to work his own ends, typically in one of four ways:

1. He can create a sudden treasure lust for gold or gems, in dwarves, gnomes, humans, or halflings (to avoid, save vs. spell at a -2 penalty; -4 if dwarven). Affected beings will do anything Abbathor (i.e. the DM) wants for 6 rounds, provided it is in an attempt to seize known treasure and keep it, slaying all witnesses if that seems necessary. Combat with friends or loved ones allows repeated saves, each round, to break free of Abbathor's power.

2. Abbathor can cause any dwarf to be suddenly made aware of the precise location, nature, and value of hidden gems within 10 feet.

3. Abbathor can cause magical silence, 15' radius and darkness, both lasting one turn, to aid the escape of a dwarf who has stolen something.

4. Finally, whenever a treasure chest is opened or a hoard-pile is disturbed while the god is watching, Abbathor will try to cause gems and/or coins to 'leap' of their own accord. He will make them fall and bounce or roll away into crevices or other hiding-places where the god may recover them later. Allow a 2 in 6 chance of this happening; if it occurs, roll 1d12 to determine how many valuables are affected, and allow PCs Dexterity checks to trap, catch, or retrieve them, according to how they act.

Sometimes, when Abbathor's avatar is present in the Realms, two other manifestations will occur.

First, when Abbathor hears his name spoken (in the way all avatars can), a hand-like invisible force will snatch and clutch at the purse, pockets, worn jewelry or sacks of the speaker, by way of warning. If anything comes loose (apply item saving throws, and/or Strength and Dexterity checks, as the circumstances suggest), treat the objects as 'leaping into hiding' (as above), for Abbathor to claim later.

Second, when Abbathor's avatar or a being (almost always a dwarf) he is concentrating upon walks close to gems, cut or natural and still embedded in stone, they will 'sing' with a high-pitched, multi-toned chiming, rather like the sounds made by the glass and metal wind chimes popular in the South. This singing is audible to all, and serves to guide Abbathor or his chosen being to the gems.

Avatar: Abbathor is squat and hunched, despite his height, and seems to slither and sidle along as he walks, never making much noise, but often rubbing his hands together. If carrying gems or gold, he often caresses these in a continuous, unconscious, overwhelmingly sensuous manner. At times this has made many ignorant folk attack him, overcome by lust to gain the treasure he holds.

The Great Master is said to have burning yellow-green eyes (blazing yellow when eager for treasure or when pouncing upon it, hooded and green while scheming or when thwarted). He has a sharp hooked nose like a giant eagle's beak, and always dresses in leather armor and furs, both fashioned from the skins of creatures who have opposed him, and died to regret it.

He is said to have a harsh, husky, wheedling voice, a quick temper. He tends to hiss and spit when angry.

SA: Abbathor wields a diamond-bladed dagger +5 with jewels set into the hilt. It does 2d12 (base) points of damage, and can detect the presence (type and amount) of precious metals in a 20 foot radius. It repowers itself by draining life energy from all mortals who touch it: one experience level is lost at the first touch, and one per round or partial round thereafter if the blade continues to be held.

When expecting trouble, Abbathor also bears a shield that can cast a 30 foot-range blindness spell at any one creature, once per round. Targets must save at a penalty of -6 (-3 if continually facing away from the shield, which forces them to fight at with a penalty of -4 to their attack rolls and armor class.

SD: Abbathor often carries a pair of golden lions, figurines of wondrous power, concealed in a pocket. If hard-pressed, he will hurl these, commanding them to fight for him. If they're overpowered and the god must flee, he simply returns to steal them back, and slay their new owner, as soon as is convenient.

BERRONAR TRUESILVER

Mother of Safety, Ruth, and Home
 The Revered Mother
 Intermediate Power

Berronar is the bride of Moradin, and dwells with him at the Soul Forge beneath the mountains in Solania (fourth of the Seven Heavens, called "Khynduum" in the oldest dwarven writings). She is seen as the patroness of marriage and love (but not necessarily romance; courting dwarves usually pray and make their offerings to Sharindlar, instead). Berronar is the tireless foe of Abbathor; her name is often invoked in small home rituals, for protection against thieves and duplicity.

Although Berronar's avatar is rarely seen in the Realms, she works ceaselessly to preserve and protect dwarven culture and civilization. Her favorite techniques are to manifest her powers in dwarven mortals on occasions crucial to the survival of a clan, people, or lore-records. She does so either to guide and empower them to protective feats of arms, or to lead them to the discovery of forgotten records, facts, and truths.

Certain gems, including octel, shandon, and sphene, are said by dwarves to be the hardened tears of Berronar. Also, rock crystal qualifies, but only when clear within, and found naturally smoothed by ice or water. These sorts of gems cannot be carried to attract the favor of Dumathoin (see above).

If a braid of Berronar's beard is cut off, it will regrow in a single day. At the end of that day, the lock that was cut off will turn to gold (worth 10,000-40,000 gp). This ability is shared by the goddess herself and her avatar form in the Realms.

Dwarves revere Berronar for her caring and loving service to all dwarves. On very rare occasions, when the most powerful priest of Berronar in a community makes humble supplication to the goddess, Berronar will give such locks of hair to mortal dwarves. This gold is given only to dwarven communities that are exceptionally poor or hard-pressed, and unable to otherwise recover economically.

Favored Manifestations: Berronar can, at a range of one mile or less, use suggestion on any intelligent creature. The saving throw is made at a penalty of -7 if the creature is of lawful good alignment, -5 if of another good alignment, -3 if of a neutral alignment, and at -1 if of an evil alignment. Berronar will employ this power to lead chosen dwarves to open certain chests, go to certain locations, and so on to uncover the secrets she wants known again. These secrets are usually about the past glories of the dwarven civilizations.

In more pressing conditions, Berronar can empower an individual dwarf with her favor, which appears as an aura or radiance of bright silver. While so imbued (a condition typically lasting 1 or 2 turns), a favored dwarf can gain three benefits. First, he has the armor class of Berronar's avatar, -4. Next, he is affected as if by a haste spell for which no aging occurs. Finally, he receives attack and damage bonuses of +2, but this 'brute force' aid is done only in emergencies.

Berronar prefers to work through lawful good dwarven fighters, using suggestion to encourage appeals to her. If such a warrior appeals to the Revered Mother for aid for a particular purpose, and makes an appropriately large sacrifice, there is a 5% chance Berronar will imbue the warrior with power. The sacrifice should consist mainly of the dwarfs of wealth, which Berronar causes to vanish from her temple altars, and personally distributes to the poorest dwarves throughout the Realms. DMs might want to secretly raise this chance to around 45% for nonplayer characters. Only dwarves of exceptionally pure heart will be considered for this honor, and Berronar almost always grants it only once in every 10 years to the same individual.

Avatar: The Revered Mother appears as a huge dwarf, fearless of aspect but gentle in speech, whose brown beard is braided into four rows. She has the power to take the shape of an aged dwarf of either sex, or even a short, stooped human crone—and when in such a form, no god or mortal can detect anything of her divine nature or powers (although she retains full use of them). Berronar often uses this lesser form to watch and judge dwarves, walking among them to learn what treatment she will receive.

priests or other officials knowingly on a mission that will involve their deliberately causing the death of another) on contact. This property will fail if the struck target saves vs. death magic with a penalty of -4; one successful save means that the being is immune to the mace's power.

SD: Berronar wears everbright silver chain mail +5 that cannot be harmed by fire. It protects its wearer from all fire, heat, and electrical (lightning) attacks.

She also wears two silver rings of great power; one prevents anyone from knowingly telling a falsehood within 100 feet of her. The other prevents the use of all thieving abilities by mortals within 100 feet of her. A thief may avoid this if he successfully saves vs. spell with a penalty of -2 in every round in which he attempts to use any thievery skill.

If either of these rings is removed from Berronar's possession, they will crumble into nothingness forever in 2-12 days. Their magic will become only 33% reliable in the last 2 days before they fall apart.

Marthammor Duin

Finder-of-Trails

The Watcher over Wanderers

Lesser Power

The Watcher over Wanderers is the protector of dwarves who make their lives in human society in the North, rather than keeping to mountain or deep-delve enclaves. He is the patron of adventurers and explorers, allowing them to find escape routes or leading them to victory in their travels. He also watches over dwarven craftsmen of any good alignment, keeping their homes and persons safe.

Marthammor is seldom at home in his Cavern of Rest, which is guarded by the souls of those dwarves who perished while traveling aboveground, and by boars and war-dogs trained by the god himself. The Cavern lies in the ever-shifting underways of Nidavellir, third layer of Gladsheim. Marthammor spends most of his time wandering the northern reaches of Faerun in his avatar form.

Favored Manifestations: The Finder

of Trails almost always manifests himself in one of four ways helpful to dwarves and to their companions and friends. He is far less xenophobic than most dwarves or their deities.

In the wilds, Marthammor will indicate to troubled dwarves the safest or best way to proceed by appearing as a glowing upright mace, floating in midair. His image is a bright, blue-white translucent mace which has no tangible existence, but which is not destroyed by being 'passed through.' It is unaffected by dispel magic or other magical attacks and effects. The Mace of Marthammor gives off enough light to read by, and floats along in front of dwarves, patiently guiding them along his chosen route.

In situations where precipices, pit-traps or other dangers lurk, or when a wrong choice of route has been made, Marthammor will manifest as a glowing, blue-white, disembodied hand. The hand will signal 'stop' by appearing fingers together and palm open in warning. It will point back or in other directions to outline traps or to indicate a better way. The hand can even trace clan symbols or dwarven runes to establish its identity or to communicate messages.

In the homes of dwarves, Marthammor manifests as a mace of pulsing light that strikes unseen surfaces in midair to make a ringing, crashing sound audible only to dwarves. This alarm warns of thieves or other intruders, and will strike one blow against an intruder (normal mace damage, automatic hit) before vanishing.

In cases of imminent invasion (i.e. by an orc horde) or other natural disaster that dwarven residents cannot hope to defeat, Marthammor can appear in the dreams of dwarves to warn them to move away in haste. If no dwarf is asleep, Marthammor manifests as a glowing magic mouth floating above the image of his symbol, and warns the residents directly. Any wizard who attempts to duplicate Marthammor's magic mouth symbol will invite an immediate personal attack by the god. If such an imposter has trap planned for the god, Marthammor will sense it and bring several other dwarven deities—such as his friends Clangedin and Gorm—with him.

Avatar: The Finder appears as a thin, raven-bearded dwarf dressed in leather armor and furs, cloaked in natural colors (usually green). He may carry a walking stick of rough wood, and often leaves it behind "accidentally" after encountering dwarves.

Treat the walking-stick as a quarterstaff + 1. When in the hands of a dwarf, it will furnish one limited wish if that wish is spoken aloud as the stick is broken. The walking-stick will then crumble into dust as the wishing-magic is expended, accompanied by the ringing tone of a mace crashing against metal in the distance. A nondwarf who breaks one of Marthammor's staves will merely destroy its magic, ending up with two or more splintered pieces of wood.

SA: The Finder wields a huge mace of steel, that glows and pulses as if still red-hot from the forge. It is not in fact hot, and does 2-20 base damage by its impact only, not through heat or flame. Marthammor can swing this weapon, or another, in a round, and also employ one of his magical powers every second round, without affecting his physical activity.

Marthammor can create one quarterstaff (see above) at the end of every 6 turns. The creation requires a physical staff be cut from a tree (a physical activity), and then enchanted (the Finder's magical activity for that round; it requires continual grasping of the staff and concentration, but does not preclude other physical activity). Marthammor can use the staff himself, including its limited wish.

SD: Marthammor can blink, dimension door, pass without trace or passwall at will, one power per round. There must be a round of power inactivity on Marthammor's part between each round in which he does use magical powers.

Marthammor can cast freedom (the reverse of imprisonment) at will, by touching the ground. He is at all times himself immune to the effects of petrification and polymorph spells cast by others, as he is to charm, entangle, maze and trap the soul magics. Fire-Eyes

The guardian and protector of dwarvenkind the Realms over is a tireless defender of the Stout Folk. Although he nominally dwells in Watchkeep, his tower home in the blizzard-whipped mountains of Shurrock, he returns to it only when he needs the armory he has amassed there, or his magical Seat of Healing. The rest of the time, Gorm is in the Realms, teleporting from place to place to aid dwarves in withstanding armed attacks or powerful monsters.

Favored Manifestations: Gorm prefers to act directly (see below), husbanding his power for personal combat. He therefore manifests seldom, except to imbue dwarven individuals with temporary fighting powers. These powers are described above under Manifestations, at the beginning of this chapter.

On occasion, he will rouse sleeping dwarves or otherwise warn of intruders or impending attack by causing a disembodied metal gauntlet to appear. The gauntlet will strike any handy metal shield or breastplate. The struck metal will ring with a terrific rolling, gong-like noise, and will sport two burning eyes for the next turn. When the eyes fade, two eyeholes will have been burned in the metal. Dwarves treasure such damaged shields and armor, and always display them as trophies, rather than melting them down to make a whole item again.

If Gorm must leave a battle (see below) knowing the dwarves there still face a grave challenge, he will manifest later as a glowing hand. His hand will break ropes, hurl back siege ladders, and strike blows (one a round, for 1-6 damage + 14). It operates with Gorm's full strength, and 'sees' by means of two burning eyes in its palm.

Avatar: Gorm appears as a dwarf clad in full plate armor of golden-brown hue, chased and decorated with red, crawling, ever-changing runes that allow it to act as a ring of spell turning. He says little, but has a stern, booming voice when he does speak.

Gorm's power is such that he can remain in one place for only a turn at most. He therefore acts only when dwarves are already engaged in combat, and need his aid. At such times he appears, engages in a frenzied, all-out attack, seeking to do the most damage to the enemies of the dwarves as he possibly can, and then vanishes again. He cannot return to a given place in avatar form twice in the same day (24-hour period), but can manifest himself in between his appearances, in a continuing battle.

SA: Once every second round, Gorm can emit a short-duration fiery beam from his eyes. This thin beam can attack up to 2 opponents in a round, striking with Gorm's normal 'hand-to-hand'

THACO, and replacing Gorm's magical activity in the round. Gorm can use it in combination with physical attacks and ongoing magical effects. The beam reaches up to 90 feet away, and does 2d8 fiery damage to all creatures struck by it (1d8 if a save vs. spells is successful). Creatures immune to flame damage will be unharmed.

The beam acts as an instant ('searing' level) heat metal on all metal that it touches. A second beam striking the same piece or area of metal will melt the metal, unless it saves vs. lightning (magical items gain saving throw bonuses equal to any attack bonuses they possess). Note that an armored character struck by the beam would suffer both direct beam damage and the 'searing' damage as from a heat metal spell. If the beam strikes again, both types of damage would be suffered again, and the armor would collapse into liquid metal blobs, falling from its wearer's body!

SD: Gorm is protected by a permanent protection from normal missiles effect natural to his body. It cannot be affected by dispel magic, nor can it be temporarily negated, and operates constantly and independently of the god's magical activity.

Once per turn, Gorm can by silent act of will use spell turning. In Gorm's case, however, he can reflect back the effects of any spells, spell-like magical powers, or effects from magical items directed at him back up on the casters or wielders. Spell turning counts as Gorm's magical activity for the round, but cannot be stopped by physical restraints or attacks, operates instantaneously, and can deal with any number of attacks launched at the god, simultaneously.

Gorm's magical Seat of Healing at his home in Watchkeep can restore all lost hit points to the god or any being he allows to sit on it. The Seat also regenerates extensive damage, in 1d4 + 1 turns.

Haela Brightaxe

Lady of the Fray, Luckmaiden, Battle-sister
Demipower

Dwarves who wander Faerun and who must face unknown dangers, particularly in the north, often worship Haela "the Hard," whose specialty is luck in battle. She is the patron of those dwarves who love the fray, and aids those who battle monsters.

Haela dwells in a simple cave, hidden by everpresent mists in the depths of a forest. Her cave is guarded by seven high-level dwarven warriors. They wield normal weapons, and have true seeing. These guardians cannot be turned. If slain, they dissipate, only to re-form 1d4 + 1 days later. Haela's cave is on Brux, in the Happy Hunting Grounds, but she bothers none of the animals who dwell there, keeping to herself. She is usually to be found in Wildspace or on a world such as Toril, wherever dwarves are enjoying a battle but in need of aid.

Favored Manifestations: Haela manifests only rarely, preferring to appear directly instead. When she does manifest, it is either in cases where she will not be otherwise needed, or to help dwarves 'hold on' until she can deal with other matters and arrive to help.

Haela's manifestations always involve an aura of silvery flames, shot through with blue-white and amber sparks. These are images only, not true flames or sparks, and cannot ignite anything.

If Haela's aura surrounds a dwarf, her power heals the dwarf of all injuries, and allows the dwarf to strike at + 4 to hit for 1d4 + 1 rounds. This imbues the dwarf with power enough to consider any weapons wielded to be "silver" or "magical, +4," or both, for purposes of damage that can be inflicted by the empowered dwarf.

If Haela's power surrounds a weapon, it is rendered "supreme" for 1d4 + 1 rounds: any attacks made with it during this time cannot miss, and do full normal damage. If a weapon empowered by Haela is already magical, its magical properties are suspended by Haela's magic, and cannot operate (or be harmed or drained): the weapon will do only physical damage until Haela's power fades.

Avatar: Haela appears as a powerfully-muscled female dwarf, clad only in her long, flowing silver hair and beard. She dances and twirls about constantly, wielding a two-handed sword that cannot cut her. She often hurls it into the air and catches it by the blade, vaults upwards to a high ledge or balcony with a hand upon its point, or slides down it exuberantly in play.

Haela usually appears in a spectacular blue-white burst of flames, which blossoms from nowhere, and does no fiery damage. Once present, she engages the fiercest foe of, or the creature offering the most pressing danger to, the dwarves that she can find. She will battle it for four rounds and, if it is slain, attack a second opponent of the dwarves for the remaining round or rounds. She will then empower a dwarf (see Manifestations, above) and/or a weapon, then disappear with a hand held high.

Haela's sword is encircled by tongues of spiraling flame while she fights; she can will these to vanish or reappear freely and they will do so instantly, but cannot reappear on the same round in which they vanish. The flames themselves are harmless. The weapon does 2d12 points of damage. Haela does 1d10 damage barehanded, and can parry just as well when weaponless.

Haela's presence causes such exultation in dwarves that they fight with a + 1 bonus on all attack rolls while they can see her. In cases where Haela aids beleaguered dwarves, she usually dances in front of their enemies, engaging and parrying rather than striking to do damage, allowing the dwarves time to regroup and drag their wounded to safety. Then she will heal 2d4 dwarves (see Manifestations, above), strike one blow in earnest, and vanish, hurrying on to the next conflict.

In such cases, consider Haela able to engage 1d8 creatures while parrying their attacks in her 'battle dance.' She cannot stop magical attacks, but automatically ruins all spellcasting, and lessens/thwarts physical attacks upon her or the dwarves she is protecting as follows:

If Haela faces one or two opponents, all attacks are automatically thwarted, and the creatures cannot advance against her.

If Haela faces three, four, or five opponents, all their attacks are made at a penalty of - 3 to hit, and - 1 on damage.

If Haela faces six, seven, or eight opponents, all their attacks are made at a penalty of - 1 to hit (no effect on damage).

Creatures in excess of eight are unaf-ected by Haela's dance of battle: they get through to attack normally. Count flying creatures as two opponents when using these totals. If Haela deems it necessary to heal (once per round) while dancing, her healing action lessens her parrying ability by two opponents.

Any successful attacks on Haela while she is parrying do half damage whether she is armed or unarmed.

Haela is seldom in any one place for long, and almost never returns to the same fray or dwarven individuals twice in a day. However, she favors especially bold or valiant dwarves, and may, in the course of their lives, aid them repeatedly. It is said that she appears when her favorites die, to carry their souls away to become her Guardians, and to avenge their deaths by pursuing and slaying their killers, however long it takes and no matter how powerful they are. If such killers are subsequently raised, Haela takes no further action against them; their payment has been made.

SA: Once per turn Haela can call into being her Brightaxe, a shining silver throwing axe as tall as a man. It appears in midair in one round, and flashes through the air in accordance to her will in the next round (preventing Haela from using any other magical powers for both rounds). The Brightaxe flies up to 140 feet distant within the second round, attacking at THAC0 1, and dealing any creature struck by it 3d12 points of damage (no save), and (if mortal) stunning them (no voluntary activities, including spellcast-ing or magical activations of any kind) for the following round.

SD: Once per day Haela can call up immunity to blades, a power that lasts for nine continuous rounds. It allows all metal weapons to pass through her body as though through empty air, doing her no damage. Note that she cannot use, grasp or deflect such weapons during her immunity, except by use of a nonmetal club or other aid. She can by touch transfer this protection to another creature at any time.

Once per day, Haela can employ resurrection (as the priest spell) on any one being, without apparently suffering any aging effects. Creatures so restored to life automatically make successful survival saving throws. Haela customarily does this only to dwarves who died valiantly in battle, although if dwarves beg her to, she will use this power to aid nondwarven companions and allies of the dwarves.

Thard Harr

Lord of the Jungle Deeps, Disentangler
Lesser Power

This deity is revered only by the wild dwarves of the jungles of Faerun. Thard Harr appears seldom in the Realms, preferring to roam the Beastlands (the Happy Hunting Grounds), aiding his worshippers through his manifestations instead. He is said to have no permanent abode, but to wander all three layers of the Beastlands constantly, stalking, hunting, and frolicking with the beasts who dwell there, running as one of them rather than preying upon them.

Thard Harr is the protector of the Jungle Dwarves, aiding them against intruders and marauding beasts.

Favored Manifestations: Thard Harr's manifestations involve low, continuous thudding and snarling sounds that apparently emanate from the empowered beings. The sounds are unstoppable and have no special effects. Empowered beings begin to glow with a crawling, pulsing nimbus of cherry-red light, and they are imbued with power from the god for up to one turn.

Thard Harr empowers only one being at a time, either a Wild Dwarf or a jungle beast. Beasts simply use their natural attacks and abilities to fight for the Wild Dwarves to the death. They are rendered immune to natural or magical entanglement, including snares, any form of charm or mental influences (including illusions), and become fearless, attacking despite fire, spells, or opponents of large size or demonstrated ferocity.

Empowered dwarves gain a temporary bonus of four levels (affecting THACO, all saving throws, and hit points). Temporary hit points gained in this way are lost with the withdrawal of Thard Harr's power, but all damage suffered by the dwarf is taken first from these.

Empowered dwarves also gain "the Claws of the God": their hands become rending talons, each doing 1d4 + 2 damage. Roll two attacks per round for dwarves with "the Claws." Empowered dwarves toss weapons aside, preferring to fight with their hands.

Thard Harr often manifests in one dwarf after another in the same conflict, so that intruders may face one empowered dwarf for a turn, another for the next turn, and so on. The god never aids the same dwarves for more than six turns in a day, but may aid them in separate 'visits' (either actual, or in manifestations), to make up this total, if danger persists.

Avatar: Thard Harr appears as a dark-skinned, potbellied dwarf covered with tattoos and tufts of long, matted hair. He cannot be caught in any web, shrubbery, vines, jaws, or glues (of monsters or plants), and can feather fall any distance.

The Disentangler is naked, except for the thick growth of hair that covers his torso, his long beard, and the ornate copper helm he wears, that conceals his face at all times. It is fashioned in the shape of a crocodile's head, and is festooned with a fringe of dangling teeth, reportedly torn from creatures the god has slain.

Thard Harr wears scaled, adamantite gauntlets strapped to his forearms at the elbow (as high as they reach). These gauntlets end in jointed, razor-sharp claws that can rake or spear for 2d8 damage each, and are reputedly unbreakable. Wild Dwarves speak of opponents or natural forces so powerful and dangerous that they might well "blunt the claws of Harr himself," but never allude to the breaking of any claw, or the defeat of their god in any fight.

Thard Harr seldom speaks, but has been known to purr, growl, snarl and roar like a great cat.

SA: Thard Harr can breathe out a spicy, greenish-blue gas once per day. The cloud is a cone 5 feet wide at its base and 20 feet wide at its furthest extent (20 feet away). All creatures in this cloud when it is released and on the round following must save vs. breath weapon or be unable to unleash or activate any spells or magic items for the next nine rounds. Ongoing or already-activated magic will continue to function, but cannot be altered in target, power level, or attitude, as the DM judges appropriate.

SD: Thard Harr is immune to charms, holds, illusions, and poisons of all sorts. He is fearless, oblivious to pain and all its effects, and can reattach severed limbs or torn body parts just as a troll does; his touch can empower any dwarf to do this (including regeneration of 1d4 + 1 hp per round) for three rounds.

PRIESTS OF THE DWARVES

The gods of the dwarves aid their dwindling, beleaguered worshippers more directly than the deities of any other race. This makes dwarven clerics at once more important and less prone to corruption than priests of other races. The dwarves and their priesthoods are explored here.

Divine Aid

Any cleric, of any level, can call on his or her deity for aid. Among the dwarves, however, they may expect, sometime in their careers, to be answered. How likely the coming of divine aid is depends on the situation. The identity of the dwarf entreats plays a part. Dwarven deities value faithful and diligent followers, and acquire favorites among their priests, who will get special attention. The major consideration, however, is how helpful the aid will be to the survival and betterment of the dwarves in the long run.

It is recommended that the DM personally decide on all cases of requested divine intervention. This is in order to make for the most exciting adventures possible, and to prevent abuse of this potential 'helping hand'. Such aid should be a last-ditch refuge, not a preemptive weapon. In general, dwarven clerics should be guided by the thought that dwarven gods are most pleased by worshippers who help themselves, not by followers who expect their gods to pull them out of every dangerous or merely uncomfortable situation.

It may be wise for the DM to pretend to roll dice to decide on all cases of requested divine intervention, and in some cases, a DM will undoubtedly want to randomly determine such aid. Roll percentile dice (results hidden from players), and allow a base 5% chance of aid, rolled whenever a plea is made. If the gods are called upon, there is a maximum of one roll per supplicant for each deity named. Such pleas should only be allowed at the height of the conflict.

If any percentile roll is successful, aid comes. Roll 1d20. Any result of 13 or less means the god will intervene with a divine manifestation. A result of 14 through 16 means multiple manifestations occur. A result of 17 through 20 means a direct appearance of the divinity's avatar. The manifestations and avatars are detailed under the entry for each god; choose the god called upon, or the one with the most appropriate portfolio.

Some gods are prone to taking a direct hand. Others prefer to work through manifestations, appearing in person only rarely. The chances given here should be adjusted by as much as three or four points on the dice to reflect this.

As a general rule, deities avoid giving aid in cases of conflict between dwarves. None of the deities encourage such conflict, and dislike taking sides openly before their faithful. They will aid dwarves against duergar, however, by manifestation only. The exception to this is Abbathor, who, by manifestation only, will aid duergar against other dwarven races.

Who Worships Who

Throughout the Realms, a traveler may find oddities among worshippers: a dragon who worships the dwarven deity Dumathoin, for example, or a human who prays to the elven god Solonar Thelandira. There are exceptions to all generalizations as to the nature of worshippers in Toril, and, one suspects, on almost all worlds and planes. DMs should not, therefore, feel constrained to place the same limits on the classes, alignments, and races of NPC worshippers that game balance dictates must apply to player-character worshippers.

Generalizations are useful as a ready guide to rational and accepted worship for player characters, and to DMs for the quick creation of background for NPCs. Here, then, is a "worshipper list" for the dwarven gods of the Realms:

Moradin: All dwarves appease Moradin, even if they do not wholeheartedly support him. All lawful good dwarves support and work openly to serve the Soul Forger, even if they also worship another deity.

Clangedin Silverbeard: All dwarves who must fight, especially dwarves who are warriors by profession, worship Clangedin Silverbeard. The Father of Battle is especially the deity of choice among lawful neutral dwarven warriors.

Dumathoin: All dwarves who live in, or venture into, subterranean areas or mountains, and who work directly with the riches of the earth worship the Silent Keeper. All dwarven miners and many nondwarven miners at least appease him, even if they do not fully support him.

Abbathor: Most evil dwarves and all dwarven thieves worship the Great Master of Greed. Many dwarves and even nondwarves consumed with treasure-lust and greed, or who seek to steal valuables make offerings to him.

Vergadain: Dwarves of all neutral alignments engaged in commerce and concerned with wealth, especially merchants and thieves, worship the Trickster.

Berronar Truesilver: Lawful good dwarves who value their families, clans, and the common strength and security of dwarven society worship the Revered Mother. All dwarves of any alignment who seek a safe refuge, or who want their loved ones or relatives kept safe offer her appeasement, as well.

Sharindlar: All dwarven healers, midwives, physics, and lovers pray to the Lady of Life. In appeasement, dwarves of ail alignments and races who are courting and those who must sentence others in the cause of justice make offerings to her, as well.

Marthammor Duin: All dwarven craftsmen of any good alignment, and dwarven adventurers and explorers, particularly those of chaotic or neutral good alignment, are devout followers of the Finder-of-Trails. For good fortune, respect is given Marthammor by all Wanderers.

Gorm Gulthyn: All dwarves who serve as guardians worship Fire-eyes. Also, in appeasement, those who require protection or armed aid pay tribute to the protector of dwarvenkind. Lawful neutral and lawful good dwarves in particular turn to Gorm.

Haela Brightaxe: Dwarves of any alignment who love battle, who wander the surface lands (especially in the North), and who must battle monsters turn to the Lady of the Fray. Love of battle or berserker tendencies and chaotic or neutral good alignment in particular lead dwarves to embrace active worship of Haela.

Thard Harr: Jungle or Wild dwarves of all alignments beat their drums for Thard Harr. Some hunters of all races and alignments operating in jungle areas look to the Disentangler for guidance, as well.

Priests

Dwarven priests are individuals who feel a special affinity for a particular god, usually from birth. They must want to further the aims of the god, feel a love and kinship for the god, and will often hear the god speak, feel the god's emotions, or (by vision) see the god act, in their minds.

There is a particular 'look' about the eyes and face of a dwarven priest, that is readily discernible (in good light, and within 20 feet) to another dwarf of the same race, but never to strangers or nondwarves. This is a subtle look of devotion, not a flashing sign that proclaims a priest's level and deity.

dwarven priests try to hide their class from nondwarves. When they must cast spells, they do so from hiding or from a distance. They have generally succeeded in keeping understanding of their spells or even recognition of their existence secret from most nondwarves in Faerun. This is particularly true in the north, where dwarves walk more softly, and more often live among nondwarves.

The rarely-identified dwarven clerics generally function (in terms of spell use, level advancement, and the like) as clerics of all other races do. They do, however, differ in behavior from most human priests. Dwarven clerics may dress and act as nonclerical dwarves do, and often try to keep worship and rituals hidden from nondwarven eyes. Only male dwarves may become clerics of the male dwarven deities, and only female dwarves may become the clerics of the female dwarven deities.

Dwarven clerics are allowed the use of any armor and all bludgeoning weapons. The exceptions are clerics of Abbathor, Clangedin, Haela and Thard Harr, who are allowed the use of all sorts of weapons. The dwarven clerics are allowed to use all magical items not specifically denied to clerics, the usual chances for malfunctions (as described in the Monstrous Compendium, Volume 2 entry for Dwarf) apply.

No dwarven deity has a sacred or totem animal. Most dwarven clerics cannot turn or dispel undead, but in direct battle with undead creatures, dwarven clerics strike at + 2 on all attack and damage rolls.

Dwarven priests of seventh level and higher are known as "High Old Ones," and gain some special powers, including the ability to turn undead. They are the 'specialty priests' of the dwarves, and often function as direct servants and speakers of the deities, Dwarves of all races and faiths respect High Old Ones, and (unless mentally controlled or unable to identify such a dwarf) will never willingly attack a High Old One, whatever the situation.

The powers of High Old Ones are described after the priesthood details that follow.

Clergies of The Dwarven Gods

Moradin

Portfolio: The dwarven race, its survival, renewal, and advancement.

Major Spheres: All, Combat, Creation, Divination, Guardian, Healing, Protection, Sun.

Minor Spheres: Astral, Elemental (earth only), Necromantic.

Clerical Raiment: Any, though ceremonial garb includes flowing, shining robes of woven wire of electrum, treated with blueshine.

Holy Days: At decree of a High Old One (usually to celebrate something), and at the time of the full moon.

Sacrifice/Propitiation: Offerings of common or precious metals, especially those already worked by dwarven hands into items of beauty, experimentation, or practical use, such as tools or ornamented hardware.

Ethos and Current Aims: To restore the dwarven races to strong numbers and a position of influence in Faerun, by founding new dwarven kingdoms and increasing the status of dwarves within the wider human-dominated society prevalent in the Realms today.

The center of any shrine to the most powerful of dwarven gods is always a hearth and forge. Temples have ever-burning hearths and forges of the finest workmanship, and are always underground, carved out of solid rock. Sacrifices of common or precious metals are melted down at the forge and reformed into shapes usable by the clergy. Rituals involve chanting, kneeling, and reaching bare-handed into the flames of the forge (Moradin prevents harm to the truly faithful), to handle red- and white-hot objects directly.

Priests entering a temple of Moradin must bow to the forge and surrender all weapons. If they are priests of another faith, they cannot advance beyond the "wall of fire," a knee-high, permanent magical effect, without permission of a High Old One or the avatar of Moradin. Priests of Moradin always strike an anvil standing by the entry once with their hammers, before surrendering them to everpresent dwarven warriors faithful to Moradin: there are always at least four present, and usually seven at any shrine.

Priests of Moradin engage in humble, verbal prayer and in open, earnest discussion of current dwarven problems and issues, more so than any other priesthood. Such discussion is considered to be between equals (even if nondwarves participate), save that the ranking priest of Moradin has the sole authority to open and close discussion on a particular topic.

Worship usually ends with a rising, quickening, fervent chanting in unison of "the dwarves shall prevail, the dwarves shall endure, the dwarves shall grow!" This is repeated ever more loudly, until the plain, massive, battered smith's hammer on the largest anvil of the forge rises up off the anvil of its own volition (moved by the power of the listening god). The hammer may or may not move about or glow to denote the god's will, marked pleasure, or agreement. It always descends gently to the anvil, although when it comes to rest, it makes a thunderous ringing sound, as if brought down on the metal with all of a powerful dwarf's strength.

Clangedin Silverbeard

Portfolio: War and battle.

Major Spheres: All, Combat, Guardian, Protection, Sun.

Minor Spheres: Charm, Creation, Divination, Elemental (earth), Healing, Necromantic.

Clerical Raiment: Silver chain mail armor, always worn with a war helm. Priests of Clanggedin seldom take off their helms, although there is no prohibition against doing so. Priests of Clanggedin never like to fight with shields, but will do so to protect other dwarves.

Holy Days: Before battle.

Sacrifice/Propitiation: On holy days or during battle, always on a known (past, present, or immediately pending) battlefield. Priests of Clanggedin chant, pray, and break weapons, which they have anointed with a single drop of their own blood. The god often manifests as a glowing radiance to consume the weapons, and this radiance may be extended to worshippers as a temporary protective aura in battle. Offered weapons not consumed by the god will either be twisted and shattered (whereupon they must be melted down, and used for other things), or left untouched (whereupon they may be used again, with the god's approval).

Ethos and Current Aims: To ensure dwarven victory in every open fray. In that light, priests of Clanggedin try to further the weapons-training, tactical training, and battle-skills of every living dwarf who will listen to them. Weapons-crafting and training is a requirement for all worshippers of the god, and priests of the god pass on their battle-knowledge at an almost frantic rate, to all dwarves who will listen. Such dwarves know that the highest service a priest of Clanggedin can do is to sacrifice himself for the cause, on the field of battle.

The god sometimes consumes such dwarves in a bright radiance; dwarves believe that the dying servant is restored by Clanggedin, and taken to serve the god as a guardian. Such guardians sometimes appear again briefly in the Realms as "Ghost Dwarves" to guide lost or defend weak dwarves in the wilds. Such ghosts are easily recognized by those who knew them in life.

Death on the field of battle is never welcomed; a priest of Clanggedin may be personally foolhardy, but his aim is always to protect as many other dwarves as possible, and to go down fighting only when necessary for victory. He will never throw his life away foolishly.

The Father of Battle is often worshipped by frantic prayers in the midst of the fray. At such times, the god answers best those who fight on, fearlessly. When time permits, however, either on the evening before an anticipated battle, or at the burial of a great dwarven warrior, the rituals of worship include a procession of faithful onto the battlefield or gravesite. This procession is led in a mournful dirge, a wordless rising and falling chant, conducted by the priests. The dirge rises slowly into an exultant roaring, and ends in a single, high, clear singing note—an odd, eerie contrast to the rough-voiced 'bloodsong' that has preceded it.

The slow-marching procession is always accompanied by slow, steady drumbeats (the drums carried by lesser priests), and consists of dwarves wearing their most battered armor (freshly used, if possible). These faithful are led and followed by chain mail-armored priests, who may echo the drumbeat by crashing weapons against shields. When the procession reaches its goal, the priests cast down their shields, hold their weapons high, and begin to whisper the god's name.

They then close their eyes and continue whispering, concentrating on whatever image each one has of Clanggedin, which is always the appearance of the avatar or manifestation, if the dwarf has witnessed the direct acts of the god. The priests begin to move towards wherever they feel the god's presence is strongest, and so blindly draw together, until they collide. At that spot, they make the weapon sacrifice, speak the names of the valiant fallen that they wish the god to remember and hold in esteem, and kneel to await a sign from the god. And an answer is often given, from a roll of thunder to a shield speaking a blessing, command, or answer. With this the priests conclude the ritual. If the ritual was a burial, it is concluded with the burial and a solemn march away. If, instead, it was a preparation for a battle, it is concluded with a war-chant and a 'wild run,' waving weapons and emitting whoops and war-cries.

Priests of Clanggedin seek to make the dwarves ever stronger on the battlefield, and are always alert for new tactics, traps, and weapons. For instance, they took great interest in such as those devised by the Lantanna and other worshippers of the human god Gond.

Sharindlar

Portfolio: Healing, mercy, love and fertility.

Major Spheres: All, Charm, Creation, Divination, Guardian, Healing, Protection, Sun.

Minor Spheres: Combat, Elemental (earth only), Necromantic, Plant.

Clerical Raiment: Any clothing (armor if necessary), accompanied by a blue scarf tied around brow, upper arm, wrist, or ankle. In ceremonial functions, red robes with a blue girdle and scarf are worn. The head is left bare except for scarf.

Holy Days: When the moon begins to wax (the night after the new moon), at Greengrass and at Midsummer Night, and whenever the moon is full Sacrifice/Propitiation: Gold mixed with the blood of dwarves (see below).

Ethos and Current Aims: The increase of dwarven numbers and health all over the Realms.

The worship of Sharindlar has been kept as secret as possible from non-dwarves in the Realms, especially with respect to her control over fertility. Dwarves in general refer to her as "the Lady of Mercy" whenever they know nondwarves to be listening. Dwarven priests of all faiths who are caring for the wounded or sick, or who are about to cast a healing spell, will often pray briefly for Sharindlar's favor.

The more secret rituals of Sharindlar take place in hidden caverns, wherever there is a pool of water.

Gold is heated until molten, and dwarves let blood from their own forearms into the mixture, which is then poured into the water, as Sharindlar's name is chanted and the dwarves dance about the pool in a frenzy. During their crazed dance, their armor and weapons are kept near at hand but not worn or carried.

In The Deep Realm, these rituals take place around the "Lake of Gold," a lake whose rocky bottom is streaked with gleaming veins of gold. The dwarves never take gold from the lake, whose bottom is now carpeted with the sparkling gold dust of long ages of worship, all from rituals performed in an effort to raise the low birthrate of the race. Couples, married or not, let blood together over braziers of melting gold, their arms entwined as they ask Sharindlar's blessing.

Rituals in honor of Sharindlar's fertility aspect celebrated here always end with splendid feasts, and courting chases through the underways of the Deeps.

Rituals invoking Sharindlar's healing strength enacted by two or more priestesses of the goddess involve their gathering over injured or sick beings. They sprinkle the ill with drops of their own (the priestesses') freshly-let blood (usually drops from their palms), and with a vial of water from The Lake of Gold, while whispering secret names and descriptions of the goddess.

This ritual has a 20 percent chance per priest taking part of aiding healing, increased by a further 10 percent if water from the Lake of Gold is used, and another 20 percent if the injured being is favored by Sharindlar. For the latter, the DM must decide secretly; Sharindlar has been known to favor nondwarves, pack animals, and even monsters. The healing aid consists of increasing the potency of healing spells and potions to the maximum possible effect, doubling the "at rest" healing rate to two hp/day, and halting the spread or effect of parasites (including rot grubs), diseases, and poisons completely for 1d4 + 1 days.

The DM should decide on beneficial effects of this ritual according to the circumstances. Sharindlar's name, whispered or repeated silently in the mind, has a calming effect on upset or pain-wracked dwarves of all faiths, allowing them to sleep.

Vergadain

Portfolio: Wealth, luck, and entrepreneurial skills such as suspicion, trickery, and deal-making.

Major Spheres: All, Charm, Creation, Divination, Guardian.

Minor Spheres: Combat, Healing, Protection, Sun.

Clerical Raiment: Any, always adorned with a string of linked coins. If armored, chain mail is preferred, always with a helm, and with a gorget bearing the god's symbol. Armor and clerical robes are always of obvious cost, with ornate trim, gold-leaf work and gem-studded fabrics. A gold color or plating for robes and armor is preferred, especially by priests of higher ranks.

Holy Days: The days before and after a full moon, Greengrass, and all days proclaimed holy by a High Old One of the faith are all considered "coin festivals."

Sacrifice/Propitiation: Monthly offerings of gold are made to Vergadain, at the altars of the god. These altars are huge stone cauldrons, over which hang the symbol of the god: huge gold coins fully five feet across. These coins are actually guardian "anators," which emit lightning bolts and magic missiles at unauthorized beings taking things from the altar. One of the correct alignment can avoid this magical wrath by whispering the anator's password.

The priests of Vergadain spend or trade this gold shrewdly, to better the lot of dwarven merchants. They use it to bail them out of debt where possible, place bribes to help dwarven trade and commerce with other lands and races of Faerun, and so on.

Ethos and Current Aims: Vergadain's priests are dedicated to further the success of dwarven merchant commerce with other races, especially humans. They are intent on increasing general dwarven influence and prosperity, and on enabling the dwarves to further their craft-work, weapons-mastery, and inventions. Through these means the priests of Vergadain hope to increase dwarven importance in the Realms.

Priests of Vergadain work tirelessly to support and promote dwarven merchants and craftsmen throughout Faerun. Whenever they render aid or handle material wealth of any sort, they mutter Vergadain's name in homage. Most of Vergadain's faithful also do so, and this makes up the bulk of Vergadain's daily worship. It is said that Vergadain can see into the minds of all creatures within ten feet of wherever his name is uttered, and sometimes warns a dwarf of treachery in dealings by presenting visions or a preventative manifestation.

The proper rituals of worship to the god consist of meeting in windowless rooms or underground, around torches, braziers, or other flames. The rituals call for dancing in slow, stately shiftings around the flame, wearing and displaying gold and other objects of worth. Every dwarf who worships the god must throw at least one gold piece into the flame as the dance continues. The flame always consumes valuables placed in it utterly, sometimes dying away to reveal a map, clue, scroll, potion, or other sending from the god. These sendings are rare, and although always helpful, they are rarely powerful, and even more rarely weapons. Perhaps the most common sending of Vergadain is a duplicate key to a strong-chest, vault, or barrier which prevents dwarves from reaching wealth rightfully belonging to them, or stolen by cheating them over a period of time.

The dance ends when the flame flares up, signifying the god's attention and thanks. The priests then light candles or conjure up light, and discuss business, usually current ways of furthering dwarven wealth. Transfers of necessary fees, bribes, aid, or other funds from one dwarf to another occurs next, usually from priests to the faithful they have called to worship. Then the ranking priest present passes his hand through the flame, which will slowly diminish. As it does so, all dwarves present kiss a gold coin in farewell, and then depart.

DumaThoin

Portfolio: Keeper of metals and other buried wealth ("secrets"), the earth's riches, and protector of mountain dwarves.

Major Spheres: All, Combat, Creation, Elemental (earth only), Protection.

Minor Spheres: Animal, Divination, Guardian, Healing, Necromantic, Plant, Sun.

Clerical Raiment: Leather garments, either armor or mining gear, with bare heads and brown cloaks and over-robes.

Holy Days: Nights of new moons and the days either side of each such night are considered holy days. Also, holy days can be decreed by a High Old One of the faith, usually when dwarves discover a major new lode, lost subterranean treasure-cache or delve, or something of the sort.

Sacrifice/Propitiation: Gems and jewelry are sacrificed each month, on holy days, to Dumathoin. These are offered up on altars dedicated to the god. Such altars are always stone blocks or natural boulders, in the deepest and best-hidden natural caverns underground. Note that dwarves may dig to open up or improve a natural cavern, without disqualifying it for use as a temple.

Ethos and Current Aims: The priests of Dumathoin seek always to uncover the buried wealth of the earth, without marring the beauty of the ways beneath the surface. They work to clean up the rubble of mining, grow and put in place luminous fungi and edible deep-mosses, and direct water through the earth to best serve the underlife which includes, of course, the dwarves.

Priests of this faith are always hunting for new veins and lodes of ore, new sources and species of useful fungi, and new delves or underways never explored before. They try to identify encountered dangers, and determine strategies to best deal with these menaces of the deep places.

Gems sacrificed to the god are pulverized and mixed with certain herbs and fungal secretions to derive a paste. The paste serves to make rock porous, make plant material adhere to it, and provide nourishment for plant materials in contact with it. With buckets of this acrid, purple-and-green fibrous paste, priests of Dumathoin creep about the underways, 'painting and planting' fungi and other plant life to best improve the underground environment. They can use it to conceal stone dwarven doors, redirect watercourses to turn water-wheels and fill reservoirs, and so on.

A priest of Dumathoin is always learning the tiniest details of conditions and life underground. Most priests are therefore invaluable in leading companions through the underways in darkness. Among their specialties are finding water, veins of ore, and cracks or fissures that provide a way out or can be mined to yield a way from one cavern to another.

Abbathor

Portfolio: Greed, evil among dwarves, thieving.

Major Spheres: All, Charm, Combat, Divination, Guardian.

Minor Spheres: Healing, Necromantic, Protection, Summoning, Sun

Clerical Raiment: Priests of Abbathor always dress in red—a brilliant scarlet, worn as underclothing for everyday use, and as over-ropes for ceremonial occasions. Over this they wear leather armor, with leather caps (never helms). If this armor must be discarded, dark crimson robes are worn to echo-and yet conceal-the scarlet underclothing.

Clergy of Abbathor never wear wealth openly, following the god's saying: "The best is always hidden."

Holy Days: Solar eclipses and days when volcanic eruptions or other causes bring darkness during daytime are always considered holy days.

Sacrifice/Propitiation: Once a year, priests of Abbathor sacrifice a creature on an altar. It must be an evil enemy of dwarves, but can be anything from an elf to a boar. Orcs, trolls, and giants are the most favored sacrifices. The faithful of Abbathor then bring gems in offering to the god, and these are placed upon the body; they must touch the blood of the sacrifice. The value of the sacrifice is said to determine the amount of Abbathor's favor that will benefit the offerer in the year to come. Even the priests refer to this practice as "buying grace." The sacrifice is then burnt to ashes, gems, and all. If magic or especially valuable gems are sacrificed, these sometimes disappear before the body is consumed, taken by Abbathor to be his own (pocketed by the priests for their own use, some say).

Abbathor's favor is said to include minor things like causing guards to sleep or become distracted, shaping shadows and moon-cloaking clouds to hide the features or exact position of a fleeing dwarven thief, and allowing a trapped thief an occasional battle-aid (in the form of an initiative roll bonus).

Dwarves in need of Abbathor's immediate favor may make offerings at other times throughout the year. It is also customary to make an offering when one first worships at a particular temple. Temples of The Great Master of Greed are always in underground caverns or secret, windowless rooms. Sacrificial altars are massive, plain blocks of stone, blackened by the many fires laid and burnt upon them. Note that nondwarves tend to panic when priests of Abbathor light fires indoors and the smoke begins to billow!

Ethos and Current Aims: Like their deity, priests of Abbathor strive to enrich themselves, taking personal advantage of their positions and influence to steal or deal themselves some personal wealth. Such funds are typically cached in remote, fiendishly-well-trapped hideavvays. Amassing enough loot to retire in luxury is a game and a driving motivation among priests of this god.

There is one strict rule, however: no priest of Abbathor will steal from any other dwarf, nor help or influence events to cause harm to come to the person or wealth of any rival priest of Abbathor. This is the infamous Abbathor's Commandment that dwarven thieves are often reminded of. Priests of Abbathor don't like to remember so readily that it was uttered purely in order to preserve some followers of the god, after angry fellow dwarves had slaughtered thief after thief in the robes of Abbathor's clergy.

The wider aims of the priesthood are to enrich all dwarves, working with the priesthods of Vergadain and Dumathoin where possible.

Across the Realms, priests of Abbathor are always looking for a chance for common dwarven profit, and their own personal gain, through underhanded and shady arrangements. The underground ways known to dwarves make them ideal smugglers, and there is many a border literally undercut by a dwarven tunnel that avoids duties and restrictions from one land to another. Dwarves are prevented from dominating the smuggling trade purely by their aversion to water and the resulting lack of dwarven shipborne activity.

Priests of Abbathor will trade (on the sly) with anyone, including duergar, drow, illithids, Zhentarim, orcs, giants, and other undesirable creatures or traditional enemies of the dwarves. Dwarves have been slain by axes sold to orcs by priests of Abbathor on more than one occasion. This contrariness, however, is an essential part of the nature of dwarves, as is the 'goldlust' that drives many dwarves on occasion; times when they are said to be "under the spell of Abbathor" or "in Abbathor's thrall" Priests of Abbathor can be considered to be permanently in this condition, but to have learnt subtlety and devious cunning in its pursuit, rather than simple, crude acquisitiveness.

Beings who need something underhanded done can always contact priests of Abbathor, if they know where to find them. Usually only dwarves know how to do so. A known worshipper of Abbathor will often arrange a meeting between an outsider (such as a human) and a priest of Abbathor, for a fee. The priest and the worshipper will both work to arrange the meeting so that the priest is in little danger of attack, kidnapping, or arrest.

Berronar Truesilver

Portfolio: Safety, truth, and dwarven home life.

Major Spheres: All, Charm, Creation, Divination, Guardian, Healing, Plant, Protection, Sun.

Minor Spheres: Animal, Astral, Combat, Elemental (earth), Necromantic.

Clerical Raiment: Silver chain mail with a silvered (everbright) helm is common. Ceremonial garb includes white underrobes with cloth-of-silver overtunics, with the priest remaining bareheaded.

Holy Days: Midwinter day and Midsummer night are Berronar's holy days.

Sacrifice/Propitiation: Annual offerings of silver are made to Berronar in the form of coins, jewelry, drinking vessels, or trade-bars. White flowers sometimes adorn the offerings, in token of dwarven love and affection for the Mother Goddess.

Incidentally, "merchant trade-bars" were originally devised by the dwarves of Faerun.

Ethos and Current Aims: The clergy of Berronar exists to further the good health and good character of all dwarves. They heal the sick and injured, attempt to treat, eradicate, and stop the spread of disease, develop antidotes to dwarfsbane and other poisons that can affect dwarves, and encourage truthfulness, obedience to law, peaceful order and harmony, and governance of greed and goldlust.

No dwarf in need of aid can be ignored by a priestess of Berronar. All must be helped to the best of a priest's abilities; if an individual priestess lacks any more healing spells, he or she must find someone who can heal, or provide all the non-magical care possible. The duty of a priestess of Berronar is to keep dwarves alive, whatever the cost.

Priestesses of Berronar worship the Mother Goddess by kneeling, closing their eyes, picturing the goddess, and whispering prayers that begin and end with her name. They typically do this whenever asking for her guidance or when about to heal in her name. Her guidance is often given by an inner feeling or decision.

More elaborate rituals to Berronar take place aboveground on Midsummer night only, and underground the rest of the time. A temple to Berronar aboveground consists of a circle of stones, usually in a wooded area, in which small fires are kindled in a random pattern, and gems and metal sculptures are set up among them on metal poles, to sparkle and reflect back the firelight during worship. Actual 'sparkler' fireworks are used on the two big holy days, to mark the ending of each prayer, chanted in unison.

An underground temple to Berronar is a cavern in which the priestesses have carefully arranged mosses, lichens, fungi, and the like brought by the hands of faithful. They keep these watered and nourished to form a lush carpet all over the floor and climbing the walls as high as possible. Luminescent fungi are favored, to give the cavern as much natural light as possible. Magical items with the power to create dancing lights are valued by priestesses of this faith, and nondwarven wielders of such items are sometimes even hired to illuminate such a temple by this means.

Such 'lighters' must come to the temple naked and blindfolded, but are treated with the utmost care and courtesy, and are taken safely back to the surface and guarded, in such a way that their dignity is maintained, but the location of and way to the temple remains hidden from them.

Rituals honoring Berronar typically begin with a chanted prayer, and continue with an address from the High Old Ones, which ends in a responsive prayer led by a High Old One or chosen priestess. This is followed by a report of the good works and successes of the priesthood, and an identification of failures and problems still to be dealt with. Another responsive prayer follows, and is followed by a rising, spirit-lifting unison prayer.

If a very sick dwarf or dwarves are present, unison healing then takes place. The entire assembled clergy lays hands on the afflicted ones and call on Berronar. Healing does not always occur, although the deadening of pain (for 1d4 + 1 days) always will—the assembled priestesses take the pain upon themselves. If healing does take place, it is a manifestation of the goddess, and not a cast spell. Berronar's Touch, as this is known, has in the past cured blindness, insanity, lycanthropy, poisonings, life energy loss, bodily transformations due to parasitic or symbiotic plant life, tissue corrosion, and the like, in addition to more simple wounds.

Marthammor Duin

Portfolio: Guide and protector to adventurers, explorers, and Wanderer dwarves.

Major Spheres: All, Combat, Creation, Divination, Guardian, Healing, Protection, Sun.

Minor Spheres: Animal, Charm, Elemental (earth only), Necromantic, Plant, Summoning, Weather (lightning control only).

Clerical Raiment: Grey or mottled green, brown, and grey cloaks, over any sort of armor. For ceremonial purposes, the priests go bareheaded, in grey robes, with a maroon overtunic emblazoned with a watchful eye front and back, the symbol of Marthammor.

Holy Days: All festival days in the Calendar of Harptos, and nine days after each festival day. On years when the Shieldmeet occurs, the holy day follows it nine days after; there aren't two adjacent days, one following Midsummer and one the Shieldmeet.

Sacrifice/Propitiation: Used ironwork and footwear (which must be of dwarven make), burned on altars. This must be done once a year per worshipper.

Ethos and Current Aims: The safe guidance and guardianship of Wanderer dwarves, and all dwarves who must wander the wilds, particularly aboveground.

Priests of Marthammor make marked trails in the wilderness northlands of the Realms, from Uttersea to the Great Ice Sea. They also establish way-caches of food and supplies (spare boots, clothing, weapons, drinking-water, bandages and splints, firemaking supplies, and the like) along these trails.

Priests of Marthammor patrol these ways, healing and guiding dwarves they meet, providing a warm fire, a warm meal, and companionship to exhausted, lonely, lost, or hurt dwarves-of any faith or race. "Help however you can, give all that is needful!" runs the temple creed.

Priests of Marthammor will work with healers and priests of all races to help dwarves, allies, and companions of dwarves. While they do not accompany adventurers, they are in a sense adventurers themselves, often fighting monsters, discovering ruins, and facing the same perils that adventurers do. Travelers in the north-especially the Sword Coast North-often encounter small bands of 3d4 dwarven priests of Marthammor. Such bands will not reveal their clerical status unless they are dealing with dwarves or those known to be dwarven allies or companions.

Marthammor is worshipped on the bare heights of stony tors on moonless nights, or, on holy days and for important rituals, in underground caverns. The caverns must always be natural, unaltered by the hands of intelligent beings.

Underground or on top, an altar to Marthammor is always a simple stone cairn or wooden tripod, supporting a stone hammer, upright and head uppermost. Priests of Marthammor stand looking at the hammer, praying to their god for guidance as to where they are needed and what they have done wrong, or poorly. The god places visions in their minds, choosing which priests will guard temples, which will explore particular areas, and so on.

The ghosts of diligent servants of Marthammor are said to haunt certain trails, old abandoned delves, and mountain passes. When dwarves or dwarven allies or companions are lost in such places, particularly in blizzards or storms, the phantom priests appear, gesturing silently, and guide the travelers along a safe route to refuge or their destination.

Gorm Gulthyn

Portfolio: Guardian and protector of all dwarves.

Major Spheres: All, Combat, Divination, Guardian, Healing, Protection, Sun.

Minor Spheres: Animal, Charm, Creation, Elemental (earth only), Necromantic, Summoning.

Clerical Raiment: Red and black cloaks and helms, worn over armor of the finest metal and type available. Priests of Gorm never remove all their armor or lay aside all their weapons unless sorely wounded and in need of care.

Holy Days: Every festival in the Calendar of Harptos (as in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set).

Sacrifice/Propitiation: Blood, sweat, tears, and weapons.

Ethos and Current Aims: Priests of Gorm serve as protectors and bodyguards for all dwarves, especially the young, and child-rearing parents of both sexes. They instruct dwarven warriors fulfilling such roles in the arts of alertness, blindfighting, and weapons-skills (i.e., in campaigns using proficiencies, the priests of Gorm can tutor dwarves in all proficiencies useful to guardians).

The foremost aim of any lesser priest of Gorm is to protect the dwarves assigned to him. Veteran priests of higher rank may choose who they protect. If this involves sacrificing one's own life, so be it; that is "Gorm's Greatest Price:" as every priest of Gorm knows.

Priests of Gorm who are serving as guardians are never "surprised," and are able to interpret noises, half-seen movements, and other symptoms of approach and movement correctly with an accuracy of 10% per level. For instance, a priest of Gorm might hear a faint scuffling, and identify it as studded leather worn by a crawling man, against a particular stone the priest noticed earlier.

A priest of Gorm will always check around his feet and overhead often, and always takes care to know the distance and exact direction of features in his surroundings. The guardian-priest described above, for instance, would know exactly where, and how far away, the unseen intruder in studded leather was-and just where to throw an axe in order to hit him.

These carefully-developed skills give guardian-priests of Gorm an attack bonus of +5 with missiles of any sort, against any target within 60 feet of their guardpost. If they've not had time to examine the surroundings, this bonus drops to +2. In addition, guardian-priests of Gorm always win initiative rolls, even when they are charged by multiple opponents coming out of the darkness.

Guardian-priests guard most clan-hold entries, the Gates on the borders of The Deep Realm, and temples of Gorm.

Temples of Gorm are always plain, unadorned stone caverns or rooms quarried from solid rock. The altar is a stone bench in front of a closed, locked door of massive construction, representing a location that a dwarf might have to guard. Instead of a stone bench, a temple might use an old tomb casket; if occupied, it must be by a fallen, not undead, priest of Gorm.

Offerings to Gorm are of weapons used, even broken, in the service of guardianship, anointed with tears, sweat, and drops of blood of the dwarf making the offering. Rituals involve silent vigils, muttered prayers, and answering visions from the god.

On holy days, guardians of Gorm gather for a salute, a ritual involving the rhythmic grounding of weapons and a responsively-chanted prayer. At the height of a salute, the door behind the altar sometimes opens by the power of the god, and through it may come instructive phantom images, scrolls or potions, weapons, pieces of armor, or even maps-small aids from the god, to help his faithful fulfill their duties. When this happens, increase the morale of a worshipper of Gorm who is wearing, carrying, or using any gift from the god by a bonus of +4.

Haela Brightaxe

Portfolio: Luck in battle, patron of dwarves who love to fight, and who fight monsters.

Major Spheres: All, Combat, Guardian, Healing, Protection.

Minor Spheres: Creation, Necromantic, Sun.

Clerical Raiment: Armor of any sort can be worn, but chain mail preferred. A helm is always worn. For ceremonial purposes, armor or plain robes of steel-grey are worn, with an overcloak of scarlet, with crimson footwear.

Holy Days: Greengrass, the Feast of the Moon, and Midsummer.

Sacrifice/Propitiation: The blood of the worshipper and that of enemies of the dwarves is commonly offered to Haela.

Ethos and Current Aims: Priestesses of Haela wander throughout the Realms, aiding dwarves in battle. They wander because no priestess knows where or when she will be needed—they rely upon Haela's guiding hand to position them as necessary.

Priestesses of Haela aid beleaguered dwarves (and known allies and companions of dwarves) against creatures of all sorts, by healing, casting spells, and fighting alongside them. Their objectives are to achieve victory for the dwarvish side and to allow the maximum possible number of dwarves to survive. The priestesses wish also to make all dwarves comfortable with their own skills in combat—to Haela's worshippers, battle-skills are needed to guide the hands of all dwarves if the Deep Folk are to survive.

Priests of Haela are always heavily armed, and are often skilled at weapon and armor repair. They freely give away the weapons they carry to dwarves in need, always keeping at least one weapon for themselves, although it may be well hidden. They practice throwing weapons in a variety of ways, such as onto ledges, to cut ropes, and to land upright, points buried in turf, beside those needing them. Priestesses of Haela who attempt to deliver a weapon in such a manner gain a +3 bonus to their Dexterity checks.

The senior priestesses of Haela teach their juniors much concerning tactics, secrets and hints for fighting specific monsters, and knowledge of their habits, lairs, and weaknesses. A DM can impart detailed Monstrous Compendium information to PCs who ask a priestess of Haela the right questions.

All individuals or groups aided by a priestess of Haela are expected to pay for the aid with a spare weapon that the priestess can give to some other needy band. Failing that, a shield, pair of gauntlets, or other armor or useful gear can be substituted. It is considered bad form to give the priestess back a weapon she just gave you.

One interesting example of this is among the halflings of Secomber. When Ardeep was crumbling as the Fallen Kingdom fell apart around them, the halflings continually repaid priestesses of Haela with bags of caltrops—typically three at a time. It is now both a joke and an affectionate tradition for both sides, and priestesses of Haela are forever toting large sacks of caltrops around, hoping to get a chance to use them. (Treat a caltrop that is hurled in battle as a hand axe for range and damage.)

Temples of Haela are caves or underground rooms, sometimes in old, abandoned holds or in the cellars of human ruins. They are also typically storehouses of food, small smithies, and armories crammed with odd weapons and armor. Her temples are never guarded by fewer than a dozen priestesses (more often, 1d4 +16 are in residence). There is always an explosive trap set somewhere in such a temple: if the dwarves are slain or forced out, no enemy of the dwarves will get the store of weapons without taking heavy losses.

One famous temple of Haela, overrun by orcs near Amphail, proved to have a trap of six separate blade barriers. These came into being one after another, using the cached weapons of the temple as the whirling weapons.

Thard Harr

Portfolio: Protector of Wild Dwarves.

Major Spheres: All, Combat, Guardian, Healing, Plant, Protection.

Minor Spheres: Animal, Creation, Necromantic, Sun.

Clerical Raiment: The skull of a large jungle beast, such as a rhinoceros, great cat, or giant crocodile, is worn as a helm. For ceremonial purposes, the pelts or skins of jungle monsters are worn as robes.

Holy Days: New moon and full moon nights.

Sacrifice/Propitiation: Blood sacrifices of beasts and/or intruders are commonly made to Thard Harr. At least one creature is offered each full moon.

Ethos and Current Aims: Priests of Thard Harr represent the god, protecting their dwarves with powers given them by the god, leading them on prosperous hunts and careful explorations. Persistent intruders (unless dwarven) must be eliminated, and the priests must lead the attack, as fearlessly and diligently as Thard Harr himself.

If the foe is too strong, the priest will try to mentally call Thard Harr himself to the scene. Jungle Dwarves speak of opponents or natural forces so powerful and dangerous that they might well "blunt the claws of Harr himself," but never allude to the breaking of any claw, or the defeat of their god in any fight.

Thard Harr's wisdom teaches that one can best defeat an enemy that one knows well. Seasoned Wild Dwarves always try to capture at least one intruder alive for questioning, before sacrificial use. If sparing the intruder seems to bring possible future benefits to the dwarves, they will do so. The Wild Dwarves are interested in trade, metal and glass objects and tools, in return for pelts, meat, or even live beasts. They conduct trade so long as they can conduct it on territory of their choosing, to set up traps and ambushes to guard against treachery under the direction of the priests of Thard Harr.

Priests of Thard Harr are the leaders and generals of, and speakers for, their people. Priests of Thard Harr always bear the god's crossed-gauntlets sign as a tattoo, usually on one shoulder or on the scalp, overgrown by their hair. Priests of Thard Harr must never cut their beards, but instead braid them into ropes that they tie around their waists or shoulders. If an enemy or beast cuts a priest's beard, there is no penalty; if it is done by the priest himself, it is a sign that he is turning away from Thard Harr's service, and can no longer expect aid from the god.

High Old Ones

Dwarven priests of 7th or greater level are known as "High Old Ones" They gain special powers from the dwarven gods. Of course, such powers can be suspended, denied, or removed if a High Old One displeases his or her god. The High Old Ones are the most respected elders of the Folk, especially in the north, where clan power and the pride and prosperity of young dwarves is weakest.

High Old Ones can identify themselves as members or friends of particular clans by the use of secret hand-signs. In rare cases, some trusted nondwarves (such as Elminster of Shadowdale and Mirt of Waterdeep) have been taught these signs for use when among dwarves.

High Old Ones gain the power to affect undead as other clerics do, turning as a 3rd level cleric when they are 7th level, a 4th level cleric when they are 8th, and so on.

High Old Ones gain special spells from their gods (detailed fully in their own section of this sourcebook). These spells are as follows, by priesthood:

Moradin: stonefire
 Clangedin: rockburst
 Sharindlar: floustone
 Vergadain: stone trap
 Dumathoin: stonefall
 Abbathor: maskstone
 Berronar: guardian hammer
 Marthammor: glowglory
 Gorm: fire eyes
 Haela: hurl rock
 Thard Harr: lesser guardian hammer

High Old Ones also gain a detection power, different for each priesthood. This magical ability always operates properly, and requires no spellcasting. It does, however, require concentration (prohibiting spellcasting or even reading in the same round) and is not continuous and automatic in its effects.

Moradin: true seeing, as the priest spell, reverse not granted.

Clangedin: detect magic, range as priest spell, holy symbol not required.

Sharindlar: detect dwarves, range and blockages as a priest's detect magic spell—detects living dwarves, dead dwarves, duergar, spilled dwarven blood, invisible dwarves, shape changed dwarves, dwarves concealed by illusions, and so on.

Dumathoin: identify, as the wizard spell, but needs no material component; the ability works as if the High Old One was a wizard of the same level.

Vergadain: enemy location, as the wand; the High Old One feels a compulsion to face each enemy in range; he need not do so, but unerringly knows who and where such enemies are.

Abbathor: detect illusion, up to normal sight limits, the High Old One knows all illusions for what they are, seeing them as rainbow-hued, translucent images superimposed over the real creature or object. The High Old One can concentrate on either the illusion or reality to see it as normal, and examine it in detail; whenever this is not done, the double images will be seen.

Berronar: detect wound, the High Old One must touch the creature. Even if it is an unfamiliar monster, this ability tells the dwarf if the creature is suffering from any internal or external physical damage—and its approximate severity. The ability identifies the presence of poison, magical charms, curses, diseases, mental damage, and other abnormal conditions, but does not heal in any way.

Marthammor: find the path, as the priest spell.

Gorm: know alignment, like the priest spell, but unerring, overriding even the strongest magical concealments and misdirections. The High Old One can scan only one person per round, and cannot cast spells during that time, but need not remain stationary, and can even participate in strenuous, acrobatic combat.

Haela: detect weapons, range and blockages as a detect magic priest spell; detects concealed, invisible, and improvised weapons that have been used to harm or are carried with intent to harm. Broken weapons are detected only if still usable. In some old ruins, this ability is rendered useless by the sheer number of abandoned weapons.

Thard Harr: detect snares & pits, as the first level priest spell, but needs no holy symbol. Using this detection ability precludes spellcasting while it is maintained.

Most High Old Ones pray directly to their god or goddess, and enjoy a good chance of being heard. While a deity may not show up instantly when aid is requested, such prayers do serve as a valuable source of information to the gods, and are encouraged. A priest who warns a deity of six hostile adventurers, by name, class, and description, may ensure that the deity warns dwarves in the adventurers' route—and will certainly affect the deity's reaction if its avatar ever meets the adventurers.

Dwarven Cults

Some dwarves who blame the gods for the present decline of the race, or who feel that the old gods are simply too weak or too out-of-touch with the wider world in which the dwarves must live to aid their Folk successfully in the ages to come. Many dwarves have dabbled in new beliefs, including ones which advocate mastery of wizardry as the key to the race's survival, one which promotes interbreeding with men and gnomes coupled with secretive diplomacy, so as to dominate and eventually absorb these more fecund races, and so on. Most of these new beliefs have tended to come and go as passing fads, embraced for a time by each successive generation of young dwarves.

Details of such cults, down the long history of the dwarves, could fill a work many times the size of this one. DMs are urged to devise their own cults, particularly for use as the sources of relics found in old, abandoned dwarf-holds, and as active religions in isolated dwarven communities.

Only two long-established or recurring cults are briefly described here. These have been successful enough that some divine power has come to support their pleas and deeds, giving their clerics spells, for instance.

The Wyrms Cult: This cult can be found in isolated dwarven communities anywhere, but seems more common in the north than in areas south of the Inner Sea lands. Its clerics are few and secretive, employing dwarven sympathizers as spies, and rewarding them for their aid by allowing them recreation or revenge opportunities in beast-form.

The Wyrms Cult worships various beasts, especially dragons and other powerful creatures that dwarves treat with respect. The cult seeks to further the power and wealth of its adherents by using the powers of beasts to slay and confound enemies.

The priests of this cult gain the power to shape change into beast form, as the 9th level wizard spell, but requiring no material component. This ability can be used up to three times a day, for a period of one turn. Favorite shapes assumed include snakes, wyverns, dragons, boars, bears, and various large cats (tigers, panthers, mountain lions, and so on). The DM should consult various volumes of the Monstrous Compendium for creature abilities.

Wyrms Cult priests can only take the shape of creatures and other living things that they've seen personally. Currently in need of both wealth and power, they have taken to attacking all nondwarven adventurers who wander within their reach, throughout the wilderlands of the north. They seek power through increased influence and worshippers and through the acquisition of magical items and controlled territories. Consider most Wyrms Cult priests to be chaotic neutral to evil in alignment, consumed by a burning anger against all types of creatures who have oppressed or slain dwarves in the past.

The Living Axe: Because magic seems to go awry in their hands, and they can never control real power like human wizards, dwarves have always been fascinated by magic. They are most intrigued by the capturing of magical powers within an item that a dwarf has created and can wield.

Down the ages there have been over a thousand thousand dwarven smiths of skill in working with magic. They have always been among the wealthiest, more powerful, and most respected dwarves. Some dwarves have gone further than that, looking beyond dwarven skill to the inspiration that guided them, and seeing in it a divine presence—a presence that, they believe, lives in the magical items themselves.

Dwarves of the Living Axe worship and obey sentient magical weapons (many of which are controlled by malevolent or insane spirits imprisoned within them), and have gone to war to extend the rule of these sacred items over other dwarves and even over small communities of humans, halflings, and gnomes. Living Axe priests are always armed with multiple throwing axes and a variety of other weapons, they wear high, spired, and spiked helms of fantastic design.

Devout "Axe Dwarves" also seek to create more magical weapons, and have fashioned many specimens of two particular types, in imitation of ancient, still operable items found in the ruins of fallen Myth Drannor: guardian blades and watch axes. One or both of these will be found accompanying any group of Axe Dwarves. They are typically used in pairs or threes to guard doors, gates, crawl tunnels, and the like around major Axe Dwarf settlements or temples.

Guardian Blades: These are two-handed bastard swords of the finest make and metals. They do 2d4 points of damage when striking, attack twice per round (first strike and last), and fly about (MV 15, Class A). They cannot be held or grounded by anti-magic spells or effects. Guardian blades attack all nondwarves, unless otherwise instructed by a helmed Axe Dwarf priest. They operate with true sight.

If grasped, guardian blades will struggle to break free, dragging the holder along with them. In such instances, roll a d20 each round, and if the roll is higher than the wielder's Strength, the blade breaks free. A blade that is held for five continuous rounds will burst into shards at the end of the fifth round, self-destructing in a lightning discharge that does 7d6 damage to all creatures within 10 feet (no saving throw allowed beings holding it).

Watch Axes: These weapons are also permanently-animated and behave just as a guardian blade does. They move more slowly (14), but do more damage (1d10). If forced to self-destruct, they explode, the blast and shards doing 4d10 damage to all within 10 feet, 3d8 damage to those from 10 to 20 feet away, and 2d4 damage to those from 20 to 30 feet away. Saving throws for half damage are allowed for all beings except those in direct contact with the axe when it explodes.

There are some guardian blades and watch axes in the Realms still, lurking in forgotten tombs and mines, that have no connection to the Axe Dwarves, and are controlled by no one. Elminster once tried to establish magical control over one blade "as an exercise," and still winces and rubs his ribs at the memory of his failure.

These sorts of weapons self-destruct when held or pinned. If struck in combat and broken, they self-destruct only 20 percent of the time. The rest of the time, they merely disintegrate harmlessly.

The most fearsome watch axe is the Living Axe itself. It is said to be an animated, double-bladed battle axe of great size, fashioned of bronzed adamantine. It is probably neutral evil in alignment, and delights in killing, periodically flying amok among orcs or whatever creatures it chances upon. It does 2d6 damage per strike, attacks twice a round, flying at MV 18 (A), and is known to be immune to all enchantment/charm spells. Its origin and precise powers are unknown, but it is said to be very old, and has been known to hunt beings across the Realms. It might capriciously spare some who openly defy it, or butcher others whom it surprises before they even realize what is happening.

DWARVEN MAGIC: SPELLS

This section details the more common priest spells unique to the dwarves. Elminster warns there are others, although he knows of no dwarven wizards, and believes the inherent magic resistance of 'trueblood' dwarves makes their mastery of wizardry impossible. Strangely, this applies to learned, memorized spells, not to spell-like natural powers. Such powers are possessed by all duergar and High Old Ones (high-level dwarven priests), and, apparently at random, by a few dwarves of other classes and sub-races.

Dwarven priests cast spells as clerics of other races do, with one important difference: spell energies are always channelled through a stone holy symbol worn next to the skin or grasped by the cleric. Without this stabilizing spell focus, dwarven clerical spells are 40 percent likely to go 'wild' when cast. This instability is also the reason most dwarven clerical spells involve material components, fragments of the prime material plane not subject to any innate magical resistance.

Wild Spells

To determine the effect of wild spell energies, the DM should consult the wand of wonder effects, using the table of suggested results given in the DMG and devising new ones. It is not unheard of for a wild spell to duplicate the effects of chain lightning, reverse gravity, Mordenkainen's disjunction and dancing lights all at once. They have also been known to cause other upheavals of nature that are just as dramatic and deadly.

Wild spells may be even more deadly attacks than the standard spells they started out as. They are not deliberately caused by priests simply because they can be as deadly to friend as to foe, having unpredictable side-effects. Moreover, most dwarven deities think such behavior reckless and disrespectful of their grace (in granting the spells in the first place) and of the safety of the dwarven people.

A dwarven cleric will cast spells without a stone holy symbol only unwittingly, or when desperate.

An attack that damages or removes a holy symbol during casting does not ruin the spellcasting, but always causes the spell to go wild. Most dwarven clerics carry spare holy symbols with them at all times, to prevent their magic from becoming ungovernable due to loss (or theft) of a holy symbol.

Known Spells of The Folk

Spells used by dwarven priests identified to date are detailed here in the new ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS®, 2nd Edition game format. Material components are consumed in spellcasting unless otherwise noted. Holy symbols are never consumed by spells.

Second-Level Spells

Hurl Rock

(Alteration)

Reversible

Sphere: Combat

Range: 10 yards/level

Components: V, S, M

Duration: 1 round

Casting Time: 2

Area of Effect: One rock (see below)

Saving Throw: None

This spell allows a dwarf to suddenly and violently use telekinesis on a loose rock, using it as a missile. Only stone can be used, either natural stone or petrified objects. The stone must be loose; it cannot be a block that is part of a wall, or a piece of a rock face or ceiling. The rocky projectile leaps from its resting position to attack with the caster's THAC0. The "range" of this spell refers to the distance between the priest and the potential stone missile. The projectile can leap up to 45 feet vertically and up to 45 feet horizontally. Determine where misses land using the "Grenade-Like Missile Effects" table in the DMG.

The caster can move up to 2 cubic feet/level. Rocks that are too large will be felt as such; the priest can choose another rock in the same round, but if it is also too large, the spell is wasted.

At times it will be important to know what damage the missile itself sustains after being hurled; for instance, if it is a fragile, valuable object, or, say, a petrified companion. The missile itself suffers 2d4 points of damage from its use in this spell and double that damage if it falls more than 50 feet in the process. This shatters the missile if it is brought to zero hit points. Assume rocky missiles to have an average hp total of 6 per 2 cubic feet, so that a rock of the maximum size that a 3rd level priest can move (6 cubic feet) will have 18 hp.

Rocky missiles that shatter spray shrapnel; all creatures within 10 feet of the landing site of a missile must save vs. spell or suffer 1d4 + 1 points of damage.

Any item struck by the missile or its shrapnel (see above) must save against "crushing blow." A being struck by the missile is hurt as follows:

Rock volume (in cubic feet)	Damage
1-2	2d4
3-4	2d8
5-6	2d10
7-8	3d8
9-10	3d10
more than 10	4d12

The reverse of this spell, rock shield, allows the caster to deflect rocky missiles of all types and from all sources. The shield remains in effect for one round/level, infallible against all missiles whose edges contain or are made of stone. Once cast, it does not require continued concentration or further action. The deflections are in directions uncontrollable by the user of the shield. Use the "Grenade-Like Missile Effects" table, noting that deflections may hit companions of the shield-user or his companions.

The material components of this spell are a suitable rock to serve as the projectile, and a tiny pebble, held in the priest's hand and not consumed during casting. The reverse of the spell requires two small pebbles and a translucent piece of glass, mica, ice, crystal, or a gem.

Maskstone (Illusion/Phantasm) Reversible

Sphere: Guardian

Range: Touch

Components: V, S, M

Duration: 1 year/level

Casting Time: 2
 Area of Effect: 1 square foot of surface area/level
 Saving Throw: None

This spell alters the appearance of stone to hide seams, openings, traps, runes, doors, and so on. The priest touches the central point of the area to be masked, and visualizes what appearance is desired (i.e. hue, fissures, shape and general appearance). The spell cloaks the stone with the visualized, long-term illusion.

Features of the stone under the maskstone spell remain physically unchanged and traceable. A known door can be felt for and located in 1d3 rounds. Unless it has been used by the searcher before, determining how it opens, in what direction, and the location of locks or catches will be impossible without a dispel magic to end the cloaking effect.

A dwarf, duergar, gnome, xorn, or other subterranean dweller encountering the spell effect can tell the stone's surface has been magically masked, but not what the true surface appearance is. Features affixed to the stone's surface (such as maps or inscriptions) are hidden by this magic.

The reverse of this spell, reveal stone, will clearly outline (momentarily illuminating) secret or hidden doors, panels, cavities, storage niches, catches, locks, and other deliberately-hidden features. These features will be revealed if the stone has a maskstone spell on it or if it is simply in poorly-lit or confusing natural conditions.

The material components are an eyelash (from any creature) and a pinch of dust or sand. The reverse of the spell requires a scrap of gauze and a piece of phosphorous or a handful of iron filings.

Rockburst (Alteration)

Sphere: Combat
 Range: 10 yards/level
 Components: V, S
 Duration: 1 round
 Casting Time: 2
 Area of Effect: 1 cubic foot/level
 Saving Throw: Special

This spell allows the caster to cause a boulder or rockpile to suddenly explode, propelling jagged shards in all directions. If the desired spell focus is larger than the volume the priest can affect, only part of it will fly about.

Shrapnel endangers all beings within 20 feet of the spell focus. Beings within 10 feet must save vs. spell for half damage. Beings between 10 and 20 feet distant who save successfully are allowed a second saving throw. If both rolls are successful, they avoid all damage (due to luck, dodging, and cover). If only one roll is successful, they take half damage. The presence of cover or armor does not automatically lessen damage due to the unpredictability of ricochets, bounces, and the like.

The shrapnel does a base damage of 1d4 + 1 points per level of the caster (i.e. 1d4 + 1 points per cubic foot of rock). In rare cases, the explosion will remove enough rock to cause an avalanche or cave-in, but such results can rarely be deliberately caused with this spell.

Third-Level Spells

Glowglory (Alteration, Evocation)

Sphere: Combat
 Range: Touch
 Components: V, S, M
 Duration: Special
 Casting Time: 3
 Area of Effect: Special
 Saving Throw: None

This spell allows priests to unleash beams of power from glowstones, or make normal stone (in a surface area of up to 1 square foot per level of the caster) radiate a continual light radiance, for 1 turn/level. If the priest desires, the radiance of normal stone can be accompanied by a gentle release of heat, enough to warm chilled beings to prevent frostbite, death from exposure, and ensure comfortable sleeping and activity in exposed or icy-cold conditions.

When used on a glowstone touched by the caster, this magic unleashes a beam of power. For more details of glowstones, refer to the chapter on magical items in this sourcebook. A beam of power is a cutting beam of radiant force that rends stone, wood, and flesh alike. It is typically used as a weapon or a tool, to quarry stone or open passages in solid rock.

A beam of power does an automatic six points of structural damage (see the DMG, p. 76) per round to wood or stone objects or surfaces. It deals 6d6 hp of damage per contact to living things. In either case, a beam of power is mentally aimed with the same THAC0 as if the priest were attacking directly. It lashes out to its furthest extent (30 yards) in a single round, and can be directed as a continuous stream or pulsed (interrupted and resumed). In either case, other spellcasting, death, or unconsciousness on the part of the caster ends the beam of power and the spell instantly. Beams of power can be tracked in any direction while cutting or to follow a moving target (at MV 15). A beam of power lasts for 1 round/level of the caster, or until ended by deliberate will of the caster (whichever occurs first).

The material components of this spell are the glowstone or normal stone to be used (which is not itself altered by the spell) and a pinch of gold- or gem-dust.

Lesser Guardian Hammer (Invocation)

Sphere: Guardian
 Range: Touch (of area to be guarded)
 Components: V, S, M
 Duration: Special
 Casting Time: 3
 Area of Effect: Special
 Saving Throw: None

A lesser guardian hammer, is an invisible, hammer-shaped field of force that appears when a guarded door, lock, threshold, or area is disturbed (even years after the spell was cast). When activated, it charges through the air to strike the living thing nearest to the disturbed guardian area, or any being in the area (if there is more than one, determine target randomly). A guardian hammer strikes only once, but does not miss. When it hits, it appears momentarily as a glowing, translucent hammer, and then fades away into nothingness. Its unavoidable strike does 2d12 damage. Beings struck must make a strength check to avoid being knocked down.

Lesser guardian hammers can be destroyed before activation by casting a dispel magic on the guarded area, or by totally destroying (e.g. by disintegration) the guarded area without entering it. Once activated, a lesser guardian hammer can dodge all magical and physical barriers, phasing in and out of the ethereal plane if necessary, and cannot be destroyed or diverted to another target.

The material components for this spell are a drop of sweat or spittle or a tear from the caster, a hair (from any creature), and a pebble or lump of ice.

Fourth-Level Spells

Fire Eyes (Evocation)

Sphere: Combat
Range: 10 yards/level
Components: V, S, M
Duration: 1 round/level
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: ½

This spell allows the priest to emit a fiery beam from either one or both of his eyes. This thin, ruby-red beam can strike up to two opponents per round, attacking with the priest's normal THAC0. Its use does not stop the priest from engaging in physical activities (including combat) in the same round.

The beam deals 2d8 fire damage to all creatures struck by it (1d8 if a save vs. spells is successful). Creatures immune to flame damage are unharmed.

The beam acts as an instant ("searing" level) heat metal on all metal it touches. A second beam striking the same piece or area of metal will melt the metal, unless it saves vs. lightning (magical items gain saving throw bonuses equal to any bonuses they possess).

Note that an armored character struck by the beam would suffer both direct beam damage and the "searing" damage as from a heat metal spell. If the beam strikes again, both types of damage would be suffered again, and armor that does not save would collapse into liquid metal blobs, falling from its wearer's body!

The material component of this spell is the priest's holy symbol, which must be touched during casting. It is not harmed, and need not be continuously touched as the spell continues.

Guardian Hammer (Invocation)

Sphere: Guardian
Range: Touch (of area to be guarded)
Components: V, S, M
Duration: Special
Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: Special
Saving Throw: None

This spell creates a guardian hammer: an invisible, hammer-shaped field of force activated when a guarded door or other area is disturbed (even years after the spell was cast).

When activated, it charges through the air to strike the living thing nearest to the disturbed guardian area, or any being in the area (if there is more than one, determine target randomly). A guardian hammer strikes only once, but does not miss. When it hits, it appears momentarily as a glowing, translucent hammer, and then fades away into nothingness. Its strike does 4d12 damage, and stuns (no voluntary actions possible) its victim for 1d4 + 1 rounds. Struck beings must make a strength check to avoid being knocked down, forcing possible "fall" saving throws for fragile carried items.

Guardian hammers can be destroyed before activation by casting a dispel magic on the guarded area, or by totally destroying (e.g. by disintegration) the guarded area without entering it. The latter method destroys all guardian hammers attached to an area; the former method destroys only one guardian hammer per dispel magic, if multiple spells exist. Once activated, a guardian hammer can dodge all magical and physical barriers, by way of the ethereal plane (phasing in and out) if necessary, and cannot be destroyed or diverted to another target by such means.

The material components for this spell are a drop of sweat or spittle or a tear from the caster, a hair from a dwarven stone mason, and a pebble or lump of ice.

Stone Trap (Alteration)

Sphere: Combat
Range: 10 yards/level
Components: V, S, M
Duration: Permanent until discharged

Casting Time: 4
Area of Effect: 1 cubic foot/level
Saving Throw: Special

This spell renders stone invisible and moves it to a mid-air location (within range) chosen by the caster. It levitates in place, sometimes for years, until the spell is released, either by will of the caster, or by the caster's death. Release is accomplished by the utterance of a word or phrase, which may be any nonsense or catch-phrase spoken in the original spellcasting, or by fulfillment of specific conditions (i.e. "when the lock on the door is broken or picked"), in the same way as a wizard's magic mouth spell (q.v.) can 'go off' when specific conditions are met.

When the spell is triggered, gravity takes over and the stone turns visible as it falls. This spell is often used to devise a trap, holding boulders as deadfalls above archways (including castle or delve entrances), vault doors, thrones, bathtubs, beds, or other strategic areas.

Creatures in the area are allowed a save vs. spell. If it fails, they take full damage. If it is successful, they are also allowed a dexterity check. If the check succeeds, they escape without any damage. If the check fails, they suffer half damage.

The base damage done by this spell is 2d4 points per level of the caster (i.e. per cubic foot of suspended rock).

Note that skilled dwarves often fashion false stone ceilings of smooth-finished stones, and raise them overhead to serve as stone traps. True seeing will reveal the levitating stone clearly, but if the caster has prepared it with enough skill (using shaped stone blocks, or carved ornaments such as gargoyle-heads or vault arches), the viewer may not recognize the viewed stone as any sort of trap. The levitating stone does radiate magic, faintly—but then, many dwarven delves radiate magic from most of their stone surfaces, if spells have been used in their shaping or subsequent use.

The material components of this spell are a speck of dust or grit, a tear or drop of water or blood, the sleep from a dwarfs eye, and a pebble.

Stonefall

(Alteration)

Sphere: Elemental (Earth)

Range: 120 yards

Components: V, S, M

Duration: 1 round

Casting Time: 4

Area of Effect: 3 cubic feet/level

Saving Throw: Special

This spell causes rocky materials to attack at the priest's direction. If cast underground, it causes stalactites to fall or causes a cave-in. If cast indoors, it causes a ceiling collapse. If cast in open air, it causes one fist-sized stone to fall rapidly out of the sky and strike the intended target, causing 3d4 points of damage (the target is allowed a saving throw vs. spell to avoid the missile and all damage).

A fall of stalactites forces the intended target to make 1d6 dexterity checks, depending on how many fall. Each failed Check equals one hit, for 2d6 damage. Fragile items may well have to make saving throws. This sort of attack is relatively unlikely (roll 1 on 1d61 to cause a more general cave-in).

A deliberate cave-in causes 4d8 damage to all below it (save vs. petrification for half damage). If the situation makes it possible for a cave-in to miss intended targets, the priest must make a successful attack roll (at +5 to hit), as if attacking directly. A miss means that the target scrambled adroitly enough to avoid all damage.

An indoor ceiling collapse causes only 3d8 damage (save for half, as above), but damage to breakable items in the room and the space above the ceiling must be considered, as well as 3d6 or more falling damage to beings coming down with the ceiling (a save vs. spell will lower this damage to 2d+ + 11).

If this spell is cast within 3 rounds after a stonefire spell has been cast, the fiery damage of the falling stone will be added to its striking damage.

The material component of this spell is a handful (at least three) of fingerjoint-sized or larger stones or pebbles.

Stonefire

(Alteration)

Sphere: Elemental (Earth, Fire)

Range: Touch

Components: V, S, M

Duration: 1 round/level

Casting Time: 4

Area of Effect: 1 cubic foot/level

Saving Throw: None

This spell allows the caster to ignite stone into roaring flames. The stone blackens, stretches to reveal holes, burns away from the edges of these holes in ever-widening cavities until large amounts of stone have actually been burnt away, and then smoulders into quiescence again, creaking as it cools.

The stonefire gives off an acrid, billowing white smoke, an earthy, metallic stink, and flames that do 2d6 points of fire and heat damage (per round) to creatures within 10 feet. Actual contact with stonefire causes 4d4 points of damage, and forces a system shock roll to avoid collapsing, unconscious, from the pain.

Creatures especially susceptible to fire damage may suffer as much as double these effects, while creatures resistant to fire may suffer as little as 1-2 hp damage from contact with stonefire (they suffer some damage due to the corrosive effects of the burning). Stone burned away by this spell is consumed, forever gone.

If key areas of stonework (such as pillars) or natural stone walls, ceilings, or supporting floors are burned away, collapses and cave-ins may occur. The effects of cave-ins are detailed in the spell description for stonefall, above. Collapses entail the same damage, plus falling damage (and item saving throws) for beings and things that fall as a result of the spell. It should be noted that this spell cannot be precisely controlled, even with long practice; it is not recommended for stone-carving or decorating uses.

The material components of this spell are a chunk of any type of stone and a small piece of saltpeter, which are rubbed together.

Fifth-Level Spells

Flowstone

(Alteration)

Sphere: Elemental (Earth)

Range: 10 yards

Components: V, S, M

Duration: 1 round

Casting Time: 5

Area of Effect: 3 cubic feet/level

Saving Throw: Special

This spell makes stone flow like syrup, and then rehardens. The stone flows in response to gravity, but may be directed by beings (such as skilled dwarves) wielding wooden paddles or erecting temporary dams. The flowing stone is not heated or altered in hue.

Dwarves often use this spell to shape stone conduits, by flowing stone around logs that are later burnt away, and to sculpt stone into smooth door surrounds, covering or shielding embedded locks and the like.

The spell can also allow escape from stone prisons, by using wooden poles to open holes in the molten stone of walls, and to uproot manacle-bolts or other entrapments. Its most deadly use is to trap beings by entombing them or encasing their feet or other body parts in the hardening stone.

Allow any being in contact with "flowing" stone a saving throw vs. poison. If successful, the being entirely avoids having stone cling or envelop any part of them. They are completely free of the affected area without harm (but must save again if they re-enter it).

A being who fails this save is partially encrusted with stone, and will be slowed in movement rate and suffer a two point dexterity penalty until the stone is washed off (within 2 rounds) or shattered and scraped off (thereafter).

If an encrusted being is immobile, or is in the center of an affected area more than 10 feet across when the round of flowing ends, a saving throw vs. spell is also necessary. If it fails, the being is stuck. A strength check is allowed beings struggling against the hardening stone. If successful, they will reach the edge of the flow area, and emerge with one or more limbs encased in immobilizing blobs of stone.

If failed, they are trapped in the hardening stone. If stone covers breathing organs (in most beings, the head), death will occur in 1d4 + 1 rounds. If stone merely prevents movement, the being will die of starvation in 1d10 + 10 days, or whenever overcome by rising water, attacking beasts, or the like.

Attacks on the stone transmit half damage directly to the trapped person; an encased limb can typically be freed by either amputating it (loss of one-quarter hit points, plus a forced, immediate system shock roll), or doing the stone 20 points of crushing or piercing damage (10 points to the trapped being). A second flowstone spell can free trapped beings without harm.

The material components of this spell are a drop of water, a daub of mud, a grain of sand, and a pebble.

Spells Usable by Most Dwarven Faiths

Fifth-Level Spells

Circle of Stone

(Evocation)

Sphere: Protection

Range: 0

Components: V, S

Duration: 1 round/level of lowest dwarven caster

Casting Time: 1 round

Area of Effect: Special

Saving Throw: None

This spell can be cast in any location in which there are pieces of stone larger than the caster surrounding him on at least three sides. The spell involves a short chant and the physical linkage (touching) of all the beings to be encircled, and creates an invisible magical field around them.

The field is spherical, with a 10 foot radius per caster involved. While it lasts, it confers a bonus of +4 to the saving throws of all beings in the circle (friendly or hostile), and a 5 in 6 chance (per attack) of a spell or magical item effect being reflected back at full power on its caster or source, even if outside the circle.

Dwarves within a circle of stone gain a +3 bonus to attack (not damage) rolls, and can hit all opponents, even those normally struck only by magical weapons of certain bonuses.

Doom Curse

(Alteration)

Reversible

Sphere: Necromantic

Range: Touch

Components: V, S

Duration: 1 day/level of caster

Casting Time: 1 round

Area of Effect: One being

Saving Throw: Neg.

The effects of this harmful spell can be brought down on any being touched by the caster, even by means of a hurled axe or other missile weapon. The spell has no effect if the target saves vs. spell, and can be ended by a remove curse or this spell's reverse, lift doom.

The exact effect of the spell varies with the curse chosen; some typical dwarven curses are given here. The DM should feel free to devise new effects, in keeping with the ethos of the casting priest, and generally of the same level of power as those given. Typical doom curses include:

- temporary loss of 3 levels, including hp, THAC0, spell wielding, etc.
- slow effects, as the third-level wizard spell.
- 4 point penalty on all saving throws and ability checks.
- inability to speak clearly (i.e. spellcasting impossible, messages are garbled and communication difficult, possibly causing misunderstandings with, and hostility in, encountered creatures).
- recurring blurred vision or blindness, lasting one round, and occurring in a 1 in 6 chance, rolled each round. AC and attack penalties apply, and certain activities will be endangered (e.g. walking along narrow paths without falling or bumping into surroundings) or rendered impossible (e.g. catching things).

Passage

(Alteration)

Sphere: Elemental (Earth)

Range: 0

Components: V, S

Duration: 1 round/level

Casting Time: 5

Area of Effect: Priest (caster) only

Saving Throw: None

This spell enables the caster (only) to pass through solid stone or metal, as a xorn does. Movement rate through metal or solid stone is 6, rising to 9 through earth, loose stone, or mud. During such passage, breathing is unnecessary, but navigation is difficult (intelligence check each round or inadvertently turn astray 45 degrees to one side or other, at random). If the spell expires while the priest is still entirely within stone, the priest is trapped (as in the imprisonment wizard spell), and can be freed only by digging or by a free action spell.

If any part of the priest has reached out of the stone, the entire body can be made to follow, in 1d4 + 1 rounds. On the second round and each round thereafter, the character is allowed a strength check. If successful, the character frees himself. On the first round, and on any round thereafter that freedom is not gained, the priest suffers 2d4 points of constriction, suffocation, and friction heat damage.

The priest cannot carry any items through the stone with him—clothing and all will be left behind. Living creatures cannot accompany the priest, and there is no known way that a priest can confer this spell effect on another being.

Rune of Power

(Abjuration, Evocation)

Sphere: Guardian

Range: Touch

Components: V, S, M

Duration: Permanent until discharged

Casting Time: 1 round

Area of Effect: Special

Saving Throw: Special

This special type of magical inscription, more powerful than a glyph of warding but less powerful than most symbols, was once the heart of all dwarven magic, usable by all dwarves (with differing degrees of power and reliability—note that modern dwarves do not have this power). Adventurers who have explored some of the remotest northern and southern depths and mountain-caverns report that either there are dwarven monasteries (clerical communities) or that a few dwarven clans or bands retain the use of rune magic.

Runes of power as used by dwarven clerics throughout the Realms are described here. They increase in power according to the level of the dwarf casting them. A successful saving throw vs. spell enables a creature violating a rune of power to escape its effects.

The priest casting the rune sets the exemption conditions; that is, the situations or creatures that will not cause the rune of power to operate. Otherwise, any being passing, entering, or opening the surface on which the rune of power is inscribed will suffer its harmful effects. Touching or attacking the rune of power itself will also certainly activate it.

A rune of power can be set to avoid discharging when creatures of certain races, alignments, faiths, and sizes try to pass it. It cannot be set to avoid specific levels, hit dice, or classes of creatures, and cannot be combined with other runes, glyphs, or symbols.

Runes of power can be drawn to any size larger than the caster's hand, and their trigger lines can be extended to encompass any size of protected area on a single surface. Dispel magic spells will remove runes of power. Find and remove traps by thieves will locate runes of power, but not identify or foil them.

Most runes of power duplicate or resemble the effects of wizard spells. The most widely-known of these "killing" runes of power are:

Alhalbrin: This rune of power melts metal on all metal items that contact or pass it, within 3 rounds of its activation. The metal receives a saving throw vs. magical fire (with a penalty of -3 if not elven chain or magical in nature). Whether the metal melts or not, it grows hot, doing any being in contact with it 1d4 points of damage.

Faerindyl: This rune of power causes a flaming sphere to come into being out of the protected surface. The flaming sphere rolls directly away from the protected surface with a movement of 18. It will pass around all immovable objects in its path, bursting only when it contacts a wall or other surface larger than its own 10 foot radius. Creatures within 5 feet of the sphere must save vs. spell or suffer 1d4 points of heat damage. Beings struck by the spell must save or take 2d4 points of fire damage. Objects in contact with the sphere must save vs. magical fire. When the sphere bursts, all creatures within 10 feet must save vs. spell or take 3d6 fire damage. Note that this sphere is quite different in behavior and effects from the wizard spell of the same name. The only known way to stop a flaming sphere is with a wall of fire (which it will merge with), a wall of force (which will cause it to burst), or a dispel magic. Otherwise, it will flow around and through all obstacles, including creatures in its path.

Sabras: This rune of power creates a miniature blade barrier effect, across (and in line with) the protected surface on which the rune of power was inscribed. It lasts for only one round, but does 4d6 damage to all creatures within 10 feet of the protected surface (a successful save vs. spells allows a dexterity check; if successful, the being escapes with no damage; if failed, the creature takes only 2d6 damage).

Thundaril: This forceful rune of power acts as a polymorph other spell on creatures activating it. Unlike the wizard spell of the same name, intelligence retention and system shock survival are automatic. Otherwise (equipment, class skills, and the like) the change functions as the wizard spell. The priest casting the rune sets the form to be changed into; Elminster reports that dwarven priests seem to like populating guarded areas with snails, slugs, and toads.

Velurdyn: This rune of power acts as a reverse gravity spell, flinging all beings within 20 feet of it (when activated) upward for 30 feet, and then immediately back downward. Creatures unable to fly suffer 3d6 falling damage, plus 3d6 (or less, if the ceiling is lower) impact damage for striking the ceiling, provided the ceiling is within 30 feet of the floor. In some cases, stalactites, piercer monsters, or even artificial spikes have been set into ceilings to augment such a trap.

Some runes of power are named by the caster as they are inscribed, and take immediate effect.

The most widely-known of these 'fast' runes are:

Bhelaerak: Acts as the 8th level wizard spell glassteel, affecting 10 pounds of weight per level of the priest.

Corsimmyr: Acts as the 5th level wizard spell passwall.

Delhaubrin: Acts as the 2nd level wizard spell shatter

Elemysr: Acts as the 2nd level wizard spell invisibility, affecting a single living or nonliving body or object. If an invisible creature launches a successful attack, it immediately becomes visible.

The material component to create any rune of power is the priest's holy symbol, which is used to trace the rune. Unlike similar priest spells, no other material components are necessary.

The Lost Runes of Power: Legends persist of runes once known to the dwarves that were far more powerful than the existing ones. A single rune of power was used to level the ancient city of Dhar-maghongh in Murghom, long ago. Elminster warns that although such runes definitely existed, no dwarven clan controls such power now—or recent dwarven history would be far different.

Seventh-Level Spells

Rune Chant

(Abjuration, Evocation)

Sphere: Guardian

Range: 10 yards/level (of caster's class)

Components: V, S

Duration: Instantaneous

Casting Time: 2 rounds

Area of Effect: Special

Saving Throw: Special

Since dwarves cannot normally progress beyond 10th level as priests, this spell is beyond the normal capabilities of dwarven clerics. It is sometimes granted to High Old Ones, clan leaders, or great dwarven heroes in times of need, by manifestation of a dwarven deity. It is not otherwise usable by dwarves.

It causes a rune of power (see above) to form anywhere in range, in midair, without the caster inscribing it. The rune of power takes immediate offensive action against a target or area selected by the will of the caster. A successful save vs. spell on the target's part will cause the rune of power to affect an area adjacent to the one intended (perhaps endangering another friendly or hostile creature, which does not receive a saving throw).

DWARVEN MAGIC: NEW MAGICAL ITEMS

Olimbis “the Old,” greatest sage of the dwarves, whose clear memory spans six centuries, tells us that dwarves learned the secret of forging steel before the time of his grandfather, Ohrlin “Orckiller” Talanath—in other words, well over three thousand years ago. Elminster suspects that it was far earlier than that; old elven legends hold that dwarves were the first to work magic, but so greedily and wildly that it twisted their very nature, which rebelled against magical forces.

Whatever the truth of those legends, dwarves have always had trouble working with magic, for some reason inherent in their nature, and have instead concentrated on technology: the mastery of engineering feats such as elaborate pumps, sluices, elevators, taps, bridges, locks, and other feats of mechanical skill.

The great artisans among the dwarves have always envied other races, notably elves, humans, and halflings, for their ability to handle magic. The dwarven artisans have worked with individuals of these races on occasion to wield their magic to common advantage.

One such joint development, “glowstones” (artificially-created gemstones that entrap magical energies and serve as power sources), were devised by dwarven master smiths in the workshops of Myth Drannor. The secrets of making glowstones are now thought to be lost, but they remain one of the most highly-prized dwarven magical items, known to all races across the Realms.

A few of the most common and famous magical items devised and used by dwarves appear here for DM reference. Experience point ratings provided are for making a single item, not finding or using it. An asterisk denotes an item whose making is no longer known; these tend to be rarer and more valuable. The XP values of such lost magical items are bracketed, to denote the small likelihood that they will be attained.

Air Hammer:

These nondescript stone hammers are marked with a certain dwarven rune: two circles, one inside the other. They are found throughout dwarven delves, lying on ledges and wedged in rock fissures, as though discarded.

They are actually emergency aids. If an air hammer is broken, or the rune upon it struck sharply (i.e. if it is used to strike a blow), it activates. A loud, repetitive knocking noise is heard, and the air hammer (or its shards) begins to vibrate rapidly, swinging back and forth, as it diminishes in size. The stone hammer is actually the stopper or portal valve to an extra-dimensional space, filled with pressurized oxygen from the Elemental Plane of Air. When it is activated, the extra-dimensional space rapidly collapses, pumping its contents into the surrounding atmosphere.

Dwarves use this to escape underground smoke, poisonous gases (including cloudkill effects), or floods (an air hammer will create a bubble of air). The oxygen will forcibly drive out existing atmosphere, providing clean air in a 30-foot radius globe around the activation point. There is enough air to last eight man-sized creatures (or twelve dwarves) for 1 turn, given normal exertion (the air will last half that time if combat occurs).

This clean air cannot be moved as an intact globe, once released, and is highly dangerous if brought into contact with open flames, typically creating an instant 30'-radius, 5d6 ball of fire. Magical fireballs that contact an air hammer's oxygen globe will instantly double in radius, and gain 6d6 additional damage power.

XP Value: 600

Blast Spike:

These dwarven mining tools are used to split or shatter rock in specific, dangerous situations, such as removing blockages from underground cascades or rivers. They can also serve as weapons. Blast spikes are simple metal spikes, about as long as an adult human's hand. They are three-sided, pointed wedges of fine steel, with wide, circular heads for hammering, like giant tacks.

They can be dropped any distance, used as weapons (1d4 damage), or hammered into rocks, stone walls, or even trees or wooden walls without incident. Many have served as climbing holds in deep dwarven caverns for years.

A blast spike can only be activated by striking it with another blast spike. Upon contact, both spikes explode violently, causing a total of 5d4 shrapnel damage to all within 30 feet (save vs. spell allowed for half damage, except for any creatures touching either spike at the time of explosion). Obviously, if one wishes to avoid damage, the second spike must be thrown or rammed with a very long pole; a successful attack roll (with nonproficiency penalties) is required.

Anyone holding onto a spike when it is struck, or attached to it via a line or other means, must make a successful dexterity check and a successful strength check to avoid falling (with attendant damage). If both checks fail, the unfortunate being does not merely fall: he or she is flung violently away from the location of the two spikes, possibly striking other beings or obstacles, and in any case incurring an extra 1d8 impact damage in the process.

XP Value: 1,000

Fist:

These prized items are traditionally used only by dwarven priests without regard to faith. Dwarves frown on beings of other races using them, and will seek any excuse to challenge or attack the owners to gain them. Fists magically alter in size to fit any hand brought into contact with them, and can even be worn and used by dragons, giants, and other gargantuan creatures!

A fist is an adamantine chain mail glove with pointed knuckles of solid metal. They are used like brass knuckles, but augment the power of the wearer's blows.

A fist adds one point of damage to the wearer's barehanded damage in normal use, and also protects the hand against weapon attacks. It can be commanded to deliver a pile driving blow.

Each such blow drains the wearer of 1d2 hit points—it is the user's life energy that powers the extra impact. A pile driving blow can be used, as the name suggests, to drive piles, or shatter doors, armor, weapons, shields, and the like.

If the target is mobile, a successful attack roll is required. If a blow occurs, the target must save vs. crushing blow at - 6. (If directed against walls and the like, consider the fist a “giant fist” on the Structural Saving Throws table in the DMG, to which the -6 penalty to the save applies.)

Against creatures, a pile driving blow does 2d12 points of damage, automatically stuns for the following round, and knocks the target down.

To avoid being knocked down, allow a strength check at - 3 penalty (- 2 if the target is large, - 1 if huge, no penalty if gargantuan). A saving throw vs. spell will avoid stunning; otherwise, the struck being can make no voluntary action on the following round.

Fists are unaffected by heat metal and similar attacks directed at them. If struck by any spell effect of 7th level or higher, or any magical item effect dealing more than seven dice of damage, they fly off, landing at random. Damaging a fist requires concentrated, deliberate magical attacks, or disintegration-normal combat attacks, even severe ones, simply won't affect a fist. A fist neither has nor uses charges.

(XP Value: 900)

*Glowstone:

These famous "gems" are synthetic crystals. Clear, faceted, and oval, as long as a man's hand, glowstones glow with a continuous, heatless white radiance equal to a continual light spell.

This radiance cannot be dimmed by magical darkness, dispel magic, or other means, with the exception of draining the stone of all power. When power is being drained from a glowstone, it pulses and flickers.

Glowstones are used to power all magical items requiring charges. A glowstone that is brought into contact with an item sticks to it. This is an attraction akin to magnetism, which can be broken by a strong pull, but not by an accidental contact. Once attached to another magical item, the glowstone begins to recharge the item, restoring one charge per full turn of continuous contact. If the item is used during this time, it loses no charges, the required magical energy being drawn from the glowstone in addition to the recharging energy being released.

Magical items which do not use charges but which can normally be used only a limited number of times in a set period gain one additional use (of each power or function) after they are exhausted. They must be touched to a glowstone for five continuous rounds. This boost cannot be fed into an item before a given power is exhausted, storing the energy for later use.

In addition, dwarven clerics can release the power of a glowstone which they are touching by means of a special spell, glowglory (presented in the previous chapter, Dwarven Magic: Spells). This potent magic allows them to unleash beams of power from a glowstone, as weapons or tools. A beam of power is a cutting beam of radiant force that cuts stone, wood, and flesh alike—doing an automatic six points of structural damage per round to the former two objects (see the DMG, p. 76), and does 6d6 points of damage per contact to living things. For more information on beams of power; please refer to the spell glowglory.

Unleashing a beam of power from a glowstone drains it of 20 charges per round. Charging an item from a glowstone drains however many charges are transferred to the item, at the rate given above. Boosts for chargeless items cost 7 charges each.

Glowstones have 1,000 charges when made, and can never be recharged, but charges can be transferred from one glowstone to another. A little-known side benefit of this last practice: any being holding two glowstones together and willing one to give the other energy experiences the energy flow through his or her body. It does not heal hit point damage, but does burn away poisons, diseases, parasitic infestations, and embedded foreign materials, purifying the body.

To destroy a glowstone, one must strike it with a disintegration spell or magical effect, or deal it physical or magical damage (or a combination of the two types) totaling more than 66 hit points in one round (cumulative totals are ignored). Even when disintegrated, a glowstone explodes in a violent blast dealing 1d10 points of damage per charge it had left, to all creatures within 70 feet (save for half damage, allowed only if at least 25 feet distant from the stone). Glowstones that are entirely drained do not explode. Their light simply fades silently, and then they crumble away to worthless dust.

Ironstar Mace:

These all-metal weapons are fashioned by the fabled Ironstar dwarven clan, and are both rare and costly. Always of the "footman's" variety, and always made of a single piece of darksteel, Ironstar maces are said to be able to shatter armor at a blow.

What they actually do is deal double damage (2d6 + 2 versus small and man-sized, 2d6 versus large), seem almost weightless (weighing less than one pound) and unbreakable (see "darksteel" in the chapter Dwarven Craft), and have a special power: the shattering strike.

A shattering strike can only be called upon successfully once in every 2 turn-period. If an intended strike misses, the power is not wasted, and can be used on a subsequent attack. A shattering strike causes a dull, rolling booming, like distant thunder.

A struck target suffers 2d12 damage and must save vs. spell or be stunned (unable to make any voluntary action) for 2d8 rounds. Even if the save is successful, the struck being is stunned for the round following the strike.

If a target is wearing field or full plate (rigid) armor, the damage taken by the target is halved, but the armor must save (metal vs. crushing blow with a -4 penalty) or shatter and fall off. If armor has resisted an earlier shattering strike successfully, its penalty is - 5. If multiple strikes have been saved against (note that this requires a passage of considerable time), the armor's saving throw penalty is cumulative.

XP Value: 800.

Pickaxe of Piercing:

This rare item is simply an enchanted adamantite pickaxe, used in mining. It does 1d6 + 2 damage (2d6 against larger than man-sized creatures), and has a special property: it can pierce magical defenses.

A creature with a high (20% or more) natural magic resistance (such as a dragon of advanced age) suffers a temporary 10% loss of personal magic resistance, lasting for one full turn, after suffering a blow from a pickaxe of piercing. Such losses are cumulative: three blows of a pickaxe of piercing robs a creature of 30% magic resistance. This loss is always temporary, even if the creature's resistance drops to zero. (A pickaxe of piercing will not cause negative magic resistance.)

Besides shattering dragonscales, armor, or solid rock, and sundering magic resistance, the pointed, double-ended head of a pickaxe of piercing is also effective against magical barriers of all sorts—walls, shells, spheres and mantles. Each contact between the head of the pickaxe and a barrier has a 10 percent chance (not cumulative) of causing the magical field to instantly collapse, dispelled. If the field survives, it is unharmed, and has normal effects. A single field can only be tested once per round by a single pickaxe of piercing, but multiple pickaxe of piercing blows will force multiple checks.

XP Blue: 2,000.

*Runehammer:

These rare darksteel warhammers do normal damage in combat. Each bears a rune of power, inscribed upon its head. If the elder dwarven name of the rune of power on the hammer is spoken aloud as the hammer is hurled or swung, the effect of the rune is delivered on any target struck in the same round.

The various rune of power effects are detailed under the description of the spell (in the chapter Dwarven Magic: Spells). A runehammer will only unleash the power of its rune six times in a day. However, they may be used in six consecutive rounds. Runehammers neither have nor use charges, but each time the rune power is used, there is a 7 percent chance (not cumulative) that the runehammer will vanish, shifted away to another plane by the will of Moradin. (Beings wielding a hammer at the time may or may not be carried along with it; the DM should decide, either randomly, or based on the situation and the willingness of the being to accompany the weapon.)

XP Value: 2,500

Stun Bolt:

This special crossbow quarrel, which can be fired from any size crossbow from hand to heavy, looks like a stone doorknob on a short, thin shaft.

When fired, a stun bolt behaves in all cases (ranges, ROF, etc.) as if fired from a hand crossbow. However, on impact, it shatters into dust-sized motes, releasing a stunning magical shock of force that does 2d4 damage to any being struck. Victims of a stun bolt strike are unable to think or act coherently for the round following the hit (no saving throw). Only living things are affected—undead and objects suffer no shock effects. Such weapons are often used by dwarven guards.

XP Value: 200.

Whip of Amatar:

Named for the famous dwarven smith who first devised them, these rare weapons are long, coiled, flexible whips of lovingly-crafted metal, usually adamantine. They look like giant metallic centipedes, with ringlike segments. In battle, they do damage as a normal drover's whip (1d4 + 1 plus the victim must make a strength check or be knocked down, dropping held items or weapons), but they have several additional useful properties.

The metal whip resists being cut or broken (it will suffer up to 17 points of damage on a single segment before parting, and, if it does, its magic is lost).

Moreover, its touch can act as a stone to flesh spell by utterance of a secret command word, affecting both petrified things and natural stone (creating a fleshy cylinder, as the spell) as though the whip was a 12th level wizard. Thus, 108 cubic feet of stone can be affected per touch. This special power can only be called upon once a turn, and only three times in all per day (any continuous 144-turn period, even underground).

Some 10 percent of these whips can function as a flesh to stone as well, if the command word is known. Their XP Value appears in brackets, below.

XP Value: 650 (950).

*Winged Hammer:

This double-ended stone warhammer is heard of more often in tales than it is actually seen today. Once a favorite weapon of northern dwarves, its use has dwindled with the passing of the Lost Kingdoms.

A winged hammer functions as a normal warhammer. However, if thrown, it follows a moving target with its wings (MV 21, Class A), striking at +2 to hit and then returning to the hand of the being who launched it. If grasped or prevented from returning by barriers, it simply blinks in an extra-dimensional space for three rounds, and then appears in the hand of the one who launched it at the end of that time.

Upon verbal command (by use of a secret word, which must be uttered by a being touching the hammer), a winged hammer will dart away to fight by itself, selecting victims according to the will of the being who sent it. If its sender is slain or rendered unconscious, the hammer simply attacks the nearest living creature until that creature falls, and then returns to the sender, even if the sender is in no condition to do anything with it thereafter. If the hammer is grasped by one other than its owner, it blinks as described earlier.

A winged hammer can fight by itself, switching opponents as often as its sender wills, for up to one turn. It will then automatically return to the sender, and cannot be sent away to fight again (or thrown, for a flying return) for one full turn. A winged hammer cannot be sent off to fight by itself more than three times a day.

Its sender can be bound or otherwise helpless, or can be casting other spells or wielding other weapons, without harming the winged hammer's activity. A returning winged hammer never spoils spellcasting, but floats just out of the way until the casting is complete, and then (if possible) smacks neatly into the sender's hand. A winged hammer cannot follow a sender onto another plane, unless carried there directly; if abandoned, it will simply fall to the floor until reactivated later, by the same or another being. The "wings" of a winged hammer are self-regenerating magical constructs; it cannot be grounded by destroying them, even for a round.

A winged hammer is AC 4 when stationary, AC - 1 when in flight, and will suffer 45 hp of damage before shattering. When destroyed, its magic is forever lost, but there is no harmful explosion or magical side-effect.

XP Value: 2,400.

THE GREAT RIFT

The center of the Eastern Shaar is cut open as if by a gigantic sword, in a curving, southeast-to-northwest canyon: the Great Rift. The Rift plunges to almost a thousand feet below sea level at its deepest point, the southernmost basin of the Riftlake. Including the lands around it claimed and patrolled by the dwarves, the Rift just outstrips the realm of Sembia in size. Its rolling plains are a day's ride in all directions from the edges the Riftlake.

Quarried by dwarves for centuries, enlarged from an impressive natural canyon to its present awesome size in the process, the Rift is the most powerful surface kingdom held by dwarves today.

The Great Rift is known as "The Crack" in everyday speech. Among themselves, dwarves refer to it as "Aglandar." In the elder tongue of dwarves, this means "sword-slash" or "sword-cut," from 'agland,' the word for sword, and 'ar,' to cut, slash, or lay open; please refer to the chapter "Dwarven Language."

The Stout Folk rule the Rift's depths, walls, and heights alike, and the land all around for a day's ride (by a dwarf, on a mule or pony). They enforce their claim from 60 massive stone guard-towers sited along the edges of the Rift. These Riftingedgers are entered only by tunnels from beneath, and house all manner of catapults and ballistae. In an emergency, frantic supplicants can be lassoed and drawn up on lines to sliding stone ports high on the walls, normally used for aerial steeds. Each tower has a standing garrison of at least 60 dwarven warriors of 3rd to 7th level. Elminster adds that each also has enough line in its strongrooms to let idio—er, intrepid adventurers down from the battlements to the floor of the Rift, far below.

The Gates

The Rift provides entrance to the Deep Realms by means of the Gates, a huge stone arch as tall as 16 men, filled by two titanic metal doors. These gates, by tradition, open only when the dwarves go to war. They are sealed with a rare white metal, hizagkuur, which reflects back all magic cast at the doors with 100 percent accuracy, and deals 2d12 electrical damage per touch (or round of continued contact) to all beings touching the Gates. The two massive doors are locked and barred from within, the hinges, panels, and bars reinforced by alternating wedge-beams of metal and stone. They have withstood direct hits made by suicidally-ramming great dragons and squid ships (see the SPELLJAMMER™ boxed set) in the past, without apparent damage. Some whisper that the Gates themselves are alive, holding the spirits of dwarven heroes who sacrificed themselves to give the Gates eternal vigilance and resiliency.

Each Gate contains a smaller door within it, a sally port that enables individual dwarves or laden pack-mules in or out. Beyond the Gates opens the gigantic Guardcavern, where dwarven caravans muster for their trips into the surface Realms. It is also in the Guardcavern where, upon returning, the caravans are checked for the presence of spies and other undesirables.

Underhome

Underhome, also known as "Underholme," its name in all old accounts, is guarded by many traps and engines of war. Potent magical detection fields and barriers bartered from the Sun Elves in the days of Myth Drannor guard its walls, and no nondwarf allowed into it has been allowed out again within living memory, the sole exceptions being Elminster the Sage and Harpers of power who do not talk loosely.

Hopeful visitors to the lands of the Gold Dwarves are directed to the chapter "Dwarven Races." The Southern Dwarves are very unwelcoming. They tolerate the entry of nondwarves into the Rift, and their business within, but closely watch them, often searching and confiscating weapons or suspicious materials. The dwarves fear the loss of gems and ore from the exposed walls of the Rift itself, and damage to the great herds of sheep, goats, and hogs that the dwarves herd on the shores of the Riftlake.

For more details of Underhome, see the chapter "The Deeps."

The Riftlake

The Riftlake's icy-cold waters are clear, though often shrouded in morning mists, and drinkable, though dissolved minerals lend them a metallic aftertaste. Dwarves do not permit exploration of the Riftlake's depths (the penalty is death), for it is said to have connections to drinking-water supplies in the Deep Realms, and to drowned dwarven tombs that still hold magical weapons and other treasures. They will usually turn a blind eye to a little bathing, however.

Adventurers are warned that any who approach the Riftlake's waters will receive swift and sure punishment. Those who ignore such warnings will discover that it is inhabited by a family of four water nagas (three of 8 hit dice, one of 7). These creatures have been deliberately tormented and starved by the dwarves until they will attack any living creature that enters the lake. If strongly resisted, they will fight with spells, and then flee into several of the flooded dwarven tomb-tunnels, where they will use magical items (of the DM's choice) buried with the dwarves there long ago to defend themselves.

The water nagas (see Monstrous Compendium Volume 2) wield magic as 5th level wizards, commanding the following spells: 4,2,1: chill touch, magic missile x3/blindness, ESP/lightning bolt (acts as a fireball in terms of area affected, when cast underwater).

Dwarven shepherds (typically 16 to 20 per herd, fully armed and armored at all times, by order) attend the sheep, goats, and hogs in the Rift bottom night and day. They keep a close eye on nondwarves in the Rift, and their horns can rapidly summon a 'peacehammer' force from the Gates or the Riftingedgers Towers. If a dripping band of adventurers crawled out of the Riftlake carrying things, for example, horns would ring out in the Rift immediately.

Such police forces are typically 1d4 + 13 dwarven fighters of 3rd to 5th level, in chain mail and armed with multiple throwing axes, a battle axe each, and a few blades. Each also carries a horseman's lance, and is mounted on a hippogriff.

The hippogriffs are trained with skill and iron discipline, and the dwarves have harness-clips on their armor that enable the dwarves to fight when flying upside-down, cartwheeling across the sky in an aerial battle, and so on.

Each dwarven "sky rider" has a pleated cloak strapped to his or her back. If the dwarf has to bail out of the saddle of a falling mount, the cloak spreads into a gliding batlike wing. Like a drogue parachute, the wing slows the rider's descent from a killing thing into a merely bruising, bone-snapping affair (assuming, that is, that the drogue wing has time to operate).

There always seems to be a shortage of volunteers to be trained as replacement skyriders. However, the dwarves who are skyriders are a Haela-praying, hearty, reckless lot who like nothing better than a fight. They particularly delight in swooping down to pinion ground targets with their lances. To pvermit this, each skyrider's saddle has a high, rigid back which also cuts down on deaths from enemy archery. At least three skyriders use magical lances that fire magic missiles or flame upon command.

Hammer and Anvil

The Gold Dwarves prefer that non-dwarves come no closer to the Rift than the trading-village of Hammer and Anvil. The village is a place of tents, moveable huts, and watchful dwarven guards armed with stun bolt-loaded crossbows, against the western wall of the city of Eartheart. Hammer and Anvil is the trading-moot established by the dwarves, in which they meet with surface-dwellers, trading their metal goods (most often weaponry) and work (especially armor-fitting and refitting, and on-the-spot gemcutting and setting) for fruit, vegetables, cheeses, fine textiles, paper, lamp oils, livestock, and other goods the dwarves need or prize.

Among Wanderers, Hammer and Anvil is often known as "Scutterbotch." The name stems from a famous prank in which a Gold Dwarf tried to publicly discredit the honesty of a Shield Dwarf there, but did it so poorly that he brought ridicule upon himself, not his target. This name is often used when Shield Dwarves do not want a bystander to recognize where they're talking about.

The population of Hammer and Anvil varies wildly. It is governed, loosely, by the Shield Ring, a council of about 40 clan elders: every dwarven clan that can get an elder to "the Hammer" and support him, gets representation on the Shield Ring. Every clan may have only one dwarf on council. In cases of rival claimants for the same clan seat, the Ring votes to decide which one to accept. Clans have the authority to remove and replace their representatives, but in practice, a High Old One or clan leader must come before the Shield Ring in person to do this.

The Shield Ring hires about 70 dwarves (fighters of 3rd or higher level) to function as watchguards. If larger troubles develop, they merely call on the forces of Eartheart, or the Deep Realm.

It is rumored that at least one secret tunnel links backways of the Deep Realm with the heart of "the Hammer." However, such a route has been sought by human adventurers and thieving guilds of Amn many times, and never found.

Eartheart

Population: 39,000 (average)

Government: The Lord Scepter of Eartheart, a dwarf elected annually by The Deep Lords (governing council of Gold Dwarf clans, who administer the affairs of the Deep Realm). For the past dozen years, the post has been held by Mariochar "Bladebeard," a clanless dwarf of high, wrinkled forehead, jet-black pointed beard, mincingly polite manners, and a shrewd, steel-trap mind. Mariochar governs Eartheart in the name of the Gathered Clans of the Dwarves (that really means the Gold Dwarf clans), and is aided by Eartheart's standing army, "The Steel Shields."

The city of Eartheart gives the dwarves a secure place to stash their trade goods, a defensive base to defend their trading and the borders of the Great Rift, and a place for all non-Gold Dwarves to come, who have dealings with the Dwarves of the Deep Realm. This combination refuge and diplomatic residence function has given the city its informal name, "Dwarfhome." Here can be found many dwarven adventurers, whom the Gold Dwarves do not trust in their cities in the Deep Realms, but whom they find useful as hirelings to carry out missions in the surface world away from "the reach of the Rift."

Aerial steeds (hippogriffs are especially favored by the dwarves) often fly to and from the thousand-foot-high towers of the city walls. On the Rift side of the city walls, these towers descend (by means of interminable corkscrew staircases) from their lofty heights straight down the Rift side, almost 2,000 feet. A small pile of bones along their bases attests to the numbers of folk who have accidentally—carelessly, despairingly, or with undesired help—fallen from Eartheart to their deaths, over the years.

Eartheart is an impressive city of soaring stone towers, flying bridges, minarets and needle-spires, raked overbalconies, and ramp-linked, many-leveled streets; a place where dwarves have set out to impress the Realms with their stonework—and succeeded. It is said to have secret doors and spy-tunnels everywhere, and to be stealthily policed continuously, to prevent thefts and violence. Troublemakers, it is whispered, are helped by the dwarven police to try their arms at flying-out a chute or window, straight down to join the bones at the bottom of the Rift.

Economy: Eartheart's economy is driven by trade. Its inhabitants specialize in forged iron goods, wagons, caravan services, cattle, and all manner of stonework.

Militia: The Steel Shields, 14,000 dwarven fighters who police the city on foot, man its walls continuously as though at war, check all who enter or leave by air, and patrol the surrounding farmlands for a day's ride out.

In BATTLESYSTEM™ game terms, the Shields will take the field to counter any large attack with the following troops (divide them into units as the referee or players see fit, according to the scenario):

Dwarven Axemen: 9,200 in all, these are the wall-guards, "in the wall" spies and guards, defensive engineers, and trainee warriors. AD 8, AR 7, Hits 1, ML 13, MV 6.

Dwarven Heavy Crossbowmen: 2,000 total, they customarily patrol the outlands, mounted. AD 8, AR 6, Hits 1, ML 13, MV 6, Range 8/16/24.

Elite Dwarves: 2,800 in all, the skilled and well-equipped city police. AD 8, AR 6, Hits 2, ML 14, MV 6.

(These numbers do not include the skyriders and garrisons of the nearby Riftedge Towers.)

THE DEEPS

“The Deeps” is a vast underground region underlying the lands east of the Shining Sea and south of the Sea of Fallen Stars. It has always been heavily-populated and dangerous, with many races vying for supremacy in the Lands that Never See the Sun.

Drow kingdoms have risen and fallen several times, and duergar have made steady advances, the latter at the expense of illithids and svirfneblin, whose numbers have dwindled. Cloakers and aboleth lurk on the fringes of the Deeps, scheming to control key rivers, lakes, and mines. Intelligent fungi are plentiful, and this ready source of food has made the Deeps sought by many.

The term “The Deeps” refers to the Deep Lands, which are areas not ruled by the dwarves, and the Deep Realm, the rich land of Gold Dwarves under the Great Rift and the Shaar east and north of it.

The Deep Lands

These dangerous regions are not fully detailed here. DMs interested in expanding these notes to create their own Deep Lands are directed to the AD&D® Dungeoneer's Survival Guide for useful background material. A creature native to the Deeps, the Deepspawn, appears in this chapter. Notable Deep Lands features include:

The Deepfall: The Deepfall is a waterfall that takes the River Raurogh to great depths, to levels haunted by cloakers, aboleth, and worse.

Helmstar: This is an independent, fortified trade-center, home to gnomes, halflings, humans, and outcast dwarves as well as more enterprising, generally poorer dwarves of the Deep Realm.

Blackrock Anvil: The Blackrock Anvil is a natural lava cascade, used by dwarven smiths willing to brave the dangers of getting there. They insist its age-old forges yield the best temper and refinement of steel. It is said to be haunted by salamanders.

Velm's Brace: This is a ghost-haunted, ruined dwarven stronghold frequented by monsters. Of course, it also draws bands of adventuring dwarves, searching for weapons of mighty magic said to lie in the lost tomb of the dwarven hero Velm Dragonslayer.

Bluesky Cavern: This is a landmark cavern adorned with a small rainwater lake. The Bluesky Cavern is lit by a shaft to the surface that is thankfully too small for dragons to fly down, so to date none have made the cavern a lair.

The Wyrmcaves: The Wyrmcaves are a series of linked dragon lairs reached by surface shafts from the heart of Sharrowood (the Drakewood) in the Eastern Shaar. Home to a powerful family of black dragons who for years feasted on the most noble bones of Unther, the caves are where the dragons have slept on gold and riches of all the rich human empires around the eastern Alambar Sea. They have roasted many greedy dwarves who came seeking their wealth; few try, anymore.

Wildstar: This small hold is named for the now-vanished clan who carved it out of a drow kingdom long ago. It is home to some brotherhoods, independent-minded dwarven craftsmen and freethinkers who dislike the haughty ways and prejudices of the Deep Realm. It is also home to many half-breeds of the demi-human races. Wildstar is infamous for strong, fiery mushroom wine and wild dancing-parties that are fuelled by the burning amber-hued vintage. “As wild as a night in Wildstar” is a common saying among dwarves anywhere in the south.

The Whistlecavern: Fissures leading to the surface here let the winds that lash the grasslands of the Eastern Shaar howl and keen down into the depths. They bring much-needed fresh air and allow lost dwarves to ‘follow the winds’ to this place. The Whistlecavern is a frequent destination for Deep Realm army patrols and traders.

Needle Leap: This is a narrow, natural stone spar that almost spans a deep chasm. In the depths below, cloakers and ‘night slugs’ (giant black subterranean slugs) dine on the shattered bodies of dwarves who thought they could leap the gap, rather than journeying two days’ travel around the chasm. Giant spiders lair nearby, preying on the trade passing this strategic location.

The Deep Realm

The Deep Realm is a rich and proud land, the home of the Gold Dwarves. It abounds in hanging spiral staircases, pumped waterfalls and cascades, glowing, ever-shifting sculptures of magically-radiant metal, and similar marvels. It is much too large to be explored in the pages of this book, but the map supplied in this sourcebook gives the locations of its largest features.

The affairs of the Deep Realm are administered by the Deep Lords. The Lords are the governing council of Gold Dwarf clan elders. Each clan may place four representatives among the Lords. They dispense justice, command the dwarven armies, and decide matters of policy. This government-by-council is made necessary because the Deep Realm is a land awash in royalty—petty, decadent royalty—from whom all real power has been taken away. Their endless feuds, bickering, and private wars prompted the creation of the Lords, since such activity threatened the survival of all the dwarves, as the drow and duergar of the Deeps grew in power, some seven hundred years ago.

Kings, Queens, Princes, Princesses, and Dukes can be found everywhere, resplendent in mithril and golden finery, fanciful costumes and barbed, curlicued armor more ridiculous and ornate than the wildest dreams of human smiths. The Princes include High Princes, Princes Royal, Axe Princes, and still others. Princesses encompass Princesses Royal, War Princesses, and more. Dukes rank above the ardukes of the clans, and act as field generals of the dwarven armies and garrisons. Among the most powerful of all these nobles are King Gnarlgar “Half-Gnome” of Glitterdelve, and King Anthon Sunderaxe of Tarnhall.

Gold Dwarves are well-fed, well-indulged, largely happy (except for their never-satiated grasping after ever-more riches) folk of haughty pride. They have a strong faith in their own superiority to “lesser dwarves” and “non-Folk” (other races). Other dwarves may be in a decline; the Folk of the Deep Realm certainly are not. To this, Elminster merely smiles sadly, and murmurs, “They were this foolish in Ardeep, and Myth Drannor, and Delzoun, too – and those are just the ones I was around to see. Dwarves learn some things very slowly, it seems.”

The dwarves of the Deep Realm are at peace these days, save for occasional skirmishes with the drow and duergar of the depths. They have not waged war in earnest against surface lands for two hundred years, but they never forget foes of their forefathers, and to this day will not trade with the humans of Unther. “A dwarf never forgets his grudges,” as the old saying goes.

The Armies of The Deeps

Much of this peace the Deep Realms have enjoyed has been bought by the sheer military might of the dwarves. Their shrapnel grenades, metal rams, and siege-engines beyond number, “attack spider” mechanical climbing-shields and levitating armored battle-barges to name but a couple, have terrorized many a foe.

The four armies of the Deep Realm are known as “Serpents,” and are named for the cardinal compass-points (of the borders of the Realm they are stationed in); thus, “The Northserpent,” “The Southserpent,” and so on. Each has a duke as a general, and at full strength, the following troops, given in BATTLESYSTEM™ miniature rules terms:

Elite Dwarves: A Ducal Bodyguard of 600, and two Hammers (strike forces) of 2,000 troops each. AD 8, AR 6, Hits 2, ML 14, MV 6.

Dwarven Axemen: The “troops of the line,” some 29,000 strong. AD 8, AR 7, Hits 1, ML 13, MV 6.

Dwarven Light Crossbowmen: The patrols and skirmishers of the army, some 16,000 strong. AD 6, AR 8, Hits 1, ML 12, MV 6, Range 6/12/18.

Dwarven Heavy Crossbowmen: Some 6,000 strong, these are the garrisons and ‘shock troops’ of the army. AD 8, AR 6, Hits 1, ML 13, MV 6, Range 8/16/24.

Dwarves: The militia and trainees; within the Realm, the army can typically muster up 4,000-5,000 of these, as needed. AD 6, AR 7, Hits 1, ML 12, MV 6.

Important Settlements of The Realm

Population: 44,000 (average)

Titular Ruler: The Deep Lords (council of elders)

The heavily-fortified Great City of the Dwarves is home to the greatest treasure vaults, most powerful arsenals, and the busiest, richest trading families of the Deep Realm. It consists of three great caverns, crowded with spired, turreted buildings like those found in surface cities, overhung by flying bridges, multi-levelled walkways, and elevators.

Clan seats in The Great City include Belindorn, Ghalkin, Gordriver, and Malthin.

Economy: The trading-center of the Deep Realm, Underhome is home to moneylenders, caravan-owners, armorers, weaponsmiths, jewelers, clothiers (who set dwarven fashions throughout the Realm), butchers and boar-breeders (whose herds are out in The Rift), and cheese-makers.

Daunting

Population: 12,000 (average)

Titular Ruler: Queen Haraura Shimmerhand (LG dwarven female, F13)

This prosperous, clean, well-built and rather quiet town is known for the carefully-tended trees and shrubs that rise in its cavern galleries. Its stone houses, similar to surface dwellings, crowd some caverns, rather than the usual ‘caves with ornate stone front porches’ dwarven homes

Daunting is the seat of the clans Crownshield and Gemscepter, and is thought of as a stable, sensible place.

Economy: Daunting is a prosperous center of stonemasons and farmers – mushroom farmers, fungi farmers, lichen farmers, snail farmers, and puff-lizard farmers. More than any other place, “Daunting feeds the Deep Realm.”

Incidentally, puff lizards are named for their speed in putting on meat as they devour wild lichens and cave insects; as succulent white meat, puff-lizard is highly prized on dwarven tables.

Firecaverns, The

Population: 39,000 (average)

Titular Ruler: High Princess Royal Rathauna Forgesilver (LN dwarven female, P9 of Berronar)

This long, narrow rift stretches for miles in the depths, linking many side caverns. Warmed by nearby lava-flows, the Firecaverns are lit by (and named for) a distinctive fungus that grows thickly on the rift’s walls and floor, and gives off a strong, steady amber hue. The inedible fungus feeds on the rock itself, on dwarven wastes, and on airborne moisture, spores, and insects. It is unlawful to destroy any of this ‘fire-fungus.’

The Firecaverns are home to many craftsmen and musicians who dwell in cave-homes opening off the side caverns. The clans Bladebite and Mastemyr have their seats here.

Economy: This rather easy-going, tolerant settlement has little heavy industry. It is home, however, to the forging of the many small, independently-sprung metal wheels used by dwarven deep-wagons and mining-carts. Lots of dwarves keep ‘second caves’ here, or retire here from surface life. It is perhaps the most welcoming community of the Deep Realm to outsiders and nondwarves, and therefore a place of wealth and quiet trade-dealings that affect commercial activities in the surface lands, and elsewhere in the Realm.

GLITTERDELVE

Population: 26,000 (average)

Titular Ruler: King Gnarlgar “Half-Gnome” Flamebeard (LN dwarven male F15)

This bustling, dirty cluster of caverns is a smoky, noisy, always-busy place of ringing hammers and hot forges. The richest metal-mines of the Deep Realm are here – iron, silver, copper, and lead are plentiful, and gold is also found.

Home to the clans Undurr and Zord, Glitterdelve is a wealthy but hard-nosed place, full of pushy dwarves. Scenes of many drunken fights between miners are not uncommon.

Economy: Glitterdelve is a wealthy, grasping place, its prosperity founded on the abundant, unusually-pure metallic ore-veins that meet here. Dwarven miners have enlarged the delve six times over in the last 400 years, and still the metal shows no sign of running out. Metal is mined, smelted, and forged into trade-bars, shields, and swords here. The work is not considered first rate: most dwarves prize its good metal, but rework what they get from Glitterdelve into their own blades and armor, with better temper and shaping. It's commonly held that the dwarves of Glitterdelve are always in a hurry-too much of a hurry to do the best work.

Hall of Echoes, The

Population: 9,000 (average)

Titular Ruler: War Princess Uranda Rythyn (LE dwarven female T12)

A place with a 'haunted' reputation. Once far more populous, the Hall of Echoes has been decimated by recurring monster attacks. It is home to the clan Talnoth. It is also, whispers say, home to evil human, half-elven, and even drow wizards. Its name comes from the eerie echoes caused by sounds made in the central cavern of "The Hall"

Economy: Miners and weaponsmiths call the Hall's many labyrinthine crawl-passages home. Their output is beautifully adorned and of the best quality. "Echo Blades" are eagerly sought by human warriors in the south.

Harlending

Population: 11,000 (average)

Titular Ruler: Deep King Hauroch "Swordbeard" Deathhammer (LN dwarven male F13)

A reclusive, suspicious community of smiths and potters, Harlending is home to the clan Breakadder. It faces constant attacks from duergar, drow, and less intelligent monsters of the Deeps. These come up nearby long, reaching mines and rifts that open into deeper, darker levels.

Harlending is a Serpent base, and often seems a city at war. Soldiers and armories are everywhere, and much of the everyday, serviceable-but-unspectacular output of dwarven arms, armor, and tools comes out of Harlending's ever-busy smelting-furnaces and forges.

Economy: The smiths and potters of Harlending live well but see little extra coin, and never cease to grumble about it. Harlending is therefore seen as "poor" by the rest of the Realm, but also as a "cutting-edge" frontier city where all must be heroes, and young dwarves at loose ends could prove themselves worthy warriors of the Folk.

Rimmator

Population: 10,500 (average)

Titular Ruler: High Duke Dunderlau Bloodaxe (LG dwarven male F14)

The fat, rollicking ruler of Rimmator sets the tone for his folk: they party and jest their lives away, delighting in jokes, pranks, and general merriment. Dwarves of Rimmator enjoy their work, are always eager for news from all over Faerun, and take a lively (betting) interest in surface politics and adventuring-careers. They are known for laying odds on the Zhen-tarim managing to control this or that place, or the Harpers foiling this or that Shadow Thief plot in Amn.

Home to the clan Sorndar, Rimmator welcomes all races of folk, and is famous for its hospitable inns and taverns.

Economy: Rimmator is an easy-going, prosperous town of traders, miners, and 'river-hunters' (fisher-dwarves; a dangerous trade thanks to water-monsters). Its mines have yielded only copper, tin, and iron, thus far.

Rimmator's major exports are its fiery red wine and thick, "rooty"-flavored brown ale. Both are prized by dwarves, but are acquired tastes for humans.

Sundasz

Population: 8,000 (average)

Titular Ruler: Axe Prince Ansal Thundermace (LN dwarven male F12)

This rather unfriendly, aloof city is home to clan Velm. It is a place of private jokes, cliques, and secrets, and, some say, trades with duergar and even drow on the sly. Certainly Sundasz dwarves seem to find odd magical items up their sleeves when trouble erupts.

Economy: Sundasz is home to a few tireless caravan-masters who ply a steady trade to and from Underhome. Most locals sell their wares to these enterprising Velm drovers, and stay at home, keeping to themselves. The smiths of Sundasz are known for their well-made tools, which are sold even in surface lands. The farmers of Sundasz grow fungi "greens" that are part of the staple diet of Realm dwarves (but taste a little nutty and salty to most human palates). The community is merely well-to-do, except for the hints of great wealth that must have bought its magic. There is a mystery about Sundasz that certain Folk are coming to believe needs investigating. Perhaps a few hired (and expendable) adventurers could serve...

Thuulurn

Population: 5,600

Titular Ruler: First Hammer of Moradin Thungalos Truetemper (LG dwarven male P10)

This is a small, fortified monastic enclave of priests dedicated to Moradin. Keeping aloof from most Gold Dwarves, they work continuously to influence events in the Deeps and surface lands, to better the lot of all dwarves.

They have been known to hire or make deals with adventurers of all races to carry out their aims. A common payment for healing badly-beaten adventurers, or raising one or more slain party members, is to undertake a mission. Typical missions include a strike against the duergar, freeing dwarves from drow slavery in the Depths Below, slaying an aboleth at a certain underground lake, or finding and slaying the latest cloaker overlord with designs on the Deep Realm.

Economy: Thuulurn is self-sufficient. What it lacks, its priests go out and get, or worshippers bring from elsewhere. Dwarven offerings have made the temple-city very rich, but wealth is seen only as a means to bringing about the Soul Forger's ends.

Deepspawn are infamous horrors who give birth to many other types of monsters, so a single Deepspawn can make a large area perilous to even alert, well-armed adventurers.

Deepspawn look like large, rubbery spheres of mottled grey and brown. Six arms project from their bodies; three are tentacle-arms, and three are jaw-arms, ending in many-toothed mouths. A Deepspawn also has over forty long, retractable, flexible eyestalks (only extending three or four at a time, well away from harm).

Combat: When found, Deepspawn are usually half-buried in a pile of slippery, shifting coins and other treasure. This may conceal their arms, so that tentacles and mouths erupting from the treasure may seem at first to be the attacks of separate creatures. The treasure may hamper opponents and even shield the Deepspawn from some damage (as determined by the DM).

A Deepspawn attacks by casting hold spells at intruders, casting such spells once every three rounds. Victims under a hold spell are grasped by tentacle-arms and constricted, as other tentacles fight off other intruders by wielding weapons (including any magical items usable by fighters accumulated from earlier victims). Deepspawn love to engage prey with weapons, and then bite them from behind with a jaw-arm.

A tentacle-arm can slap for 1d4 + 1 points of damage, grasp items or beings and move them about (with 17 Strength), wield delicate keys or weapons, or constrict.

Constriction requires a successful attack roll (automatic if the victim is under a hold spell), and does 1d4 points of damage, plus 1d4 + 1 points per round thereafter. In any round in which a being gets free, it takes only one point of constriction damage. Constricted victims can be swung about by the Deepspawn as bludgeons (doing others struck 1d2 damage, ruining spellcasting, and forcing saving throws for fragile carried items). This causes the constricted being no extra damage unless driven onto points or blades (determine damage on a case-by-case basis).

Victims may only escape constriction by severing the tentacle-arm or tearing free. Tentacle-arms let go if severed. Each arm has 2 HD; severing occurs if damage equal to half a tentacle-arm's hit points is dealt in a concentrated area by edged or pointed weapons. To tear free, roll a d20 for both victim and Deepspawn on each round of constriction, adding their respective strengths (17 for the Deepspawn). If the victim has the higher total, it wins its freedom.

Deepspawn can also cast ESP and water breathing at will, and may employ a heal spell (self only), once a day. If a Deepspawn's life is threatened, it hurls caches of seized weapons as missiles, unleashes any magical items it has, and tries to escape by a planned route. Deepspawn seem immune to all known venoms (perhaps because they are able to create many poisons in their offspring), and regenerate lost arms and stalks, though slowly, healing 2 hp/day.

Habitat/Society: Deepspawn prefer to let their offspring fight for them, lairing in caverns, dungeons, or ruins amply protected by traps and guardian monsters (their 'spawn'). If these defenses are penetrated, the Deepspawn is usually found in a readily-defended room or area, always with at least one or more escape routes.

Deepspawn are native to the Deeps, and have successfully resisted the attempts of dwarves, drow, duergar, cloaklers, illithids, and aboleth to exterminate them. Deepspawn seldom lair within 30 miles of each other, but individuals may be much closer together underground (e.g. on different levels).

Ecology: Deepspawn eat anything organic, but prefer fresh meat. By some as-yet-unexplained natural means, a Deepspawn can 'grow' and give birth to any creature native to the Prime Material Plane it has ever devoured (but not undead or other duo-dimensional creatures). The 'spawn' have the natural attacks, including spell-like powers, alignment, and intelligence of their forebears, but class abilities and other learned skills are not gained. A spawn 'grows' in 1d4 days (varying with size and complexity) in a Deepspawn, which must ingest meat, vegetable matter, and water or blood to fuel the birthing. The Deepspawn then splits open to emit a fully-active spawn. Spawn are never hostile towards their parent, and cannot be made to attack them, even by magical means. Spawn can attack or defend themselves within one round of emerging. At the DM's option, they may use certain powers or abilities clumsily for a few rounds.

THE LOST KINGDOMS

In the northlands of Faerun, humans with little interest in dwarves, who have seldom even seen one, have heard about the Lost Kingdoms.

In taverns and inns, on nights around crackling fires when the hour is late and the tankards seem to leak constantly, many mouths down the years have told and retold the tales of the slow eradication of the once-proud dwarven kingdoms of the north, fallen before tireless orc hordes, the depredations of magic-using men, and worse.

All that is left today are crumbling ruins, the names and tales, and the whispers of still-waiting treasure. The tales tell of shining achievements, bright treasure, and fell curses—the tales can go on for several straight nights, if travelers are snowed in together at an isolated inn or hold.

The Lost Lands

A survey of what is known and what remains today of the vanished northern realms of the dwarves is helpful to adventurers seeking treasure, and to all who want to learn something of the ‘feel’ of things dwarvish. Landmarks that remain are listed under the kingdoms that they were once part of. If this seems a lot of space to spend on yesterdays, bear in mind that the glorious past of the dwarves is the key to the surviving Stout Folk of today.

Access to maps of the Realms will be helpful in understanding just what dwarven lands lay where. Maps of particular importance are TM4 The City of Waterdeep Trail Map and the maps in FR5 The Savage Frontier and FR9 The Bloodstone Lands. Those without maps can still follow the text just as most travelers in the Realms, who may only have glimpsed a map from afar in a temple, or clutched in an officer’s gauntlet. Others must listen in a tavern, learning borders from landmark to landmark.

Here, then, is a traveler’s introduction to The Lost Kingdoms.

Ammarindar

This weak dwarven realm was centered in the Greypeak Mountains, and flourished when the human land of Netheril was strong, supplying many needed metals to that land. Much of dwarven knowledge and techniques of enchanting items and combating hostile magic date from observations and the teachings of Netherese sorcerers at this time.

Ammarindar’s greatest rulers were haughty King Azkuldar and the much later King Olaurin, a great warrior. Also, Queen Helmma, who skillfully saved most of her subjects and saw them safe to southern deeps as her realm crumbled about her, ruled this land.

Ammarindar fell when Ascalhorn became Hellgate Keep, and evil creatures overran the surface lands and the underways all down the valley of the Delimbiyr. Most of its folk escaped to Oghrann, only to be scattered when that realm fell soon after. Many died in the savage fighting, especially the valiant rearguard led by Queen Helmma, who perished to the last dwarf, their queen among them. They bought with their lives time for the less warlike of their people to flee south from raiding orcs in the Vale of Naurogloth, known today as Bleached Bones Pass.

Ammarindar was abandoned in such haste that cartloads of treasure were left behind. Among the riches were coins and gems, metal-work of all sorts, and armor and weaponry of beauty and the highest quality. Cartloads of it were soon brought to Hellgate Keep.

Human scavengers brought more out via Loudwater in the years after the kingdom’s fall. However, more is thought to lie, yet undiscovered, in caverns and caches all over the Greypeak Mountains (now a dangerous region of roaming monsters, desperate outlaws, and Hellgate Keep patrols).

In particular, the dwarves of Ammarindar were known for their everbright adamantine armor. They fashioned suits of full plate worked into horns, ridges, barbs, and crests of a shining blue-silver hue. The undead riders of Hellgate Keep are known to wear pieces of some of this armor, when they hunt humans for sport around the Shining Falls. However, most of this armor has gone missing, not in the hands of dwarves, nor of any other known plunderers of fallen Ammarindar since. Several fortunes in adamantine must still lie waiting to be found. The greedy are warned that the adventuring companies of the Black Band, the Company of the Horse, and the Company of the Scaled Tail have all perished in the search for Ammarindar’s lost riches.

The Harpers have sent a general warning to adventurers of the North. It states that the Royal Caverns of Splendarmornn have been stripped of all treasure, probably by those of Hellgate Keep, and are now home to undead and fell creatures of even greater evil.

The borders of Ammarindar were always less clear than those of more northerly and westerly dwarven realms, but at its height, the Throne of Ammarindar’s rule extended over much of the upper Delimbiyr valley. The King’s seat was at Splendarmornn, the Shining Mountain, westernmost peak of the pair that stands west of the Shining Falls.

The borders of the realm were the tree’s edge all along the High Forest (then part of the elven realm of Eaerlann) south to Dahaurock, a hook-shaped bare rock crag just upriver of present-day Loudwater. From there, the border crossed the river and followed the present-day trade road from Loudwater to Llorck, turning south at the eastern edge of what is now known as South Wood, to take in the mountains.

Naurogloth (Bleached Bones Pass) then marked the southern edge of the realm, which took in all the Greypeak Mountains, east almost to Dekanter, and then north as far as Horindon Lhar (High Gap). The realm then took in the eastern bank of the Delimbiyr (and the lands up to the mountains, to the east) as far south as the confluence of the Delimbiyr and the Heartsblood, a place known as Karscrag to the dwarves. There of old, two leaping stone bridges spanned the Delimbiyr, and the realm of the dwarves crossed the river with them, to command the western shore as far as tree’s edge, past the Shining Mountain to Dahaurock.

The Sign of the Realm of Ammarindar of old was a side-on, three-horned crown, points uppermost, a four-pointed star floating above each point of the crown. This can be found carved on some trails high in the Greypeak Mountains, and in tunnel-passages in the dark hearts of those mountains, but the dwarves of Ammarindar seem not to have marked their borders with it, or with anything else.

Besilmer

This dwarven realm's name and history is forgotten even by most dwarves, although two of its proudest works remain as landmarks known throughout the Sword Coast North today: the Stone Bridge and the Halls of the Hunting Axe.

Besilmer was founded almost as long ago as Gharraghaur, by dwarves under Torhild Flametongue. Torhild and his followers believed that the dwarves would always be a beleaguered race, so long as they mined in the mountains and fought the other creatures who dwelt there, most notably giants and orcs.

The future of the dwarves, Torhild believed, lay in learning to farm, reshaping the downlands, not the mountains, to form beautiful, pastoral, stable communities, living in peace with neighboring men and elves. In his vision, they would use the native innovations and craft-of-hands of dwarves to prosper as inventors, builders, and repairers.

Accordingly, Torhild founded his realm in the troll-infested hills of the fertile Dessarin valley, where no elf or other civilized folk laid claim, and set to work. The trolls were eradicated, though they continued to raid, each year, from the Evermoors to the north. Irrigation was begun, and livestock herds accumulated and bred.

Unfortunately, the unfortified realm made a tempting target to all hungry predators of the north, from wolves in winter to giants in summer. The land also suffered from being a dream held most strongly by one dwarf, Torhild the Far-Sighted. When he fell, slaying a hill giant in single combat at the Stone Bridge, the realm soon crumbled and was overrun. Its farm-buildings were plundered and burned, its two great stone structures, the Bridge and the Halls, battered and abandoned. Torhild's people fled south, to join in another realm doomed to fail: the Fallen Kingdom. Dwarves fleeing from Delzoun (see below) occupied the Halls for 40 winters more, but succumbed to harsh winters, wolves, and orcs in the end.

Persistent rumors tell of great riches buried hastily by the fleeing dwarves, and of magical treasures hidden somewhere beneath the earth near or under the Halls, but no such treasure has yet been found. Besilmer is today forgotten, although its sign, a wheel over a plow, can be found on rocks at Ironford and on the pylons of the Stone Bridge, as well as here and there around the Sember Hills (the modern name for the hills bisected by the Dessarin, which lie just south of the Stone Bridge).

Its borders extended from tree's edge of the Westwood, east to Ironford, and from there due east to the edge of the High Forest. At that time, the High Forest extended further westwards than it does today. From there its borders went north along that tree's edge to the short-lived lumbering town of Caddarak, now marked only by the stone hall of its lord, Darthurn, called by humans the Hall of Four Ghosts.

From there, the realm's borders ran due west, skirting the hills that lie south of present-day Yartar, to Tsordvuudd (known today as Kryptgarden Forest).

The Stone Bridge: This massive stone arch spans the River Dessarin without ceremony or accompanying settlement, rising lonely and weathered in the midst of rolling grasslands without a road or building to be seen as far as the eye can scan.

Built long ago to link the two halves of Besilmer, it was fashioned to span the broadest imaginable spring flood of the Dessarin. It rises in a great arc, without supporting pillars, some two miles in length. It reaches a height of some 400 hundred feet above the waters of the Dessarin.

The dwarves explain the awesome size and continued survival of the Bridge to the fact that it is also a temple to Moradin. Lawful good dwarves still make pilgrimages to the Bridge, said to be one of the Soul Forger's favorite spots on Faerun. On at least one famous occasion, the god appeared on the Bridge to aid dwarves in need.

It occurred in the waning days of the Ironstar clan. Driven out of their holds by orcs, the pitifully few surviving dwarves fled south from their kingdom, down the west bank of the Dessarin, harried by trolls and orcs. They were led by their King, Daurvos Frostbeard, an old and wounded warrior-lord who had lost his sons in the savage fighting when Ironstar Mountain was taken by the orcs.

Daurvos continually led the young dwarven youths, his great-grandchildren among them, in rearguard skirmishes to protect his people. His daughter Tammas Forkbeard led the dwarven wives and infants on to the south.

On the Stone Bridge Daurvos fell to orcbldes, and was ridden over as the orcs routed his shocked companions and swept south after his kin. After they had gone, the mortally-wounded King crawled to the very top of the Bridge, and cried aloud to Moradin to protect the Ironstar people out of his mercy, as there were none now left in the Realms to do so. And with that plea the old King fell from the Bridge, dead, into the waters below.

There was a flash of red light, and a clang as of metal struck, that smote the ears and reverberated like the tolling of a great bell for some minutes. Looking back, orcs and fleeing dwarves alike saw a great dwarflike figure, fully 20 feet high, standing upon the height of the arch outlined in red flames.

The dwarf upon the bridge had eyes like leaping red flames and a sweeping beard, and bore a red-glowing hammer in one bare hand. He swung the hammer in a circle above his head, faster and faster, and then hurled himself down from the Bridge like a meteor, to land hissing in the water below.

There his light faded, and he rose from the waters bearing the limp body of Daurvos like a doll in one hand. Cradling it carefully against him, the armored dwarf wept, silent tears streaming down his face, and as he wept, he ran towards the orcs. Muttering in fear, they turned to meet him as one, and he charged into their midst without a word.

At that, Tammas Forkbeard rallied her people to fight, and led a charge back at the band of orcs, to aid the newcomer. But even as she reached them, she saw that the lone dwarf among them was smiting right and left tirelessly, ignoring the blades of the orcs, and they were falling like rain around him. Soon the last of them fell at the feet of Tammias, from a blow of that awful hammer.

As Tammias looked at the dwarf, the sign of a hammer and anvil appeared in outlines of fire upon the breastplate of his armor, and she knelt in the midst of her thanks, recognizing that this was indeed Moradin.

But the Soul Forger merely held over her his hammer, sternly pointing south. She scrambled up, and led her people on. And all that day, as orcs rode after them, Moradin strode at their back. The dwarf who towered 20 feet tall smote down all who threatened the last of the Ironstars, slaying orcs as a farmer threshes wheat, until no more came, and the dwarves came to Ironford at sunset, and could go no further.

Then a flash and clangor came once more, and the survivors of the Ironstar clan were alone again. On the turf where the god had stood they found the hammer and crown of Daurvos, but his body was gone. It was this crown that the first of the dwarven Kings of the Fallen Kingdom wore, and it was to the Fallen Kingdom that the last of the Ironstars went.

Dwarves revere the Bridge for this reason, and will not suffer anyone to settle near it nor control who may cross it. The bridge is of weathered granite, so skillfully fitted that it seems almost of one piece, and is six paces broad. It has no parapet or railing on either side.

The Halls of the Hunting Axe: The rubble-strewn Halls of today rise out of thick brush that cloaks the moat and gardens that surround the stone walls of this sprawling building. Roofless and windowless, the arched walls of the Halls reach into the sky like dead fingers, pillars here and there rising out of the brush.

Colored glass can be found amid the rubble, suggesting that the huge arched windows piercing the walls of the labyrinthine Halls were once mosaics of colored light, like the rich temples of Waterdeep and more southerly lands. Today this glass is gathered and sold by peddlers, and is popular in the north for use in making bottles.

The Halls themselves are said to be stripped of any valuables reachable without digging. Tons of stone have collapsed atop the cellars in several places, and fantastic wealth may lie buried below. Monsters—particularly leucrotta and doppelgangers—haunt the ruins, and make searches perilous indeed. These inhabitants both seem to prefer to attack by night.

The Hall of Four Ghosts: The Hall is a high, slate-roofed, leaking structure with a beautiful vaulted ceiling, and several rail-less spiral stone stairs ascending to galleries and hanging apartments. It is haunted by the ghosts of four lovers (two dwarves, an elf, and a human), whose mounting mistrust of each other led to murder. It is known as The Hall of Four Ghosts today, the presence of the dwarven lumbering town forgotten.

From the vast storage cellars of the Hall, tunnels run eastwards beneath the High Forest, under lands then settled by elves, to interior areas inhabited then only by monsters and a few dryads and korred.

The dwarves built several fortress-holds to retreat to, for protection if attacked while working in the woods. Most are lost and overgrown, but those known to men include the Stronghold of the Nine and Hammer Hall.

Dareth

This vanished realm of the dwarves lay north of Rashemen, in the mountains that divide the Great Glacier from the Great Ice Sea. Settled by dwarves who first came to the Bloodstone Lands from the south (from worked-out, individual clan holds in the mountains south and west of Unther and Mulhorand), and reinforced by later arrivals who fled from eastern Delzoun, Dareth was a briefly prosperous land.

Dareth was founded almost 4,000 summers ago as a realm of linked caverns under the rule of its first King, Orloebar Snowbeard, who renounced his clan membership to found the ruling house of Dareth. The mountains held few gems, but rich veins of metal-bearing ores, and the forges of the dwarves worked tirelessly.

Men came to what is now Hoarbridge to trade with the dwarves of Dareth, "The Ice Kingdom." The dwarves tunnelled ever further into the mountains, and even cut into the depths of the Great Glacier, following rich ore-veins.

One spring, no dwarves came to trade with the men—without word or explanation. The Stout Folk simply "came no more." Their work, mainly armor and weaponry, was still avidly bought and sold around the lawless, fledgling human settlements in the area, and word of their sudden silence was slow to get around.

When Delzoun began to crumble, dwarves who lived and mined the easternmost reaches found themselves cut off from their brethren by the fall of Felbarr. Some fled south down the De-sertsedge, but others made a titanic trek across frozen Anauroch to the Moonsea North, and thence through the Bloodstone Lands to reach the Mountains of Dareth.

They soon learned why little had recently been heard of the dwarves from the Inner Sea South who'd first founded the kingdom. A realm of white dragons (and bestial servant creatures) was located at the northern end of the mountains. Once the dwarves had broken through into their caverns, brutal war had begun. In the end, the dwarves of Dareth had been driven into a few deep caverns.

The Mountains of Dareth had become "the Peaks of Cold Death" to human traders, who sought the besieged dwarves in vain, but found white dragons on the wing all too often.

The dwarves from Delzoun rescued the surviving folk of Dareth with a vicious attack upon the dragons' besieging servant creatures. The dwarves fled to a lone mountain that stood apart from the rest, which they named Mount Sundabar in honor of a city in the Northkingdom that they'd left behind. There they founded a new citadel, electing as King one Embryn Shattered-shield, who left his clan to take the name of Dareth.

The white dragons soon attacked Mount Sundabar, employing magical items of great force and unknown, elder origin. In the end, the Mountain was shattered, the dwarven hold laid waste. The dwarves fought on, however, slaying dragons whenever they could reach them. They became skulking attackers who swarmed all over the Mountains of Dareth, until no dragon was safe in its lair, and the bones of both dwarves and dragons littered the mountain range.

In the end, the dwarves and dragons destroyed each other, in a final confrontation on the broad mountaintop now known as Heroes' Height. This opened the way for humans to hunt and cut lumber in the rich lands that became Armridge and Sossal. The caverns of Dareth were explored and plundered of all valuables left by the dwarves, but recurring monster attacks made the mines too dangerous to work. And so they remain today, home to dangerous creatures who feed on the occasional humans or dwarves desperate or reckless enough to try mining the riches of lost Dareth again.

Dareth's borders lay within the mountain range named for it, plus Mount Sundabar, Heroes' Height, and the high valleys between.

The Sign of the Realm, almost unknown today, was a row of three peaks with a stone hammer, head to the right, horizontal above them.

Delzoun

The famous Northkingdom of the dwarves, named for its heroic founder, Delzoun is only a shining memory today. Once it stretched from the Ice Mountains in the Utter North to the Nether Mountains in the south. It was bordered on the east by the Narrow Sea (now vanished; the Great Desert lies there today), and on the west by Silver Moon Pass (just east of present-day Silvermoon) and the Dharnvudd (the Moonwood). The world was 2,000 years younger then.

Delzoun was a rich and proud land, perhaps the pinnacle of dwarven power. Its smiths crafted intricate and beautiful mechanisms to ease every task, the great dwarven families grew rich and famous, dabbling in poetry and even fashion, and gold shone everywhere about the persons and homes of the dwarves of Delzoun. The dwarves ranged across the North, building holds for themselves and (for hire) for men, such as recently rediscovered Gauntulgrym. Their work endures still. They were a happy and hearty people, but that is all gone now.

Today, Delzoun is largely wilderlands, fought over by dwarven patrols and orc raiders. Citadel Adbar guards the richest mines still known to the Longbeards (the dwarven elders of Adbar), and the orcs harry and menace dwarves and men alike on all sides. The ancient trade-road of fitted stone blocks, built by King Adbarruns so long ago, still runs from the Citadel to the Fork. There it splits, running east and west.

One road runs east to ruined Ascore, once a port on the Narrow Sea. It is still rumored to contain treasure, and some fell evil that keeps even orcs away from it. Its stone towers are a landmark for adventurers doing "The Long Run" up or down the edge of Anauroch, seeking to avoid the worst predators (human and otherwise) that infest the lawless eastern Sword Coast Northlands.

The other road runs west to Sundabar, now a city of men. The Fork itself was once marked by the grand mansion of the dwarven hero Gaurin, but today every stone of that place is gone, and the land hides its cellar-caverns, so that the roads remain. They simply meet, without marker or sign of any habitation, in the wilderness.

The old western Delzounian hold of Felbarr is now held by orcs, and known as "The Citadel of Many Arrows," and the central dwarven villages of Osstkar and Meruindelve have utterly vanished, even their locations known only to a few of the oldest Longbeards. Save for many forgotten dwarven tombs tunnelled into the mountains all about, nothing else remains of the once-mighty Northkingdom.

The Sign of the Realm was a double-headed, horizontal hammer, in a triangle of three cut, gleaming gems. It can be found on mutilated way-markers here and there within the old borders of the land. No human explorers have yet found a marker that someone-probably an orc, in most cases-hasn't pried the gems out of.

CITADEL ADBAR

This mighty fortress is named for the ancient dwarven king Adbar (actually "Adbarruns" in full, though only dwarves and sages know that), who built it over 1,000 years ago when the lands about were Delzoun, the Northkingdom of the dwarves.

Quarried of granite, the Citadel can house up to 60,000 dwarves in comfort; men will find its defensive tunnels and wall-ways too dark and too cramped. Beneath its towers lie miles upon miles of linked rooms, on many levels: the storehouses and living quarters of Adbarrim.

The Citadel is ruled today by King Harbromm, whose ceaseless patrols keep the nearby mines and this last large hold of the dwarves in the North from being overrun by the everpresent, numberless orcs. Perhaps another 2,000 dwarves in the mines and mountainside holds submit to his rule, and their numbers dwindle every year (births simply do not keep pace with battle losses).

Citadel Adbar still produces the finest metals in the North, shipping out axe- and pick-heads, 'forge-bars' of unworked metal, and sword-blades by caravan to Sundabar. Orc attacks on the dwarven miners and the caravans have cut down on the Citadel's output in recent years, raising market prices for its top-quality goods throughout Faerun.

The banner of Citadel Adbar bears the Forge-Mark of the King in red upon a silver field: an upright single-bladed hand-axe enclosed by a circle of flames.

The Fallen Kingdom

This now-vanished realm was a short-lived effort to stem the demi-human decline in the North by uniting elves and dwarves and humans in a commonly-held land. The kingdom was smashed by the repeated attacks of vast orc hordes, although the slaughter done to the orcs drove them back north for generations.

The Fallen Kingdom had many names; the 'real one' has been lost with the passage of time, mixed up with the names of the Kingdom's various districts (such as Ardeep, Delimbiyran, and Thaltekhth). The term 'Fallen Kingdom' today refers to the rolling wilderlands due east of Waterdeep, although this was only the north-western end of the long-ago united realm.

When founded (at the famous Council of Axe and Arrow in The Laughing Hollow), the Kingdom had Three Kings at once: an elven King, Ruardh Lightshiver; a dwarven King, Torghatar blood of Bharauin; and a human King, Javilarhh "the Dark" Snowsword. It also had two Dukes, a gnome and a halfling: Ulbrent Handstone and Corcytar Huntinghorn, respectively.

All three of the original Kings perished in battle, as did two elven successors. Finally, at the collapse, the dwarven replacement, Oskilar son of Fauril died, as well. The two Dukes survived the collapse of the kingdom, and led their peoples in battle in the area for many more years.

The Fallen Kingdom collapsed when most of the elves gave up the endless warring (which sickened them), and took ship westwards to the realm established ages before by the most farsighted of the elves, Evermeet. There were too few dwarves left to continue open warfare with the endless orcs; they retreated to more southerly holds, or to human cities.

The humans had grown ever more numerous over time. They had outgrown, in fact, any need for an alliance with other peoples. When their demi-human partners left, the humans continued to hold the land, inviting displaced halflings from the Calishite lands to settle (particularly in the lands about Secomber), and bolster the weakened strength of commerce and settled civilization in the area.

In this, the humans of Waterdeep were aided by a small group of moon elves, who lingered on for another age in Ardeepforest. These elves believed in working with humans—particularly adventurers—to respect and guard the land together. It is thought that the Harpers began under their guidance.

The borders of the Fallen Kingdom, when it was first formed, are known to have been as follows: from Mount Helimbrar at the sea northeast to what is now Ironford, an area known of old as Rarg's Hold, due to an old bandit-keep located there, one of the first human habitations in the Sword Coast North. From there the border ran southeast to the Dark Hills, the stony, broken hills that lie between Waterdeep and Secomber, and to Secomber, where the riders of the Kingdom commanded the lands perhaps a day's ride around the fledgling settlement. From there, the Kingdom's borders followed the southernmost tributary of the Delimbiyr, the Ulbanlur (Highmoorflow), south and east along the edge of the High Moor, up to Evendusk Lake (The Mirror of the Moor, the lake due south of South Wood). The border then ran southwards with the edge of the Moor, taking in the Serpent Hills before turning back north around the western edge of the Moor, which it followed, along a string of now-vanished human castles, north to about where the Way Inn now stands. There it turned westwards to the sea, to the Seatower of Ilinyth.

Before this fortress was blasted to rubble by fell magic, it served as a watchtower seawards, and as a base for mounted patrols defending the Kingdom against troll and bugbear attacks in the area. It also allowed elves to quietly take ship there by night, flying by magical means down the rugged cliff to board vessels that then slipped away towards Evermeet. It is thought that over 7,000 elves slipped away from the faltering Kingdom before its fall in this way, leaving the bloodshed and tumult of Faerun behind.

There is one old legend attached to the Kingdom that still seems active today: the tale of the Ghost Dwarves. The ghosts of its first dwarven king and his bodyguard are said to still roam the lands. They were ambushed and slain by hired duergar in the heart of the kingdom while on their way to answer a (false) call for aid. The dwarves are said to still ride to aid those in need near the River Dessarin, from its mouth as far north as Ironford.

The Ghost Dwarves appear as shining white translucent figures in plate armor, on horseback and armed with great two-handed war axes as long as spears. They strike silently but viciously at orc-kin and other evil creatures only, and the bite of their phantom weapons visits the effects of magical fear and repulsion on their targets. Many travelers swear that the Ghost Dwarves have come to their aid, when they were attacked by ghouls, brigands, or goblin-kin raiders near the Dessarin.

The Sign of the Realm was a circle, usually inlaid with white quartz or marble chips, around three side-on spired crowns. It can still be found on toppled, overgrown way-markers around the edges of the High Moor, but only by those who seek them out; bugbears and goblin-kin raiders seem to hate the Sign, and always tear down markers that bear it.

The House of Stone: East of Ardeepforest, near Waterdeep in the Sword Coast midlands, rises a huge square tower. It has come to be known as 'The House of Stone' after an old (human) children's rhyme:

*An elf calls the deepest wood his own
A human everywhere may roam
But a dwarf just wants a house of stone.*

The fortress was built a thousand years ago by dwarves under Turgo Ironfist, a huge citadel to help defend the shared human, dwarven, and elven kingdom against attacking tribes of orcs, hobgoblins, bugbears, and trolls. The dwarves excavated huge, many-levelled storage granaries out of the rock, and over them built a fortress cunningly crafted of fitted stone.

In old tales, the House of Stone is said to have many hidden doors, sliding rooms, and chambers that rise or fall in shafts like buckets in a well. It also is said to have dangerous traps designed to capture intruders. Rumors persist of rich treasures, such as entire rooms full of gleaming gold coins, and closets crammed with gems mined by dwarves who were dust long ago, all over the north when the mountains were still young. Most importantly, an armory for the defense of the kingdom is said to have been collected here, including weapons of powerful magic crafted by the elves and by the mighty smiths of the dwarves of long ago.

Until they vanished recently (presumably gone to Evermeet), the moon elves of Ardeepforest guarded the House of Stone closely, letting no one near it. Several adventuring groups have set out from Waterdeep to explore it in the last three summers, but none have yet returned.

The famous bard Mintiper Moonsilver was allowed to see the House of Stone some years ago by Eroan, archmage of the elves of Ardeepforest. He reported to the Lords of Waterdeep that its gates were open.

"A hill giant had forced them apart some months before my visit," he said, "for its huge corpse hung just beyond, impaled on a massive, ram-like stone claw the length of a warship that had sprung out into the space beyond the doors. The elves just smiled when I asked if the place was full of such traps, and said it was best to assume so from safely without its walls."

It seems unlikely that later visitors will bear Mintiper's report in mind; even now, talk in Waterdeep holds that several bands of adventurers are equipping themselves in the city for assaults on the citadel's fabled defenses, despite others' recent failures.

Illefarn Mountain: East and north of Daggerford on the Sword Coast, up the river Delimbiyr, stands Illefarn Mountain.

Once it was an important metal-mine and stone quarry for the dwarves of the Fallen Kingdom. It was the seat of King Devin in those long-ago days, but is presently a dangerous place.

Gharraghaur

This small but prosperous dwarven land was named for its principal city, which stood where Mirabar is now. It in turn was named for its founder, a mighty dwarven warrior.

Enriched by the most accessible of the rich mines developed by the dwarves, this dwarven realm was centered around the Tanlur (the dwarven name for the River Mirar), and ruled by the Royal House of the Helm, a now-extinct dwarven family whose greatest kings were Anarok (whose name is echoed in Anauroch; it is not known if the two names have any connection) and his son Relavir. Their seat was the Iron Tower in the center of Gharraghaur, which has utterly vanished. Its great storage-caverns, however, still serve as the granaries and safe-caverns of rich Mirabar.

Gharraghaur was the first of the great dwarven kingdoms to fall to orc attacks; its people were too busy mining to arm themselves in numbers enough to withstand the orcs before it was too late.

At its height, the borders of this realm were as follows (using the old dwarven names wherever possible): east from the sea at Lyntara, a blue-veined, uninhabited rocky headland north of present-day Port Llast, to Glaurimm, the lofty volcanic peak known today as Mount Hotenow. Thence east down the Nethlur (Neverwinter River) to Nethultok (its forks), and from there northeast to Anaurdahyn, now known as Twilight Tor, the northernmost hill of the range of knolls that ends in the south at Berun's Hill. From there, the border ran east to the meeting of Shardylnur (Shining Creek) and Gaurlynlur (the Goblintide River). North from there, the land of Gharraghaur continued up the western bank of Shardylnur, into the depths of Vurykvudd (the Lurkwood), tending northwest to the isolated drumlins of Marak's Tor and Havyltor, whose bare rock heights rise out of the green depths of the great wood. From there, the border ran north to the open Vale of Khedrun, named for the legendary dwarven hero whose warriors first secured a foothold on the surface of the Northlands for the dwarves. The valley runs northeast to a high meadow, Khedvallahir, deep in the mountains of Barakmornolor. Barakmornolor, incidentally, means the Spine of the World, a translation preserved as the formal modern-day human name for the mighty range, also known colloquially as "The Wall." The realm encompassed it and the many mines reached by it.

These were the earliest of the rich dwarven mines of the Sword Coast North. Many, particularly in the upper Vale, are now worked out or strongly held by orcs and worse. However, those to the west, along the Wall, provide much of the riches of Mirabar to this very day. A summer seldom passes without another find being made, somewhere along the western half of the Wall. All races in the north generally refer to the Wall as being divided into eastern and western halves by the Mirar, and the Vale that flanks it. The borders of Gharraghaur followed the Wall west, claiming on average two peaks northwards from the edge in all places, until the border reached Velaunlur (Blackraven River).

The Ice Lakes region served of old, as they do now, as mating and nesting grounds for many beasts. They were also home to many kobolds then. The little terrors, coupled with the many monsters, made the region too dangerous for busy dwarven miners interested in gems and metal, not in downing tools every third breath or so to fight off some new attacker.

Gharraghaur's borders accordingly followed the eastern bank of the Velaunlur down to the Tanlur, and the south bank of that river down to the sea. Gharraghaur had no port, trading instead with Haunghdannar to the south, and underland with more southerly realms.

It did have two large surface fortresses. The first were the keeps of Orglaunt, which stood where the Blackraven joins the Mirar, in the northeastern angle of the confluence. The other was Halanaskarr, which stood just south of the Lurkwood, at the headwaters of Shining Creek. Both have been robbed of their stones by later builders, and are marked now only by overgrown, water-filled cellars carved out of solid bedrock.

The few adventurers who have probed these watery ruins and lived to tell of it report that the dwarves may have forgotten to leave any treasure behind, but more evil creatures have found the flooded depths to make admirable lairs.

The Sign of the Realm can be seen on markers that still flank the Mirar trade-road: four vertical, diamond-shaped gems, in a triangle with the largest gem in its center.

Haunghdannar

This small and little-known realm was centered on the mountains east of Leilon, and home to the only known dwarven seafarers.

The sea is thought to have driven the dwarves of Haunghdannar mad; the realm rapidly dwindled, as ship after ship that put out did not return, except for small fishing-boats that never left the sight of land. The land was overrun by bugbears, trolls, ogres, and orcs.

The remnants of the Haungh Dwarves are thought to be the Madbeards of today (see the chapter Current Clack). The stone keeps of the realm are long gone, their stones used by later humans to build cruder, lesser houses. The names of the three most important keeps survive: Alogh, Mnerim, and Olphrintar. The names of all of the land's kings, however, have been forgotten.

Haunghdannar's port now lies beneath the sea, off Leilon; it was known as Barhindhun. Some intrepid adventurers have searched the depths for it, but if any found it and survived, they've made no sound about it in the Northlands.

The remnant of the realm most important to the folk of today is Southkrypt, an underground hold that once defended the eastern border of the realm. The dwarves of Haunghdannar are thought to have come from some larger, wealthier kingdom, for they used a vast array of magical weapons in fighting off the orcs, bugbears, leucrotta and trolls numerous in the region. Legend whispers that Southkrypt still contains many of these magical weapons—adventurers add that it is also home to many fearsome creatures that have taken up residence in recent times.

Haunghdannar's borders are somewhat uncertain; it is thought that the dwarves never marked or fortified them. Elminster believes that they curved in an egg-shaped arc inward from the sea just south of Leilon, inland to take in the mountains in which Southkrypt can be found, known as the Maruutdin to the dwarves. From here the border turned sharply west at the end of the mountains, though excluding the troll-infested hills that continue northwards, to seek the sea again, south of Neverwinter Wood.

The Sign of the Realm is found on the doors of Southkrypt, and can be found by the observant on some of the stones used by men to build Leilon's walls: it is a seven-pointed star, over a fish facing to the left, floating above a mountain peak.

Ironstar

This short-lived realm grew around the holds of only one clan—the Ironstar clan. They became very rich from their delvings, and mastered the art of instilling magic in items better than any previous dwarven smiths.

The Ironstar Masters were famous in their day, as they worked under Ironstar Mountain and its sister peaks of Northlook and Wyrmtongue. Together these are the three most southerly peaks of the range of mountains north of the River Surbrin, just above its confluence with the Rauvin. It was here that gnomes and halflings came regularly with barges to trade with the busy dwarves, taking the famous armor and weapons away south for sale to humans up and down the Sword Coast.

These mountains, and the land south from them to the river, were all the land that the Throne of Ironstar ever commanded. Yet Ironstar is regarded today as the most mighty of the dwarven kingdoms, after Delzoun.

Its smith-craft was matchless, and its people industrious. Yet in the end, the throne failed to hire mercenaries enough to hold their caverns against the ever-attacking orcs, and they were routed.

The last remnants of the Ironstars were rallied by their aging king, and led south, to eventually join The Fallen Kingdom. That sad story is better related by The Stone Bridge, under the entry for Besilmer, above. Also, please refer to the chapter Clans for their eventual fate.

The Sign of the Realm was the Ironstar clan sign: a four-pointed white star gleaming atop a rugged black iron anvil.

Oghrann

This realm lay in what is now the Plain of Tun and the surrounding mountain ranges. It claimed the Helbryn as its own, a hunting-range north of the Laurvinlur, the River Reaching, east of present-day Hill's Edge. The Helbryn was a great open area of rolling plains, extending north to the elven lands of Evereska.

Oghrann was founded by the mighty warrior Thorbard Firebeard, who was its first and greatest king. Over the years that followed, beset on all sides by enemies—lizard men, nomadic human tribes, wemics, and the usual bugbears, trolls, and goblin-kin races—the kingdom declined. The realm was swept away by disease and war even before the more northerly kingdoms of the Stout Folk fell.

Oghrann encompassed all of the great circle of Tunland and the mountain ranges that surrounded it: the Stormhorns on the east, and the Sunset Mountains, Far Hills, and Easting Peaks on the west. These mountains were known to the dwarves of the time collectively as 'ol Araubarak: the Great Shield.

Thorbard established regular mounted patrols into the Helbryn, although he forbade settlement there. It was to be the hunting-preserve of the kingdom, whereas Tun Plain was to be its livestock farm. The Helbryn ran northwest from Wind Peak to The Winding Water, taking in Skull Wood, the woodland northwest of present-day Hill's Edge. The Wind Peak is the westernmost peak of the Sunset Mountains, just north of present-day Corm Orp; it is named for a hole in its spire through which the wind howls and whistles. However, the border skirted Boareskyr's Forest, the large woodland further northwest, known to the dwarves as Wurgymvudd, or Ugly-Wood because of the large numbers of evil and rapacious creatures that roamed there.

The Helbryn's border followed the Winding Water northeast as far as the Tor of Swords, which stands just east of the most northerly of the easternmost loops that the ever-twisting river makes, roughly north-northwest of the Hill of Lost Souls. From that tor, the dwarves' hunting preserve ran westwards to the ever-expanding Anauroch, skirting Evereska by a day's ride, and followed the edge of the sands southeast to the mountains of the kingdom proper, encompassing all the rolling plains within an area as large as Oghrann itself.

Such a large territory was impossible to defend, especially for only 26,000 dwarves, at most. It was soon lost. The realm's very existence is forgotten even by most dwarven elders, to say nothing of human sages.

The Sign of the Realm can be found in deep caverns in the Sunset Mountains. It can also be found here and there in the Stormhorns, such as Dark Wind Pass, a high and perilous trail known to few beings alive today, that crosses the Stormhorns by way of old tunnels cut by the dwarves, east of Skull Crag. It is a curved hunting horn, open end to the left, with a six-pointed star above it, and another beneath it.

Hill Of Lost Souls: This isolated, grass-cloaked peak was an armed camp at the time of the Battle of Bones, where the armies of men raised their standards and tended their wounded. That was the Year of Tattered Banners, just over two centuries ago. From here they went down to the plain to make war on the goblin-kind races that had overrun the dwarven Helbryn. It was to here the dying returned, to gasp their last or to be healed if possible. Several haunts are said to linger here still, long after the dead have been buried and the armies are gone.

In more recent times, the Hill of Lost Souls has been used by spellsingers as a meeting-place, and by the Hierophant Druid Phezeltan to work mighty weather magics.

It is a place sacred to Wanderer dwarves, who believe that the gods often walk here. Here the famous dwarven adventurer Thelarn Swifthammer is buried;

he is said to have been entombed with a hammer of thunderbolts and a great war axe that can call lightnings when wielded, as well as being buried with a fortune in gold. At least one group of adventurers, the Men of the Blue Blade, has met grief at the hands of orc bands while looking for Thelarn's riches. The Hill is said by some to be an extinct volcano, and to have, deep in its interior, a great shaft with gmelined cavities opening off of it.

The Far Hills: The remnants of the dwarves of Oghrann dwell in subterranean 'wells' beneath the Far Hills, and number some 7,000 in all. There are three large wells, and two smaller ones. The large ones are Thelarn's Fist, Sabrishon, and Iritasker. The smaller ones are Uestingpool and Tunthryn. Each well is dominated by a single clan, and ruled by an elected council, which must have representatives on it from all clans whose members dwell in the wells.

The "wells" are so named because they are gigantic caverns shaped like inverted cones. The walls of the cone are ringed with a spiral road or path, off of which open the dwelling-caverns, halls, and store-caverns of the dwarven community. The bottom of the cone is filled with water, natural underground lakes, which are prevalent in the area, and whose waters eventually feed two great rivers: the Chionthar and the Tun.

The dwarves fly about the inside of the cones on giant, trained bats and pass cargo across the great bowl slung on cables, and pulled by the recipients. These bats also emerge into the countryside to hunt at night, sometimes with lance-bearing, foolhardy dwarven riders. Fish are carefully raised and bred in the wells, for the dwarven dining-tables. Hanging fungi gardens, enriched by the guano of the bats, who lair on the cavern's high ceiling, both light the well and augment the dwarven diet. Nets hung low above the well catch any falling folk, debris, or carrion, keeping the water clean. Dwarven moving-stone pumps and endless circular bucket-chains bring water up from the well to tap-tanks all around the spiral road.

Fried fungi are a delicacy among the dwarves of the Far Hills, who sell the giant, fleshy mushrooms they grow in Easting. Many subterranean creatures attack the wells, but thus far the Zhentarim agents active in the area have not bothered the dwarves.

The dwarves of the wells do not openly use the Sign of Oghrann, but each well proudly preserves a way-stone in its Council Hall. These way-stones were once part of a line of boundary-markers that crossed Tun Gap near the present-day Bridge of Fallen Men.

Sarphil

Of old, this realm encompassed the eastern end of the Moonsea, and the mountains running north to what is now Glister. Beset by orcs and elven resistance to surface expansion, the dwarves of Sarphil tunnelled under what is now Mulmaster, going deep to pass under the Lis. Their delves, sought by adventurers in the Mulmaster region, are called "The Lost Ways."

Dwarves of Sarphil developed special moving-stone pumps to keep the waters of the Lis at bay, as they extended their underways westwards to the rocky heights north of present-day Elventree.

The Scarp sought by the dwarves is today much reduced in height; the dwarves quarried it from the top down for its rich veins of copper. They were perhaps the purest and largest deposits in the known North.

The elves of the Elven Court resented this intrusion, and repeatedly attacked the dwarves. Before their numbers and magic, the dwarves were forced back. In the end they had to abandon all of the southern shore arm of Sarphil, retreating east and north into the mountains.

The only trace they left behind is the name of the city of Hillsfar, after Clan Hillsafar of Sarphil, principal miners of the Scarp. Clan Hillsafar can be found today in the land of Vaasa, on the other side of the Dragonspine Mountains (see the chapter Clans).

Sarphil was founded by Nilythra Namarforge, who became its first Queen. Her son, Raulauntar, proved to be an able and astute warrior, and is said to have personally slain over 20,000 ogres, as he defended the fledgling realm against attack.

Sarphil's fall is a story common to most of the other Lost Kingdoms; its warriors were too few to hold what they had seized, and faced too many enemies. The last king of Sarphil was Dauringogh "the Doomed." He disappeared in deep caverns under Mount Throndor, in the Dragonspine Mountains just south and east of Glister, as duergar and drow, in a rare alliance of the depths, harried the Sarphilan warriors northwards.

Sarphil never had clear borders. Its hastily-abandoned caverns, the Lost Ways and all of the many linked caves and passages that honeycomb the Dragonspine Mountains, are said to hold enough wealth to buy at least six kingdoms (or so the minstrels say).

The Sign of the Realm was a crossed (double-ended) pick and hammer, above an anvil. It can be seen to this day cut into the westernmost face of the Scarp, facing Hillsfar across the bay.

Many dwarves, perhaps 16,000 in all, still dwell in the Dragonspines today, hidden away in small, isolated caverns and high holds among the peaks. They have no king nor organization beyond clans and families, and do not trust each other enough to do more than trade.

An adventuring brotherhood, the Axe By Night, provides messenger and monster-killing services, and peddles tools, needles, cheese, sausage, beer, and other goods desired by the dwarves. They buy what each hold has to offer, and sell it to other holds. They travel up and down the mountain range, but they operate mainly in summer, and take care not to lead Zhentarim or orc patrols to the hidden holds.

Shanatar

The only known lost realm of the dwarves in the South is Shanatar, a land that flourished over 5,000 years ago.

Dwarves from Shanatar first explored the Sword Coast North, seeking new sources of metal to replace their worked-out mines. To the north most of the Shanataran dwarves fled, when human settlement, duergar, drow, and monster attacks drove them from their land. Particularly troublesome were the dragons and deep worms, both of which the dwarves had disturbed as they delved ever-deeper and climbed ever-higher after new riches.

Shanatar was a wealthy, prosperous land, where dwarves farmed the surface with hired gnomes and halflings. These dwarves grew taller and stronger than their cousins in the Deeplands to the east.

Ruled by a succession of wise, strong Kings, the Shanatarans kept a strong, vigilant army, a vibrant society with music, fashion, high cuisine, and happiness valued as much as wealth. Their inquiring, philosophical minds were always busy. Shanatar is rightfully regarded by wise dwarves in the north as the pinnacle of dwarven society, whereas Myth Drannor represented the height of their social cooperation with other races, and Dezloun at its zenith was the most populous and wealthiest of their kingdoms.

Most Gold Dwarves see Shanatar somewhat differently. They see it as a frivolous, decadent place where "dwarves grew weak as elves," and eventually paid the price for it. They also discount the glories of Myth Drannor for the same reason, and believe that Delzoun's population and riches have been exaggerated with the passing years.

The last King of Shanatar was Orligrimm Stormbeard, of the ruling house of Stratha. The house of Stratha admitted dwarves of any clan to its ranks, and chose kings by council, to keep the crown in the hands of the most worthy, rather than having the crown pass by blood succession. In Orligrimm's time, fell sorcery given to men by the drow and duergar first made human power in Calimshan great—at the cost of the kingdom of the dwarves.

Where the dwarves had taken over an uninhabited land ravaged by warring elements, the nomadic tribes seized the rich holds of the dwarves. These stretched from present-day Calimport to Volothamp, roughly the entire southern watershed of The Marching Mountains. Thus began a struggle of swords and magic that was to last over 3,000 years, ere the Shoon Empire rose to power, enforcing stability again in the region.

Dwarves flooded north, on a long and often bloody trek to the holds that their most daring merchants and adventurers had built. There they founded new kingdoms: the Lost Kingdoms of the north that we've looked at earlier in this chapter!

DWARVES IN THE NORTH TODAY

In general, dwarves remain in the Sword Coast North today only near the richest delvings in all Faerun, those deep and dangerous metal mines known collectively as 'mithril mines.' These diehards of the Stout Folk usually dwell in heavily-fortified holds on the surface. Their citadels, ready military might, and savage courage keep the orcs at bay from year to year, between the onslaughts of the great orc hordes.

In the Moonsea North and Easting North, dwarves are less threatened by orc attacks, but still tend to live in fortified communities, generally with humans, or in their own well-guarded holds, near mountain mines.

The remaining fortified cities of the north ruled by dwarves include Citadel Adbar, Ironmaster, and Ironspur. These settlements, and others having important dwarven populations, are detailed in previous Realms sourcebooks: the boxed FORGOTTEN REALMS™ game boxed campaign set, FR1 Waterdeep and the North, FR5 The Savage Frontier, FR7 Hall of Heroes (the entry on Bruenor Battlehammer being the chief source of dwarfish information therein) and FR9 The Bloodstone Lands.

Very briefly, the latest figures on significant (either large, or a large proportion of a settlement's citizenry) urban dwarven populations in the North are as follows:

Bloodstone Village: 880 dwarves (out of 7,600, almost all human).

Citadel Adbar: Dwarven rule under King Harbromm; 14,360 dwarves.

Fireshear: 7,900 dwarves (out of 15,400, the rest mainly human).

Helioga balus: 5,100 dwarves (out of 26,460, mainly human).

Ironmaster: Dwarven rule under Lord Clanmaster Strogue Sstar (LG F9); 9,200 dwarves.

Ironspur: Dwarven rule under High Iron Duke Murnaros (LN F11); 3,890 dwarves (out of 4,700, the rest human).

Llorkh: 300 dwarves (out of 2,400, almost all humans).

Mirabar: 4,100 dwarves (out of 23,700, the remainder human).

Mulptan: 2,030 dwarves (out of 6,900, the remainder human).

Neverwinter: 4,600 dwarves (out of 17,990, the rest mostly human).

Praka: 2,020 dwarves (out of 11,790, the remainder mainly human).

Silverymoon: 4,200 dwarves (out of 29,990, of all demi-human races and humans).

Sundabar: 6,600 dwarves (out of 36,000, the remainder mainly human).

Tomrav: 210 dwarves (out of 470, the rest humans and half-orcs).

Trailsend: 2,100 dwarves (out of 8,280, the rest mainly human).

Viridin: 360 dwarves (out of 1,520, the remainder mainly human).

Waterdeep: 7,100 dwarves (out of 149,890, of all races, mainly human; permanent residents only-summertime rise to 8,600 out of 509,000 +).

Individual dwarven clan holds can be located wherever a DM desires. They will always be in rough terrain or underground, usually far from coasts, and seldom near marshes or large lakes.

Landmarks

The Stout Folk, the greatest builders of all races in Faerun, have left many traces of their presence in the Realms. Even above the ground, they have left an impressive number of landmarks, not part of any dwarven kingdom past or present, but of interest to dwarves (and adventurers of other races) nonetheless.

Some of these landmarks are detailed below. Others appear in the sourcebook FR9 The Bloodstone Lands.

Durlag's Tower: This stout tower rises amid in gently-rolling hills near the southern edge of the Wood of Sharp Beth, in the Sword Coast midlands. It is the keep of a dwarven hero of old, the mighty warrior Durlag 'Trollkiller,' son of Bolhur.

Durlag amassed treasure of legendary proportions during his adventuring career, and stored it here, protected by many magical wards and self-devised mechanical traps.

Durlag took a lone, spired crag for his own, and with the help of dwarves hired with gold and gems, he hollowed it out and raised his tower atop it. Durlag is long dead, and many have come seeking his treasure over the years. However, some fell power (a lich, some say, with undead servant beholders) has recently taken up residence in the tower. Its defenses keep Durlag's treasure safe.

The Dungeon of Death: This abandoned dwarven gem-mine was developed by intrepid adventurer-dwarves of the Deepdelve clan. They took to this industry after the dwarven kingdom in the area had fallen, and the land was overrun with trolls, orcs, bugbears and worse.

The Deepdelvers were slain and driven away by a small band of medusae, and they in turn fell to a troll invasion. The gem mine got its present welcoming name from this time. A self-styled 'Troll King,' one Glarauuth (a giant two-headed troll) took up residence in the former dwarven living-quarters (uppermost levels), and sent out raiding-parties across the north. They took human slaves, who farmed the land around for their own sustenance, and were imprisoned between shifts in the old gem-mine. The borders of the nameless troll kingdom were great pens, patrolled by captive catoblepi.

Because the sole purpose of the slaves was to produce babies for troll dinner-tables, the grim place became known as "The Dungeon of Death." It was reclaimed by dwarves of the Foehammer clan some 90 years ago, but these brave beards were too few to hold the rich gem-mines, and it has changed hands many times since, acquiring bone-chilling legends of crawling evil down the years.

The Dungeon of the Ruins: This ancient dwarfhold was sited atop three adjacent hills, hills whose rock was rich in gems! Mined by dwarves over the years, the hold fell long ago in a bitter clanwar, and gnomes, halflings, and humans all fought over (and dug away more of) the hills in the years that followed. After that, there were only a few pillars, walls, and stairs remaining of what were once three linked hill-forts atop labyrinthine mining delves.

Legend still whispers that gems galore lie waiting to be found among the ruins, but few have returned from recent explorations. A thessalhydra is said to lair there now, surrounded by its giant, frog-like offspring, and various monsters it has mated with, in a bestial colony of savage, far-ranging predators.

Earthfast: Once a thriving community of 100,000 dwarves, this dwarven city now holds only a tenth of its former strength. Located in a high mountain valley in the midst of the Earthfast Mountains of Impiltur, Earthfast seems a grim, doomed city.

Few women and children live there today. The bustling trade that once went on is now limited to a few brave peddlers from other cities who slip through the goblin-kin patrols to reach the city, bringing seeds and fruit, cheeses and textiles to trade for the famous war-goods of Earthfast.

The dwarves that remain in the city mine and fight valiantly, beset by orcs and goblins who have recently gathered together in attacks aimed at eradicating the remaining dwarves. The city is a gloomy, silent place, but for the noises of smithy-work and war. The dwarves of Earthfast fight silently, too, though they do utter an eerie low, rumbling roar of victory when a battle is won.

Earthfast is ruled by a single hereditary leader, the ironlord. The current lord, Torg mac Cei, commands the army and keeps law and order in the shrinking city. A black-bearded, foul-tempered dwarf, he is prone to bombast and overstatement, and has recently trained his troops in the use of polearms to augment their traditional crossbows, axes, and swords.

Torg has taken a liking to the canaries used by dwarven miners in the north. In warmer caverns of the south, glowing fungi betrays bad air by a change in hue, but it dies in the chill air of northerly delves, so they have turned to these winged companions. He can often be seen carrying a beautifully-wrought birdcage with him about the city, even in the midst of battles. The ironlord lost both wife and son to orcs some time ago.

Very few creatures of any race earn the trust of the dwarves of Earthfast. This is true even of most other dwarves. There are notable exceptions, including King Azoun of Cormyr, who has a long-standing treaty of alliance with Earthfast. King Azoun is said to have helped the dwarves in the past.

Recently, a mysterious human female warrior of great fighting-skills has been seen fighting alongside the dwarves. Some say that she is a renegade witch of Rashemen, and others that it is one of the Knights of the North, cast out of the Citadel of the Raven by the Zhentarim. Other traders who have seen her say that it is a woman of fierce temper and a regal manner, possibly a petty ruler or courtesan of a more southerly land. The pirate “queen” Shandagara recently vanished from the waters of the Vilhon Reach, leaving her abandoned ship wallowing in the waves still laden with treasure—spirited away by magic, obviously. Perhaps she came to Earthfast. Pressed on this point, Elminster merely smiled enigmatically and said that some things were best revealed in good time—and revealed they would be, though the time might not be good.

The dwarves of Earthfast are skilled weaponsmiths, and their axes are especially valued. A full suit of Earthfast plate can fetch a staggering price, for it is said to be the equal of Ironstar-work: the equivalent of full plate +2 (conferring an Armor Class of -1), without being magical. Armor from Earthfast is extremely rare, however, and under no circumstances can the city’s dwarves be commissioned to make new armor for outsiders (they are far too busy fighting and repairing their own armor for the ongoing fray). Most of the Earthfast armor in existence fits only dwarves; the few suits that are larger tend to be close-guarded family treasures, in Sembia, Amn, Waterdeep, and other wealthy places (such as the Palace of King Azoun, in Suzail).

The dwarves of Earthfast have been fighters beset by enemies for so long that they all consider their forebears to be heroes. Thus, every dwarf bears the name of his father: “mac” means ‘son of,’ so a typical dwarf of Earthfast will be a silent, moody, usually grim miner named Lleumat Gwydython, or Pryderi mac Immath.

This city is described here because much of it is abandoned already, and because the rest of it seems doomed to fall from the hands of the dwarves sooner or later. It will then be one more dwarven casualty in the long wars with the orcs.

Gauntulgrym: Recently rediscovered by a Waterdhavian adventuring band, this long-lost underground human city was built by the dwarves of Delzoun long ago. It lies somewhere under the Crags south of Mirar Vale, the valley of the River Mirar. It is just west of the road linking Mirabar with Longsaddle. Gauntulgrym is known to have an underground river in which troglodytes lurk, at least one dragon-lair accessible on the wing, and a still-functional magical forge.

Halfaxe Trail: The tragic tale of the nail is in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set; space forbids us to elaborate here. Elminster attests that the withdrawal of the elves from the area has seen immediate dwarven activity here. They try to reclaim the Trail as an overland trade-link from the port of Harrowdale, sponsored by a small but rich dwarven brotherhood there, the Black Helm. He suspects that amid the gnome- and halfling-crewed caravans are more than a few mining-wagons, as the dwarves resume their long-ago-interrupted task of tunnelling into the treasure-filled depths of ruined Myth Drannor. Elminster warns those greedy enough to follow the dwarven tunnels that Myth Drannor’s deeps contain more strange beasts, and powerful undead than any other known underrealm of Faerun.

Settlestone: The ruins of this northern city, in the mountain spurs near the headwaters of the Surbrin, mark the route to the long-lost glories of fabled Mithril Hall. More of the Hall is told in FR7 Hall of Heroes, and in The Icewind Dale Trilogy of novels.

Even for those not daring the dangers of the mountain caverns in search of the riches left by the fleeing dwarves long ago, the crumbling towers of Settlestone provide a landmark, meeting-place, and temporary shelter for many prospectors, hunters, and adventurers in the north. Orcs seem to avoid the place, and so it provides a refuge for dwarves, humans, halflings, and elves.

It has its own legends, too: somewhere in the walls of one of the deep wellshafts beneath Settlestone’s towers is said to be the hidden entrance to a rich treasure-crypt. The dwarves who knew the way in all perished long ago, and the riches wait there in the dark. They are guarded, it is said, by a mechanical giant of metal and gems, who wields magic but cannot be harmed by magic. Adventurers, Elminster assures us dryly, are still looking.

CURRENT CLACK

Duergar seem to be massing under Turmish, on the southwestern coast of the Sea of Fallen Stars. They gather for a great strike north into the underlands of the Dragonreach, currently held by the drow and studded with isolated dwarven and svirfnbelin enclaves.

The duergar are said to be led by a dark-skinned dwarf of great height—perhaps twelve feet—who has strange magical powers, including the ability to hurl gusts of wind with his gestures. The gusts can pick up and hurl fully-armored duergar into cavern walls with crushing force. This self-styled “WarKing” is called Olorn Ridaugaur, and claims to be the son of Deep Duerra, apparently a demigoddess worshipped by some duergar.

Blihkarr Touchstone, a dwarven smith of Neverwinter, reports that the Madbeards have returned. This crazed band of berserker fighting-dwarves is thought to dwell somewhere on an island near Utersea, in the Trackless Sea north and west of Ruathym. From time to time they successfully raid ships of the Northmen, and sail such ships on to attack Sword Coast shipping and even the smaller harbors up and down it.

Such ‘deathships’ are eerie sights: wallowing, wild-sailed longships, their human crews slumped dead at the oars, while howling, laughing dwarves with beards longer than they are tall caper naked up and down the decks, waving bloodstained weapons and singing strange songs when they see prey nearby.

Madbeards are crazed and fearless, and will attack anything living that they can reach, from shipwrecked men clinging to floating wreckage to fully-manned Waterdhavian warships. They are a menace to all who sail the icy seas of the Sword Coast north of Mintarn. So far this season, according to Blihkarr, they have rammed and sunk three wool-trading boats bound for Mirabar, set fire to a Luskan warship and slaughtered its crew, and battered a merchant caravel racing for the safety of Waterdeep in a rail-to-rail boat race that went on for three days and nights, until the caravel ran onto rocks and had to be abandoned.

Luskan and Waterdeep are said to be readying scouring-fleets, and merchants sailing into Mirabar are hiring escort warships, for, as the saying in Neverwinter goes, “You never know with a Madbeard.”

The adventuress Lurath Thoenabar of Hillsfar returned to that city three rides ago in wild high spirits, making the rounds of the taverns with a boastful tale of finding a lost dwarven hold in the Eastwall, that towering peak of the Dragonspine range that rises above all the rest at the eastern end of the Moonsea, near the mysterious Ironfang Keep. She answered disbelieving comments in The Flouncing Firedrake by opening her tunic to reveal a mithril pectoral emblazoned with the sigil of an axe, set out in gleaming rubies each as big as a man’s eye.

In the general lunge for her that followed, she slew three men with steel needles that seemed to leap out of the pectoral like crossbow bolts, at her will. She then battled her way clear of the place with her usual blade and by hurling a shining axe that spun through the air like a striking stirge, darting back to her hand repeatedly despite obstacles and attempts to grab it.

Lurath has sworn to return to Hillsfar with more dwarven treasures, and buy up her favorite parts of the city! Since making that boast, she has vanished. Her present fate and whereabouts are unknown, though there seem to be many newcomers in the city of late, searching the streets after dark. Some have whispered that they recognize agents of Calaunt, Zhentil Keep, Mulmaster, and even certain rich Sembian merchant concerns. However, their arrival in the city may not be connected to Lurath’s revelations. Though as locals of Hillsfar have been heard to say, even the gods probably think otherwise.

Somewhere in the mountains east of Glister, the dwarf Helarn Hammerblood the Younger, of the Black Peak (which rises near The High Dale, in The Thunder Peaks that separate Sembia and Cormyr), slew a white dragon of monstrous size. Its lair was a deep blue ice cavern carved out of the heart of a living glacier, choked with the bones of eaten prey and the gold and gems they’d carried. Many of the dead seemed to be dwarves of long ago, still clad in gleaming mailshirts and ornate armor of chased metal set with gems, feeble magic still glowing about it despite the passing of ages. There were also dragon bones to be seen: the remnants of at least three previous owners of the glacier-cave hoard.

Helarn brought out just one treasure: a glowhammer, as made by the dwarves in the days when Myth Drannor was being built and peace between the Three Peoples (elves, dwarves, and humans) held sway over the Moonsea North, as together they fought off orc, flind, and ogre attacks.

Helarn plans to go back, but hunters out of Glister have already reported seeing armored riders on griffonback winging their way north. They have also seen at least one dragon—a large black wyrm, according to the observer—in flight over the glacier; fighting over the hoard freed by Helarn may have begun already.

Helarn’s companions, a small band of dwarves known as the Silent Axe, are thought to still be near the glacier, in hiding. Helarn has met with several respected dwarven craftsmen in Sembia, and whispers have begun the rounds that he has discovered some long-lost magical weapons of the dwarves of the North.

Adventurers returning to Tilverton from explorations in the Desertsouth Mountains report that a full-scale war has broken out between the orcs that have long infested the mountains, and dwarves, presumably those of Tethyamar ruled by Ghellin, seeking to reclaim the ranges and caverns that were once their own.

Despite the vast numerical superiority of the orcs, the human observers (16 Cormyrean men and women, of the Company of the Bald Skull) believe that the dwarves have the upper hand. “Not a valley or gully did we see that didn’t have a dozen or more rotting orcs in it,” said the warrior Guthryn of the Company. “In seven days scrambling in the mountains, we must have seen 6,000 or more dead orcs. I counted only 11 dwarven bodies.”

The Company witnessed two skirmishes, and reports that the dwarves seem to be armed with warhammers that glowed with light, and were often thrown. They were armored in ornate full plate armor, and waded stolidly through howling, stabbing orcs with their axes, as though cutting firewood, until the surviving 'grunt-goblins' screamed and fled.

Some sages in Cormyr believe that the Iron House may have succeeded in retaking their long-ago realm of Tethyamar, driving out the orcs. Reportedly, the orcs have recently lost much of the fell magical support of the Zhentarim, now that Daggerdale has largely fallen, and Cormyr is consolidating its hold on Tilverton rather than raiding into Daggerdale. Others say that it is far too early to tell what has occurred, and that speculation, while both inevitable and fun, is dangerous and irresponsible, on such slim information.

Adventurers seeking a way around The Great Glacier on the east, from the Bloodstone Lands to Armridge and Sossal beyond, have arrived safely in Sundice. There they told tales of finding dwarves frozen into the Great Glacier, armed and armored with gear of an excellence and design rarely seen in the Realms these days.

The adventurers, the Men of the Red Kestrel, produced a long sword and a warhammer to support their story. These have been purchased by Eldaerim of Sossal, who has also offered to sponsor the Men for another foray into the Glacier, in return for the first three items of worth that they find.

The news has spread from Telflamm, where the wizard Nathlaeris maintains a regular sending service to and from the mage Anothaer of Sossal.

Baelakkin of Phelzol, who calls himself "The Easternmost Smith of the Dwarves," reports seeing a flight of dragons low over the city, flying westwards by night. Baelakkin has recently sponsored several expeditions of human adventurers into the eastern mountains of Semphar, where he believes rich dragon-hoards lie. Baelakkin believes that dwarves once lived in great numbers in Semphar, over 10,000 years ago, and some of their wealth and work could well lie in those hoards.

An abandoned dwarven hold has been discovered high up in the Star Mounts, that almost inaccessible mountain range in the heart of the High Forest, in the Sword Coast Northlands. The discoverers, an intrepid band of adventurers called the Drawn Dagger, who flew over the forest on griffonback, found the hold only when they landed on a wide mountain ledge to rest their mounts, and found carved door openings into the mountain.

The dwarves evidently used aerial mounts too, as well as elevators and spiral stairs. The extensive hold is being used as a lair by a large band of harpies, and the adventurers had to flee before they could explore it. However, their spokesperson, the female human warrior named Maranthra Shaunsalyn, swears that some of the harpies wore everbright gorgets and strings of gems and metal targes (shaped and decorated metal plates strung amid gems for body adornment, used only by dwarves and barbarian human tribes). They reportedly wielded metal maces and warhammers of fine make, almost certainly plundered from the hold.

No sage of Secomber (where the adventurers landed) or of Waterdeep knows what dwarves made the hold, or when. The entrepreneur Onthiir Athklut of Amn has offered a 3,000-gold piece fee to any member of the Dagger who will guide an expedition mounted by him to the hold.

The elven sorcerer Anlyth of Secomber has warned all interested parties that great dangers—probably far worse than a few harpies—lurk in the area, and it is wise not to disturb them, if one would live.

When the ancient dwarven kingdom of Shanatar fell, the throne of its king was lost in the ruins of Brightaxe Hall. The Hall stood near present-day Keltar, and was razed hundreds of years ago. In the confusion of the fray, no one knows what became of the Wyrmskull Throne.

It was fashioned of smooth-polished black obsidian, its feet impaling the skulls of four elder great wyrms, all blue dragons, sages say. It had magical powers, including the ability to teleport on command, but always to a levitating position above the ground, somewhere chosen by the throne's original enchanter, not the person on it!

Sages have long thought that a foolhardy human warrior or shaman sat on the throne while battle still raged in the Hall, only to vanish "elsewhere" after commanding the seat in ignorance.

Recently a pirate hauled out of the sea off Zazesspur was interrogated as to the whereabouts of treasure by greedy merchant captains employing magical aid. He told a wondrous tale. Somewhere in the Race, near the Sea Tower of Nemessor, is a small, tree-clad island with the shape of a horseshoe, the open end facing towards distant Rilmere.

In the lagoon, guarded by the arms of the isle, a fantastic collection of seawrack has collected over the years, brought in by waves and trapped in the already-choked waters.

Masts, decking, and the broken prows of ships are tumbled together with smaller debris. Gleaming coins and shattered seachests, and barrels galore litter the waters. Underwater in the center of the pool, a black arch-backed throne, with four huge, toothed skulls as feet.

The throne floats at mid-depth, unmoving yet not touching anything, as the waters swirl around it. Seated in it, as though held there by some invisible force, is a human skeleton clad in still-bright robes. He was upright, clutching at the arms of the chair and staring endlessly into nothingness.

There must be some magic to this, the pirate swore. In all the time he was on the island, neither skeleton nor throne was moved by even the fiercest waves. Two tendays passed ere the sea brought the pirate a small skiff, in which he made a perilous run for the coast.

The pirate, one Havilos Thrunn, was promptly jailed, still soaked and more dead than alive. The next morning his jailers found the cell still wet with seawater, but empty, the door locked. The man has not been seen again.

The tale of the throne is all over the Sword Coast. At least one Calishite merchant ship was seen making for the treacherous shoal waters on the southwestern side of the Race, waters usually avoided by all but pirate ships. The Calishite vessel, Haerno's Hippocampus successfully slipped between two islets known as the Tusks for their sharp rocks and ran straight into an ambush involving at least three pirate vessels. The vessel's fate is unknown, but it is now six days late at its expected port-of-call.

The Runestone

Here is a drawing of a typical runestone:

This translates as:

"This place is Dhurri's Bridge. Here forty-two of the best warriors of (the House of Helming) fell, to keep orcs from the Halls. We slew six hundred and eight. (Day) 218, (Year since the founding of the House) 377."

The Dethek alphabet appears on the outside cover of this sourcebook. With it are several sample runic inscriptions, from a variety of runestones.

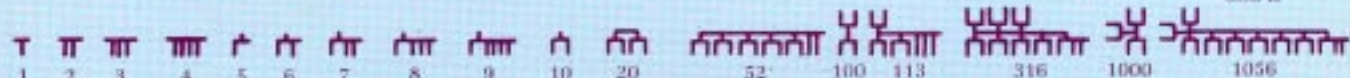

The script on this stone, written in horizontal lines as most humans of Faerun do, is:

Dwarves Deep

It takes most adventurers in the Realms a lifetime to learn more than a handful of the secrets of the dwarves.

The seeking costs some their lives.

But Elminster's agreed to change all that.

Welcome to Dwarves Deep.

Welcome to the secrets of the dwarves.

This sourcebook is one of a series that belongs on the bookshelf of any dungeon master exploring the rich lands (and dark under-realms) of the Forgotten Realms. It presents an introduction to the Deep Folk of Faerun, three unique races of dwarves. Virtually all of the famous "dungeons" of the Realms, explored by adventurers seeking treasure, magic, and lore, were built—and in most cases, once occupied—by the dwarves. Learn their ways and unlock their secrets.

In the pages of Dwarves Deep, readers will find:

- Dwarven spells of earth and fire,
- Dwarven magical items of rare quality and power,
- Details of the dwarven language, their names and runes,
- Details of dwarven clans, priesthoods, and adventuring brotherhoods,
- Details of dwarven lands and settlements, including the fabled riches, ways, and armies of the Great Rift, the Deeps, and the Lost Kingdoms,
- New monsters and notes on dwarven halfbreeds and the special powers wielded by dwarven High Old Ones,
- Special metals and alloys used by the dwarves to hone the blades that slay their enemies,
- Dwarven beards...and much, much more!

I n t r o d u c t i o n

The steppe nomads have existed for millennia. References to the horse people are found in the scrolls of lost Imaskar and the silver glyph plates of the First Emperor of Shou Lung. In each age they seem to live an unchanging existence; their customs, gods and way of life never varying for centuries.

This is no more true of the nomads than of any other people. Tribes appear and disappear, wars change grazing grounds, leaders come and go. Life on the steppe seems changeless because of the rigors of the steppe itself.

For thousands of years the peoples of Faerun and Kara-Tur dismissed the nomads as barbarians. No longer.

The Horde Wars, the Tuigan invasions of Kara-Tur and Faerun, have had a major impact on East and West. Landscapes have changed permanently, the Dragonwall is broken, and Khazari is no more. Zhentil Keep established two new outposts deep in Faerun. The consequences of Faerun unity, the result of the Tuigan threat, have yet to be assessed. No event in recent memory, save the Time of Troubles, had such an impact on the future of the Realms.

This is a history of the Horde Wars from a military perspective. It is too soon to determine what the long term effects of the Horde Wars will be, but a careful accounting of the military practices of the Horde and its opponents, and an assessment of events leading to the Wars, should provide military and political scholars with employment in the years to come.

This history follows the life of Hoekun Yamun, Khahan of the Tuigan, "Emperor of All The World", whose fortunes rose and fell with the Horde Wars. Perhaps the most striking element of the Wars is that they began with the ambitions of one man, rather than political and economic tensions. Koja of Khazari said,

"Yamun Khahan tried to make the world over in his image, to weave a picture that would encompass the entire globe!" Even in failure Yamun's name is forever engraved in the history of the Forgotten Realms.

The author is indebted to the careful renderings of events painted by Thom Reaverson's History of the Crusade and Koja of Khazari's Life among the Tuigan. Without the careful, unbiased chronicles of these scholars, none could undertake a history of the Wars with accuracy.

The author also acknowledges the assistance of the temple of Deneir in Procampur and Prelate Wenslan Amthur, for allowing him to examine the complete manuscript of Vilhiard of Procampur's A Discovery of the World. It is only with this older manuscript that nomad life can be understood and the rise of Yamun Khahan placed in context of the history of the Endless Waste.

How to Use This Book

This single 48 page history can be understood best if it is read in context with other material of the Horde Wars: the Horde boxed set, the Empires Trilogy (Horselords, Dragonwall, and Crusade), and the Empires Adventures Trilogy (Storm Riders, Black Courser and Blood Charge). Enough information is given here, however, to allow military gamers and FORGOTTEN REALMS® campaign enthusiasts to understand the scope of the Horde Wars without them.

Miniatures gamers will also find AD&D® BATTLESYSTEM™ statistics for all participants in the Horde Wars. They will allow miniatures gamers to recreate the battles of the Horde Wars, of Yamun Khahan, General Batu Min Ho, and King Azoun. Enough general information about troop dispositions and terrain is given in each chapter to allow miniatures gamers to devise BATTLESYSTEM™ scenarios.

Chapter 1 The Coming of the Horde

"The greatest joy a man can have is victory; to conquer one's enemies, to pursue them, to deprive them of their possessions, to reduce their families to tears, to ride on their horses, to make love to their wives and daughters!"

Yamun Khahan

The Grand Army of the Tuigan, known as the Horde, was born in the violence of tribal warfare and the betrayal of a single man. Yamun, a noyan of the Hoekun (a minor tribe of the Tuigan people), son of the Khan, strangled his father in battle to gain the title. The murder was the first in a long string of draconian measures which made Yamun Khahan and "Emperor of All The World!"

Gaining control of the Hoekun (probably in 1334 DR), Yamun led his tribe against his Tuigan neighbors. He gained the alliance of another minor tribe (the Basymits), and together they raided the Jamaqua, the Dalats, and the other Tuigan tribes. After each raid, the Khahan sent emissaries with a simple offer: join him or die. Through a combination of diplomacy, treachery and warfare, Yamun secured the alliance of most of the Clan and was elected Khahan of the Tuigan.

After asserting control over his own clan he conquered the Naican, the Commani, and the Oigur. The other tribes soon joined his growing army.

This was Yamun Khahan's secret: instead of crushing his enemies and starting blood feuds, Yamun gave the khans of the clans a chance to join him. In these early days, dreams of world conquest governed his actions. We have little documentation of the battles among the steppe tribes. No reliable observers were there, and the Tuigan themselves have no written language. Therefore, the details gleaned by Koja of Khazari during his stay with the Tuigan must guide our analysis.

Organization of the Tribes

Those who have not lived in the Endless Waste often view the nomads of the steppe as a single people. The truth is that the barbarians are divided into many different tribes, each with its own customs, alliances, and hatreds.

The tribes of the steppe tend to follow the same organization. The basic unit is the yurt, ruled by the head of the household. A number of grouped yurts become an obogh (horde). The households of a single obogh typically travel, hunt and herd together, though each yurt tends its own livestock.

Three or four oboghs normally made up a small ordu. Larger ordus contained as many as 30 oboghs, though ordus of this size were usually found only in the more prosperous regions of the steppe. Within the ordu, certain families are considered noyan (noble). The hereditary leader of the ordu was the Khan.

Khans ruled their ordus, and each khan did as he pleased, so long as his obogh would obey him. The nomads were more likely to follow a strong leader. In the face of a weak khan, oboghs rarely separated from their ordu, waiting instead for a more ambitious scion of the noyan to come to power.

The power of a khan was determined by the military force he commanded, or the allies he could call upon. Some khans of small ordus were greatly respected because they allied with larger ordus and could call up the warriors of allies in time of war.

Regardless of their power, khans commonly had rights and privileges granted to no other member of the ordu. It was not permitted to challenge the khan to a blood duel, and many tribes maintained that it was an ill omen to spill the blood of a khan. In return for his service to the ordu, the khan was provided the best food and lodging, although this was likely no better than that enjoyed by the head of a yurt.

Most disputes between ordus were managed through a complex web of blood ties, marriage, and obligations among the noyan. In theory, disputes between ordus were settled by peaceful means. In practice, disputes were usually settled in favor of the most powerful khan.

Despite political effort, warfare was waged between ordus. Ordus battled for grazing or water rights, raiders descended upon the oboghs of neighboring ordu to steal livestock or wives.

A tribe was made of many ordus. Tribes ranged over specific geographic areas. Although the boundaries were fluid, ordus often crossed into the territory of a neighboring tribe, creating border turmoil.

Khan was not the greatest title which could be achieved. At rare moments when faced with an outside threat or when a charismatic leader arose, the khans might "elect" a khahan, a great khan. Once awarded, the title could not be taken away except by force. The khahan was the ruler of all the khans of a tribe, a title of great prestige and power. It normally went to the khan having the most power and political savvy. Unless there was an obviously superior candidate, (or a crucial outside threat) even a powerful khan was not always named khahan. Only a few of the tribes had a khahan, and two in one century was extremely rare.

Rarely, a single khahan did unite the tribes by conquest and diplomacy, conquered tribes became his and others gave allegiance out of friendship or fear. Prior to Yamun Khahan, this had not happened in many centuries.

The warriors of the tribes were organized by ordu. In war, the ordu's troops were led by the khan, and the headman of each obogh led his troops obedient to the orders of his khan. Without a strong force of his own, even a khahan was hard pressed to control the disposition of an ordu's forces.

Organization of Yamun Khahan's Army

When Yamun Khahan created the Great Horde, one of his innovations was the regularization of units under his command. Without a system of regular units, managing a force of 300,000 troops would have been impossible.

It is unlikely that Yamun created the organization of his troops himself. The Lady Bay alun, Yamun's mother, had studied the philosophical writings of Shou Lung and Khazari, and she was powerful in Yamun's councils. She probably learned the Shou system and explained it to the khahan.

The basic unit of Yamun Khahan's army was the warrior. Each warrior was assigned to an arban, a group of ten men. The arban chose a sergeant to command them. If one man committed a crime, all suffered. If one man was a hero, all benefited. Deserting a comrade was punished by death.

Ten arbans made a jagun, 100 men. The jagun acted as a single group, the sergeants choosing a commander for their jagun, the commanders were almost always noyan. Commonly, all men in an arban were members of the same obogh, although an obogh's warriors were often allo-ated to more than one jagun.

Ten jaguns formed a minghan, 1,000 men. Minghans were commanded by a khan (or at least a noyan), the warriors usually of the same ordu.

Ten minghans were a tumen, 10,000 men. This was the largest unit in the Khahan's army. Commanders of the tumen were appointed by Yamun Khahan himself, serving under army commanders. Tumens usually held men from a single tribe, although several ordus might be represented. Army commanders were Yamun's sons, andas (blood-friends), and trusted generals. An army commander had two to six tumens (20-60,000 men) under his command.

These troop strengths were of course ideal. At the beginning of the Horde War, Yamun Khahan's army numbered over 30 tumens, half of which were led by Yamun Khahan himself, and all fully staffed. As the war progressed and casualties increased, it became increasingly difficult to merge depleted tumens without encountering inter-tribal or inter-ordu conflicts. There were 17 tumens at the invasion of Rashemen, but the army was only about 100,000 strong.

Yamun himself was in command of the army commanders, and in addition led his own tumen: the Kashik. This special bodyguard was divided among day guards (turgut) and night guards (kebtut). They were easily identified by their black kalats, a uniform no others wore. Many of the Kashik were members of the Hoekun ordu; others were warriors whose courage or devotion caught Yamun's attention.

Discipline in Yamun's army was very different from the tribal rule which it replaced. Yamun Khahan was the ultimate appeal: only he could sentence a man to death. But Yamun, cruel as any other Tuigan, routinely held for the commander making the fatal request.

Much of the Khahan's discipline was meant to transform the nomads from bands of raiders into a world conquering army. To stop inter-tribal warfare, Yamun outlawed plunder and raids, punishing violators with death. Minor infractions, failing to attend the Khahan, were punished with wooden rod beatings; more severe infractions (sleeping on guard) were punished with maiming or death.

Arms and Armor

Typical nomad warriors were well equipped for warfare on the steppe, but the type of armor he wore depended upon his resources. The common warrior wore a leather or horsehide kalat, a long coat. Kalats, heavily padded, usually extended down below the knees. A fur cap with long ear flaps served as a helm. A few carried light wicker round shields, mounted at the saddle side or across the warrior's back. Most rejected the shield; it interfered with the bow.

Wealthy warriors acquired armor made in neighboring civilized lands. Scale mail was most common, and chain mail tunics were not unknown. Some khans had banded mail made of plates tightly overlapping and riveted to a leather undercoat. This was not universal. Yamun himself had a steel gorget and bracers tooled with tigers and dragons.

Most nomads who could afford it wore conical bronze helms or fur trimmed skullcaps supporting narrow bronze or iron plates. These occasionally trailed tassels of chain mail to protect the neck. These helms were characteristic of the steppe, where warriors often cut at enemies' necks as they rode by.

Although the steppe warriors did not generally make their own armor, there were exceptions. The warriors of the Oigur tribe constructed loose fitting scale mail by stitching large bronze plates outside their kalats. The Pazruki of the Ama basin cured elk hides into thick, inflexible leather armor.

The weapons of the steppe were designed to be used from horseback. The favored weapon was the composite bow, its length and power suited to horsemen. The bow was made of short pieces of springy wood fastened firmly around a central core of sinew. Light arrows were used for long range fire, heavy broad-headed arrows for close range; 100-400 of each type were carried.

The grip of the composite bow was set low, rather than being centered as in most bows. This allowed the bow to be easily used on horseback, the lower portion of the bow less likely to foul in the horse's tack.

The slender, curved sword was the preferred melee weapon, though most nomads carried daggers of one form or another. Knife fighting was an honored art among the yurts of the steppe. In cavalry charge and attack, the most terrible Tuigan weapon was the lance. A thin pole, 9'-12' long, was slung over the neck of the small nomad pony and used to attack slower animals.

The Tuigan were fond of lance contests; accuracy was a prized ability in a Tuigan warrior. Contests included ring capture and birding. Rings of narrowing sizes were snatched by lance from a full gallop. In birding, small birds were released before a galloping rider to be plucked from the air.

Other weapons of the steppe were primarily used for hunting. The most common hunting weapon was the pole lasso. A length of rope was fastened to the far end of a pole 12 to 15 feet in length, then formed into a loop and run back down the pole to the rider. The hunter slipped the noose over the head of a herd animal and closed the loop. It was also used to capture an enemy. Urging a mount to full gallop, the victim was dragged to his death.

The other major "weapon" of the steppe was the horse. The Tuigan rode ponies thirteen or fourteen hands high, which were watered once a day and mostly fed on wild grasses. An army on the move had four times as many horses as men, that their horses need not be ridden every day. Spares were left behind in battle, insuring fresh mounts. This accounted for the phenomenal speed of the nomads. Their horses were not barded nor were they trained to battle, as Faerun war horses. But a steppe pony did not shy from clashing swords.

The nomads did not have siege equipment, though they saw it used in the Shou invasion (Chapter 4). Moving heavy siege engines would have slowed the army, and the nomads greatest weapon was speed. During later events in the Wars, the Yuigan were to use captured siege equipment (rams and catapults), serviced by captives.

Tactics of the Tribes

Tactics in tribal warfare were usually hit and run. An ordu typically sent 50 to 100 warriors on a raiding party, striking at outlying herds or a central encampment of yurts. The purpose was to steal as much as possible and escape with the spoils.

With the tactical speed possible only to horse warriors, the nomads were masters of the feint, feigned retreat, and forced encirclement. Children learned the ebb and flow of horse combat as youth of Faerun learned to thrust and parry with a sword. Although some Shou scholars referred to nomad tactics as "cowardly," they were in fact carefully constructed stratagems.

The feint practiced by the steppe warriors involved bringing a credible force to bear on but one side of a defender's camp. Enemy warriors would then concentrate their forces to defend against the attack. A second force of nomads would then appear and descend upon their unprotected rear. Mounted, it was a simple matter for the warriors' party to circle just out of sight of the camp, and strike at any perceived weak point. If a camp was too well protected, the horsemen of the steppe devised the feigned retreat to draw them out. A small raiding force would assault the camp, then, when the defenders came to drive them off, the warriors would "rout". The defenders would pursue the "defeated" force into the swords and lances of the counter attack force.

Against less mobile forces, the nomads employed forced encirclement. In this maneuver, the faster nomad warriors surrounded the enemy, simultaneously attacking the enemy force from the front, the flank and the rear.

Commonly, the nomads attacked in force, choosing weak and undefended targets. In these assaults, the nomads were canny. If a particular point was too strong, they would break off, depending on their speed to bring them to another camp, caravan or village with less stubborn defenses.

Nomad charges were initially carried with lances, but once through the defender's lines the Tuigan quickly switched to swords, hacking their enemies' reserves. Some charges were intended to position attackers inside massed forces, creating havoc and forcing the enemy to break formation. This type of tactical charge left large numbers of nomad casualties; surrounded by the enemy, they died. Still, the Tuigan used them against those they believed to be weak or demoralized.

Another element of the nomads tactics was an almost complete avoidance of the use of war magic. Part of their reluctance was due to the khahan's poor relationship with the shamans, though even before the Wars, nomad distrust of magic was common knowledge.

Not only did they not use magic, but it tended to frighten them. Several times during the Horde Wars, when magic was used against them, their attacks ceased. The magical attacks terrorized horses and panicked warriors. Only twice (the battle of Shou Khan and the Battle of Dragonwall) did the nomads use any extensive magic in battle. Most of the army were uninvolved with shamans.

Tactics of Yamun Khahan

Yamun Khahan's tactics were typical of the steppe. In addition to multi-pronged attacks and feints, Yamun Khahan initiated several strategies extremely useful against foot soldiers.

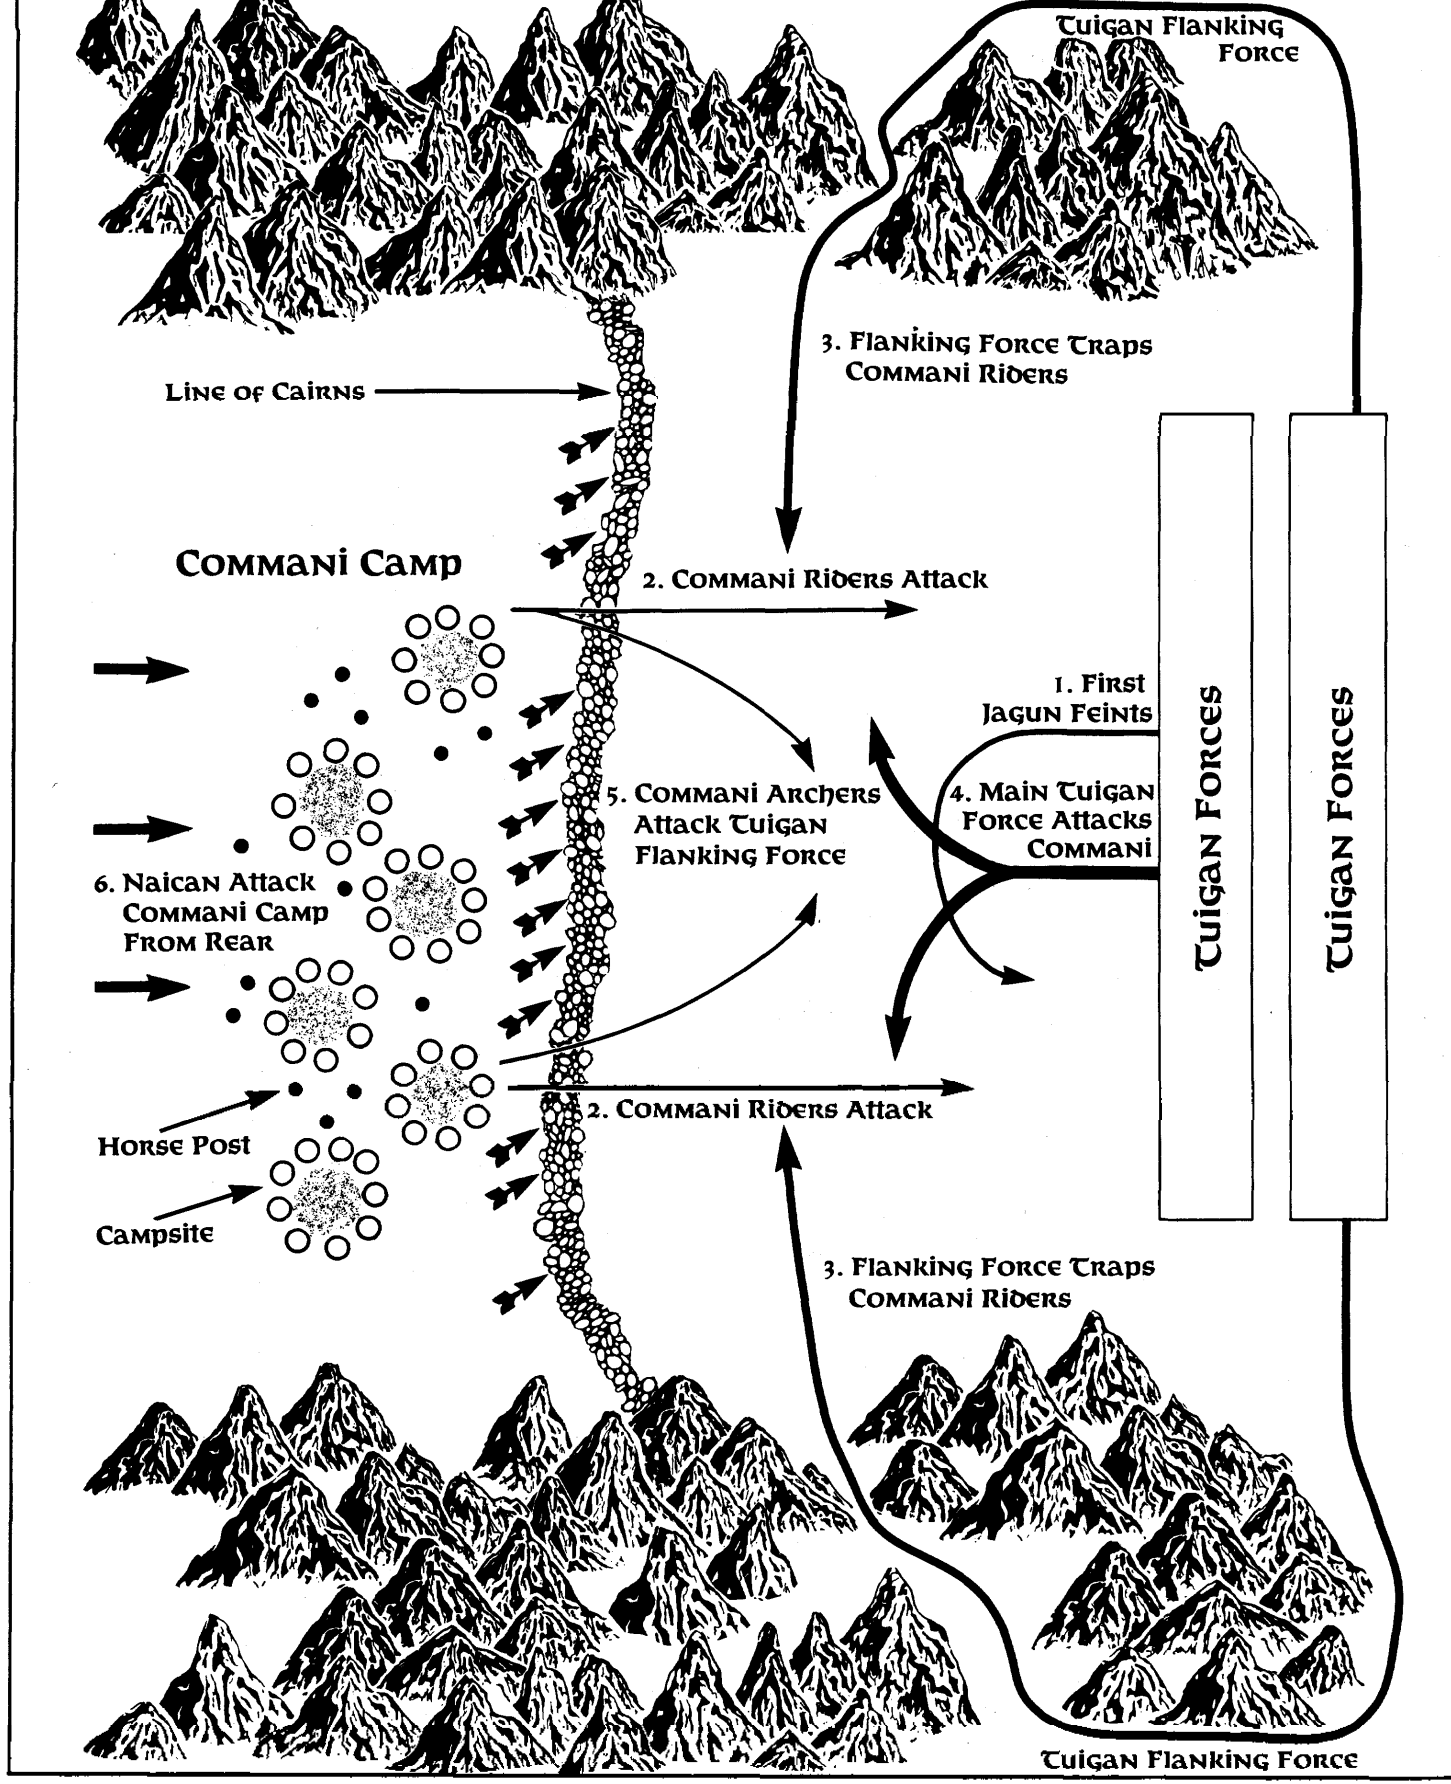

The Khahan pioneered the use of war drums, horns, and waving standards as signaling systems. Prior to Yamun's rise to power, few nomad forces ever became large enough to require coordination. Yamun developed a complex set of horn calls and other signals to communicate his commands to his men. It should be noted that he may have acquired this technique from the Shou, as he did his military organization. Each minghan had a set of war drums which allowed the commander to relay information to his own troops and to the Khahan.

Yamun Khahan also developed a variation on the feinting charge. Checking his forces at missile range, he fired volleys of arrows at the enemy, using these feints to gather intelligence about the enemy's bowmen and magic. The sight of so many warriors raining death on their troops often prompted commanders to commit their most mobile or highest ranged forces.

Strategically, Yamun Khahan was clever and innovative. He established a network of Imperial messengers who would ride across the steppe changing horses at pre-arranged way stations. Through this network messages could travel nearly 100 miles in a day. A message could be brought from the farthest extent of the steppe to Yamun's capital at Quaraband within two weeks.

He managed the morale problem of maintaining a large army on the steppe by ordering each commander to rotate a portion of his troops home while they were not engaged in campaign. Ordu then were not left without men, and the limited grass of the steppe, near army campsites, was not overgrazed. Yamun established a corps of special officers assigned to select camps and arrange supplies. These “yurtchis” formed the nucleus of a disciplined logistics corps, maintaining mobility despite the increasing size of the nomad armies.

The Conquest of the Commani: Tarsakh (April) 11, 1338.

The Commani were one of the first tribes to fall to Yamun Khahan. A powerful tribe, they had been divided for several years. Three different contenders vied for the Khahanate, and none could arrange the necessary support without an external threat.

The future of the Commani was forever changed when Yamun became khan of the Hoekun. Abatai, one of the most powerful khans of the Commani, promised his daughter to Yamun when he came of age. When Yamun strangled his father, Abatai refused him his bride.

The rise of Yamun and his strong alliance with the Naican tribe alarmed many Commani khans. When raiders from the Tuigan began picking off ordus on the Commani’s eastern border, a council was hastily called. Abatai was elected Khahan of the Commani and given the task of defeating the Tuigan upstart.

Before Abatai could assemble an army, Yamun Khahan decided to take revenge. Revenge for the insult of having been refused Abatai’s daughter. He assembled an army of four minghans (4,000 men) of the Naican and Tuigan tribes to destroy the Commani.

The Commani camped on the Rusj River, near Mount Bogdo. A storm on the steppe allowed Yamun to move his army close to the Commani, undetected.

The Disposition of Forces

The Commani were camped in a low, narrow valley in the foothills of Mount Bogdo. Their camp was fortified with cairns erected hastily, drawing a rough line across the center of the valley. When the Tuigan reached the camp, 3,000 warriors were mounted and camp was being struck. Many were not mounted, and most were neither in armor nor prepared.

The Tuigan were more than prepared. Yamun had taken advantage of a moonless night to send the Naican to the other end of the valley. Once the Commani were drawn out, they would be crushed between the Tuigan and the Naican.

The Flow of Battle

The first charge was at dawn. One minghan of Tuigan entered the valley from the east to draw the Commani out of the valley and prevent an ambush. After a brief exchange of arrow fire with the fortified nomads, the jagun retreated, apparently in disarray.

Abatai, not entirely sure of the size of the force he was fighting, committed 700 men to driving the jagun from the valley. Seeing the success of their stratagem, the Tuigan went into a full false rout, hoping to draw the Commani into their trap. They succeeded. From the point of view of the Commani remaining at the camp, 700 men routed a much larger force. Abatai was about to give the order for the remainder of his forces to commit when his attacking force suddenly realized the size of the Tuigan army. Nearly 2,000 Tuigan waited at the end of the pass. The Commani spun, fleeing the countercharge.

The escaping Commani quickly came under the umbrella of the archers who remained in camp. A withering curtain of arrow fire began to slow the charge. The Tuigan committed, sure that the Naican were coming to support them. They were severely hurt before breaking off.

Lack of the relief force quickly cost Yamun nearly 300 men. Yamun considered sounding retreat, but decided against it. He assumed that his rear attack force had been detected and lost, and decided to gamble the remainder of the battle on a desperate strategy.

He sent 400 men into the foothills around to the north and south of the pass. The remaining Tuigan would taunt the Commani into coming out of their fortifications. If it worked, the main Tuigan force would stand at the east end of the pass and fire into the trapped Commani; the men in the foothills would prevent them from escaping north or south. Simultaneously, the trapped warriors would block the archers.

The Tuigan warriors succeeded in drawing nearly 1,000 Commani into the valley, but they did not stop the Commani archers for long. The trapped Commani realized their danger and a few fled back across the cairns to the safety of the western side. Most charged Yamun's main force.

The warriors in the foothills saw a chance for glory by charging the attacking Commani, trapping them between two Tuigan forces.

Disobeying orders, they charged into the valley, right into the Commani archers' line of fire.
