

Official Game Accessory

Waterdeep and the North

by Ed Greenwood

for use with the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Fantasy World

TSR, Inc.
PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION

Advanced Dungeons & Dragons®

WATERDEEP AND THE NORTH

by Ed Greenwood

Table of Contents

How to Use This Book	2
Chapter 1: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE NORTH	3
Chapter 2: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE CITY OF WATERDEEP	11
Chapter 3: THE CITY WARDS	21
Chapter 4: LIFE IN THE CITY	29
Chapter 5: THE GUILDS AND FACTIONS OF THE CITY	35
Chapter 6: NOBLE FAMILIES OF WATERDEEP	45
Chapter 7: SELECTED NON-PLAYER CHARACTERS OF WATERDEEP	50
Chapter 8: BEGINNING A CAMPAIGN IN WATERDEEP	59
Chapter 9: ADVENTURES IN WATERDEEP	60

Maps:

The City of Waterdeep	outside gatefold
Known Sewers	inside front cover
Basic Floorplans	inside back cover

Credits:

Design and Development: Ed Greenwood
Product Coordination: Jeff Grubb
Editing: Karen S. Martin
Cover Art: Keith Parkinson
Interior Art: Chris Miller

Maps: Frey Graphics and David Sutherland
Heraldic Escutcheons: David E. Martin
Typography: Kim Janke
Keylining: Stephanie Tabat

TSR, Inc.
POB 756
Lake Geneva,
WI 53147 USA

TSR, Inc.
PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION™

TSR UK Ltd.
The Mill, Rathmore Road
Cambridge CB1 4AD
United Kingdom

ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS, AD&D, FORGOTTEN REALMS, FIEND FOLIO, PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION, and the TSR logo are trademarks owned by TSR, Inc.

Distributed to the book trade in the United States by Random House Inc. and in Canada by Random House of Canada, Ltd. Distributed to the toy and hobby trade by regional distributors. Distributed in the United Kingdom by TSR UK Ltd.

This material is protected under the copyright laws of the United States of America. Any reproduction or unauthorized use of the material or artwork presented herein is prohibited without the express written permission of TSR, Inc.

©1987 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved. Printed in U.S.A.

ISBN 0-88038-490-5
$7.95 US
9213

9213XXX1501

How To Use This Book

Whether you are a veteran player of the ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS® game or a novice playing a character for your first time, this book can be of help in AD&D® game play. A campaign can be set in the sprawling City of Splendors itself, or Waterdeep can be used as a model of a fantasy city by DMs wishing to create their own large port cities without using the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ campaign setting.

Waterdeep is a city of intrigue and wonders; in its streets and buildings can be found almost every variety of beings and activities, goods, and interests. Carefully handled, the City will come to life, and give players and Dungeon Masters a continuing, ever-developing locale in which characters can adventure, to return to as a base while adventuring up and down the Sword Coast by ship or in the wilderland of the North. I know. Waterdeep can serve such a long-lasting role in a campaign, because the City of Splendors was the beginning of my original FORGOTTEN REALMS campaign, and has been used continuously in play since then, providing delights and challenges for characters from levels 0 through 16 down the years from 1975 and the original D&D® boxed set through the multi-volume AD&D® rule books of today.

This book describes the major features of life in Waterdeep, some important inhabitants, and the layout of the City wards, but leaves room for DMs to develop their own characters and local details. For those employing the FORGOTTEN REALMS campaign setting, a section on the City's surroundings is included, and for all AD&D game players, a number of possible adventures set in the City, or beginning within its walls, are described. These are largely presented in outline form, so that DMs can change characters, settings, treasures, and the pacing to suit their own campaigns.

We begin with brief summaries of the geography and history of the North, and then of the City of Splendors, providing an understanding of why Waterdeep is the way it is, and a guide for DM innovations. A summary of the government, laws, and how justice is enforced and administered in the City of Splendors follows.

Each of the districts, or "wards" of the City is then viewed. DMs should note that many buildings remain "open" for use in their own adventures, and most structures in Waterdeep are three or four storeys in height, containing private apartments or offices (not detailed herein) above the street-level shops. DMs should bear in mind that many minor features of Waterdeep change with time, and can readily be modified to better suit their own adventures.

The next chapter tries to give you something of the "feel" of life in Waterdeep, and describes money and commerce, some of the natural hazards of City life, and current events of interest.

The sections that follow detail in turn the various Factions and Guilds active in the City; the Noble Families of Waterdeep; and individual Non-Player Characters (NPCs) suitable for use in play.

Suggested adventures involving the City of Splendors are then given, and our book closes with a description of the City's immediate surroundings.

Well met, all! I give you Waterdeep; my city. Let it now be your city, too, and if you treat Waterdeep as a real place, as I have done, it will live for you, too. Many happy hours of AD&D game play in a campaign can use only those details of the City's streets and people contained herein. Further development of Waterdeep's sewers, dungeons, and intrigue could even keep a campaign going for years without any player character ever setting foot outside the City walls. So read on, and walk the streets of Waterdeep the Great, Crown of the North, with (of course) the standard warning: keep weapon to hand and eyes attentive...

Chapter 1: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE NORTH

"The North" is a term applied to many different areas of Faerûn, depending upon who's speaking. In these pages, and in trade-talk over much of the Realms, it refers to that area between the Sword Coast and Anauroch (the Great Desert). The southern boundary of this region is the cause of much dispute. To many a satrap of Calimshan, the "cold land of savages and beasts" begins at the northern border of Amn. To a Waterdhavian (a native of Waterdeep), "the North" begins at the City and stretches due east to the Desert, taking in everything north of that line. Most sages agree that "the North" begins somewhere to the south of that, but they disagree on just where. Most use the Winding Water as a boundary. This book uses the Waterdhavian boundary.

The North has been known as "the Savage Frontier" for many years. It is a rugged, heavily wooded wilderness only lightly ruled by humans. Such civilization envelops the coastal regions (as far inland as the "Long Road" that runs from Mirabar to Waterdeep) securely; the vast, open rolling valley lands of the river Dessarin less securely; and the eastern region, dominated by the High Forest and mountains, only as far as the points of their ready swords.

One thousand years ago, the North consisted of a number of civilized elven and dwarvish realms surrounded by a wilderness roamed by fearsome monsters, and such races as orcs, trolls, hobgoblins, and bugbears. Human tribes were few and primitive, dwelling along the coast. The lower birth rates of the demi-human races rendered them less able to replace casualties suffered in their almost continual fighting with the aggressive humanoid, and with the years their number dwindled. They have been steadily pushed southward by the ever-expanding, fecund orc tribes, abandoning realm after realm, or being overwhelmed by numbers and slaughtered. The many resulting, largely-empty dwarven delves and holds are what human adventurers refer to as "dungeons."

The demi-humans, although they achieved many splendid victories in battle, could not stem the humanoid tide even when they united (see "the Fallen Kingdom," page 5). Today, the dwarves remain only around the richest "mithril mines" in the North, and no known elven settlements of any size exist north of Evereska. The rise of human power in the North outstripped even the growth of the orcs, and prevented the collapse of civilization in the area.

The North remains a land of riches, mineral wealth equalled nowhere else in the known Realms, and seemingly endless strands of timber of a size not often found elsewhere. Game is plentiful, and the landscape is beautiful. But danger is always lurking; for the most part, the law of the North is the law of the sword. Traveler, you have been warned.

TRADE AND TRAVEL IN THE NORTH

There are fortunes to be made in the North, for those willing to risk its dangers. Sword Coast shipping is imperilled by the often fierce weather and by piracy (sometimes covertly supported by Luskan, a city which would like to control all waterborne trade).

Overland travel is menaced by many monsters, and as a result is usually in the form of large, well-armed caravans, accompanied by clerics and magic-users if possible. The terrain and the need for constant vigilance keeps caravan travel slow. Twenty-five miles a day is a very respectable pace. Horses and draft oxen cannot be used to exhaustion when one might be attacked at any moment. Naval travel averages twice that daily rate.

The northernmost settlements of the Sword Coast exist because of rich mines, and sent their ores south by ship. Mirabar, inland, is the richest of these, and must send its metals overland to its Southern markets via the Long Road, or by road to the port of Luskan (the river Mirar is not navigable). From Luskan, the older, "High Road" runs along the coast to Port Llast and Neverwinter. It continues through Leilon, cutting east around the Mere of Dead Men, and thence to Waterdeep.

The Long Road runs south from Mirabar through the desolate Crags, to the village of Longsaddle, past Berun's Hill, and thence to Triboar. The Dessarian grasslands open out to the east of the Road here, stretching south to the sea at Waterdeep. The Long Road continues beside the Dessarin to the City, through a series of small settlements spaced a day's travel or so apart.

To the east, in the Dessarian valley lies Nesmé, the only settlement in an area roamed by trolls. The lands to the east of the valley are largely uncivilized, although they once held great kingdoms of dwarves and men and elves. From the Ice Mountains (known to be home to remorhaz and frost giants) to the north, this region descends into lesser peaks where orcs dwell in uncounted thousands. Whenever their numbers grow intolerably great for the available territory, the orcs issue forth in great hordes and sweep south. They have taken one city, The Citadel of Many Arrows, and their numbers are more than sufficient to hold it.

The "mithril mines" (the richest delvings known to exist in all Faerûn) keep the dwarves in the northeast, where their mighty fortress, Citadel Adbar, and savage courage keep the orcs at bay. A trade-road built by the ancient dwarven King Adbar brings the wealth of the dwarves south, and then the road branches east to Ascore and west to the fortified city of Sundabar.

From Sundabar trade can go west overland to Silverymoon, largest city of the far North, and (for the warmest months of the summer) by river (the Rauvin) to Everlund.

Silverymoon is a strong, bustling city, the height of human culture in the Northern interior. To its west lies The Herald's Holdfast, along on a crag. To its south lies Everlund, and beyond it the vast and mysterious High Forest, little visited by men. It is drained to the south by the Unicorn Run.

Far to the east of the Run, the Forest ends at the banks of Delimbiyr, the River Shining, which is navigable as far as the fortified town of Loudwater. Long ago, wagons took trade around the Shining Falls and back onto the river, which is navigable from there up to its headwaters. Here of old elves lived in numbers in the eastern High Forest. The remains of an old road and a ruined port, names forgotten with time, mark the site of their now-abandoned land.

The elves of Eaelrann (for so the abandoned elven kingdom was known) were few, and embittered by long strife with orcs. When Ascalhorn fell to evil, becoming Hellgate Keep, the elves left, traveling southwest, and vanished—over the sea to Evermeet, the first realm of elves in Faerûn known to have done so.

Druids came into the deserted woodlands to preserve the old, lovingly-cared-for trees, the Tall Trees, and remain there yet, defying the strength of Hellgate Keep. Strong garrisons of men and dwarves from Everlund, Silverymoon, Sundabar, and Citadel Adbar now together hold Turnstone Pass, barring the forces of Hellgate Keep from the lands to the west, but there is constant fighting merely to hold the Pass.

BERUN'S HILL

This local landmark is a bare-topped, conical hill that commands a splendid view of the valley of the river Dessarin to the east.

This lookout has often been used in times of trouble to watch for advancing orc tribes coming down from the north and east. It is named for the famous ranger Berun, who met his end here at the hands of such a horde. He failed to stop the orcs, but slew over three hundred singlehanded ere he was overwhelmed. Bandits sometimes watch from the hilltop for the approach of likely victims. Northern legend has it that a dwarven tomb lies under the Hill, rich in golden armor and treasures, but none have ever found it, and no dwarves of today know any more of it than the legend.

CITADEL ADBAR

This mighty fortress is named for the ancient dwarven King Adbar, who built it over a thousand years ago when the lands about were Delzoun, the Northkingdom of the dwarves. Quarried of granite, the Citadel can house up to 60,000 dwarves in comfort; men will find its defensive tunnels and hallways too dark and too cramped. The Citadel today holds around 14,000; the savage courage of these dwarven warriors, under King Harbromm, protects the mithril mines in the mountains nearby from the endless orcs that threaten to sweep this last hold of the dwarves away. Citadel Adbar still produces the finest metals (sword-blades, “forge-bars,” and axe-and-pick heads are the most numerous forms in which trade leaves the Citadel) in the North. The dwarves’ output has dwindled in recent years, however, as the number of miners grow fewer and orc raids upon the trade-caravans (which travel west from Adbar to the city of Sundabar) grow fiercer. The banner of Citadel Adbar bears the Forge-Mark of the King in red upon a silver field: an upright single-bladed handaxe enclosed by a circle of flames.

CITADEL OF MANY ARROWS, THE

This fortified city was once the dwarven hold of Felbarr, part of the realm of Delzoun (q.v.). It stands on a rocky mount in the center of a wide mountain valley, and was once home to 25,000 dwarves. When the dwarves began to withdraw from the North, Felbarr—far from any still-productive mines—was the first settlement to be abandoned. Some three hundred winters ago the dwarves left it, and humans from Silverymoon garrisoned it with over three thousand troops. Skirmishes with orc raiders began almost immediately.

Fifty years later, an orc horde of awesome size poured down from Dead Orc Pass to the east, and surrounded the Citadel. The orcs attacked heedless of losses, and after four months The Battle of Many Arrows (so-called because of the defenders fired every arrow they possessed down into the massed orcs below, and the orcs ignored their casualties and kept climbing, until the walls were heaped about the dead) ended with the fall of the Citadel and the slaughter of its garrison. The orcs moved in, in strength. Today, some 40,000 orcs are crammed into the fortress-city, and their patrols regularly harry travelers on the road between Silverymoon and Sundabar, and test the very gates of those two cities. The orcs are far too numerous to dislodge, and constantly threaten to overwhelm Sundabar, or Silverymoon, or both. The leader of the orcs of the Citadel is thought to be one Obould, a giant orc of considerable fighting prowess.

CITADEL OF THE MISTS, THE

This isolated castle lies in the northern fringes of the High Forest. It is the home of the Mistmaster, an illusionist of great power. Some believe him to be of the 26th level of achievement. There he dwells with a small household staff, including the 8th level monk Iltmul (currently the Green Master of Dragons, once the White Master of Dragons) and the pegasi he loves to raise and train. Great treasure is rumored to lie in the Mistmaster’s vaults, but few have even seen the Citadel, let alone passed within. It does have some sort of magical, monstrous guardians, by all reports, and (when the Mistmaster wishes) is cloaked in thick, swirling mists.

DELIMBIYR, THE RIVER SHINING

This clear, cool river forms the eastern and southern boundaries of the High Forest, as it runs over a thousand miles from its headwaters in the Nether Mountains to the sea west of Daggerford. The River Shining is fast-flowing, and its waters are mint-sweet and safe to drink. It is home to many szorp, a brown, trout-like fish whose white flesh is tasty and which forms much of the daily diet of the inhabitants of Loudwater. Delimbiyr is navigable from its mouth to Loudwater, and from above The Shining Falls to its headwaters.

DELZOUN

The Northkingdom of the dwarves, named for its founder, Delzoun is only a shining memory today. Once it stretched from the Ice Mountains in the utter north to the Nether Mountains in the south, bordered on the east by the Narrow Sea (now vanished; the Great Desert lies there today), and on the west by Silvery Moon Pass (just east of present day Silverymoon). The world was two thousand years younger then.

Delzoun was a rich and proud land, perhaps the height of dwarven power; its smiths crafted intricate and beautiful mechanisms to ease every task; the great dwarven families grew rich and famous, and gold shown everywhere about the persons and homes of the dwarves of Delzoun. The dwarves ranged across the North building holds for themselves and (for hire) for men, and their work endures still. They were a happy and hearty people. That is all gone now.

Today, Citadel Adbar (q.v.) guards the richest mines still known to the Longbeards (dwarven elders), and orcs menace men and dwarves on all sides. A trade-road built by the ancient dwarven king Adbar runs south from the Citadel to the Fork, once the site of the grand mansion of the dwarven hero Ghaurin, but today merely a meeting of roads in the wilderness. One road runs east to ruined Ascore, once a port on the Narrow Sea. It is still rumored to contain treasures—and some feel evil that keeps even orcs away from it. The other road runs west to Sundabar (q.v.), now a city of men—and that, save for some forgotten dwarven tombs tunneled into the mountains about, is all that remains of the Northkingdom.

King Harbromm probably rules 16,000 dwarves from Citadel Adbar, no more, and the numbers of his people dwindle each year; the births of young dwarves do not keep pace with the battle losses.

DESSARIN, RIVER

The cold and deep River Dessarin flows into the sea just south of Waterdeep, at Zundbridge. Its waters are home to the silver shalass, fish that are a delicacy across the North. The Dessarin itself rises in the Lost Mountains, two isolated peaks in the High Forest, barely five hundred miles northeast of the City of Splendors, but the Dessarin is fed by many other rivers and streams. The waters of the Surbrin come down from the Endless Ice Sea, north of the Wall (the mountain range that marks the northern edge of habitable land in the North). Two rivers join the Surbrin from the east: the “Laughingflow” (the original elven name has been forgotten; only its rough translation survives), and the Rauvin, named for a legendary dwarven explorer, which runs east into the heart of the old dwarven kingdom of Delzoun (q.v.). A small boat can take travelers from the sea all the way to icy falls east of Dead Orc Pass if orc-attacks and Tymora's blessing allow.

This network of rivers is fordable at Ironford and at Dead Horse Ford, east of Yartar. It is bridged at The Stone Bridge, Yartar, Nesmé, Silverymoon, Everlund and Sundabar. Its upper reaches form a vast, open, grassy basin, rising in the east into the moors. These lands are still roamed by trolls today; in the past, "the everlasting ones" were so numerous that the fires set to burn their corpses raged so often that men thought the land would never be green again. The "Evermoors" have proven not to be forever barren, however.

EAERLANN

Even this elven kingdom's name is forgotten to all but a few in the North. Once, it stretched from Turnstone Pass in the north to The Shining Falls in the south, holding the upper valley of the River Shining and The High Forest to a hundred miles west of the Delimbiyr.

Its peoples and deeds are lost with time gone over the sea to fabled Evermeet. Today, the remains of an old road and an abandoned, ruined port mark the site of Eaerlann's trade-link to the lands west and south of it—once, wagons took trade around The Shining Falls and back onto the river, and up and down the River Shining Eaerlann's slim barges were seen often. Today, not even treasures remain, or at least none have yet reported finding any. Adventurers, it should be noted, do still go looking, as do forces from Hellgate Keep (q.v.)

EVERLUND

Lying to the south of Silverymoon and the river Rauvin, the walled city of Everlund is home to many human caravan-masters, adventurers, and tradesmen. A council of six Elders rules here. The population, always changing with the travel trade demands, is usually around 12,000, of all non-evil races.

Everlund is an "open city," tolerant like Waterdeep, but it must be ever-vigilant against trolls to the west, orcs from the mountains to the northeast, and the fell power of Hellgate Keep to the east. The Council hires adventurers to patrol outside the city, and to bolster its defenses when large-scale attacks are feared.

FALLEN KINGDOM, THE

This now-vanished realm was a short-lived effort to stem the demi-human decline in the North by uniting elves and dwarves and humans in a common realm. The realm was smashed by the repeated attacks of vast orc hordes, although the slaughter done to the orcs drove them back north for some generations. The Fallen Kingdom had many names; the "real one" is lost with time, among the names of its various districts (such as Ardeep). The term "Fallen Kingdom" today refers to the rolling wilderlands due east to the City of Splendors, although this was only the north-west end of the long-ago united realm.

FALLEN LANDS, THE

This is the present-day name for the strip of habitable land west of Anauroch, stretching between "the Far Forests" (now overrun by evil things out of Hellgate Keep) and Weathercote Wood. The Fallen Lands are now home only to monsters, it seems, although rumors persist of powerful mages inhabiting the southern end, and hurling back the evil creatures of Hellgate Keep with their art. This was once part of the realm of Netheril, a kingdom of mages who could not stem the expansion of the Great Desert; some sages say that many of them set out south across the Realms to find a new home, and founded the present-day realm of Halruaa. Reports from the adventurers Vanthorn and Haladan indicate that when they visited The Fallen Lands some five winters ago, they observed a beholder of awesome size directing hobgoblin servants to capture monstrous beasts and conduct a strange bestial breeding program.

FIRE SHEAR

An isolated mining city on the frigid northern arm of the Sword Coast, this cold and grim human city is the site of extremely rich veins of copper and silver, exposed in an unusual rift caused by a long-ago volcanic explosion (or perhaps a meteor strike) that blasted out a large bowl-like crater, shearing away tons of rock (hence, "Fireshear") to expose the metallic ores for easy discovery and mining. Fireshear is ruled by three Senior Merchants (one of Mirabar, one of Neverwinter, and one of Waterdeep) who ensure that the city falls under the control of no other city of the North. Fireshear's 15,000 inhabitants are all miners; all else—goods, food, and services—comes by ship during the summer, when the ice allows. Fireshear's arms are a crossed blade, pick, and shovel at the base of an orange, leaping flame on an ice blue field.

GAUNTLGRYM

Gauntlgrym is a large underground city built by dwarves for men in the early years of the amicable existence of dwarves, elves, and men in the North. It is now abandoned and holds great riches. All who have ever heard the ballads and tales of bards in the North know this; what none have known is the precise location of this potential treasure-trove. The dwarves themselves know only that it lies north of the Dessarin and its tributaries, near the valley of Khedrun. (Khedrun, pronounced "Ka-hed-ROON," was a famous dwarven hero who in legend carved out the homeland of the dwarves in the North with his axe from lands dark with wolves, orcs, and bugbears; he really existed, but so long ago that none know what of his story is fancy and what is fact.)

A few adventurers returned to Waterdeep in triumph with news of Gauntlgrym's discovery a season ago, set out once more to recover its treasures, and have not been heard from since.

HELLGATE KEEP

In olden days, when the elven kingdom of Eaerlann began to suffer attacks from orcs coming down from the north, and the human realm of Netheril to the east across the mountains was passing away under the onslaught of the Great Desert, the elves built a great fortress in the head-valley of the river Delimbiyr, commanding Turnstone Pass to the northwest and their own northern borders. That citadel, and its task of defending against orcs, the elves turned over to men.

Over hundreds of years of success, followed by a generation of peace, when no orcs came, the city's people grew proud and splendid. The fortified city, known as Ascalhorn (it was built on a jutting crag known as Ascal's Horn), was thought of, as Silverymoon is today, as another Myth Drannor. The folk of Ascalhorn dabbled in sorcery, planning to recapture Myth Drannor's splendor and power—and succeeded only in destroying themselves.

One ambitious dabbler opened a gate to the Nine Hells in secret, seeking aid, and received it. The city was slowly infiltrated by devils, at first only as skulking servitors, quiet and quick, but subsequently as schemers and go-betweens, subverting many mages to embrace lichdom and then rising to torture and devour the citizenry with cruel ease. In desperation, many turned to arcane books of lore and summoned demonkind to battle the servants of the Hells—a strategy that worked far too well, as hordes of demons poured into Ascalhorn and overwhelmed humans, devils, and lichens alike (a few lichens remain as servants, intrepid adventurers report). Ascalhorn became a ghoulish hold, guarded by cambion troops, and ruled by at least one Type VI demon. The city's troops are commanded by a deathknight, who leads or directs many patrols in the lands about. The city, now known as Hellgate Keep, is shunned by men. Human and dwarven forces have several times failed to take the city, but its troops have been likewise rebuffed in attacks on Citadel Adbar, Sundabar, and Silvermoon. Those cities, reinforced by the open city of Everlund, hold Turnstone Pass, albeit shakily, against Hellgate Keep's forces to prevent unchecked and unheralded attacks throughout the North by the Keep's armies.

HELM'S HOLD

Southeast of Neverwinter lies an isolated monastery dedicated to the worship of the god Helm. Founded some eight winters ago by a retired member of the famed Company of Crazy Adventurers (of Waterdeep), the monastery was at first a single farm known as Helm's Stead. It has grown greatly, and been fortified (hence its new name) against bandit and monster attacks, and now numbers some 700 devout worshippers of Helm. The founder, Duml Erard, became the White Master of Dragons by defeating Iltmul at The Citadel of Mists (q.v.). Duml has had to defend his own title many times (see Hlam, in the "Selected Non-Player Characters" section).

HERALD'S HOLDFAST, THE

West of Silvermoon is the spell-guarded citadel of Old Night, one of the five High Heralds of western Faerûn. The Herald's Holdfast is a precious library of heraldry and genealogy of the known human, elven, dwarven, halfling, and gnomish peoples as far back as records can be traced. It is said to be an invincible fortress, and is respected by both good and evil races of the North—even some details of the histories and badges of orcs, hobgoblins, and goblins are said to be preserved within its walls.

HIGH FOREST, THE

This vast woodland covers much of the eastern central North, stretching for almost five hundred miles from its southern edges (near Secomber) to its northern end (near Turnstone Pass). The High Forest is home to most known races of intelligent woodland creatures. Treants, the "wood-rulers," are closest to Everlund, and that part of the High Forest is known as "The Woods of Turlang" after the treants' aeons-old leader, Turlang "the Thoughtful." Men know little of the interior of the High Forest, although korred are known to inhabit the headwaters of the Dessarin, and several networks of subterranean caverns underlie the Forest's western edge.

The Unicorn Run (q.v.) enters the interior of The High Forest from the south. To the east, along the western bank of the upper Delimbier, elves of old had a realm, Eaelrann (q.v.), now abandoned. They left when Ascalhorn became Hellgate Keep (q.v.), but druids moved into that region known as the Tall Trees, to preserve and defend the forest, and may be encountered there yet.

The Forest is so vast that travelers can, and have, found every sort of woodland creature in its green, shadowed depths. Rumors of lost cities and treasure regularly surface in taverns about the North but the truth is, few dare to investigate. Of the most powerful adventurers who dwell in seclusion in the North most have avoided The High Forest (the Mistmaster and the Nine being the only exceptions, and in both cases they have not settled in the Forest's interior). Archmages of power great enough to rival demigods have chosen the orc-infested regions of the far North (The Lonely Tower, on the shore of The Endless Ice Sea, for example, and Tulrun's Tent, usually to be found in the eastern Coldwood, near the Ice Mountains) rather than settle in the High Forest. Lesser men have been much slower to cut trees and carve roads into these woods than they have in the Dragonreach lands. There is something about this vast green land that warns civilization away...Tapann, god of the korred, perhaps? Silvanus? Only time—and with it, intrepid exploration—still tell.

ICEFLOW, THE

This, chilling, fast-rushing river thunders down out of the icy interior of the northern arm of the Sword Coast. It is not navigable by any normal means. Its waters are just above freezing, and travel at terrifying speed down through a great ice gorge. In spring and high summer, great slabs of ice break off the gorge walls and fall into the waters, shattering with the force of a triple-strength ice storm as they spray the vicinity with boulders of broken ice. These chunks of ice are then swept down the gorge and out to sea, to drift south amid the great icebergs from the Sea of Moving Ice. Remorhaz are known to lair in the vicinity, and great horrors known as "ice spiders" or "snow spiders" have also been encountered here. Human prospectors who made it back found no rich ores in what they could reach of the walls, but there are persistent rumors of ancient ruins and buried riches in secret places in the gorge.

IRONMASTER

This isolated, stone-towered city of mountain dwarves is built into the rock walls of a frozen valley; many of its storage chambers and passageways are tunneled out of never-melting ice, so that the buildings merge directly into the valley-side. Ironmaster is home to around 9,000 hard-working dwarves; no non-dwarven races are welcome in this city. From the deepest tunnel-passages of the city mine-shafts lead down to extensive iron deposits—not rich or rare, but far greater in extent than found elsewhere. The dwarves refine this, and fashion it into pots, pans, and "forge-bars" (flat bars that a smith elsewhere can readily forge into something). Ironmaster's arms are a red anvil on a grey, diamond-shaped field, the long points of the diamond vertical. Its ruler is Lord Clanmaster Strogue Sstar (LG dwarf, 9th level fighter).

LEILON

This small human mining town sprawls along the High Road, on the Sword Coast. It lacks walls (an earthen bank surmounted by a wooden palisade shields it from the landward side, but where the road pierces these works there are no gates), and also lacks a proper harbor. A dozen massive, battered barges are loaded in the shallows in the spring and summer, and are poled and then rowed out to meet ships and unload by means of rickety cranes that rise from the stems of the barges into their holds. Needless to say, this is a fair-weather operation only, and tricky even then if the wind is fresh and the seas high. Increasingly, Waterdhavian entrepreneurs have sent wagons north to buy the copper, nickel, and silver of Leilon at bargain prices and take it south to sell at Waterdeep's harbor. Leilon's mines are guarded by "the Lances of Leilon," a force of some two hundred fully-armed, mounted lancers used to fighting off pirates, orcs, bugbears, and trolls. Each lancer carries an axe and knife, usually a sword of some sort, his lance, and a light crossbow which he is experienced in firing from horseback. Leilon's total population is some 3,000; its ruler is Pelindar Filmarva, Lord of Leilon. Leilon is a firm ally of Waterdeep, and considered a friend of the Lords' Alliance. In the mountains east of Leilon's mines is at least one important abandoned dwarf-hold, "Southkrypt," said to be home to many strange and dangerous creatures.

LLORKH

Many old nearly-worked-out mines tunnel the mountains to the east and north of this isolated town. Two thousand humans live here, and perhaps three hundred dwarves. Llorkh was once ruled by a succession of human lords, respected retired miners or fighters, but recently the last of these, Phintarn "Redblade," was found dead at the base of the Lord's Keep, and overnight a new Lord seized the Keep and the throne: the mage Geildarr. Since his arrival, Zhentarim caravans have begun to arrive in Llorkh from the east, bringing much-needed wealth to the town. Dwarves have begun to quietly disappear since Geildarr became Lord, and it is whispered that some have been murdered as Phintarn was, and that Geildarr is a member of the Zhentarim. The caravans spend much gold as they take on men and beast of Llorkh for their last overland trek to Loudwater, where trade-barges will take their wares on to Secomber or the Coast. The Lord has declared one aged dwarf, Thianos "Ironskull," a cleric of Moradin (8th level, LG) outlaw, and is said to have men searching for him. The Lord has brought with him almost four hundred purple-cloaked "Lord's Men": chain-armored men-at-arms, fully armed and experienced in battle, to defend the town and enforce the Lord's will. The Lord's Men have already fought one major battle with the evil forces of Hellgate Keep, on the banks of the Delimbiyr above The Shining Falls, forcing the Hellgate Keep forces back.

LONGSADDLE

This tiny agricultural village (population: 130) is notable as the home of the Harpell family. Many Harpells have been mages of influence in the North (such as the present-day adventurer Malchor Harpell, detailed in "Selected Non-player Characters"). Longsaddle is the local daily farmers' market, and boasts a waystables, an inn, The Gilded Horseshoe, and a stirrup-maker and bell-caster. The village Elder (ruler) is Adanac Harpell, present head of the family.

who is a 9th level NG; magic-user, and lives in "the Ivy Mansion," Harpell House, on the hill in the center of Longsaddle.

LOUDWATER

This town of 4,000 lies almost at the midpoint of the River Shining, and spans the river with a spectacular arching bridge made over a thousand years ago by the dwarf Iirkos Stoneshoulder for the elves who lived there at the time. Few elves are left here today, although almost a quarter of the town's inhabitants are half-elven (the rest are human). Here the river has been cut into a wide pool to skirt around unthrusting rocks and to provide a loading and unloading area for cargo that of old went overland to north of The Shining Falls (and back to the river), and today goes east to Llorkh, for assembly into caravans there.

Loudwater is a beautiful place, where green, grassy banks line the river, and great trees overhang it; the many wooden buildings of the town are of all shapes and sizes, overgrown by hanging plants and ivy until they seem to blend almost back into the forest itself. Loudwater is defended by patrols of warriors, usually twenty strong, who muster some three hundred in all, under the command of two "gauntlets": Harazos Thelbrimm (LN, 5th level fighter) and Kalahar Twohands (CG, half-elven, 6th level fighter), who is under the command of the High Lord of Loudwater (ruler of the town and its "claimed lands," which extend for two days ride up and down the river). The present High Lord is Nanathlor Greysword an 11th level NG cavalier of the nobility of Nimbral, which he left in his youth some fifty years ago to found his own land in the savage North; instead, he rose to rule a place that needed him.

LUSKAN

A maritime merchant city, Luskan is fierce, warlike, and proud. An important port (lying at the mouth of the unnavigable river Mirar), Luskan serves as the chief transfer point for the mineral wealth of the mines of Mirabar (q.v.). The Mirar is fast, icy cold, and rocky, but a road parallels it inland to Mirabar, and down this road come many wagons of forge-bars for the markets of all Faerun. The perils of both the "High Road" (along the coast) and the "Long Road" (in the interior) south from Mirabar relegate most metal trade to ships out of Luskan.

Luskan's traders "wear furs, haughty expressions, and ready swords," as Sammereza Sulphontis (q.v., Chapter 2) once put it, and can be found all down the Sword Coast. The city's population is approximately 16,000, exclusively human, and they do not welcome visitors. The only known accommodations for travelers presently in the fortified City of Sails are The Cutlass, a notorious dive on the docks, and the Seven Sails Inn.

Luskan is ruled by five High Captains, who command a standing army of two hundred spearmen, and at least fourteen warships (each with a crew of seventy archers). In peacetime, these warships operate as "unsanctioned" pirates (the High Captains direct them, but pretend they are independents operating in defiance of Luskan law) up and down the Sword Coast, trying to make all shippers use only Luskan ships or only Luskan as a port, by preying on all other ships, and on all shipping that visits Waterdeep (Waterdeep's fighting ships are on constant patrol because of this). Luskan's "pirates" have no connection with the pirates of the Pirate Isles south and west of Amn. Luskan has waged almost constant war against naval powers its Captains feel they can defeat; recently, they crushed Ruathym. In the past, they have raided but been defeated by Mintarn and Orlumbor (supported by Waterdeep and Amn) and slaughtered on the seas by the ships of Lantan, whom they no longer molest or even speak of. The Zhentarim are said to have tried to negotiate an alliance with Luskan several times (it is not known if they have at last succeeded), and adventurers are advised to keep an eye on this perennial trouble spot of the North.

MERE OF DEAD MEN, THE

A vat salt swamp stretches along the Sword Coast shore here for over a hundred miles, reaching a width of over thirty miles at its greatest extent. It is a desolate, insect-haunted place, seldom visited by men, and home to many fell creatures. The Mere of Dead Men was named for the thousands of men slain here when orc hordes that outnumbered them overwhelmed and routed them by striking south from the present-day site of Triboar and east across The Stone Bridge and Ironford. The orcs pursued the men westwards between the coastal peaks, and slaughtered the human army as it was forced back into the icy waves.

Travelers on the High Road, which skirts the Mere to the east, have been known to travel for three days and nights without stopping to avoid camping near the Mere. Will-o-(the)-wisps bobbing over the Mere are common sights by night on this stretch of the High Road. Legends speak of floating islands in the midst of the Mere, of lizard-men commanded by liches, and even of a penanggalan of monstrous size that haunts the area, but few are moved to investigate the dark water of the swamp to learn dire truth for themselves.

MIRABAR (MEER-ah-barr)

The richest city north of Waterdeep is Mirabar, chief mining center of the North. The Mines of Mirabar provide almost all known metals, in vast quantities, and are guarded from orcs and the monsters of the peaks by a standing army of almost a thousand men who ride mountain ponies in summer and trained rothe in winter. The rich, cold grey stone city is surrounded by mines. The worked-out mines to the west and south of the city, across the Mirar, are now used to quarry building stone and rubble to shore up the ever-crumbling gravel roads that carry Mirabar's metal wealth south and west to the rest of Faerun. Mirabar's Councillors meet each fall in the Hall of Sparkling Stones to determine where and when to sell their metal, mindful of who will use it to forge weapons to make war on whom.

Over the Council rules Elastul Raurym,

Marchion of Mirabar. His bodyguards all sport armor plated with platinum, number sixty-four, and are commanded by four "hammers" (6th level fighters), Djassar, Hulmm, Kriador, and Turvon.

The city is noted for its ever-hot forges and fine gems, and is crowded with grim men (some 19,000) and even grimmer dwarves (4,000 strong). The Royal Badge of Mirabar is an upright double-bladed axe with a pointed haft and a flaring, flat base, of rust red hue. It is usually displayed on a black field, but sometimes on a purple field, and (on ship pennants) on white. Mirabar's merchants own many ships based in Luskan.

NESMÉ (NEEZ-may)

This trading-town is the only settlement in the Evermoors. A circular, fortified settlement of some six thousand residents, Nesmé is ruled by the priests and priestesses of Waukeen, and welcomes all who come to carry on honest trade. On its west, Nesmé has a fortified bridge over the river Surbrin, and fortified stables, paddocks, and stock-pens; to the east, beyond the walls, lie forty or so farms under the protection of the Riders of Nesmé. In the center of the city rises the spired temple of Waukeen; the First Speaker of the city council is the High Priestess Jygil Zelnathra (N, 10th level), and the lesser clergy of the temple hold the majority of the voting-stones of the Council. They are usually opposed on Council by Tessarin "Longtresses" Alaraun, a wizardess (NG, 13th level magic user) who believes priests have no business running any government, particularly not that of the place that was her home first. Jygil needs Tessarin's support in times of attack; the storms she summons have often proved crucial to the disruption of attacking orc hordes, and the two women have a grudging respect for each other, so they maintain an armed truce in Council.

The Riders of Nesmé, based in the stables on the west bank of the Surbrin, are 400 strong. Besides patrolling the Evermoors for two days ride on either bank around Nesmé, they defend the city when the orcs come (at least once every ten years; usually more often). They also police the population of Nesmé, which has a higher turnover than most settlements due to the total dominance of trade (which in the North always involves travel).

NETHERIL

This long-ago realm lay to the east of the river Delimbiyr, stretching from the Nether Mountains (which gained their name from this realm) to Evereska in the south, and east to the Narrow Sea, whose shores once ran southeast from Ascore (see Delzoun, above) for hundreds of miles ere the Great Desert swallowed it. Netheril was a realm of mages, and many items of wondrous magic were crafted here, still to be found in treasure hordes and tombs across the Realms. Dekanter is the only known surviving ruin of Netheril, although it holds no magic any longer. Legend holds that the mages of Netheril tried by titanic efforts of art to stem the advancing desert, and failing—whereupon they took to the air on carpets and other magical conveyances, and on bestial steeds of many rare and wondrous forms, and searched for a new home. Most sages believe that Netheril's culture was at its height some four thousand years ago, and that it was the earliest human civilization in the North. It was abandoned approximately three thousand years ago. Others hold that those dates are far too old; Netheril's fall cannot be more than a thousand years ago, at the most. Hard evidence, thus far, does not exist to support or deny any conjecture on the issue. It is known that adventuring band after bandit band after mercenary company searches The Fallen Lands and the Desert's Edge in hopes of gaining some of Netheril's lost magic. Few admit any success.

NEVERWINTER (see also entry in THE FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set)

This friendly city of craftsmen bustles with business, but does it quietly; it avoids controversy and warfare, keeping within its walls and dealing with the outside world largely through merchants of Waterdeep. On the rare occasions when armed men (from Luskan) or orcs (not so rare) have shown up outside the city walls, explosive missiles lobbed among them “in such numbers that it seemed a hailstorm,” as one observer put it, have sent them away again, in much reduced numbers. Catapults and missiles alike were devised by the hard-working craftsmen of the city. The city also has more conventional forces; an army of 400 archers and spearmen who guard the city walls and harbor, and patrol the High Road as far as Port Llast (q.v.) to the north, and a hundred miles south towards Leilon on the other. In peacetime, sixty of these are always retraining, sixty are on leave, for rest and relaxation, and sixty are serving as the city's Watch (police). Like all else in “The City of Skilled Hands,” they are efficient, quiet, and make sure their work gets done properly.

The city is ruled by Lord Nasher (NG, ST 18/

09, CHA 17, 12th level fighter), a former adventurer who gained much magic in his career, and now employs it to defend himself and his bodyguard, the “Neverwinter Nine.” Nasher is an amiable but fearless balding man who enjoys music and hearing of other lands and peoples. He rules some 17,000 subjects. The water-clocks and multi-hued lamps of the city are known and sought throughout the Realms, as is the reputation of the city's gardeners, who in summer fill the city with fruit-bearing trees and hanging plants, and contrive to keep flowers blooming throughout the severe winter. Most say the city got its name from this feat; others hold that it is due to the Neverwinter river that flows through the city from the deep woods to the east; its waters are so warm that Neverwinter's harbor never freezes.

The Neverwinter woods have never been logged by men, and even today are largely unknown. The depths are said to harbor fearsome creatures, and locally are shunned and feared. Orc hordes always go around the woods, never through them. To the southeast of Neverwinter lies Helm's Hold (q.v.); on the eastern edge of the Neverwinter woods rises The Tower of Twilight (q.v.).

The Royal Badge of Neverwinter consists of a white swirl connecting three white snowflakes. Silver and blue haloes encircle the flakes.

PORT LLAST

On the High Road some thirty-five miles north of Neverwinter stands Port Llast, a small town (of 700 inhabitants) now known mainly for its skilled stonecutters. Port Llast is ruled by a First Captain, and is closely allied to Neverwinter (largely to avoid being conquered by Luskan, who would like to have a more southerly harbor for its warships). The current First Captain is Haeromos Dothwintyl, a retired stonemason (LN, 0 level fighter ST 17, WIS 17).

Port Llast was once of great importance to men. When orc tribes and hostile duergar held the lands where Luskan now stands, it was the “last port” (hence its name), the northernmost human access to the mineral riches of the North. Then, it was twenty times as populous as it is today, and much larger; much of the City walls were battered down by orcs, or plundered since for use in repairing local homes, but the shattered remnants can still be seen circling around the town to the east, in lands now used as gardens and burial grounds or let to go back to forest.

SILVERMOON

The largest city of the North (that is, north of Waterdeep), Silvermoon is home to 26,000 men, elves, half-elves, dwarves, gnomes, and halflings. All live in harmony under the wise rule of Alustriel, High Lady of Silvermoon (CG, IN 18, WIS 17, DEX 16, CHA 17, 22nd level magic user). Alustriel uses her magic sparingly but her natural kindness and grace—and acquired shrewd diplomacy—often, to keep the demi-humans and humans of the North largely at peace with each other.

Some say Silvermoon's values and preservation of music, learning, and the arts “echo lost Myth Drannor”—the fabled lost city where elves, dwarves and men worked together to bring knowledge—particularly magical knowledge—and the arts to a pinnacle never elsewhere achieved, before or since. Certainly its armies of men and half-elves persist in behaving as though no orc threat existed in their gallantry and enthusiasm, and have won several “impossible” battles due to their boldness, persistence, and the timely magical aid of the Mistmaster and the one known only as Shadowcloak. They are known as “The Knights In Silver,” for their appearance in a battle as described by the bard Mintiper Moonsilver in a ballad.

Silvermoon lies on the northern bank of the river Rauvin, its walls curving in a half-circle from the river's waters. It has extensive docks and an arching magical “moon-bridge” of invisible force fields across the Rauvin. The bridge is visible only in moonlight, and its central arch can be reduced to nothingness by magical means, spilling attackers into the river, or allowing tall-masted ships to pass.

Silvermoon's Royal Badge is a thin crescent moon curving to the right, a single star sheltering under its uppermost horn. The moon and star are both of silver, and the whole is displayed on a royal blue field (or graven on grey stone to mark the boundaries of Silvermoon's claimed lands). Alustriel's palace is just within the eastern arc of the city walls, east of the vast open market, and is heavily guarded by magic-users of all ranks loyal to her, and warriors of skill. There are major temples to Helm, Lathander, Milil, Oghma, and Selune in Silvermoon.

STONE BRIDGE, THE

This massive stone arch spans the River Dessarin without ceremony or accompanying settlement, rising lonely and weathered in the midst of rolling grasslands without a road or building to be seen as far as the eye can scan.

Built by dwarves five thousand years ago to link the now-ruined Halls of the Hunting Axe (a ruined dwarven city thirty miles south and east of the bridge; its tumbled stones can still be seen today, although those wishing to visit are warned that despite much butchery, leucrotta repeatedly laid in the place) with now-forgotten dwarven holds somewhere to the northwest. The Bridge was built to span the broadest imaginable spring flood of the Dessarin and it rises in a great arc, without supporting pillars, some two miles in length, reaching a height of four hundred feet above the waters of the Dessarin (at normal flow). The dwarves explain the awesome size of the bridge—and its continued survival, despite armies clashing on it and mages hurling mighty spells to and from it, over the years—to the fact that it was built in homage to Moradin the Soulforger, and is in fact a temple to him. It is true that some lawful good dwarves do make pilgrimages there, and that at least once in times of darkness for the dwarves Moradin appeared on the bridge.

STRONGHOLD OF THE NINE, THE

This cavern complex is a former dwarfhold rebuilt by the Nine. This famous adventuring band, led by the archmage Laeral, is largely retired today; they make their home in the seclusion of the High Forest, as far up the Unicorn Run as men dare go. The Stronghold is known to have strange and powerful magical guardians (including nagas and golems). The Nine are known to have gained much treasure over the years, however, and much of it is undoubtedly in the Stronghold (if any are foolhardy or desperate enough to face nine veteran adventurers, the least of which is 14th level, on their home ground!).

SUNDABAR

This fortified city, once home to dwarves, now houses men. Extensively rebuilt by men friendly to dwarves, it now trades with Citadel Adbar and Silverymoon, and can field an army of 2000 to turn back orc hordes. Its coffers were rich enough to hire the Flaming Fist mercenary company (see THE FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set) once, to swing through Dead Orc Pass and fall upon an orc horde from behind. Great was the slaughter that day, and great the victory of men and dwarves.

Sundabar's population averages 36,000, and it is ruled by Helm Dwarf-friend, Master of Sundabar (NG 14th level fighter). Sundabar is known for its woodworkers, who produce carved furniture, musical instruments, and travel-chests of unusual beauty and durability.

TOWER OF TWILIGHT, THE

On the eastern edge of the Neverwinter Woods, a days ride west of Longsaddle, stands The Tower of Twilight. This lone tower rises from an island in a small lake that drains into the woods to the west, and is the abode of Malchor Harpell (see "Selected Non-Player Characters") and his apprentices and companions (Aflame and Nanitha, also detailed in Chapter 7). Its defenses are unknown. Aerial steeds are known to be able to land in or on the Tower itself.

TRIBOAR (TRY-bore)

This small walled town is strategically located where the Long Road and the major trail to the east (sometimes called the Evermoor Way, although a commonly-used name for the route has never really been settled upon). Its people number approximately 2,500, and elect a "Lord Protector" every seven years to lead the town militia. An able human fighter, Faurael Blackhammer (NG, ST 17, IN 16, 6th level fighter), has held this post for the last thirty years. Triboar has two good smithies and a wagonmaker of note. Several ranches in the lands to the west bring their horses here to sell to traveler's. Gathered armies have often set forth from Triboar to meet orc hordes pouring south out of the mountains. Triboar's name is thought to have come from a traveler's tale of slaying three boars in a day, here, long ago.

UNICORN RUN, THE

This cool, gently-flowing river rises in the mountains at the very heart of The High Forest (thought by some to be home to many nymphs), where few civilized beings have ever been, all down the ages, save elves who do not talk. The Stronghold of the Nine (see above) lies partway up the Run, and unicorns inhabit the woods near its banks in the vicinity, and are known to travel up and down the river (hence its name). There is a legend that an elven king buried the treasure of all his court somewhere along the Run, when fleeing from orcs and hobgoblins who had pursued his people from the the far North, and never returned—slain shortly thereafter by the orcs. Another legend holds that the god Mielikki inhabits the Forest near the Run and is often seen wandering in the woods near it. Harpers say that this "legend" is plain truth, and make occasional pilgrimages to certain groves there. Certainly the Run's vale within The High Forest is one of the most beautiful regions of all Faerûn. Bards who have come here tend to sing of it for the rest of their lives. The Nine's adventures have become far fewer since they settled on the Run, and halflings from Secomber regularly travel upriver to just within the Forest's edge to bury their dead. One famous halfling adventurer, Gaultham Longtoes, is known to have said, after visiting the Run, "I have seen the unicorns, and can die content."

WEATHERCOTE WOOD

This isolated wood is avoided by all save the bravest (or most foolish) adventurers; it has existed since before the fall of Netheril, persist despite Anauroch's advance, and seems to be a place of fell magic. Blue mists and glowing lights are often seen in its interior by Zhentarim caravans passing in the night, to and from Llorck (q.v.) to the west.

The elves say that gates to other worlds lie in the depths of Weathercote, and that mages of awesome power from other worlds have come to Faerûn to dwell in the Woods and guard the gates to prevent others of their kind from using them. The truth of this is not known neither spells nor psionics seem able to penetrate the Wood's interior, and those who go in to see do not come out again.

YARTAR (YAR-Tarr)

This fortified town is the site of a bridge over the Surbrin, just north of its confluence with the Dessarin. Yartar is home to some 6,000 men, and is the site of a major temple to Tymora. Many barges are built here, for use up and down the river, and the folk of Yartar traditionally fish the "Three Rivers" (the Dessarin, Surbrin, and Laughing-flow) near their docks for much of their table fare. Yartar is the scene of the vast Shieldmeet of the outcasts, bandits, homeless, and isolated landholders of the North, who gather here in the thousands. Yartar's ruler, the "Waterbaron," is presently Alahar Khaumfros (LN, ST 16, 4th level fighter). He commands an Official barge that can carry two hundred men, and a mounted army, "The Shields of Yartar" to fill it if need be. More often, they police the town and defend it against wandering orcs and trolls.

Chapter 2: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE CITY OF WATERDEEP

A BRIEF GEOGRAPHY OF WATERDEEP

The City of Splendors lies on the western coast of Faerûn, north of Amn. That region is known as “the Sword Coast,” because for many years it was ruled by the might of swordarms rather than by any laws or treaties (and some folk in the South still hold it to be so). Waterdeep’s boundaries are strictly controlled by the mysterious rulers of the City, the Lords of Waterdeep.

Waterdeep is guarded by a wall from its southern tip to the northern end of the City of the Dead, where there is a sheer cliff of over a hundred feet in height, by the Trollwall (so named because of its earliest form it was intended primarily to hold off trolls), which rises up again after the cliff lessens to a height that attackers could scale, and extends as far as the Trolltower, or Northtower, before doubling back south to meet the sea.

This wall is pierced by four gates: the South Gate; the River Gate; Northgate; and Westgate. Within the walls, the city of Waterdeep sprawls to the shore, except where restrained by edict of the Lords, who forbid any habitation of encroachment into the City of the Dead, the public streets, and the slopes of Mount Waterdeep around Castle Waterdeep.

The Watch (City police) divide the City into seven districts, or “wards.” These are Castle Ward, the City of the Dead, Sea Ward, North Ward, The Trades Ward, Dock Ward, and Southern Ward. Divisions between these districts are not obvious to a visitor to the City. Industry and other activities are not restricted to this or that ward (the exception being the City of the Dead). The complex ward boundaries are shown on a map included in this book.

- Castle Ward contains Mount Waterdeep, the Castle itself, Piergeiron’s Palace, and many of the barracks and other public buildings around them. Generally only the wealthy live here, and then only if they are involved in the daily intrigue and “night life” open social cut-and-thrust of City life.

- Sea Ward lies to the north and west of Castle Ward, all along the seacoast. It contains most of the large temple complexes found in the City of Splendors, and many large private villas of the noble families and the very rich non-nobles. If one is not noble, and not a “swinger” or diplomat, but becomes very wealthy, the Sea Ward is the place to live.

- North Ward takes in the eastern portion of the northern end of the sprawling City, as far south as The City of the Dead. It contains many noble villas and grand houses, but the presence of many inns and rooming-houses make it slightly less haughty in overall character than Sea Ward. North Ward inhabitants are generally thought of as very respectable and prosperous.

- The City of the Dead is a walled cemetery, strictly patrolled by the Watch. So one may live or even sleep overnight therein. It is kept in a beautiful, park-like open condition, and is used as a launching and meeting place by natives of Waterdeep at all hours.

- The Trades Ward lies generally to the south of Castle Ward and The City of the Dead, and is an arbitrary slice of the bustling commercial area of the City, where most moderately wealthy merchants live, and much of the City’s light-goods and respectable trade takes place.

- Southern Ward, as its name implies, is the southern end of Waterdeep, and dominated by the caravan trade, with its necessary stables and warehouses. Many poor but honest Waterdhavians live here.

- The Dock Ward takes in the entire dock area from the Mountain to the southern end of the City, and is the most crowded, dirty, and “rough” district of the City. The vital commerce (and shady dealings) of Waterdeep keep its streets busy at all hours.

Any aerial visitor to the City of Splendors arriving from the south can clearly see the general topography of Waterdeep; the City resembles a flat board raised at its north end, and slightly tilted downwards on the west so that it slopes down towards the Mountain, leveling off along The Way of the Dragon. Mount Waterdeep is of course the highest point in Waterdeep; its seaswept flanks rise to shield much of the City beyond from the worst coastal storm winds, peaking some seven hundred feet above the waves. An eyrie for aerial traffic, garrisoned by the City Guard (the difference between Guard and Watch is explained later in this chapter), shelters below the peak on the landward side. From it, the City’s defensive naval combat “throwers” are commanded, and patrol squadrons of griffonriders fly.

As a port, Waterdeep provides an excellent natural deep-water harbor (hence its name) and shipbuilding facilities; over four hundred vessels can dock at once. Waterdeep maintains a small navy of sixteen fast “rakers”: slim top-armored vessels that can carry up to seventy troops each, and that are armed with fire-pot catapults and large deck-mounted crossbows.

These ships have armored bow rams, banks of oars (and a normal crew of thirty-six to man them), and two masts for crowding sails on in pursuit or when speed is essential.

The navy’s base is fortified Deepwatch Isle, which protects the harbor mouth from weather and from seaborne attackers, and is garrisoned by almost a thousand guardsmen at all times. At least two naval rakers are always on patrol outside the harbor, and another two are on “ready” duty within the harbor. At least four others will be on extended patrol somewhere off the Sword Coast on any day in peacetime. These warships are supported by over twenty small lateen-sailed galleys, or “strikers,” and fifteen large, wallowing troop-and-supply vessels. (For AD&D® game statistics of these vessels, refer to the “Waterdhavian Ship Table” listed under “The Order of Master Shipwrights” in Chapter 5.)

Most merchant ships of the Realms can average fifty miles or so per day, in moderately favorable conditions. Sailing in the Sword Coast region is dangerous to impossible (as one goes northwards and icebergs become more common) during the harsh storms of winter. Storms are almost continuous in the month of Hammer, and frequent in the two months that follow, becoming increasingly fierce but shorter, and with longer intervals between. Thereafter, in the fourth month, they are replaced by cold, heavy rains that rarely involve lightning or high winds, and are fairly safe (if uncomfortable) for sailing.

The City of Waterdeep is built upon the rock and rubble of the slopes of Mount Waterdeep, built up and quarried flat over generations of habitation. At least three major networks of underground passages are known to exist beneath Waterdeep’s busy streets. Undermountain, a deep, many-leveled former dwarven city and mine of great antiquity that, as its name implies, lies largely beneath Mount Waterdeep, is the largest and most famous (in tavern-talk) of these. The Dungeon of the Crypt, so named because its above-ground entrance is one of the crypts in The City of the Dead, lies under the North Ward, and is less spoken of.

The third of these labyrinths is the city sewers, detailed in this book. The major channels of the sewers are navigable, and the secondary channels may be crawled or swum by man-sized beings of bravery (or stupidity), daring, and agility, although the curious are warned that the sewers have gratings at awkward places to prevent their use as a subterranean highway and to hamper the movements of less desirable visitors from the sea depths.

Fresh, clean water (for drinking and cooking) in Waterdeep comes from deep wells under Castle Waterdeep and under Farwatch Tower, and from shallow wells. These wells are attended at all times by members of the Watch. To deliberately poison or attempt to block access to or fill in one of these wells is an offense punishable by immediate (i.e. as soon as the offender is within blade's reach) death. "Spillwater," the not-quite-so-clean water used for bathing and washing of animals, buildings, and equipment, and for the watering of plants, is gained from cisterns on the roofs and in the cellars of most buildings in Waterdeep; cellar cisterns are fed by sloping catch-basins on roofs, and have gratings to filter solid debris that finds its way onto the roof out of the collected water as it flows down wall pipes into the cellar; smaller roof-cisterns are merely open-topped basins, and are cleaned often by users below to avoid contact with dead pigeons and the like. Used spillwater is referred to as "nightwater", and is used to sluice chamber pots into the sewers.

Waterdeep's population rarely falls below 122,000 beings. The actual number varies greatly with the seasons, as so much of it consists of those visiting in the course of conducting trade. In times of busiest trade, the City often holds five times as many. Such busy times (apart from special occasions caused by wars, bountiful harvests, Shieldmeet—described in the Campaign Set—and the like) occur fairly regularly at "full spring," when winter is fully gone without threat to the reasonable-minded of its return and the transportation routes over land and sea are fully open, and after the fall harvest in the North (before the threat of winter's mud can become a reality, closing the roads, and the granaries and warehouses are bursting with food destined for the South).

A BRIEF HISTORY OF WATERDEEP

To most inhabitants of the Realms, Waterdeep the Mighty, the City of Splendors, "Crown of the North," is a place that has "always been there." It is a vast and colorful, tolerant and eclectic crossroads city where peoples of all hospitable races meet, and the most wondrous and exciting works and achievements are seen. Waterdeep is seen as the cradle of, and foremost in, invention and innovation in the creative endeavors of all cities in the Sword Coast lands and perhaps in all Faerûn. Inhabitants of other cities in Amn and Calimshan on the Coast, and of Cormyr, Sembia, Thay, and other realms inland, may dispute this—but they are disputing a known (if unadmitted) supremacy. The "creative endeavors" Waterdeep's merchants and nobles deal in include magic, art, music, and "craftwork": that is, the carving and combining of wood, metal, glass, and other materials into tools and useful items of ever-increasing beauty, precision, and efficiency.

Few now know the true history of this great city, which had its beginnings over a thousand years ago, when the North was truly what Southerners still call it sneeringly: "the savage North." In those days, most of the North was covered with vast, tall forests of ancient green, and inhabited by dwarves and goblinkind (in the most northern mountains and foothills) and elves (in widely-scattered forest enclaves everywhere else). A few primitive human tribes lived along the Sword Coast, fishing and hunting and gathering in spring and fall to trade their furs for the merchants' jewelry and metal tools, or the occasionally-available weapon or two, with vessels sailing in from the South. In the spring, these vessels came primarily to cut and take huge trees for shipbuilding, trees being no longer available in such large sizes farther south.

In the fall, the vessels came in to cut timber for their own repairs, or to take on a cargo of wood if the misfortunes of trading had left their holds low or empty, for want of anything better. Most of these trademoots were at a certain place where there was a great natural deepwater harbor, protected from the sea by a rocky spur of land, an arm of an isolated coastal crag, and a rocky island beyond it.

Over the years, the forest was cut back farther and farther from the shore, and some tribes began to stay most of the year there, farming the cleared land (and, the wiser among them reasoned, controlling some of the timber, which they could claim as theirs and trade for more weaponry and tools). Such claims and raids from tribes finding the squatters rich with tools and weaponry gained from frequent trade brought attacks from land and sea, and the squatting tribes were slaughtered by the more warlike tribes. Notable among these tribes was that led by Nimoar, a chieftain who directed his people to seize the farms, and the ramshackle wooden docks, trading-sheds, and storage barns that had come into being by the deepwater harbor over the years, settle there themselves, and erect a log palisade within an earthen embankment, to protect the holdings. Nimoar's people did so, withstood several pirate and tribal raids, and prospered.

Farther north, orc tribes had outgrown their mountain strongholds. Attempts to expand underground met with fierce dwarven resistance (although many small gnomish colonies were overwhelmed and wiped out), and the orcs spread out on the surface of the land, coming south and down out of the mountains, hurling their seemingly endless numbers against all who stood in their path. Here and there elven enclaves held out, but the push southwards displaced many other northern inhabitants, including the "everlasting ones" (trolls), who came down into the newly-cleared lands northeast of Nimoar's Hold, those lands now known as the Troll-moors. Nimoar died of old age during this time of increasing danger. Younger War Lords led the men of Waterdeep (for so the shipcaptains called the harbor) in battles against the trolls. There were many bloody struggles between men and trolls for a decade, until the magic of a Northern youth named Ahghairon turned the fortunes of war against the trolls, and the "everlasting ones" were destroyed or scattered.

Fearing further attacks, the men of Waterdeep raised a small keep on the slopes of Mount Waterdeep above their farms, where fire arrows from on high could defend against attacking trolls. Many men of outlying tribes who had come to the settlement for safety from the trolls stayed, and expanded the walls with new farms several times. War Lords ruled the Free City of Waterdeep, holding it independent and increasingly wealthy as years passed. Ahghairon rose slowly in skill and power with the passage of years, until he became a great mage. He discovered a supply of potions of longevity (or learned the art of making such), for he lived on, still physically a man in his prime, for decade upon decade. In his 112th winter, Ahghairon had a sharp disagreement with Raurlor, who was then Warlord of Waterdeep. Raurlor wanted to use Waterdeep's acquired wealth and strength-of-arms to create an empire in the North, with Waterdeep its capital (and Raurlor its ruler), and gathered armies for the purpose. Ahghairon defied him before all the people, and Raurlor ordered that the mage be chained. Ahghairon struck aside with magic all who sought to lay hands on him, until in a fury Raurlor drew his own blade and struck at the mage. Ahghairon rose into the air, just out of reach, and as the infuriated Warlord slashed repeatedly at his rising feet, gestured. Raurlor's blade was transformed in his hand, from steel into a hissing serpent. The Warlord was bitten, and died of the venom before the shocked people assembled there. Ahghairon then gathered all the captains of Waterdeep's army, and all the seniors of the families of Waterdeep. While runners were sent to gather them to the Palace, flames roared and crackled in the Warlord's empty chair-of-state at Ahghairon's bidding, so that no one sat there. Then at a gesture from the mage, the flames were gone as though they had never been, leaving the chair unmarked. Ahghairon seated himself, then, and proclaimed himself the first Lord of Waterdeep, saying that henceforth wisdom and not armed might would rule in the city. He would gather some few—in secret—to rule as Lords with him, masked and disguised when they appeared to the people, but equal to him in authority and free of coercion by any, himself included. These Lords could serve as long as they wished, and were to be drawn from all walks of life in the city.

The people heard, and agreed, and for the next two hundred years, Ahghairon ruled Waterdeep with his unknown fellow Lords. Over the years, the masked Lords were a group of sometimes six, sometimes seven, betimes five, who appeared seldom and said little. Some whispered that they were Ahghairon's servants, or even automatons magically controlled by the Old Mage, but Ahghairon's justice was swift and fair, his laws good, his guardsmen polite and ready to help as well as apprehend, and the people of Waterdeep approved.

The years passed in peace and prosperity. The North was opened to humans. Roads built under Ahghairon's direction linked it together, from the ruins of "the Fallen Kingdom" (see Chapter 1), which had been shattered by goblin races' attacks before men were numerous in the North, to the cities that would later become Amn. Waterdeep grew fivefold in size and wealth. From all over the Realms folk began to come to the "Crown of the North," drawn by money—and among them came those who rob and cheat and steal. When word of the doings of such extending beyond simple theft to deception-in-workmanship and the appearance of many fly-by-night impostor-craftsmen reached Ahghairon's ears, he called together the senior merchants, "the Noble Ones," and suggested that they form guilds as was done in the far South, and police the unscrupulous of their own professions. Some resisted, or were furious, but most saw the advantages of such an arrangement, particularly if they were free to set matters up themselves, and not have less favorable arrangements forced upon them. The Guilds were created forthwith. Waterdeep continued to grow in size and prosperity. Twice more the city walls were expanded, and its merchants traveled the world over, bringing back exotic goods from afar, and spreading word of the city's wealth to remote lands. In the South some listened with an eye to conquest or at least plunder, but swords were already out in those southern lands in a time of widespread strife, and no invaders came.

At length Ahghairon's health failed. He died, and was buried with ceremony in his tower, which was sealed up against thieves and fools. Those who had learned the arts of magic from the Old Mage came to salute him, and to cast the most potent protective magics they knew upon his resting-place (which, it is believed, remains inviolate today).

There was great turmoil in the City as the Guildmasters argued amongst themselves as to who should govern the City, and more than one merchant of power was found murdered. Groups of liveried bodyguards appeared openly armed on the streets, accompanying their masters, and two very troubled months passed as they bickered and parleyed (and occasionally duelled in the streets). At last the Guildmaster decided that all Masters should rule Waterdeep together, in a council. The lesser nobles and many townsfolk protested, saying that the Lords by right ruled, but the Guildmasters said that the Lords had not been seen since Ahghairon's death, and that they must always have been golems or zombies controlled by Ahghairon himself, to conceal his lone rule. And indeed, the Lords were silent and unseen, and continued to be so.

In truth, the Lords were real men and women, whose identities had been learned, over the years, by certain professionally curious Guildmasters, who had ordered them slain by their own closemouthed, loyal servants following Ahghairon's death. The only Lords still surviving (those whose names and faces had remained secret) were Baeron, a woodworker, and Shilarn, an apprentice magic-user. These surviving Lords kept very quiet, and waited. The Guildmasters thought that all the living Lords of the City had been eliminated, and took firm rule over Waterdeep.

The Guildmasters ruled Waterdeep for only six years ere their self-interested squabbling led to bloodshed. A few armed quarrels and murders quickly erupted into a brief but vicious series of street fights and midnight attacks. This strife, sometimes termed "the Guildwars" by sages (although it was never as long-drawn-out or so formal as to be called a "war" when it was taking place), left all but two Guildmasters dead, most of the City's best minds stilled, and much of the City's gold wasted or plundered with the Guilds in disarray.

The surviving Guildmasters were Lhorar Gildeggh of the Shipwrights, and Ehlemm Zoar of the Gemcutters. These two, ruthless manipulators both, were well-matched and could not overcome each other, though their private armies clashed often in the streets. At length they sickened of bloodshed, after many of both their families had been found lifeless in the gutters, and agreed to rule together. Two thrones were set up in Castle Waterdeep, and from then the two argued bitterly over this and that, and the City was a place of tension and fear. All matters, including the recognition of new Guildmasters to the government of the "headless" guilds, had to come before the Two Lords Magister, as Lhorar and Ehlemm were called. Few matters were settled.

One day to the Courts of the Lord Magister came two people masked and robed as the Lords of Waterdeep had been of old. Where these two came from no one knew, but they appeared in the Castle's Great Hall where the Courts were, and commanded the Lords Magister to leave the City forthwith. Laughing, the Lords Magister refused, whereupon the shorter of the two masked intruders (the lady Shilarn, once apprentice to Ahghairon, and his undeclared heir as first Lord of the City) blasted them with fire and lightning, and their very thrones were shattered and tumbled.

The taller of the two intruders (Baeron) then called for the heads of the noble houses to come to them, or leave the City forthwith and forever, if they cared not to come by nightfall. All in the Courts heard, and the news was cried in the streets.

The surviving nobles came, reluctantly and with bodyguards, expecting such a summons to be a trap. Baeron spoke to them and the crowd of curious townsfolk that had also come, saying, "this must not happen again." If Waterdeep was to be safe once more, he told them, all must support what he and his fellow Lord now planned, as they had supported Ahghairon in the past. The two would choose others to be Lords as before, he said, and they would rule in secret, as before—save for himself. He removed his mask, and said, "I am Baeron. I would be Lord as Ahghairon was before. I would be safe in this my city again." And the folk of Waterdeep there agreed. Shilarn, still masked, commanded that the houses of the Two Lords Magister be Outcast. There was protest, and she raised her hands that had blasted the thrones, and it was still again. And the house of Gildeggh and of Zoar were outcast.

Peace returned to the City, and Waterdhavians to their labors. To inhibit discovery of who the Lords were, Baeron selected certain men of character whom he knew well, and appointed them Magisters ("Black Robes," they were soon called, from their robes of office) under the Lords, to judge and apply the laws of Waterdeep in daily affairs. These Magisters he paid well, to raise them from temptation, and gave lodgings to those who feared for safety to dwell among the people. To so serve, he told the City, was a burden, not a proud misuse of authority, and if any wished to no longer serve, or were found wanting, they were not to be vilified, but accorded respect. And over the Magisters the Lords sat in their Court, to correct and overrule the judgments of the Magisters. Baeron told the people that none were to decry or belittle any judgments of Magisters that the Lord saw fit to alter or cast aside. If any thought ill of the offices or those who held them they could turn back to the rule of sword and whim, and perish as had those before them.

Before the Lord's Court Baeron encouraged people to speak freely for the length of a short candle's burning, without fear of chastisement or reproach from the Lords for anything said, as long as they spoke openly and answered questions or opposing views put to them by any there. Thus, he held, just grievances of folk would be heard, no matter how small the matter or lowly the speaker.

And so it was. Slow to take hold, until people knew it for careful justice, but enduring beyond Baeron's time, and beyond Shilarn's time, and beyond the time of their daughter Lhestyn "The Masked Lady," who wed Zelphar Arunsun of Neverwinter, and was mother to Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun, a Lord of Waterdeep today, who knows the secrets of long years as Ahghairon did. And as the years have passed, Waterdeep has grown in size and variety, flourishing with good trade under the tolerance and protection of strong defenders and good government; there is no city of the Realms able to rival Waterdeep the Mighty in all these things today.

AND NOW THE NEWS...

News spreads rapidly in Waterdeep. The diplomats and those who ship goods by land or sea to or from "the Realms afar" have a professional interest in learning of current events (and rumors) speedily, and many others take a natural interest in such information.

Waterdeep's crossroads nature makes it a very good place to hear of things—and falsehoods are more likely to be revealed in the City of Splendors than it other cities of the Realms, because such a large number of widely-traveled beings of experience and knowledge are gathered there. If PCs go seeking information, a DM should exploit the role-playing possibilities, following the general guideline that only technical information or Guild secrets are for sale (and rarely, "state" secrets; these are almost always details of the doings, intentions, and military strength of other realms and city-states, not Waterdeep itself). All else is given in return for only a drink or a trade of information. Contacts or sources are never revealed except to fellow adventurers or Guild members. If the PCs attempt to spread news or rumors, a DM must judge their effectiveness according to their methods and current events in the City. Generally, seven days is the longest news will take to spread throughout the City. News of Palace doings or public disputes in main streets is usually everywhere by the evening of the day after the events occurred.

Below follow a few items of current news in the City (a DM should develop his or her own constant stream of similar rumors and facts; if kept fairly constant, they seem real and not a deliberate, "hey, here's an adventure!" ploy, although any may be so developed by interested DMs). In addition, the news of the Realms found in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set may be used. All information therein is current as of early Mirtul, in the Year of the Prince.

- Nather, a merchant from Amn, has been robbed of six identical very valuable statues. The seven-foot-tall elven male nudes, sculpted of white marble by unknown artisans long ago, are said to be very heavy, fragile, and incredibly life-like. They vanished from the locked interior of a warehouse in the docks area, without disturbing a dozen private guards. Magic is suspected. The City Watch has contacted The Watchful Order of Magists & Protectors for professional assistance.

- Alusair Nacacia, a princess of far-off Cormyr who has been missing for over a year, and is sought after by her father, King Azoun IV, who has offered 12,000 pieces of gold and a knighthood for her safe return, has been seen in the City. She is said to be living as an adventurer, and as the companion of one of the powerful mages of Waterdeep, but it is not known which one. A man who boasted that he knew was found petrified at his corner tavern seat moments after he spoke, and his stone form subsequently and mysteriously shattered. "Alusair is known to be slim, short, and winsomely beautiful; impish and dark-eyed," the diplomat Aszundar Zel of Neverwinter described her three winters ago, after a court visit. Since Alusair's disappearance, many wild and colorful rumors as to her whereabouts have made the rounds.

- Zulmark Korathar, the famous fighter-adventurer, is said to be gathering companions to form a new adventuring company, to explore certain abandoned dwarven cities he has located under mountains in the North. Interested parties can find him most nights in The Bloody Fist (#272 Presper & Snail Streets, Dock Ward); the grizzled, one-eyed veteran of The Blue Mask and The Riders of the Night adventuring companies (both now disbanded) is said to know the North as few other living men do, and to have fought more fearsome monsters than any men living—if at least half of the tales he tells over a jack of wine are to be believed.

- On two nights in the past month, wyverns have been seen in the night skies over the City. Griffon-mounted Guard patrols sent aloft found nothing, so magic is suspected. The Watchful Order of Magists & Protectors fears that an evil mage of Waterdeep or a nearby, hidden locale has developed a spell that summons and/or teleports wyverns, and controls them in servitude to the caster. No attacks or thefts connected to the sightings have yet been reported.

POLITICS, CRIME & PUNISHMENT

Herein the formal politics of Waterdeep are discussed—the intrigue of guilds, contending factions, and power groups is left to a later chapter. A general note is necessary, however; “social level” is far less important in Waterdeep than in other cities of the Realms (and presumably, elsewhere); the crossroads nature of the City and the up-and-down fortunes of those who make their living in trade makes the inhabitants of the City of Splendors tolerant of a wide variety of peoples, with widely varying customs, religions, incomes, and interests. A paladin native to Waterdeep, for example, would readily accept that people who reject rigid authority are just as “good” and worthy of his aid and protection as their more enlightened neighbors, unless they are actively evil. In like manner, a cavalier might think himself above a dung-sweeper of the City’s streets, but he would never act more superior in dealings with the sweeper beyond a slight condescension and a simplification of speech and manners. Low birth or station is not in Waterdeep a recipe for ridicule or rudeness from one’s betters, beyond what one’s actions would earn from one’s equals in any case. Visiting cavaliers and paladins are, of course, a different matter, although they are soon enlightened by those of all walks of life (or by the Watch, if they are very objectionable). “Live and let live” is a good description of the attitude of most Waterdhavians to their neighbors; everyone is busy in the pursuit of wealth, and prudes, gossips, and folk who wish to tell others how to act, think, and live are more a source of entertainment than a serious social force.

GOVERNMENT

Waterdeep is presently governed by sixteen Lords of Waterdeep, who are seen by the general populace only when sitting in the Lord’s Court, identities concealed by identical masks and robes. It is rare indeed for more than seven Lords to sit in Court on a given occasion.

This democratic council has a largely secret membership. Everyone knows that Piergeiron “the Paladinson,” Warden of Waterdeep (= commander of the City Guard), Overmaster of the Guilds, and Commander of the Watch is a Lord of Waterdeep. The paladin sits openly in his golden-spired palace conducting the City’s diplomatic and legal business. Among the citizens, it is generally agreed that the archmage Khelben “Blackstaff” Arunsun is also of the Lords (perhaps chief among them), but no one who knows the identities of the other Lords for certain has made them public knowledge. One hears the names Mirt, Larissa, and Texter.

DMs are encouraged to develop their own Lords—six are left undescribed here, although one should bear in mind that any Lords created should be of fairly low public profile (i.e. should not be noble, and cannot be Guildmasters), and must be of essentially good alignment (probably neutral, or perhaps lawful) to fit the established character of the council, which already has its share of chaotic good members, notably Mirt. This will allow DMs to use Lords “behind the scenes” to influence events in Waterdeep, foiling any players who read this and learn the identities of the Lords given here, and allow DMs some “elbow room” for future modifications that a completely open and set membership would not permit (and the mystery adds to the fun).

The penalty for impersonating a Lord is death: on the spot, without delay, with speak with the dead magics employed later to find out why, as time permits. The Lords all know each other, and Piergeiron can demand that they unmask to him at any time (refusal is itself a capital offense).

PIERGEIRON “the Paladinson”

Palace, all wards 14th (or greater?) level paladin
LG Tyr
Human male

Piergeiron is the only openly-known Lord of Waterdeep, and speaks for all the Lords. He is also the City of Splendor’s chief diplomat to foreign powers and its chief defender, being both Commander of the Watch and Warden (commander) of the Guard. As Overmaster of the Guilds, he has clear authority to override Guild law, and his decree is the only absolute law in this city of interpretation and subtle evasion. As such, he is very safe from Waterdhavians—and his life is threatened by foreign powers, such as Amn, Calimshan, and Luskan, for the same reason: he is so above reproach, and so able in his administration and justice, that the City flourishes. Waterdhavians could not conceive of a better man to fill the offices Piergeiron discharges; those wishing the City ill want to remove him if at all possible. Piergeiron speaks seldom, and slowly; as a result, he is sometimes snidely known as “the Thickskull,” though never to his face. He is not stupid, but often pretends to be, to draw others out into verbal admissions they might otherwise not make. His grander nickname is due to the fact that his father Athar, “The Shining Knight,” The Arm of Tyr, was a very famous paladin adventurer of the North.

KHELLEN “Blackstaff” ARUNSUN (KELLEN AIR-un-sun)

Blackstaff Tower, all wards, travels widely (including extraplanar)
26th (or greater?) level magic-user
LN (strong Good tendencies) Mystra
Human Male

Khelben is the most powerful and influential archmage of the Sword Coast, and is one of the rulers of Waterdeep (although he does not admit this openly, most in the North suspect him of being so). Allied to the Harpers, and instrumental in keeping the Lords’ Alliance (of Silverymoon, Sundabar, Neverwinter, and other “good” cities of the North, with Waterdeep) intact, Khelben is always working to influence this or that occurrence or trend, looking years ahead. He is a forester and a painter, and has tutored many mages of note (including Malchor Harpell, Savengriff, and Nain).

Khelben appears as a tall (6’), well-muscled, bearded man with a receding hairline, black hair shot through with silver, and a distinguished manner. He is gravely wise, not pompous, and is fully learned in the history, lore, and traditions of magic as practised by humans in the North since the rise from barbarism.

It is suggested that DMs adjust Khelben’s level upwards to ten levels above the strongest PC, for use in humbling “run-away” characters. Note that Khelben can escape by an Elminster’s evasion (improved contingency) spell if he gets into trouble, and can always call on Malchor, Nain, and Savengriff for aid if need be, by means of a sending.

MIRT “the Moneylender”

Mirt’s Mansion, all wards Fighter of unknown level
CG Tymora
Human male

A fat, casual, hard-drinking man, coarse-mannered and gruff (in earlier days, also lusty and brawling), Mirt is really one of the most shrewd Lords of Waterdeep, even if secretly romantic and soft-hearted. Often seen wheezing about from tavern to tavern in food-stained clothing, Mirt “the Moneylender” is a very rich man. He was once a successful mercenary general of the North and Sword Coast lands, Mirt “the Merciless.” Mirt is one of the most influential Lords, well-loved by his fellows (even the paladins). He is wise in tactics and in judging the characters of beings of all races and creeds. Mirt's constant companion is the young fighter Asper, whom he once rescued as an infant from a sacked city, and whom he regards as his little girl, despite her now-matured beauty. (Asper is a fighter of unknown level, DEX 17 CHA 16, CG, worships Tymora, and is a lithe, petite beauty, soft-spoken yet merry.)

Larissa Neathal
4th level fighter
NG Sune

Larissa Neathal is a courtesan of Waterdeep who plays a giggling, empty-headed sex-kitten with all the visiting envoys and diplomats she has time for, and gathers all the information for the Lords that she can this way. When weary or upset, however, she turns to Durnan (see below) for comfort. Her capacity for court parties is legendary, and she can dance all day and all night if necessary, without apparent ill effects. She is either immune to most poisons or sleep drugs, or has some sort of magical protection against these.

Texter
17th (or greater) level paladin
LG

Texter is a paladin, like Piergeiron a follower of Tyr. Unlike Piergeiron, Texter has little patience for ceremony, and prefers to be out and about doing things, such as leading road and ship patrols around Waterdeep tirelessly. His vigilance has prevented the City of Splendors from being surprised by attacking enemies on several occasions.

Every so often, Texter feels he has to renew his faith and dedication by solitary rides into the Northern wilderness, where he singlehandedly battles any orcs, trolls, or other evil creatures he encounters, and inspects firsthand conditions in the North. Texter is almost fearless, but he is not stupid. He will consider attacking twelve orcs single-handed to be fair odds, but will retreat before an orc horde to warn the city, rather than charging to attack.

Durnan
12th level (or greater) fighter
NG

Durnan "the Wanderer" is a retired (?) fighter who now runs The Yawning Portal inn (building #4) in Waterdeep (which contains a well-like shaft leading down into Undermountain, the subterranean ways under Mount Waterdeep). He is a closemouthed, prudent man who hates unfairness and injustice, but is tolerant of the differing interests of others, until they draw a weapon in his inn, whereupon he promptly punishes them severely on the spot. Durnan and Mirt are old friends, once companions in adventure. Many years before he met Mirt in a sea-battle, Durnan was a solitary, wandering adventurer, who traveled the North extensively.

Durnan was born somewhere in the remote North, and especially hates hobgoblins. Mirt believes that Durnan's family, friends, and neighbors were slain by hobgoblins, leaving Durnan homeless when he was a child, but this is no more than a guess; Durnan will not talk of such things. When Durnan doesn't want to answer any questions, he will simply look at the questioner with a calm, expressionless face and say nothing. He shouts in battle, but rarely gets into verbal arguments, retreating instead into silence. The Dungeon Master should refer to the Red Sashes (covered in Chapter 5) for further information on Durnan's activities.

Nymara Scheiron
7th level (or greater) thief

"Kitten" Nymara Scheiron; few people even among the Lords know the full name of this tousle-haired, fierce female of middle years, occasionally savage temper, and lush figure. "Kitten" she is to all, a hard-bitten entertainer and sometime-thief of Waterdeep's docks, who was recruited by Mirt and Khelben over a decade ago to the ranks of the Lords. It is her practical outlook that influences the details of many an action of the Lords. She knows how this or that decree will appear to, and work among, the common folk. "Kitten" once fought an evil demigod ("the Godson," son of Bane) toe-toe with blades when a summoning by a company of adventurers went awry. She is servile to no-one. She regards Mirt, Durnan, Larissa, and Khelben as her dear friends, and delights in relaxing with them on a night when she is not on the streets or poking about in the goods of this or that suspicious visitor to the City. Kitten will not take a copper piece from her fellow Lords, fiercely rejecting any gifts or charity. Nymara can appear as a stunningly beautiful lady of high station if she wishes to do so (very rare), but is more often to be found heavily perfumed and made-up, dressed revealingly and lounging in an alley or bar of the docks. In less distinctive garb, she is expert at following people in the streets without being noticed, and is familiar with the sewers of the City and the roofs in many districts, as highways faster and less crowded than the open streets.

Sammereza Sulphontis

Sammereza Sulphontis is a slightly slimmer, slightly younger, and far more polished and mannered version of Mirt. This tireless traveling merchant is seldom to be found within the City walls. He will sell anything to anyone, buy almost anything from anyone, and trade most things with most people, as Durnan once put it. As this sly, witty, iron-nerved, sometimes oily wheeler-dealer makes his way about the Realms, dealing in anything from loads of fresh manure to slaves (although he neglects to inform Texter and Piergeiron of this latter trade good), his eyes miss little. Much of the Lords' information about the South and the lands east of the Inner Sea comes from Sammereza, who is known to have some means of teleporting himself back to Waterdeep in time of danger or when news is urgent. Sammereza's precise abilities are left to the DM.

Caladorn
8th level (or greater) cavalier

Caladorn is a cavalier born and raised in Waterdeep. He has chosen to drop his family name of Cassalanter (see Chapter 6) until he "does something worthy of it," as he has told his father Ohrl, current head of house Cassalanter. This allows Caladorn to retain the privileges of his birth, and be gracefully free of his father's direct authority. Ohrl is unaware that his son is a Lord of Waterdeep.

Caladorn is young, sardonic, very perceptive and intelligent, and fun-loving when he can find an occasion to abandon his customary serious resolve, in private. He is a Knight Bachelor. Although he is not yet fully aware of it, he is beginning to grow restless for adventure. On several occasions, he has accompanied raker ship crews into battle, although the captains did not know that their passenger was a Lord, only that he was a bored young noble who could lend them an extra swordarm. Khelben and Durnan, and to a lesser extent Mirt, view Caladorn as one of the important Lords who will carry on after they are gone, although they view his noble background as a handicap to be overcome before he will be truly suitable for such a task. As Mirt puts it, "too often that lad thinks like the blueblood he is—arrogant, self-assured, knows the place for everything and everyone—and dead wrong. A little dose of the real world'd do him all the good, 't would."

Brian "the Swordmaster"
12th level fighter
NG

Brian "the Swordmaster" is a Smith of skill. His nickname is a title of proficiency in his craft, although he has gone beyond the skills of a swordsmith, and is now a master armorer—in short, Brian is as skilled a smith as it is possible for a human to be, able to craft items of lasting durability, beauty, and exquisite workmanship. Brian spends most of his time at his forge, and is known for his simple, direct (some would say blunt) way of looking at things. Brian and "Kitten" are the most practical of the Lords, followed by Mirt and Durnan, capable of seeing weak points in plans, and anticipating social problems long before they occur.

The policies of the Lords are announced publicly through Piergeiron; it is suggested that PCs not be able to dupe, infiltrate, spy upon, join the ranks of, or easily slay any of the Lords: they are not, and should not be played as, pushovers. The Helms worn by the Lords when they appear in public, which support their featureless masks, are enchanted. The wearer is protected against divination spells and other mind-reading and -controlling powers, as noted in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set, under "Waterdeep."

Justice

Beneath Piergeiron and the mysterious Lords are the magistrates, or Magisters, and two enforcement arms of authority: the City Guards (or military), and the City Watch (police).

MAGISTERS. Twenty-six Magisters conduct the Common Courts of the City. At least three such officials are always on duty at the Palace, and during daylight hours there is also a Magister at each gate of the City. These "Black Robes" can pass sentence instantly, although most make sentences conditional on the supporting evidence of witnesses. They are always accompanied by a bodyguard of at least six members of the City Guard. Any citizen of Waterdeep is allowed an appeal to the Lord's Court within two days. The Lord's Court is chaired by Piergeiron (at least two other Lords must also attend), and is held at about highsun (noon) every day. This court hears all cases of murder and other "severe" crimes, reports of suspicious deaths, rape, misuse of magic, and appeals from the citizenry against Magisterial judgments. Most judgments are upheld or reworded in a minor way, it should be noted. The Magisters are good and perceptive men, or they do not hold their positions for long. Magisters can be created at will by public decree of the Lords.

GUARD AND WATCH. Visitors to Waterdeep often confuse the City Guard and the City Watch; the former are the heavily-trained, fully-armored men-at-arms who are permanently employed by the City as crews of the rakers, fighting troops when the City or its interests are attacked, road patrols outside the City walls, and as garrisons for Piergeiron's Palace, Castle Waterdeep, and the many guardposts along the City's perimeter—towers, walls, seacaves, jails, and armories. The Guard also serves as bodyguards for Piergeiron and as honor guards for visiting diplomats. The City gates are manned by both by the Guard, who control access and see to the security of the City from attack, and by patrols of the Watch, who observe those entering, and are ready to aid the Guard in troubles, chase fugitives so that the Guard need not abandon their posts, or escort visitors if required.

The Watch, far more often seen by most citizens and visitors, are the City's daily, domestic police, and do far more than arrest offenders. They may aid passersby with heavy loads, give directions, search for lost children, provide basic medical aid, and referee gambling disputes or childrens' fights during a typical patrol. A Watch street patrol usually consists of four men, afoot, two being officers—an "armar" (sergeant) and a "civilar" (captain or lieutenant)—and all being clad in leather and chain armor of green, black, and gold, base AC 7 (the Guard's armor is scale mail of black, silver, and gold), and armed with rods (treat as clubs), daggers, and short swords. The Watch has access to the Guard's armories in the Castle, Palace, and wall-towers. Reinforcements rushing to the scene of a dispute may be on horse and may wear all manner of armor and bear all manner of arms, as required. Watch patrols are many; all members of the Watch can enter any building or area in the City without hindrance or warning, unless specifically forbidden to by a Lord (not a Magister or senior Watch or Guard officer) and search any person, place, or container at will. Certain areas of the City are, by tradition, lightly patrolled (the docks, for example) and others are very heavily patrolled (the City of the Dead, for example, and the streets around the villas of the wealthy in the northern areas of the City). If a Watch patrol encounters a major disturbance, they will blow the distinctive "trembling" note horns they carry on their belts to summon aid, and one member of the patrol will immediately run to the nearest guardtower or fixed-location guardpost to spread the word.

Under the command of Piergeiron, the Watch is run by its Captain, Rulathon, a 12th level LG fighter (see "Selected Non-Player Characters"). His messengers are the "Officers of the Day" (four Watchmen chosen from the ranks), and he leaves the administration of Watch weaponry and equipment to the Senior Armsmaster, Helve Urtrace, a 5th level LG fighter (see Chapter 7).

The size of the Guard and the Watch is known only to Piergeiron and the Lords, but is strictly controlled, and thought to be approximately 1,200 Guard and 1,600 Watch. In times of strife, Waterdeep usually hires mercenaries and installs Guardsmen as officers over them. The professionally curious are warned that Piergeiron has deliberately subdivided the payrolls of these forces so that it is difficult for visiting diplomats and others engaged in snooping (pardon, sightseeing) to discover the true size and names of the Guard and the Watch, and these figures may only be two-thirds or even less of the true totals.

Laws

Waterdhavians are, by and large, a law-abiding people—when so many of the City's inhabitants earn their living by trade, respect for property is high, and support for a strong, objective police force even more so. The wearing of weapons is allowed in the city, as is using them in clear self-defense, but duels are allowed only in specific places (such as the various open courtyards in the southern part of the City), and must be marshalled by an officer of the Watch or a Magister. A duel must be for reasons of a specific, unprovoked injury, allowed by a Magister; simply hilling citizens because you covet their money or don't like their faces is not sanctioned. Lords, Magisters, Guard and Watch members, and Heralds (even visiting ones) are exempt from challenges, and the Lords usually forbid any duellings involving the heads of the Guilds, noble houses, or priesthoods, too, although rank-and-file members of all of these organizations can and do duel, sometimes with great enthusiasm. Duels are seldom to the death; more often, they are to yield or first blood, whichever first occurs; and clerics usually attend to heal (upon payment of temple donations) the loser, and sometimes the winner too.

If a Watch patrol makes an arrest, two of its four members must accompany an accused to a Magister immediately, the other two remaining on patrol, or if necessary assisting or protecting victims or abandoned property. If a vendor is arrested, the two Watchmen who remain must guard his goods and conduct business for him to the best of their abilities, although they are not responsible for lost business or losses to monies or property in the arrested person's absence. One officer will be with each half of a split patrol, never staying together while their two subordinates go elsewhere together.

For restraining and guiding very dangerous or active suspects, each patrol carries two rolled-up leather "capture hoods"—large sacks with tiny air-holes which are thrown over a person's head and then drawn tight with straps around the person's waist or belly, pinioning arms to sides and hampering visibility. Guide-ropes can be clipped to the hood to pull a confined person along in a certain direction, or used by several officers and a lot of strength to hold a confined person away from others that the person is attempting to reach by pulling on lines on all sides of the hood, preventing the arrested from lunging.

Watch patrols when arresting will employ Grappling to disarm and capture suspects who do not stand and surrender or throw down or sheathe their weapons when challenged. If the suspect continues to be violent, Pummeling and Overbearing will be used, the object being to hold the suspect down by sheer weight while he or she is disarmed and bound, with feet hobbled, or a capture hood is put on.

In cases of great danger to Watch officers (such as an angry mage wielding wand, rod, or staff, or a fighter attacking with an apparently magical blade), the Watch will slay to defend themselves and employ speak with the dead later to determine guilt or innocence. Innocent parties are always raised at the City's expense, if possible. Watch officers who must kill in the line of duty are never charged, nor held financially responsible, for the deaths they bring about. An officer who kills often without clear cause will be dismissed. Much of the laws of Waterdeep remain unwritten, within the "reasonable discretion" of the Magisters (and ultimately, of the Lords who may overrule them), and therefore cannot all be set down here. A summary of sentences, the "Code Legal," is provided below.

CODE LEGAL

Crimes and their corresponding sentences, as administered by the Lords and Magisters of Waterdeep, can be roughly summarized as set forth below. This system is known as the "Code Legal," and is only a basis for sentencing, not absolute rules. Note that both Lords and Magisters are free to determine absolutely guilt and innocence, and set any lesser sentence they consider fitting (or none at all) if a crime is deemed justified or largely harmless and unintentional.

A single act can result in multiple charges, under one or more of the four "Plaints." Magisterial justice may be appealed to the Lords by anyone, but such appeals must be within nine days of the initial sentencing, and non-citizens of Waterdeep must persuade a citizen of the City ("money is the great persuader," Durnan once remarked dryly) to appeal on their behalf.

The four Plaints are the four different classes of aggrieved parties; that is, those who are injured by a crime. They are Crimes Against The Lords; Crimes Against The City; Crimes Against The Gods; and Crimes Against Citizens. Under each Plaintiff are four classes of crimes. These four types of offenses are Severe; Serious; Lesser; and Minor.

The sentences have been set forth below in a chart to save space. After the letter that denotes a type of punishment, an amount (of time or money) usually follows. The commercial nature of the City, with its emphasis on mercantile trade and property, is clearly reflected in these "typical" punishment. The City is empowered to seize and sell the property of a convict to realize the money needed to satisfy the payment of fines or damages, without the consent of a convict. The family, clan, guild, or business partners of a convict are never liable for the payment of a convict's fines or damages, unless they can be proven to have aided, abetted, ordered, or coerced a convict into the criminal activity in question.

Temples and priesthods are not permitted to pass or carry out sentences under the Third Plaintiff; only officers of the City may do so.

Convicted beings may owe fines to the City and pay as they can over time, but only upon permission of a Lord or Magister, who will typically demand at least a partial payment immediately.

SENTENCES

A	Death (instant)
B	Death (upon conviction)
C	Exile or Ban Against Future Entry
D	Mutilation (loss of offending extremities, branding)
E	Enforced Hard Labor
F	Imprisonment (dungeon)
G	Imprisonment (light work in Castle compound)
H	Fine (payable to City)
I	Damages (payable to injured party)
J	Edict Against Convicted (public pronouncement forbidding convicted to do something; e.g. continue in present business, repeat circumstances that led to an offense, etc.)

The First Plaintiff: Crimes Against The Lords

SEVERE:

- Treason (including Assault Upon a Lord): A
- Impersonation of a Lord: A
- Impersonation of Magister: B after flogging
- Forgery of an Official Document: B or C (permanent) plus D
- Assault Upon A Magister: B or F (10 years) after flogging

SERIOUS:

- Theft, Vandalism, or Arson Against The Palace or any part of the City Walls, E (as justice demands) plus H (cost of repairs plus 2,000 gold pieces)

- Impersonation of a Guardsman or Officer of the Watch: F (as justice demands) plus H (5,000 gold pieces) and flogging

- Repetition of any Lesser or Minor Offense Against This Plaintiff: E or F (1 month) and/or H (up to 1,000 gold pieces)

- Willful Disobedience of any Edict Uttered Against One By A Lord: H (up to 1,000 gp) and/or C (up to 5 years)

LESSER:

- Unlawful Observation or Copying of an Official Document: F (3 weeks) plus H (300 gp)

- Assault Upon Any City Officer Who Is Acting In The Line Of Duty: F (1 week) plus H (as justice demands; usually based on ability to pay; flogging if unable to pay anything)

MINOR:

- Blasphemy Against Lord, Magister, or any City Officer: G (4 days) plus H (20 gp)

The Second Plaintiff: Crimes Against The City

SEVERE:

- Poisoning of Water (City Wells; includes attempted blockage or attempts to control public access, or charge fees for such access): A

- Murder: B or E (10-15 years)

- Spying, Sabotage: B or C (permanent) plus H (costs of repairs plus 2,000-5,000 gp) or F (20 years) plus H

SERIOUS:

- Fraud: C (permanent) and I (as justice demands) or F (up to 10 years) and I, and J

- Fencing Stolen Goods: G (up to 2 years) and H (typically twice the price the goods were sold for) and J

- Unlawful Duelling (Manslaughter): C (up to 5 years) and I (to family, typically 1,000 gp) or E (up to 3 years) and I

- Murder With Justification. C (up to 5 years) or E (up to 3 years)

- Repetition of Any Lesser or Minor Offense Against This Plaintiff: F (1 month) and H (up to 1,000 gp) and J

- Bribery of a City Officer or Official (attempted or apprehended): C (up to 20 years) and confiscation of all property except one weapon, one week's rations, and clothes worn by offender

LESSER:

- Unlawful Entry Into The Harbor (1 charge per vessel per occasion). C (1 year) and H (500 gp)

- Unlawful Duelling (apprehended, i.e. on fatality): G (1 week) and H (100 gp) and J

MINOR: • Bribery: G (1 week) and/or H (amount of bribe or attempted bribe)

- Unlawful Flight Intrusion (into City airspace, of intelligent being flying by means of an aerial mount or magic): H (300 gp) and J (in peacetime; in wartime, sentence can be A)

- Blasphemy Against Foreign Ambassadors: G (up to 1 week), H (50 gp) and J

- Vagrancy: F (overnight)

- Littering (includes Relief of Human Wastes in Public). F (overnight) and H (2 sp to 1 gp, based on ability to pay) and J

- Brandishing A Weapon Dangerously or Threateningly Without Due Cause (note: being in a brawl is not “due cause” unless one is menaced with a weapon): F (overnight) and H (1 gp)

- Dangerous Operation of a Coach Wagon Litter or other Conveyance (including Airborne): H (5-50 gp, as justice demands, note that this will be in addition to the sentence for any charges placed under The Fourth Plaint)

The Third Plaint: Crimes Against The Gods

SEVERE: • Defiling of a Holy Place (Temple Burglary, Temple Arson, or Temple Vandalism). C (5 years) and I (as justice demands) or E (up to 5 years) and I or F (up to 3 years) and I

SERIOUS: • Theft of Temple Goods or Offerings (includes spoilage or consumption of same). F (up to 1 month) and I (double the estimated value of the goods) and J

- Tomb-Robbing (or Unlawful Entry and/or Vandalism of a Tomb): G (up to 1 week) and I (costs of repairs and replacements plus up to 500 gp, payable to whoever maintains the tomb—temple, guild, City, or family) and J

- Repetition of any Lesser or Minor Offense Against This Plaint: G (up to 1 week) and H (up to 1,000 gp) and J

LESSER: • Assault Upon A Priest or Lay Worshiper: I (of up to 500 gp; payable to temple and usually based on ability to pay) and J (in addition to charges placed under the Fourth Plaint arising from such an assault)

MINOR: • Public Blasphemy of a God or Priesthood: I (up to 10 gp, based on ability to pay) and J

- Drunkenness (and Disorderly Conduct) at Worship: I (up to 3 gp, based on ability to pay) and J

The Fourth Plaint: Crimes Against Citizens

SEVERE: • Arson (of Ship, Structure, or Stored Property), E (up to 3 months) and I (value lost plus up to 500 gp), and/or C (up to 10 years) and I

- Rape: D and I (up to 2,000 gp) or E (up to 5 years) and I or F (up to 10 years) and I

- Assault Resulting In Mutilation or Crippling: D and I (up to 2,000 gp) or E (up to 3 years) and I

- Magical Assault H (up to 1,000 gp) and I (up to 2,000 gp) and J

- Forgery (not including official City documents): C (up to 20 years) and D and the confiscation of all property except 1 weapon, 1 week’s rations, and offender’s clothing worn at the time of sentencing

- Slavery: C (up to 10 years) and flogging if shackling, cruelty, whipping, branding, or physical indignities are observed

SERIOUS • Robbery: E (up to 1 month) and I (value of goods lost plus up to 500 gp)

- Burglary: F (up to 3 months) and I (value of goods lost plus up to 500 gp)

- Theft or Killing of Livestock: (double cost of lost stock)

- Repetition of any Lesser or Minor Offense Against This Plaint: F (up to 1 week) and I (double normal), or G (up to 2 weeks) and I (double normal)

- Usurv: I (City recovers excess over legal rates, returns to injured party)

LESSER: • Damage to Property: I (value of goods lost plus up to 500 gp) and

- Assault (Wounding): I (cost of medical attention plus up to 500 gp) and J

- Assault on Livestock (non-fatal): I (cost of medical attention plus up to 500 gp; maximum damages always apply if livestock’s breeding capability is impaired)

- Unlawful Hindrance of Business: I (up to 200 gp) and J (this charge includes instances of blocking access to a place of business without permission of owner or a Magister; and trying to frighten, disgust, or drive away customers in or in front of another’s shop)

MINOR: • Assault (without wounding or robbery): F (overnight) and I (up to 50 gp)

- Excessive Noise (interfering with sleep or business): I (up to 25 gp) and J

A DM should use the “elbow room” created by this discretionary legal system just as the Lords do; to create any necessary decrees to prevent Player Characters from running amok. Magisters and Lords have in the past made laws (edicts) specific to certain individuals (e.g. “Sibrin the Warrior may not enter the City of the Dead at any time, for any reason except his own final burial”), and will continue to do so.

Guild Law

Guild Law, the rules under which specific trades are conducted, are distinct from City law and are discussed in the chapter that describes Guilds. Guild law can never conflict or override City law or the known intent of such laws; Guilds pay careful attention to all that is said by any Lord, and govern their affairs accordingly. On two occasions since the destruction of the Two Lords Magister Guildmasters have defied or quietly contradicted edicts of the Lords, and on both occasions the Guildmaster was exiled, and his or her family ordered expelled from the Guild, though not from the City. Waterdeep is often called “The Open City” when trade and guilds are discussed, because its Guilds are not all powerful, and cannot restrict trade to their members only; the Lords and Magisters are strict and vigilant about this. Tradesmen operating outside of a Guild, of course, are not entitled to Guild rights and privileges, and the Guilds concerning cannot be held responsible for the actions of such outsiders, and are allowed to make very public the fact that this or that person is not part of the Guild.

Taxes and Fees

At present, the City collects no annual taxes, but raises its revenues by the charging of fees, as follows:

- 1 copper piece per market stall per day, payable to any Watch patrol between sunrise and sunset, who will issue a receipt for it, to show later patrols that the fee has been paid. This buys the exclusive use of a certain area from sunrise to sunset, covering patrols by the Watch, and freedom to sell goods at whatever the market will bear, rather than at prices set or recommended by Guilds or priesthods. Guilds customarily pay these fees for their members, out of guild revenues and dues.

- 1 silver piece (extra, above any fines imposed) from everyone convicted in a Magisterial or Lords’ Court, per conviction.

- 1 gold piece per caravan wagon leaving the City, empty or full.

- 1 gold piece (included in the sale price, and surrendered by the vendor to the Watch or a Magister within ten days) per sword sold; all blades sold within Waterdeep are so taxed, and registered but other sorts of weapons are not taxed; hence, many citizens of Waterdeep employ clubs and daggers (and if of shady character, garrots, nets, and lassos) rather than swords; Magisters deem anything with a blade over a foot long to be a sword.

- 5 gold pieces per ship that touches dock in Waterdeep (the rakers and diplomatic vessels excepted), collected from the captain and covering a stay of up to fourteen days, provided the ship does not leave the harbor and return during that time, which would end the stay and begin a new one. This covers Watch patrols, the provision of the dock space, fresh water rubble ballast supplied if desired, and the right to dump ballast or spoilage cargoes in an agreed-upon area under the direction of the Watch.

In times of trouble, direct taxes may be imposed:

- a “fire tax” (usually 1 gp per household), levied whenever a major fire destroys a large portion of the City (not a common occurrence; cf. “Plague & Fire” in Chapter 4).
- a “wall tax” or “harbor tax” (of like amount) raised to directly pay for needed repairs or expansions
- a “lance tax” raised to provide a payroll for mercenaries hired by the City when required (this is usually 1 sp/household each week until the Lords repeal the tax)

All in all, Waterdhavians are lightly taxed and know it; they may grumble, but they never collectively revolt or refuse to pay.

Trials & Bribery

There is no bail in Waterdeep, although a Lord can dismiss charges at will. This is rarely done; usually the offender must be an undercover Lord or trusted agent involved in something important to get such a reprieve.

Bribery is a most frowned-upon crime among the general populace. Because of the ill it brings to one’s reputation, no-one native to Waterdeep would ever attempt it, although they might—if very rich—bargain with the Lords to drop (severe) charges in return for forfeiture of a valuable property, vessel, or cargo (this has wryly been referred to by Durnan as “buying back you own skin”).

There are no lawyers in Waterdeep, although there are a few “professional witnesses” who for a fee will state a case to their client’s best advantage before a Black Robe.

Expulsion from the City is the fate of any of these who are caught swearing they saw something that did not in fact occur, or that they were not present to see. Several minor clerics earn regular incomes for themselves or their temples by casting detect lie magics from behind concealing tapestries at a sign from a Magister. The fee paid by the City is 500 gold pieces per spell cast, and so this service is used only in the most delicate of important cases.

The death penalty is customarily employed only to deal with dangerous and incurable lunatics, murderers, and those who commit acts of treason against the City or the Lords.

Sentences of death are usually carried out on the battlements of Castle Waterdeep if commoners or soldiers must die—for death in such cases is by hanging, usually at highsun (noon). Several massive, permanent wooden scaffolds are cantilevered out from the Castle walls on the south side. Nobles die by the sword; such beheadings are usually carried out in front of the Palace gates. Floggings are more often carried out in the Court of the White Bull, but may be carried out anywhere if an example to the citizenry of a particular neighborhood is intended.

Debts

Most Waterdhavians are sentenced for debts of one sort or another—either debts to another citizen or outstanding debts owed to the City due to unpaid fees or taxes or fines imposed by a Black Robe or Lord which cannot be (or are not) paid within a specified period of time. Such “payoff” periods are set by the sentencer, and are usually twenty days, exactly, from the date and time of the sentencing. Minor personal (private) debts are paid off by the offender, by having him work for the person he owes money to (Watch officers will check on attendance to, and diligence in, this enforced servitude), until service, at the going market rate, equals the debt owed.

Major debts may result in the City paying the person owed from its own coffers, and the offender becoming an unpaid sewer, wall, or road repair worker until the debt is cleared.

In times of strife, such offenders have found themselves pressed into service as temporary soldiers, or rowers on a seagoing raker, on the understanding that they are free of debt if they survive to make it back to Waterdeep with their ship or military unit. Only the Lords can approve a recommendation by a Magister, senior Watch officer, or one of their number to seize property or goods of an offender to pay fines; this they do rarely—but, combined with exile from the City, it provides an effective last-resort method of removing persistent troublemakers.

Written contracts or note-of-hand are required to prove to a Black Robe that a debt is owed, if a citizen wishes to bring a complaint before the Courts. All careful merchants will get and give written documents in their dealings, even if their trade is unlawful (for example, the selling of privileged information overheard in the Palace might appear on an invoice as “three horses,” or slaves—discussed below—as “six sacks of finest barley, unmilled”).

Thievery

Most thieves in Waterdeep are independent artists, of low level and, if they are not both unusually lucky and skilled, soon caught, unless they steal seldom, taking advantage of misfortune, a fight, or other confusion to steal unattended goods. Kidnapers, those who rob and then slay their victims, and those who indulge in torture are pursued tirelessly by the authorities. Only blackmailers, it seems, flourish in Waterdeep. Thieves of all sorts are reminded (often painfully and too late) that Waterdeep is a city of much magic and powerful (high-level) people, and escaping detection is difficult. There is no organized Guild of thieves in the City, due to diligent policing and the activities of the Red Sashes (q.v.).

Slavery

Slavery is illegal in Waterdeep; within the City walls, no one is deemed a slave, and may not be treated as one—no branding, shackling, or physical punishment. If any of these are observed in public (this includes inns and businesses, but not private homes, pleasure houses, festhalls, and warehouses), charges will result, usually including immediate imprisonment for the offender, so that the slave has time to escape. Many slaves are brought into the City, however, for slavery is common in Calimshan and Thay, and not unknown in the northern Moonsea area, Unther, and Mulhorand. While in the City, slaves have all the rights of any citizen, and wise owners make a trip to the City of Splendors a holiday for slaves, giving them some spending money, and hire bodyguards (for protection against their own temporarily free slaves, as well as any dangerous residents of Waterdeep) and servitors (to do all the fetching and carrying the slave normally does) for their stay in the City. Many slaves, if they are ever freed or escape, come to Waterdeep because of their happy memories of these holidays.

The selling of slaves, even in the form of a previously-arranged transfer of possession that does not involve any transfer of payment within Waterdeep’s walls, is well-nigh impossible given the vigilance of the Guard, Watch, and the magical arts of allies they can call upon. Durnan and “Kitten” of the Lords have both been slaves in the past, and the Lords as a whole take a savagely dim view of slavers.

Chapter 3: THE CITY WARDS

A complete description of all the buildings in bustling, ever-changing Waterdeep is a task beyond the scope of this book. Features likely to be useful in AD&D® game play, including the suggested adventures in a later chapter, are located and described in this section. Dungeon Masters should make Waterdeep their own, filling in details as necessary for exciting play, and the day-to-day adventures of player characters.

Player characters visiting or resident in Waterdeep have to live somewhere, as thieves take a professional interest in persons who try to sleep outside the walls of the City each night and return when the gates are opened at sunrise. Even when such adventurers are a strong and fearless band, there will be those times when they do not leave the City before the gates are closed at sunset, making necessary a stop-over or at the very least an unpleasant swim or expensive ferry out of the harbor (which never closes).

The neighborhood(s) around the chosen lodgings of PCs must be detailed by a Dungeon Master—and whenever PCs go exploring, or try to find tutors to advance their professional skills, a DM will have to sketch in this or that local eatery, rooming house, or home. Such work must be left for individual DMs, as it necessarily responds to the play of a particular group of gamers.

Buildings

The layout of buildings in play may become important if PCs engage in extensive indoor thieving, stealthy shadowing, and fighting. Space considerations prohibit the provision of floor plans for every building in the City, but random generation of the overall natures of buildings may be accomplished using the table below. Random generation of Class A buildings (see below) and of specific buildings intended beforehand for use in play is not recommended. DMs who contradict themselves on building layout from one PC visit to another are advised that buildings in the City are constantly being rebuilt, renovated, and repaired (a convenient explanation).

Buildings in the City can be artificially divided into four classes, as follows.

Class A: The Palace, Castle Waterdeep, other public structures (e.g. the Arena), Major Temples (including The Plinth), Noble Villas. These buildings are unique, generally large and grand, and random tables are not given here.

Class B: Grand Houses (without grounds or walled gardens; villas always have such), Large Warehouses, prosperous businesses, Guildhalls. Buildings in this class have up to four storeys, and may have extensive cellars (usually connected to the sewers at some point). Most inns in the City fall into this class. (Note: random generation of Guildhall interiors is not recommended.)

Class C: Row Buildings. This class describes the great majority of City buildings, of two or three storeys, and usually having shops on the ground floor, with offices above and apartments above that (or just apartments). This class includes most of the taverns and rooming houses in the City.

Class D: Lesser Buildings (hovels, sheds, small warehouses). This class consists of one-storey buildings, usually of wood, and are mainly found in Dock Ward, with a few in Southern Ward and The Trades Ward, and a handful in the part of the docks which lies in Castle Ward.

Once the class of a given building has been decided by the DM, the following steps can be followed if speedy random generation of building features is desired.

Step 1. Determine number of storeys in building, by deliberate choice or by the methods that follow.

Class B: roll 1d8. Result of 1 = one storey, no basement (cupola and/or skylights possible); 2 = two storeys, no basement; 3 = three storeys, no basement; 4 = four storeys, no basement; 5 = one storey with basement; 6

= two storeys with basement; 7 = three storeys with basement; 8 = four storeys with basement (tower with additional floors possible).

Class C: roll 1d4. Result of 1 = two storeys, no basement; 2 = three storeys, no basement; 3 = three storeys with basement; 4 = 2 storeys with basement.

Class D: roll 1d4. Even result = 1 storey and basement; odd result = 1 storey, no basement. Either type may have a dormer, cupola, or tower to add partial upper levels, and lean-to additions on the sides.

Step 2. Determine condition of building, by deliberate choice or by rolling 1d6. Result of 1 = derelict, boarded up (possibly in use as a secret meeting place by thieves, intrigue groups, monsters, or adventurers); 2 = ramshackle, in need of repair; 3 = well-worn and in heavy daily use, with evidence of some repairs having been made and some further minor ones needed; 4 = in good condition, well-kept and clean; 5 = new or pristine condition, freshly decorated or carefully-maintained, perhaps with ornate trim and furnishings; 6 = currently under construction or extensive repair (includes freshly gutted by fire or damaged by collapse, weather, explosion, et cetera).

Step 3. Determine function of building, by deliberate choice or by rolling 1d10. Consult the table below according to Building Class.

Die Result	Class B	Class C	Class D
01	Warehouse (multi-storey, with elevator or interior hoist)	Warehouse	Warehouse
02	Warehouse (multi-storey with elevator or interior hoist)	Ground floor shops with offices above	Warehouse
03	Offices of Major Business	Ground-floor shops with apartment above	Warehouse
04	Offices of Major Business	Large shop with storage above (roll 1d4; even = proprietor lives above; odd = proprietor lives elsewhere and hires night watchman)	Warehouse
05	Rooming House	Rooming House	Dwelling (single family)
06	Rooming House	Rooming House	Rooming House
07	Ground-floor shop with apartments	Ground-floor shops with offices and apartment above	Shop
08	Ground-floor offices with apartment above	Ground-floor shops with offices and apartment above	Office
09	Residence of a family of noble birth	Apartment block	Dwelling (multi-family)
10	Residence of a noble individual	Apartment Block	Dwelling (space shared with rental storage space)

Features of the City Wards are listed hereafter. Most inhabitants of Waterdeep know all of the major thoroughfares, are familiar with the general layout of the City, and know well the neighborhood(s) where they live, work, and go to eat or be entertained. Waterdeep is a city of much traveling about and little restriction on movement for social class or legal reasons.

Castle Ward

Mount Waterdeep: the mountain is a bald, rough crag, topped by a lookout tower and griffon-steed eyrie; on its seaweed flanks are emplaced eleven gigantic triple-catapults for hurling loads of rock and burning material out to sea against attacking ships; and it is pierced by several sea-caves, connected by tunnels of great antiquity whose creator is unknown, and formerly used for smuggling—but now controlled (and heavily guarded) by the City Guard, and used by the Lords of Waterdeep in occasionally secretive operations.

Castle Waterdeep: Waterdeep's great fortress is a thick-walled stronghold that frowns down on Castle Ward from the flanks of Mount Waterdeep. Pennants and banners are often hung and flown from its battlements to signal the arrival of this or that diplomat or the commencement of gathering for this or that ceremony, because of the great height of the Castle walls make such signs readily visible in the southern half of the City.

The Castle's walls rise four hundred feet at their greatest height from the ground (at the southeastern corner, near the massive beams where hanging are carried out), and average sixty feet thick, with rooms and passages tunneled out of their great bulk. Many protective spells have been placed on the fortress walls over the years, and they have never been breached in battle.

The Castle's various chambers can house 3,000 in comfort, and three times that number if every corner is used for accommodation and food storage. Its normal peacetime garrison is approximately 1,400. The main dungeon levels beneath it contain some ninety cells in all (at any one time, thirty or so will be in use), many large enough to contain six prisoners. The Castle's larders, by edict of the Lords, must contain an emergency food supply (preserved fish and meat, grains and vegetables) large enough to feed 50,000 people for a week; this state is maintained, with about two day's extra viands, by senior Guard officers.

The Guard and Watch both use the Castle courtyard for training their members, and for training horses. Their main stables, containing seventy or so fully-trained and equipped warhorses, are located in the ground level interior of the Castle's south wall.

Signal beacons and horns, and mighty cata-pults capable of commanding the entire harbor of Waterdeep as far as Deepwater Isle and the Torchtowers, are kept ready on the battlements, and there is always a garrison unit of at least thirty ready-armed soldiers of the Guard on duty. The Castle gates and all stations of the walls are always guarded, and just within the gates is a duty guardroom where a strike squad of twenty crossbowmen and two magic-users can reinforce the gate-guard in seconds, and anywhere else in or under the Castle in minutes.

Space prohibits inclusion of detailed floorplans of the Castle; DMs are advised that its twisting passage tunnels (most permanently lit by continual light radiance) are a warren of successive defensive "pockets," suitable for holding off attackers from behind cover, and that there are extensive (known and guarded) "secret passages" allowing defenders to spy (and fire) upon intruders, and to withdraw into the caverns beneath Mount Waterdeep if necessary. Castle Waterdeep is a place of great age and indomitable strength.

Ahghairon's Tower: This small stone tower rises as a slim stone pinnacle with a conical roof and few windows, four storeys from the street. It is always quiet, never visibly changed by the passage of years not disturbed by passersby. Its interior (and possible treasures) are left to the DM, but it should be noted that no one has been able to enter it since Ahghairon's death. The co-operative efforts of all Ahghairon's apprentices laid potent protective magics about it (above and below, as well as all about its walls). These are equal in effects to a permanent forcecage enclosing the entire tower at a distance of ten feet—a barrier visible only as a faint shimmering in the air unless under magical attack (which outlines it clearly). Several times it has been dispelled or cancelled by enterprising mages, only to reform again—trapping them—1 round per level of the attacker later.

Within this forcecage is a prismatic sphere, again invisible except while under attack, and within it is a further invisible force field that if dispelled, will cause by means of contingency magics, unseen warning trumpets to sound the alarm in Piergeiron's Palace, Blackstaff Tower and The Herald's Holdfast (far to the north), and a cyclocone (detailed in Unearthed Arcana, p. 98) to be activated and whirl about the tower in a ring.

Small but powerful iron golems and stone guardians are believed to wait within the Tower to attack intruders, but details of the Tower's treasures and interior guardians are unknown; none have ever penetrated to them.

1. Mirt's Mansion. Home of Mirt "the Money-lender," Lord of Waterdeep. Mirt practices his moneylending trade from here when in the City (mornings only). It is a secure, fortress-like home with many human, monstrous, and magical guards. DM note: PCs of less than name level, regardless of the size of the party, should be made to consider the Mansion too tough to be worth the risk of an attack. Mirt does have some money and magical treasure here, although it is well-hidden.

2. Crommor's Warehouse (see Chapter 4, "Fences")
3. The Sailors' Own (tavern)
4. The Yawning Portal (inn) — See Durnan, p. 17
5. The Red-Eyed Owl (tavern)
6. The Sleepy Sylph (tavern)
7. Barracks (of the Guard; fireproof; capacity is 200 men for each structure—the smaller ones have more storeys)
8. Smithy (of the Guard; standing garrison of 25 Guardsmen)
9. Bell Tower (garrisoned by 15 of the Guard at all times; used to signal fires, attacks, assembly at the Palace)
10. house of Naneatha Lhaurilstar, Lady of Waterdeep (see Chapter 5, "The Red Sashes")
11. The House of Gems (HQ: The Jewellers' Guild)

12. Mother Tathlorn's House of Pleasure and Healing (fest-hall and spa)
13. House of Leone the fighter (CG, 8th level; see Chapter 7)
14. House of Shyrrhr, Lady of the Court (0 level fighter; see Chapter 7)
15. The Map House (HQ: The Surveyors', Map & Chart-Makers' Guild)
16. Fellowship Hall (HQ: The Fellowship of Innkeepers)
17. Palace Warehouse
18. Palace Stables (total capacity 726 mounts)
19. Palace Paddocks (total capacity approximately 1700 mounts)
20. The Dragon's Head Tavern
21. The Golden Key (shop of Ansilver the Locksmith)
22. The Master Bakers' Hall (Ho: The Bakers' Guild)
23. The Crawling Spider (tavern)
24. The Elfstone Tavern
25. House of Velstrode the Venturer (an adventurer of note, and a successful merchant; tall, bearded, and loaded down with defensive magic, CN 15th level fighter, ST18/96, IN 17, DEX 16)
26. Halambar Lutes & Harps (shop—the owner, Kriios Halambar, is Guildmaster of The Council of Musicians, Instrument-Makers, and Choristers)
27. Hilmer Warehouse (see #28, below)
28. The Halls of Hilmer, Master Armorer
29. Balthorr's Rare and Wondrous Treasures (shop & warehouse—see Chapter 4, "Fences")
30. Tower of the Order (HQ: The Watchful Order of Magists & Protectors)
31. The Smiling Siren (nightclub)
32. Blackstaff Tower (home of Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun—see Lords of Waterdeep descriptions, Chapter 2)
33. Phalantar's Philtres & Components (shop of medicines, herbs, rare substances and material components for magic; see also "Fences," Chapter 4)
34. Guildhall of the Order (HQ: The Solemn Order of Recognized Furriers & Woolmen)
35. The Jade Jug (inn)
36. The Blue Jack (tavern)
37. Pewterers' and Casters' Guildhall (Guild HQ)
38. Olmhazan's Jewels (shop; the proprietor, Jhauntar Olmhazan, a nasty and superior sort, is Gentleman Speaker (public contact) for The Jewellers' Guild)
39. House of the Fine Carvers (HQ: The Guild of Fine Carvers)
40. The Pampered Traveler (inn—the proprietor, Brathan Zilmer, is Guildmaster of The Fellowship of Innkeepers)

41. The Singing Sword (tavern)
42. The Market Hall (HQ: The Council of Farmer-Grocers)
43. The Spires of the Morning (Temple complex, dedicated to Lathander)
44. Usual location of The Walking Statue of Waterdeep: a stone golem created by Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun, and controlled only by Piergeiron or the Archmage of Waterdeep himself; it is intended to be used in defending the City against any attack that breaches a City gate, to "hold the gap." The statue stands 90 feet tall, is of grey granite, and looks like a tall, regal human with an impassive face. It is AC1, MV 4", 140 hit points, 1 attack for 6-60, 3 points of structural damage per round, harmed only by +3 or greater magical weapons, and by spells as a normal stone golem. Rumor holds (correctly) that six more of these pieces of garden statuary are stored, in working order, in the caverns under Mount Waterdeep.

The four entries that follows are luxurious but usually damp house built by nobles who now live in warmer climes, and rent these places for 25 gp a month (and up) to anyone interested in contacting their noble families; who owns what is left to individual DMs.

45. Fair Winds (rental villa)
46. Marblehearth (rental villa)
47. Stormwatch (rental villa)
48. Heroes' Rest (rental villa; also known as "Cold Comfort," a nickname bestowed by a certain adventuring band)

Sea Ward

49. The House of Heroes (Temple complex dedicated to Tempus)
50. Halazar's Fine Gems (shop—the proprietor, Stromquil Halazar, is Guildmaster of the Jewellers' Guild)
51. The Ship's Wheel (tavern)
52. Pilgrims' Rest (inn)
53. The Wandering Wemic (inn)
54. The House of Purple Silks (fest-hall)
55. Gounar's Tavern
56. The House of the Moon (Temple complex dedicated to Selune)
57. Tchazzam (noble) family villa
58. Maerghoun's Inn
59. Dacer's Inn
60. The House of Inspired Hands (Temple complex dedicated to Gond)
61. The Fiery Flagon (tavern)
62. Ruldegost (noble) family villa
63. The Dragon Tower of Maaril (13th level magic-user; see Chapter 7)
64. Ilzimmer (noble) family villa

65. Urmbrusk (noble) family villa
66. Moonstar (noble) family villa
67. Assumbar (noble) family villa
68. Cassalanter (noble) family villa
69. Zulpair (noble) family villa
70. Husteem (noble) family villa
71. The Tower of Luck (Temple complex dedicated to Tymora)
72. Wavesilver (noble) family villa
73. "Naingate" (Tower of Nain—Nain is a NG 13th level magic-user, detailed in Chapter 7)
74. Melshimber (noble) family villa
75. Iitul (noble) family villa
76. shrine of Mielikki (The Lady's Hands)
77. shrine of Silvanus
78. Emvoelstone (noble) family villa
79. Hiilgauntlet (noble) family villa
80. The Temple of Beauty (Temple complex dedicated to Sune)
81. Gauntyl (noble) family villa
82. Eltorchul (noble) family villa
83. The House of Wonder (Temple to Mystra)
84. Eirontalar (noble) family villa
85. Selchoun's Sundries Shop
86. Thongolir (noble) family villa
87. Tesper (noble) family villa
88. Dezlentyr (noble) family villa
89. Tesper (noble) family villa
90. Neshar (noble) family villa
91. Brokengulf (noble) family villa
92. Belabranta (noble) family villa
93. Irlingstar (noble) family villa
93. Gundwynd (noble) family villa
95. Tessalar's Tower (magically-guarded home of the 16th level magic-user; see Chapter 7)
96. Raventree (noble) family villa
97. Bladesemmer (noble) family villa
98. Manthar (noble) family villa
99. Artemel (noble) family villa
100. Animakyl (noble) family villa
101. Silmerhelve (noble) family villa
102. Rosznar (noble) family villa
103. Jhansczil (noble) family villa

North Ward

104. The House of Crystal (HQ: The Guild of Glassblowers, Glaziers, & Speculum-Makers)
105. House of Crystal Warehouse
106. Adarbrent (noble) family villa
107. Agundar (noble) family villa
108. Kothont (noble) family villa
109. Sultlue (noble) family villa
110. The Galloping Minotaur (inn)
111. Sulmest's Splendid Shoes & Boots (shop—the proprietor, Darion Sulmest, is Spokesman (public contact) of The Order of Cobblers & Corvisers)
112. Meraedos Fine Furs (shop—the proprietor, the soft-spoken and careful Shalrin Meraedos, is Gentleman Keeper (public contact) of The Solemn Order of Recognized Furrriers & Woolmen)

113. Phylund (noble) family villa
114. The Gentle Mermaid (tavern & fest-hall)
115. Maernos (noble) family villa
116. Cragsmere (noble) family villa
117. The House of Healing (HQ: The Guild of Apothecaries & Physicians)
118. Amcathra (noble) family villa
119. Lanngolyn (noble) family villa
120. Mascalan (noble) family villa
121. Talmost (noble) family villa
122. Piiradost (noble) family villa
123. Crommor (noble) family villa
124. Brossfeather (noble) family villa
125. Wands (noble) family villa
126. Hunabar (noble) family villa
127. Durindbold (noble) family villa
128. Hothemer (noble) family villa
129. Margaster (noble) family villa
130. Thorp (noble) family villa
131. Estelmer (noble) family villa
132. Maerklos (noble) family villa
133. Ulbrinter (noble) family villa
134. Hriiat Fine Pastries (shop—the proprietor, Relchoz Hriiat, is the public contact for The Bakers' Guild)
135. The Grinning Lion (tavern—see also Chapter 4, "Fences")
136. Gost (noble) family villa
137. Lathkule (noble) family villa
138. Nandar (noble) family villa
139. Thann (noble) family villa
140. Thunderstaff (noble) family villa
141. Anteos (noble) family villa
142. Phull (noble) family villa
143. Snome (noble) family villa
144. Helmfast (noble) family villa
145. Roaringhorn (noble) family villa
146. Kormallis (noble) family villa
147. Majarra (noble) family villa
148. Tarm (noble) family villa
149. Stormweather (noble) family villa
150. Jardeth (noble) family villa
151. Hawkwinter (noble) family villa
152. Gralhund (noble) family villa
153. The Raging Lion (inn)
154. A Maiden's Tears (tavern)
155. The Misty Beard (tavern)
156. The Cliffwatch (inn)
157. Cliffwatch inn stables
158. Zun (noble) family villa
159. Ilvastarr (noble) family villa
160. house of Orlparr Husteem, noble (see also Chapter 4, "Fences")

THE CITY OF THE DEAD

Unkeyed tombs are those of individual noble or wealthy family. In several cases, noble families share a tomb, which usually leads to separate crypts beneath and several floors above.

161. Mariner's Rest—tomb for all drowned at sea, and all ship-captains, however deceased. The long-ago mage Anacaster made this tomb a gate to an "empty" prime material plane, with infinite burial space around the shores of a quiet lake.

162. The Hall of Heroes—warriors' tomb, for fighters and all who fall in battle. Anacaster made this one a trophy hall, and at its end a gate to pleasant rolling fields on the same "empty" plane, where the warriors are buried, row upon row.

163. The Hall of Sages—tomb for sages; a dusty, fascinating place with only about seventy buried here.

164. Monument to the warriors of Waterdeep—a sixty-foot-high stone sculpture depicting a circle of men striking down trolls, orcs, hobgoblins, bugbears, and barbarians, all of whom are falling backwards—outwards—all around them. Impressive to all but the pigeons.

165. Merchants' Rest ("The Coinsciffin" tomb). This, another of Anacaster's gates to a lightly-wooded region, is the resting-place only of those who prepay for the honor, hence its nickname.

166. Ahghairon's Statue—a tall sculpture of the bearded, robed mage, in light-hued stone. Ahghairon stands atop concentric steps, his hands outstretched to indicate the City around him and a smile on his face. The steps are lit by night with rows of torches, and are a favorite meeting-spot by day.

167. The House of the Homeless—tomb: this is a vast mausoleum; Anacaster's gate leads to an apparently endless labyrinth of underground caverns, lit by the Guild of Chandlers & Lamp-lighters, who are paid by the City for this service. Here lie all the dead of Waterdeep who do not merit, or do not own (by purchase or membership in a noble or wealthy family), a place in any other tomb. If their names are known, such are always cut into the rock above the hole where their ashes are interred. All burials here are cremations.

THE TRADES WARD

Virgin's Square: This traditional hiring-place for fighting-men (see Blazidon One-Eye, Chapter 7) and local market is named for the local legend that virgins were once sacrificed to dragons on this spot, before there was a City of Waterdeep. It is known that some barbarian tribes in the North do still worship a Dragon God.

168. The Inn of the Dripping Dagger (see Filiare, in Chapter 7, and many other NPCs)

169. The Riven Shield Shop (shields bought, sold, & repaired)

170. house of Myrmith Splendon (7th level fighter; see Chapter 7)

171. Mhair's Tower (home of Mhair Szelture, 17th level magic-user; see "The Watchful Order of Magists & Protectors" in Chapter 5)

172. Dunblast Roofing Company (Elemos "the Hand" Dunblast, the proprietor, is the public contact for The Carpenter's, Roofers', And Plasterers' Guild)

173. Gondalim's (inn)

174. The Citadel of the Arrow (HQ: The Fellowship of Bowyers & Fletchers)

175. Saern's Fine Swords (shop)

176. Costumers' Hall (HQ: The Order of Master Tailors, Glovers, & Mercers)

177. Thentavva's Boots (shop—see also Chapter 5, "The Red Sashes")

178. The Unicorns' Horn (inn)

179. Orsabbas's Fine Imports (shop)

180. Riautar's Weaponry (shop—the proprietor, Zarondar "the Nimble" Riautar, is the public contact for The Fellowship of Bowyers and Fletchers)

181. The House of Song (HQ: The Council of Musicians, Instrument-Makers, and Choristers)

182. Patient Fingers Finework (shop—the proprietor, Dannath Lisosar, is the public contact and second-in-command of The Guild of Fine Carvers)

183. Office of The League of Basketmakers & Wickerworkers (Guild HQ)

184. Warehouse of The League of Basketmakers & Wickerworkers

185. The House of Cleanliness (HQ: The Launderers' Guild)

186. The Old Guildhall (HQ: The Cellarers and Plumbers Guild)

187. Thond Glass & Glazing (shop—the proprietor, Jhalassan Thond, is Speaker (public contact) for The Guild of Glassblowers, Glaziers, & Speculum-Makers)

188. Belmonder's Meats (butcher—the proprietor, Morathin "Hooks" Belmonder, is the public contact for The Guild of Butchers)

189. The Zoarstar (HQ: The Scriveners, Scribes, and Clerks Guild)

190. The House of Textiles (HQ: The Most Excellent Order of Weavers and Dyers)

191. The Gentle Rest (inn—see Chapter 4, "Fences")

192. Gentle Rest inn stables

193. Felzoun's Folly (tavern)

194. Surtlan's Metalwares (shop—the proprietor, Baerhar Surtlan, is Voice (public contact) of The Guild of Trusted Pewterers and Casters)

195. The Guild Paddock (HQ: The Stablemasters' And Farriers' Guild)

196. The Golden Horn Gambling House (a plush-carpeted and dimly lamplit gaming place policed by sixteen private bodyguards, and run by Hahstoz Baerhuld, 0 level fighter, who employs many dancing girls and fleeces many customers)

197. Meiroth's Fine Silks (shop)

198. The Bowels of the Earth (tavern—see Blazidon One-Eye and others, Chapter 7; this is a cheap but cozy "dive" much frequented by adventurers visiting the City)

199. Cobblers' & Corvisers' House (HQ of that order)

200. The House of Light (HQ: The Guild of Chandlers & Lamplighters)

201. Chandlers & Lamplighters Guild warehouse

202. Stationers' Hall (HQ: The Stationers' Guild)

203. "The Plinth"—This interdenominational temple is guarded by the Watch at all times, and kept open as a place of worship for all faiths. Many minor or extra-dimensional faiths find in The Plinth their only formal place of worship in the City. The Plinth is a slender, many-levelled tower with a flat top, which is staffed by the Guard as a landing-eyrie for the aerial steeds of private citizens.

204. The Grey Serpent (inn)

205. Wheel Hall (HQ: The Wheelwrights' Guild)

Southern Ward

206. The Stone House (HQ: The Carpenters' Roofers', and Plasterers' Guild)

207. Brian the Swordmaster (smithy & shop—see The Lords of Waterdeep descriptions, in Chapter 2, page 18)

208. The Jade Dancer (tavern & fest-hall)

209. Nueth's Fine Nets (shop)

210. The Spouting Fish (tavern)

211. The Red Gauntlet (tavern)

212. Pelauvir's Counter (goods store—this establishment is the closest Waterdeep comes to a department store; everything but food can be bought here; standard Players Handbook prices apply).

213. The Swords' Rest (tavern)

214. The House of Good Spirits (HQ: The Vintners', Distillers', and Brewers' Guild)

215. The Redbridle Stables (see Rhazbos Redbridle, Chapter 7)

216. The Coach & Wagon Hall (HQ: The Wagonmakers' and Coach Builders' Guild)

217. Saddlers' & Harness-Makers' Hall (Guild HQ)

218. House of Kappiyan Flurmastyr (11th level wizard; see Chapter 7)

219. Builders' Hall (HQ: The Guild of Stonecutters and Masons)

220. Nelkaush the Weaver (textiles shop)

221. The Full Cup (tavern)

222. The Road House (HQ: The Fellowship of Carters and Coachmen)

223. Prestar's Furniture

224. Hlakken Stables (see also Chapter 5, "The Red Sashes")

225. Metalmasters' Hall (HQ: The Most Careful Order of Skilled Smiths & Metalforgers)

226. Bellister's Hand (shop)

227. Bellister's House (warehouse)

228. Orm's Highbench (Trading Company)

229. Athlal's Stables

Dock Ward

Waterdeep Harbor: The naturally sheltered, deepwater basin that gives the City its name and its wealth is a bustling place. Its chill waters are kept fairly clean by the diligent work of the Watermen (see Chapter 5) above, and hired mermen below. The mermen maintain a small community (60 well-armed males) under Deepwater Isle in guarded caves, and rotate willing males of their folk to man it. No young or merwoman, and no barracudas, will be found in these relatively chill, inhospitable waters, but a few dolphins that carry messages between this outpost and the larger undersea habitations of these folk (in southern Nelanther, or Pirate Isles) are often seen. The mermen are paid handsomely in food, medical supplies, and trade-bars (the equivalent of 25 gp per head per month) by the City in return for their loyal patrolling of the harbor depths against invaders, predators, and hazards to shipping, and their aid in the recovery of corpses, spilled cargo, sunken vessels, and the like. Magic-users communicate with the mermen and, by means of their art, enable senior Guard officers and a few senior Watch officers to do the same.

Waterdeep's sewers empty into the harbor at places covered with extremely large and strong gratings, and patrolled regularly by mermen, who use catch-nets on poles to scoop and gather the debris into large tow-globes for transport far out to sea (to an undersea garden in a "hot rift," where mermen grow and cultivate certain undersea plants, for use as seaborne nutrient fertilizer).

The harbor's rocky bottom is thinly covered with mud, especially at the southern end of the harbor, but is kept free of plants and litter; a swimmer is likely to be noticed in a turn or less by the mermen; a corpse or other large drifting or unmoving object in 1-4 turns. Locathath sometimes come to trade, as do mermen, but lizard men and sahuagin are attacked on sight (both are rarely seen).

The mermen are free to travel outside the harbor, but seldom patrol outside of it (moving in regular patrols no farther west than a quarter of a mile or so from the western shores of Deepwater Isle). They know something of the undersea life hereabouts, which is dangerous; eyes of the deep and sharks cruise these cold waters during the summer months. Aquatic elves can be found far to the southwest, and around Evermeet. All aquatic races are to be found to the south, in warmer waters, and conduct much trade (and warfare) there.

230. Cookhouse Hall

231. Gelfuril the Trader (shop)

232. The Copper Cup (tavern, inn, & fest-hall)

233. Thomm Warehouse (see Chapter 4, "Fences")

234. Melgard's Fine Leathers (shop)

235. The Butcher's Guildhall (HQ: The Guild of Butchers)

236. House of Jemuril, adventurer; a mysterious, thin, bearded dwarf who is seldom seen. Jemuril is female, although few who are not dwarves know it, and is a 9th level fighter who has collected much magic over the years. She is famous for destroying the evil mage Susktar of Calimport, when attacked by his spells in the Bazaar, by wading through two lightning bolts to reach him, ramming a globe from a necklace of missiles down the mage's shirtfront, and then striking his chest full force with her war-hammer. PCs should decide whether they wish to disturb Jemuril accordingly.

237. Fish Warehouse (belonging to The Fishmongers' Fellowship)

238. Smokehouse (belonging to The Fishmongers' Fellowship; also used by butchers, who must pay fees)

239. Telethar Leatherworks

240. Torpus the Tanner

241. League Hall (HQ: The League of Skinners & Tanners)

242. Mariners' Hall (HQ: The Master Mariners' Guild)

243. Shipmasters' Hall

244. Watermens' Hall (HQ: The Guild of Watermen)

245. The Sleeping Snake (tavern—see also Chapter 5, "The Red Sashes")

246. Nestaur the Ropemaker

247. Khostal Hannass, Fine Nuts (shop)

248. Felhaur's Fine Fish (shop)

249. The Blushing Mermaid (inn, tavern, & fest-hall)

250. Seaswealth Hall (HQ: The Fishmongers' Fellowship)

251. Full Sails (tavern; HQ: The Most Diligent League of Sail-Makers and Cordwainers)

252. Arnagus the Shipwright (see "The Order of Master Shipwrights" in Chapter 5)

253. The House (warehouse) of Tarmagus

254. warehouse of The Fellowship of Salters, Packers, and Joiners

255. Coopers' Rest (HQ: The Coopers' Guild)

256. Shippers' Hall (HQ: The Fellowship of Salters, Packers, and Joiners)

257. The Blue Mermaid (tavern)

258. The Hanged Man (tavern)

259. The House of Pride (perfume shop)

260. The Purple Palace (fest-hall—see also Chapter 5, "The Red Sashes")

261. The Sleeping Wench (tavern)

262. The Hanging Lantern (panderer; escorts of all races and sexes can be hired in advance—payment in advance is required—here, typically for adventurers', nobles', or Guild parties, and typically for high prices: seven to nine gp per head per night, 3 gp to the Lantern, the rest kept by the individuals.

263. Muleskull Tavern (HQ: The Dungsweepers' Guild)

264. The Mermaid's Arms (inn, tavern, and fest-hall)

265. Red Sails Warehouse (used by many who rent space, including the "fence" One-Eyed Jukk; see Chapter 4)

266. Shipwrights' House (HQ: The Order of Master Shipwrights)

267. Helmstar Warehouse (see Chapter 4, "Fences")

268. The Ship's Prow (inn)

269. The Thirsty Sailor (tavern)

270. Warm Beds (inn)

271. Lanternmaker Zorth Ulmaril (shop)

272. The Bloody Fist (tavern), one of the most notorious "dives" of the Docks

273. Three Pearls Nightclub

274. The Thirsty Throat (tavern)

275. Serpental Books & Folios (see "Fences," Chapter 4; the proprietor, the suave and greedy Jannaxil Serpental, is the equal of any sage, anywhere in Faerûn when it comes to books in human tongues available from the Sword Coast east to the Plains of Purple Dust)

276. The Blackstar Inn

277. The Splintered Stair (inn)

278. The Rearing Hippocampus (inn)

279. The Metal House of Wonders (HQ: The Splendid Order of Armorers, Locksmiths, and Finesmiths)

280. Turnstone Plumbing and Pipefitting (shop; Jhalossan Turnstone, plumber, is the public contact for The Cellarers and Plumbers Guild; his father, the owner of this shop, is the Guildmaster)

281. Dhaermos Warehouse (see Chapter 4, "Fences")

The Sewers of The City

The accompanying map shows the known sewers of Waterdeep; the uppermost portions of the sewers, that are in present use and fairly good repair. Many older, smaller tunnels are walled up and not in use—at least, not to carry sewage, and there seem to be many more creatures in these sewers than could be expected to find food enough to survive, for even if every person who ventured into these damp, dark, foetid passages vanished into their waiting maws, some would go hungry. Connections to the infamous "dungeons" of the City, Undermountain and The Dungeon of the Crypt, do exist, and it is through these that such creatures come.

DMs are encouraged to invent adventures for any PCs exploring the world beneath the City and to create new passages, chambers, and features for characters to find.

Sewer Encounter Table for Waterdeep

Roll 1D8. Results 1-5: no encounter
 6: crew from Cellarers and Plumbers Guild (3-5 0 level humans, armed with piping (treat as club, crowbars (treat as a quarterstaff), hammers, and daggers)
 7: thief (lone character, of level and intentions to be determined by DM)
 8: special encounter; to determine the encounter, roll percentile dice on the table below:

Percentile. Roll	Monster	No. Appearing	Source
01-07	Bat, Giant	1-8	FF
08	Bloodworm, Giant	1	FF
09-14	Bogle	2-8	MM2
15	Cave Fisher	1	MM2
16-20	Centipede, Huge	2-24	MM2
21, 22	Centipede, Giant	1-8	MM
23, 24	Crocodile	1	MM
25, 26	Executioner's Hood	1	MM2
27	Galltrit	1-4	FF
28	Gibbering Moulder	1	MM2
29	Gorbel	1	FF
30	Green Slime	1 colony	MM
31	Grell	1	FF
32, 33	Jackalwere	1-4	MM
34-37	Lurker Above	1	MM
38-41	Mimic	1	MM
42	Mite	6-24	FF
43, 44	Mold, Yellow	1 colony	MM
45	Mongrelman	1-10	MM2
46	Neo-Otyugh	1	MM
47	Oblivix	1	MM2
48-52	Otyugh	1	MM
53-56	Pedipalp, Large	1-4	MM2
57-67	Rat, Ordinary	1-100	MM2
68, 69	Rat, Giant	5-20	MM
70, 71	Rot Grubs (in carrion)	5-20	MM
72-76	Scum Creeper	2-24	MM2
77	Shambling Mound	1	MM
78	Skeleton	1-12	MM
79	Skull	1-8	FF
80	Slicer Beetle	1	MM2
81	Slug, Giant	1	MM
82-87	Spider, Huge	1-12	MM
88, 89	Stirge	3-12	MM
90	Stunjelly	1	FF
91	Tentamort	1	FF
90-95	Tick, Giant	2-8	MM
96	Tunnel Worm	1	MM2
97	Vargouille	1	MM2
98, 99	Wererats	4
		11(3+1D8)	MM

00 DM's Choice (e.g. Cambion, Shadow, Shadow Demon, Xorn, or roll again on this table)

The Known Sewers of Waterdeep

The accompanying map shows only the largest passageways of the City sewers; those navigable by M-sized creatures. These are of two sorts: "primary" and "secondary" according to size. Primary passages are twenty feet across and contain three-foot-wide railless walkways on both sides. Sewer workers cross passages by means of using their 16' "catchpoles" (also used for reaching below water level to clear debris from sewer gratings) to vault across, or by the use of boards, which they lay down as temporary bridges.

Secondary passages are twelve feet across with a single three-foot-width ledge on one side (usually the more southerly or easterly). The countless feeder pipes (any sewer pipe of less than a one-foot diameter) and tertiary tubes (which can be crawled through by slim M-sized creatures only if dry, or if water breathing is employed) are not shown.

The map is not to scale; many features (such as the junction room and surface-shafts) are distorted in size for clarity. The sewers themselves have no names. Gratings in the sewers are stout, but often old and rusty. Double all "bend bars" chances ("lift gates" does not apply here). Gratings may be permanent or swing open when unlocked (thieves suffer a -6% chance of picking the locks; they are of massive construction, and often rusted nearly solid). The air supply is good in the sewers; there is little danger of suffocation—but there is little or no light, lots of echoing water flow noise, and a terrible stench pervades the entire network.

Excessive contact (e.g. swimming or falling in, or any other activity that results in nostrils, mouth, eyes, or ears getting wet) with sewer water will necessitate a Disease Check; the base chance is 12%.

Sewer Features Surface References

1. under trees in the interior of the block west (and slightly north) of the shrine of Silvanus (surface map: #77)
2. in the northernmost corner of Sabbar's Alley
3. in the center of Shank Alley, just southwest of the warehouse that stands in the interior of the block
4. just beside (south of) the tree in Sniff Alley, south off The Street of Glances
5. in the central stand of trees in the southern end of Heroes' Gardens
6. under a lone tree in the alleyways west of the Eltorchul family villa (#82), south of Ivory Street and north of Pharra's Alley
7. in the mouth of the alley way that opens north off Chasso's Trot, just west of Sul Street
8. in a cul-de-sac due south of the Jhanszil family villa (#103), across the road
9. under the tree in the alleyway just south of the Bross-feather family villa (#124)
10. at the northern end of a dead-end alley opening off of Grimwald's Way, just south of the Ilitul family villa (#75) wall
11. in the easternmost cul-de-sac opening off the alleyway that bounds the Neshar family villa (#90), just west off Mendever Street
12. in the alleyway just outside (west of) the gates of the Manthar family villa (#98), off Delzorin Street between Sul Street and Shield Street
13. in the larger clump of trees in the interior alleyway of the block bound by Vondil Street, The High Road, Delzorin Street, and Copper Street
14. in the southeastern corner of Trollskull Alley, closest to the intersection of Whaelgund Way and Delzorin Street
15. in a cul-de-sac opening north off Horn Street, between Tower March and Whaelognond Way
16. under the trees in the dead-end alley in the southern interior of the block bounded by Delzorin Street, Vhezoyar Street, Sulmoor Street, and Ilzantil Street
17. in the mouth of Sharra's Flight, where it joins the Street of Whispers
18. in a cul-de-sac opening northeast off Toalar's Lane
19. in Gothal Street, where it meets Calamastyr Lane
20. in the southwestern corner of Runer's Alley
21. under the southern mouth of Cloaksweep Alley (no surface connection)
22. in the trees that stand in the alley in the center of the block bounded by Hassantyr's Street, The High Road, Julthoon Street, and Copper Street
23. in Marlar's Lane, western end (by the alleyway wound to Tharleon Street)
24. just behind (due south) of Blackstaff Tower (#32, Swords Street), at the base of the rocky cliff-face
25. shaft (with locked cover) opens onto the surface near the top of the rocky slope of Mount Waterdeep, at a point due southwest of Turnback Court
26. in Turnback Court
27. in the southwestern corner of an alleyway opening south off Cymbri'l's Walk, between The Street of Silver and Warriors' Way
28. in the southwest corner of a dead-end alley in the block bounded by Lamp Street, The Street of Bells, Cymbri'l's Walk, and The Street of the Sword
29. in the northwesternmost junction of alleyways in the block bounded by Lamp Street, The High Road, Selduth Street, and The Street of Bells
30. in the southeasternmost corner of an alley opening off of The High Road (the first north of Lamp Street, just to the west of Andamaar's Street)
31. under the Grinning Lion tavern (#135); no surface connection
32. in the northwest corner of an alleyway that opens off Golden Serpent Street and Nindabar Street, just east of Mhalsymer's Way
33. halfway down Belzound Street
34. in the northern mouth of an alleyway opening south off Sevenlamps Cut
35. at the intersection of Shadows Alley and Lemontree Alley
36. in the alleyway just behind (north of) The Pampered Traveler inn (#40)
37. in the wide alleyway between The High Road and The Street of Bells, north of Buckle Alley
38. under the House of the Fine Carvers (#39, on The High Road); no surface connection
39. in Spindle Street, just south of Selduth Street
40. in the lane that parallels Irimar's Walk on the north, west of Theln Lane
41. in the alleyway of the three trees that opens west off Wall Way, just south of Andammar's Street
42. in the alleyway just to the north of Ironpost Street, that opens west off Wall Way, at the point where it joins another alley branching to the north
43. in the trees in a dead-end alley just north of Costumer's Hall (#176)
44. in the mouth of a dead-end alley opening east off The Street of the Turks, just south of Burnt Wagon Way
45. under the alleyway that opens south off of Spendthrift Alley, just behind (east of) Thentavva's Boots (#177); no surface connection
46. in the cellar of The Unicorn's Horn (inn)
47. in the alley just behind (west) of Olmhazan's Jewels (#38), between The High Road and The Street of Bells
48. at the end of a dead-end alley opening south off Nelnuk's Walk (just north of the intersection of Adder Lane and Gut Alley)
49. in the southwestern corner of a dead-end alley that opens off Shesstra's Street (just north of Blackstar Lane)
50. under the westernmost intersection of alleyways off Snail Street, north of Shesstra's Street (no surface connection)
51. in a cul-de-sac opening off of Belnimbra's Street, in the block bounded by Soothsayer's Way, Snail Street, and Rairun street
52. in the westernmost dead end of Quaff Alley (off The High Street)
53. just in front (east) of the Bell Tower (#9), on Soldiers' Street just southeast of Watchmens' Way
54. at the intersection of alleyways just north of The Three Pearls Nightclub (#273)
55. under the wide part of Candle Lane, west off The Way of the Dragon (no surface connection)
56. in the westernmost end of a dead-end alley opening south off Simples Street
57. at the intersection of Tsarnen Alley and Burdag Lane
58. in the mouth of a dead-end alley, where it joins Quill Alley between The Wide Way and Nethpranter's Street
59. in the westernmost end of a dead-end forked alley that opens east off Rivon Street, north of Spendthrift Alley
60. in a cul-de-sac opening east off the northern end of Drovers' Street
61. halfway down Beacon Street
62. under an east-west alley that lies in the "center" of the half-circle formed by the northern end of Slop Street, between Fillet Lane and Fishwife Alley (no surface connection)
63. in Rednose Alley, just behind (east of) Saddlers' & Harness-Makers' Hall (#217)
64. in a cul-de-sac opening off The Rising Ride between Juth Alley and Caravan Court
65. in the wide part of the alley that opens south off Olaim's cut
66. in the wide alley north of Coach Street, just west of The High Road
67. in the alley just behind (east of) Prestar's Furniture (#223)
68. in the cellar of The Spouting Fish tavern (#210)
69. in the wide area of the second alleyway north of Bellister's House (#227)
70. under Piergeiron's Palace (a locked shaft cover opens into a cellar guarded at all times by five armed men of the Guard, plus an officer; an alarm gong on the wall near them is to be rung whenever they see or hear anything suspicious from the sewers below to alert a second guardpost, who will arrive to take a report, and can in turn alert all of the Palace's defenders)

Chapter 4: LIFE IN THE CITY

In this chapter, details of City life are provided for players and DMs, so that the “feel” of Waterdeep can make a campaign distinctive and enjoyable, and to prevent hasty invention on the part of a DM whenever player characters go out into the streets to buy a meal, hire a horse, or the like. This information is given under headings, below, for easy reference.

Religion

Waterdeep is undoubtedly the most tolerant city of any size in Faerûn when it comes to religion, and perhaps the most tolerant anywhere. All creeds are respected, due to the eclectic crossroads nature of the City, as long as worship of a particular deity does not involve the theft or destruction of other beings (i.e. human or animal sacrifice) or their property (believers may freely give offerings, but non-believers should not be compelled to do so), or wanton assaults upon non-worshippers (followers of Tempus, the war-god, for example, are not allowed to run amok in the streets stabbing and hacking).

A DM can thus use non-Realms gods in play even if he or she wants to use THE FORGOTTEN REALMS™ campaign setting. All will be tolerated here; many travelers from other planes trade here often. A DM should bear in mind, however, that trade is paramount in Waterdeep. Priesthoods that attempt to restrict trade, or expect large cash gifts to their deity, or who try to collect temple tithes through coercion, will not be popular.

There are few large temple complexes in the City. In such a large and bustling center of commerce, priests have relatively little power and influence; large temples tend to establish themselves in small communities on major roads, where they are readily reached by the faithful and yet can dominate—if not control outright—their surroundings.

Small shrines attended to by lay worshippers (not permanent clergy) can be found in many cellars and upper storeys of buildings throughout Waterdeep. Places of worship are forbidden by edict of the Lords only in The City of the Dead, to prevent various priesthoods from claiming tomb after tomb as sacred to (and thus, exclusive to) their deity, and charging fees for entry and burial.

The staff and details of the temples in the City that do have clergy (all save the shrines

DEITY	TEMPLE	CLERGY
Gond	The House of Inspired Hands (map: #60)	Priestess; Jhoadil Zulthind (Matriarch, female 8th L cleric)
Lathander	The Spires of the Morning (map: #43)	High Priestess: Ghentilara (female 10th L cleric) Prior: Athosar (Canon, male 6th L cleric)
Mielikki	(permanently-staffed shrine, map: #76) The Lady's Hands	Briosar Helmsing (Courser, male 5th L ranger), Tehtira Bellsilver (Scout, female 4th L ranger)
Mystra	The House of Wonder (map: #83)	High Priest (“Magister of Mystra”): Meleghost Starseer (Necromancer, male 10th L magic-user) First Seeker: Ilbrost Mythyl (Enchanter, male 7th L magic-user)
Selune	The House of the Moon (map: #56)	High Priestess: Naneatha Suaril (female 16th L cleric)
Silvanus	(permanently-staffed shrine, map: #77)	Watcher: Anarakin Iriboar (ovate, male 2nd L druid)
Sune	The Temple of Beauty (map: #80)	High Priestess: Ssaeryl Shadowstar (female 14th L cleric)
Tempus	The House of Heroes (map: #49)	High Sword: Turk Bloodhelm (Superhero, male 8th L fighter) Prior: Mactilar Rhebbos (Canon, male 6th L cleric)
Tymora	The Tower of Luck (map: #71)	High Priestess: Seenroas Halvinhar (female 14th L cleric) Prior: Markos Zellizands (Prefect, 5th L cleric)

are “large” temple complexes) are summarized below. These clerics will all willingly tutor adventurers of the right faith, class, and alignment, if the proper offerings to the furtherance of the deity’s work are made through the temple, beforehand.

Money

Waterdeep is a rich merchants’ city, the crossroads of trade and culture of the Sword Coast. Beings of many races come from all over the Realms to live, work, and do business here. Trade is transacted by barter and in many currencies. Practically any coin will be accepted for its metal value, and gems are negotiable according to their rarity, size, and quality (standard AD&D® game values for copper, silver, electrum, gold, and platinum pieces should be used, as should the relative varieties and values of gems described in the Dungeon Masters Guide). DMs should bear in mind that the Realms have some unique gem varieties, and receive visitors from many planes; one’s own invented coins and gems could easily be introduced into play. Written notes-of-hand are seldom honored by any save those who issued them, or others of the same noble family or merchant company or Guild.

Waterdeep does, however, have its own coinage, as do the cities of Silverymoon and Mirabar in the South. Most cities honor all coinage; “trade bars” of silver (which very quickly corrode to a black hue) and electrum in 10-gp, 25-gp and 50-gp denominations are common throughout the North, and used everywhere in the Realms (in the South, gems are more often used for such purposes).

Mirabar makes four-sided trade bars of black iron; each is like two long, thin pyramids joined together at their bases, to form a foot-long spindle. These are valued at 10 gp in Mirabar, 7 gp in Luskan and Port Llast, and 5 gp elsewhere.

Silverymoon mints a crescent-shaped, shining blue coin called an Electrum Moon. These are worth 2 ep in Alustriel’s lands and 1 ep elsewhere.

Waterdeep produces a square, flat brass coin called a “toal,” issued and honored by the Lords’ treasury, which has a 2-gp value within the City walls and very little value elsewhere (most never leave the City, but are changed to the standard coins of metal value by those leaving the City). A toal has a hole in its center to aid the user in collecting toals on a ring or thong; one eccentric warrior of long-ago Waterdeep always paid in bills by means of a hurled dagger, on which were transixed several toals, aimed at the bar or a pillar nearby. The much rarer “harbor moon,” worth 25 toals or 50 gp, is fashioned of platinum inset with electrum, and consists of a crescent with a hole cut into the center of its curve; its name comes from its traditional use in the docks for buying large amounts of cargo at a time. Also issued by the treasury, this is another coin of lesser value (about 2 platinum pieces) outside the City walls.

Wages are discussed throughout this book under the relevant guilds and under sections dealing with specific activities. For DMs wishing to determine wages for actions not covered herein, basic unskilled wages are 4 cp/day (2 cp per half-day) for tasks requiring some strength (such as loading and unloading goods), and 3 cp/day (no half-day wages, usually, but lunch included) for taking or issuing chits, blocking a shop exit to shoppers who might otherwise leave without paying, and other less demanding jobs.

Pay for messengers and other bearers of responsibility averages around 5 sp a day. Bodyguards receive 8 sp to 1 gp daily, depending on armor, weaponry, and demonstrated skills they can offer the one hiring them. Adventurers down on their luck of ten regularly act as bodyguards, although an old, feeble, or obviously wounded or handicapped person will of course be passed over for such employment.

Persons seeking casual daily employment in the City gather, by tradition, at one of the City gates in all seasons except high winter, each day and wait to be approached by a merchant who might hire them. (By tradition, one does not call one's skills or desire for employment, but lets those who may hire questions and examine quietly, and make any approaches if interested.)

Average prices in Waterdeep are as given in the Players Handbook, although those too poor to afford such fare (such as those being paid the base price given above, daily, as a casual worker) can buy a "docker's quaff"; a skin of watered-down barley beer and a round loaf of crusty brown bread baked around sausage ends and meat scraps, for 1 cp. This provides many Waterdhavians with their main meal, but it can only be bought in one of the open markets of the City, and only from late morning to early afternoon, each day. Better fare on the streets is priced approximately as follows: a tankard of ale is 1 sp; a jack of wine about 7 sp; and a simple, full meal about 1 sp.

Waterdhavians vary widely in the strength of their faith (and monetary devotion) to their goal. In the interests of good play it is suggested that the DM play the majority of citizens with the same devoutness (or lack of same) that Player Characters display. Those players and Dungeon Masters wishing to leave out religion altogether may do so without any detrimental effect on play, although the "flavor" of life in the City will change.

Selected "Usual" Prices for Goods and Services in Waterdeep

In this brief summary prices are provided for a few things PCs may well desire or require. DMs should use these as guidelines only—if something is in great demand and shorter supply, prices will rise; if there is a glut, they will fall. If a Guild is involved in the price-setting, that is mentioned at the end of the entry; non-Guild operators usually undercut the Guild unless what they sell is in so much demand that they need not compete with Guild prices. DMs are directed to pages 35 and 36 of the Players Handbook, and pages 25-33, 35, 103, 107-108, 114-118, and 121-125 of the Dungeon Masters Guide. Additional information may be found on pages 26, 75-79, and 84-89 of Unearthed Arcana, and on pages 25-26, 56-58, and 123 of the Dungeoneer's Survival Guide. Prices given therein are considered to hold true, in general, for Waterdeep, and are not duplicated here unless modifications apply. Prices for unusual services—bounty-hunting, for example, or for the sale of monsters and monster eggs or young—are not given herein, as it is recommended that a DM determine these on a case-by-case basis, roleplaying all haggling.

Accounting: see "Bookkeeping"

Ale, tankard: 1 sp to 10 sp (varies with quality)

Baldric: see "Weapon-harness"

Barrel: 5 sp to 5 gp, depending on size (Guild)

Basket, wicker: 2-4 cp depending on size, durability (Guild)

Beer (dark Stout), full quaff: 2 sp; 1 barrel: 20 gp (Guild)

Bells: wooden: 5cp/cast metal: 1-5 gp, depending on size and tone (Guild)

Bookkeeping: 1 gp per day or portion of day spent on accounts (Guild)

Boots: new: 3 gp/repair: 5-15 sp (Guild) a bonus of up to 5 gp is customarily paid for immediate (same-day) service. Secondhand boots. 5 sp to 20 sp (markets)

Bottles (glass): new: 1 gp per bottle, matching sets, 3-6 cp per bottle, "odd bottles" (Guild)/secondhand: 1 or 2 cp

Bowl, carved wooden: average price 2 cp (increases with size, finer workmanship, materials)

Bowl, cast metal: average price 2 sp (increases with size, finer workmanship, materials) (Guild)

Bread, fresh-baked: 1-4 cp/loaf (depending on size, quality)/"waybread" (older, hard-baked): 2 cp/loaf

Building (including repairs or additions):

STONE: 10 gp/day per Guild workman and gp/day per assistant plus 10 gp daily crew expenses fee, plus materials (Guild). See also "Stone." /WOOD: 1 gp per man per day, plus 5 gp for a surveyor-chartist, plus 5 gp for a Guild engineer plus materials plus 10 gp/day "crew needs" fee (Guild) See also "Lumber": (does not include "Excavations," q.v.)

Candles, scented and colored: 2 sp each (Guild), used: 1-3 cp (for "nobles' stubs"; i.e. ends)

Carrying Fare: 1 cp for a half-hour or less ride anywhere within City walls, in an open trotting-cart (and up, for better conveyance) (Guild)

Cart, new: 25 gp to 60 gp depending on size—all have two wheels (plus a spare underneath), an open carrying bed, and trails for beasts, the more ornate have a seat for the driver, removable sides, etc. (Guild)

Chain: 1 gp/yard (ornamental) to 5 gp/yard (harbor or gate) depending on size and strength (weight and method of joining links) (Guild)

Chimney-Cleaning: 10 sp-1 gp/chimney (wealthy are charged more)

Cloth, new-woven: 5 sp to 10 gp per bolt, depending upon materials, demand, imported or local (Guild) (does not include "Wool"; q.v.)

Clothing, tailored new: 5-20 gp/garment (Guild) "Off the rack:" 2-15 cp/garment (depending on amount of material, workmanship, materials used, style); secondhand: 2 sp to 4 gp per garment if tailored, 2 cp to 10 cp if not

Crockery, earthenware: 1 cp-6 cp per item, depending on glazing, size, complexity, and durability

Crystal Balls: 4-8 gp, depending on size (plus enspelling fee)

Divination, folk many prices, many methods: most who can afford it purchase clerical magic

Drugs: medicinal: 1-8 gp/bottle (includes bottle, contents yield 3-6 doses, usually 4) (Guild)

Dyeing, of cloth, provided by the client: 5 sp to 10 gp/bolt, depending on complexity and difficulty of desired result (Guild)

Excavations: 2 gp per man per day (or part of day) plus materials, plus 10 gp/day "crew head" fee (Guild)

Ferrying (about harbor, to and from ship and shore): 2 cp per trip per person carried, plus an additional 1 cp per passenger if any accompanying luggage, pets, or goods are not wholly carried by the passenger (Guild)

Fertilizer: 5 gp/wagonload (manure), 7 gp/wagonload (fish or bone meal) (Guild)

Firefighting, magical (if no Fire Guild hired): 10 gp per building, regardless of success (Guild)

Firewood: 5 sp to 1gp/face cord (known in Waterdeep as a "Stand"), ranging according to the type and dryness of wood, and difficulty of procuring it (i.e. higher in deepest winter)

Fish, fresh-caught: 1 cp to 12 cp per fish, depending on species, sizes, and condition

Furniture, wooden: 1 sp to 15 gp per piece, depending on size, workmanship, and materials used, most "normal" chairs, standing shelves, and mid-size plain tables cost about 2-4 gp each (Guild)

Glass: 4 cp for 4-inch-square pane to 6 gp for a 4-foot-square pane (Guild), for blown vessels, use "Bottles" entry

Gowns, fine: 33-99 gp, plus cost of materials and perhaps gems, provided or selected by client (Guild)

Guiding through City: 2 cp by day 4 cp by night (Guild)

"Hardware" metal work (latches, hinges, needles, spikes) sold by weight, usually 1 cp per ounce (Guild)

Herbs: 5 cp to 8 gp/dry ounce (saffron is 40 gp/dry ounce)

Hooks, metal: 1 cp (fishhook) to 4 gp (grappling or meat) (Guild)

Horses, shoeing: 1 gp per shoe (includes making or fitting and shoeing) (Guild)

Horses, stabling: 1 gp to 3 gp/night (includes night watch, feeding, watering, cleaning and rubdown, exercise if necessary) (Guild)

Horsehoes: see "Horses, shoeing" (the secondhand value of a found shoe is 1 cp to 3 cp, depending on size and condition)

Ink: sold by the 2 ounce bottle, 10 sp-4 gp per bottle according to ingredients, such as gilding pigments; always includes bottle (Guild)

Jewelry: varies widely according to value of materials, from costume jewelry employing much brass, at 2-4 cp per piece, to elaborate pectorals worth up to 400,000 gp (Guild): many Waterdhavians wear rings or belt buckles of worked gold worth 2-4 gp

Lamp Oil: 3 sp for a 2 ounce bottle, or 1 gp/flask (as given in PH), or 10 gp/small key (sealed with tar)

Lamps: 4 cp (hand clay lamp) to 50 gp (waterproof lantern) (Guild)

Laundry: 2 sp/garment "while you wait," 1 sp/garment overnight (Guild)

Law: professional witness, assistance of: 10 gp per day (double if hired to state against charges of "severe" crimes), payable in advance

Letters, written: 10 gp/page (includes materials) (Guild)

Lighting Through City (without guiding): 3 cp/trip (if guiding, use "Guiding" entry) (Guild)

Livery, Guild or other: 3 gp/suit, plus materials (Guild)

Loading/Unloading, Docks: 1 sp per man per hour, 2 sp per man per hour if cargo is dangerous (Guild)

Loans: 15-30% (see "Usury" in "Laws" section of text)

Lumber: 1 cp/board (2" x 4" x 8' long) and 2 cp/bar (4" x 4" x 8' long) to 1 sp/board and 12 sp/bar depending on type and condition; prices will vary with non-standard sizes

Magnifying Glasses: 5-10 gp each (Guild)

Maps: 25 gp in nine days, delivery to Waterdeep address included; "rush" jobs 18 gp. Cost may increase if map unusually large (Guild)

Meat, fresh: 10 gp (Whole carcass, average price), 17 gp (smoked carcass), varying with condition and size of carcass, type of animal (Guild)

Medical Care: 10-20 gp daily (includes nursing, splints, dressings, emergency medicines, etc.) (Guild)

Moneylending, Moneychanging: 10% interest (for principal of 100 gp or less) to 15% interest

Musicians, performing: 6 sp/day or occasion (whichever is the lesser time), each (Guild)

Musical instruments, new: 1 gp/day of making (Guild); most instruments take a month/secondhand: 30 gp average (varies widely with type of instrument and condition)

Night Watchmen: 1 gp each/night, per building watched (unarmed; for armed men, "bodyguard" rates apply; see text under "Wages")

Packing: 3 gp for 1 hour of crating and packing = 1 person's typical belongings, readied for extended travel (Guild)

Paper: script: 2 cp/ream; parchment: 5 cp/ream (1 ream is roughly 10" x 14", a two-sided sheet) (Guild)

Party Costumes: masks and suits of metal, 600 to 2,000 gp (Guild); 20-75 gp for ornate metal masks only

Pastries: 1 cp each, or if small, a dozen for 2 cp

Pens: 2 cp each (quill), 2-4 sp (metal nib, varying with design) (Guild)

Perfume: sold by the 2 ounce bottle, always including the bottle (which is sometimes quite ornate) and varying in cost from 1 cp to 30 gp, depending on quality and demand

Pictures and Likenesses: 2 gp each to 6 gp each (Guild)

Pots, cast metal: 5 gp each, average price (with lid, varies with size, quality) (Guild)

Rope: 100' coil of thin black waxed cord: 17 sp 100' coil of ornamental, silk braided cord: 25 gp (Guild)

Sail: single lateen sail 500 to 700 gp (30% less if several months' notice given) (Guild); non-Guild "no guarantees" sails sell as low as 200 gp for full rigging, refer to text under the 'Most Diligent League of Sail-Makers and Cordwainers'

Scrolls: see "Spells" if magical, "Paper" if not (price is per ream, stitched together)

Seals: of metal, 12 gp for each design or likeness (Guild)

Security: see "Fire Guard," "Night Watchmen," "Spell Guard," and text under "Wages" for bodyguards

Ships: 5,000 to 7,000 gp (minus 1,000 to 1,500 gp if "used"); for breakdown by type, see text under "The Order of Master Shipwrights" (Guild)

Shoes: see "Boots"; reduce all costs by half

Signet Rings: see "Seals"

Signs, Lettering: 5 gp/day (or part of a day) (Guild)

Smith's Tools: 70 gp (full and proper assortment, fine tempering is required)

Soap: 3 gp per 10 gallon barrel to non-members (Guild)

Spectacles: 5-10 gp each "pair" (Guild)

Spell Guard, magical: 10 gp/day (Guild)

Spells (scrolls): see text under "The Watchful Order of Magists & Protectors" (Guild) for prices; typically a 75% mark-up to non-members (sold by individual Guild members, NOT by the Guild)

Spellcasting, at trials: 500 gp per divination spell cast, paid by City if cast upon order of a City official

Spices: see "Herbs"

Stamp-marks: see "Seals"

Stone: 2 cp/block if purchased to do own work; 3 cp/block laid by Guild for repairs or additions; 4 cp/block laid by Guild when new structures built; 5 cp/block laid by Guild if marble, obsidian, or other "finestone" (Guild)

Suspenders: 2 cp each set

Tankards, cast: 10 sp to 1 gp, depending on size and workmanship (new), (Guild)/secondhand; typically 3 cp

Tiles: new: 1 cp to 3 cp each (varies with quality), laid: 1 cp each extra (or daily rate) (Guild)

Tote straps: 3 cp/strap (Guild)

Toys, metal: 5 cp to 5 gp (Guild)

Training, of mounts: 2 gp/day (2 weeks to 1 month required, depending on desired result)

Wagons: 75-200 gp, varying with size, durability, style, and length of time given to build, "custom" or unusual sizes and style more expensive (Guild)

Weapon-harness: 1 gp per piece (e.g. belt, scabbard, baldric = 3 pieces) (Guild)

Weapons, bladed: cost as per PH, plus 1 gp City fee (various Guilds)

Wheels, replacement (for wagons and carts): 2 gp to 6 gp per wheel, depending on size, design, difficulty of job and materials required; double if job is a "rush" or dangerous one, involving travel outside the City walls (Guild)

Wickerwork, small: 1 cp/piece (Guild)

Window-frame: wooden: see "Building," Metal, custom-made to fit: 5 sp-10 sp unbarred, depending on size, 2 gp to 10 gp if barred, depending on size, esthetic design of the bars, and sturdiness (Guild)

Windowpanes: see "Glass"

Wine: 7 sp/jack, 1 gp/bottle, 20 gp/barrel to 4 gp/jack, 12 gp/bottle, 70 gp/barrel depending on quality, rarity, "fashionability" (Guild)

Wool: 7 gp per bolt, fine-spun but undyed (Guild)

Zzar: 2 gp/jack, 7 gp/bottle, 40 gp/small key (Guild)

Haggling offers players and DMs a splendid opportunity for roleplaying, and can serve to "open up" hesitant players who are newcomers to roleplaying, as well as allowing a DM to give players something of the "feel" (and the occasional item of interesting gossip that might point the way to an adventure or two) of the City. One can always haggle in the open markets; undercutting Guild prices is the way such merchants attract business. Food prices (such as those given above) are not haggled over; a vendor signals that certain wares are not to be haggled over by giving an outrageously high price when a low price is offered by a buyer, followed by stating the "real" price in a clear, slow voice. Few shopowners who belong to Guilds will haggle much; they may go down by ten percent, but no more (unless trying to unload perishable goods that will spoil if kept longer). If pressed, they will say, "Guild law, friend," or rarely (e.g. when selling swords, where the 1 gp fee is involved) "Lords' edict, friend," and close off any bargaining. If a vendor willing to haggle reaches his or her lowest price, and a buyer pushes further, the vendor will say, "Thief! Why not join the Lords, and take my life, too?"

Moneylending

Moneylenders are respected citizens of this trading city; everyone needs extra money from time to time. Moneychanging—the conversion of one currency to another, including goods (such as furs or weapons) into hard cash—is the daily bread-and-butter of moneylenders, who make a 10-15% profit on such transactions. Moneylending involves a written promise of collateral in the form of property (which becomes the lender's if the loan is not repaid), and written terms of interest and a time-limit; most loans are for one or two months, and rates of interest charged vary from 15% for small loans (anything under 100 pieces of gold, not including interest) to 30% for very large loans. There is mild competition in this field, but most rates are similar from lender to lender. A lender may have two bodyguards (no more) by law, but may request assistance from the Watch in guarding large amounts of cash, carrying such through the streets, or to be present at a difficult transaction, although the Watch cannot be held responsible for losses that occur despite their presence. One of the current Lords of Waterdeep, the former mercenary general Mirt, has amassed a considerable fortune by prudent moneylending. Usury (the charging of outrageously high rates) results, if detected, in the lender becoming in debt to the City, who pay the victim back the excess and may seize the lender's property or recover its money.

Fences

Many merchants in Waterdeep will purchase or trade for the occasional item of dubious origin, particularly if the item is not of overly distinctive appearances, they have not heard that the Watch is looking for the item, or have not themselves heard of a theft involving such an item. "Fences" who do a lot of trade in stolen goods are rare. Several, as might be expected, are to be found in the docks area, but the most successful are a rich noble who lives alone, and the proprietor of a busy inn, whose guest often bring "extra" belongings that they leave without, with no one of the Watch or government any the wiser. Those fences that have survived in this generally-law-abiding City are both shrewd and paranoid, and take elaborate precautions against arrest and exposure and possible treachery on the part of their clients. PCs who decide to "jump" a fence who is bargaining with them may find themselves catapulted into pit traps at the touch of a lever, or suffer poisoned crossbow bolts fired by the fence's servants from the ceiling above or from concealed holes in the walls behind them. Most fences have means of acquiring shield and wall of force protections—and their treasure stores may well have golems and more sinister guardians.

Asking in the “rough” taverns of the City is the only way to find a fence if one is not familiar with the City. DMs should roleplay attempts to find a fence to the hilt, bearing in mind that thieves and undercover Guards listen sharp in such taverns and that PCs may be sent to a succession of NPCs before one of them gives the name of the “CONTACT” in the list below (usually with a password or secret sign). Note that a fence will pay 5% more than the “usual” price given below for items in his or her specialty categories.

Known Fences of Waterdeep

NAME; CONTACT LOCATION; SPECIALTIES; USUAL PRICE PAID (IN % OF STREET VALUE)

Alathann Ruil; “One-Eyed Jukk” at The Bloody Fist, Presper & Snail Streets, Dock Ward (map: #272); Red Sails Warehouse On Cod Lane, Dock Ward (map: #265); weapons, armor, fine metalwork; 40%

Balthorr “the Bold”; Balthorr, at Balthorr’s Rare and Wonderful Treasures, The Street of the Sword, Castle Ward (map: #29); gems, rare coins, regalia; 40%

Chuldán Helmstar; Chuldán; at Helmstar Warehouse, Dock Street, Dock Ward (map: #267); carvings, statuary; 35%

Haerlit Thomm; Felzoun Thar at Felzoun’s Folly (tavern), Salabar Street, The Trades Ward (map: #193); Thomm Warehouse, Sambril Lane, Dock Ward (map: #233); furniture, distinctive furnishings; 35%

Jannaxil Serpentil; Jannaxil, at Serpentil Books & Folios, Book Street, Dock Ward (map: #275); maps, charts, and books; 30%

Lhund Dhaeromos; Hulfast, on the docks (usually Wharf Street, Dock Ward); Dhaeromos Warehouse, Belnimbra’s Street, Dock Ward (map: #281); exotic creatures, plants, and all types of slaves; 30%

Orsabbas “the Fingers”; Orsabbas, at Orsabbas’s Fine Imports, Vellarr’s Lane, The Trades Ward (map: #179); tapestries, wines, perfumes; 30%

Phalantar Orivan; Phalantar, at Phalantar’s Philtres & Components, The Street of Bells, Castle Ward (map: #33); magic—written and active (i.e. magical items); 35%

Torst Urlivan; Torst, at his inn, The Gentle Rest, The High Road, The Trades Ward (map: #191); Gentle Rest Stables, Deloun Alley, The Trades Ward (map: #192); horses, harness; 40%

Ulmar “the Watchful”; Ulmar or Zhaegos; Crommor’s Warehouse, The Reach, Dock Ward (map: #2); ships & shipboard equipment, cargos; 40%

Orlpar Husteem (younger brother of Orbos, head of the Husteem noble family); Hala Myrt at The Grinning Lion tavern, off Golden Serpent Street, North Ward (map: #135); Orlpar’s house on Golden Serpent Street, North Ward (map: #160); spices, scents, wines, and drugs; 60%

Plague and Fire

Disease is a danger whenever many beings are crowded together; DMs should use the modifiers given in the Dungeon Masters Guide under “Disease,” checking for disease every four weeks (remember, in the Realms a week is ten days) and parasitic infestations every three weeks. Medical care in Waterdeep is surprisingly good: rest, cleanliness, herbal medicines, the presence of many clerics and a relevant guild, and the use of bread-mold cures and other substances to help one’s body to recover are all understood. Fees can, however, be high if a victim suffers from anything major or complicated. Severe outbreaks may result in buildings being sealed up (with afflicted victims within) for 4-6 months and then seared with magical, cleansing fire by the Watchful Order of Magists & Protectors, but curative magics are always attempted before this is done.

Fire is not as common in Waterdeep as it might be. The collapse of a building often douses the fire with a dull boom as the full water cistern on the roof is emptied onto the flames, or the building falls in, onto a full cellar cistern. Watch officers are adept at fighting fires with sand, night soil, the removal of flammables, and in most cases, the full cooperation of nearby City folk. Timbers are used for most of the upper stories, and for floors and furnishings, in Waterdeep buildings, but this seacoast City is damp (fogs and gentle mists are common) and most wood is very slow to catch a light, even when heating fires within are large, and ground-level storeys and the floor directly above them are usually of stone or clay brick. Roofs are often a mixture of boards, thatch, and slates, sealed with pitch.

Most injuries in fires come from smoke inhalation or being burned by raining goblets of fiery pitch when a roof collapses. A typical building in Waterdeep has a base 30% chance of an uncontrolled fire in a room spreading (increased if there are tapestries, or stocks of stored fuel such as woodpiles oil present) to the rest of the building. If it does, usually in 6-9 (5+1d4) rounds, the building will be engulfed, a process taking 3-6 turns, affected by any firefighting attempted and by the weather, and there is a 1 or 2 chance on a 1d8 that the fire will spread to adjacent buildings (check for each building; if a fire spreads to a new building, there is a base 20% chance of it engulfing the structure as the original one was, and so on; unless aided by magical or very unusual winds, a fire will never leap over water, a street, or another already burned building to reach a structure farther away).

Members of a certain Guild, The Watchful Order of Magists & Protectors, will guard building against fire, or attempt to extinguish existing fires, for fees. A private home of middling wealth and no especially flammable or valuable contents is 35% likely to have a protection contract with this guild; members will arrive in 4-7 (1d4+3) rounds and attempt to douse the flames by magical means.

Wintering in Waterdeep

The importance of Waterdeep as a center of trade, and the ready market its wealthy population provides to merchants, keep the City of Splendors busy for most of each year. The North has fierce winters, however, and overland trade is virtually cut off from the Inner Sea lands, while travel within the North itself is limited to a few brave (or foolhardy) adventurers, who do not as a rule travel heavily laden with trade goods. Even the shipping of the Sword Coast is imperilled by ice and by raw winter gales, although the harbor does remain open year-round.

Wintering in Waterdeep offers a very different setting for adventure than the other seasons. The population is effectively limited to those within the walls when winter closes in, and few creatures arrive or leave.

Beasts of prey come down out of the wilderlands to the fields outside the City walls, hoping to catch some human-sized meals. The Guards at each City gate are doubled in number because of such menaces, and equipped with long pikes. Occasional Guard patrols try to keep track of creatures in the vicinity of the City, and note how passable the roads are. Few arrive at or leave the City until the spring thaws are past, although a few daring “mudrunners” bring wide, flat trade sledges through the mud of each thaw to gain premium prices from the bored City populace for their wares.

Everyone in Waterdeep over a winter has plenty of time—time to plan next year’s business affairs, or scheme about how to arrange this or that; in short, intrigue runs rampant. It is damp and cold, and snows a lot; tempers worsen as the weeks pass, and adventurers are warned that trouble is far easier to find when noble, merchant, beggar, and Watchman alike are bored and irritated. Winter in Waterdeep comes a week or so after The Feast of the Moon, isolates the City two or three weeks after that, and then deep winter lasts two months before the first thaws begin the slow warming process.

Thieves should note that many of the richer merchants and nobles empty and shut up their villas or houses and vacate the City for somewhere warmer (such as Tharsult, Tashalar, Narubel, or even Calimshan) to spend the winter.

A NIGHT OUT IN THE CITY

Waterdhavians generally work hard, make large amounts of money as a result, and play hard, too. By night, taverns do a steady (though muted by regular Watch patrols) trade, and the fest-halls and nightclubs—there are many in the docks area, and a few in all of the other City wards—are wild, crowded places, to say nothing of the private parties in homes, the villas of the nobles, and guildhalls. There is no “weekend”, as there are no weekly “holy days” or days off work as we know them, although there are festivals and special holidays throughout the year (refer to the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set for details; in Waterdeep, all holidays described in the entry on The Calendar of Harptos are celebrated), but Waterdhavians usually party at least once every three nights unless they are very busy with their work (e.g. anyone involved in shipping goods just before winter or just after the big spring thaws) or are courting.

Waterdeep is lamplit by night (by The Guild of Chandlers & Lamplighters): Castle Ward very brightly, Sea Ward and North Ward less so; and the other wards less and less so. The City of the Dead is lit only by the torches at the foot of Ahghairon's Statue.

The City of the Dead is an active place by night, although it is very heavily patrolled by the Watch. Prostitutes and their clients, and those wishing to transact private (usually shady) business deals undetected, make use of its dark expanses. In general, the docks area has the noisiest taverns, and Waterdhavians wishing to have a wild time will go there. Except along the High Road itself, noisy establishments in the North Ward or the Sea Ward are effectively prohibited by the Watch, and they frown upon nighttime activity in The Trades Ward north or east of The High Road, and in Southern Ward north of Caravan Court. Rowdy, home-bound Waterdhavians or visitors may receive a Watch escort. Rowdies with no apparent home to return to, or too drunk to find it, will be taken to a cell until sober, and then released without charge (unless, of course, they have indulged in vandalism or gotten into serious fights on the way).

DRESS AND APPEARANCE

All manner of clothing and garb may be seen on the streets of Waterdeep. There are no laws relating to dress except to prohibit private citizens from impersonating Lords, Magisters, or officers of the Guard or Watch. Guild livery can only legally be worn by Guild members, and is worn when appearing before the Lords' Court on official business, during holidays, outside the City on diplomatic trading business, when appearing before a Black Robe, and at any private Guild functions that Guild laws require it to be worn to, such as voting meetings. Coats of arms to which one is not entitled cannot, of course, be copied and worn.

Nobles usually do not wear their coat-of-arms, except in the form of signet rings, belt buckles, or pendants; their servants wear clothing emblazoned with their coats-of-arms. Nobles may wear any sort of dress without social censure; it is common for noble women attending parties and other "high society" functions to wear glittering, diaphanous gowns of silk and sequins, their lower bodies concealed by many layers of translucent silk, each layer sequined in different patterns, and their upper bodies festooned with jewelry (and, if the weather is cold, fur gloves that reach up to points at the shoulders). Most "high fashion" noble party dress involves masks, although many are not intended to conceal the wearer's identity, but merely to provide a means of further jeweled head adornment. Younger noble ladies often wear gowns with elaborate filigree "stomachers" in exquisite designs (often set with gems), and the arms and front of the noble lady will themselves be covered with glued-on gold dust and sequins. A "stomacher" is a rigid garment, in this case of open wire-work worn over the silken dress, extending from crotch or breast; Waterdhavian examples often sweep up both sides of the bodice into fantastic swirls and points on the shoulders.

Mercenary and adventuring company members usually wear the devices of their organizations openly, with pride, on the City streets; again, it is a crime to falsely wear such garb, although a plaintiff must prove (by oath of recognized officers of such a body, or the enlistment rolls, or both) that such a person is unlawfully bearing such a device—such complaints are, as a result, rarely successful.

Jewelry is worn by both sexes in the City of Splendors; some people festoon themselves with its glitter, and others never wear even a single bauble (regardless of personal wealth). All manner of hairdos may be seen, and all types and colors of clothing are used. There is no law against nudity or requiring that this or that area of the body be covered, but Waterdeep is a damp coastal city—when it isn't raining (or in winter, snowing), there is usually mist about the streets. Despite the sheltering mountain, the City streets can also be windy in bad weather and around highsun (dawn, dusk, and night tends to be calmer). These conditions preclude light or skimpy dress for most beings, most of the time.

The fashions of other planes, as well as other lands, may be seen on the City streets, so dress is individual and variance is freely tolerated. There is no such thing as "not in fashion" in the City of Splendors, when it comes to dress. Beings of almost all races may be seen in the City, too. A typical Waterdhavian would react with hostility and fear only to a drow, an illithid, an obviously unhuman native of the Lower Planes, and an armed orc (as well, of course, as "monsters" such as beholders and dragons); with all others, it's generally "business as usual."

MANNERS

Again, the cosmopolitan nature of the City of Splendors makes Waterdhavians very tolerant. They tend to be talkative, friendly, easy-going, and outspoken, but do not expect others to be. Good Waterdhavian merchants are very quick to sense how those they meet like to speak and be spoken to (so that they can make business deals with speed and to mutual advantage and pleasure), and slow to take offense. A Waterdhavian will usually state plainly his or her feelings, often as a warning (for example: "I don't find that amusing, friend," said pleasantly to a stranger), before showing clear anger. Some visitors to the City have misinterpreted such behavior as cowardice or lack of perception (as in, "he was too stupid to even know I was insulting him!"), but if they act upon such judgments, they usually regret it. Most Waterdhavians are slow to take fright unless facing magic or monsters; a human threatening them is quite likely to be stared at calmly, or even sneered at. Lecherous and drunken behavior, as strange manners of speech or customs, tend to be tolerated. If a drunken outlander makes a coarse suggestion to a Waterdhavian who does not find it amusing or inviting, the suggestion will merely be ignored. If repeated, the Waterdhavian will leave if he or she wishes to, or simply state his or her disinterest or lack of appreciation. This process will continue for some time ere fists fly or blades flash, as a general rule—Waterdhavians with hair-trigger tempers who don't also happen to be magic-users of stratospheric level simply don't last long.

Waterdhavians, unless farmers or sailors by profession, do not discuss the weather. Small talk normally centers on matters of commerce, and secondarily on warfare elsewhere in the Realms (such as the constant small-scale strife in the South, or the recent bloodshed in Tethyr and between Ruathym and Luskan); Waterdhavians tend to take a sporting interest in such happenings.

Chapter 5: THE GUILDS AND FACTIONS OF THE CITY

This chapter details many, but by no means all, of the various special-interest (or “power”) groups active in the City; the Dungeon Master is encouraged to use the maneuverings of these to generate continual adventure for PCs in any ongoing campaign, and to introduce his or her own power groups.

Space prohibits discussion of the many mercenary and adventuring groups. These tend to vanish, reappear, grow, shrink, amalgamate, and change names with bewildering rapidity as their fortunes wax and wane. Many such are mentioned in this book, in conjunction with various NPCs or events, and others are mentioned in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set. The DM is encouraged to use only what he or she likes of such groups.

FACTIONS

The various “power groups” of Waterdeep can be divided into four factions. Picture these as the four corners or points of a rectangle or diamond, tugging at each other but counterbalanced, so that although one faction may gain the ascendant, none can completely eliminate or absolutely rule the others without destroying the City. These four factions are The Ruling Faction, The Guilds, The Temples, and The Independents.

The Ruling Faction has largely already been detailed in these pages. It consists of the Lords, the Guard, the Magisters, the Watch, the Palace and its officials and diplomats, and a special group, the Red Sashes, described below. This faction traditionally has the upper hand in Waterdeep, and the Lords are extremely careful to ensure that things stay that way by retaining (ruthlessly, if need be) the absolute loyalty of the other members of this faction, particularly the Guard (which, traditionally, the Guilds always try to purchaser the loyalty of). With a few individual exceptions, the nobles must be considered part of The Ruling Faction, as they stand squarely behind it. The Lords largely leave the nobles alone, and they are thus far more free to act as they want to, without responsibilities. At one time almost all the noble families ran almost all of the Guilds, but these days most noble families have withdrawn from the cut-and-thrust of active guild membership.

The Guilds are detailed in this chapter, and operate within limits set by the Lords (some only as far as the Lords’ vigilance forces them to). The DM should become passingly familiar with these guilds before any play involving the City commences. Their ranks will provide “honest jobs” for PCs and most of the NPCs they will have daily dealings with, and properly handled by the DM, will provide much of the “life” of the City in an ongoing campaign.

The major temples listed earlier are summarized in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set. Regardless of what deities a DM uses, the priesthoods work their ends through the common people (the fourth faction), by exhortation and manipulation, and by direct diplomatic appeal to the Palace.

The Independent faction, far more numerous than the other factions, consists of private citizens of Waterdeep who do not belong to a Guild. Most adventurers (Player Characters and NPCs) and mercenaries are members of this faction, as are lone magic-users and thieves. This faction gains its name from the independent (non-Guild) merchants of Waterdeep. The lack of common organization renders this most numerous group the least powerful.

The most active interfactional rivalry in Waterdeep is between the Guilds and the Ruling faction, a rivalry traditionally won by the Lords because of the personal strength of the Lords, although weaker Lords could crack down on all other factions (ruining Waterdeep’s ever-growing prosperity, and their own popularity, in the process) with stiffer, martial law. Waterdeep is not like many more corrupt cities in the South, however; by and large, everyone in the City of Splendors is too busy making or spending money to care enough about such rivalries to cause any open conflict. This or that individual might slay or trick a rival individual, but the factions do not see themselves as cohesive groups warring with each other. Indeed within Guilds, priesthoods, and nobles there are stronger rivalries than between factions.

The Red Sashes

This mysterious group is not known to have ever operated outside Waterdeep’s walls. A brotherhood whose entire membership is a secret to all but their head, who is known only as “the One”, the Red Sashes are elusive and as unobtrusive as possible in their activities. Experts in intrigue and at hiding or locating wanted persons, the Red Sashes (who do not wear red sashes, but sometimes tie up a wanted felon with red sashes and leave him or her on the Palace steps or at the foot of Ahghairon’s Tower for the Watch to find) can be hired by contacting one of six known agents. The Red Sashes seem to avoid taking sides in City disputes, but most believe themselves to be the real opposition to the Lords of Waterdeep.

The six contacts for this group are the cobbler Thurve Thentavva (Thentavva’s Boots, #177, Vellarr’s Lane, The Trades Ward), the horse dealer Surrolph Hlakken (Hlakken Stables, #224, Coachlamp Lane, Southend Ward), the courtesans Aletha and Jhoysil Samprava (the Purple Palace, #260, Slut Street, Dock ward), and the dockhand “Red” Hlintas Urte! (most evenings: The Sleeping Snake (tavern), #245, Wharf and Dock Streets, Dock Ward). The sixth agent, known to far fewer of the public, is Naneatha Lhaurilstar, a courtesan of Piergeiron’s Palace (her house, #10, is on Gem Street, in the Castle Ward); Piergeiron provides escorts of both sexes as hosts and guides to visiting envoys, seemingly innocent of any immorality that may be involved, and certainly unaware of any loyalties to the Red Sashes and other groups.

The DM should try to keep secret from the players the fact—unknown to all of the Red Sashes except Naneatha and a 5th level fighter of the Red Sashes, the moneylender Jurisk Ulhammond—that “the One” is in fact Durnan of the Lords of Waterdeep, who uses them to unwittingly further the Lords’ interests (ironically, the Shadow Thieves hire them often to act against the Lords!). Of the Lords of Waterdeep, only Durnan, Mirt, “Kitten,” Sammereza, and Khelben know that the Red Sashes work for Durnan, who uses them to accomplish things in the City that the paladins among the Lords would never agree to.

The Guilds

Hereafter the forty-two recognized Guilds of Waterdeep are described in brief. For each, the name, class and level, and Guild title, if any, of the Master and a contact person (some guilds don’t have a separate spokesman; all business is addressed directly to the Master) are given. Few Guilds control their field of interest absolutely. Most Guilds merely use their numbers to do better than independents, and thereby gain the lion’s share of business.

The majority of Waterdhavians, living in a city of contracts, negotiations, and commerce, are literate. Without exception, all Guild contacts and senior members can read and write (whether they will admit to being able to do so is another matter).

The DM should read the entry for any Guild the PCs have dealings with, and consider the motivations of Guild members and agents, to determine how this or that Guild should act towards PC offers and activities.

Not all professions are organized into guilds. Notably, panderers, courtesans, and “escorts” lack a guild, nor do sages have such an organization. For the convenience of Dungeon Masters, sages will be detailed collectively hereafter as though they did.

Sages, or “wisebeards” as most Waterdhavians call them, can be found in most City markets. They are of varying degrees of learning. Waterdeep has no great resident sages of note at present. (The most learned regular inhabitant of the City of Splendors at this time is undoubtedly the archmage Khelben “Blackstaff” Arunsun.)

Most sages in the City rent rooms and move about often, as they search for new beings to consult and writings to study. Such moves minimize risks of theft and intimidation to acquire information, and the regrettable tendency of landlords and neighbors to disturb a sage’s studies with requests for this or that information “free. . . just for me?” The present locations of the sages listed below are therefore left to the DM. Note that the sages listed below are by no means all the learned-experts-for-hire in Waterdeep. The Dungeon Masters Guide should be consulted for details of dealing with sages. It is strongly suggested that sages be too expensive for casual consultations, or even for PCs to consult them often.

Guilds must be recognized by the Lords. The newest Guild is The Watchful Order of Magist & Protectors, formed only forty years ago. Applications for Guild formation are seldom recognized. Applications that would create rivals in the same field(s) of trade as an existing Guild are always denied. The Lords prefer that competition exist within Guilds, rather than between them—although rival Guilds often compete over areas of trade where their jurisdictions overlap.

Guilds have widely varying degrees of influence, but no official precedence; they are numbered below purely for ease of reference. Guild ranks vary, but usually, from the top down, they are Master (or head); Elders or Council (if they have a say in governing Guild matters), usually “senior members”; spokesman or contact person for the public; Member; Apprentice/Prentice/Novice (the term varies from guild to guild, as do the powers and dues of this rank—consult individual Guild entries).

A Short Guide To Guild Portfolios

This alphabetical list of goods and services will aid DMs in finding the guilds relevant to any PC activities. Guilds are listed by the number given them in the alphabetical Guild entries which follow this list. If several are given for a particular heading, several guilds may well be involved, or several guilds may dispute who has control over the good or service in question.

accounting: 33
aerial steeds: 36
animal breeding, capturing, taming: 36 animals, slaughtering of: 14 armor fitting: 35
armor, leather: 24
armor, metal: 35 arrows: 8 art: 33
baked goods: 1
bars (windows, grates): 26 barrels, making & repair: 4 baskets, making & repair: 23 beer: 39 bells: 19
belts, etc.: 24
blacksmithing: 26 bookkeeping: 33
boots: 29 bottles: 17 bows: 8 boxes: 11
branding (animals): 36 building construction: 2, 18

building design: 38 (2) building repair: 2 candles, making: 15
cargo handling: 20 carpentry: 2
catapult repair: 8
caulking and sealing: 3 (not ships) chain: 26
chain, fine: 21 charts, nautical: 38 cleaning (streets & stables): 6 clerks: 33 cloth: 28, 31
clothing: 22, 31
coach building: 40 composing (poetry & music): 6 counterfeiting: 33 court records: 33
crates: 11
crystal balls: 17, 41
dictation: 33 digging: 3 distillation: 39
docks, loading & unloading: 20 documents: 33
drugs, medicinal: 13
drydocks: 30
dung removal: 7 dyeing: 28 engraving: 19, 21 eyeglasses: 17 ferrying: 20
fertilizer: 5, 7, 12
finesmith-work: 35
firefighting: 41
fish fishermen, fish-sellers: 12 flowers: 5
food: 5
food, preservation and packing of: 11 footwear, making & repair: 29 forgery: 33 frames, metal: 26 furniture: 16, 23
furs: 34
garbage removal: 7, 20 gems: 21
“gilt” ink: 37 glass, making & installation: 17 gloves: 31
gold: 21
guiding through streets: 15 harness: 32 healing: 13
horns, warning: 6
horseshoeing: 26
horse breeding & training: 36 housing (“who lives where” information): 23 ink: 37

Known Sages of Waterdeep	Alignment	Abilities (16+)	Major Fields of Expertise (Specialties in Brackets)	Minor Fields of Expertise
Ammathair Hawkfeather	LN	IN 18, DEX 16	Humankind (History, Theology & Myth)	Metaphysics
Amnglor Belthair	NG	IN 18	Supernatural & Unusual (Divination, Planes: Outer)	Chemistry
Blackrabbas Khuulthund	CN	IN 18	Fauna (Avians, Insects)	Flowers, Herbs
Haerund Mhammaster	CN	IN 18	Demi-humankind (Art & Music, Legends & Folklore)	Cryptography
Ilighast Chamnabbar	NG	IN 17, WIS 17	Supernatural & Unusual (Dweomercraft, Planes: Astral, Elemental & Ethereal)	Demi-Humankind History
Javroun Lithkind	NE	IN 17	Humankind (History, Politics & Genealogy)	Geography
Kromnlor Sernar	CN	IN 16, WIS 18	Flora (Fungi, Herbs)	Medicine*
Mirrormul Tszul	CG	IN 18, WIS 18	Humanoids & Giantkind (Biology Languages)	Demi-Humankind Languages
Narthund Delhzour	LG	IN 18, WIS 17	Physical Universe(s) (Astronomy, Geology & Mineralogy)	Astrology & Numerology
Zeltabbar Iliphar	NG	IN 17	Humankind (Languages, Legends & Folklore)	Planes: Outer

*The Guild of Apothecaries & Physicians will warn people against the “false” knowledge of this sage. Kromnlor’s learning is actually far greater (and more accurate) than that of most members of the Guild.

inns: 10
 jewelry: 21
 lamplighting: 15 latches: 26
 laundry: 22
 leather: 24, 29 (winter only), 32 lettering (signs): 33 letters (written): 33 lighting, night: 15 liqueur: 39 liquor: 39 livestock: 14 locks: 35
 longshoremen: 20
 magic (including protection against): 41
 magnifying glasses: 17 maps (purchased, drawn, and sold): 38 masks: 35
 masonry: 18
 material components (for spellcasting): 41 meat: 14
 medicine: 13
 metal, precious: 21 metal-work, design & repair: 26 metal casting: 19
 mounts, "trade-in": 36
 music: 6
 musical instruments: 6 nautical charts: 38 needles: 26 packaging, construction of: 11 packing: 11
 parchment, fine: 37
 paper-making: 37 pastries: 1
 pedigrees, animal: 36 pens: 37 pewter-work: 19
 piloting (harbor): 25 (20) pipe-laying: 3
 plans (building): 38 plaster-work: 2 plumbing: 3 portraits: 33
 pottery: 18
 preservatives, making & using: 11
 "problem patrons," information: 10 quarrying: 18 quills: 37
 record-keeping: 33
 renovations, building (plans): 38 rental coaches & wagons: 9 repairing buildings: 2 roofing: 2, 18
 rope: 27 (25) saddles: 32
 sages: no guild sail: 27 (25)
 sand: 17, 18
 sandpaper: 17, 18, 21 scabbards: 24 scribes: 33
 scrivener's: 33
 seals: 35 (see also 37) seasonings: 14
 secret compartments: 40 sewer-work: 3, 6
 shipbuilding: 30
 ship-loading & -unloading: 20 ship-captaining: 25 ship-owning: 25 ship-repair: 30 signets: 35 silver: 21

singing: 6 skinning, animals: 24
 slaughtering, animals: 14 sleighs & sledges, rental: 9 smithy-work: 26
 smuggling: 4, 13, 40 soap-making: 22 spectacles: 17
 "spell-guard": 41
 stable-cleaning: 7 stamps, business: 35 stolen animals, tracing: 36 stone polishing: 18
 stone cutting: 18 street cleaning: 7 tack: 32 tailors: 31 tanning, hides: 24
 thieves: no guild (see 21) tile-making: 18 tools: 19, 26
 toys: 16, 35
 tracing of stolen animals: 36
 "trade-in" mounts: 36 transportation (within city), land: 9 transportation (within city), water: 20 veterinary aid: 36 wagons, making & repair: 40
 "wanted" likenesses: 33 warehouse rental: 5
 waxes: 37
 weapons: 26, 35 (swords, finest quality) weaving: 28 wheels: 42
 wicker-work: 23 wine: 39 wire: 21, 35 woodcarving: 16
 wool & woolsens: 44 work clothing: 31
 zzar: 39

1. THE BAKERS' GUILD

Master: Dundold Buldharroaz (0 level fighter)
 Headquarters: The Master Bakers' Hall, #22, The Street of the Sword, Castle Ward

Livery: white cloaks and hats with a light blue chevron on the left shoulder or brim of each
 Entrance: 10 gp; by application to "the Master Bakers": the ten senior (longest registered) Guildmembers, plus the Master
 Dues: 5 sp/month
 Contact: Relchoz Hriiat, Hriiat Fine Pastries, #134, Sammarin's Street, North Ward

The Bakers' Guild is very wealthy. Its wares are known to be of good quality, and many citizens of Waterdeep live largely on breads and pastries. This, of course, makes it of great interest to those trying to get money for investments in other businesses (which has increased this guild's influence with other guilds, and the influence of individual bakers with other merchants), and to thieves. As a result of the attentions of the latter group, most bakers have "runners" who both deliver hot wares to customers who place large orders, and serve to chase thieves and act as bodyguards to protect the bakers and their cash. These private guards have no authority, but the Watch usually co-operates with them rather than resenting or cautioning them.

2. THE CARPENTERS', ROOFERS', AND PLAISTERERS' GUILD

Master: Halthos "the Hammer" Blund (3rd level fighter)
 Headquarters: The Stone House, #206, Telshambra's Street, Southern Ward

Livery: red caps, pierced in the brow with a row of three brass nails

Entrance: 25 gp per individual
 Dues: 10 gp/year (member); 5 gp/year (Prentice)
 Contact: Elemos "the Hand" Dunblast, Dunblast Roofing, #172, Ironpost Street, The Trades Ward

This guild is extremely busy and extremely rich, with many members; even casual labor hired by its members must be enrolled in the Guild, even if only as prentices, although the Guild is continually unsuccessful in attempts to force the Lords to legally restrict building, construction, and repair within the City to Guild members. The Lords have repeatedly taken the position that a building is the property of its owner, who may modify, repair, or rebuild it if he or she wishes, and that any system of inspection must remain within the power of the Lords, and not be made a Guild affair. There have been several instances of Guild members sabotaging non-Guild work (to convince building owners to trust only the Guild; "you can be sure our work won't collapse around you"), but by and large members of this Guild are too busy for such mischief. They have their hands full just keeping up with demands from nobles to build this or that new, bigger, and higher, and from merchants to repair this or that as cheaply as possible so long as it won't fall down, and finish it by tonight . . . Guild work is expensive: 1 gp per man per day on the site, plus 5 gp for a Guild surveyor-chartist, and 5 gp for a Guild engineer (usually the boss of a work crew, with the surveyor-&artist being the crew's liaison with clients), plus the cost of materials, and a flat 10 gp per day fee for "crew needs" (food and drink), regardless of the size of that day's crew. This Guild does serviceable work, although it boasts no great engineering genius in its ranks at present, and specializes in competent repair work. Most successful Guild members undertake work in neighboring cities to the north along the Sword Coast as far as Luskan, although their fees rise sharply the farther they get from the City's walls. Most Guild members who do outside work have arrangements with adventurer types to persuade clients toying with the idea of not paying for work done, to make sure payment is prompt and in full. Outside the City, most Guild members design their own buildings if a client does not wish to, but inside Waterdeep that is the province of another Guild, and members of this Guild only do on-site surveying to match already-prepared plans (although they may occasionally pretend otherwise).

3. THE CELLARERS AND PLUMBERS' GUILD

Master: Hilitimm Turnstone (2nd level fighter, Master Plumber)

Headquarters: The Old Guildhall, #186, Gaustus Street, The Trades Ward

Livery: deep orange caps and cloaks, with a red line trim border around all hems and cuffs

Entrance: 5 gp; by acceptance by the Guildmaster only

Dues: 7 sp/month

Contact: Jhalossan Turnstone (0 level fighter, plumber), Turnstone Plumbing and Pipefitting, #280, Belnimbra's Street, Dock Ward

This guild is small, highly trained, and somewhat scornful of the "thick-fingered clods" of the Carpenters', Roofers', and Plaisterers' Guild, whose work they constantly encounter in the course of their duties. The Guild is engaged in constant small repair jobs about the City, and is responsible for restoring the surface of any street or courtyard dug up, promptly upon completion of the work. Their reward for hours of much and back-breaking digging are the highest fees of any of the service guilds: 2 gp per man per day or part of a day (most crews are two or three men in size) plus materials, and a "crew head" (or food and drink retainer) of 10 gp per day or part of a day.

Materials commonly used include lots of pipe, fashioned by other guilds, the guild depending on whether it is made out of metal or clay; the cellarers and plumbers lay it, support it with stones and talus or wooden collars of their own fashioning, and seal everything with various secret mixtures of pitch, gravel, lime, sand, and similar materials.

Members of this Guild unearth many things during the course of their diggings. By the rules of the Guild they are bound to tell only the owner (most will do so only if the owner is observing, or asks directly) upon request, or fellow Guild members, of treasure, skeletons, valuables, secret passages, and the like (they may keep any of these that they can make off with undetected by the owner or the Watch, by Guild rules). Most senior Guild members, in their work of draining cellars or repairing the sewage plumbing of old buildings, learn the general layout of the City sewers in 2-5 (1d4+1) years. Some believe that members of this Guild know of underground pipes and cavities that lead nowhere, but are used by this Guild for storing weapons, magic, and treasure—and disposing of the occasional corpse—where only earthquake or the Guild will find it. Some believe that this Guild knows of, or even makes, hidden tunnels leading into the treasure vaults of nobles, and the cellars of the Palace itself. Some are correct.

4. THE COOPERS' GUILD

Master: Rugglar Tossarim (4th level fighter, Master Cooper)

Headquarters: Coopers' Rest, #255, Pressbow Lane, Dock Ward

Livery: brown caps and cloaks, with hem-lines of blue and green as trim

Entrance: 30 gp (upon acceptance by majority vote of the members)

Dues: 3 gp/month

Contact: the Master

The Coopers' Guild is kept busy. Many things that go aboard ships in Waterdeep's busy port, notably pickled fish from The Fishmongers' Fellowship and the wares of The Vintners', Distillers', and Brewers' Guild, require its barrels. Members of this Guild cut, steam and shape the wood, and form and weld the metal (from hoopstock supplied by The Most Careful Order of Skilled Smiths & Metallforgers) of the bands, of barrels themselves, and charge 5 sp to 5 gp per barrel, depending on the size (from foot-long hand-keg, with rope handle, to twenty-toot long cellar cask; most produced are 1 gp, 10-gallon barrels). Long ago Waterdhavians (and others up and down the Sword Coast) discovered that one of the best ways to smuggle things into, and out of, kingdoms is in sealed barrels, so the Guard inspects every so many barrels at random, paying the Guild a "resealing fee" of 3 sp per barrel. A Guild member caught smuggling will be fined heavily (usually 50 gp). One caught with a dead body or two in a cask will be imprisoned, and may lose his or her Guild membership (such membership losses are quietly restored by the Guild when imprisonment ends)—and yet this happens constantly most Guild members cannot resist the "free gold" they are offered for doing so. Seventy-five hp or more is expected, per barrel of contraband.

5. THE COUNCIL OF FARMER-GROCERS

Master: Zelderan Guthel (0 level fighter, Master Provisioner)

Headquarters: The Market Hall, #42, Traders' Way, Castle Ward

Livery: cloaks or sashes of bright green; in early summer, fresh floral blossoms worn at the left shoulder

Entrance: 1 gp/year, or 25 gp for life membership; none refused

Dues: 5 sp/month

Contact: the Master, or "the Voice of the Master", Baalbaas Partall (0 level fighter), The Market Hall

This guild is a consortium whose membership changes annually with the fortunes of harvest (memberships expire in Hammer, the dead of winter (our January), and run for one year, except for twenty or so life memberships, which are without exception held by very wealthy farmers with vast landholdings). The Council determines prices for raw grain, arranges milling and warehouse facilities in the City (both of which it controls; the milling business provides the Guild with its bread-and-butter operating money, and when warehouses are emptied in winter, with no crops available to replace them until first harvest, the Guild rents the space to other merchants). The Guild also receives regular funds from the Lords in return for keeping the City's granaries and icehouses full of provisions, to feed the Castle and the Palace, and have emergency food on hand in case of siege or crop disaster. The Guild arranges market stall space for its members (although individual members must pay the daily fees), and provides cartage for spoiled food to the refuse dumps south of the City.

6. THE COUNCIL OF MUSICIANS, INSTRUMENT-MAKERS, AND CHORISTERS

Master: Kriios Halambar (0 level fighter, Master Musician; known widely as "Old Leatherlungs"), Halambar Lutes & Harps, #26, Street of Swords, Castle Ward
Headquarters: The House of Song, #181, Rivon Street, The Trades Ward

Livery: scarlet jackets, with slashed sleeves of white and purple, and deep green long cloaks and matching hats, with white and purple plumes

Entrance: 30 gp

Dues: 25 gp annually (members), 15 gp (apprentices)

Contact: the Master, or Maxeene "the Flute" Rhiosann (0 level fighter, "Lady Voice of the Council"), The House of Song

This guild elects its Master every seven years, nominating only candidates from within its membership, and eliminating the least popular candidate in successive ballots until a Master is chosen. Kriios Halambar, the current incumbent, has never been unseated in such an election, and has held the post for fifty-six years (he is now seventy-seven years of age). If he dies in office the Voice of the Council, the young singer Maxeene, will run the Council until the regular seven-year election time comes again (although she may of course run as a candidate in that election). This Guild admits as full members only skilled, accomplished artisans, and its members enjoy a good reputation for quality—and command high fees—as a result (typically 6 gp/day per member performer, and 1 gp/day for an instrument-maker, with many days involved in the making of a custom instrument). In Waterdeep, true professionals in music are not "prima donas" with difficult tempers or a need for creative self-expression that overwhelms tact. Rather, they pride themselves on giving a client exactly what is desired or needed, performed superbly. Often clients write terrible tunes or lyrics for a Guild member to perform at private parties, weddings, or other ceremonies. Members of this Guild may embellish such efforts to make them sound better (previewing them in private before the performance for the client's approval), but they never change a client's work because "they know better". It is just not done. Apprentices unable to cure themselves of such rashness will forever remain apprentices. Guild members do tutor non-musicians, and do give their own concerts, however. Amongst Waterdeep's wealthier inhabitants, hosting (and sponsoring) such concerts of an evening is a popular pastime. Certain members of this Guild create instruments of quality known throughout the Realm—and with the City, Guild members have a standing contract to provide the signal-horns (also known as "war-horns", or "battle-trumpets") for the Guard.

7. THE DUNGSWEEPERS' GUILD

Master: Zulgoss Helberad (2nd level cleric of Lathander)
Headquarters: Muleskull Tavern, #263, Ship Street, Dock Ward

Livery: cap with red and orange feathers

Entrance: 1 gp (by application to the Elder Dungsweepers—6 senior members—their decision absolute, but may be questioned 1 year after being made or reversed)

Dues: 1 gp/year

Contact: the Master

This is a poor guild, consisting of those who clean the streets (and, for a fee, the stables of others) in Waterdeep. Normally, they do not do sewer work, the province of another Guild, but the City, for security reasons, reserves the right when necessary to contact the Master of this Guild to hire (by the day; the City pays 5 sp to the worker and 3 sp to the Guild, per worker) Guild members to help in such work.

The Dungsweepers have a traditional right to "glean the sweepings", keeping anything discarded for their own use. Obvious valuables are to be turned in to the Master for sale, the individual Sweeper receiving half the sale value and the Guild the other half. Guild members bring their sweepings to Fishgut Court, where large wagons provided by the Guild take the refuse once per day under guard by a mounted patrol of fourteen Guardsmen, to a refuse dump south of the City, the "Rat Hills," a site chosen years ago to discourage hostile landings on the shallow shore between the City and the River Des-sarin. The dump is also known sardonically as "the Palace of the Rats." Prospective smugglers should note that the guardsmen inspect the wagons and their loads carefully as they are being filled and emptied, and as they re-enter the City, looking underneath and with an attendant low-level mage employing detect magic and detect invisible. There is little interest in joining this Guild, as few fancy the working conditions. Despite its work and its poverty, this Guild can be quite influential when the Master gets upset about something. He can quietly threaten to withhold Guild services, or dump the dung in specified (embarrassing, and inconvenient) areas, such as in front of a food market, festhall, or tavern. Wisely for all involved, the Master uses this power sparingly.

8. THE FELLOWSHIP OF BOWYERS AND FLETCHERS

Master: Halassiter Ahrlan (6th level fighter: weapon specialization: long bow, Master of the Bow)

Headquarters: The Citadel of the Arrow, #174, Burnt Wagon Way, The Trades Ward

Livery: white jackets or cloaks with red diagonal stripes
Entrance: 5 gp to join; readily accepts new members; registry only at headquarters

Dues: 8 sp/month

Contact: Zorondar "the Nimble" Riautar (4th level fighter; weapon specialization crossbow, light); Riautar's, Weaponry, #180, The High Road, The Trades Ward

This guild is "free and easy" in its outlook. Its members are predominantly young, and not overly concerned with cutthroat competition. There's enough demand for their wares to keep all members busy, and the Guild has a respected inspection program (to ensure shafts are straight, fletches secure, and heads of sharp, symmetrical construction, resulting in flights true to aim) that in turn guarantees that non-Guild bowyers and fletchers will never command a substantial share of business. This Guild has the exclusive contract to produce the large shafts fired by the deck bows of the City's rakers.

9. THE FELLOWSHIP OF CARTERS AND COACHMEN

Master: Jasril Malakar (0 level fighter; Master Carter)
Headquarters: The Road House, #222, Carters' Way, Southern Ward
Livery: dark blue cloaks and long-peaked caps, with silver trim
Entrance: 25 gp (for the owner of a coach or more than one conveyance), or 10 gp (for the owner of a single cart or litter), by application to the Master (few are refused)
Dues: 5 sp/month
Contact: the Master

This guild is an association for all native Waterdhavians who own carts, wagons, coaches, litters, and in winter sleighs and sledges, that they use in their business as a direct source of income. Most nobles and many wealthy individuals possess their own private coaches and litters, without being Guild members. Woolmen and other merchants who use their own wagons to carry their own goods, but do not as a rule rent them out for the use of others, also need not be Guild members. The Lords strictly forbid any efforts to restrict ownership of such conveyances within the City to the Lords on one hand and members of this Guild (only) on the other. In recent years Guild members have stopped trying to get a legal monopoly; they are presently all much too busy trying to keep up with all the business of moving the goods and persons of Waterdhavians and visitors hither and yon within the City walls.

Most major caravan companies operating overland in the North and to the Inner Sea lands have representatives in Waterdeep who are Guild members, but the lowliest carter has the same Guild rights as these, which include freedom from search by the Watch save by express orders of the Lords or a Magister. The Guard, however, can search wagons and persons of Guild members at will, and in practice, the Watch merely calls on the Guard in the event of any dispute.

The operations and jurisdiction of this Guild do not extend over water—harbor conveyances are in the province of the Watermen, another guild. The typical "cheapest" carrying fare is 1 cp for a ride in an open trotting-cart, or two-wheel rickshaw-like covered taxi, holding one or two persons and pulled by one or two persons anywhere within the City walls, for up to half an hour.

10. THE FELLOWSHIP OF INNKEEPERS

Master: Brathan Zilmer (6th level fighter, and proprietor of The Pampered Traveler Inn, #40, at the corner of Selduth Street & The Street of Bells, Castle Ward; Master of Hospitality)
Headquarters: Fellowship Hall #16, Waterdeep Way, Castle Ward
Livery: none
Entrance: 25 gp (by majority vote of the membership)
Dues: 20 gp/year
Contact: the Master

This organization is one of the oldest of all the Guilds of Waterdeep, and one of the most relaxed. Formed long ago as a means of protection (all the innkeepers together hiring a group of heavily-armed bodyguards that none of them could individually afford, to stop drunken tavern-goers returning to inns deep-drunk and getting into fights or destroying property, and to control noisy horse-play late at night), the Guild now functions primarily as a means of sharing information. News of thieves, con artists, brawlers, mages with urges to let off spells and other "problem patrons" who are making the rounds from inn to inn is shared among members, speedily. The Guild also arranges to get its members discount prices on ale, linens, laundering, and so on by placing orders in bulk. Once every nine nights, the Fellowship Hall is opened by the Master as an inn—with dining and sleeping facilities—for members only, so that they can enjoy the comforts of an inn without being the hosts.

11. THE FELLOWSHIP OF SALTERS, PACKERS, AND JOINERS

Master: Rahannsoz Burihildar (0 level fighter)
Headquarters: Shippers' Hall, #256, Oar Alley, Dock Ward
Livery: yellow cloaks and high-peaked caps with a black spoked carriage wheel on the breast and center brim, with a black sail curved around it
Entrance: 5 gp: only upon acceptance by the Master
Dues: 3 sp/month
Contact: Baerlos Dunthar, Shippers' Hall

This guild employs many young boys as runners, to keep its constantly-moving members in contact with each other and with the Master at Shippers' Hall. Salters, packers, and joiners are the professionals at preparing goods for shipping long distances. Their fees vary; so much per cargo, depending upon how much is to be packed (and how difficult the task is, measured in terms of the time it will necessarily take) and the coat of the packing materials. Joiners make shipping crates out of finished lumber after the salters (who employ brine, salt, and many other preservatives, to protect perishable goods, such as meat or fish) and packers have wrapped (in cotton, canvas, hide, or even clay, baked hard) and prepared goods for travel. Guildmembers travel about the City in response to orders sent in to Shippers' Hall by various merchants, packing goods (especially delicate or perishable items) for travel out of Waterdeep—although much of their work is in the docks area. Almost everything carried on shipboard, if not already in a barrel, does better crated than not. An hour's crating by two Fellowship members might suffice to prepare the entire belongings of one adventurer for sea travel, in one readily-opened chest (for items used often) and three to five large crates, and would cost a total of 3 gp for the labor and materials. Members of this guild do not stack or carry crates they have finished, but go on to another job. A client must hire members of The Fellowship of Carters and Coachmen, or the Watermen, to move such items to the conveyance they will travel in. The Guild maintains stocks of packing, materials for its members (not all clients provide such).

12. THE FISHMONGERS' FELLOWSHIP

Master: Aybrauve Haltorel (3rd level fighter, Master Fishmonger)
Headquarters: Seaswealth Hall, #250, Seaswealth Hall Warf, Dock Ward
Livery: silver caps, with blue eyes upon either side, or sashes of silver with a single blue eye, worn hanging straight down from the left shoulder
Entrance: 5 gp
Dues: 2 gp/year
Contact: the Master

This poor, friendly, informal Fellowship is run by a retired fisherman, Aybrauve "Farfisher", as he was known of old, who buys fresh fish from fishermen docking in the harbor. The fishermen themselves (including the large fleet owned by the Phull noble family) are not members of this guild. Fishing boats that dock at Seaswealth Hall's wharf to load or unload fish are exempted from the City's docking fee. Many fishermen never tie up anywhere else at Waterdeep's docks, but anchor in the harbor and swim or ferry ashore, to avoid the fee, beaching south of the City for repairs. Aybrauve sorts, ices, and sends their catches (eels, crabs, and fish of all sorts) to the stalls of various Guild members by means of fish carts run by his boys, all over the City. The Watch observes the progress of these carts closely to prevent theft of the fish from the boys.

Guild members can return spoiled, unsold wares at the end of the day for 1 cp/bucket. Aybrauve sells these to the Farmer-Grocers, for fertilizer.

13. THE GUILD OF APOTHECARIES & PHYSICIANS

Master: Unthril Zond (1st level illusionist, Master Physic)
Headquarters: The House of Healing, #117, The High Road, North Ward
Livery: cloaks and tunics (never caps) of black, grey, and white bands, with a large white diamond, bordered in grey with the long points vertical, on chest and back
Entrance: 50 gp, upon acceptance by the Master only Dues: 10 gp/year (member), 5 gp/year (apprentice)
Contact: the Master

This is one of the richest Guilds in Waterdeep, and has a somewhat checkered history. On several occasions various of its members have been implicated in smuggling, fraudulent investment affairs, and similar instances of criminally imprudent investments of their monies. No doubt some of their fellows (who have not been caught) remain rich and with shady connections. This Guild has also been at odds with the Lords as a group. Repeatedly the Guild has tried to have all non-member medical practitioners (including all clerics) banned from practicing in Waterdeep, so that they would have to join the Guild or cease providing it with any competition. The Lords have strenuously resisted such efforts, executing on two occasions members of this Guild who arranged assassination attempts upon the life of Piergeiron. The Guild does provide services of high quality, however. It maintains a "Formulary" in its headquarters (open to members only) that records agreed-upon formulae for many drugs and other medicinal remedies, and keeps in stock some of the rarest ingredients needed to make these medicines, dealing with far-faring seacaptains, traveling merchants, and caravan leaders to gain these from the far reaches of the Realms. Medical aid in Waterdeep is expensive: an examination is only 1 gp, but most drugs are in the 1-8 gp per bottle range (a bottle usually contains 3-6 doses, most often 4), and medical attendance, with nursing, splints, dressings, emergency medicines, and the like, costs 10-20 gp/day, based on the ability of the patient (in the estimation of the Guild members involved) to pay.

DMs must determine the effectiveness of such medicines on a case-by-case basis; generally, poisons and fevers can be neutralized if treatment begins in time. Diseases and parasitic infestations can be held at bay, but rarely fully cured by such means (although medicines may buy time for natural healing and other means to work). Most physicians can provide overnight care of dressing, bandaging, drugs, sustenance, and therapy able to restore 2-7 (1d6+1) lost hit points, if a patient rests for at least (and free of the gate-tax on wagons) three days afterwards.

14. THE GUILD OF BUTCHERS

Master: Kellatarn Nander (4th level fighter, Master Butcher)
Headquarters: The Butchers' Guildhall, #235, The Way of the Dragon, Dock Ward Livery: crimson cloaks with purple lining
Entrance: 25 gp
Dues: 3 gp/month
Conduct: "Hooks" (Morathin) Belmonder (0 level fighter, Second Knife), Belmonder's Meats, #188, The High Road, The Trades Ward

This guild represents Waterdeep's butchers; those who slaughter, and cut up for sale, all manner of livestock, from ankheg to yeti (cattle and hogs are more common, although it should be noted that people in the North, including Waterdeep, have a taste for horseflesh). Guild law ensures that meat is properly bled, hung, and smoked or seasoned in certain ways, so that it is as clean, and in as good condition as possible, and without exception the butchers who are in business in Waterdeep are Guild members. The Lords forbid formal price-fixing by the guild, but all meat is fairly expensive and similarly priced, being slightly cheaper in the docks area and slightly more expensive in the wealthy neighborhoods. Apprentice butchers pay no Guild dues, but are direct employees of a (member) butcher. Most apprentices, seeing how profitable the business is, can't wait to leave their poorly-paid positions, pay the stiff entrance fee, and pass a rigorous examination of their skills by the Master Butcher. This Guild also buys the occasional cargo of exotic meat (or slaughterable beasts) from ships, at bargain prices, reselling such goods among the Guild members at substantial savings to the individual butchers, who may pass the savings on to their customers if they wish, but are not bound to do so. Most butchers wisely offer real bargains on such occasions, earning the goodwill of their clientele, and encouraging them to sample and acquire new (and usually expensive) tastes in meat.

15. THE GUILD OF CHANDLERS & LAMPLIGHTERS

Master: Ormbas Delzord (0 level fighter, Master of the Flame)
 Headquarters: The House of Light, #200, Scroll Street, The Trades Ward
 Livery: black caps with a gold flame device on both sides of the head (and, for ceremonies only, black tunics with a gold flame inside a gold circle on the breast)
 Entrance: 5 gp, upon acceptance by the Master (who keeps the Membership limited in number)
 Dues: 3 sp/month
 Contact: the Master

This guild is the only Guild of Waterdeep whose members are predominantly youths. Aside from the Master and four senior (adult male) members, three of whom act as a mobile protection squad for the younger members, all guild members are youngsters. By day they all make candles (mostly of tallow) at The House of Light, and repair lamps. By night they run about the City with glow pots, tongs, and reach-poles, lighting lamps for the City (on contract, which provides the Guild with its daily bread-and-butter money) and for private individuals, usually nobles. Guild members also sell candles, and, for a fee, will guide the way (or provide light for a traveler who knows the way) through the City by night. Most such boys return often to The House of Light to give their monies to the Master, for all know what a tempting target a "lighter" clinking with coins is to thieves, drunks, other youths, and ruffians. A fistful of coins wrapped in a shirt or other cloth makes a handy sap. All lighters are trained to use such an improvised weapon and cry the alarm if attacked.

16. THE GUILD OF FINE CARVERS

Master: Malutt Mauksoun (5th level fighter, First Master Carver)
 Headquarters: House of the Fine Carvers, #39, The High Road, Castle Ward
 Livery: royal blue cloaks with red and brown lines as borders
 Entrance: 10 gp (member); 3 gp (prentice)
 Dues: 4 gp year (member); 2 gp year (prentice)
 Contact: Dannath Lisosar (0 level fighter, Second Master Carver), Patient Fingers Finework, #182, Sleepers' Walk, The Trades Ward

Twenty-six Master Carvers and seventy-three Prentice Carvers make up this Guild, which aids its members in many ways. Notably, it procures shipments of fine carving wood such as felsul-root, suth-wood, and zalantar from far Chult and from the South via Tharsult. It sells "prentice pieces" (inferior or damaged work) to merchant captains heading south, where some pieces will sell for their curiosity, others because of the type of wood used, and some as mementoes of the savage North. The Guild also arranges standard carving-tool sizes and qualities with the two smithing guilds, who make the chisels, knives, and gouges used by Carvers, and with The Jewellers' Guild, source of the best fine sandpaper.

The Guild also arranges large jobs (such as all the benches for congregations in a new temple, or the panelling and relief-carving of an entire mansion or castle) by lining up the needed Master Carvers and giving them Prentice Carvers to learn on the job, at a price of 1 gp per Prentice per day. Master Carvers earn 2 gp daily. In recent years, cleverly-carved wooden toys made by Guildmembers have gained greatly in popularity in the City of Splendors as gifts.

17. THE GUILD OF GLASSBLOWERS, GLAZIERS, & SPECULUM-MAKERS

Master: Maersar Rillithar (4th level magic-user, Master Specular)
 Headquarters: The House of Crystal, #104, Copper Street, North Ward
 Livery: pink cloaks or robes with a large white circle on the breast
 Entrance: 20 gp, upon acceptance by majority vote of the entire membership
 Dues: 15 gp/year (member); 9 gp/year (apprentice)
 Contact: Jhalassan Thond (0 level fighter, Speaker for the Guild), Thond Glass & Glazing, #187, Sleepers' Walk, The Trades Ward

This guild is a small, highly professional organization whose members take care to give fast, efficient, polite service, although glass is not cheap. While a simple stoppered flash may only cost 1 cp, replacing a pane of glass runs 4 cp for a four-inch-square pane up to 6 gp for a four-foot-square pane. Sets of bottles of uniform size, thickness, and glass hue are more expensive than "odd bottles." The Guild procures the finest sand (from certain beaches in the Tashalar and in Tethyr) for the use of its members in making glass, and provides emergency equipment and glass stocks for their use. A Guild member convicted of deliberately breaking glass in place in any building in Waterdeep not belonging to him, without permission of the owner, or hiring someone else to do so (such as gangs of street urchins armed with rocks) is fined by the Magisters and expelled from the Guild by the Master Specular.

Such a miscreant can later be voted back into the Guild by the membership, upon subsequent reapplication (and payment of another "entrance fee"). For many years this Guild was involved in an acrimonious dispute with The Watchful Order of Magists & Protectors over which Guild would make crystal balls—a dispute that still causes grumbling.

The matter was formally resolved some ten winters ago by the Lords. Such items can be made by anyone (including this Guild), but can be expelled only by individual (private) mages (working for themselves, but not under hire by any Guild), or by The Watchful Order.

This Guild also makes many spectacles and magnifying glasses, typically costing 5-10 gp each. Any full member of the Guild has the skill to grind and polish a glass lens to a particular strength and focus.

18. THE GUILD OF STONECUTTERS, MASONS, POTTERS, & TILE-MAKERS

Master: Buirholdan Skordar (6th level fighter, Master Stoneworker)
 Headquarters: Builders' Hall, #219, Coach Street, Southern Ward
 Livery: grey cloaks and caps with an orange pickaxe, handle vertical and blade at the top
 Entrance: 30 gp (upon examination by the Master)
 Dues: 5 gp/month
 Contact: the Master

This respected, busy Guild has over three hundred members (most of whom employ three to twelve assistants), some of whom quarry stone, some of whom cut, dress, and lay stone, some of whom only lay stone, and some of whom make clay or earthenware vessels or tiles, and lay tiles.

Constantly busy on the rooftops of Waterdeep where tile is slowly replacing thatch (which rots too quickly) and boards (which too easily catch fire when sealed with pitch, and too readily leak water inside, and rot, when not), members of this Guild also build most of the City's new buildings. The Lords frown on dwelling-places newly built entirely of timber, and restrict such structures to one story with a loft. Most City buildings are now multi-story, as Waterdeep has filled in almost all of the available spare within the walls, and is now expanding upwards.

Stone is cut and hauled from the seacoast crags north of Waterdeep, and brought by ship from Port Llast and from Mirabar, where dwarves tunneling for new ores have found it very rewarding to break up the rubble they used to toss aside into regular, rectangular blocks and sell it for 1 cp a block. That becomes 2 cp a block in Waterdeep, and 4 cp a block when a Guild member builds a structure. Demolition of an existing structure on the same site is free if the Guild member is allowed to keep what he can salvage of the stone. Repairs to, or building onto, an existing structure is 10 gp per Guild member per day plus 10 gp expenses (lunches) per day, plus material costs (3 cp a block; 5 cp for marble, obsidian, or other "finestone" that requires a smooth polish), plus 3 gp per day per assistant. Most such crews include five to eight assistants.

19. THE GUILD OF TRUSTED PEWTERERS AND CASTERS

Master: Dunbold Laracikan (4th level fighter, High Artisan)
 Headquarters: Pewterers' and Casters' Guildhall, #37, The High Road, Castle Ward
 Livery: white sleeveless surcoats and aprons with the green silhouette of a tankard, handle to the viewer's right, beneath a bell
 Entrance: 20 gp (upon acceptance by the Master)
 Dues: 1 gp/month
 Contact: Baerhar Surtlan (0 level fighter, Voice of the Guild), Surtlan's Metalwares, #194, River Street, The Trades Ward

This guild has over four hundred members, those who cast (rather than forge) items from metal. The Guild livery depicts their two most popular products: a tankard and a bell. Bowls and books are probably the next most often produced items. Players Handbook prices provide a guide for the DM in improvising the costs of such wares. The Guild buys the raw materials, and mixes a "basic whitemetal" mixture which it sells to its members cheaply (1 cp for a foot-long, three-inch-high and wide, bar) as the basis for such castings, but members like to add their own "secret ingredients" to make their products superior. The "trusted" in the Guild title refers to the fact that Guild members will melt things down for re-casting without query or comment. Precious metals are rarely handled by this Guild, who leave gold- and silver-work to The Jewellers' Guild and to The Splendid Order of Armorers, Locksmiths, And Finesmiths.

20. THE GUILD OF WATERMEN

Master: Zzundar Thul (3rd level fighter, "Master of the Harbor"—this is purely a Guild title, and not a City rank or position)
 Headquarters: Watermen's Hall, #244, Dock Street, Dock Ward
 Livery: blue shoulder-raincloaks, white shapeless hats
 Entrance: 10 gp (upon acceptance by the Master)
 Dues: 5 sp/month
 Contact: Jaster Thul (0 level fighter, Guild Spokesman, Watermen's Hall)

This guild is one of the busiest and most important in the City of Splendors. Its members keep the harbor clear of all litter (discarded crates, discarded seaweed tangles from fishing nets, discarded bodies, et cetera), run a myriad of small skiffs and ferries about the harbor and up and down the seashore of Waterdeep, for hire, and load and unload almost all of the ships that dock in Waterdeep's busy harbor. This last mentioned work is done for a standard fee of 1 sp per man per hour, doubled if the cargo is dangerous (such as live, wild beasts, even if caged; incendiaries; exotic, volatile oils; or diseased or insane creatures) Allowed to keep "found" items from harbor floating debris, and unclaimed cargo after seven months following a legal announcement of the discovery of same, unless the owner identifies it to the satisfaction of a Magister but does not wish to take possession of it within the seven months (whereupon the City stores it, granting the Waterman involved a 1 gp "finder's fee" which it recovers from the owner later). Watermen do not pilot large boats into or out of the harbor, but do work the clock around at some times of the year, loading and unloading vessels, and ferrying people to and fro, collecting their fees constantly as they work. All Watermen know the currents, depths, and backwaters of the harbor well, and where the various sewers empty into it.

21. THE JEWELLERS' GUILD

Master: Stromquill Halazar (1st level illusionist, Master Jeweller), Halazar's Fine Gems, #50, Shield Street, Sea Ward

Headquarters: The House of Gems, #11, Gem Street, Castle Ward

Livery: deep purple robes with a triangular, crown-cut white gem, point downwards, on the breast, purple hats with white plumes

Entrance: 40 gp

Dues: 25 gp/year

Contact: Jhauntar Olmhazan (0 level fighter, Gentleman Speaker for the Jewellers), Olmhazan's Jewels, #38, The High Road, Castle Ward

Members of this small, tightly-knit and secretive guild are wallowing in money. They all have bodyguards (the Lords limit such private forces of non-Nobles to sixteen armed men, maximum, as they do to all Guild members and other merchants resident in the City) and take elaborate security precautions, hiring dwarven artisans and powerful mages to devise traps to protect their gold and their gems. They also hire mercenary groups and adventurers privately, to bring them precious cargos of uncut gems (sometimes stolen from the South) from afar, and are closely watched by the Red Sashes and the Shadow Thieves. At least two powerful Guild members are agents of the Shadow Thieves.

This Guild conducts quiet but relentless vendettas against suspected gem thieves in the City. DMs should bear this in mind if PCs fall afoul of any Guild member. Members of this Guild will, however, buy with no questions asked, as well as sell, gems (cut or uncut) jewelry, and precious metals, fine chain and wire used in their work. They also cut, polish, and mount gems, repair or reset jewelry, and value jewelry for other merchants.

22. THE LAUNDERERS' GUILD

Master: Jeldeth Khondar (2nd level illusionist, Master Launderer), The House of Cleanliness

Headquarters: The House of Cleanliness, #185, Slipstone Street, The Trades Ward

Livery: white caps and cloaks with an open human hand, fingers uppermost and spread, in silver on the breast of the cloak and center peak of the cap

Entrance: 5 gp, by registry at The House of Cleanliness (none refused)

Dues: 1 gp/month

Contact: Ulaeren Caulbor (0 level fighter, Soap Master), The House of Cleanliness

Members of this guild are an overworked, underpaid

lot, who labor around the clock (most are family businesses, with the family members working in shifts) to wash the dirty garments of Waterdhavians in open-topped tubs, usually stirred with long poles (the "honest" use for a ten-foot pole) full of boiling water and scented soap. Everyone buys his own scent: some use cider, some use wine, some use straight perfume, some strong herbs. but the Guild provides various soaps for its members at cheap rates (1 gp per 10-gallon barrel). These soaps are sludgy mixtures, not hard bars or dry flakes. A launderer never guarantees that your garment will survive cleaning, and Waterdhavians do not expect perfection (nobles usually have their own servants launder difficult or delicate garments, and buy new garments for themselves often) Washing can be done while you wait (2 sp per garment: it is put back on wet, and dries on the body), or overnight (1 sp per garment). Most launderers have numbered-bins (with wooden tags) as a clothes filing system—no tag, no laundry unless you pay 2 gp or more for a new tag and your garments. Unless a launderer remembers you, there is also a wait of three or four days in case you're mistaken and someone else comes with the tag to claim the same clothes.

All cleaning must be paid for when the clothes are left, not when they are picked up; this is due to nobles who refused to pay for cleaning, every time, on the grounds that it was not satisfactory. Magisters grew tired of the constant disputes.

A favorite trick of mercenaries coming into the City used to be to find some drunken patron in a tavern about their size, follow him and beat him up, take his tag and money, and promptly claim his clothes for their own. This practice was one of the reasons that the Watch escorts many tavern-goers home, but the Watch can do nothing about those gamblers who wager their laundry tags in card, dart, or dice games when all their money is gone

23. THE LEAGUE OF BASKETMAKERS & WICKERWORKERS

Master: Felthauvin Mirrarmul (0 level fighter, Master Worker)

Headquarters: The League Office, #183, Wall Way, The Trades Ward

Livery: cloaks of gold, with thin red and purple diagonal lines forming a cross-hatch pattern on breast and back

Entrance: 15 gp (upon acceptance by the Master)

Dues: 3 sp/month

Contact: the Master

This poor, quiet guild has many members all around the City (as the handiwork of basketmaking can be carried on with ease in private dwellings, above the shops), usually 1400 or more. Its Master, aided by his family, makes a tidy living providing Guild members with supplies for their work: trimmed and bundled rushes and willow-wands. Master for life, Felthauvin owes his position to his unmatched skill at his chosen craft and his resulting ability to train members and would-be members, and to finish work for them in emergencies in a perfect match of their various styles, as well as his careful investments. Felthauvin is a major landlord in the City, personally influential as a result (thus able to deal as an equal with many far wealthier and more essential guilds), and able to bankroll the Guild in difficult times.

Felthauvin has many young sons, who "run the bundles" up stairways and alleys for him, and as a result know who lives where upstairs in the City better than any other group of people in Waterdeep except the Watch.

24. THE LEAGUE OF SKINNERS & TANNERS

Master: Orgul Telethar (0 level fighter, Leaguemaster), Telethar Leatherworks, #239, off Tower Trail, Dock Ward

Headquarters: League Hall, #241, Tower Trail, Dock Ward

Livery: Leather armbands (almost a foot long, worn on upper left arm) of gleaming brown, with a red diamond representing a hide cut into it, a black skinning knife raised up in the center of this diamond

Entrance: 15 gp

Dues: 5 gp/year

Contact: Ilmar Chantreth (0 level fighter, League Spokesman), League Hall

This guild represents those who skin each animal slaughtered by a butcher. Usually the animal is sold to the butcher, and the skinner pays the butcher 3 to 10 sp per skin, depending on its size and condition. Rare types of skins, or skins in rare hues, may cost a skinner up to 1 gp. The tanners then process the hides to produce leather, suede, vellum, and similar byproducts, which they sell to other Guilds for the making of clothing, footwear aprons, pouches, war-harness (leather armor), and the like. Traditionally, this Guild has made belts, scabbards, baldrics, straps, and suspenders itself. Other Guilds consider the wares of this Guild to be somewhat overpriced, but everyone needs their goods, and no independents have found it economical to continue operating outside the Guild, so nothing is done.

25. THE MASTER MARINERS' GUILD

Master: Jheldarr "Stormrunner" Boaldegg (4th level fighter, Master First Mariner)

Headquarters: Mariners' Hall, #242, Cedar Street, Dock Ward

Livery: red hats with white plumes, red shoulder cloaks

Entrance: 25 gp (none refused)

Dues: 10 gp/year

Contact: the Master

This guild consists of all ship captains and merchant fleet owners who are based in, or who often put into Waterdeep. It represents their interests before the Lords' Court provides them with piloting training into and around Waterdeep's Harbor, maintains emergency warehouse space (and a "free"—that is, the Guild pays all docking fees—dock with room for three vessels for loading or unloading from the Guild warehouses), and provides accommodations and a private bar for visiting members at Mariners' Hall.

Ship captains pilot themselves into Waterdeep's harbor, or signal from offshore that they require a Guild pilot, by lowering all sail and running a red signal pennant up the mainmast. Aside from the standard City docking fee, such pilots are provided free by the City, but the pilot is always accompanied by a Guard patrol, who inspects the ship's crew and cargo on the way into the harbor to ensure that no hostile or illicit activities are being brought into Waterdeep.

This guild has a continual rivalry with The Order of Master Shipwrights, but cannot afford to maintain its own ship repair facilities. It does keep emergency stocks of rope and sail that Guild members in a hurry can purchase at bargain rates instead of dealing in the City for custom-made sails, and provides its members with fresh livery upon payment of their annual dues.

26. THE MOST CAREFUL ORDER OF SKILLED SMITHS & METALFORGERS

Master: Hawkun Orsund (6th level fighter, Master Hammer), Metalmasters' Hall

Headquarters: Metalmasters' Hall, #225, The High Road Southern Ward

Livery: grey caps with black plumes, red tunics with a black vertical hammer head uppermost, on the breast

Entrance: 30 gp

Dues: 20 gp/year

Contact: the Master

This guild represents the everyday blacksmiths who shoe horses and fashion such items as lamps, torch- and sign-brackets, gratings and barred window frames, fire-shields and other hearth-ware, and chains. They also make the simpler weapons, such as maces, hammers, and flails. The everyday pieces of metal-work, from needles and spikes to boot-jacks, kitchen hooks, latches and hinges, to candlesticks, are the "bread-and-butter" work of this Guild, whose members are always busy and who prosper steadily.

Most Guild members are strong (16 ST and up), have high CON, and a high tolerance for heat and noise. A point of etiquette: never touch a smith's tools except by his leave, and state your requirements as requests, not demands, or you'll probably be told bluntly to take your business elsewhere. Members of this Guild take pride in working quickly, in designing things with efficient elegance, and in reproducing replacements to exactly match an original. DMs must devise prices for such smithywork according to the complexity and size of an item, judged against the item prices given in the Players Handbook.

This Guild provides its members with cheap, readily-available supplies of raw metals, brought by the shipload from Mirabar and elsewhere, and makes, stocks, and inspects smithy tools for the convenience of its members, who may rent or buy such from the Guild.

27. THE MOST DILIGENT LEAGUE OF SAIL-MAKERS AND CORDWAINERS

Master: Geladar Nithrim (0 level fighter, League Master), Full Sails

Headquarters: Full Sails (the League-run tavern), #251, Dock Street, Dock Ward

Livery: white cloaks and caps, and sky-blue robes; on the breast of the robes, two darker blue wavy horizontal lines (waves), and above them, three silver stars

Entrance: 15 gp (none refused)

Dues: 5 gp/year

Contact: the Master, or Tavernmaster Jelhuld Alaer (2nd level fighter), Full Sails

The vast amounts of rope and many sails needed by the ships based in Waterdeep and those who call at its busy harbor are made by members of this Guild, who use the collective buying and bargaining power of this Guild to obtain canvas, hemp, and other needed supplies as cheaply as possible from other Guilds and from outside Waterdeep. There are never enough skilled merchants in this Guild to keep up with the demand for new rope and sails; apprentices work on repairing sails (for ships whose captains can't wait a week or more for new custom sails) until they are masters of their craft, and training them in sail design is then a simple matter.

This Guild takes pride in producing heavy-duty, long-lasting goods, although their wares are not cheap: a 100' coil of heavy sail-rope is 10 sp; a 100' coil of thin black waxed cord, as strong as the sail rope but not for marine use, is 17 sp. A simple lateen or square sail for small vessels, of "standard" (not custom) dimensions, will cost 500 to 700 gp (30% less if the buyer is willing to wait several months); a custom mainsail will cost 1,000 gp. A full set of sails (including a spare jib and mainsail) for a merchant ship will cost 2,000 gp (4,000 gp for a large or triple-masted ship, more if the vessel is even larger and uses more sail). Interested buyers should note that non-Guild sailmakers usually sell no-guarantees sets of sails for half what the Guild charges.

28. THE MOST EXCELLENT ORDER OF WEAVERS AND DYERS

Master: Tresh Lanngolyn (noble, 0 level fighter)

Headquarters: The House of Textiles, #190, Nethpranter's Street, The Trades Ward

Livery: rainbow-hued dyed overcloaks and overgowns

Entrance: 30 gp

Dues: 10 gp/year

Contact: Mellor Rhagust (0 level fighter, Speaker of the Order), The House of Textiles

This guild is rich and busy and offends few. Its wares are reasonably priced and its dyes good—they bleed and stain little, and fade only slowly. Guild members will gladly dye garments to order, although patterns and devices must not mock, closely resemble, or duplicate the heraldic devices of the City, Lords, or nobles—a Lords' edict on this point is strictly obeyed by the Guild. Guilds, nobles, and others with a clear legal right to such designs may, of course, order work bearing them from this Guild, a process involving a written request bearing as witness a Magister's (or Piergeiron's) signature.

The Order has over two thousand members, most human, and over half female. Its current Master is head of the noble family Lanngolyn, and he takes care that members avoid controversy, shady dealings, and large expenses, all of which makes this Guild of little interest to adventurers

29. THE ORDER OF COBBLERS & CORVISERS

Master: Falloor Malthind (2nd level fighter, Senior merchant)

Headquarters: Cobblers' & Corvisers' House, #199, Soothsayers' Way, The Trades Ward

Livery: grey cloaks or caps, with a brown human footprint (right foot, bare), toes uppermost, on the right shoulder or cap-front

Entrance: 25 gp (member), by application to the Council of Senior Merchants (all members of the Guild who have been members for fifteen continuous years, or more)

Dues: 10 gp/year (members), 15 gp/year (apprentices)

Contact: Darion Sulmest (0 level fighter, Spokesman of the Order), Sulmest's Splendid Shoes & Boots, #111, The High Road, North Ward

This guild is a quiet, always busy, wealthy lot, who make and repair shoes, boots, and all forms of footwear, including thick-soled wooden clogs for use in rain and snow. This is not a profession for the lazy—Waterdeep's inhabitants keep members of this Guild working hard, and always try to get their own shoes or boots mended (or made new) first, before all the others waiting, by paying extra, and promising more. When a dozen or so customers do this in quick succession, some Guild members' shops get a little frantic. Most apprentices, however, watching the money roll in and reflecting on their dues (apprentices pay more than members), cannot wait to become full members, although the Council tries to keep active membership in the Guild down to 80 or so. By Guild law, each member can have up to nine—but no more—apprentices.

Guild dues are among the other things used to place large orders each fall (when herd animals that cannot be fed over the winter are slaughtered) with the League of Skinners & Tanners for basic, dark brown, heavy-duty finished leather for use in the making of footwear by the Guild. These annual orders are for tons of leather, are carefully guarded by both guilds, and the Order gets their leather at a bargain price in return for providing the League coffers with a regular, large sum to tide League members over each winter. Members of the Order are known to be either hoarders (the possessors of vast amounts of treasure hidden and secured somewhere in the City) or investors, with their money in dozens of businesses or properties (there's an old Waterdhavian saying, "Most landlords are corvisers; they know best when and how to give the boot").

30. THE ORDER OF MASTER SHIPWRIGHTS

Master: Kelvar Helmfast (noble, 4th level fighter, "The Old Captain", Master Shipwright)

Headquarters: Shipwrights' House, #266, Dock Street and Asteril's Way, Dock Ward

Livery: cloaks and robes of blue, dun, and red, in three broad vertical stripes

Entrance: 30 gp (only upon acceptance by the Master; there is no room for new members at present)

Dues: 15 gp/year

Contact: Zabardon Barpar (0 level fighter, Speaker for the Shipwrights), Shipwrights' House

This guild collectively owns the dry-docks and construction sheds of Waterdeep (except for Guildmember Amagus, who has his own, and allows the City and fellow Guild members to use it for a fee) where ships are built, although they have always been a small guild. Orlumbor's gigantic shops have always commanded the lion's share of Sword Coast shipbuilding, and the shops in Waterdeep are simply too small to lay the keels of the largest ships. The Order does a steady trade, however, producing and repairing the merchant cogs and caravels that ply coastal waters. The master merchants of Mirabar who own their own ships in Luskan, to bring their metals to Waterdeep, prefer the broad-beamed massive cogs of Waterdeep's shipwrights over all other vessels for bringing their cargos safely through storms and with

WATERDHAVIAN SHIP TABLE

Refer to the Dungeon Masters Guide and Wilderness Survival Guide for the meanings in this table

Ship Name	Hull Value	Length	Width	Draught	Speed: Normal Sail	Speed: Maximum Sail	Speed: Normal Oar	Speed: Maximum Oar	Peacetime	Armaments	Crew	Startup
Raker	36	90'	20'	6'	10 mph	16 mph	5 mph	8 mph	4 ballistae (2 fore, 2 aft); 4 fire-pot catapults (amidships and aft; armored ram)	36	4 rounds
Striker	12	60'	10'	4'	12 mph	14 mph	6 mph	10 mph	4 ballistae; armored ram	44	3 rounds
War Nao	40	40'	20'	12'	4 mph	6 mph	½ mph	1 mph	2 catapults, amidships (can carry 200 armed passengers)	40	1 turn
Fast Caravel	26	60'	10'	6'	7 mph	10 mph	1 mph	3 mph	1 ballista	10	4 rounds
Caravel	33	50'	10'	8'	5 mph	8 mph	1 mph	3 mph	1 ballista (or nothing)	10	5 rounds
Cog	40	45'	20'	10'	5 mph	7 mph	½ mph	1 ½ mph	none	12	1 turn
Heavy Cog	60	60'	25'	15'	3 mph	5 mph	½ mph	1 mph	none	14	1 turn overly heavy loads to dock in the City of Splendors. The base price for a new caravel is 6,000 gp; a "fast caravel", which is a light, slim ship larger than its similar cousin, and able to carry more sail and thus run faster, is 9,000 gp. A cog, a shorter, broader, wallowing, slower and far less elegant cargo ship, is 5,000 gp. One of the "heavy cogs" mentioned above is larger, can carry more sail, and has a massive reinforced hull (able to break through thin ice and thus sail in the North a week or so before and after less sturdy ships, each winter) is 7,000 gp.

(' = feet; mph = miles (nautical) per hour, assuming moderate favorable winds, calm seas)

Unless such ships are heavily damaged or obviously very old and worn out, they bring a "used" price of only 1,000 to 1,500 less. Guild members sometimes salvage or buy and refurbish old wrecks to make additional cash with relative ease and speed.

31. THE ORDER OF MASTER TAYLORS, GLOVERS, AND MERCERS

Master: Alurra Tarbrossen (3rd level magic-user, Lady Master of the Order), Costumers' Hall
 Headquarters: Costumers Hall, #176, The High Road and Spendthrift Alley, The Trades Ward
 Livery: white glove, arm, and half-cloak (one-piece garment), decorated with blue and green sequins in a repeating pattern of interwoven thread, leading to a threaded needle picked out in sequins along the wearer's forearm; this is worn on the left arm, hand, and shoulder, and is removed to do any practical work of any sort
 Entrance: 25 gp
 Dues: 12 gp/year
 Contact: the Lady Master

This busy guild has over six hundred members, who import some cloth and other supplies (such as thread), and use much of what other Waterdhavian Guilds make (such as leather, textiles, carved and cast buttons, and needles) to make clothing—literally tons of clothing, of all sizes and fashions, from high-society ladies' party masks to the leather breeches of a smith or dock-worker. Every Guild member has his or her own specialty (such as gloves or gowns), and prices, speed of work, and durability vary widely. The guild serves mainly to save its members money by importing needed supplies in bulk.

32. THE SADDLERS' & HARNESS-MAKERS' GUILD

Master: Deljassaa Rammathor, "Lady Wind" (2nd level thief, Guildmistress High), Saddlers' & Harness-Makers' Hall (where she lives)
 Headquarters: Saddlers & Harness-Makers' Hall, #217, Tulumaster's Street, Southern Ward
 Livery: none
 Entrance: 20 gp (upon acceptance by the Guildmistress High)
 Dues: 7 gp/year
 Contact: the Guildmistress High

This guild is led by a former thief and jockey who turned to breeding horses rather than racing them after several bad falls, and thence to making her own tack, eventually rising to head this Guild. Deljassaa is no longer an active jockey or thief, and she is widely respected among the members of her own Guild and among the Guildmasters of the City as a shrewd and pleasant wheeler-dealer who gets what she wants (such as preferential treatment from the League of Skinners & Tanners for the leather her Guild members need).

33. THE SCRIVENERS, SCRIBES, & CLERKS GUILD

Master: Dablor Zimmulstern (0 level fighter, Scribe rank: High Atlar, Guild Master)
 Headquarters: The Zoarstar, #189, Quill Alley, The Trades Ward
 Livery: none
 Entrance: 10 gp
 Dues: 1 gp/month
 Contact: the Master

This guild is a highly-educated, professional group of men and women who letter signs, draw pictures (sometimes in front of a party audience, upon a noble's hiring), compose and write letters, take dictation, design ornamental scripts, draw up legal tallies, and set down records, contracts and accounts. Many Guild members will even forge or counterfeit documents (for very stiff fees, in the hundreds of gold pieces range per document, because the penalties are so severe: expulsion from Guild and City for very serious cases, with amputation of fingers and thumbs added if the forgery is treasonous or inflammatory, in a manner that threatens the peace of the area).

The Palace retains a dozen Guild members at all times to transcribe a record of all said before it, and retains one scribe for each Magister (for the same task). The Watch also employs Guild members to draw likenesses of fugitives described by witnesses, so that Watch officers can carry these sketches when on patrol.

34. THE SOLEMN ORDER OF RECOGNIZED FURRIERS & WOOLMEN

Master: Thoss Bhalein (0 level fighter, merchant, Master of the Order)
 Headquarters: Guildhall of the Order, #34, Waterdeep Way, Castle Ward
 Livery: grey woollen cloaks trimmed with fur (winter), skullcaps of grey wool with a fur fringe (summer)
 Entrance: 25 gp fee upon application to the Master, refunded if application refused
 Dues: 2 gp/month
 Contact: Shalrin Meraedos, Gentleman Keeper of the Order (0 level fighter), Meraedos Fine Furs, #112, The High Road, North Ward

This guild is rich, long-established, and tight-fisted. Its members, all of old families, attempt to control all trade in their field that enters Waterdeep by ruthlessly outbidding independents. Sabotage (such as mysterious warehouse fires or even highway banditry) is not unknown. The current Master, Thoss Bhalein, elected from the Guild ranks by the Order's members upon the death of his predecessor some twenty winters ago, has let no one join the Order since he took office, and shows no sign of changing his views, even encouraging wealthy members of the Order to buy out weaker fellow members, to tighten the Order's control. Thoss will be master for life (or unless he resigns his post, an almost unheard-of event dying, bedridden Masters have often clung to their titles for years after real power has passed from their hands), and is presently sixty-one winters of age, but in good health. This Order is one of the most lawful and conservative in the City, and looks upon adventurers (and young, entrepreneurial merchants in any field) as dangerous, reckless brigands who by their actions threaten not only the good name of merchants everywhere, but the very stability of society.

The "recognized" of the Guild's title refers to the proud assertion that no member of the Order deals in second-hand, doctored, or stolen wares, but is above reproach. This is largely true, but is a claim occasionally rendered a myth by certain Guild members.

35. THE SPLENDID ORDER OF ARMORERS, LOCKSMITHS, AND FINESMITHS

Master: Hallthor Duzmund (12th level fighter, Master Smith)
 Headquarters: The Metal House of Wonders, #279, Belnimbra's Street and Gut Alley, Dock Ward
 Livery: grey cloaks with a single blue star on the left shoulder
 Entrance: 35 gp
 Dues: 2 gp/month
 Contact: the Master

This guild represents the most skilled smiths (those able to craft weapons, shields, and armor superbly matched to the wielder and of lasting quality, the "finest quality" that mages enchanting weapons seek to find). Guild members can command the highest prices for their work, particularly for personalized weapons for adventurers and custom-designed locks and strong-doors for the vaults of merchants and nobles. Guild members also design and make ornaments of lasting beauty from wire and sculpted metal, such as the fantastic masks worn by many noble ladies of Waterdeep; metal birds that will flap their wings and trill if the hollow tails are blown through, as toys for the children of the rich, and elaborate party costumes of metal plates that can make the wearer appear as a monster, for party or stage wear. Each Guild member trains his or her apprentices for many years. Acquiring such skills is a full-time profession that does not allow adventurers to dabble and acquire skills thereby (the Guild Master's fighting level is a reflection of his intimate knowledge of the properties and handling of the weapons he makes).

Members of this Guild also fashion signet rings and stamps for the Guilds, noble families, and the Palace (the Palace seal, the arms of the Lords of Waterdeep, was made by this Guild).

36. THE STABLEMASTERS' & FARRIERS' GUILD

Master: Belihands Masker (0 level fighter, Senior Master)
 Headquarters: The Guild Paddock, #195, Walltower Walk, The Trades Ward
 Livery: deep blue hats with white plumes
 Entrance: 15 gp
 Dues: 3 sp/month
 Contact: the Master

This guild represents all who breed, train, capture and tame, house, and tend horses and other riding animals, including aerial steeds (but not aquatic creatures, lizards, or great cats), and sets standards for such care. The Guild also provides its members with veterinary aid, and cheap rates on feed by buying in bulk. The Guild maintains a registry of pedigrees and brands to discourage theft and aid the Watch in tracing animals it they are stolen. Prices for Guild members' mounts are as given in the AD&D® rules. Such businesses do take exhausted mounts for a lesser, "trade-in" value.

Guild member Jhalathan Ilzoond is considered the finest griffon-tamer in the City, but owns only one such steed himself, which is housed at Castle Waterdeep and hired by the Guard. The Guard is the largest owner of griffons in the City, it stables over twenty in the eyrie on Mount Waterdeep, and another six (plus Jhalathan's beloved "Firebeak") at the Castle. There are perhaps three dozen known aerial steeds regularly in the City in the private hands of City residents, including pegasi, hippogriffs, and wind steeds. Members of this Guild have trained almost all of these.

37. THE STATIONERS GUILD

Master: Azoulin Wolfwind (0 level fighter, Master Stationer)
 Headquarters: Stationers' Hall, #202, The High Road and Way of the Dragon, The Trades Ward
 Livery: white robes with a black quill pen on the breast
 Entrance: 15 gp
 Dues: 1 gp/month
 Contact: the Master

This guild consists of those artisans who make both parchment paper and the cheaper rough-finished variety known in Waterdeep as "scrip," ink, blotters, colored waxes for seals, gilt ink for use in illuminating documents, metal pen nibs, and the like, as well as importing many large feathers from the South for use as fine quill pens. All Guild members have their own secret recipes for preparing special paper, but the Guild does supply its members with fine parchment (made in Stationers' Hall) and the other products of their trade, at a discount.

38. THE SURVEYORS', MAP & CHART-MAKERS' GUILD
Master: Halaviir Touzoun (0 level fighter, First Chartist)
Headquarters: The Map House, #15, Waterdeep Way, Castle Ward

Livery: green robes with a crossed chalk and dividers on the breast, green hats with white plumes

Entrance: 20 gp (upon acceptance by the Master)

Dues: 1 sp/month

Contact: Doroun Lhaerzor (0 level fighter, Speaker for the Guild), The Map House

The term "architect" is unknown in Waterdeep. Members of this guild design buildings and draw the required blueprints for all new buildings in Waterdeep, and all renovations which change the height of a building or add to its outside extent. This Guild also does all the necessary surveying in the City, except for private building sites.

The Guild maintains, at Map House, a large and ever-growing collection of maps and nautical charts, which they will purchase from any who offer good specimens to them (at 1-5 gp each). The Guild sells copies of maps from this collection, typically at 25 gp each, delivery to any Waterdeep address in nine days included. "Rush" jobs (two days) cost double.

DMs should note that the First Chartist and the Speaker know the collection thoroughly, and also know charts and maps. They will pay more than the usual range for things they really need (for example, maps of cities in Thay, and good maps of far-off, legendary Kara-Tur), but will refuse maps they know to be fanciful, wrong, or merely "treasure maps" with no details of the physical vicinity. Nautical charts (and of course, maps of the land) of the elven realm of Evermeet are a real rarity, but the elves take care that it stays that way (elves need no charts themselves, and their navy takes care that no other ships get near).

39. THE VINTNERS', DISTILLERS', & BREWERS' GUILD
Master: Razaar Slissin (0 level fighter, Guild Master)

Headquarters: The House of Good Spirits, #214, The Rising Ride, Southern Ward

Livery: purple robes with an upright drinking jack in white silhouette on the breast

Entrance: 30 gp (upon acceptance by the Master)

Dues: 1 gp/month

Contact: the Master

This guild has only forty-odd members, but it produces a prodigious amount of drink for Waterdhavians and for export. Guild members annually turn out thousands upon thousands of barrels of wine, beer, liquor, and various liqueurs, including the distinctive "zzar," a Waterdhavian fortified wine that is fiery, orange, slightly almond-flavored, and equivalent to sherry. Players Handbook prices apply to such wares; zzar is 2 sp per jack, or 7 sp per bottle. This is a difficult Guild to join; years of apprenticeship to a member are necessary. The Master is careful not to increase the membership so much that the competition will hurt Guild members.

40. THE WAGONMAKERS' AND COACH BUILDERS' GUILD

Master: Sarjak Belszour (0 level fighter, Guild Master)

Headquarters: The Coach & Wagon Hall, #216, The High Road, Southern Ward

Livery: brown cloaks with four white wheels on each front shoulder

Entrance: 20 gp

Dues: 1 gp/month

Contact: the Master

This guild builds and repairs coaches, wagons, and other conveyances for overland trade and travel within the City (including, for extra fees, conveyances with an astonishing variety of secret hiding places for use in smuggling and outwitting bandits). The skill involved in making durable, beautiful conveyances is considerable, and years of apprenticeship are necessary, so PCs cannot soon join and make a success of themselves in this Guild. On the other hand, the conveyances produced by this Guild are elegant and sturdy, lasting through quite a bit of abuse. Prices vary widely with the different types and sizes of conveyances. Custom-made wagons take up to two weeks to build. Wagons assembled from "stock" parts on hand can be finished in two days.

41. THE WATCHFUL ORDER OF MAGISTS & PROTECTORS

Master: Mhair Szeltune (pronounced "mm-AIR Szz-EL-toon"; 17th level magic-user; Lady Master of the Order), Mhair's Tower, #171, Spindle Street, The Trades Ward
Headquarters: Tower of the Order, #30, The Street of Bells, Castle Ward

Livery: dark purple cloaks, with a white human hand, open, with fingers together and uppermost, on the left shoulder

Entrance: 35 gp (upon majority vote of the members)

Dues: 7 gp/month

Contact: Orlar Thammas (6th level magic-user, Speaker for the Order), Tower of the Order

This guild protects the less-powerful magic-users (and novices to the Art) of Waterdeep, and attempts to influence the powerful loners (non-Guildmembers) of magical power in the City (such as Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun and Malchor Harpell), to be prudent and conservative, wielding magic little in public, so that mages will be respected and looked up to, rather than feared and actively opposed. Guild activities have little effect on the City's more powerful magic-users, who are not Guild members and who do what they like anyway (although Khelben's quiet support has allowed the Order to establish itself and have some effect). They are effective in policing mages of low and mid-levels who visit the City, in matters of not throwing spells around to coerce or influence the populace, and to have respect for colleagues of lesser power as well as greater. The membership gains great practical benefits through the Order. Members can readily communicate with fellow members to arrange training and buy magical information with some assurance that they are not dealing with charlatans (the Order will expel and publicly vilify members who practice deceit on fellow members), can readily purchase all manner of rare material components (such components are not cheap, but the time necessary to personally procure them is saved) from the golem-guarded cellars of the Tower of the Order. (DMs should invent some really heavy-duty magical guardian creatures and traps for this place if PCs assault it, culminating in personal appearances by the Lady Master of the Order, reinforced by Khelben and perhaps one or more mages of high level; i.e., PCs should have to run for their lives!) Members short of cash can earn ready money by serving as fire guards, "spell guards", or in fighting fires.

A fire guard is hired for a building (usually only when it contains valuables, although DMs should note that some nobles consider themselves valuable, night and day, as long as their money holds out) for 5 gp/night. The Guild keeps 1 gp of the fee, and gives the guarding member 4 gp. Such duty consists of loading up with affect normal fires, cone of cold, conjure water elemental, and similar spells and standing watch, with a guardian pigeon. If the pigeon is released, it will fly back to the Tower of the Order, and fire fighting mages will come on the run, sometimes by aerial steed (the Lady Master has a pegasus, who will carry one other mage on the saddle with her, so long as she is mounted too).

Fire fighting mages, of whom the Order retains four to six a night, are paid by the Order directly, 9 gp each. If summoned by a fire guard, they cost the building owner nothing. If they arrive to fight an unguarded building, the City will pay the Order a flat 10 gp fee per building if the owner cannot be found, is deceased, or is unwilling to pay. Otherwise, owners are charged 10 gp per fire fighting mage.

A "spell guard" costs 10 gp per day (of which the Order gets 1 gp, and the guard 9 gp), and simply consists of accompanying a merchant, noble, or other paranoid individual through a day of living, negotiating, partying, or working, to detect and counter spells cast at him or her (obviously, detect magic and dispel magic are needed here).

The Order also sells scrolls of certain spells to its members, as follows:

Spell (each scroll contains only one spell of the type listed)	Cost in gp (not for sale to non-members)
Affect Normal Fires	300
Comprehend Languages	400
Detect Invisibility	600
Detect Magic	300
Dispel Magic	800
Erase	400
Fire Trap	1200
Identify	500
Infravision	900
Knock	600
Locate Object	700
Mending	300
Protection From Evil	300
Read Magic	200
Remove Curse	1000
Shield	400
Tongues	900
Water Breathing	900
Wizard Eye	1500
Wizard Lock	700
Write	500

A member of the Order may of course resell a scroll purchased from the Order to a non-member. This is rarely done (the Order will stop selling scrolls to a member who does it more than rarely), and usually for a 75% markup.

Member and non-member adventurers can make fairly good money by selling material components to the Order. They will not buy overpriced components, nor everyday or overstocked substances, however.

42. THE WHEELWRIGHTS' GUILD

Master: Zorind Tulwynd (0 level fighter, Master Wright)

Headquarters: Wheel Hall, #205, River Street, The Trades Ward

Livery: orange robes with a black, spoked wheel on the breast

Entrance: 5 gp

Dues: 1 gp/month

Contact: the Master

Members of this guild make coach, cart, and carriage wheels, of specific woods steamed and bent, and wrapped with iron bands. They can do this in a matter of some hours with ready materials. Making a replacement wheel for a carriage that matches design and appearance exactly might take a day and a half. Merely fitting the same vehicle with a "stock" wheel of the right size and roughly the right weight takes minutes if one is in stock, and about two hours if it must be made (although it should not be used right away, or it might throw its metal band off, and collapse—the band must cool completely to grip as tightly as it's supposed to).

Chapter 6: NOBLE FAMILIES OF WATERDEEP

From its earliest beginnings to its present sprawling wealth and influence, Waterdeep has had its successful merchant families, the mainstays of its early social and civil stability and later of its “high society” cultural tone. Some of these families have died out or been submerged by marriage, and others have arisen with each decade, until now there are seventy-six noble families of Waterdeep.

Two families, at least, have been declared outcast (exiled): the family Gildeggh (now apparently extinct), and the family Zoar. The reasons for their casting-out are given in Chapter 2. The arms of the Gildeggh family were a red rose clutched in a silver gauntlet, on a green field; those of the Zoar family consist of a realistic, severed umber hulk’s head impaled on a bloody spear, on a scarlet field. Today, members of the Zoar family are bitter enemies of Waterdeep’s rulers, and dwell in Luskan, Scornubel, and Amn.

Noble families are granted the right to bear arms—that is, real arms: small private armies, of no more than seventy fully-equipped men-at-arms, within the City, to guard the security of their goods, properties, and trade. Nobles are also granted the right to bear symbolic arms: heraldic coats-of-arms, to be used as recognition-badges by such armsmen. (Non-noble families, businesses, and individuals in the City are allowed no more than sixteen fully-armed bodyguards, by edict of the Lords.)

A hundredth of the annual wealth of each noble family goes directly, into the City coffers each Midsummer for the defense and maintenance of the City.

No “arms of grace” (heraldic arms recognized in the City) have been granted by the Lords of Waterdeep in more than twenty winters; this recognition of nobility involves the Herald of Waterdeep, Falconfree, and unanimous agreement of the Lords, and seldom occurs.

The DM is encouraged to give the nobles of Waterdeep individual style and character; most are decadent but not really evil or depraved, and are used to getting their own way in most daily doings. They make formidable enemies. The younger members of such families may well fit into the cavalier class, but it is strongly recommended that no PC be a noble (at least, at the start of play) in any campaign set in Waterdeep—and if one must have PC cavaliers, that they be from elsewhere in the Realms, not of these noble families (unless the relationship is distant). Most nobles spend their adult lives in an endless round of parties, intrigue, dabbling in this or that special interest, and partying again. Nasty, unpleasant adventures are things that (thankfully) happen to somebody else, and can be laughed over at a party, half a year later!

DMs are encouraged to invent fiendish guardians for any noble’s villa that PCs try to explore uninvited. Remember, money is no object to most of these nobles; they are rich enough that they need not engage in trade if they do not care to.

Space does not permit full genealogies and biographies of all of the nobles of Waterdeep. Given hereafter is a list of some details of each likely to be useful in casual play.

Included with each family entry is its heraldic coat-of-arms (borne by all men-at-arms and low-ranking servants of each noble family, and thus often seen in the streets of Waterdeep), and at the end of this chapter the heraldic arms of the City and of the Lords of Waterdeep are included. The heraldry of Waterdeep may seem crude and simplistic, but this is largely the result of practical considerations, such as the need to readily recognize a distinctive family device from afar, even in twilight, bad weather, torchlight, or in a fight; and of the personal tastes of the nobles and of the Heralds involved over the years. Close examination of the coats-of-arms will reveal many complex elements, although differencing (by labels) is rare, as only family members who have had a deep, long-lasting breach with their kin request differentiated arms for themselves—and most such individuals usually leave the City of Splendors for more hospitable habitations elsewhere in the Realms.

In the entries which follow, “prominent members” are those with wide influence and fame of infamy in the City (thus, the young Cassalanter who is secretly a Lord of Waterdeep, Caladorn, is not listed as prominent—as only the DM, and Caladorn’s fellow Lords, know of his importance), and “trade & interests” refers to activities engaged in all over the Realms, not just within the City walls. One note: many noble families gained great wealth through slave trade. Many years ago, they were given the choice of freeing all slaves and ceasing such trade, or becoming outcast. All renounced slave-trading and slavery (although some rumors to the contrary regularly make the rounds about former slaving families with connections in the far South).

Many noble families have been ennobled for six hundred years or more; however, there is no established order of precedence. At Court, nobles may speak whenever recognized by Piergeiron, or when silently pointed at by one of the masked Lords.

Most noble families have fifteen or so members of direct blood resident in Waterdeep. One or all of these may also own extensive holdings elsewhere in the Realms and other residences in the City. A noble household typically houses fifty or so servants, and mounts for all blood members and about half of the servants. Many noble families are also landlords of substantial holdings within the City. Ownership of buildings around one’s own villa is the best way to rid oneself of noisy or undesirable neighbors and the like.

Precise details of the wealth and current activities of these families have deliberately been excluded, so that each DM can involve such nobility in adventures as he or she sees fit, tailoring details to the adventure and to the political situation in the City in his or her individual campaign. For similar reasons, the classes and levels of most prominent family members have been left to the DM.

THE NOBLE FAMILIES

Family Name: ADARBRENT (Ah-DAR-brent)

Prominent Members: Royus Adarbrent
Trade & Interests: shipping, navigating, cartography and exploration Arms: field: gold star: red stalactites, cavern ceiling: purple

Family Name: AGUNDAR (Ah-GUN-dar)

Prominent Members: Torres Agundar
Trade & Interests: mercenary fighting, warrior-training, sword-forging
Arms: field: sky blue lightning bolt: white cloud: purple

Family Name: AMCATHRA (Am-CATH-ra)

Prominent Members: Challas Amcathra, Mourngrym Amcathra, youngest son, now Lord of Shadowdale (Dalelands, in the Inner Sea lands)
Trade & Interests: wine, sword-forging, horse-breeding and training Arms: field: red crescents: silver flame: blue

Family Name: AMMAKYL (AM-ah-kill)

Prominent Members: Luth Ammakyl
Trade & Interests: farming, wine-making
Arms: field: sky blue ground: rich green water: bands of blue and silver tree: black cloud: white

Family Name: ANTEOS (AN-tee-oh-sss)

Prominent Members: Dulbravvan Anteos
Trade & Interests: (formerly slaving), trading, moneychanging and barter
Arms: field: white spears: brown shafts, silver heads impaled head: brown hair and beard, pink flesh, red blood (lots)

Family Name: ARTEMEL (ARR-tem-el)

Prominent Members: Bresnoss Artemel
Trade & Interests: boar-hunting, moneylending
Arms: field: sky blue
eagle's wing: white upper feathers, black lower feathers

Family Name: ASSUMBAR (Asss-UM-bar)

Prominent Members: Laeros Assumbar
Trade & Interests: carpentry, designing exotic and splendid carriages Arms: field: pink goblet: silver helm: silver with gold crown-feathers and green plume-feather

Family Name: BELABRANTA (BELL-ah-bran-tah)

Prominent Members: Huld Belabranta (the "Dark Enchanter": NG 16th L magic-user)
Trade & Interests: griffon-breeding & taming, hunting
Arms: field white stream: light blue netting: purple

Family Name: BLADESEMMEER (BLAY-deh-sem-mer)

Prominent Members: Taeros Bladesemmer
Trade & Interests: fencing, sword-forging, designing exotic and unique body armor
Arms: field: orange blade: silver hand: pink flesh chevron: red
Upper field: light green

Family Name: BROKENGULF (BROH-kenn-gull-ff)

Prominent Members: Morus Brokengulf, Prendergast Brokengulf, nicknamed "Huntlord" (heir)
Trade & Interests: exploration, guiding, and the hunting and procuring of exotic beasts
Arms: field: sky blue mountain: grey cavern and trail: red

Family Name: BROSSFEATHER (BROSS-fether)

Prominent Members: Orbul Brossfeather
Trade & Interests: forestry, lumbering, and fur-trapping, guiding Arms: field: gold feathers: red axe: blade silver, handle brown

Family Name: CASSALANTER (CASS-ah-lanter)

Prominent Members: Ohrl Cassalanter
Trade & Interests: banking, moneylending, information-gathering, rumor-mongering (spreading rumors, for fees)
Arms: field: white yoke: green
bird: white with gold beak, black feathers

Family Name: CRAGSMERE (CragS-MEER)

Prominent Members: Japhyl Cragsmere, "the Hawk" Trade & Interests: moneylending, land-owning Arms field: purple
stars: silver crag: gold front, silver back slopes water: silver ground: black lower tip of shield: gold (rising sun)

Family Name: CROMMOR (CROM-mor)

Prominent Members: Duth Crommor
Trade & Interests: brasswork (e.g., the trumpets on the family arms)
Arms: field: white bands: red trumpets: gold, with orange mouth-openings

Family Name: DEZLENTYR (Des-LENN-teer)

Prominent Members: Arlos Dezlentyr
Trade & Interests: exploration, settlement of islands, establishment of harbors, caravan trading and shipping Arms: field (lower half) red, (upper half) white stripes: white anchor: silver border: royal blue water: light blue island with tree: rich green

Family Name: DURINBOLD (DUR-in-bold)

Prominent Members: Buldos Durinbold
Trade & Interests: mercenary fighting, cattle-rearing, sheep-farming
Arms: field: white battlements: grey men in armor: silver arrows: black standard: red (banner), gold (ball on top), black (shaft)

Family Name: EAGLESHIELD (EE-gull-shield)

Prominent Members: Nuthos Eagleshield
Trade & Interests: mercenary fighting, animal husbandry, tack-making Arms: field: sky blue water: purple
sun: gold bands of cloud: black eagle: red

Family Name: EIRONTALAR (EYE-ron-TAI-ar)

Prominent Members: Marlus Eirontalar
Trade & Interests: hunting, tracking, and guiding Arms: field: light green dragon (claw, tail, jaws): grey flames (dragon's breath): red

Family Name: ELTORCHUL (El-TORR-chull)

Prominent Members: Thesp Eltorchul
Trade & Interests: mage-schooling, magical research and the procuring of rare substances and items
Arms: field: white wands: gold hat: black

Family Name: EMVEOLSTONE (Em-VEE-ohl-stone)

Prominent Members: Lylar Emveolstone
Trade & Interests: ironmongery, curio trading
Arms field: white small shield: black
sun: gold

Family Name: ESTELMER (ESS-tel-mer)
 Prominent Members: Guldos Estelmer
 Trade & Interests: heraldry, sage-lore, printing
 Arms: field: white daggers: black (handles), silver (blades)
 gauntlet: green shelf: brown with black scrollwork skulls: white half-shield: gold hook: white quill pen: turquoise

Family Name: GAUNTYL (Gone-til)
 Prominent Members: Eleemos Gauntyl
 Trade & Interests: mercenary fighting, exploring, mining
 Arms: field: orange gauntlet: silver spikes of gauntlet crimson slashes (three): crimson

Family Name: GOST (Gaaw-ss-t)
 Prominent Members: Djarrus Gost, Bhaedulph Gost (crippled father)
 Trade & Interests: caravan-mastering, trading, armor-forging Arms: field: yellow
 snake deep green (body), white with red pupil (eye)

Family Name: GRALHUND (GRAUL-hund)
 Prominent Members: "Hund" Irg Gralhund
 Trade & Interests: mercenary fighting, weapon-making
 Arms: field: gold
 devil's face: orange (eyes), tawny (unshaded aide), scarlet (shaded side)

Family Name: GUNDWYND (GUN-dd-wind)
 Prominent Members: Maurgosz Gundwynd
 Trade & Interests: the capture, training, and breeding of hippogriffs (and other aerial creatures, as steeds)
 Arms: field: white spiral winds: red (outer), orange (inner)
 sun: gold

Family Name: HAWKWINTER (HAWK-winter)
 Prominent Members: Eremoes Hawkwinter
 Trade & Interests: soldiering garrisons and guardianship
 Arms: field: royal blue star: silver arms & banners: black

Family Name: HELMFAST (HELM-fasst)
 Prominent Members: "The Old Captain" Kelvar Helmfast
 Trade & Interests: shipping, shipwrights
 Arms: field: purple
 moon: white waves: bands of black and purple foam: white hull: crimson sail: orange

Family Name: HIILGAUNTLET (HEEL-gawn-tlet)
 Prominent Members: Jhassin Hiil-gauntlet
 Trade & Interests: mercenary fighting, military outfitting
 Arms: field orange flames: scarlet chain: silver

Family Name: HOTHEMER (HOTH-em-er)
 Prominent Members: Malas Hothemer
 Trade & Interests: trading, owning fleets of caravan wagons
 Arms: field: green
 dragon: white (body), red (teeth and tongue), gold (eye)

Family Name: HUNABAR (HOON-ah-bar)
 Prominent Members: Haskar Hunabar
 Trade & Interests: textiles-trading, importing fashions
 Arms: field: orange star: white
 reins: bronze

Family Name: HUSTEEM (Huss-TEEM)
 Prominent Members: Orbos Husteem
 Trade & Interests, mercenary fighting, land-owning Arms: field: tawny scimitar: white (blade), crimson (tip), gold (hilt) blood drops: crimson gauntlet: grey

Family Name: ILITUL (ILL-ih-tull)
 Prominent Members: Murgos Ilitul
 Trade & Interests: goat-raising and herding, mercenary fighting
 Arms: field: orange spears: red

Family Name: ILVASTARR (ILL-vah-starr)
 Prominent Members: Ulguth Ihvastar
 Trade & Interests: beast-taming and breeding, and the cooking of exotic meats
 Arms: field: gold
 minidragon: metallic green (body), orange (eye)

Family Name: ILZIMMER (ILL-zim-mer)
 Prominent Members: Boroldan Ilzimmer
 Trade & Interests: horse-breeding and racing, making and collecting maps, designing gowns and jewelry Arms: field: silver
 tears: crimson

Family Name: IRLINGSTAR (URR-ling-star)
 Prominent Members: Hulraven Irlingstar
 Trade & Interests: caravan-running, shipbuilding Arms: field: silver sash: red star: white

Family Name: JARDETH (JAR-deth)
 Prominent Members: Ulb Jardeth
 Trade & Interests: soldiering; garrisons and guardianship
 Arms: field: gold tower: purple bird: black tower window, road and jagged opening in tower base: gold

Family Name: JHANS CZIL (JANN-sss-zil)
 Prominent Members: Harkas Jhansczil
 Trade & Interests: trading, horse-breeding, mercenary fighting
 Arms: field green
 weapons: silver (blades, hilts, and pommels), black (grips)

Family Name: KORMALIS (KORE-mal-liss)
 Prominent Members: Helm Kormallis
 The Torturer
 Trade & Interests: (formerly slaving), recruiting, mercenary training, outfitting for travelers Arms: field: yellow boot: brown
 flower: blue (blossom), green (leaves and stem)

Family Name: KOTHONT (KOTH-ont)
 Prominent Members: Alauos Kothont
 "Lord Goldbeard"
 Trade & Interests: herd farming, fur-trapping
 Arms: field: sky blue spear: brown (shaft), silver (head) banner: green
 star: silver

Family Name: LANNGOLYN (LANN-go-linn)
 Prominent Members: Tresh Lanngolyn, Ormaes Lanngolyn "Seamaster"
 Trade & Interests: textiles, shipping
 Arms: field: purple shell: pink sea-worm: green

Family Name: LATHKULE (LATH-kool)
 Prominent Members: Nimor Lathkule
 Trade & Interests: jewelry, gem mining and prospecting, gemcutting Arms: field: white
 arm: pink flesh
 gem: glistening green

Family Name: MAERKLOS (MAY-er-close)
 Prominent Members: Aldara Maerklos
 Trade & Interests: seer (predictions), swine-herding, beer-brewing Arms: field: deep green (lower), pink (upper) eyes: white, (lashes) black mouth: red border between fields, and lines in lower field: thin black

Family Name: MAERNOS (MAY-er-no-zz)

Prominent Members: Ultas Maernos (Raiser-of-Priests)

Trade & Interests: moneylending, banking, financial administration of temples (hence, Ultas's nickname)

Arms: field: royal blue spearpoints: silver folded hands: pink flesh sleeves: green

Family Name: MAJARRA (Mah-JAR-ra)

Prominent Members: Kelthul Majarra

Trade & Interests: harping, instrument making, and harp-training, silver mining (Mirabar)

Arms: field: deep green bars: white
harp: brown (body), white (area of strings), silver (strings)
curtain: orange (fabric, in top corner), crimson (border)

Family Name: MANTHAR (MAN-thar)

Prominent Members: Ithuil Manthar

Trade & Interests: mercenary fighting, trading in metals & perfumes

Arms: field: royal blue band: silver
swordtip: silver (blade), red (bloodied tip)

Family Name: MARGASTER (MAR-gast-er)

Prominent Members: "Lord of Lords" Thentias Margaster

Trade & Interests: trading, shipping

Arms: field: gold claw: white talons: scarlet feathers: brown

Family Name: MASSALAN (MASS-ah-lann)

Prominent Members: Iliaru Massalan

Trade & Interests: Jewelry

Arms: field: red border: gold stars: white

Family Name: MELSHIMBER (Mel-SHIMM-bur)

Prominent Members: Hlanta Melshimber (said to know many insidious poisons)

Trade & Interests: sage-lore (history & genealogy), research and information-gathering, fine wines

Arms: field: silver border (representing edge of helm): royal blue eye: white with green pupil

Family Name: MOONSTAR (MOON-starr)

Prominent Members: Helve Moonstar

Trade & Interests: guiding, cartography, exploration and caravan-mastering

Arms: field: royal blue moon and stars: silver

Family Name: NANDAR (Nan-DAR)

Prominent Members: Baelrun Nandar

Trade & Interests: house-building, bridgebuilding

Arms: field: sky blue bridge: grey star: silver
spear: black (shaft), silver (head), royal blue (banner)

Family Name: NESHER (Neh-SHURR)

Prominent Members: Laskar Neshar

Trade & Interests: hawking, lumbering, wood-making

Arms: field: green
hawk-bell: white

Family Name: PHULL (Ff-ULL)

Prominent Members: "the Fisherlord" Ulmassus Phull

Trade & Interests: fishing

Arms: field: green
fish: silver (body), yellow (eye)

Family Name: PHYLUND (ff-EYE-lund)

Prominent Members: Urto Phylund

Trade & Interests: the training, procuring, and breeding of fearsome "monsters" (will buy from adventurers)

Arms: field: orange horn: yellow-green eyes: glittering green mouth: red (maw), white (fangs)

Family Name: PIIRADOST (PEER-ah-dohst)

Prominent Members: Humbraz Piiradost

Trade & Interests: horse-breeding, cattle raising

Arms: field: red portcullis: grey chain & collar: grey skull: white and black

Family Name: RAVENTREE (RAY-venn-tree)

Prominent Members: Nandos Raventree

Trade & Interests: rare-foods purveying, shipbuilding

Arms: field: orange water: green
tree: black raven: black (body), red (eye) sails: white hull: brown

Family Name: ROARINGHORN (ROAR-ingg-horn)

Prominent Members: Vastarr Roaringhorn, Kuldos Roaringhorn (brothers, co-heads of the family and known collectively as "the Lords Roaringhorn"). The family is a lusty, fun-loving, singing, brawling clan, who love parties and pomp.

Trade & Interests: mercenary-fighting, horse-raising

Arms: field: green
horn: gold (body), white (blast of sound)
star: white

Family Name: ROSZMAR (ROZZ-nar)

Prominent Members: Estrip Rosznar, "the Young Masked Lady" (due to her fondness for masked dance costumes, and her facial resemblance to the famous Lhestyn "the Masked Lady").

Estrip (pronounced ESS-treep) is head of her House.

Trade & Interests: land-owning, wine-making

Arms: field: royal blue
falcon: white

Family Name: RULDEGOST (RULL-dee-goss-t)

Prominent Members: Dethnar Ruldegost, a quiet, "respectable" family (whose interests belie this act).

Trade & Interests: banking, mercenary fighting, bounty-hunting, caravan-mastering

Arms: field: sky blue flames: scarlet
armor: silver (face: black, no features shown) blood: crimson (three rivulets, from open helm)

Family Name: SILMERHELVE (SILL-murr-hellve)

Prominent Members: Laerlos Silmerhelve

Trade & Interests: guardianship warrior-training, pandering

Arms: field: green
borders: silver torso: pink flesh
lance: brown
helm, sword, and shield (note borders on shield): gold

Family Name: SNOOME (Ss-NO-mm)

Prominent Members: Arrabas Snome

Trade & Interests: beer and liqueur importing Arms: field: scarlet goblet: gold spilling wine: purple

Family Name: STORMWEATHER (STORM-weather)

Prominent Members: Mintos Stormweather

Trade & Interests: shipping, naval exploration

Arms: field: sky blue waves: green
foam at top of wave: white
moon: white

Family Name: SULTLUE (SUL-tloo)

Prominent Members: Asbrior Sultlue "the Serpent" (this family holds grudges and wild hatreds; some members may not be quite sane)

Trade & Interests: mercenary fighting, horse-breeding and trading

Arms: field: royal blue serpent: light green (body), yellow (eyes, fangs), red (mouth)

Family Name: TALMOST (TALL-moss-tt)

Prominent Members: Hyara Talmost
"the Matriarch"

Trade & Interests: textiles, fashion clothing, furs

Arms: field: sky blue

castle: grey torch: gold flame: orange

Family Name: TARM (TAR-mnn)

Prominent Members: Thentivil Tarm

Trade & Interests: caravan-mastering, horse-breeding and training

Arms: field: red

band: white
bugle, candle-lamp, and whip: gold (including thong, flame)

Family Name: TCHAZZAM (TAH-chah-zzam)

Prominent Members: Ulboth Tchazzam
Trade & Interests: archery, hunting, bowyers & fletchers

Arms: field: royal blue

moon: white
fanciful arrow: silver (including speed-streaks)

Family Name: TESPHER (TESS-purr)

Prominent Members: Armult Tesper
Trade & Interests: guardianship, skill-at-arms

Arms: field: royal blue

bands (two): red will-o'-wisps (two): white

Family Name: THANN (Thh-ANN)

Prominent Members: Rhammas Thann
(a rich, careful, quiet clan)

Trade & Interests: (formerly slaving) land-owning, merchant shipping

Arms: field: green

horse: white (body), brown (eye)
crow: black (body), yellow (eye)

Family Name: THONGOLIR (THONG-oh-leer)

Prominent Members: Bilaerus Thongolir
Trade & Interests: calligraphy, limning, printing

Arms' field: royal blue
scrolled border: silver

Family Name: THORP (THOR-pp)

Prominent Members: Bulmere Thorp
Trade & Interests: caravan-mastering, mercenary fighting

Arms: field: gold
mace: grey

Family Name: THUNDERSTAFF (THUN-der-staff)

Prominent Members: Baerom Thunderstaff

Trade & Interests: magecraft, mercenary fighting, caravan-mastering

Arms: field: red weapons: silver tall blades, black (all shafts)

Family Name: ULBRINTER (UL-BRIN-turr)

Prominent Members: Nomus Ulbrinter
Trade & Interests: shipping, shipwrights

Arms: field: white
waves: green
hull: brown
sail: light blue (with red heart blazon) masthead banner: red ships' lines, catwalks, shrouds, mast: black

Family Name: URMBRUSK (URM-brusk)

Prominent Members: Halam Urnbrusk
Trade & Interests: land-owning, money-lending

Arms: field: green
sword: blue (blade), gold (hilt,ommel), black (grip) blood: crimson monster: brown (body), white (fangs), purple (mouth)

Family Name: WANDS (WAA-nds)

Prominent Members: Maskar Wands
(powerful mage), Olanhar Wands
(Maskar's daughter and successor)

Trade & Interests: mage-schooling, magical research and adventuring, dweomercrafter-for-hire

Arms: field: purple manche (sleeve): black stars: gold

Family Name: WAVESILVER (WAVE-silver)

Prominent Members: Bleskos Wave-silver

Trade & Interests: merchant shipping

Arms: field: red (sky)
waves: royal blue spray: silver (one curl at bottom, curl and drop at top)

Family Name: ZULPAIR (ZUL-pair)

Prominent Members: Olomar Zulpair
Trade & Interests: merchant shipping

Arms: field: purple

proW: gold star: silver spray: white waves: navy blue

Family Name: ZUN (Zz-UNN)

Prominent Members: Lungar Zun
Trade & Interests: cattle-farming, mercenary fighting

Arms: field: brown
sting & claw: metallic green (both have silver sparkles)

Here follow the Arms of the City of Waterdeep:

field: royal blue (sky)
border: silver crescent moons (one a distorted reflection): silver water: navy blue horizon: purple
nine stars: silver

Here follow the Arms of the Lords of Waterdeep:

field: white
border: silver torch: metallic blue flame: silver

Chapter 7: SELECTED NON-PLAYER CHARACTERS OF WATERDEEP

The characters listed below are for the DM to use in encounters with PCs in Waterdeep, not as Player Characters. This is by no means a complete list of important personages of the City, but merely some beings useful as tutors, sources of information, potential adversaries, and “local color” for PCs exploring Waterdeep. NPCs dealt with elsewhere in this book have not been repeated here.

In the entries that follow, the pronunciation of each character’s name is noted, and the ward(s) of the City each is most often found in is given. Ability scores of 16 or greater are included; others may be determined as a DM sees fit.

Aluar Zendos (AL-OO-ar ZEN-dosz)

The Trades Ward
4th level ranger
CG Mielikki
Human male, ST 17, CON 17

Aluar is a quiet, unassuming man of muscular build, who possesses a hawklike face and a hatred for evil creatures. He can be encountered often in the inns and taverns of Waterdeep, where he will offer himself as a guide (for 1 sp/day) or caravan-guard for any traveling in the North. Aluar will go as far east as Westgate, as far north as the mountains allow, and as far south as the cities of Amn. He enjoys a good fight, although he will not stay with adventurers who wantonly slay wildlife that does not menace them or that they do not intend to eat, or who fell trees or burn brush without reason. He will readily tutor other rangers (he wants very much to gain a magical blade he can wield in battle). Aluar is a restless man who does not know what to do in life, but he knows somehow that Waterdeep, a city to which he returns continually, is very important, and that his eventual destiny will involve it.

Bamaal Dunster (Bam—ALL DUN-sturr)

All wards
3rd level cleric of Lathander
NG Lathander
Human male, WIS 17

Bamaal is a short, fat, jolly man of middle years, given to impish humor and a love of good times and convivial fellowship. He is often to be found in taverns and at parties, and has a prodigious tolerance for drink, so that although he may grow rather owlsh by the end of a wild evening, he is still upright and observant. Bamaal exasperates the clergy of Waterdeep’s temple to Lathander because of his undignified (and unrepentantly so!) nature, but he is a devout follower of Lathander in his own way, forever helping to tend some stranger’s flowers or handing young lovers the keys to his current inn room for a night, and forever starting and helping others to start plans, fellowships, and businesses. He gains the necessary monies to live as he does by healing and aiding others with his divinely-given magic for fees, quite unashamedly, and Lathander seems to approve, as Bamaal’s prayers are continually answered with spells. Bamaal will not leave the City to go on any sort of adventure, but he will quite happily rise from his bed in the dead of night to cure the wounds of a fallen adventurer if awakened by one of the unfortunate’s anxious companions.

Blazidon One-Eye (BLAZZ-ih-don)

Virgins’ Square (day), Bowels of the Earth (night): The Trades Ward, Dock Ward
4th level fighter
CN Tempus
Human male, ST 16

By night, Blazidon makes the rounds of Waterdeep’s inns and taverns, befriending penniless newcomers to the City who might be willing to hire themselves out as fighting men or guards. By day, this grizzled old fighter, now retired, but still armed to the teeth and no pushover, can be found in Virgins’ Square. Most caravan-masters know where to find him. For a copper piece per man hired, Blazidon will contact a hiresword for a client, and bring the two together to talk business in a little room off the taproom of The Bowels of the Earth tavern (#198, Snail Street and Simples Street, The Trades Ward). Unbeknownst to most of Waterdeep, he owns the palace, and usually sleeps in its dust-filled attic. Blazidon knows Waterdeep’s inns and taverns, and the entire City south of the Bazaar, well.

Brace Ulmemur (BRAY-sss Ull-MEM-urr)

Taverns and near City Gates, all wards
4th level fighter
CN Tymora
Human male, ST 17

Brace is a beefy, hard-faced man who in the past was a member of two short-lived adventuring bands: the Men of the Knife and The Company of the Black Hand. Both companies were decimated by monsters while exploring ruins in the North. Brace is reluctant to mount further adventures by himself, and won’t even discuss details of his past career (such as just where the ruins were). He is quite willing to hire on with bands of adventurers as an extra sword (he fights with broad sword, battleaxe, and dagger), for 1 sp per day, plus meals, and a 5 gp bonus if substantial treasure is found. Brace is not greedy and will not try to keep treasure for himself, and is quite dependable to any party that does not callously leave him to death (those sorts of people he will follow, if he can, and rob or slay, one by one, calmly and patiently). He owns two magical items: a (standard) ring of regeneration, which he conceals with a bandage that covers three fingers and the back of a “broken” hand, and a ring of ESP (allows the wearer to eavesdrop on the surface thoughts of one creature, as the second-level magic-user spell, for two rounds in every 1-turn period, either a single 2-round probe, or two 1-round probes). Brace will try to avoid people casting detect magic on him, and if they do so, will try to trick such examiners by clasp his hands together while such detection is operating, and by otherwise never using his bandaged hand, into believing he wears only one magic ring, not two. If Brace is given or gains lots of treasure suddenly, he will offer much of it to the service of Tymora.

Coril (KOR-ill)

All wards
2nd level magic-user
CG Mystra
Human “male” (see below), IN 18, DEX 18

This (apparently) handsome young man always wears black robes, and carries a thick book under one arm. The tome consists of reams of loose scrap paper clamped together with clasps between two covers, upon which Coril scribbles (execrable: DMs are encouraged to freely invent samples) verse from time to time. Coril may be encountered in any of Waterdeep’s inns and taverns, where he likes to sit in a corner and just watch people. Coril is willing to cast spells for fees, trade spells for magical items or (useful) spells he does not have, and tutor magic users for fees, too.

Coril knows the following cantrips and spells.

Cantrips: clean, color, dampen, freshen, stitch, tie, warm/tangle, untie/distract, hide, present/giggle, wink, yawn/bluelight, fire-finger, smokepuff, unlock/footfall, groan, whistle

Spells: armor, comprehend languages, dancing lights, detect magic, hold portal, magic missile, mending, read magic, shield, shocking grasp, unseen servant, write

Coril is actually female, and an agent of the Harpers, about whom she (deliberately) knows nothing useful. Once a month she meets the bard Shalar Simgulphin (q.v.) in a tavern somewhere in Waterdeep. She tells him details of people she's seen. He tells her things to look for in the month ahead for him, and he hands her 50 gp for living expenses in the month to come. Coril has no magical items, keeps her spell books hidden in a cavity behind a loose stone in a minaret on the roof of Mariners' Hall (her Dexterity and climbing proficiency allow her to reach it easily in night's darkness). She is the illegitimate daughter of the cavalier Sarraver of Baldur's Gate, who does not know her current whereabouts.

Dagasumn (DAG-ah-summ)

? (Contact: #24 on City map)
3rd level magic-user
LN Mystra
Human male, IN 17

An adventuring mage who may be contacted through the staff of The Elfstone Tavern (The Street of the Sword, Castle Ward), Dagasumn was born in Port Llast and was briefly apprenticed to Malchor Harpell (q.v.) at the latter's Tower of Twilight near Neverwinter. Dagasumn soon came to Waterdeep to make his fortune, casting spells and tutoring lesser magic users for fees. He is always dispassionately considering and attempting ways of gaining magical knowledge and power (i.e., magical items) and gold with a minimum of risk. He hires bodyguards for meetings with numerous potential clients, and never goes adventuring when he can stay safely in the City and cast spells in the comparative safety of The City of the Dead (where careful timing between Guard patrols, and careful choice of location, will ensure the fewest possible witnesses) for adventurers who come to him with gold (notably identify, detect evil, locate object, and strength). Dagasumn will keep strictly to the letter of any agreement he makes with anyone, but is loyal only to himself.

Duromil "the Fearless" (Durr-OH-mil)

all wards (inns and taverns)
6th level thief
CN Mask
Human male, ST 16, DEX 18

This quiet, close-mouthed thief of Waterdeep specializes in robbing visitors to the City of small items of value (gems, magical items, spell books, and the like). He frequents the inns and taverns of the City posing as a fighter, even hiring on through Blazidon (q.v.) from time to time when money is low. Duromil wears leather armor (he will claim to be too poor to afford better), and carries a broad sword, long sword, and dagger. He is not at all adverse to accompanying a party as a hiresword and then stealing from them when the opportunity arises, although he will always try to conceal the fact that he is a thief, and even that he is disloyal to the party. Backstabbing and picking pockets in the dark when the party is confused or split up, and then "appearing" on the scene as a loyal (and upset) party member is a favorite trick. Duromil is wise enough to know when this will not work, and not to attempt it in such cases. He has done this many times, and Waterdhavians and surviving adventurers he accompanied alike do not suspect that he is a thief, or was disloyal (in other words, he's a very smooth operator). Duromil is not cruel or overly reckless, and he is always alert for trouble.

Elaith Craulnobur, "the Serpent" (Ee-LAITH Crawl-NO-burr)

all wards (taverns, nightclubs, festsalls)
6th level fighter/7th level magic user
NE Erevan Ilesere
Elven male, ST 17, IN 16, DEX 17, CHA 17

This charismatic, handsome, and glib-tongued rogue is a ruthless adventurer of Moon Elven stock; tall, slim, and silver-haired, with amber eyes and a melodious voice. He often appears gently amused at his surroundings, but he is as dangerous as the type of monster he is nicknamed for. Elaith is the last survivor of the famed Company of the Claw, and the last living member of the Three Blades of tavern fame. He earned his nickname for his gliding strike in battle, and his cruel sense of humor. Some in Waterdeep believe (rightly) that he betrayed or slew some of his adventuring comrades. All say that he has vast sums of money hidden away, while ever he seeks more. Elaith often organizes new adventuring companies in Waterdeep's taverns, to explore this or that dungeon or ruin of the North, although experienced mercenaries say cynically that the Serpent is just looking for fodder: cheap muscles to die in traps and battles while he grows rich. In truth, Elaith owns much property in Waterdeep, and in a hidden cellar has a strongbox, guarded by a gargoyle or similar fearsome clawed, flying monster, with several magical wands in it, and coffers of gems worth over 90,000 gp. The only magic the Serpent carries is a potion of extra healing and a ring of the ram. He fights with a sabre, daggers (which he is adept at throwing: he has one in each boot and one at his belt), and a handaxe. He is also adept in the use of a spear and darts. Elaith is known to use a Rary's mnemonic enhancer to carry more lightning bolts or fireballs than he ordinarily would be able to. He is always expecting and prepared for treachery and trouble.

Infamous among elves in the North (where he is hated and feared, although some secretly envy his successes and confident independence, when the elven People in general are in decline in Faerûn), Elaith takes full advantage of the fact that most visitors to the City do not expect an elf to be evil.

Filiare (Fill-ee-AIR)

#168 (almost always)
3rd level fighter
LN Tempus
Human male

The owner and bartender of The Inn of the Dripping Dagger (The High Road, The Trades Ward), Filiare is a jovial, middle-aged former mercenary who is the major alternative to Blazidon (q.v.) as a job-finder for "hireswords" (mercenary fighting men). His inn is the favored home and watering-place for such warriors, and many employers seeking a few blades in a hurry come here and see who's "at home at the Dagger" to hire. The Company of Crazy Adventurers lived here until they built their own keep (now demolished), and it was always their favorite place to drink. Filiare is a good, considerate host, and has lots of spare weapons and gear on hand (given to him by fighting men down on their luck, who had no spare coin to pay their bills, or who never came back from an expedition to find more coins to call their own) to sell to adventurers in need. DMs should note that Filiare may shave a copper piece or two off the standard—i.e. Players Handbook—prices for such items, if adventurers seem to be in dire straits.

Flambos Axemaster (FLAM-boe-ss)

all wards (inns and taverns)
3rd level ranger
NG Mielikki
Human male, ST 17, W 16

Flambos is a ranger based in Waterdeep (where he may be found in almost any inn or tavern, splendid or squalid), who rides the High Moor armed with long sword, longbow, and the battleaxe for which he is named, battling evil creatures who live there until he must return to the City for healing and rest. He will readily accompany adventurers of good alignment who need a guide or sword-arm, charging 1 sp/day (and an equal share of any treasure gained). Any large amounts of treasure he may win while adventuring will be given to the shrine of Mielikki in Waterdeep, for the Lady's Work. Smaller amounts pay for necessary healing and daily expenses. Flambos lives simply.

Gaundos (Gh-ONN-doe-ss)

? (contact: #213)
5th level illusionist
CN Leira
Human male, IN 17, DEX 17

This mysterious illusionist of Waterdeep takes care that none know his true abode or face, employing change self constantly, and making paranoid roundabout trips everywhere, constantly doubling back and changing his appearance again. He can be contacted at The Swords' Rest tavern (The High Road, Southern Ward) by leaving word with the bartender, Elgorel, whom he speaks to at some time during every evening. Gaundos is constantly in need of money to purchase tomes and material components to further his art (illusionists—or at least, illusionists willing to make themselves known to Gaundos—seem to be few and far between in Waterdeep). He will agree to cast spells, or tutor lesser illusionists, for a fee. He will never willingly go on adventures, and for self-protection carries a necklace of missiles (4 2d missiles, 2 of 4 dice, 2 of 6 dice, and one of 8 dice), which he will use if attacked or cornered by anyone.

Helve Urtrace (HEL-ve UR-tray-ss)

Castle Waterdeep or trouble scenes (see below)
5th level fighter
LG Tyr
Human male, ST 16, DEX 16

Helve is a close-mouthed, always-calm fighting man, who is Senior Armsmaster of the Waterdeep Watch, responsible for purchasing, maintaining, and keeping an account of, all weapons used by officers of the Watch. If one goes missing, it is he who will investigate. He is said in tavern-talk to put secret marks on all the Watch weapons, invisible to all but himself, but this is a myth. Helve also drills Watch officers in the use of their arms, and is said to know every trick of tavern- and street-fighting and to have an uncanny ability to anticipate what an opponent is about to do and be ready for it. This seems to be true. If a large brawl or magical fight erupts and a Watch patrol calls for reinforcements, and the reinforcements in turn have to blow their horns for additional reinforcements, Helve will almost certainly (90%) arrive. He carries a rod of smiting when on duty, and when answering a summons to trouble, he is often accompanied by his daughter, Lassree, a 2nd level magic-user who has been given a ring of spell turning and a wand of paralyzation by the Lords to help her (and the Watch) in such situations, and 11-22 (10 + 1d12) additional officers of the Watch.

Hest Sciprar (HES-ssst SIP-rar)

#168, or on streets
4th level fighter
NG Tymora
Human male, ST 17, IN 17, CON 16

Hest is a fun-loving, adventurous mercenary who loves dashing deeds and gallantry, and is most willing to undertake adventures for a fee—2 sp/day—or rescue missions for half that. He rooms at The Inn of the Dripping Dagger, where he can be readily contacted, in person or via Filiare (q.v.). Hest Sciprar expects an equal share of any considerable treasure won—coins, not magic, to give to Tymora's temple, to Filiare for rent, and to buy a few rounds for the boys at the Dripping Dagger. Hest dreams of someday rescuing and marrying a beautiful lady and becoming a noble lord. DM's note: add +3 to all of Hest's saving throws. He seems truly favored of Tymora.

Hlam (Hh-LAM)

Mt. Waterdeep (see below)
7th level monk
LG Tyr
Human male, ST 17, W 16, DEX 17

Hlam has twice tried and failed to become the White Master of Dragons. He was defeated by Iltmul at the Citadel of the Mists, and later by Iltmul's successor, Dumat Erard of the Company of Crazy Adventurers. Hlam considers these defeats signs from Tyr that he was not ready to advance in Tyr's service, so he patiently meditates and trains, alone in a small cave partway up the eastern face of Mount Waterdeep. The Guard and Watch know of his presence but do not disturb him. Indeed, they have instructions from Piergeiron to leave food at the cave-mouth regularly. Hlam considers it part of his service to Tyr to train monks of lesser accomplishments, but considers adventuring with companions (rather than alone) to be frivolous self-indulgence. He will expect such trainees to make offerings to Tyr, at the shrine in Neverwinter or elsewhere.

Ilph (real name: Myturkh Longpipe)

All wards (see below)
7th level thief-acrobat
CN Brandobaris
Halfling male, ST 15, DEX 17

Ilph says little, keeps to dark Dock Ward taverns or sewers by day, and roams the roofs of the City by night, looking for open windows and unattended belongings in walled courtyards and gardens. The Watch has never caught him, although they have often seen him running nimbly along the top of a villa wall, far above them, shrouded in hood and silence. Ilph is not willing to train others, and if encountered in a tavern by day will profess to be a simple farming lad from Corm Orp, come to see the sights of the big City, and not a thief at all. If approached on the rooftops by night, he will attack instantly, and then flee. He is not adverse to stealing from adventurers. He has a perfect hiding place for his booty, inside a hollowed-out block of stone on the roof of the Palace itself.

The ornate, many-spired roof of the Palace is lightly guarded because it is considered too difficult to reach and climb about on. The various roof hatches are heavily guarded within, but if one can climb unobserved—Ilph always comes by night, from the Mount Waterdeep side—one is likely to be unchallenged. Ilph never tries to get into the Palace, and so never runs afoul of the Guard. PCs trying to follow Ilph or enter the Palace by this route will no doubt discover the scenic delights that the Palace offers the discerning visitor: steep, greased roof slates, spike-studded ledges, wire snares, treacherously-crumbling stone trim, and tripwire-activated alarms and automatic crossbows.

Janszobur (JAN-so-burr)

Streets (see below)
4th level barbarian
NG "The Fist" (Tempus)
Human male, ST 17, DEX 16, CON 18 (IN 5, WIS 4)

Janszobur is a native of the Snow Cat Nomads, who inhabit the mountains of the Utter North, battling remorhaz and intruding orcs with savage ferocity. They are few and physically strong, and worship an incarnation of Tempus, whom they call "the Fist."

Once in his life, each man of the Snow Cats must undertake a quest, a service for the Fist, some great deed for the good of the tribe. The elder seers of Janszobur's tribe picked as Janszobur's task bringing back a warrior-princess from the great City of men far to the south, on the coast, a fighting queen who will lead the People to greatness. So to Waterdeep Janszobur has come, bewildered by the crowding and the strange ways and all the finery and wealth.

He is still doggedly looking for the War Queen, although he has almost run out of taverns to look for her in, and is known to the Watch all over Waterdeep for his habit of drinking all evening, breaking a few heads to warm up, and then striding through the streets of the City in the wee hours, singing lustily at the top of his lungs as he peers in windows and tries doors, looking for the princess. Janszobur prefers to brawl (refer to Unearthed Arcana) rather than draw steel. Unwitting adventurers who encounter him may suffer the same rough fate that Watch officers usually do (their reports usually include the phrase, “. . . after regaining my senses, I . . .”).

Kappiyan Flurmastyr (KAPP-ee-yan FLURR-mass-turr)

#218 (rarely elsewhere)
11th level magic-user
NG Mystra
Human male, IN 18, CHA 16

This distinguished-looking, tall, thin, white-bearded wizard lives alone in a house on Anchoret’s Court (Southern Ward), where he is engaged in seemingly constant research, and in the making of potions. He will sell potions in return for money to continue his researches (the DM should determine what he has on hand, and follow standard Dungeon Masters Guide prices. Kappiyan is not running a potion shop, as he will testily say if PCs turn up on his doorstep again and again). He has a homonculous and other magical guardian creatures in his house. The severity of Kappiyan’s defenses is left to the DM. PCs intent on robbing him should expect to leave the remains of many of their fellows behind.

Loene (LOW-enn)

#13 and all wards
8th level fighter
CG Tymora
Human female, ST 16, DEX 17, CHA 16

Now a formidable fighter and rich landlord in Waterdeep, Loene was once a “pleasure girl” purchased by Minark “the Salt Torturer”, from whom she was rescued by the notorious Company of Crazy Adventurers. Becoming an assistant to Nain Keenwhistler (q.v.) she defended him ably when he was attacked in the streets, and was offered a place in the Company ranks and training at arms, as a result. She rose in skills with astonishing speed, and upon the Company’s dissolution remained in Waterdeep as a gambler and adventuress for hire, becoming for a time the lover of Mirt “the Moneylender.” Loene no longer gambles, is still a friend of Mirt, and still trains lesser fighters and goes on adventures in return for a 2 gp/day fee and a full share of treasure. She does not really need the money, and will refuse any part of what she sees as foolhardy, frivolous, and trouble-making ventures. Loene wears a ring of spell storing when adventuring. Khelben, Nain, or Malchor will readily “refill” it for her. When full, it contains dispel magic, fly, sending (which Loene will use to call upon Nain when in peril of her life), and wall of force. Loene has a dagger + 1, but otherwise carries no magical weapons (she is thought to have a few, hidden away in the walls of one of the buildings she owns). Loene’s house is on Waterdeep Way, and backs onto Gem Street (Castle Ward).

Maaril (MAYR-ill)

#63 or at parties (see below)
13th level magic-user
NE Mystra
Human male, IN 18, DEX 17, CHA 17

A handsome, dark-eyed wizard with a jutting black beard curling from the point of his chin, Maaril is given to wearing dark green or purple robes, and appearing at Palace and nobles’ private parties, and otherwise remaining within his Dragon Tower (so named because its peak is carved into the shape of a dragon’s head; from the mouth and nostrils the smoke of the chimneys below issues, eerily), which lies on the west side of The Street of the Singing Dolphin, Sea Ward. Maaril always wears an amulet of proof against detection and location and a ring of X-ray vision. He is never without his staff of power. Maaril is working on the secrets of opening gates to other planes and commanding creatures from those planes who come to this one, and is constantly on the watch for signs or news of new magic in the City. The other mages of the City consider him an eccentric, but do not realize his evil nature (Khelben suspects, but Maaril’s visible guardian creatures are enchanted constructs rather than living beasts, and can remain lifeless if Maaril has guests). Maaril will try to seize (by means of clay golems or gargoyles, by night) any items of magic that PCs reveal to public view in the City. He will prove a quiet, patient behind-the-scenes foe to any adventurers who retaliate against him, hiring endless hireswords to bar their way.

Madieron Sunderstone (Mah-DEER-onn SUN-der-stone)

Palace (otherwise, with Piergeiron)

9th level paladin
LG Tyr
Human male, ST 18/72, CON 16, CHA 17

Madieron is the Champion of Piergeiron. He guards Piergeiron’s person in the Palace and outside the City, and answers any challenges to the Lord with his own blade or axe. The latter weapon is a battleaxe +3 that radiates a bright white continual light, given to Madieron by a High Priest of Tyr in the Inner Sea lands long ago, a Lawful Good weapon consecrated to Tyr, and known as “The Axe of Heavenly Fire.” Madieron stands an astonishing eight feet in height, and when “on duty” wears polished, blued full plate (known in the Realms as “coat-of-plate”), truly an awesome sight. Madieron also wields a 12’-long iron bar (treat as a triple-damage quarterstaff) when engaged in “crowd control” or facing many small foes, such as kobolds or goblins. Madieron is well-nigh fearless, and not especially bright. His perseverance, however, makes him a formidable foe.

Malchor Harpell (MAL-core HAR-pell)

In Waterdeep: streets, Blackstaff Tower (rarely in City)
18th level magic-user
NG Mystra, Deneir
Human male, IN 18

Malchor was a charter member of the Company of Crazy Adventurers, with whom he had a long and active (more than any other Company member) career. Upon the Company’s dissolution, Malchor went to stay with Khelben “Blackstaff” Arunsun in Waterdeep, and willingly served Khelben as an assistant, including taking part in adventures on other planes, and aiding in Harper-related plans. Malchor did this to gain the experience and increased powers he believed necessary for self-sufficiency in the sometimes-dangerous North.

After completing a staff of the magi he had been working on for some years, Malchor took his leave of Khelben amicably, and returned to his native Longsaddle. There he found a suitable spot half a day’s ride west of the town, on the edge of the Neverwinter woods, built himself a Tower, and retired there to study and further his powers, with the occasional relaxation of training (for substantial fees) lesser magic users, including Dagasumn. Malchor now rarely emerges from his Tower of Twilight except to aid the Lords of Waterdeep, particularly his friend Khelben. Malchor maintains close contact with Khelben and he gives aid to, and can call on ready aid from, him. Malchor is known to have a griffon steed, and at least one guardian defending his Tower (he has mastered the arts of creating stone guardians, staves of the magi, wands of magic missiles, rings of feather falling, and rings of warmth, and is now working on certain potions and elixirs). A painter, Malchor is fluent in Common, Elvish, Djinni, and Drow. When adventuring or traveling alone, he always wears a lurker cloak and a ring of protection, +3, and bears his staff of the magi, and is said to usually have one or more rings of warmth and feather falling about his person to trade for magic new to him, or timely aid, as well as for his own use.

Maskar Wands (MASS-car WANN-ds)

#125 (rarely, streets and markets)

21st level magic-user

LN Mystra

Human male IN 18, W 16, DEX 16

Said by some to be the most powerful independent wizard of Waterdeep, the old, seldom seen head of the noble house of Wands keeps to his twin-towered villa home much of the time, and is usually silent in public, although his manners and gestures are gracious. He is known to have a staff of the magi and a carpet flying, and to disapprove of the unrestrained use of magic. He often directs adventurers to give up the use of all magic if they cannot govern their use of it better, or donate it forthwith to any temple of Mystra. Maskar will train lesser magic users, but his payment will always be in the form of a difficult service or task, such as restoring lost or stolen spell scrolls to the tomb of a particular mage, or destroying a lich, or bringing him a rare material component from halfway across Faerûn. As a result, he is rarely sought as a tutor by mages of lesser powers.

Mistmyr Iroan (Misst-MEER Eye-ROAN)

#277 (or in any tavern nearby)

9th level magic-user

NG Mystra

Human male, IN 18, DEX 16

Mistmyr is a young, good-natured sorcerer of impoverished means, who has no magical items nor even many gold pieces to his name. He hasn't even enough gold to further his studies. As a result, he will gladly cast spells for, or tutor, anyone who will pay him although he will not sell the secrets of spells, only trade a spell for a (useful) spell he does not possess of equal or greater level, or several useful spells of lesser level. He will not go on adventures unless forced to, even if offered heaps of treasure, for he thinks the risk too great. Mistmyr rooms at the Splintered Stair inn (Gut Alley, Dock Ward), and will be found there or at a nearby tavern, having a meagre meal.

Mulgor (MULL-gore)

Palace, streets (with escort)

4th level cleric

LG Tyr

Human male, IN 16, W 18, CON 16

Mulgor is Waterdeep's collector-of-fees, a stolid, polite, no-nonsense man who is escorted by the Watch while on his money-collecting rounds. PCs who duck paying fees will get to know Mulgor very well. He is diligent, inexorable, and never forgets a face, a name, or an unpaid fee. Those who slip out of the City without paying and return years later will be confronted by a patient, courteous Mulgor. Mulgor also serves as clergy of Tyr in officiating at ceremonies for the paladins and other followers of Tyr in the City, which are held at the Palace for the convenience of Piergeiron. Mulgor lives in apartments in the Palace.

Myrmith Splendon (MEER-mith Spl-ENN-don)

#170

7th level fighter

LN Tempus

Human male, ST 18/04, W 16

Myrmith is a "captain-at-arms" (a professional tutor of fighting-men) who will train fighting-men (and all others) in the use of certain weapons (DM's choice, as long as at least one type of sword, one pole arm, and a dagger are involved). Myrmith does not specialize in any weapon, but rather tries to be an "all-rounder", mastering the greatest variety of personal weapons possible. Myrmith's fees are steep, but his training is good. His house is on Spindle Street (The Trades Ward), and he trains clients there. He is always busy. A wait of one or two weeks may be necessary for a fighter wishing the intensive training involved in going up a level, unless that fighter is willing to pay double so that Myrmith will risk the displeasure (and possible loss) of another client by "bumping" him or her.

Nain Keenwhistler (NAY-nn KEEN-whistler)

#73 (rarely Palace or streets)

13th level magic-user

NG Mystra, Tymora

Human male, IN 18, DEX 16

Nain is an ex-member of the Company of Crazy Adventurers. In his career with them, he was slain and raised many times, and rose to 15th level, ere a battle with an evil demigod (the Godson) drained him of much experience. He worked his powers back up to his present level ere the Company's dissolution, and befriended Khelben and Durnan of the Lords of Waterdeep.

With his share of the Company's wealth, Nain built his own tower (Naingate) in Waterdeep, at Seawatch Street and Grimwald's Way (Sea Ward), where he lives happily immersed in the cut and thrust of politics and intrigue as a trader and diplomatic agent in the Palace for the Lords (that is, he supports and puts forward views of the Lords while appearing as an independent, thus influencing other diplomats and City personages). Nain's inattention to his studies and lack of adventuring (he has not undertaken any deliberate expeditions into danger since his Company days) have kept him at his present level. He sometimes wants to go adventuring again, but after many Company expeditions in the shadow of his colleague, Malchor Harpell (q.v.), Nain is determined that he will be in charge, if he becomes an adventurer again. Nain has a dagger +1 and a decanter of endless water, both of which he always carries with him (and, of which, he is practiced and skilled in the odd and offensive uses of the decanter, such as a means of propulsion when floating, as a pushing or blinding weapon, to shatter glass, and suchlike).

Paerro (Pay-er-OE) (real name: Taslythor Rocktapper, of the Rocktappers of the Earthfasts)

#270, #272

2nd level thief

CN Baervan Wildwanderer

Gnome male, ST 16, DEX 18

Paerro has recently arrived in Waterdeep from the backlands of Impiltur far to the east, and is seeking adventure and fortune, despite becoming suddenly and uncomfortably aware of how law-abiding and well-policed this City is. He's somewhat at a loss for what to do, and his money is running out. He has no smithy skills, and doubts he'll find work at much else, even if he were interested in doing so. He hears much tavern-talk of the riches of Undermountain and other subterranean complexes beneath the City, but dare not enter their dangers alone, and knows it. Paerro has a room at the Warm Beds inn (Presper Street, Dock Ward), and can be found there, or drinking at The Bloody Fist (tavern, Presper Street, Dock Ward).

Rhazbos Redbridle (Ra-HAZZ-boe-zz RED-bry-dul)

#215, streets and markets
6th level fighter
CG Tempus
Human male, ST 16, IN 16

Rhazbos is a stout, jolly man who makes his living breeding and training horses in Waterdeep (he is a member of The Stablemasters' and Farriers' Guild), having a large and successful stables on Wall Street and Caravan Street in Southern Ward. He was once an adventurer, but is too busy (and getting too fat) to go adventuring these days. He will take up to two weeks (at the most) off at a stretch to tutor fighters if they offer him enough, including meals, and have a place (the courtyard of a private house, for example, or a warehouse) where he can stay.

Rulathon (Roo-LATH-on)

All wards (see below)
12th level fighter
LG Tyr
Human male, ST 17, W 16, CHA 16

Rulathon is Captain (overall commander, under the Lord Piergeiron) of the Watch, and represents them in Palace ceremonies. Where there is any big trouble anywhere on the streets, Rulathon will arrive, clad in full plate and bearing his Red Sword (a sword +4, defender). He carries a Lawful Good iron horn of valhalla for use in emergencies, and the distinctive note of his silver belt horn will alert one or more of Piergeiron, Khelben, Mirt, Durnan, Texter, or Sammereza, if any are within range to hear it. This will bring about a prompt response by one or more mages on aerial steeds or carpets of flying, with 5-20 (5d4) fully-armed Guardsmen, on aerial steeds and/or afoot arriving in 4-9 (3 + 1d6) rounds. If a situation is very serious, one or more of these arrivals will speedily go for the mercenary reinforcements. Rulathon is a fair man, but not one to fall afoul of. He'll arrest and bring individuals before a Magister a dozen times, if need be, until he gets a conviction or they take the hint and leave the City.

Savengriff (SAY-ven-griff)

All wards
17th level magic-user
LG Mystra
Human male, IN 18, W 16, DEX 16

The least powerful of the Company of Crazy Adventurers' prominent magic users, Savengriff perished while battling a beholder. Unbeknownst to the Company, Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun had recruited Savengriff to be a member of the Harpers, and traced Savengriff's remains by means of a certain amulet Khelben had given the unfortunate mage. Khelben, Mirt, Durnan, Piergeiron, Kitten and the bard Shalar Simgulphin, as well as several of Khelben's apprentices and colleagues-in-magery, destroyed the beholder and retrieved Savengriff's remains, and by the magic of allied clerics, Savengriff was restored to life. He became a loyal apprentice of Khelben—and in time, a loyal agent of the Harpers and a mage of accomplishment, creating the wand of banishment, of which he made over a dozen. One he took with him, one he gave to Khelben, and others he gave to Alustriel, High Lady of Silvermoon, and other mages of the North who were Harpers. He is thought to have hidden away at least one wand ere he took to traveling about Waterdeep, the North, and other planes to do the Harper's business. Upon such mysterious errands he may be encountered anywhere in, under, or near Waterdeep, at any time. He will be magically prepared for, and expecting, trouble.

Wand of Banishment

This wand is usable only by magic-users; it cannot be recharged, and each use (effective or not) drains one charge. Upon command, a needle-thin ray of flickering green light shoots from the wand's tip up to 4' distant, striking a single target creature (the target is allowed a save vs. spells at -1; a successful save means the ray missed). Creatures struck by the ray are affected as follows:

—A summoned creature (from another plane) is instantly banished back to its own plane; it must save vs. wands at -4 to remain. If it does remain, it is held for one round.

—A creature summoned from elsewhere on the Prime Material Plane (i.e., by monster summoning, call woodland beings, or the like) is driven away; it will leave instantly at a normal movement rate, stopping only to defend itself if attacked, and not return.

—A hostile creature of 2 + 2 hit dice or less (including enemy familiars and homonculi) is affected as if by a repulsion spell, for four rounds. The target is allowed a save vs. wands; if successful, the repulsion lasts for only two rounds.

—A hostile creature of more than 2 + 2 hit dice must save vs. wands at -4; if successful, it is slowed for 2-5 (at random) rounds (if save is successfully made, target creature is unaffected).

—By draining six charges at once (the power will not work if less than six are left, but any attempt will exhaust the wand anyway), the wielder of the wand may attempt to repel any other wands within 4". Any affected wands (all wands are allowed a save vs. Lightning on the Saving Throw Matrix for Magical and Non-Magical Items at -3; if successful, they are unaffected) will be instantly, and violently, telekinesed away from the wand of banishment for 10"-60" distance, and held that distant for 1-4 rounds. Wands carried in the hand or belt will tear free; wands in backpacks and chests will drag the owner or item with them—unless very heavy or bulky, in which case the wand will smash about within the item, perhaps being destroyed. Note that wands in extra-dimensional spaces (such as a bag of holding or that produced by a rope trick) are immune from this effect.

Only one creature can be attacked with a wand of banishment per round; the ray will only affect one creature at a time, although it may affect any number of wands. Any given creature can be affected by any particular wand of banishment only once every 12 hours; a creature cannot be repeatedly attacked, or attacked a second time or with a different function of the wand, if an initial attack fails. Subsequent attempts will merely waste charge; a creature that has saved once against the wand (or endured one successful attack) cannot be affected by the wand again until the dweomer built up around the creature by the wand dissipates (which takes 12 hours).

Shyrrhr (SHEER-hur)

Palace, #14, and streets (always with escorting diplomat)
0 level fighter
NG Lathander
Human female, DEX 16, CHA 16

Shyrrhr is a courtesan of the Palace, one of the escorts Piergeiron provides for diplomatic guests. She specializes in chaperoning shy or uncertain human or half-elven women and elves of both sexes, as she is tall, elegant, soft-spoken, and kind, with a usually-hidden, light sense of humor. Shyrrhr knows both spoken and written Elvish, and is familiar with the customs, culture, courtesies, and religion of the various sorts of elves, even sea elves. She is intelligent, perceptive, and possessed of very good hearing and attention to "body language," and learns far more from most guests than they realize. Although not a member of any of Waterdeep's noble families (she was born, surprisingly, in Deepingdale far to the east), Shyrrhr is accorded noble status in Waterdeep, has the title “Lady of the Court”, and lives in a house in Waterdeep Way, Castle Ward. (Thieves visiting it will be surprised to discover that she has nice wines, many nice gems, about 20 gp, and little else; Piergeiron provides for her needs out of the Palace purse.) Shyrrhr reports to Piergeiron, in private, all she learns, and the two are good friends, trusting each other absolutely. Shyrrhr has bronze-color hair, worn long and straight, and green eyes. She is graceful and quiet of movement, and can drink great amounts of wine or spirits without ill effect or intoxication, thanks to many years of Court service.

Sumer (SOO-mur)

All wards (visitor)
6th level cleric of Talos
CE Talos
Human male, ST 16, W 18

This tall, slim, dark-haired man appears in Waterdeep as a rich trader, clad in purple robes, with a bodyguard of four or five men, and his crony, Greeme, a 5th level CE fighter who uses poisoned weapons. Sumer keeps a low profile and does not cause public trouble, but he likes to kill at least one person, for the greater glory of Talos the Destroyer, on each visit, and favors adventurers, because if they vanish, there is less surprise and outcry, and because they often have cash or magical treasure he can use to further the work of Talos. Sumer will follow parties of adventurers into the North or into the dungeons beneath the City, and attack when they are weak or unprepared (i.e. when resting). He will flee if his life is threatened. Sumer carries no magical items except an amulet of proof against detection and location.

Tantuss Shieldsun (Tan-TUSS Sh-EE-ldsun)

All wards (streets, taverns) and #76
8th level ranger
NG Mielikki
Human male, ST 16

Tantuss makes a living as an adventurer, guiding caravans (and defending them against evil) in the North, and is a Harper and devout servant of Mielikki, who often carries messages to and from The Lady’s Hands at the shrine of Mielikki in Waterdeep (communications with other servants of The Lady of the Forest all across the North). He is widely traveled and will gladly hire himself out as a guide, although he will not enter tombs or private homes in the name of adventure (ruins and the subterranean lairs of evil creatures are another matter). Tantuss will also tutor rangers for the usual fees, which he will use to live on or improve his equipment, and give most to the shrine for its continuance and service to Mielikki. Tantuss has no magical items, and rarely carries more than 20 pieces of gold.

Tessalar Hulicorn (TESS-ah-lar HOOL-ih-corm)

#95, and (rarely) taverns, markets, and parties in all wards
16th level magic user
LN Mystra
Human male, IN 18

Tessalar is a mercenary mage of Waterdeep, who tutors and casts spells continuously in exchange for treasure, which he uses to further his researches into the making of various magical items. He also makes and sells scrolls and potions, and rarely leaves his home (Tessalar’s Tower is at Sul Street and Chasso’s Trot, Sea Ward). A high-voiced, bearded, vain man given to wearing lots of sparkling rings (costume jewelry worth only a few coppers; his money goes into his research) and to using smokepuffs and pyrotechnics for dramatic effect, Tessalar is the closest thing to a “magic shop” Waterdeep has. PCs are warned that he will never go adventuring, will raise his prices steeply if the same people keep bothering him over and over again for potions or scrolls, and has enough real power (walls of force, contingency spells to whisk him away from harm, a constant Serten’s spell immunity, and a ring of spell turning) to utterly destroy most attackers, as well as a homonculous and an iron golem or four to dissuade thoughts of such undiplomatic dealings. Tessalar trusts no one, and always demands payment in advance for unusual potions and scrolls, or half in advance and half when ready (he never delivers; you must go to him) for “standard,” often-demanded potions and scrolls.

Thear Chessar (THEER CHESS-ar)

All wards
6th level thief-acrobat
CN Vergadain
Dwarven female, ST 17, DEX 17

Thear is a dwarf of quixotic nature who loves the fun and danger of stealing by night, from the rooftops. She is short and bearded (female dwarves are almost all bearded, though many shave). Thear finds her appearance a useful disguise; with an axe and mailshirt, no one suspects that she is a thief, and few will reach a rooftop to snatch shirt or axe while she’s in the building beneath, acquiring wealth (gold is her favorite loot). Thear is good, resists greedy impulses to over-indulge at her thievery, and likes to pick on visitors to the City (such as adventurers). If caught, she might offer to train a thief of lesser skills for free to make amends, but will otherwise have nothing to do with player characters, except to rob them whenever they bring home lots of gold. She has an uncanny ability to sense (90% of the time) when mechanical traps are present, even when actually finding or removing them is beyond her skills, and will leave guarded treasure alone, to seek easier loot elsewhere. Thear will prove an elusive foe if chased, doubling back over sewers and rooftops until she can don mailshirt and axe and become a “typical male” dwarf drinking in a busy tavern. She has seen Ilph (q.v.) from afar on the rooftops, but avoids him.

Tzarrakyn “the Younger” (Tizz-ARR-ah-kin)

All wards (streets, markets, and taverns)
2nd level fighter
CG Tymora, Tempus
Human male, ST 16, DEX 16

Tzarrakyn’s nickname is due to his famous father, Tzarrakyn of the Company of Crazy Adventurers, who perished in the same epic battle with a beholder that claimed the life of Savengriff (q.v.). Unbeknownst to his fellow Company members, Tzarrakyn had taken to wife a merchant’s daughter of Waterdeep, Dartheema, who died in childbirth less than a year after her husband. The baby, now known as Tzarrakyn “the Younger,” was raised by Dartheema’s parents. Nain of the Company, when he by chance learned the baby’s parentage, gave the parents seven thousand pieces of gold towards the boy’s upbringing, but the parents themselves both died of a winter fever when Tzarrakyn had just reached the age of fourteen.

Taken in by the Watch, Tzarrakyn cared for their boots and weapons in return for a bed and food, and dreamed of being a warrior hero, and rich. That would need luck and a good sword-arm, the Watchmen told him, so he became a worshipper of Tymora and Tempus, and has now taken leave of his friends at the Watch (who took a collection for him, and got him leather armor, a serviceable dagger and long sword—he also knows how to use a club—and twenty-three pieces of gold) to seek his fortune. He will tutor a 1st level fighter in return for a fee, hire on as a man-at-arms, or even join an adventuring party. Any treasure he gains will be split four ways: a share to each god he worships, a share to live on and/or replace and repair his equipment, and a share given to his friends at the Watch—if they won't take it, he'll spend it on drinks for them. Tzarrakyn could prove a valuable party member, or an ally (a DM should keep track of his imaginary career; as the PCs adventure, so too will Tzarrakyn, alone or with the PCs or another group, and could well gain levels, proving useful as a later tutor for PC fighters).

Ulmrin (ULM-rin)

All wards (taverns, streets, markets)
2nd level fighter
LE Ilneval
Half-orc male, ST 17, CON 17

Half-orcs are rare in Waterdeep, but are tolerated as all beings short of drow and illithids (mind flayers) are, if their gold is good. Ulmrin can pass for human in appearance, is rather burly, and fights with a broad sword, axe, and dagger, in chainmail. He loves to fight, and will readily join or hire on to adventuring bands, but although he is not so stupid as to show it, his loyalty is only to himself, and he will run away to fight another day in any really tough battle, taking any treasure he can.

Varbrace Zaalen (VAR-brayse ZAY-len)

#168, streets, and see below
7th level fighter
LN Tempus
Human male, ST 16, DEX 16

This fighting-man makes his living as a professional tutor of fighters, or "captain-at-arms", and is quite willing to do this (upon payment of the proper fees) for player characters. (DMs should determine the weapons Varbrace has mastered, and those that his competitor Myrmith Splendon (q.v.) employs, for minimal overlap, so that PCs can choose what weapons to be trained in fairly freely.) Varbrace does not deal again with those who try to trick or cheat him unless they offer him double fees in advance, and act very sorry. He rooms at The Inn of the Dripping Dagger, and trains people in a secluded corner of The City of the Dead (or, if the Watch objects, outside the walls near River Gate). Varbrace will not go on adventures—he considers the risks too high for the potential profit.

Vedellen Hawkhand (Veh-DELL-en HAWK-hand)

City inns and taverns, all wards
1st level ranger

NG Rillifane Rallathil
Half-elven male, ST 16, IN 16, W 16

This ranger is an agent of the Harpers. That essentially good but secretive organization of the North seeks, among other things, to destroy evil—or at least, evil rulers, and the goblin races—to prevent men from indiscriminately despoiling the land for their own gain; and to preserve the culture of the elves and dwarves, encouraging elves, dwarves, halflings, gnomes, and humans to live together in peace. Vedellen doesn't worry about all that, however. He merely seeks grand adventure in the wilds, with any band that is headed there, his task from the Harpers being to keep an eye on such bands in Waterdeep and report on their real alignments, intentions, and activities. If he joins a band, it will be on a temporary basis, and he will of course seek to curb any wanton destruction of wildlife except evil giant-class creatures or other monsters, whom he will attack without hesitation. Between adventures, Vedellen will always return to Waterdeep's inns and taverns to continue his spying for the Harpers. If he is ready for training, he will go north, alone, to Silverymoon, to find a half-elven ranger to tutor him.

Wulve Raaikyn (WUL-vuh RAY-in-kin)

All wards (streets, inns, markets, and taverns)
1st level thief
CN Brandobaris
Halfling male, DEX 17

Recently arrived in Waterdeep as a trader in textiles, Wulve has stayed in the City of Splendors hoping to steal some gold and or magic before he heads back east with a wagon-load of turnips. He thinks sleeping adventurers are perfect targets, trusting to his feet to run away if discovered (he has learned where one or two ways down into the sewers are, and will make for them).

Xanathar

Beholder Crime-Lord
LE Bhaal

Waterdeep's "official" thieves' guild was crushed long ago and its remains driven from beyond the North into the lands of Amn. This does not mean that thievery and crime does not exist in the City of Splendors, for in the shadows it thrives in hundreds of small independent operations. The major advocate and support of these operations is the Beholder Xanathar.

Xanathar makes his home in a opulent chamber that hidden behind a secret door leading from the sewers of Waterdeep. His main chamber has yet to be located by the forces of Law, and, indeed, few know of his very existence in the city. Rather than operating a strict Thieves' Guild, Xanathar works everything with freelance thieves, operating through third parties in order prevent the freelance agents of revealing his whereabouts, if caught. Xanathar is a collector of information from the surface world, again through trusted third parties, by which he makes his plans. It is said that Xanathar has the best knowledge of the sewers and their entrance both into the major citadels and into Undermountain as well.

Xanathar is served has a central "Four Councilors" who meet with him regularly. They in turn deal with other underlings, who do not even know of Xanathar's existence or the fact he is a Beholder. Slan Thurbel is his mercenary leader, a 6th level fighter who arranges crimes of violence. Slink Monteskor is Xanathar's bookkeeper and gatherer of information—he has a network of snitches scattered throughout the poor sections. Ott Steeltoes is a renegade of Ironmaster, a one-eyed dwarven pirate who is a 5th level fighter and thief. Shindia Darkeyes is a half-drow thief of 7th level, and Xanathar's personal favorite. She is also a master at blackmail and extortion, her information coming from the darker festhalls of Waterdeep and its more stylish parties. In his lair, Xanathar keeps a pair of charmed intellect devourers, and a winglet of six gargoyles for local defense.

Xanathar's abode is said to be reached by a number of trapped passages, which only the four know the correct passage. Other interlopers are kept as pets briefly, wrung dry for information, then dispatched (for Xanathar's appetite is enormous). The series of chambers in Xanathar's lair contains a number of treasure vaults and libraries (with information by Slink written in a code). Xanathar itself reclines in a clear glass tank of scented water when not planning criminal activities.

Xanathar is a creature of pleasures—it enjoys finely-prepared foods (Steeltoe's domain), scented oils, and spiced southern tobaccos and herbs. It is confident of both its power and its secrecy from the Lords, and is willing to go to great lengths to maintain that secrecy. Operatives who begin to wonder who is giving the final orders get a midnight visit from Slan's ritual slayers. Xanathar is sure that the Lords would destroy the cellars stone by stone to find out where its lair is, if they knew where it existed. Xanathar's Libraries keep extensive track of the abilities and weaknesses of the Mages of Waterdeep.

Xanathar's greatest defense is his secrecy. "If they do not ask the right questions, they do not get the right answers" is its comment on spellcasters seeking evil in the city. In addition to non-detection defenses in lair, Xanathar makes sure that his operation cannot be considered a true "Thieves' Guild," so he may chuckle over the Lords, secure in their knowledge that no such organization exists, while Xanathar grows rich on their lack of knowledge.

Xorla Djannas (Jx-ZOR-lah Deh-JANN-iss)

All wards
2nd level illusionist
CN Leira
Human female, IN 18, DEX 18

Xorla is an apprentice illusionist whose master, the (9th level) illusionist Selpar Thynn, was slain some months ago in a tavern brawl. She is at a loss over what to do now, stranded in a City largely unfamiliar to her (both she and Selpar were born in southern Tethyr), and will readily tutor or undertake adventures, both for the money (she has little left) and for something to do. If she joins a party of PCs, it will take some time of shared adventuring for her to develop any real loyalty to the group.

Yuldar (Yul-DAR)

All wards (streets), The City of the Dead, and #77
1st level druid
N Silvanus
Human male, W 16, DEX 16, CHA 17

Recently arrived in Waterdeep, Yuldar finds the big City bewildering and distasteful. He longs for home—a home in Tethyr from which he had to flee for his life, because he was related to a local lord. Yuldar was a cousin of the Lord Ilistiin, who was killed by a rival, who in turn took the lordship and then started hunting and slaying all relatives of the former lord, to prevent any claimants raising armies to dispute his rule. Yuldar has grown a beard and changed his appearance, taken the robes of a druid as a disguise, and discovered to his surprise that a childhood love of the local woods has become a strong loyalty to Siivanus. He has visited the shrine of Silvanus for guidance, and been told to go out into the North with a band of adventurers (for his personal safety) and see all he can of it, for only if Yuldar searches thus will the Wood-Father reveal what task He has for Yuldar, to him. Yuldar is thus eager to join any band of adventurers who will be exploring any part of the North, on any terms.

Chapter 8: BEGINNING A CAMPAIGN IN WATERDEEP

This book is designed to provide enough detail about the City of Waterdeep to enable a long-term campaign to be set therein with a minimum of “panic work” by any DM, and yet leave room for every DM to develop details of the City to suit (and reflect the vital play of) an individual campaign. The DM using this book must study the opening chapter and the chapter on non-player characters, and to a lesser extent the chapter on guilds, to gain some feeling of the “life” and character of Waterdeep. The chapters of suggested adventures and noble families are most optional to a DM beginning play, but every DM should read about Waterdeep through these pages, noting his or her own ideas for adventures that spring to mind, until Waterdeep feels real and familiar—and then play can begin.

Player characters of all classes may begin their careers at 0 level in Waterdeep, although barbarians and assassins must be visitors, not native Waterdhavians, and may encounter difficulties in advancing, getting necessary training, or even operating at all. Rangers and illusionists will also have limited scope for development, due to a lack of a good selection of tutors, and an unappreciative environment. It is suggested that cavaliers be newcomers to Waterdeep, not “native” nobles, or they will have great dominance over fellow party members, and a “free ride” over many daily difficulties of City life that otherwise force players to role-play and get involved in life in Waterdeep (which in turn suggests to, or forces upon, players additional adventures in the City). Note that non-cavalier PCs could well be minor, junior members of one noble family or other, given difficult or dangerous tasks by their clan to “prove themselves.”

In any case, the DM must carefully prepare the connections, knowledge, and family background of a cavalier PC (and to a lesser extent, a PC of any other class who is a native Waterdhavian). If the cavalier is from Waterdeep, the DM will have to carefully determine the extent of influence of the cavalier’s family (one reason that the noble families have not been detailed herein with complete family trees). A suggested “homeland” for visiting PCs is troubled Tethyr (far to the south of Waterdeep, on the west coast of Faerûn), from whence many people of all classes and abilities have recently been displaced by civil strife.

The DM must keep track of the living costs of PCs—where they live, more than food, will be the biggest expense—and make sure that players are aware of these costs, too-often a shortage of cash will force PCs to seek adventure when they might otherwise wait for a more opportune moment—or even (gasp) take honest jobs, to make ends meet. DMs should carefully inform PCs of current news and events as they would learn of them as City inhabitants (and visitors) would in “real” life. If they sit back and do nothing, events will pass them by.

A look at the non-player characters included in these pages readily shows that Waterdeep contains people of all ranks of power. If PCs tend to “push around” NPCs of lesser power, the DM should ensure that the consequences are severe. Use of the “oops, that character’s not that low in level at all” table in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set is recommended. (This table is on p. 17 of the DM’s Sourcebook of the Realms.) NPCs who like to push PCs around should show up, too.

As play progresses, DMs must take care to keep PCs involved with NPCs and adventures of power levels they can handle, and yet which challenge them as they adventure. Ideal AD&D® game play emphasizes role-playing rather than exceptional character or magical abilities, and a DM used to role-playing, or able to encourage it, will find that character levels are not nearly as important when PCs are engaged in dealing with many NPCs in a city, rather than in an “obstacle course”-like dungeon situation. AD&D game statistics are largely excluded from the chapter of adventures so that a DM can adjust them for mid- or high-level PCs who come to Waterdeep, or use them with characters beginning their adventuring careers there.

In a City, with so many details to keep track of, it is well-nigh impossible to tell players beforehand exactly what their characters know. Over eleven years of play involving Waterdeep, it seems that the best and fastest way to handle information problems is simply for the DM to say, as situations arise, “you know such-and-such,” or “as a Waterdhavian, you recognize the heraldic arms on the jerkin.” If players feel they need information, they need only say, “Player to DM: (query)” instead of speaking as their characters. DMs uncomfortable with City play can use Waterdeep as a base for expeditions into the North, or by ship up and down the Sword Coast, confident that the characters and detail are there to return to. Years of play in the City will build its own characters, memories, and favorite places, as though the City is indeed real—and with vivid play, players and DMs alike can come to know the imaginary Waterdeep as well or better than any city one visits or lives in, in “real life.”

Chapter 9: ADVENTURES IN WATERDEEP

A guide to the City of Splendors would not be complete without suggestions as to possible adventures player characters of all levels can enjoy within its walls. A few are presented here, in the form of plot outlines, so that each DM can adjust events and NPCs to challenge PCs of all levels (and so that players who sneak a peek into these pages will not know for sure just how things are going to turn out. A good DM will add twists of his or her own). There is no need to use these adventures with the endings suggested, or one at a time. A fine atmosphere of intrigue can be created if two (or more!) of these suggested spurs to adventure begin to happen simultaneously, with PCs “in the middle.” DMs should read through these outlines, decide which ones to use in play, change them somewhat to suit his or her players or campaign balance, and, most importantly, decide how to introduce these into play. Have fun!

1. The Shadow Thieves Strike

In an alleyway or other secluded area of the City, PCs are attacked by an agile man in black armed with poisoned daggers (which he can throw with skill). His target appears to be one PC in particular, and PCs will see a second man running away whether or not the assassin’s attack is successful. This second observer should escape cleanly (although if the PCs give spirited chase, the runner could lead them into an ambush in the sewers beneath the City). The assassin will flee by a different route, if possible. From then on, the PCs will be attacked and stolen from repeatedly, by a mysterious band of thieves (and, if they venture into the docks area by night, by hired fighters). At least once a week, game time, an assassination attempt will be made on one of the PCs—if the PC who was the target of the first attempt survived it, that PC will be the primary focus of later attacks.

The hired fighters know nothing. Questioning a thief or assassin (alive or employing Speak with the Dead) is the only way for PCs to uncover the plot. The attackers were sent from Athkatla, a city in Amn where the Shadow Thieves are based, to kill at least one of the Lords of Waterdeep. One of the PCs just happens to very closely resemble a merchant of the City, Riyataivin, whom the Thieves suspect (wrongly) of being a Lord of Waterdeep.

Riyataivin is an investor in caravan trade who rooms at various inns and rooming houses in Southern Ward, buying and selling wagons, draft animals, cargos, and warehouse space for small but consistent profit margins. He is a LN 0 level fighter, and generally respected among his colleagues. He likes to act mysterious, but has no special knowledge of, or connection with, the Lords of Waterdeep.

If the PCs do well against the Thieves, they will earn the status of “deadly enemies” in the eyes of that organization, who will become relentless behind-the-scenes foes. The only way for PCs to end this is to destroy the organization (a task that will earn them the gratitude of the Lords of Waterdeep, with perhaps orders to the Watch to leave the PCs alone for a while, whatever their activities). The headquarters of the Shadow Thieves in Athkatla is a subterranean complex connected to the City sewers, built around “The Assassins Run,” a deadly training ground of traps and obstacles. The Thieves’ local (Waterdeep) commander is the evil mage Marune, whose lair is said to be north of the City, within Mount Sar. Marune is of at least 17th level, and his lair will have many traps and guardian creatures, but details of these are left up to the individual DM.

2. Screams in The Sewers

On any occasion when they are on a relatively deserted street of Waterdeep by night, PCs will hear incoherent, agonized screams from beneath a sewer grate right under their feet, which soon die away. The grate can be pried up, to reveal a ledge just above the flowing muck that is covered with fresh blood, and a severed human hand lies in this ichor clutching a partial map of the sewers. DMs should draw a map from the one given in Chapter 3 of this book, revealing to the players only what they want the players to know, although obviously the portion where the PCs find the map must be included, and at least two entrances/exits to the sewers—and a way to the Palace could well lead the PCs into other adventures.

If PCs explore the sewers themselves, they will soon encounter the cause of the demise of the unfortunate thief with the map: a giant crocodile on which is riding a quasit, who seems to be somehow directing the beast. The reptile will attack, and the quasit will turn invisible and flee, using all of its powers necessary to do so.

If PCs do not investigate the sewers, the DM should carefully introduce news of the strange and horrible deaths of a crew of The Cellarers and Plumbers Guild underneath the City streets, and of reports of blood flowing into the harbor where certain sewers empty into it. Talk will begin to circulate around the taverns that the Cellarers and Plumbers are refusing to do any sewer work—and that a tiny creature (the DM should describe the quasit) is seen scuttling about often before fearsome monster attacks in the sewers. Something is definitely going on under the City. . . .

The quasit is the familiar of an evil mage of minor powers, who has been hired by a man called Neruudan to clear out the sewers. Neruudan is an agent of Luskan, who is staying at The Gentle Rest (#191, The High Road, The Trades Ward), posing as a gem-dealer. He is actually trying to set up a smuggling ring in the City, using the fence who owns the inn he is staying in and one other—he has not yet decided who to contact—that he can reach by means of the sewers (see Fences in Chapter 4). Neruudan intends to control the upper sewers of the City, but is running into problems. He had no idea that so many of Waterdeep’s inhabitants used the sewers as regular highways, and that its depths held such a selection of dangerous creatures. This adventure could well lead PCs into one (or both) of the famous “dungeons” of Waterdeep, Undermountain or The Dungeon of the Crypt and may bring them into confrontation with Xanthan the Crimeland (q.v., Chapter 7) and his minions.

3. The Disappearing Dead

Word spreads rapidly through the City that a family crypt, opened to add an unfortunate’s bones to join the endless rest of his forebears, has been found empty—even though it was locked, sealed, and apparently undisturbed. Permission was sought of Piergeiron by the Watch to open two other tombs, and received. They, too, were empty. Someone in the City is stripping graves—not just of treasure, but of bodies!

If the PCs do not investigate, this mystery will never be solved. If they do, the logical place to wait for something to happen is The City of the Dead. The thefts occur only by night; and while waiting, PCs will be watched suspiciously by Watch patrols, and may in turn observe and overhear (if they take care to stay hidden, e.g. on the roof of a tomb) some interesting goings-on between other citizens of Waterdeep that may lead to other adventures. The tomb thefts are done under cover of magical darkness, often during bad weather. Cloaked thus, an evil mage with four to six servant gargoyles will enter a tomb through the floor by means of a passwall spell, and take the contents. The tomb robbers will flee if attacked, but will attempt to slay and take at least one attacker. The mage is attempting to build a zombie army for his own protection in his City villa (DMs should locate the villa in an unexpected area of the City, such as Sea Ward or North Ward), as he plots to charm important personages of Waterdeep, and amass as much magic as he can (he has little at present, but DMs are encouraged to introduce magical items into the campaign for this mage's use, to heighten the tension of any battle with him). If PCs take no interest in the recurring tales of empty crypts, this mage could come after their magic when he has grown very powerful. The mage is quite insane, and will escape if hard-pressed by a means of a teleport spell or a teleport without error to another, plane of existence, to become a recurring foe for PCs.

4. The Kiss of The Goddess

A great gem known as "The Kiss of the Goddess" is brought to the Palace and presented to Piergeiron by the Sultan of Volothamp, the archmage Nairith Irizar, in reparation for a mistaken attack upon a ship of Waterdeep off the coast of Tethyr by galleys of Volothamp engaged in fighting pirates. (DMs may wish to forewarn PCs of this visit by rumors and then news within the City; the adventure will be far more vivid if they attend the ceremony at court, and witness the presentation.) Present at the ceremony will be the archmage Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun and several other prominent wizards, including Maskar Wands, Nain Keenwhistler, and possibly Malchor Harpell, as well as Piergeiron, Madeiron Sundestone, and Rulathon. PC thieves, like all other thieves present in Waterdeep, may think better of trying to lift the gem at the ceremony).

The "Goddess" the gem is named for is Sune, the Goddess of Love, and it has a unique magical power conferred upon anyone touching it when it flares into radiance. Once every 66 turns, regularly, the gem flares with a blue-white radiance for one round, and any one creature who first touches it during that round will be healed of all lost hit points, wounds, feeblemindedness and blindness (lost limbs will not, however, regenerate, and insanity will not be cured) and will be invigorated, alert and refreshed, and able to operate at a furious rate of activity, if desired, without growing physically or mentally tired, for 200 consecutive turns. The Sultan will demonstrate this upon a mouse in a "running wheel", in a cage, before the court. Each time the gem flares, there is a 7% chance (not cumulative) that it will plane shift itself, and anyone touching it, instantly to Sune's abode on the plane of Olympus, a rose-crystal palace of hot scented baths and cozy bowers, from which PCs will be teleported back to the pinnacle of Mount Waterdeep, 1-12 days later, by servants of the Goddess only if they are, or become (perhaps losing levels or class abilities in the process) worshipers of Sune. Otherwise, they will have to find their own way back to the Forgotten Realms. (These planar details of the gem are unknown to anyone in the City.)

If PCs are not present at the ceremony, their should hear all about it, vividly told, by someone in a tavern or inn, later.

Six or so days after the Sultan leaves, Piergeiron has the gem carefully tested on volunteers and criminals, and it works without ill effects—although he will refuse any requests that it be turned over to the priesthood of Sune or used to heal all who request it, saying sternly that it is still largely an unknown and perhaps dangerous, or even evil, thing, and that further studies are necessary before he dares use it so. Those on whom it was tested are kept under careful observation, to find any ill or side effects.

One day the gem does not flare, and mages called in to investigate say that the "gem" in their hands is a thing of cut glass that has never held a dweomer; a copy, definitely not the quite real gem they used the day before.

The real one has been stolen (by one of the minor mages placed as a guard over it in the Palace) despite the fact that two iron golems flanked its protective casket, which was atop a smooth-sided, twenty-foot-high plinth, with orders from Khelben to attack anyone (including the minor mages set as guards) touching, or even approaching within 10' of the gem. Khelben arrived to activate and deactivate the golems each day himself, but was not present during the testing. The golems did not move, and the mages swear they saw and heard nothing, but the gem is somehow gone.

Exactly who took it, is up to the DM, but it is suggested that magic be involved, and the thief be (or have been working for) someone in Waterdeep—perhaps Xanthas, Maaril, Gaundos, or Elaith Craulnobur, all of whom are detailed in Chapter 7—who remains within the City walls, and hides the gem somewhere in the City. One of the PCs will be contacted by a man called Lathchar, who pretends to be an agent of the Lords and wants to hire the PC to recover the gem or at least find out what they can about the affair, offering 100 gp per person involved, and another 100 gp in ten days, when he meets the PC again, if results warrant it. Lathchar will give the PC a password (for use in emergencies only, he warns) that will ensure that the watch co-operates with, or at least does not hinder, a PC involved in apparently shady activities who is confronted by the watch. The password is genuine, and will work for seventeen days after the PC learns it (assuming he or she accepts Lathchar's gold), but Lathchar himself is not—he is a thief who wants the gem for himself, and will shadow the PC(s) and attempt to rob or ambush (with up to twenty hireswords) the PC or any companion who gains the gem. Lathchar wears an amulet of proof against detection and location to conceal his alignment, and may employ a wand of magic missiles, sword of dancing, or other magical item at the DM's option to make him a formidable opponent for the PCs in a fight.

The theft was actually accomplished by the mage and an accomplice, an evil cleric. The mage had a glass copy of the gem fashioned, and a copy of the casket it was housed in, and equipped himself with a ring of telekinesis and his accomplice with an amulet of proof against detraction and location and plate mail of etherealness. When the normal rotation of guardian mages brought the mage to the Palace, the accomplice accompanied him (as an escorting guard, in the usual manner). Outside the chamber where the gem was guarded, in a nearby "jakes" (washroom), the mage cast an invisibility spell upon the accomplice. The concealed cleric accompanied the mage to his post, and slunk into a corner, remaining invisible and moving only when one or other of the mages was speaking or making other noise. After the other two mages had gone “off duty,” the accomplice waited until the innocent guardian mage was distracted. Then the guilty mage used his ring to send the real gem in its casket to the floor in one corner of the room, and replace it with the copy. As no one visibly touched or approached the gem within ten feet, the golems did nothing. The mage then took off the ring and placed it on the floor.

The invisible accomplice picked up the ring and then carefully moved over to the gem, slowly and carefully for utmost quiet, as the innocent mage reappeared and walked back to the plinth again.

Although both the Palace and specific rooms within it (including the chamber where the gem was guarded) have been rendered proof against astral, ethereal, or other magical passage, by means of gorgons’ blood mixed into the mortar and by lead shielding, the plinth on which the gem-casket rested is not so protected. The invisible accomplice touched the casket containing the real gem, simultaneously becoming ethereal, and passed “into” the pillar with the gem. There he remained until all the hue and cry had died down and the mage signaled him that it was safe to emerge. The moment the theft was discovered, but before the high-level help actually arrived to investigate, the accomplice cast obscure object upon the gem itself, and upon its casket.

DMs should take care to remove the gem from play (perhaps by use of the priesthood of Sune, operating against PCs in an “at all costs, no holds barred” manner, to gain the gem) if PCs somehow get hold of it and use it as a “constant healer.”

5. The Temple War

The DM can introduce this adventure whenever PCs are near one of Waterdeep’s temples to Tymora or Tempus (in the Sea Ward). There will be sudden explosions (perhaps a meteor swarm) from within one of the temples, and PCs may see a robed, masked figure emerge hastily from a Temple door, burn a symbol on it with a fire-finger cantrip (the dagger of Tempus if the temple is that of Tyche, and the circle of Tyche if the temple is that of Tempus). This will take but a single round, whereupon the figure will twist a ring on its finger and vanish into thin air, teleporting away, before the PCs can reach it.

On the following round, a Watch patrol will come at a run, and under-priests and lay followers will pour out of the vandalized temple. The PCs and anyone else nearby will be suspected of somehow being involved by both groups, and unless the PCs do some fast talking, temple followers will attack them, with the Watch trying to stop the fight and apprehend the PCs. The Watch will call in reinforcements as described in Chapter 2, and in Chapter 7 under the entries for Helve Urtrace and Rulathon. One or more PCs will escape, but it is likely that at least one PC will be held and questioned closely.

The DM and players should roleplay the entire interrogation. Co-operative PCs who answer questions fully and submit to detect lie spells cast by minor clerics of Tyr who are present will probably be let go upon providing the Watch officers with an accurate account of where they now reside in Waterdeep, and a promise not to move residence without informing the Watch. The Watch will also forbid the character(s) to leave the City for at least ten days, with the warning that a Magister may extend this “grounding” period at that time. Gate guards—able to themselves call on reinforcements as noted above—will ensure that the affected character(s) cannot leave by any normal means.

The attack on the temple will be followed, several days later, by an attack on the other temple, and upon its door will be left the symbol of the other priesthood involved. If the suspect PCs have a good alibi for the time of this second attack (e.g. drinking in the public taproom of a respectable inn or tavern, or being in a particular merchant’s shop), suspicion on them will be lessened. If not, it will increase (the Watch will investigate both priesthoods, and find that both were honestly not involved—detect lie spells will be used to discern this).

If the PCs try to investigate for themselves, they will be closely observed by the Watch, but not hindered. It is suggested that the PCs see a masked, robed figure that closely resembles the one they saw outside the temple if they do any looking in the North Ward. If they attack or confront the figure, or call the Watch to do so, the figure will turn out to be a noble lady of the City sneaking back from a lover to her home (and unsuspecting husband). She will of course be furious if the Watch is involved, and very frightened if she thinks the PCs have some connection to her husband, and she will undoubtedly flee if given any opportunity. If the PCs do not confront her, but follow her, they will see a second masked, robed figure resembling the first (they will see this figure several nights later, if they do confront the Lady). If this second figure is followed, it will go into a certain house on a quiet street somewhere in North Ward. If the PCs investigate, they will be attacked by armed men, and the masked figure will turn out to be a wizard of some power. All are members of the Cult of the Dragon, and in the house they will have some treasure—gold and minor magic—stolen from the temples and from elsewhere in the City, which they intend to take to dracoliches somewhere north of the City. If the PCs are forced to retreat from this fight, the Cult members will immediately try to leave the City with the treasure, and if the PCs pursue, they could well end up facing a dracolich in its lair.

DRACOLICH (Night Dragon)

FREQUENCY: Very rare
 NO APPEARING: 1 (unless called by a ring of dragons)
 ARMOR CLASS: -2
 MOVE: As per former dragon type
 HIT DICE: As per former dragon type
 % IN LAIR: 20%
 TREASURE TYPE: B, H, S, T
 NO. OF ATTACKS: As per former dragon type
 DAMAGE/ATTACK: See below
 SPECIAL ATTACKS: Breath weapon and spell use
 SPECIAL DEFENSES: Spell immunities and spell use
 MAGIC RESISTANCE: See below
 INTELLIGENCE: As per individual dragon
 ALIGNMENT: Evil (any sort)
 SIZE: L (dimensions vary)
 PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil
 Attack/Defense Modes: Nil/Nil
 CHANCE OF:
 Speaking: 100%
 Magic Use: 96%
 Sleeping: 0%
 LEVEL/X.P. VALUE: Varies/As per former dragon type, plus 1000 + 10/hp (if destroyed, along with host)

A dracolich is an undead creature, an unnatural transformation of evil dragonkind by powerful magic known to be practiced only by the mysterious Cult of the Dragon. Like human liches, dracoliches are immune to charm, sleep, enfeeblement, polymorph, cold (magical and natural), electricity, insanity, and death spells or symbols. By the nature of its making, a dracolich is also immune to potions or items of dragon control. Dracoliches can be affected only by magical attack forms (against which they have standard magic resistance, except for the immunities listed), or by monsters with magical properties of six or more hit dice. They cannot be poisoned, paralyzed, or held. They cannot be turned by clerics, and the knowledge of their ability to escape destruction works in dracoliches a transformation from cowardice to confidence; if a dracolich ever triumphs in any battle, from that point on, it is fearless (including immunity to magical fear or psionic attacks causing fear) and cannot be subdued.

A dracolich retains the keen senses (60' infravision, ability to detect hidden or invisible creatures within 1" per age level) it enjoyed in life, but its bodily processes are maintained magically; it need never eat again for sustenance. Most dragons enjoy eating—and a dracolich must eat if it wishes to refuel its breath weapon—but a dracolich never feels weakness, fatigue, or hunger. Attacks upon a dracolich, due to its magical nature, do not gain "to hit" or damage modifiers by type and breath weapon of dragon attacked.

All physical attacks by a dracolich (jaws, claws, and wing or tail buffets, where applicable) do the damage dealt by the dragon in life, plus 2-16 hp chilling damage. Opponents struck who fail to save vs. paralysis will also be paralyzed for 2-12 rounds by the touch of a dracolich. (The victim's immunity to cold damage, temporary or permanent, negates the chilling damage but not the chance of paralysis.) Dracoliches cannot drain life energy levels. They retain the ability to cause fear in opponents (as per the Monstrous Manual) that they had in life; as a lich, the fear they cause is slightly stronger—opponents must save vs. spell against the fear aura at -1 (after all other modifiers are taken into account). The gaze of their glowing eyes can also paralyze creatures within 4"; creatures of either 6th level or above, or 6 hit dice or greater, save at +3. If a creature ever saves against the gaze of a particular dracolich, it is immune to the gaze of that dracolich from then on.

Dracoliches can use any magic available to them in life; once they have acquired a full roster of spells (most are aided in this by the Cult) they can never gain new spells, but never need to study or concentrate to replenish their arsenal. Their magical natures revitalize their spell ability, each spell being replaced 1 day after it is cast. Instead of casting a spell, a dracolich may attempt undead control (as per a potion of undead control) once every three days. Such control, if successful, lasts for one turn only, upon any sort(s) of undead present, and such undead save at -3 vs. the control. Control can be exercised up to 6" distant; undead cannot be summoned by means of this power. While undead control is being exercised, spells cannot be cast. A dracolich cannot drop control of undead and regain it immediately after casting a spell—it must wait three days before any attempt at control will again be successful. Dracoliches without spell-casting ability can use undead control.

Dracoliches can employ their breath weapons only three times a day, as in life. Note that they will teleport (if provided with a means such as a magical ring, by the Cult or through their own acquisition of treasure), or merely leave their bodies behind and flee in spirit-form, to return to the vicinity of the host (often a sword in their own hoard) that contains the essence of their spirit before being reduced to zero hit points; few opponents can destroy a dracolich outright. A dracolich can be destroyed by a power word, kill, or by the destruction of its host at a time when a suitable corpse is not within range for the dragon's spirit to possess.

Dracoliches usually appear as they did in life, except save that their eyes are glowing points of light floating in dark eyesockets. Some few are reported to appear skeletal or semi-skeletal.

In any event, PCs will have to explain all to the Watch to try and clear their names, holding a live Cult member if possible for the Watch to question. (The Watch takes disturbances of the peace seriously in Waterdeep—such can seriously harm trade, and everyone is then the poorer.)

6. The Emerald Dragon Affair

A ship, The Emerald Dragon sinks just outside Waterdeep's harbor in a storm, and all hands are lost. The DM should make this big news in the City, and immediately follow up with rumors that search parties of the Guard employing water breathing and with mermen aiding them have failed to find any trace of the crew—not a corpse—nor of the ship's cargo, which is whispered to have been chests and chests of gems; the sunken ship is empty. A few days later, another rumor should make the rounds: a sailor known to be of The Emerald Dragon's crew has been seen by night, walking down Dock Street by the water's edge.

The PCs will become directly involved in this affair when they are on a street in Waterdeep. They will encounter a closed wagon with a broken wheel; the wagon's driver will ask them, in apparent desperation, to help change the wheel on the wagon, by running off and buying a wheel from any wheelwright they know of; he offers 7 gp to any one who brings him a wheel. Several NPCs will hear the offer and rush off towards the nearest wheelwright; regardless of who comes back with the wheel, they will be paid and the wagon-driver will offer a further 1 gp per person to lift the wagon and hold it up while the old wheel is pulled off and the new one put on. PCs approaching the wagon closely at any point will become aware of a rotting-flesh smell coming from the wagon. If they investigate, they will discover what's inside—if not, the wagon driver will offer 2 gp more to anyone who will guide him to the River Gate. The driver will seem somewhat confused, not entirely "with it", at all times. If a PC does guide him, things will go well until the River Gate is within sight, whereupon the driver, instead of paying the PC this last fee, will turn the wagon into side alley and attempt to strangle him or her. If the PC fights back, the driver will break free and run around into the back of the wagon, and the PC will then discover its contents. The wagon driver, a former sailor of The Emerald Dragon, has no more gold on his person, and will be confused and helpless whenever PCs open the wagon, as he is suddenly released from psionic domination.

Inside the wagon is the creature who has been dominating the sailor, who will attempt to dominate a lone PC, or psionic blast the first PC if several others are present, and try to escape in the wagon. It is a mind flayer, (a prisoner from the ship), who sits on six chests of gems (total amount and value to be determined by the DM—they may all be bloodstones, moonstones, and/or pearls if the value should be kept low in the interests of campaign balance), and the stacked bodies of The Emerald Dragon's slain crew, all of whom have had their brains sucked out. The mind flayer will try to do the same thing to each PC, escaping by probability travel with a chest of gems only if hard-pressed (i.e. by the arrival of lots of Watchmen with mages in support, or by persistent attacks from the PCs). It will attempt to get out of the City with the wagon if possible, if necessary levitating atop a Gate-tower and dominating gate-guards to attack each other, and the sailor or a PC or another citizen to drive the wagon, to do so. (Anyone successfully dominated who is driving the wagon will not be killed for their brain until the illithid finds a better human slave to control.) PCs attacking apparently innocent, dominated citizens—or gate-guards—will not, of course, be very popular with the Watch.

7. The Unmourned Passing of Roungoze Haballanter

This adventure can begin whenever PCs are drinking in a City tavern, except The Bowels of the Earth tavern in Dock Ward.

They will notice a man seated alone in a corner, in robes, drinking wine and reading some notes on two scraps of parchment. His hat and staff are on the table in front of him. If any of the PCs look at him overlong (he certainly looks like a wizard) he will look up and glare at them. If any PC approaches him he will cast a push spell and keep them at bay, glaring but saying nothing. After a time, the tavernmaster will approach him rather nervously and place a small, unlit brass lamp on the table, saying, "Excuse me, good sir—be ye Roungoze Haballanter?" The man will only stare at him, and the tavernmaster will continue, "Because if ye are, then this is yours. A man left it last night, saying ye'd want it when ye came." The man will then nod, curtly, and the tavernmaster will return to the bar. Roungoze will then reach for the lamp. The DM should ensure that PCs are attentive to this, by attracting their attention by the scared white face of the tavernmaster as he passes, or by another means.

The lamp suddenly changes to the small (four-inch-tall) form of a man in robes, who casts a spell at the astonished Roungoze—and Roungoze, arms moving frantically in the casting of a spell, fades slowly away to nothingness—disintegrated. The tiny figure then turns a ring on its finger and vanishes (teleporting away). There will be an uproar, but PCs will notice that Roungoze's hat, staff, and one piece of parchment are still on the table (the other scrap of paper was disintegrated with the unfortunate wizard). The tavernmaster will call for the Watch, who will confiscate everything when they arrive ten rounds later—but in the meantime everyone in the place will examine the table, the wine, and the three items. If PCs detect magic, nothing is magical—but DMs should make them aware that all eyes are upon the items while they (and others) make such examinations. There will be utterly no chance for anyone to pocket, hide, or substitute something for any of the items unobserved.

When the Watch arrive, they will ask for statements from everyone, and if any of the PCs have cast a detect magic, identify, or any other spell, several people will say so, and identify the spell cast by the PC(s) correctly if these are not unique. The Watch will want to know the spell results. The adventure will end there unless the PCs get a look at the surviving page of notes, before or after the Watch arrive. They are in Common, and read as follows:

"Then did I essay the studs down the length of the rod, with most spectacular results. That closest to the bulbous end caused a blade to spring forth from the ball, whilst the handle shortened, and behold! I held a blade such as a fighting-man might wield with pride in bloody battle, and from the faintly-glowing blade burst flames, which ran up and down the steel in a manner most wondrous. The studs had retreated into a recess in the handle, under the grip of the fingers when holding the blade, but the second stud, which is twice the size of the first, could readily be distinguished; and when pushed, the sword-blade vanished back into the ball right speedily, and from it flashed forth yet another blade, broadening to an axe blade, whilst the whole lengthened again to form a battleaxe. I continued in my investigation of the weapon, most careful to try every manner of its employment, several times in peril of my fingers, at the least—and I can state without reservation that the item is indeed a "Rod of Lordly Might," as the mage Dassalar describes it in his Items of the Power Arcane, the standard work on the subject. I have left the rod safely as we agreed, in the bowels of the earth, and collected my fee without demur from your apprentice. I remain, as ever, your willing hireling.

Phloid Shaustrayt, Sage"

Questioning by the Watch will reveal that no one in the tavern knows of either Phloid or Roungoze, and as one man says, ". . . and I know every sage in the City." (DMs should decide beforehand whether he indeed does or not, but the Watch officers will nod in agreement; it should be obvious to the PCs that neither man is a Waterdhavian.)

There is one clue as to the whereabouts of the Rod in the note: the "bowels of the earth" referred to is really The Bowels of the Earth tavern, in Waterdeep's Dock Ward (if the PCs are not familiar with it, it does have a rather rude signboard hanging out over its door, readily visible to any passers-by, and the DM should mention it if the PCs ever pass that way, and see if they make the connection). No one in Waterdeep knows of Phloid Shaustrayt or Roungoze Haballanter, but if the PCs inquire about the mage Dassalar of any Waterdhavian magic user or Palace courtesan or official, they will recall that a sage who owned the only known complete copy of Dassalar's famous book Items of the Power Arcane used to own The Bowels of the Earth tavern, in the docks. A lot of innkeepers and older merchants have heard of Dassalar, and will suggest asking a mage or at the Palace for more information about him.

If the PCs do go to The Bowels of the Earth and use a locate object or physical search to uncover the hidden rod of lordly might, they will discover one of two things, at the DM's option; either the rod will be long gone, someone else having figured things out and got to it first (this is best if the DM thinks PC possession of the rod would unbalance play), or the rod will be there, in an old satchel behind a huge keg in the cellar, with a startled fighter of high level and a ring of spell turning on one finger already with it in his grasp; he will fight his way out if PCs try to take it by force, and will expect trickery if they try to bargain for it. DMs should note that the cellar's confines (20' X 40', with a 5' high ceiling, and dotted with several thick pillars that support the floors above) make it hard for area-effect spells to be cast without endangering the entire building and other party members, hard for many PCs to engage this fighter in physical combat, and easy for the fighter to topple barrels onto, or to reach PCs close enough to see him at all, with the rod or his sword. The cellar has a back way out, connecting to the sewers; if the PCs give chase, the sewer descriptions in Chapter 3 should be consulted.

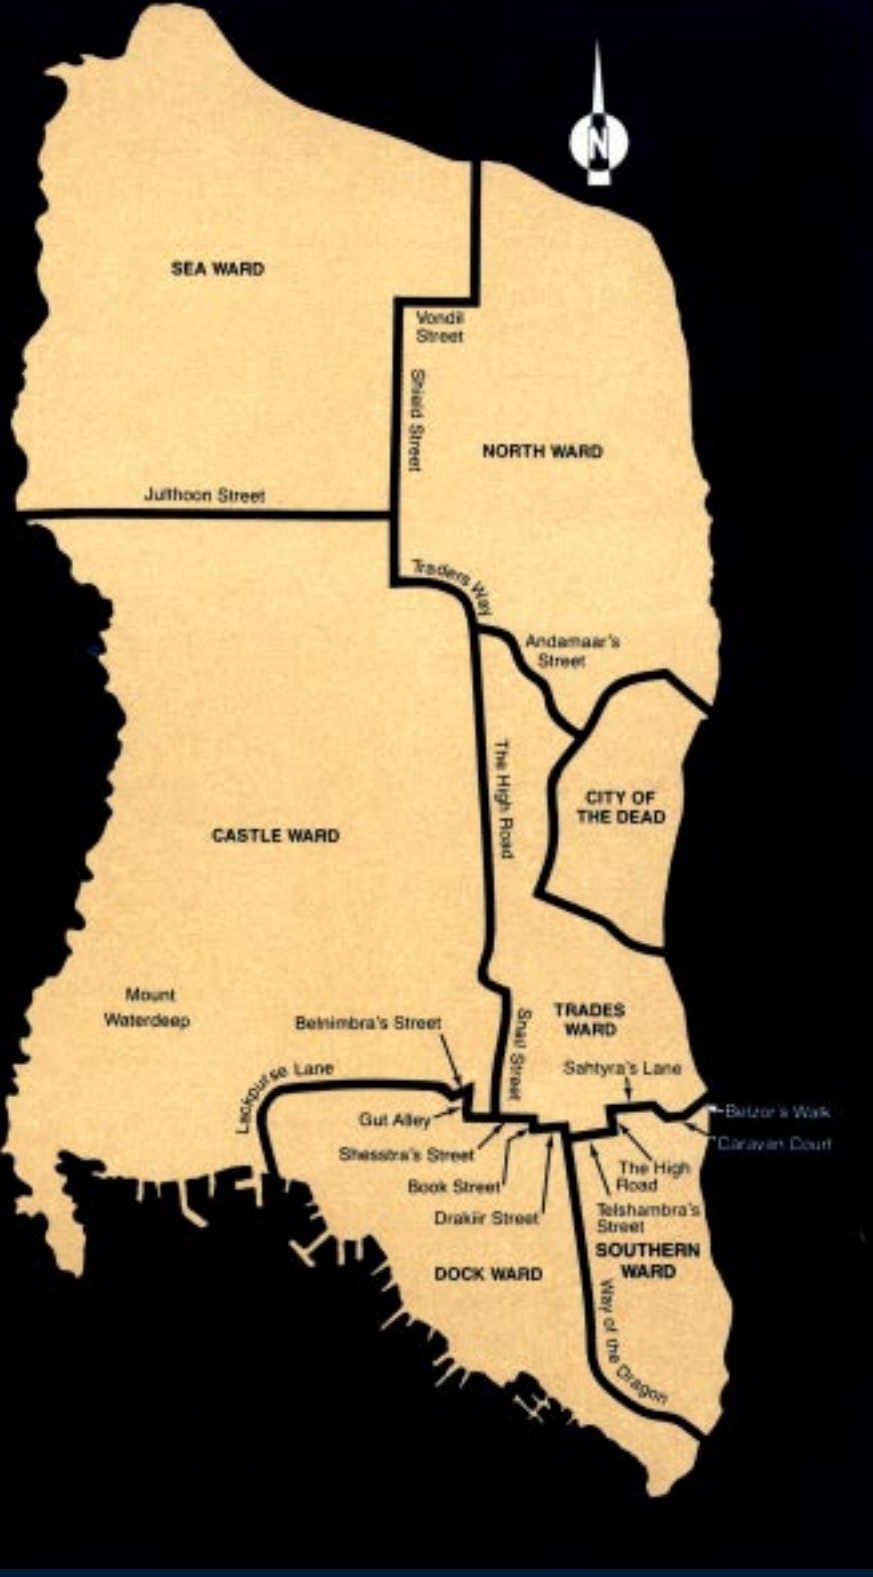

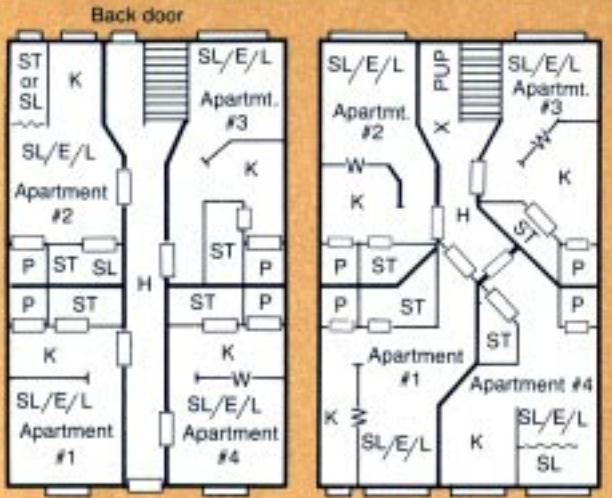

KNOWN SEWERS OF WATERDEEP

-  Primary Passage
-  Secondary Passage
-  Grating
-  Unlockable Grating
-  Shaft to Surface
-  Junction Room
(typically 10'x10' stone-walled cubicle, 20' high, with a sitting ledge near the ceiling)
-  Junction Room with Shaft to Surface

Selected Representative Floorplans for buildings Waterdeep

DMs must adjust the precise dimensions of the rooms depicted in these plans, and alter the

CITY WARDS OF WATERDEEP

This map depicts the boundaries of the seven districts of the present City. Many of its distances and proportions have been distorted for clarity; it is not to scale. DMs should note that Watch patrols ignore ward boundaries while actually on duty, but there are separate on-duty Watch officers in overall command of each ward. This map is also helpful as an aid to finding specific City addresses given in the text.

positions (or presence) of doors and windows, to fit the known exterior and purposes of each building. Ground floor windows are usually barred. To avoid a "sameness" contributing to boredom and too easy unlawful, undetected PC entry and egress, DMs must vary floorplan elements; use these examples as guides only.

WATERDEEP— City of Splendors

Northgate

Farwatch Tower

North Trollwall

Imma Street

Horn Street

Tower Street

143

142

141

124

140

123

7

102

101

139

122

121

103

101

100

152

101

120

116

100

100

Endcliff Tower

The Cliff Watch

Nindabar Street

Zenduth Street

Ussilbran Street

Mhalsymer's Way

Galthoon Street

Golden Serpent Street

Summarin's St

Brondar's Way

Vhezoar Street

Izantil Street

Tarnath Street

Suldown Street

Andamar's Street

Spindle St

The High Road

The Street of Bells

Copper Street

The Street of the Sword

The River Gate

Guardtower

Wall Street

The High Road

The Way of the Dragon

Virgin's Square

Book Street

Slut Street

Snail Street

Snail Street

Ship Street

Waterdeep

Dock

Rollwall

The South Gate

Waymoot

East Torch Tower

Waterbreak

Inner Fort

Sea Stacks

9213XXX0701

WATER

City of S

WATERDEEP splendors

Great Harbor

The Sea

Deepwater Isle

Outer Fort

Smugglers
Bane Tower

Stormhaven Island

Advanced Dungeons & Dragons®

Official Game Accessory

Waterdeep and the North

by Ed Greenwood

The North...rugged mountains and dense forests, which hide many beings hostile to man (who has settled here but lightly). Many dungeons and ruins also lie hidden in the Northern wastes, relics of the former splendor of the dwarven kingdoms, now lost and abandoned, and of earlier, fallen kingdoms of men.

Waterdeep...crossroads of the world, City of Splendors. Here are wealth and goods from every corner of the Realms, intrigue and feuds and important personages of rank and influence. From the many-spired towers of Piergeiron's Palace to the littered alleys of "the Docks," this book introduces you to the living, ever-changing city of Waterdeep, and suggests many adventures therein.

Partake of the sights, the bustle, and the intrigue—rub shoulders with the powerful and famous—feast your eyes on fabled treasures. Hear tales in the taverns such as can be heard nowhere else in all the world—but keep your weapons ready and your wits sharp. Oh, and above all... enjoy your stay.

©1987 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

Printed in the U.S.A.

TSR Inc.
POB 756
Lake Geneva,
WI 53147

TSR UK Ltd.
The Mill, Rathmore Road
Cambridge CB14AD
United Kingdom

ISBN 0-88038-490-5

Official Game Accessory

Moonshae

by Douglas Niles

An Accessory for Characters of All Levels
for use with the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

©1991 TSR, Inc.

TSR, Inc.
PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION™

Moonshae

by Douglas Niles

Credits:

Editing: Mike Breault	Cartography: Dave S. LaForce
Cover Art: Tim Hildebrandt	Typography: Kim Janke
Interior Art: George Barr	Keylining: Stephanie Tabat

Acknowledgements:

I would like to thank Graeme Morris, Jim Bambra, and Phil Gallagher for their ideas and input as the islands were beginning to take shape.

The Korinn Archipelago was created by Aaron Allston and is detailed in module N4, Treasure Hunt.

TSR, Inc.
POB 756
Lake Geneva,
WI 53147 USA

TSR UK Ltd.
The Mill, Rathmore Road
Cambridge CB1 4AD
United Kingdom

ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS, AD&D, BATTLESYSTEM, FORGOTTEN REALMS, PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION, and the TSR logo are trademarks owned by TSR, Inc.

Distributed to the book trade in the United States by Random House, Inc. and in Canada by Random House of Canada, Ltd. Distributed to the toy and hobby trade by regional distributors. Distributed in the United Kingdom by TSR UK Ltd.

This material is protected under the copyright laws of the United States of America. Any reproduction or unauthorized use of the material or artwork presented herein is prohibited without the express written permission of TSR, Inc.

©1987 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved. Printed in U.S.A.

ISBN 0-88038-494-8
$7.95 US
9217

9217XXX1501

© 1911 HOBBS, LYNN

Table of Contents

Introduction	4
Moonshae Overview	7
Character Races of the Moonshaes	7
Character Classes of the Moonshaes	7
Character Levels	9
Common Conflicts	9
Economies of the Moonshaes	12
Moonshae Climate	12
Moonshae Topography	15
Wildlife of the Moonshaes	19
Deities of the Moonshaes	21
The Goddess	21
The Children	23
Kazgoroth the Beast	27
Specific Locales of the Moonshaes	31
Callidyrr	32
Corwell	34
Moray	39
Snowdown	42
Norland..	44
Norheim	46
Oman	48
Gnarhelm	50
Korinn Archipelago	53
Myrloch Vale	54
Synnoria	56
Flamsterd	58
Appendices	60
Using the Moonshaes	60
Magical Items of the Moonshaes	61

INTRODUCTION

The goddess has been in the Moonshaes for many centuries—since before the coming of the humans or even the Llewyr. Alone, she nurtured and cared for the isles, seeing them green and verdant through the summers, white and slumbering through the long winters.

She watched her body, the land, change with the passing of years, yet so slowly that it always seemed to remain the same from year to year. She gave birth to lakes and low marshes became grassy fields. Mountains slipped slowly, eroding into the valleys below, while rivers grew in size, becoming more placid with the years. Occasionally a river would change its course, racing eagerly along a new path until the passing of the centuries pacified its turbulent ways.

The goddess could see the isles through the Moonwells, windows she created in the land. Each Moon well was a clear, placid pool of cool water that lay in a secluded grove or remote mountain glen. Through the Moonwells, the goddess watched her world take shape, and she watched it grow and change.

And finally, she watched the coming of life to her world.

She remembers times, long past, when the only creatures upon the isles were her children. The great leviathan was the first of her offspring to come upon the shores of the Moonshaes, its great, gray back breaking the surface of the Sea of Moonshae like a freshly rising island, as broad and solid as a small land mass. For many years, the spuming cloud of the leviathan's breath was the only sign of animal life along the gravelly shores and deep firths of the islands' rugged shorelines.

Then came the unicorn, Kamerynn, whose snowy mane flashed through the fields and glens of the isles. The mighty creature lived first on Gwynneth, but then on Alaron, Moray, and other islands until finally it had dwelled upon all of the isles. Legends say that the offspring of the unicorn, the horses, roam all of the Moonshaes because of the wanderings of their ancestor above all, and the first two of her children were peaceful, nonthreatening creatures. To balance them, the goddess gave birth to her third child—the youngest and deadliest of her brood. The goddess brought forth onto the Moonshaes the Pack, the congregation of wolves whose hunting song would strike terror into the hearts of lesser creatures, and whose cruel jaws would end the lives of many a helpless doe and unwary rabbit.

But the goddess required Balance

For the Balance demanded that life be countered by death. And so the Pack roamed the Moonshaes, wild, singing, and free, as the goddess's agents of death.

As time passed, more and more animals arrived to populate the rugged, yet peaceful isles. The most serious threats to the land were the winter storms that swept off of the Trackless Sea, scouring the weak and the frail from the islands, leaving the strong to multiply and prosper. Thus, even the storms played their role in maintaining the Balance.

Then one day the Llewyr arrived. The elvenfolk came over the sea, perhaps interrupted in some mysterious journey toward places even farther west. They claimed the Moonshaes as their own. They lost touch with their kin throughout the Realms, and passed peaceful centuries of pastoral solitude.

Later came the dwarves—mysterious folk who seemed to sprout from the ground itself, for the goddess does not recall their arrival. They lived in peace with the Llewyr, for the dwarves shunned most of the surface world. Those places they inhabited were barren and rocky—terrain the Llewyr had no wish to populate.

And then, in the heart of a cruel winter, the Moonshaes felt the first heavy tread of the beast.

The mother knew not whether it emerged from the storm-tossed sea or from the depths of some seething ocean of lava far beneath her skin. She knew only that the monster stalked the land with foul purpose, grievously threatening the Balance.

The children of the goddess, and the animals, and the Llewyr and the dwarves, fought the Beast as best they could, holding its dark force at bay. The Beast could not be defeated, but neither could its might grow such that it would overcome the goddess. Thus, the Balance was maintained.

The Beast called its own followers who rose, dripping, from the sea to crawl forth on land. The firbolgs claimed the Moonshaes as their own, ruthlessly slaying any who stood in their way. The ugly giants gradually took to the land, forgetting their origins in the sea, and spread across the Moonshaes with relentless strength.

The dwarves and the Llewyr marshalled their forces to stand against the threat of the giants and the Beast. For many decades, war wracked the isles, but finally the firbolgs were driven in to small corners of the isles, where they were carefully watched by the protectors of the Balance.

For centuries this remained the way of the Moonshaes. Little changed, for the Llewyr and the firbolgs were not builders, and the work of the dwarves progressed mainly underground. And thus it might have remained for all time, but for the coming of man.

The first humans arrived from the south, sailing slow but seaworthy coracles from an unknown land. These men fled a mighty foe and erected fortresses and palisades to protect themselves. But whatever they feared, it did not pursue them here.

More and more of the men arrived, soon claiming most of the large isle of Alaron as their own. Grudgingly, the Llewyr moved aside, withdrawing to the wilder reaches of the isles. But it seemed that the human arrivals would never stop, as word spread of a place where none need fear the tyrants' boot or the evil sorcerers' spell.

The people who came to the Moonshaes called themselves just that: the People or in the language of the isles, "the Ffolk." The Ffolk prospered, and their cities grew. They spread to Gwynneth, to Moray and Snowdown, and—in lesser numbers—to the more barren isles of Norheim and Norland.

With the Ffolk came the halflings, for the little people dwell in the Realms wherever they can find human targets for their mercantile dealings. The human and halfling habitations drove the Llewyr far into the wilds of the isles, as the elvenfolk shunned contact with these shorter-lived and aggressive newcomers.

The Ffolk soon claimed all the isles as their own—not as a united people, but as an assortment of small, bickering kingdoms. They waged petty wars, seeking more to annoy than destroy. Slowly, the large islands of Alaron and Gwynneth became focal points of power, though three or four separate kingdoms on each still vied for ultimate authority.

As the dramas of humans, Llewyr, and other lesser creatures unfolded across the stage of the Moonshaes, the Beast slept. The vigilance of the goddess waned, as she relished the flourishing of life upon her body.

And slowly the Beast awakened, surreptitiously sapping power from the goddess through a Moonwell. When it was ready, the Beast took a name, and walked again upon the land.

Its name was Kazgoroth.

Now the Beast walked the land with death as its purpose. It slew relentlessly, indiscriminately. It thrived and grew as it killed. And it drove the Ffolk together to fight against it.

A king arose from the kingdom of the Callidyrr on the isle of Alaron: Cymrych Hugh. With the blessings of the goddess and a sword forged for him by the finest of dwarven craftsmen, Cymrych Hugh faced Kazgoroth. The might of the sword and the king drove the Beast back to the darkened recesses of its home, badly wounded but not killed. There it would remain for many centuries.

Cymrych Hugh united the Ffolk of the Moonshaes into one kingdom for the first time. He erected a mighty citadel at his home—Caer Callidyrr; it became fabled throughout the Forgotten

Realms.

For a time the Moonshaes saw peace and prosperity as the realm of Cymrych Hugh and his descendents held the Ffolk together. Gradually, with the passing of generations, the memory of the first High King dimmed, and the strong bonds uniting the Ffolk began to fray. Soon, the islands were once again a collection of small kingdoms waging petty wars.

These bickering kingdoms were easy prey to the savage onslaught of the northmen, the yellow-bearded warriors who sailed from Waterdeep to seek new lands to the west. The longships landed first along the Norheim Isles, taking tribute from the tiny kingdoms of the Ffolk they found there. Next Norland and then Oman and Moray shuddered under the attacks of the raiders.

But the northmen quickly tired of raiding and chose to settle. They claimed the isles of the north as their own; the divided kingdoms of the Ffolk could not gather to resist. As time passed, the northmen became more powerful and conquered more of the islands. If the tide is not reversed, the years of the Ffolk's reign upon the Moonshaes are drawing to an end.

Clerics have arrived among the Ffolk, preaching of the new gods—the gods worshiped in Waterdeep, Calimshan, and Thay. These clerics have not eliminated the faith of the Ffolk in their goddess, but they have raised doubts.

The goddess can now feel her strength waning, and she knows that her life has become bound into the life of the Ffolk.

And again the Beast has begun to stir

MOONSHAE OVERVIEW

The Moonshae Isles are alive with AD&D® game campaign opportunities. Characters of virtually all the standard classes and levels can find adventure and challenge in some part of the islands.

CHARACTER RACES OF THE MOONSHAES

Many of the common character races of the AD&D game are native to the Moonshae Isles. These are listed here, with a brief introduction to their Moonshae characteristics. Players who wish to use characters of other races may of course do so, subject to DM approval, but those characters will hail from other parts of the Forgotten Realms.

Humans

Two major human societies populate the isles of the Moonshaes. The original human inhabitants of the islands are the Ffolk. The later arrivals are the more war-like northmen.

The Ffolk are organized into a number of small kingdoms, loosely collected under the leadership of a High King. The High King is more of a figurehead than a true ruler, however. The Ffolk are primarily an agricultural society, though they can fight savagely when called on to defend their homes.

The northmen scorn agriculture in favor of raiding and making war. They have wrested much of the northern Moonshaes from the hands of the Ffolk. The remaining kingdoms of the Ffolk are the favored raiding targets of the northmen, but their adventures also carry them to the Sword Coast, and occasionally as far south as Calimshan.

Elves

The race of elves living on the Moonshaes is the Llewyr. Once the dominant race on the isles, the Llewyr now claim only small and remote portions of Gwynneth and Alaron as theirs. The Llewyr are very similar to High Elves.

Dwarves

Like that of the Llewyr, the dwarven culture on the Moonshaes goes back a long way. These stocky and war-like demihumans have also been driven into small holdings on the isles. More numerous than the Llewyr, the dwarves love their privacy and vigorously defend their lands against any further human encroachment.

Halflings

Of all the demihumans, the halflings have adapted most easily to human domination of the Moonshaes. Halfling communities are located beside most major communities of the Ffolk; some halfling towns can be found near the strongholds of the northmen. The halflings thrive on the trade with their human neighbors and welcome the security provided by nearby castles.

CHARACTER CLASSES OF THE MOONSHAES

Among the Ffolk, bards and druids are highly respected and are subject to some unique rules. Fighters, thieves, magic-users, and clerics can be members of any of the societies on the islands, subject to the usual race restrictions.

And of course, visitors to the isles are common enough that any other kind of character race or class could quite reasonably be found here.

Druids

Druids are common on each of the isles inhabited by the Ffolk. There is a Great Druid on each of Gwynneth, Alaron, and Moray.

Druids generally show an aptitude for their calling very early in life. As druids are highly regarded in the culture of the Ffolk, parents encourage children to develop their inherent talent. The ranks of the druids are thus assured a steady supply of fresh initiates.

Each druid is assigned a certain portion of one of the isles as his territory. At the center of the druid's territory is his druidic grove. The grove might be a cluster of pine or aspen trees, but most often contains aged oaks, weather-beaten and gnarled forest giants that have withstood a hundred or more savage winters.

In some high locations, or upon the barren isles on the northern fringes of the Moonshaes, the druidic grove is no more than a scraggly circle of stumpy pine trees. These trees might be two hundred years and yet be barely as tall as a man. Regardless of the type of trees, every druid has his own grove.

Druids of 12th level and above receive a particularly enchanted grove to guard—one with a Moonwell at its heart. These groves are the most sacred locations in the world to the Ffolk. The druids take their custodianship very seriously indeed. Any druid would sacrifice his life to preserve the sanctity of a Moonwell.

Each of the largest isles, Gwynneth, Alaron, Moray, and Norland, has a central Moonwell of special import to the druids. Stone monoliths with cross-pieces form rings of arches around these Moonwells.

These special Moonwells lie at the hearts of the groves of the Great Druids. Those upon Gwynneth, Alaron, and Moray remain bright and hallowed places, for those islands are under the control of the Ffolk. Upon Norland, however, the arches have fallen into wreckage and the waters of the Moonwell lie stagnant and green. Here the northmen have driven the Ffolk and the druids from the land, so there are none to tend the well. Thus the goddess's sight grows dim, and she loses her vision of the world.

Clerics

Clerics of the Forgotten Realms have traveled to the Moonshaes to spread the word of their various religions. This is not an easy task among the Ffolk, who regard the goddess, as she is presented by the druids, to be the supreme deity. Even the clerics of Silvanus, patron god of the druids, find themselves constantly striving against the centuries-old tradition of distrust toward clerics.

The northmen have clerics of Tempus, toward whom they turn for spiritual leadership. Occasionally, a cleric of Malar will gain a following among the more radical factions of the northmen. Religious conflicts among the northmen are rare, however, since they generally work out their aggressive urges on the Ffolk.

Clerics of Azuth, Deneir, and Lathander are commonly encountered among both the Ffolk and the northmen; generally these clerics have gathered a small congregation of converts. These clerics commonly hail from Waterdeep, Amn, and other, even more distant reaches of the Realms.

The goddess herself is an aspect of the goddess Chauntea but, at least on the Moonshaes, she spurns the worship of clerics, preferring the exclusive attention of her druids. The mortal enemy of the goddess, the beast Kazgoroth, is an aspect of the god Malar.

Bards

Bards are the favored sons of the Ffolk. They are given the same regard as most kings of the Ffolk. The bards of the Ffolk serve many functions: historians, entertainers, poets, heroes, and spies.

A bard is either a Greater Bard or a Lesser Bard. A Lesser Bard is any bard who has not acquired one of the instruments of the bards. A Greater Bard must have acquired one of these instruments, of which three are known on the Moonshaes, and must be of 11th level or higher.

The Lesser Bards serve generally as traveling entertainers, singing at fairs and feasts in exchange for a warm place to sleep and a meal. They move about continuously, visiting all the lands of the Ffolk, the nations of the northmen, and even countries beyond the Moonshaes. These bards write ballads and ditties about their adventures, incorporating the people they have met and the sights they have seen.

The Greater Bards, of which there are no more than three at any given time, are the poets laureate of the Ffolk. The ballads of the Greater Bards are sung and recorded by all the bards of the land. These lyrics weave the history of the Ffolk.

The Greater Bards are much sought after by the kings and lords of the Ffolk. A ruler who has a Greater Bard play at one of his festivals or feasts is accorded great honor. Greater Bards do not travel as much as the Lesser Bards, preferring to enjoy the comforts of Caer Callidyrr during the long winters. A Greater Bard will occasionally serve as a messenger for the High King on a errand of considerable importance. Often the Greater Bard recommends a Lesser Bard to travel in his place should he elect to decline the assignment.

Magic-Users

Magic-users are held in suspicion by most of the people of the Moonshaes. This accounts for the scarcity of magic-users here. A careless mage who gets identified in a rural community of either the Ffolk or the northmen may find this to be the last mistake he ever makes.

In two places on the Moonshae Isles, however, practitioners of magic are more likely to be encountered. Sitting upon the council of mages, ostensibly serving the High King of the Ffolk, are 13 magic-users of medium to high level. These sorcerers are practically autonomous in actuality, and each controls a small part of Callidyrr. Each also has several students and apprentices of 6th level or lower, so the actual number of magic-users in this area is at least 50.

And upon the isle of Flamsterd, to the south of Gwynneth, is a land where no mage need fear persecution. For this is the domain of the great wizard Flamsterd, who left Waterdeep in search of lonelier pastures. The island of Flamsterd is essentially a mageocracy, though the wizard himself would scoff at the notion that he rules here. Still, there is no other government body, and the island never seems to suffer the landfall of a northman raiding party.

Flamsterd has opened his island as a refuge and place of study for all young mages. Flamsterd has perhaps the highest concentration of magic-users of any area in the Forgotten Realms.

Thieves

Thieves will find it hard going among the people of the Moonshaes. The Ffolk tend to severely punish those caught stealing, with death a common punishment. The northmen regard stealing from others as a way of life, but one who is caught stealing from them is certainly killed.

There are thus no thieves guilds in any of the cities of the Moonshaes, except perhaps as briefly established by some venturesome individual. Invariably, the guild only lasts as long as the leader goes unpunished—never more than a few years.

Some thieves have been known to band together in isolated sections of wilderness, functioning essentially as bandits, although with skillful use of spies and decoys planted among their target communities.

Since many of the thieves that have practiced their trade upon the Moonshaes have come from foreign lands, there is a certain mistrust of foreigners inherent in both the Ffolk and northman cultures. Thus thieves who differ physically from the local populace will have a very difficult time avoiding notice.

Fighters

This most common of classes finds plenty of representatives among the Moonshae peoples. Nearly all adult male northmen are fighters; a few are rangers. Among the Ffolk, a much smaller percentage of adults, both men and women, are practiced in the combat arts. A high proportion of these, however, are rangers, paladins, and cavaliers.

Fighters of the northmen prefer the battle axe or hand axe for melee combat, though swords, short bows, spears, and hammers are not uncommon. Fighters of the Ffolk almost always wield the sword in melee; many are skilled in the use of the powerful long bow.

Some fighters of the northmen (20% chance per individual) have the ability to drive themselves into a berserker frenzy in battle. Warriors who demonstrate this aptitude are often gathered by their king into a royal bodyguard or a unit of elite soldiers. The fighters can bring on the berserker rage simply by contemplating imminent combat, or in response to a surprise attack.

Berserker northmen receive a +2 bonus to hit and need never check morale. For BATTLESYSTEM™ rules purposes, they have a discipline of 0. If a player wishes to avoid having his northmen warriors consumed by the berserker rage, he can make a morale check before the fighters go berserk. This check suffers a -2 penalty, but if it succeeds the northmen do not become berserk during that fight.

Warriors of both the Ffolk and the northmen occasionally fight on horseback, but most prefer foot combat. The Ffolk of Alaron also employ a small battle chariot, well suited to the smooth and grassy terrain of that isle.

CHARACTER LEVELS

The Moonshaes can serve as a setting for campaigns at all levels. Low-level adventuring is possible throughout the isles; this can involve explorations of ancient ruins and dungeons, interaction with other societies on the islands, town and village adventuring, wilderness and maritime adventures, or raids on monster holdings.

Mid-level adventures can of course include all of the above. The firbolgs that populate many of the isles are challenging adversaries for mid-level characters. Mid-level characters can also get involved in trading, perhaps as caravan or convoy guards, as well as small-scale military activities. The characters and story in the novel, Darkwalker on Moonshae, provide some ideas for mid-level adventuring on the Moonshae islands.

High-level characters will find themselves right at home with the isle's rulers. The Moonshaes have many kings, and a large number of petty lords, all of whom could interact in a high-level game. Military adventures, perhaps including an occasional BATTLESYSTEM™ scenario, could easily be worked into the overall campaign situation. The next Moonshae novel (to be released in April of 1988), Black Wizards, presents some examples of high-level campaign possibilities in the Moonshae islands.

As in any game, the key is not so much to establish PCs of the levels you want to fit into the world, but in creating tough, but not too tough, challenges for whatever levels and abilities your players have.

COMMON CONFLICTS

A number of ongoing conflicts can serve as a backdrop to your Moonshae campaign. These can also provide the major adversaries for your PCs.

Northmen vs. The Ffolk

The raids of the northmen have gradually become oriented toward conquest, and the kingdoms of the Ffolk have succumbed one after the other to the enemy longships. Now that the threat has been realized, it is nearly too late.

Whether you want to use this conflict to create an isolated threat to your PCs, or to make it the centerpiece of your campaign, the rivalry between these two cultures should be present in any Moonshae setting.

The raiders generally embark in summer to plunder and raid the kingdoms of the Ffolk, or to range farther afield and strike targets along the Sword Coast. Often several kingdoms of northmen unite to stage a massive raid.

If the attack succeeds in driving the Ffolk from their homes, the northmen are likely to move in and settle a region, bringing their families, livestock, and other possessions by longship before winter sets in.

Firbolgs vs. Humans

The firbolgs are the scourge of the remote areas of the Moonshaes. Huge, ugly, and mean, these monsters are prone to attack anything that is not of their race.

Fortunately for the other inhabitants of the isles, the firbolgs rarely leave their remote domains. This makes them primarily a threat to those who venture to explore these areas.

The firbolgs do, however, occasionally muster a large force and venture into civilized areas for raiding and plunder. These outings consist mainly of slaughter and destruction as the firbolgs are not much inclined to stealing or enslaving. A raiding party of firbolgs is something all sensible characters try to avoid, or at the very least, challenge only with a sizeable force.

Clerics vs. Druids

The clerics from the Sword Coast strive mightily to bring word of their gods to the Ffolk of the Moonshaes. The Ffolk, steeped in their traditional worship of the goddess as the earthmother and guarded jealously by the druidic councils, tend to resist this conversion.

This conflict is primarily a peaceful one—it is not uncommon for a community of Ffolk to include one or two clerics, while most of the populace still pay their respects at the druidic grove nearby. Occasionally, however, violent disputes flare up—the followers of some of the more war-like gods have been known to torch a grove, driving its druids into a religious frenzy.

The druids are not without recourse. Many a worship service of the new gods has been disrupted by the sudden appearance of spiders, rats, or bats—creatures summoned by the druids to invade a temple and scatter the congregation.

POLITICAL CONTROL OF THE MOONSHAE

While the healing powers of the clerics cannot be denied, and their wisdom is great, the druids retain control of the Moonwells. Through these pools their link with their goddess remains strong. The conversion of the Ffolk, if it is ever successful, will take many more decades, perhaps even centuries.

Interkingdom Squabbles

Many small kingdoms are scattered across the isles, both those of the Ffolk and of the northmen. Even among rulers of the same culture, rivalries and wars are not uncommon.

These political conflicts have the potential to spread over several isles as each participant gathers allies to his banner. On the other hand, if a strong ruler can succeed in bringing several weaker rulers under his protection and leadership, the end result could be a more peaceful and united nation for all concerned.

Because of the relative balance of power between the various kingdoms, however, most of these petty wars are not resolved with any clear victor. The result is that grudges are carried, wounds grow deeper with time, and even people of the same culture find themselves inexorably drifting farther from their neighbors.

Magic-Users vs. The People

Neither the northmen nor the Ffolk readily accept the presence of magic in their societies. Both cultures are highly superstitious, taught that arcane power is a tool of the gods and their agents. The people tend to view wizards as untrustworthy, if not downright evil.

The primary magic-users of the Ffolk serve on a council for the High King, at Caer Callidyrr. While ostensibly under the High King's control, the mages in reality practice their arts for their own ends, allowing the High King just enough control to convince him that things are not getting out of hand.

These wizards are a patient bunch, and are content to watch the forces of society at work, only prodding these forces occasionally to move them in a desired direction.

The Ffolk, by and large, are suspicious and fearful of the council. It is the fear that gives the High King useful leverage in retaining his post as the mightiest king among the Ffolk. However, the mages are notoriously fickle about helping the High King extend his domination over the rest of the Ffolk.

Wizards are uncommon among the northmen and generally persecuted when they are found. It is not unusual for a king of the northmen to enlist the aid of a sorcerer—there are many things that a spell can accomplish, after all—while keeping it a secret even from his own people.

External Cultures vs. The Moonshaes

Because of their isolated location, the Moonshaes do not suffer a lot of interference from nations on the mainland. Only occasionally do men from Calimshan, Tethyr, Amn, or Waterdeep visit the Moonshaes.

Sometimes a group from one of these nations lands at a kingdom of the Ffolk or the northmen and conducts several days of trading while agents secretly reconnoiter the local town or fortress. Then, a day or two after the visitors leave, a boat puts several thieves ashore in the dead of night. These skulk their way into the targeted areas, steal whatever is valuable and not nailed down (including attractive young women), and slip back to their ship to be gone before sunrise.

Monsters vs. Humans

Certain parts of the Moonshaes are home to vicious tribes of orcs and goblins. These humanoids are commonly found in the northern reaches of the isles—most notably in the Korinn Archipelago, as detailed in module N5, Treasure Hunt. Smaller groups of these monsters inhabit some of the other islands, and often a tiny and remote islet is populated exclusively by orcs or goblins. These humanoids also dwell in some of the mountainous regions, occupying huge underground caverns and dungeon complexes that they have stolen from the dwarves or excavated with slave labor.

Trolls present another common threat throughout the islands, including marine trolls (scrags) that have the advantage of retreating back to the sea after their terrifying raids. Dreaded sahuagin also occasionally emerge from the sea to terrorize and kill the peoples of the coastal communities.

Other monsters rarely plague the civilized portions of the isles. Wyverns and perytons fly over remote wild places, striking without warning if they sight a victim below. Norland and Moray reputedly shelter a few of the largest rocs ever known, though no one has actually seen these massive birds. Lizard men inhabit some of the darkest and dankest marsh and swamp reaches.

An entire assortment of horrifying monsters can be encountered in remote areas of the isles, including, but not limited to, beholders, lycanthropes, giant centipedes, ropers, shambling mounds, giant weasels, dire wolves, giant leeches, poisonous toads, harpies, water weirds, and giant snapping turtles.

The section on Moonshae topography lists a sampling of the types of encounters, including monster encounters, that characters can run into in the various terrain types on the island. These lists are not intended to be all-inclusive; feel free to change the lists as necessary to fit your campaign.

ECONOMIES OF THE MOONSHAES

While each Moonshae kingdom is relatively self-sufficient, a certain amount of trading nonetheless serves to supply goods that a particular nation does not produce. This trading occurs via overland transport between kingdoms on the same island, and overseas trading of goods between the various islands and the lands along the Sword Coast. Trading partners of the Moonshae kingdoms include Calimshan, Amn, Tethyr, and Waterdeep.

The economic map (on page 13) shows the most common trading routes to and from the Moonshaes, as well as the most common products of the productive parts of the islands. Each route is detailed below, with a listing of the daily probability of a ship being encountered along the route, as well as descriptions of the probable vessel types and cargoes.

If the PCs are traveling along a route, they will only encounter vessels traveling in the opposite direction; those going the same way remain ahead of or behind the PCs' ship.

The probability listed for each area applies only to summer. The probabilities should be reduced in half during spring and autumn and drop to zero during the winter months,

Route A: Callidyrr To Waterdeep

This is one of the most active trading routes into the Moonshaes, since Caer Callidyrr is the largest and most accessible port on the islands.

The route takes approximately 8 days, given average winds and a reasonably fast boat, when traveling from Callidyrr to Waterdeep. The current, which flows northward, lengthens the return trip to 10 or 11 days. From Waterdeep, encountered vessels are likely to be longships of the northmen that have embarked on trading missions. The northmen may offer spice, oil, or cloth in exchange for the fine steel of the Ffolk.

Route B: Callidyrr To Calimport

This searoad leads from the High King's city to exotic Calimport, site of the Pasha's palace. Imports from Calimshan include silks and other fine fabrics, spices, parchment, and horses. These goods are carried in high-decked galleons, slow-moving but relatively unsinkable ships that are common all along the Sword Coast.

From Callidyrr, the Calishites trade for weapons and the metal to make them, furs, and timber. The tall pine forests of the Moonshae heartland are the only nearby source for the timbers needed to build masts for the huge galleons.

Route C: North Kingdoms To Waterdeep

The ports and fortress cities of Rotesheim, Norheim, Iron Bay, and Gnarhelm provide the major stopping points to the lands of the northmen. From here, longships strike northward to the distant port of Waterdeep, and the nearer isles of Ruathym.

The trip to Waterdeep requires about 8 days when sailing north, 10 days when sailing south. From the Moonshaes, the northmen send slaves and weapons of the Ffolk that they have gained through combat or trade. In return, the northmen receive the amenities of life from more civilized lands—oil, gold, woven cloth, and exotic liquors.

Route D: Callidyrr To Sea of Moonshae

This route avoids the swells of the high seas, providing safe passage for even the clumsy coracles of the Ffolk. The journey from Caer Callidyrr takes about 12 days in good weather; storms sometimes double this time.

From Callidyrr, the armorsmiths of the High King export weapons of fine quality. In return, the Kingdom of Corwell sends ales, livestock such as sheep and horses, and able-bodied workers.

The kingdom of Moray receives the same products, sending in turn coal and iron ore to the forges of the High King.

Route E: Corwell/Moray To Calimshan

This route is an alternate passage used by the Calishites when trading with the Ffolk and the northmen. Although it takes an extra week for the journey, whether sailing north or south, the searoad is used to carry the same types of goods as are taken to Callidyrr.

Route F: Callidyrr To Mintarn

This route leads to the island of Mintarn off the Sword Coast. The shipbuilders of Mintarn have long since exhausted the timber upon their now-barren island, but they still pride themselves on their work. They have now turned to the vast forests of the Moonshaes for raw material.

A crew of shipwrights will book passage to Callidyrr, where they will spend a year building a ship. They then load the vessel with enough timber for a second ship, and sail the vessel and its cargo to Mintarn. They build the second ship, sell both to any of a dozen buyers along the Sword Coast, and sail back to Callidyrr to start again.

MOONSHAE CLIMATE

The climate of the Moonshae Islands provides much of the atmosphere of this game setting, so it deserves to be given careful consideration. A DM may simply use the following procedures as a guide, making up for himself the weather on each given day of the adventure. This can become an important story consideration; many an adventure should reach its thrilling climax in the midst of a raging thunderstorm or crashing gale.

Alternatively, procedures exist that will enable the DM to determine, randomly and relatively quickly, the weath-

ECONOMIC MAP

⊗	Mines
▲	Agriculture
➤	Fishing Grounds
—	Trade Routes

er at any given time. For those players who wish to use the very detailed system from the Wilderness Survival Guide to determine weather in the Moonshaes, consider the islands to be a Subarctic Clime.

The climate of the Moonshaes can best be described as severe, especially during the long winter months. Each month is described separately in the following text, with probabilities for various types of weather listed. Whenever the weather can be an important part of an adventure, check on a daily basis.

The Average Daily Temperature for a month can fluctuate wildly. To get a range for game purposes, roll 2d6. If the result is 7, the temperature falls right into the range for a given day. Higher numbers mean higher than average temperatures; lower numbers mean the opposite. Thus, a 12 would mean abnormally warm temperatures on a given day, while a 2 would mean unusually cold weather.

If you need an exact temperature, take the difference between the number rolled and 7 and multiply it by 5 to determine the variance from the normal temperature. For example, if the roll is an 11, the difference between 11 and 7 is +4, multiplied by 5 to get +20. Therefore this day is 20 degrees warmer than is normal for this month. In nearly all cases, a general approximation will do, but if you need an exact number for some reason, you can use this fast method.

All temperatures in the Forgotten Realms are given on the Fahrenheit scale, so water freezes at 32 degrees.

For further realism, add 1 to the 2d6 roll if the previous day's temperature was warmer than normal; subtract 1 if it was colder than normal.

The Fog percentage listed for each month is the chance that at least part of the day is spent beneath the heavy mists that are so common on the isles. If fog is indicated, it develops between 1 and 6 AM (roll 1d6) and persists for 2d12 hours.

To determine cloudiness, which is different from fog, a type of die is listed for each month. Roll the appropriate die. On a result of 1-2, the day is clear. On a 3-4, it is a partly cloudy mixture of sunny skies and cumulous clouds. On a roll of 5 or more, it is overcast.

Precipitation occurs only on overcast days. The chart for each month lists a percentage chance of precipitation occurring, and often a guideline as to what type of precipitation falls. Determine the amount of precipitation as indicated for each type.

WEATHER TABLES

Hammer (January)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 23
Low: 0

Fog: 75%

Cloudiness: 1d20

Precipitation: 60%

D20 Roll	Result
1	Rain (.1-.4 inches)
2-19	Snow (1d6 inches)
20	Snow (2d10 inches)

ALTurisk (February)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 28
Low: 6

Fog: 60%

Cloudiness: 1d12

Precipitation: 50%

D20 Roll	Result
1-2	Rain (.1-.4 inches)
3-19	Snow (1d6 inches)
20	Snow (3d6 inches)

Ches (March)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 33
Low: 14

Fog: 80%

Cloudiness: 1d20

Precipitation: 75%

D20 Roll	Result
1-7	Rain (.1-.8 inches)
8-10	Sleet
11-20	Snow (1d6 inches)

Tarsakh (April)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 40
Low: 28

Fog: 70%

Cloudiness: 1d10

Precipitation: 75%

D20 Roll	Result
1-16	Rain (.1-.8 inches)
17-18	Rain (1d4 inches)
19-20	Snow (1d10 inches)

Mirtul (May)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 60
Low: 42

Fog: 60%

Cloudiness: 1d8

Precipitation: 60%

D6 Roll	Result
1-5	Rain (.1-.6 inches)
6	Rain (1d4 inches)

KyThorn (June)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 70
Low: 50

Fog: 40%

Cloudiness: 1d6

Precipitation: 50%

D6 Roll	Result
1-5	Rain (.1-.4 inches)
6	Rain (1d4 inches)

Flammerule (July)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 76
Low: 53

Fog: 40%

Cloudiness: 1d6

Precipitation: 40%

D6 Roll	Result
1-5	Rain (.1-4 inches)
6	Rain (1d4 inches)

Eliasias (August)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 75
Low: 50

Fog: 50%

Cloudiness: 1d6

Precipitation: 60%

D6 Roll	Result
1-4	Rain (.1-8 inches)
5-6	Rain (1d4 inches)

Eleint (September)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 69
Low: 45

Fog: 65%

Cloudiness: 1d8

Precipitation: 60%

D8 Roll	Result
1-6	Rain (.1-8 inches)
7	Rain (1d4 inches)
8	Sleet

Marpnoth (October)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 57
Low: 36

Fog: 75%

Cloudiness: 1d10

Precipitation: 50%

D6 Roll	Result
1-3	Rain (.1-1 inch)
4	Sleet
5-6	Snow (1d4 inches)

Uktar (November)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 48
Low: 30

Fog: 85%

Cloudiness: 1d12

Precipitation: 60%

D8 Roll	Result
1-2	Rain (.1-1 inch)
3-4	Sleet
5-7	Snow (1d6 inches)
8	Snow (3d6 inches)

Nightal (December)

Average Daily Temperature

High: 34
Low: 18

Fog: 80%

Cloudiness: 1d20

Precipitation: 60%

D8 Roll	Result
1	Rain (.1-1 inch)
2	Sleet
3-6	Snow (1d6 inches)
7	Snow (3d6 inches)
8	Snow (3d10 inches)

VARIATIONS WITHIN THE ISLES

The Moonshae isles do not have the same type of weather everywhere at the same time, though the area is small enough that a general weather pattern can be assumed. However, if you want to determine specific variations, the following guidelines should help.

Altitude

The highlands tend to be a little colder on the average than the rest of the isles. Assume that any mountainous region is 2d6 degrees colder than the normal temperature established for the day. An area of high mountains (5,000 feet or higher) can be 3d6 degrees colder.

Latitude

The northern parts of the isles are often (50% of the time) colder than the average temperature by 1d10 degrees. Likewise the southern shores reach temperatures 1d10 degrees higher than the norm determined for a given day.

Thunderstorms

Whenever your determination reveals that the isles will receive an inch or more of rain during a day, that rain is accompanied by thunderstorms. While such storms serve more to add atmosphere than anything else, you can assume that characters exposed on a moor or mountaintop each have a 1% chance of being struck by lightning—treat as a 6d6 lightning bolt spell. This increases to 2% for characters in a boat on open water.

MOONSHAE TOPOGRAPHY

Although the islands share a common general climate and geographical area, the topography of each island differs widely from those of the other islands.

The large color map of the islands shows the various terrain types found on each island.

Each terrain type has an encounter table that contains the creatures most likely to be found there. While encounters can be rolled randomly on these lists, the DM is encouraged to choose encounters according to the situation. Take into account such considerations as the nearness of human (or other) habitation, the season of the year, the weather, and any other variables that seem appropriate.

These encounter lists include many, but not all, of the unusual creature types that are most significant to game play on the Moonshae Isles. Mundane and relatively harmless animals such as hares, deer, pheasants, grouse, songbirds, squirrels, and mice are not included on the lists; the presence of these creatures is a matter of DM discretion.

Beaches

The fringes of the islands are often lined with long, flat beaches. These are not soft and sandy, however—most of the beaches around the islands are made of gravelly chunks of rock and pebbles. They are generally very wide, often as much as a quarter mile from the water's edge at low tide to the beginning of the inland terrain.

When the tide rises, however, water level comes up as much as 8 or 10 feet. On average, 75% of the beach area disappears even during a mild surf. When a storm is brewing, the entire beach area is pounded by heavy surf.

Boats and ships can be landed safely at these beaches during calm seas, or even in rougher weather if the beach is on the lee side of land (i.e., is on the downwind side of an island), or within one of the many firths, bays, and sheltered coves that pocket the shoreline of the Moonshaes.

Random Beach Encounter

- | | |
|----|---------------------------|
| 1 | Turtle, Giant Sea |
| 2 | 2d6 Dolphins |
| 3 | 1d6 Scrag |
| 4 | Seawolf, Greater |
| 5 | Selkie |
| 6 | Water Weird |
| 7 | 1d4 Whales |
| 8 | Fishing Boat |
| 9 | Northmen Longship |
| 10 | Pirate Ship |
| 11 | 1d6 Beachdwellers (Human) |
| 12 | 1d4 Sea Lions |
| 13 | 2d6 Sahuagin |
| 14 | Merchant Ship |
| 15 | Dragon Turtle |
| 16 | Crab, Giant |
| 17 | Human Farmers |
| 18 | Human Children |
| 19 | 1d6 Selkies |
| 20 | Castaways (Human) |

Escarpments

These dramatic cliffs line some of the coasts of the islands and also carve their distinctive lines around some of the inland areas. The escarpments shown on the map are all at least 500 feet high. If you need a specific number, roll 1d6 × 100 and add 400 feet to determine the cliff height in an area.

While steep, these cliffs are made of very old bedrock—generally granite. Thus, their surfaces are cracked and weatherworn, but not crumbling, which makes them ideal for climbing. Climbing proficiency checks for characters ascending or descending these escarpments get a +10% modifier because of the many foot- and handholds in the rock. In winter, however, snow and ice make the climbing very treacherous, eliminating the benefit and causing a -25% penalty.

Random Escarpment Encounters

- | | |
|----|---------------------|
| 1 | 1d6 Eagles, Giant |
| 2 | 1d8 Dwarves |
| 3 | 1d4 + 1 Badgers |
| 4 | 1d6 Dryads |
| 5 | 1d6 Firbolgs |
| 6 | 2d6 Harpies |
| 7 | 1d4 Griffons |
| 8 | 1d2 Hippogriffs |
| 9 | 1d4 Wyverns |
| 10 | Leprechaun |
| 11 | 1d8 Perytons |
| 12 | 1d2 Rocs |
| 13 | Sylph |
| 14 | 1d4 Hunters (Human) |
| 15 | 1d6 Trolls |
| 16 | 1d20 Wasps, Giant |
| 17 | Wolverine, Giant |
| 18 | 1d3 Wind Walkers |
| 19 | 4d4 Giant Ravens |
| 20 | 1d6 Rams |

SALT FLATS

These stagnant marshes extend inland beyond certain low-lying beaches, where seawater flows in enough volume to exterminate freshwater life, but is not lively enough to rinse away the decay and rot that collects there.

The salt flats are marshy and treeless, a bleak horizon to the far limits of vision. Gray in color, they constantly emit a sulphurous odor, akin to rotten eggs or dead, decaying flesh.

Insect life flourishes here in the summer, as all manner of stinging and biting bugs infest the stagnant pools and passages of the flats.

Salt flats make for treacherous traveling, as approximately 10% of their surface is made of quicksand. These marshes are nonetheless teeming with life, but not much of it is the kind of life that most characters wish to meet.

Random Salt Flat Encounters

- | | |
|----|----------------------------------|
| 1 | 1d3 Shambling Mounds |
| 2 | 2d6 Leeches, Giant |
| 3 | 4d10 Rats, Giant |
| 4 | 1d8 Toads, Giant Poisonous |
| 5 | 1d3 Weasels, Giant |
| 6 | 1d4 Fishermen or Hunters (Human) |
| 7 | 2d6 Lizard Men |
| 8 | 1d12 Wererats |
| 9 | 2d6 Sirens (Harpies) |
| 10 | 5d8 Frogs, Giant |
| 11 | 3d6 Frogs, Killer |
| 12 | Beholder |
| 13 | 1d8 Beaver, Giant |
| 14 | 2d4x10 Bandits |
| 15 | 1d6 Scrag |
| 16 | 1d20 Wolves |
| 17 | Porcupine, Giant |
| 18 | 1d6 Crabs, Giant |
| 19 | Cat, Wild |
| 20 | Scorpion, Huge |

MOORS

The moors of the Moonshaes make up a great bulk of the land surface. These areas are grassy and either flat or gently rolling. They make the most appropriate grazing land on the islands, often used as pasture land for sheep or occasionally cattle.

The moors may contain pockets of swampy or marshy land, but most of their surface is relatively dry and well drained. Many areas of moors are dotted with small lakes and ponds that contain edible fish. This land is generally among the most pleasant and hospitable of the isles, except during winter. Then the lack of cover on the moors enables the biting wind to sweep unimpeded across it, striking with chilling force anything standing in its way.

Random Moor Encounters

1	2d10 Humans
2	1d8 Halflings
3	Irish Deer
4	Stag, Giant
5	1d4 Boars, Giant
6	2d20 Wolves
7	2d4x10 Bandits
8	1d100 Ravens
9	Brown Bear, Giant
10	Werewolf
11	1d4 Trolls
12	2d10 Goblins
13	Leprechaun
14	1d8 Dwarves
15	1d20 Firbolgs
16	2d12 Centipedes, Giant
17	1d10 Centaurs
18	1d2 Porcupines, Giant
19	1d6 Horses
20	1d4 Nymphs

Random Deciduous Forest Encounters

1	1d4 Hunters (Human)
2	1d3 Woodsmen (Human)
3	1d6 Halflings
4	2d4x10 Bandits
5	1d6 Centaurs
6	Dryad
7	1d8 Pixies
8	1d3 Boars, Giant
9	2d6 Firbolgs
10	Faerie Dragon
11	Stag, Giant
12	Unicorn
13	Leprechaun
14	2d6 Wolves
15	2d6 Goblins
16	Falcon, Large
17	Hoar Fox
18	1d8 Centipedes, Giant
19	1d10 Goats
20	Brown Bear

Random Coniferous Forest Encounters

1	1d6 Llewyr
2	1d4 Woodsmen
3	Herdsman (sheep or cattle)
4	1d6 Hunters (Human)
5	2d6 Halflings
6	1d20 Pixies
7	2d20 Centaurs
8	3d10 Firbolgs
9	Irish Deer
10	Boar, Giant
11	Owl, Giant
12	Roper
13	Porcupine, Giant
14	1d6 Weasels, Giant
15	1d8 Lizard Men
16	2d10 Goblins
17	2d6 Orcs
18	Faerie Dragon
19	Unicorn
20	Ram, Giant

Deciduous Forests

These thick forests cover much of the lowlands on the isles. Primarily composed of oak, hickory, aspen, birch, and maple, these are areas of dense undergrowth and tangled passages. Travel through them is very difficult, except along a path or game trail.

The deciduous forests are home to a great deal of small wildlife, including squirrels, hares, foxes, and an occasional deer. Insects are rife in the summer, as the dense undergrowth stifles any cooling breeze and holds the air, humid and heavy, among the massive trunks.

In winter, these forests grow very barren, as the leaves fall away from the trees and the underbrush, leaving little to impede the biting winds and driving snow.

Coniferous Forest

These are areas of pine, cedar, and spruce trees – evergreens. Legend has it that these forests are the favorites of the goddess.

Unlike the deciduous forests, the coniferous forests contain only scant undergrowth. Most of the ground is covered with a thick carpet of needles that have fallen from the trees over the centuries, making travel through the forests easy, and rest quite comfortable.

The coniferous forests are located higher above sea level than the deciduous and are swept by cool breezes in the summer. Insect pests are rare, but large wildlife, such as deer, wolves, and bear, are more abundant than in any other part of the isles. In the winter, the thick protection provided by the trees keeps out the worst of the winter winds. This protects the inhabitants of these forests from really huge buildups of snow.

Highlands

The mountainous regions of the Moonshaes make up another sizeable proportion of the islands' land area. These rugged ranges are surfaced mostly with broken rock, twisted and cracked from centuries of exposure to the weather. Although the mountains are not towering by most standards, the highest being a mere 8,000 feet above sea level, they are universally steep and broken.

In places, the coniferous forests extend up the slopes of the mountains, and here the rock is not so jagged nor so exposed – the layers of pine needles and the shelter provided by the trees make these regions more hospitable than is usual for the Moonshae mountains. Occasionally, a shepherd or cheesemaker can be found living among these forested highlands. But most of the mountains are barren of trees and habitations. Hardy mosses and lichens are the most common plant life, though a vibrantly colored collection of wild flowers makes a brief appearance in the heart of summer. The only animals that live in these reaches are hardy marmots, tiny mice, and the slender foxes that live off the former. Also, eagles, hawks, and falcons make their aeries among these heights, preferably atop a cliff sheer enough to keep the hungry foxes at bay.

The highlands receive a heavy dumping of snow, beginning in late autumn and continuing through the beginning of spring. In places, accumulations of 10 to 12 feet are common. The high altitudes enable the snow to remain longer here than elsewhere on the islands; not until late spring or early summer is the snow totally melted away.

Random Highland Encounters

1	Herdsman, With Sheep
2	Farmer (Human)
3	1d3 Hunters (Human)
4	Ram, Giant
5	Bear, Cave
6	1d20 Eagles, Giant
7	1d20 Firbolgs
8	2d20 Orcs
9	2d20 Dwarves
10	1d12 Goats, Giant
11	1d20 Wolves, Dire
12	1d100 Ravens
13	1d6x10 Bandits
14	1d8 Trolls
15	Roc
16	1d4 Griffons
17	1d4 Badgers
18	1d6 Perytons
19	Ki-Rin
20	Werewolf

Fens

The fens of the Moonshaes are some of the most fetid, festering swamps north of the jungles of Chult. They are generally tree-filled, except where pools of stagnant water or sluggishly flowing streams prevent the roots from taking hold.

In summer, the insects swarm through the fens with every bit as much aggressiveness as they take over the salt flats. In addition, darker, more menacing creatures are suspected to lurk beneath the black and bubbling waters.

The Fens of the Fallon, on the isle of Gwynneth, are perhaps the most fell reaches of any on the Moonshaes. This is the place where the Beast last arose, and the place it retreated to when its might was eventually countered. But all of the isles have their fens, and none of them are pleasant.

Random Fens Encounters

1	1d10 Centipedes, Giant
2	1d8 Leeches, Giant
3	1d4 Weasels, Giant
4	2d12 Bandits
5	1d10 Poisonous Toads
6	10d10 Ravens
7	Druid
8	1d6 Trolls
9	2d6 Frogs, Poisonous
10	Werewolf
11	1d8 Wolves, Dire
12	Scorpion, Giant
13	3d6 Lizard Men
14	3d10 Firbolgs
15	1d6 Shambling Mounds
16	Beholder
17	1d8 Harpies
18	Crane, Giant
19	1d4 Hunters (Human)
20	1d12 Spiders, Huge

Streams, Rivers, and Lakes

The fresh waterways of the Moonshaes are filled almost universally with clear, clean water. The only exceptions are the ponds and streams of the fens and salt flats. Even in these cases, the water that emerges, black and stinking, from a fen seems to clean itself within 5 or 10 miles of flowage, almost as if the earth acted as a filter.

The fresh waters are teeming with trout, perch, and salmon; a skilled fisherman need never go hungry when near fresh water.

The streams are generally fordable, nowhere reaching a depth of more than about three feet. They flow rapidly, however, and are not navigable by boat. The few rivers on the isles are deep and placid, and carry much boat traffic. They can only be crossed (short of swimming) at the fords, bridges, and ferries marked on the map.

Random Freshwater Encounters

1	1d4 Lampreys, Giant
2	1d8 Pike, Giant
3	1d6 Gar, Giant
4	1d4 + 1 Otters, Giant
5	1d4x10 Nixies
6	1d12 Toads, Giant
7	1d4 Snapping Turtles, Giant
8	Water Weird
9	1d8 Beaver, Giant
10	2d6 Crayfish, Giant
11	1d6 Crabs, Giant
12	5d8 Frogs, Giant
13	1d8 Fishermen (Human)
14	1d4 Nymphs
15	1d6 Falcons, Large
16	Swanmay
17	2d10 Throat Leeches
18	2d6 Lacedons
19	Owl, Giant
20	Naga, Water

Sea

Surrounded as they are by saltwater, the Moonshae islands depend upon the sea for many things: trade, food, and protection, to name a few. The rolling gray vastness of the Trackless Sea and the more placid, but still chill waters, of the Sea of Moonshae insulate the islands from the rest of the Realms.

The Trackless Sea is the source of a long series of harsh storms during the winter months. These storms generally move out of the northwest, often pushing waves as high as 30 or 40 feet before them in huge, gray swells. The storms begin in fall, often as early as late Eleint (September), and continue through the middle of Ches (March) or occasionally into Tarsakh (April).

The seas are virtually unnavigable during these seasons, so the Moonshaes are almost completely isolated from the rest of the realms during winter. Once fairer weather arrives, however, the surface becomes blue and relatively smooth—the Moonshae's highway to the world.

The Sea of Moonshae, enclosed by the isles, is more placid than the outer ocean, but is still a formidable challenge to winter mariners. In fairer seasons, the Sea of Moonshae serves as a pleasant path between the isles.

The Sea of Swords, between the isles and the Sword Coast, does not receive the harsh winter weather of either the Trackless Sea or the Sea of Moonshae. Warm southerly currents seem to insulate the region against the heavy gales. These currents bring pleasant and comparatively balmy weather to the coasts of the Moonshaes that face to the south and east.

Random Sea and Ocean Encounters

- | | |
|----|----------------------------|
| 1 | 1d8 Scrag |
| 2 | 2d10 Whales |
| 3 | 2d6 Dolphins |
| 4 | Dragon Turtle |
| 5 | Northmen Longship |
| 6 | Pirate Ship |
| 7 | Calishite Merchant Galleon |
| 8 | Merchant Vessel |
| 9 | Coracle of the Ffolk |
| 10 | 1d4 Lampreys, Giant |
| 11 | 3d6 Sahuagin |
| 12 | 1d6 Fishing Boats |
| 13 | Octopus, Giant |
| 14 | Portuguese Man-o-War |
| 15 | 1d3 Sharks, Giant |
| 16 | 1d20 Sea Horses, Giant |
| 17 | 1d4 Sea Hags |
| 18 | 2d6 Sea Lions |
| 19 | Squid, Giant |
| 20 | 1d3 Water Weirds |

WILDLIFE OF THE MOONSHAES

The forests, moors, and swamps of the Moonshaes teem with mundane wildlife—creatures that might escape the notice of the adventurer in search of plunder, but which are important to the hunter, woodsman, ranger, and druid.

The largest of these creatures are the great deer that abound in all of the wild places, including moors, highlands, forests, and fens. The antlered rack of a big male makes a fine trophy for the hunter, and the venison is sweet and tender. These deer always run from human or other intruders.

A variety of small mammals, including hares, squirrels, foxes, mice, ground hogs, and boars inhabit the woodland and highland reaches. Bird life is also common—pheasants, grouse, and waterfowl challenge the archery skill of many hunters. Songbirds, blackbirds and jays are present in varieties too numerous to count.

The rivers and streams of the isles are home to salmon, trout, perch, and catfish. Fishing is generally quite good, and many peasants pursue this during their rare moments of recreation. The salmon run upstream in the spring to spawn—a sight to thrill any fisherman's heart.

The Moonshaes are of course home to more terrifying residents as well. These are listed together with their favorite terrain types in the Moonshae Topography section.

© Barr

DEITIES OF THE MOONSHAES

The goddess a wakened slowly from her cold sleep, awareness returning as the chill blanket of the passing season fell away. Turning with imperial grace, she sought the life-giving force of the renewed sun.

Soon she felt its warmth upon the long and gravelly beaches of her coastlines, and upon the stagnant expanses of her low, flat marshes. Slowly, the sun drove winters blanket from the rolling moors and tilled fields.

The white mantle remained thick and heavy among the forests and glens, and the highlands still showed no sign of acknowledging winter's end. This was as it should be, and the goddess rejoiced in the growing vitality of her body, the earth.

Cool seas bathed her lands, cleansing the debris left by the passing of winter. The goddess saw that her children still slept peacefully. They could, she hoped, sleep long years before she needed to call them.

Through the Moonwells, she saw the clearing skies. No longer did the heavy, iron-gray storm clouds oppress her. The Ffolk were active, preparing for a new season of growth. The druids moved among the trees and mountains of her wild reaches, restoring places where winter had disrupted the Balance.

Yet, as she threw off her white blanket, she felt a sudden, stabbing pain, penetrating deep within her. Hot and threatening, the injury seemed ready to spread like a cancer through her.

A Moonwell was the source of the pain. Instead of providing a window into the world, full of cool and healthy power, the well burned like a poisoned wound. Very black, it blocked the light and absorbed her power, instead of nourishing it. As she awakened, the goddess felt fear.

And she knew that, once again, the Beast would walk the land.

—From Darkwalker on Moonshae

The religious foundation of the Moonshae Isles is predicated upon a worship of the land itself. This belief, originated and primarily held by the Ffolk, has resulted in a conception of their goddess as the earthmother. The belief holds that the goddess is not a human-shaped, or otherwise mortal-imitating being; but is rather the hills and moors and marshes and seas of the world.

Central to this belief is the purity of the land. The antithesis of the goddess is, naturally, the threat of corruption, perversion, or pollution of the land. The goddess is a neutral deity, recognizing that both good and evil have a place in the world. Her strength derives from a Balance of these extremes. Her enemies are not only those evil ones who would extinguish life casually and frequently, or maliciously bring destruction upon her. She is also threatened by those who preach a doctrine of complete peace, or practice the science of bringing the land under the control of its human caretakers, threaten to push the Balance too far in the other direction.

Thus, the goddess strives against powerful forces. She is threatened from both sides of the Balance, and her existence is always in danger. She has powerful allies, of course. Her children, the Leviathan, Kamerynn the unicorn, and the Pack, all provide powerful tools in the defense of the Balance. The druids, too, are potent warriors in the goddess's struggle.

But arrayed against her is the Beast, Kazgoroth. It is a being of putrid filth but awesome power. In times past, the goddess has seen the monster slain, or vanquished, only to suffer its return in an even mightier aspect decades, or perhaps even centuries, later.

And the clerics of the new gods threaten the Balance as well, with their words of good and peace and mastery over nature. Peace is a benign blessing, but is the natural state of the goddess, and when this peace must be accompanied by mastery of the land, as the clerics preach, the power of the mother can only wane.

The major players in this cosmic drama are detailed here. They may be used to serve as a centerpiece of your campaign, or simply to provide a bit of background flavor as you and your players wish.

The Goddess, Earthmother

The goddess shivered and flinched. She felt her body growing numb—not from fear, but from a distant and wistful sadness. The feeling was remote, and she took no great notice of it. Gradually, though, she began to recognize the numbness for the dire threat that it was.

With an effort, she forced herself to stir. Hesitation now, she knew instinctively, would be fatal. The call she sent reverberated through the earth, thrumming deep within the mountains and hills, even rolling along the bottom of the sea.

Hoping that it was not too late, the goddess tried to awaken her children.

—From Darkwalker on Moonshae

The goddess of the Moonshaes is an aspect of the benign goddess Chauntea (Chawn-TEE-ah), who is worshiped throughout the Realms as the neutral good goddess of agriculture. As she is worshiped in the Moonshaes, however, her aspect is shaped differently than it is in any other part of the Realms.

Where Chauntea is generally worshiped as a goddess of agriculture, the earthmother is much more a goddess of nature. Agriculture as an aspect of nature she regards kindly, but agriculture as an attempt to master the land becomes a grave threat to her existence.

The earth goddess does not have a physical form in which her worshipers can see her, other than the world that is all around them. Her symbols, however, are myriad. The tiniest swallow is a favored messenger of the goddess. A broad oak, gnarled and weatherbeaten, but alive and flourishing, symbolizes her ageless strength. A towering pine, rising arrow-straight toward the heavens, marks the precious neutrality of her being, so necessary to preserving the Balance. The thorny, bright green cluster of mistletoe is another of her symbols, showing the vitality and harshness of her existence and mirroring the extremes inherent in her two most dramatic seasons, the winter and summer.

Her deepest symbols, incorporating all of the contradictions inherent in the Balance, are the moon and the sun. Those periods when the moon is full are nights of high power, when druids rejoice and the land itself seems to share in the celebration of the goddess's power. Midsummer's Eve, the night of the summer solstice, is a period of great magic. This is when the druids harvest the mistletoe for their most potent rites, and when all the communities of the Ffolk pause to celebrate their life and prosperity.

The full moons near the vernal (spring) and autumnal equinoxes are also festive occasions. In spring, the festivals are affairs of frenetic drinking, dancing, and romance as, after the long cold winter, the return of warmth and sun to the land is welcomed by the Ffolk. Spring festivals are ribald affairs, but the Ffolk are congenial even in the throes of drink, so the only real drawbacks are suffered by the celebrants the following morning.

The autumn festival is a more sober affair, for the Ffolk know that a cold and dangerous winter waits close in the wings. In autumn, feasting rather than drinking is the order of the day, and the better the annual harvest, the more elaborate the feast. Nearly all ports of the isles bid their last departing ships farewell following the autumn festival; they are not likely to receive another visiting vessel for six months, until spring once again rolls across the land.

The night of the Winter Solstice, or Yuletide, is an eve of deep reverence for the Ffolk and their druids. Locked within the icy grip of winter, they quietly acknowledge the might of the land around them and celebrate the beginning of longer days and the gradual arrival of spring. The celebrations are somber, for the Ffolk know that many months need pass before the sun returns with enough strength to drive winter from the land.

The nights of the full moon are the times when the goddess's power is at its height, but these are also the times when her world is most chaotic. Through the Moonwells and the druids, she has the might necessary to control the Balance, but she also faces some of her gravest threats. Lycanthropy, in particular, grows into its most dangerous manifestations during the periods of the full moon.

The vehicles through which the goddess sends her power to the world, and through which her druids perceive her needs, are the Moonwells. These precious pools of clear water are located throughout most of the isles, but are most common on Gwynneth and Alaron. The waters of the Moonwells have several beneficial properties that are known to the druids alone.

The water, when drunk directly from the Moonwell by a character's cupped hands, serves as a potion of healing. This effect can benefit a character only once per day. If the character drinking the water has acted in a way that threatened the Balance within the month prior to drinking, the water actually sickens him, inflicting 1d8 points of damage.

Examples of actions that endanger the Balance include slaying animals without putting the meat and skin to good use, chopping down living trees for any reason, or initiating attacks against peaceful beings. Characters who entered a dungeon to punish a group of raiding goblins would not imperil the Balance, but those searching for treasure and attack goblins in their lairs to gain this treasure would not benefit from the favor of the goddess.

When a druid bears a rod, staff, or other chargeable magical item, a Moonwell can be used to recharge that item. The druid must dip the staff into the well at midnight, under the light of a full moon, and cast a shillelagh spell at the same time. The staff will receive 1d6 charges from the power of the water. This recharging can only be performed once a month, and a given druid can only recharge one item per month.

The druids earn these benefits, however, for without their tending the Moonwells would cease to hold their power. On some of the northern isles, where the northmen have already driven the Ffolk and the druids away, the Moonwells have dried up, or become stagnant, or merely turned into mundane wells. This is one cause of the waning of the goddess's power.

Each Moonwell is entrusted to the care of a druid of at least 12th level. A great portion of that druid's activities involve the ritual care and cleansing of the Moonwell.

Animals of the isles, when they are injured or sick, often seek out the Moonwells. Sometimes, the healing strength of the water will bring the creature back to a state of health; other times the waters peacefully put the suffering creature out of its misery. Those animals that die at the shore of the Moonwell are taken by the water quickly and cleanly, leaving no carcass to decay and pollute.

The animals of the Moonshaes are favored creatures of the goddess. The majestic deer she regards fondly, and the sly old trout is another of her favorites. The rare faerie dragons that buzz through her wildest forests give her great delight.

The goddess is nearly immortal—as immortal as the land that is her body. She is not given gaming statistics as she does not interact with the creatures of the world in a way that would make such stats meaningful. She has agents, however, that can perform such interaction—creatures of might, and timeless grace, who prowl her surface and seek to further her ends. These are detailed here. Unlike the goddess herself, her agents can kill and can be killed.

These agents are the children of the goddess.

The Children

The children of the goddess take three forms upon the face of the Moonshaes. These forms (Leviathan, Wolf Pack, and Unicorn) are not immortal, though their favored status empowers them far beyond the norm for their types of creatures.

These mortal aspects of the goddess grow old and die, as is ordained for all of the animals of the world. Yet their spirit and the favor of the goddess lives on in their line. Thus, when Kamerynn the unicorn, proud son of the goddess, meets his mortal end, another unicorn, somewhere among the wilds of the Moonshaes, will assume the mantle and serve his mother for the remainder of his mortal existence.

Thus, the three children of the goddess are immortal in a sense, but the creatures themselves have game statistics and can serve as allies or antagonists for the player characters.

Though her children are mortal, the loss of one of these mortal bodies is a grievous blow to the strength of the goddess; their deaths are not things to be taken lightly. The passing of any one of them is a tragic occasion, to be marked by natural phenomena such as meteor showers, savage storms or unnaturally placid weather, a blight upon the area where the child of the goddess perished, or other supernatural special effects.

Each of these children is detailed separately, but they have this in common. Should one of them die, it will take some time for the spirit to find a new body. This time period varies for each of the children.

Leviathan, The Old One

The cool waters pressed heavily against the floor of the sea, far out of range of the sun's warmth. Here the world knew neither winter nor summer, day nor night. There was only the darkness, the eternal darkness that cloaked a region nearly devoid of life.

Yet the goddess's call reached through the pressure of the depths, persistently nudging at the one of her children who slept here. At first, the message was ignored, and the one who was called slept on. Another century or more might pass before the creature stirred.

But the call of the mother was relentless, and finally a hulking form stirred in the deep silt of the sea bottom. Shrugging its giant body free from the clutching muck, the creature rose from the bottom and floated, nearly motionless, in the depths. Time passed, and the form slowly sank toward the bottom again.

But the goddess prodded gently at her huge child. The great head swung slowly from side to side, and powerful flukes pushed hard against the sea bottom. A mighty tail thrust downward, and the body flexed along its vast length.

Then it began to move, slowly at first, but gaining an awesome momentum. The flukes plowed the water with solid authority, and the broad tail pushed with unstoppable force. Higher, toward the realms of light, sun, and current, the creature moved.

It gathered speed as it rose, and energy seemed to build in the mighty body. A stream of bubbles flowed from the wide mouth, trickling around layers of huge teeth and seeming to flow downward along the huge body.

The water ahead grew brighter, until the creature saw a pale gray glow spread across the upper reaches of the sea. The grayness became blue, and finally even the sun came into view, a shimmering yellow dot viewed through the filter of the sea.

The body broke the surface of the water with explosive force, sending a shower of brine through the air in all directions, High, and impossibly higher, the creature rose into the air, and still more of its length emerged from the frothing sea. Water spilled from the black skin in thundering cascades, until finally the great head slowed, and paused for an instant.

With a crash that rocked the sea for miles around, the body fell back to the surface. Waves exploded outward from the falling body with enough force to capsize a large ship. But the horizon was empty of either land or sail.

There was none to see that the Leviathan had awakened.

—From Darkwalker on Moonshae

The Leviathan is a great whale, vaster even than the largest whales that are known to live in our own world. A peaceful creature, it spends long years in hibernation at the bottom of the sea, reaching a state of virtually suspended animation. After many years of sleep, the creature will stir gradually, surfacing for air and then swimming about the isles, perhaps striking out along the length of the Sword Coast, or entering the Shining Sea, as it gratifies its tremendous appetite with plankton, kelp, and small fish. Unless it is called upon by the mother to fulfill a purpose, meeting some dire danger with its enormous might, the Leviathan returns once again to its blissful and nearly eternal slumber.

Leviathan

FREQUENCY: Unique
NO. APPEARING: 1
ARMOR CLASS: 4
MOVE: 24"
HIT DICE: 48
Hit Points: 250
% IN LAIR: 80%
TREASURE TYPE: Nil
NO. OF ATTACKS: 2
DAMAGE/ATTACK: 6d10/1d100
SPECIAL ATTACKS: Tail
SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil
MAGIC RESISTANCE: 30%
INTELLIGENCE: Low
ALIGNMENT: Neutral
SIZE: L (360 feet long)
PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

The Leviathan, though generally placid, is a creature of tremendous power. Its wide mouth is lined, not with soft balleen, but with razor-sharp teeth. It is capable of destroying a good-sized ship with a single bite. Its tail is also a formidable weapon and can easily crush the life out of any surface creature caught in its mighty blow.

The Leviathan will rarely make an unprovoked attack. However, as fish are the mainstay of its existence, if it encounters a fishing boat at work, there is a 10% chance that the mighty creature attacks and destroys the vessel. It always fights to defend itself, if attacked by foolish sailors. In addition, it always comes to the aid of any whales that are being hunted within 20 miles of the Leviathan's location—the keening cries of such whales alert the creature and send it unerringly to their location.

However, given the vastness of the ocean and the Leviathan's penchant for long periods of sleep, there is a less than 1% chance (call it 1% for game purposes) that it hears the cries of hunted whales or encounters a fishing boat at work.

The Leviathan's favored method of attack is to surge upward from the depths and crush a ship between its widespread jaws as it breaks the surface. Sailors on the vessel have a base 10% chance of escaping the creature's maw and falling into the sea; this chance increases by 2% for every foot away from the midship line (the point exactly halfway between the bow and the stern) of the sailor's position. Thus, a sailor in the bow of a 60-foot boat is 30 feet from the midship line and has a 70% ($30 \times 2 = 60\% +$ the base 10%) chance of falling free.

Characters falling into the whale's mouth have a 50% chance of either getting bit (for 6d10 hit points of damage) or of falling unscathed down the creature's gullet. Once swallowed, a character suffers 1d6 points of damage per round from the beast's digestive juices. A character can carve his way out of the Leviathan by inflicting 125 points of damage with an edged weapon. There is a 10% chance, anytime a blow inside the Leviathan strikes for 10 points or more, that the whale regurgitates the contents of its stomach, spewing characters and everything else back out of its mouth. Of course, there is a 50% chance that the Leviathan is anywhere from 10-1000 ($1d100 \times 10$) feet below the surface when it does so.

If the swallowed individuals succeed in lighting a fire inside the creature, there is a 50% chance that it will retch them out.

The tail of the Leviathan is 60 feet wide and can be used to strike a different target than the mouth. The tail is most effective against targets on the surface of the water, inflicting 1d100 points of damage to every individual within the path of the tail on a successful hit.

The Leviathan's gravest weakness is its vulnerability to pollution and poison. Hits with poisoned weapons do not require the beast to save, but they inflict 10 times the normal damage for that weapon. In an area where the water has been clouded with offal or the decay of dead bodies (near a busy port, for example), the Leviathan suffers 1 point of damage per turn spent in such water. This damage can be repaired at the rate of 1 point per day that the Leviathan spends in clean water.

If the Leviathan is slain, his place as the oldest child of the goddess will not be filled for $1d10 \times 10$ years. When another whale assumes this place, he is only half the size of the original Leviathan, requiring many centuries to mature to the size and might of his predecessor.

The Leviathan has swallowed many a ship, with its contents, over the centuries. Its stomach now holds quite a large trove of undigestible treasure—coins, gems, and jewelry. This includes $1d6 \times 1000$ pieces of each type of coin, $1d100$ gems, worth $30d6$ gp each, and $3d20$ pieces of jewelry worth $1d8 \times 100$ gp each.

Kameryynn, The Unicorn

The mistletoe rustled, spreading to allow the great white head to emerge. The head shook, and a satiny mane fluttered through the air and came to rest upon the snowy neck. The branches of mistletoe snapped as the rest of the powerful body emerged from the shady bower.

Hooves, shanked with fur also white as snow, stepped gingerly among the wild flowers, crushing none, as the creature walked to the nearby pool. Bending his neck downward until the long horn broke the surface into a series of ripples, the unicorn drank deeply. Still sleepy Kameryynn the unicorn raised his head and looked around the grove. The grasses underfoot tasted sweet, and he ate heartily of the most succulent shoots. The beams of brilliant sunlight penetrated the leafy canopy in several places, creating dazzling shafts of yellow.

Slowly the unicorn grazed and drank, recovering his strength after the long sleep. The goddess had awakened him for a purpose, he knew, and that purpose would no doubt require strength and endurance. With majestic grace, the animal moved through the thick patches of clover.

Suddenly the waters of the Moonwell swirled, whispering slightly. Kameryynn stared at the milky pool until he understood his task. The unicorn raised his head and trotted toward the pristine and pastoral forests of Myrloch Vale. After several minutes, Kameryynn began to canter, and then to gallop. Soon he raced like a ghost through winding pathways. All the lesser beasts shrank from his path at his thundering approach. His ivory horn held high, and his mighty hooves carefully avoiding the rarer plants, the unicorn raced to answer the call of the earthmother.

—From Darkwalker on Moonshae

There are several unicorns among the lands of the Ffolk, and they roam the wild places of Alaron and Gwynneth. The mightiest of these is Kameryynn, who reigns as king of the wilderness, the proud child of the goddess herself.

Swift and stalwart, the unicorn races across the wilds of Gwynneth, fearing no creature in nature. Taller and stronger than any other of his breed, Kameryynn symbolizes, to the Ffolk and the druids, all that is good and free and wild.

Kameryynn, Large Male Unicorn

FREQUENCY: Unique
 NO. APPEARING: 1
 ARMOR CLASS: 0
 MOVE: 27"
 HIT DICE: 8 + 8
 Hit Points: 47
 % IN LAIR: 20%
 TREASURE TYPE: Nil
 NO. OF ATTACKS: 3
 DAMAGE/ATTACK: 1d12/1d12/1d20
 SPECIAL ATTACKS: Charge
 SPECIAL DEFENSES: See Below
 MAGIC RESISTANCE: 40% & See Below
 INTELLIGENCE: High
 ALIGNMENT Chaotic Good
 SIZE: L
 PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

This mighty creature is a formidable foe (or ally) in combat. When charging he strikes with his horn for double damage, forgoing the hoof attacks. He is immune to poison and can sense the approach of an enemy up to 36" away. He moves so silently that he surprises opponents 90% of the time.

Kameryynn has the dimension door ability of the unicorn, blinking up to 36" away and carrying his rider. He will only consent to a rider who is a maiden of pure heart, and who has received a special blessing of the goddess.

He makes saving throws as a magic-user of 13th level, and cannot be charmed or held by magic. He is immune to death magic.

Kamerynn dwells in a shady bower near the center of Gwynneth, protected by a high hedge of mistletoe. The bower is centered in a high grove of oak and aspen trees, with a small Moonwell near its center. Although he is very old, he has not begun to lose his strength or his senses. When he does, a younger unicorn will peacefully assume the mantle of the honored child of the goddess. If Kamerynn is slain, this transition does not occur for 1d6 years.

The Pack

The Pack a wakened to the cold, white glare of the full moon. Gray and shaggy forms emerged from a hundred dens, shaking the weariness of a long hibernation from stiffened muscles and sleep-clouded brains.

A large male raised his voice to the moon in a long, ululating howl. Others joined in, first a few, but then hundreds. As one creature, the Pack raised its voice to the heavens, singing the praises of the goddess.

And then a breeze carried to the large male the scent of a stag, somewhere not far away in the misty night. Patches of fog drifted among the towering pines, but bright moonlight illuminated the clearings and high places as the wolf searched for the source of the scent.

Others picked up the spoor, smelling blood, and meat, and fear. The baying of the Pack dropped lower, and took on a deeper tone of menace. Slowly, like gray ghosts, the wolves began to lope through the forest, gaining speed as alertness returned. The stag turned fear-maddened eyes toward its deadly pursuers and then fled—a flight that could have only one consequence, as the Pack spread out and began to close upon its prey.

Once again, after a century of sleep, the mighty wolves of the Pack sang to their prey. The song was ancient, and piercingly beautiful. It was a song of the glory of the goddess, and of the might of her children.

But above all, it was a song of death.

—From Darkwalker on Moonshae

Small packs of dire wolves are not uncommon in the wilderness of the Moonshaes. These ferocious predators kill swiftly and ruthlessly, tearing the raw meat eagerly from the bones of their prey. Unwary humans are apt to fall into this category.

These wolves are territorial creatures, and snarling fights erupt should two packs enter the same area.

When the goddess chooses to awaken the Pack, however, the territories of the individual groups merge into one. The largest male assumes leadership of the Pack, without a challenge. Many hundreds of wolves will join together and lope across the land, serving the will of the goddess.

As time passes, the Pack grows in size until it becomes an unstoppable force. The will of the goddess must remain strong, however, to bind the wolves together, or the unnatural grouping will dissolve.

Most of the wolves of the Pack are dire wolves, and should be treated as such for game purposes. The male who rules the Pack is an unusually large specimen, for the might of the goddess runs fiercely within him.

Leader of the Pack

FREQUENCY: Unique

NO. APPEARING: 1

ARMOR CLASS: 4

MOVE: 24"

HIT DICE: 6 + 6

Hit Points: 42

% IN LAIR: 15%

TREASURE TYPE: Nil

NO. OF ATTACKS: 1

DAMAGE/ATTACK: 2d6

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Hamstring

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil

MAGIC RESISTANCE: 20%

INTELLIGENCE: Average

ALIGNMENT: Neutral

SIZE: L

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

When the Pack forms, it becomes the most efficient killer on the Moonshaes—perhaps the most efficient anywhere in the Realms. The Leader uses the wolves like soldiers, dispersing them to cover vast areas, but calling them together when prey is sighted.

In the chase, the Pack is unerringly patient. No matter how far or fast the quarry runs, the wolves of the Pack keep pace. And sooner or later the prey can no longer run, and will turn to face the onrushing tide, and will die.

In a sense, the Pack is the most immortal of all the children of the goddess, for if the Leader is slain, the next largest male immediately steps into the role, utilizing the same attributes listed above for the Leader.

The Pack will form upon the command of the goddess, as the wolves awaken from a winter's hibernation. Whatever instinctive urge this creates, it compels them to join into a large group as soon as they awaken. At this point, the Pack numbers 300-600 individuals. This awakening occurs 1d4 weeks after the spring equinox.

The Pack remains in constant motion, always seeking prey. It avoids human habitations almost completely, however, as the Leader seems to sense that it will not further the cause of the Balance by striking at farming communities and woodsmen's cottages. While it roams, the Pack gains 1d100 wolves per week, until the summer solstice. It remains together as long as it is needed, or until the autumnal equinox sends the wolves back to their winter dens, but the Pack does not grow in size after Midsummer.

The Pack's most significant weakness is the vulnerability of the Leader, for if he can be replaced or controlled by an external force, the Pack will follow whatever course the controlling force sets down for it.

Forces of Evil

Black waters swirled and parted, and the form of the Beast rose from the still coolness of the Darkwell. Massive and tight-knit trailing vines crowded close, but the broad, scaly body thrust the interfering plants aside like blades of grass.

Kazgoroth moved slowly, reveling in this new freedom. The Darkwell had served its purpose, for the monster felt power coursing hotly through its body as never before in its long centuries of existence. The Beast allowed a trickle of acidic saliva to drool from its wide-spread jaws. Turning its hot, fiery eyes to the pool, it watched the thick waters of the Darkwell bubble in its wake.

Pulling its feet from the sucking mud, the creature pushed its way into the fens. Tree trunks snapped like brittle twigs as broad shoulders pushed them from its path. A heavy, clawed foot squashed flowers, insects, and rodents with equal lack of note. The sounds of cracking limbs, crushed vegetation, and sticky mud slurping with each mighty footfall shot violently through the wood. Wildlife shrank from the path of the Beast, racing in terror or cowering in abject fear until the monster passed.

Dawn colored the sky as Kazgoroth moved west. Now the chill reflection of the sea came in to sight, stretching a way to the horizon and beyond. But the monsters goal was much closer than the horizon, or even the sea.

Before the waters stood a small castle, and Kazgoroth knew that humans in abundance would lair here. Before the castle spread broad fields, covered with tents and banners and stirring with activity and life.

To this field Kazgoroth moved.

—From Darkwalker on Moonshae

The goddess holds dear the Balance of nature upon her lands, fully aware that there are forces arrayed before her who would seek to do grave harm to that Balance. Too numerous to count are the petty monsters and avaricious kings who kill for the joy of causing death. Not so numerous, but equally threatening, are the builders and tam-ers of the land, those who seek to bring order out of the ordained chaos of nature. They cut down the trees of the goddess's forest and fill her skies with the black smoke of coal fires.

But neither of these extremes presents a menace that equals the age-old enemy of the earthmother. Though it stalks the land only rarely, its menace extends to far greater heights than those of any of the other enemies faced by the goddess.

This enemy is Kazgoroth, the Beast. Together with its minions, the Beast seeks to kill and destroy across the face of the Moonshaes, taking particular pleasure in profaning the places of most sacred beauty.

Kazgoroth does not work alone when it wages its war against the goddess. Instead, the Beast uses its potent magical abilities to enlist the aid of many henchmen, often using former allies of the goddess herself. The Beast delights in nothing more than the corruption of a druid to its evil purposes.

Kazgoroth

FREQUENCY: Unique
NO. APPEARING: 1
ARMOR CLASS: 0
MOVE: 12"
HIT DICE: 16
Hit Points: 120
% IN LAIR: 0
TREASURE TYPE: See Below
NO. OF ATTACKS: 3
DAMAGE/ATTACK: 1d12/1d12/3d10
SPECIAL ATTACKS: See Below
SPECIAL DEFENSES: See Below
MAGIC RESISTANCE: 60%
INTELLIGENCE: High
ALIGNMENT: Chaotic Evil
SIZE: L (18 feet tall)
PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

The origins of Kazgoroth lurk in the past, nearly as distant as those of the goddess herself. In the pantheon of the Realms, the Beast is manifested as an aspect of Malar (MAY-larr), the Beastlord. On the Moonshaes, however, this aspect has a specific purpose: the disruption of the Balance.

The Beast is a formidable foe in combat, yet whenever possible it seeks to do battle through shrewdness and trickery rather than straightforward melee. When fighting in its true form, Kazgoroth attacks with its clutching foreclaws and vicious bite. It can, at the same time, swing its tail around to strike a foe behind it for 1d6 points of damage. A person thus struck must make a Dexterity Check with a -5 penalty, or be knocked from his feet. He can do nothing the following round except stand.

Kazgoroth can only be struck by magical weapons of +2 or greater enchantment. Its magic resistance applies to all magic-user and clerical spells; it has no magic resistance against druidical spells.

Kazgoroth can change shape at will, shrinking its body down to halfling size at the minimum. It cannot assume a form larger than its own—but then, it doesn't really need to! It has a number of special abilities.

The Beast can cause lycanthropy with its bite, if it chooses to do so. It can detect magic and detect invisibility in a 24" radius at will. It can cast a permanent charm upon a victim at a range of 1" or less. A side effect of this charm is that the victim must roll a successful saving throw vs. spell each week or lose a point of Charisma permanently (to a minimum of 3). Once per week it can cast a death spell at a character of 7th level or lower.

The Beast has a unique ability to perform a corrupted type of mass charm spell, creating for itself a band of fanatically loyal undead troops known as Blood Warriors. A unit of soldiers, up to 500 individuals, can be thus corrupted as long as the unit has a strong commander to serve as the Beast's lieutenant. The game stats of the Blood Warriors follow this description.

Kazgoroth draws power from the goddess herself and thus chooses as a resting place a Moonwell that has been polluted or otherwise desecrated. The Beast is the lord of the Firbolgs and will often order a band of these giants to guard its well, and perhaps to pollute it, while it rests and gains power. If Kazgoroth is slain by any means other than the Sword of Cymrych Hugh, it will return within 3d6 years. If this sword is used to kill it, and the remains of the beast are burned to ashes, it is rumored that it can be destroyed permanently.

Blood Warriors

FREQUENCY: Rare
NO. APPEARING: 50-500
ARMOR CLASS: 2
MOVE: As When Alive
HIT DICE: 8
Hit Points: 40 each
% IN LAIR: Nil
TREASURE TYPES: As When Alive
NO. OF ATTACKS: 1
DAMAGE/ATTACK: 1d10
SPECIAL ATTACKS: Nil
SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil
MAGIC RESISTANCE: Nil
INTELLIGENCE: Low
ALIGNMENT: Chaotic Evil
SIZE: M
PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

The Blood Warriors are a type of undead soldier corrupted from normal human warriors by Kazgoroth's power. They are fanatically loyal, never check morale, and rejoice in killing. The Beast can create one such unit each time it emerges from hibernation to stalk the land.

The Blood Warriors begin to decay rapidly, resembling zombies as their skin and flesh rots away. Their fiery red eyes distinguish them from other undead, however.

Blood Warriors must kill in order to retain their strength. All Blood Warriors start with 40 hit points. Each Blood Warrior loses 5 hit points for every week since the troop's last kill of a human or humanoid. When a Blood Warrior dies, each of the remaining warriors loses 1 hit point. To regain hit points, the Blood Warriors must kill. For every victim killed by a Blood Warrior, each member of the troop gains 1 hit point.

A Blood Warrior's hit points can never exceed 64. If his hit points drop to 0, he dies. No matter how many hit points a Blood Warrior has, he always attacks as an 8th-level fighter.

Blood Warriors have a haste ability that they can employ before entering battle. To gain this power, there must be a ritual slaying of humans or demihumans, and the fresh blood must be used to anoint the warriors. The leader of the unit must perform the ritual. This has the effects of a haste spell with a duration of 1d4 turns.

SPECIFIC LOCALES IN THE MOONSHAES

My journeys to the Moonshaes linger as some of the more fascinating voyages that I have experienced, in a life not entirely devoid of fascination. These isles, so placid and pastoral on the surface, proved to be nests of tension and conflict. I must confess to some surprise as I began to perceive the true capabilities of the peoples of the Moonshaes.

I took the Ffolk as they are taken along the length of the Sword Coast—as a somewhat unambitious people, content with their lot, and lacking the initiative to work serious change. A peaceful people, thought I, making an unfortunately vulnerable target for their rapacious neighbors to the north.

And the northmen! Of course, it is well known that they are ignorant barbarians, who care more for strong drink and a warm bed than they do for any higher purpose in life.

Even the keen eyes of an old sage, I learned, can be opened to the light of new knowledge.

My voyages began with the journey to Callidyrr I do not recall what I expected—most certainly, some minor harbor with an assortment of ramshackle buildings, perhaps protected by an old wall. Nothing prepared me for the towering alabaster spires of Caer Corwell, soaring skyward as if to challenge the gods themselves. (Of course there was no such challenge intended, for the Ffolk see their goddess as the earth below them, rather than a celestial presence.)

And the port of Callidyrr, as my ship drew closer, became revealed as a deep, secure facility, with large and sturdy docks, a solid breakwater, and a great bustle of activity. My vessel drew alongside the quay, and a score of eager workers made her fast, helping an old sage down a teetering gangplank. (I could have made it myself, but they were being very helpful.)

The most surprising thing about the port was the vigor and apparent seacraft of a non-sea faring people. Though the Ffolk did not build large vessels of their own, and preferred to work on land, they took pains to see that visitors were treated to splendid accommodations. The inns were clean and the service friendly (I recommend the Inn of the Dancing Dolphin—ask for Isolde.)

The miracle of Caer Callidyrr's construction was only slightly diminished when I learned that it is a relic from a prior age—the only real Golden Age of the Ffolk, when their lands were united under the banner of the High King, Cymrych Hugh. As I journeyed across the isles, to Corwell, and then to Moray, I never saw another structure that could hope to rival the palace of the high king.

The high king himself, Carrathal or something, I believe they called him, did not have the time to visit with an old sage from the mainland. I suspect the loss was his more than mine. (I'll delete that line later; it really is beneath my dignity.)

To get to Moray I employed a variety of transportation, most of which I would not recommend to the modern traveler. The coracle—a deep-bottomed, round-hulled monstrosity of a boat—that carried me from Callidyrr to Corwell was a nightmarish craft, more suited for torture than transportation.

I managed the traverse to Moray aboard a Calishite galleon—a more stable, if slower, vessel than the coracle. Moray came closer to my preconception of the Moonshaes than did either Callidyrr or Corwell—it was an impoverished kingdom, unstable and unclean. The period between planting and harvest, when I had the misfortune of paying my visit, is a time of drunken debauchery that would put some of the pleasure palaces of the Amn to shame. (Never drink the dark mead of the western Moonshaes on an empty stomach!)

From Moray, I at last sailed north, to Norland and then Gnarhelm. I found the lands of the northmen to be quiet and peaceful realms. The men were happy with their lot in life; the women, as a rule, were not allowed to meet strangers. This, if anything, was the only disappointment in my journeys among the northmen.

—From the Journals of Elminster the Sage, Travels Along the Sword Coast

The lands of the Moonshaes are broken into specific locales in this section and discussed in detail.

The first part of the section deals with the lands of the Ffolk, including the kingdoms of Callidyrr, Corwell, Moray, and Snowdown.

Next are covered the kingdoms of the northmen, including Norheim, Norland, Oman, Gnarhelm, and the Korinn Archipelago.

Finally, realms that do not fall easily into either of these categories are presented. These include the isle of Flamberd, settled primarily by the followers of the wizard of the same name, the mountainous region of Highhome, which is the stronghold of most of the dwarves remaining on the Moonshaes, Synnoria—the sacred heartland of the Llewyr, where few humans have traveled, and Myrloch Vale, the most pristine wilderness of all the isles.

Each of these areas is organized with a look to its location on the map of the Moonshaes, followed by information presented as it is in the Cyclopedia of the Realms. Thus, a brief capsule (“At a Glance”) describes the area as it would be seen at first glance. Following this are notes from the scrolls of Elminster, taken from the sage’s travels around the Moonshaes. The section then concludes with game information that will be useful to a DM trying to run the players through adventures in that locale.

THE LANDS OF THE FFOLK

Callidyrr, Realm of The High King

AT a GLANCE

The mightiest and oldest kingdom of the Ffolk, Callidyrr occupies most of the island of Alaron. The Palace of the High King, Caer Callidyrr, is easily the grandest structure on the isles. This is the center of magic, for here the council of sorcerers holds the ear of the High King. And this is the center of artisanship, source of the finest steel weapons anywhere along the Sword Coast.

The northern border of Callidyrr lies along the Fairheight Mountains. This is a relatively low, but very rugged range that separates the kingdom from the northmen realm of Gnarhelm.

Callidyrr is easily the most prosperous and civilized kingdom on the Moonshaes. The land is rich and natural resources such as timber and iron are abundant. Even gold, silver, and other precious metals have been excavated from the foothills of the Fairheight Range.

Callidyrr receives more visitors from the Sword Coast and beyond than any other realm of the isles, and consequently it has a more integrated populace. It is not uncommon, in the streets of the capital city, to encounter Calishite merchants, mercenaries of Tethyr, shipbuilders of Mintarn, and many others among the tradesmen and fishermen of the Ffolk.

Much of Callidyrr is gently rolling open country. Several good roads cross the land, stretching north and south from the capital. Many other roads have fallen into disrepair.

The largest forest in the land, Dernal Forest, is home to several roving bands of outlaws and cutthroats. Even the militia of the High King fears to enter this wild reach, except in great numbers.

But the most fabled part of the kingdom, and one of the wonders of the Moonshaes, sprawls on the hilltops above the islands' most populous city. Caer Callidyrr lords over the city of the same name. The Palace of the High King is a wonder of architecture. Its tall spires can be seen, piercing the clouds, as ships sail through the placid waters of Whitefish Bay.

Amid the winding ways of the castle, the elite troops of the High King train and the council of sorcerers meets to advise their liege. The High King himself rarely leaves his castle or receives visitors. In splendid isolation he rules his land and his people.

Elminster's Notes

The wonders of Caer Callidyrr would take a far larger volume than this to describe, but the beauty of the palace lies deep within the white granite walls. A shameful state of grime and disrepair has been allowed to besmirch the place under the current monarch.

Of course, I waste no affection for His Majesty, King Carrathal. That worthy sir deemed my visit not sufficient cause to grant an audience. I was made welcome in his castle, but no more than that.

As I whiled away several days, I noticed a curious mood about the castle and the city below. Oh, the Ffolk were friendly enough, and I took several afternoons to peruse the wares in the city market, even taking the liberty of selecting a keen dagger from an old weaponsmith—once the armorer for the king's troop, he claimed. And his weapon was a fine piece of work.

But I asked him about the current king, and the man steered me to a new subject. Throughout the city, and even among the servants in the castle did I find this to be the case. None would talk about their privacy-favoring lord.

The city itself is a bright and cheerful place. The music of bards and minstrels abounds; wares from throughout the Realms are sold at the many small shops. Taverns, of course, are frequent, but are mostly clean and relatively quiet—unusual for a large port.

And the entertainment that abounded throughout the city gave to mind thoughts of constant festival, ever-evolving as the Ffolk found something new to celebrate with the arrival of each day. Musicians walked the streets, playing their instruments and singing as the mood seized them. Bards of the Ffolk, minstrels of Waterdeep, and pipers of Calimshan were present in nearly equal numbers, such that just as the music of one began to fade from the stroller's ear, another would intercede to take its place.

Of the fabled sorcerers—at least, the council is fabled here on the Moonshaes, where practitioners of magic are not common—I saw but one. This was a clean-shaven young fellow who greeted me curtly along the wall one morning, then chanted a spell and flew over the city, attracting some considerable attention.

The castle itself is a splendid fortress, surrounded by thick walls of that strange, white granite. It is huge, circling about the tops of three large hills. Access is granted through three large gates, one atop each of the hills, but the approaches to each gate are securely covered by adjoining walls and towers. Unfortunately, in many places the white stone was stained by soot, for no one seems to make any effort to keep it clean. Cracks and chips had worn into the walls, and several of the highest towers had been deemed too unsafe for use.

I was granted access to one of the sturdier towers, and the climb was worth the view, even for these old bones. The spire seemed impossibly narrow, yet the joints in the stonework bespoke a truly immortal strength, and the view of the castle, city, and bay proved superb. It was easy to understand why the fortress had never fallen to an invader: the landward approaches are screened by a series of jagged gullies and ravines, and the slopes of the three hills are steep and rocky.

I journeyed north from the capital aboard a jolting hay wagon that was carrying fodder to the mines at Cantrev Blackstone. Fortunately, the high quality of the road, apparently made of the same white granite as the palace of the High King, made the ride bearable. We moved quickly, reaching the cantrev in a few days.

The Cantrev of Blackstone is really a collection of shops, with houses added secondarily, for this is the source of some of the finest iron in the Realms. Miners worked day and night, supervised by a number of crusty dwarves who must have been drawn here by tremendous wages. A pall of black smoke seemed to hang heavily in the valley occupied by the cantrev.

The mines are located at the bases of the surrounding mountains. A steady stream of carts hauls the valuable ore down to the smelters and forges of the Cantrev. The air stings one's eyes in that stinking place, and the litter of human endeavor is everywhere.

Although the town looked shabby, wealth was very much in evidence. I learned that gold had been discovered in more than one of the mines; the yellow metal was spent by many a dirt-stained miner on spirits, food, or ribaldry. The cantrev, which I understand is representative of the mining towns along the southern shore of the Fairheight Range, had a sizeable, albeit ill-trained, militia. The town lord was much in evidence, McDonnell I believe they called him. He marched about at the head of the militia during the day, and then staggered from tavern to tavern with a crowd of hangers-on at night.

Needless to say, I was not disappointed to embark from Blackstone toward the southern part of the kingdom, beginning my journey via coracle down the Swanmay River. This journey was without exception a pleasant one, until the river began to wind through the tangled depths of Dernall Forest.

Here my boatman and I were accosted by bandits, who used an ingenious snare to trap our little vessel. Things looked rather grim for a moment, but I managed to persuade them to give my boatman his freedom, and to take me to their ruler.

This gentleman, a remarkably well-mannered rogue whom I heard them call O'Roarke, apologized for a misunderstanding, as his men had assumed that I was traveling with a great deal of money intended for the coffers of the High King. When he learned that my mission was simply one of learning, he proved a most amiable host.

O'Roarke informed me that the High King, in his opinion, was not the true ruler of the Ffolk. Apparently, my host's rather vigorous announcement of this opinion, which he believed to be absolute fact, resulted in an edict declaring him an outlaw.

The outlaw had assembled for himself a company of men, loyal to their leader, and now enjoyed the fruits of the land, supplemented by whatever fruits of the king he could liberate from the royal coffers. Indeed, O'Roarke and his band lived quite comfortably. I saw dozens of maids, many quite fair, in the camp, and was treated to an evening of entertainment by a Lesser Bard who nonetheless seemed to be quite a promising talent.

The outlaws lived in a unique city, located in the center of a swamp that was near the heart of the forest. Their cottages were built around the trunks of trees, or upon stilts that rose from the muck. They traveled about by canoe, or used intricate webs of vines to scamper back and forth. I must confess to using the canoe when I moved about—the vine web, I fear, was designed for much younger men than I.

I stayed with the outlaws for several weeks, enjoying a thrilling chase when the militia of the High King came upon us quite by surprise. I'm afraid I was a bit of a nuisance as my scrolls went flying just as the iron-clad guardsmen burst into the camp. The opportunity to witness a truly disciplined company in action was well worth the dishevelment, however; O'Roarke's fighters lured the militia into a carefully laid ambush and then set upon them from all sides with delightful ferocity. The melee was relatively bloodless—O'Roarke lost none of his men, and I think only one guardsman fell dead, but many of the rest fled with an assortment of cuts and bruises. I'm quite certain it will take great incentive to bring that band into the forest again.

With regret I finally departed the jolly bandits, for I had another region of Callidyrr to see before journeying on. O'Roarke's men gave me protection to the southern edge of the forest, and furnished me with a pair of horses and a groomsmen to see to the rest of my trip.

My last stop was at Cantrev Llewellyn, a large fishing village on the western shore. This community, finally, fit the preconception I had held of the Ffolk: it was a plain burg of several hundred cottages and a few dozen larger buildings. A stone tower, about a mile inland, provided security against raiding northmen.

A large community of halflings had excavated burrows into the hillsides near the tower, and the small folk are numerous in the town itself. Several own taverns and inns and serve a predominantly human clientele.

Lord Llewellyn received me as his guest and treated me to an endless litany of complaints about his neighboring lord to the south, Lord Kythyss. It seems that the two contest the rights to fish the fertile waters between their cantrevs. They have appealed to the High King for a judgment, but have as yet received no response. It seems Lord Kythyss has now hired a company of mercenaries to protect his ships. Lord Llewellyn is certain they intend to march on his town. His lordship impressed me as a singularly timid man for a ruler of his station.

I have no indication of how the two lords resolved their conflict, for soon after my arrival, I chartered a fishing captain to take me across the strait to the island of Gwynneth. But that is a tale for another time.

Game Information

The Fairheight Range is home to an unpleasant array of monsters. Trolls in great numbers roam the highlands, making the passes across the range unsafe for any but large groups of travelers. (Even these might be preyed upon if they do not exhibit sufficient caution.)

All of the cantrevs along this range derive their existence, as does Blackstone, by mining metals from the rich veins among the foothills. Orc and goblin raids are not uncommon, and each cantrev keeps a ready militia of 2d4 x 100 1st-level fighters ready to pick up arms in defense.

All of the cantrevs can muster a small militia, generally 200-500 1st-level fighters, with about 25% bearing long bows, and 15% mounted on horses. The army of the High King, and all of the militias from the southern half of the kingdom, is also equipped with a few battle chariots.

The High King has an elite troop of bodyguards, consisting of 180 5th-level fighters. He can also muster an army that includes 300 3d-level and 1,500 1st-level troops. Among these are 400 longbowmen, 300 horsemen, and 50 charioteers driving a total of 25 vehicles.

The council of sorcerers concentrates most of the magical power in the Moonshaes into the hands of the High King. The council consists of 11 mages of 9th level and above. The most powerful mage, Curmavys, is 15th level.

Corwell: Heartland of The Ffolk

At a Glance

If Callidyrr represents the height of culture and accomplishment of the Ffolk, Corwell represents the roots of those achievements. Occupying the southern half of the island of Gwynneth, Corwell is the oldest kingdom of the Ffolk upon the Moonshaes. The island of Gwynneth was the first to be settled by humans, although its population fell behind that of the more hospitable island of Alaron.

The kingdom was founded by the greatest hero of the Ffolk, Cymrych Hugh, before that ruler became High King and moved his seat of government to Callidyrr. Now Corwell is the second-largest realm of the Ffolk, after Callidyrr.

Corwell is ruled by King Bryon Kendrick from his great hall in Caer Corwell. The king exerts little real control over the land, however, preferring to leave details in the hands of the cantrev lords. Because of the relatively sparse population of the land, there is plenty of room for all of the cantrevs, and thus they do not suffer from the petty internal bickering that seems so common on Alaron.

The island of Gwynneth has been held by the druids to lie closest to the heart of the goddess. Moonwells are more common here than on any of the other islands, and the clerics of the new gods have made few inroads into the traditional goddess-worship of the people.

Corwell is bounded to the north by the sacred wilderness of Myrloch Vale. The Ffolk have displayed no ambitions to expand into the area, and the druids constantly expound upon the sacred nature of the place. Humans rarely enter the Vale, as there is little of material worth to be found there.

The southern coast of Corwell is exceptionally rugged and rocky. Sheer cliffs line much of the shore, so even where sheltering promontories keep the waters placid, there are few sites that make decent ports.

Add to this the fact that the landward side of the coast is blanketed in the thick woods of Llyrath Forest, and the southern coast of Corwell becomes virtually inaccessible. This makes it an ideal hiding place for the occasional pirate ship that strays westward from the pirate isles. These ships, and the occasional band of castaways, make this coast the most dangerous part of the kingdom.

Caer Corwell itself stands at the terminus of Corwell Firth, one of the finest natural harbors in the islands. The city of Corwell is actually more of a town centered around the docks and storage buildings of the harbor.

Because of its more remote location, Corwell receives far fewer visitors from other realms than does Callidyrr. A few trading vessels call at Corwell harbor each year, but the kingdom does not maintain a steady commerce with any lands except the other kingdoms of the Ffolk in the Moonshaes. This has allowed the culture of the Ffolk of Corwell to remain relatively pure, a status that the druids strive diligently to maintain.

The area around the town is smoothly rolling moor, barren of trees, so the predominant feature of Corwell is visible for many miles in all directions. This is Caer Corwell, a sturdy castle that has been built atop a rocky promontory that rises several hundred feet above the town itself.

Caer Corwell is nowhere near as grand as Caer Callidyrr, but it has proven a sturdy redoubt in times of trouble. The castle consists of a great central hall, adjoining barracks, stables and other outbuildings, and a wide courtyard, all surrounded by a timber palisade. The only easy access is along the castle road, which winds up the side of the knoll, totally exposed to fire from the walls and gatehouse of the castle. Thus the weakness of the timber palisade has been balanced by the difficulties of the castle's approaches. Like Caer Callidyrr, Caer Corwell has never fallen to an invader.

Caer Corwell is the setting for much of the adventure contained in Darkwalker on Moonshae. The description of the area during Elminster's visit is drawn from the sage's experiences approximately 10 years before the happenings described in the novel.

Elminster's Notes

My journey to Corwell was taken in one of the ludicrous craft the Ffolk use for sailing from island to island—a coracle. The craft was the size of a small, inverted barn. It seemed to have little keel, for it pitched forward every bit as much as it rocked from side to side. A single sail served to catch such wind as was available; I felt certain that the few days I spent at sea were likely to be my last.

The crew of several fisherman served my needs solicitously, I must admit—kind Durkin, the captain, took particular pains to see to my comfort. The journey was broken by one rather stunning interlude, as well.

As misty dawn was breaking across the Strait of Alaron, and the captain was assuring me that we were far from any land, we suddenly beheld a glittering castle, rising as from the waves themselves, startlingly close to our craft.

The fishermen grew reverent and awestruck, falling to their knees in amazement. I could waste no time on such reactions, so overcome was I by the scene.

The castle gleamed as though encrusted with a multitude of gems that were sparkling in the sunlight. As we passed, I saw that the stones were wet with brine, as if the edifice had, moments earlier, risen from the clean sea to welcome the day.

The walls were high, the castle narrow and looming. The stones of the wall, I saw as they dried, were smooth and rose-colored, like polished quartz. Slender towers with cone-shaped tops climbed skyward within the walls. From the highest of these, a silken pennant flew, bearing the image of a black chariot with whirling silver wheels. I saw no gate, nor means of entrance, though the walls were marked by high windows. Neither did I see any living creature.

With palpable regret, I studied the mystic structure as it fell astern. It was hard to avoid the conclusion that the castle moved away from us, rather than we from it.

Durkin told me tales of such a place—Caer Allisynn, he called it. It is the legendary resting place of Queen Allisynn, wife of Cymrych Hugh, who perished in her husband's war with the Beast of the isles. Hugh erected this citadel for her, surrounding her with the most fabulous treasures of the age, upon a small island between Gwynneth and Alaron.

Then, with the aid of the Great Druids of both islands, he commanded the castle to sink beneath the waves, carrying his beloved queen to an eternal rest. The fisherman says that he has heard tales of its sighting, but had dismissed such stories as inventions of strong drink and big mouths. Part of the rumor, he said, is that one of high honor and pure heart who visits the tomb of the queen will there have a wish granted by Her Benign Majesty.

The castle stayed visible throughout the morning, which was exceptionally clear. It finally disappeared below the horizon with amazing suddenness; I could not tell if distance had put it out of sight, or if it had again slipped under the surface of the sea.

Much inspired by the mystical encounter, I at last reached the shores of Gwynneth, stepping ashore at Cantrev Kingsbay. This little town well fit my preconceptions of the communities of the Ffolk.

The smell of fish was everywhere, emanating from the two dozen fishing boats docked in the little bay and from the smokehouses along the shore where the catch was dried. Even the people smelled of the sea. Perhaps a hundred cottages crowded close against the shore, for the land beyond rose quickly into a rocky bluff.

At least the town boasted a hospitable inn, the Silver Salmon. Young Winifred, the barmaid, was exceptionally helpful in introducing an old traveler to the wonders of her island. (Though most of the wonders did not compare in any way to Winifred herself.)

I politely turned down an offer from a fisherman to take me along on his daily voyage, having had enough of the sea to last me for many years, but he took the time to explain that the salmon run in the Straits of Alaron was at its peak. I finally consented to the ride and was pleasantly impressed. The long-hulled fishing boat—more reminiscent of the longships of the northmen than it was of the coracles—proved quite seaworthy, and the salmon run was a thing of rare beauty.

Silvery fish leapt clear of the waves on all sides of us. We found ourselves in the midst of a large school, and the fisherman and his sons were hard-pressed to haul in the nets. In less than an hour, his boat laden with the catch, the fisherman turned back toward the harbor. As soon as we docked, the huge crane next to the smokehouse was lowered into the hold, and the catch was lifted ashore. It was a most exhilarating experience, though the smell of fish wafted from my robes for the remainder of the journey.

The evening of this adventure, while recovering in the Silver Salmon, I encountered a breeder of horse—one Garald, of Cantrev Horstall, who had just completed the first leg of a journey to Caer Corwell. Garald was delivering a dozen fine steeds to King Kendrick and offered me a place on the back of one of them for the journey overland. I agreed and bid a fond farewell to fair Winifred.

We set out the following day upon the only road in the kingdom, Corwell Road. This thoroughfare was a splendid example of engineering, paved with smooth white stones and running straight as the path of an arrow across the center of the kingdom. Garald's company was entertaining. His horses were splendid creatures: browns and grays, strong enough to pull a plow, but fleet enough to carry a lancer into battle. He told me they were representative of a breed that is unique to the eastern Cantreves of Corwell.

The central plains of Corwell made for easy traveling. The road climbed steeply from Cantrev Kingfish, but within a mile had leveled out across open country. For several days we traveled thus.

Each night brought us to a small cantrev, occasionally little more than a traveler's inn, but the accommodations were always comfortable and the prices reasonable. This, I was learning, seems to be a hallmark of the business establishments run by the Ffolk.

The fourth day of the journey, as we approached the halfway point, was marked by a surprising incident. As we approached Cantrev O'Malley, we were met by a company of angry men, bearing pitchforks and a few swords and long bows. The group was in high dudgeon, as it seems that a band of firbolgs had descended from the highlands of Myrloch Vale and had wrought deprivations among the cattle and sheep.

The townsmen were led by a ranger who had located the trail of the monsters; they wanted to commandeer our horses to aid them in the chase. Garald agreed to rent them the steeds, whereupon they threatened to take them and leave his body for the ravens. Some judicious negotiating followed, as the militia captain stated his emergency justification, and Garald explained that the steeds were intended for the stables of King Kendrick himself. Eventually, an arrangement was reached, a reasonably low price was arrived at, and we set off on the trail of the giants.

The firbolgs had fled north, toward their own dominions, and the humans pursued them through increasingly rugged country. Finally, we caught them—a trio of the ugly beasts. They were surprised in the evening as they prepared a simple camp. All three were slain by the archers before the rest of the mob could get close, but that didn't stop the others from charging in and savaging the bodies with malicious glee. Finally, the blood frenzy seemed to pass from these formerly peaceable Ffolk, and we returned to Cantrev O'Malley. I was considerably sobered by the observation of the ferocity of the Ffolk when battling a hated enemy. I vowed to treat their traditions with respect as long as I remained within their lands.

That night, Cantrev O'Malley was the scene of wild celebration. The heads of the firbolgs had been returned to the town and were mounted on sturdy poles to be reviled by all. Kegs of dark ale were rolled out, bonfires climbed into the sky, and maidens took part in a bizarre ritual where they swung great, clublike sticks at the giant heads in an effort to knock them from the stakes. One Colleen, a petite lass and the daughter of the cantrev lord, knocked two of the heads free, and followed her triumph by consuming ale at a rate that put even this old sage to shame. (Had it not been for the pressing nature of Garald's business, and my dependence upon his transportation, I would have remained in Cantrev O'Malley for several days. In a few short hours, I observed these people passing from battle frenzy to festive revelry. In later years, these hours have always symbolized for me the dual nature of the Ffolk. And of course, there was Colleen...)

The last week of the journey passed quickly. Garald pointed out the dark ridge of forest land that remained visible off to our left for several days, naming it Llyrath Forest. This, he explained, was the wildest region in the kingdom, the haunt of bears, boars, and other wild game. Were I more of a huntsman, I'm sure I would have been tempted to venture there. As it was, I contented myself with my destination of Caer Corwell.

On the last night of our journey we stayed at a cozy inn at Cantrev Koart, where I met the local lord (of the same name). After many tall drinks, Lord Koart shared a tale of Llyrath Forest that I knew not whether to take seriously. I include it here with that cautionary note.

Lord Koart tells of an ancient fortress in the depths of Llyrath Forest that has been long abandoned. It is a castle made of skulls, erected some time after the reign of Cymrych Hugh to commemorate a great victory over the northmen. In those days (and still, as evidenced by the episode with the firbolgs) the Ffolk would take the heads of those who had fallen in war.

In time, enough enemy skulls had been gathered that the High King, Gwyllloch, had them raised into a mighty pile on the south coast of Corwell. So taken was he with the proof of his enemies' downfall that Gwyllloch moved his court into the castle of skulls. He led expeditions against the lands of the northmen, or against the holdings of recalcitrant lords, in order to add skulls to his collection.

But the place reeked so heavily of death that he slowly went mad, as did all of the retainers and courtesans who attended him. At the last, gibbering and drooling, they destroyed themselves in a suicidal orgy of combat within the gruesome walls.

Lord Koart claims that the castle of skulls still stands somewhere along the rugged southern coast of the island, guarded by the spirits of those who died there (and perhaps by darker things as well). Of course, no one alive can verify the existence of the place, but all hold the tale to be truth.

The following day we finished the ride to Corwell, none too soon for my tastes. I would almost have preferred to travel by coracle, for the saddle sores stung for another week.

The fortress of Caer Corwell was visible for most of that day's journey. As we drew closer, I could make out details of the great hall and the surrounding palisade. The fortress's location, atop a steep knoll, seemed to be naturally formed for defense. The improvements wrought by the Ffolk made the place virtually impregnable.

The road winding up to the castle was steep and passed under the palisade wall for much of its length. Thus attackers would be subjected to a nearly constant stream of oil and arrows should they try for an assault against the gatehouse. And the sides of the knoll were so steep that no other approach seemed even vaguely feasible.

I feared that I had arrived at an ill time, for I learned upon entering the castle that King Kendrick was secluded in mourning for the loss of his young wife. It wasn't until much later that I learned she had died six years before; the king had never completely recovered from the shock.

While I waited for an audience, I spent several days in the town, but found the place somewhat disappointing. Perhaps I was expecting some of the splendors of Caer Callidyr. What I found was a small fishing town, not unlike Cantrev Kingfish at the other end of Corwell Road, except that the capital was a trifle larger and more prosperous.

The inns, as always, were fine. The Boar's Tusk, run by a grizzled old huntsman named Garek, had a solidly male clientele, and the conversation was earthy. The Red Stag, on the other hand, was a quieter place with soft-spoken barmaids and savory food. It was run by a stout matron named Miriam, whom I recalled from Water-deep. There she worked in an establishment of a somewhat more ribald nature; she seemed to enjoy the more pastoral life of Corwell.

Of particular fascination was the local druid grove and Moonwell, which lie near the castle, across a large commons field from the town. The massive oak trees marking the grove stood in a nearly symmetrical ring, although they had sprouted naturally there. Within the grove, a leafy canopy shaded the ground, but the widely spaced trunks allowed a pleasant breeze to whisper through. A soft cushion of grass layered the ground, and subtle shades of columbine brightened the shadows. In several places I noticed huge stone arches, moss-covered and obviously very ancient.

In the center of the grove was a pool of still water, nearly clear, but clouded by a faint, milky tint. I sensed something powerful and sacred here and then realized that I must be looking at one of the Moonwells. I could almost feel the nearness of the earth goddess worshiped by these Ffolk; certainly, I knew why they held her in such reverence.

Finally I was able to meet with the king. I found King Kendrick to be a young man, obviously a former warrior, who carried his few years heavily. Wrinkles creased his face, and gray streaks ran through his hair. His manner was listless, albeit polite.

During the audience, we were interrupted by the king's young son and the king's ward—a striking, dark-haired lass who stared at me so boldly that I had to smile. The king treated them brusquely, in a manner that struck me as unusual after observing the usual enthusiasm with which the Ffolk treat those they care for.

But then, this king treated everyone brusquely, even the old sage who had honored his kingdom with a visit. He gave me a cursory review of his nation's long and colorful history: the birthplace of Cymrych Hugh, the home of the elite swordsmen who had routed the northmen from Moray a decade earlier, and the land closest to the heart of the goddess. The only time real feeling entered his voice was when he discussed Myrloch Vale, which is not part of his kingdom at all. He seemed to feel real reverence for that place and spoke with fondness of the great druid of Gwynneth, Brianna Moonsinger. When I asked if I could meet her, he grew wistful again, and then rudely refused.

After this unpleasant interview, I resolved to terminate my visit to Corwell. As there happened to be a Calishite trading galleon in the harbor at the time, and I had heard a crewman mention its next port of destination—Moray—I induced the captain to ferry me across the Sea of Moonshae to my last stop among the Ffolk.

Game Information

Caer Allyson is now an undersea realm that only rarely emerges from the water to enjoy 2d6 hours of sunshine. This occurs 1d4 times a year, always during pleasant and summery weather. It is the tomb of a highly virtuous queen and is laden with many treasures, but the ransacking of the place would be an evil and chaotic act. A character who reaches the glass coffin of Queen Allyson, at the heart of the castle, and who has not stolen or plundered, may have a wish granted, at the DM's discretion. The castle is defended now by scraggs and sahuagin, both above and below water, so reaching the throne room is no easy task. The quest for the wish can be successful whether or not the castle is submerged.

The castle of skulls is also a real place, but it is far more sinister than Caer Allisynn. It is a labyrinthine place, with upper levels populated by slithering reptilian monsters such as basilisks, giant snakes, and perhaps even a green dragon.

The upper reaches are pleasant picnic grounds compared to the lower levels, where increasingly powerful hordes of undead guard the burial mounds of many brave knights and bold kings. The deeper one penetrates, the more horrible the undead, until spectres and ghosts are encountered around the final barrow. Within, a lich stands lonely vigil over the bodies of the fallen warriors. Characters besting these monsters can find an assortment of powerful magical weapons and armor laid upon the bodies of the long-dead knights who wielded them. Choose the items so that they do not unbalance your campaign, but every character who makes it this far should find something worthwhile.

The castle of skulls is hard to find since it is overgrown with weeds and also lies in the heart of a stagnant fen at the southern fringes of Llyrath Forest. The specific location should be determined by the DM, using one of the fens shown on the map.

Also populating the southern coast of Gwynneth are numerous savage bands of pirates, who use the rugged bays and coves as secure hiding places. Often the pirates are northmen, but they might also be Calishites, rogue bands of Ffolk, or other bands of renegades from anywhere along the Sword Coast.

A pirate base will have a few crude huts lodged on a narrow strip of shore, or maybe built within a wide sea cave. Generally, the coves selected by the pirates are not accessible via overland routes, as they are protected by tangled fens and the high bluffs that run along most of the southern shore of the island.

An active base always has 4d20 pirates present. These are mostly 1st-level fighters. For every 10 pirates, however, there is one 3d-level fighter; for every 20 pirates, there is a 5th-level fighter; for groups of 40 or more pirates, there are a 7th-level fighter and a 7th-level magic-user. There is a 50% chance that any group of pirates includes a cleric of 1st-10th level.

Although the pickings and plunder are not great along the Sword Coast, 50% of the pirate communities have a stash of treasure nearby, generally buried in a very concealed location. Half of these treasure troves are guarded by a chained or charmed monster of some sort, such as firbolg giants, trolls, or scraggs (if underwater). The total treasure found is worth 2d6 x 1,000 gp, but at least 75% of it is in the form of sp and ep. (The pirate captains take all the easily carried stuff.)

The chance of any pirate knowing the location of the stash is determined by rolling 1d6. If the roll is less than the pirate's level, the pirate knows where the treasure is. Thus, 7th-level pirates always know and 1st-level pirates never know.

Outlaw encounters are possible in Llyrath Forest, but they are uncommon and are with small bands of 2d6 outlaws. These gangs are surly cutthroats, generally living here because there is a sentence of death hanging over their heads.

Firbolg encounters represent a possible threat in the northern parts of the kingdom. Rarely one can encounter these giants farther afield. As they lair in Myrloch Vale, however, unusual circumstances (such as war) are required to draw them far from their homes.

Each cantrev in the kingdom can muster a militia force of 40-100 1st-level fighters commanded by a sergeant of 2d-5th level. The cantrev lords are fighters of 5th to 10th level. Most of these men are swordsmen, but about 20% are skilled with the long bow as well.

Caer Corwell maintains a garrison of 200 men-at-arms, 10 of which are sergeants of 2d-5th level. The garrison commander is Arlen, a 9th-level fighter.

Moray

At a Glance

Moray is the westernmost of the lands of the Ffolk and is thus the most removed from the civilizing influence of the cultures along the Sword Coast. It is also the most untamed of the southern isles. Trolls, orcs, goblins, and firbolg giants may commonly be encountered in its remote regions.

The Ffolk of Moray are rough and uncouth, even by the standards of the Ffolk. They are savage fighters, easily provoked to violence, but warm and generous to their friends.

Moray is the original home of the moorhound. The breeding of these great dogs is still a highly honored tradition. Every cantrev lord keeps a large pack of the animals, and they serve loyally both on the hunt and at war.

The rocky and mountainous nature of the isle is one reason it has remained so untamed. The small harbor and town of Moray on the northern coast is the largest concentration of humans anywhere on the island, and its population barely exceeds a thousand. Most of the other human inhabitants are scattered along the Shannyth River valley that cuts across the center of the island.

The northeastern tip of Moray is covered by the Trollclaw Range of mountains. Although the altitude of this rocky wasteland rarely exceeds 4,000 feet, and then only at the dozen or so highest peaks, it is so marred with sheer cliffs, loose slides of rock, narrow gorges, and deep lakes that human travel here is difficult. The terrain is completely impassable to horses.

Much of the southern and eastern regions of Moray lie under the Orcskull Mountains. This is a larger range, no higher than the Trollclaws, but it is not quite so rugged. An occasional pass crosses the range, and much of the highlands consist of green tundra.

A few small cantrevs lie along the southeastern coast of Moray, connected by passes to the rest of the isle. These communities derive a living from the bounty of the sea. The mountains to their backs shelter them from the worst of the winter storms, so the weather here is not as bad as on the rest of the island. However, the threat of marauding orcs, raiding down from the Orcskull Range, is very real. More than one of these communities has been wiped out to the last person by the ravages of the bestial monsters.

Elminster's Notes

The Calishite galleon proved to be a wonderful improvement over the coracle, even better than the merchant ship of Waterdeep that brought me to the islands. Once the captain realized that my gold was forthcoming, in exchange for each additional nicety he could provide, the accommodations improved regularly.

The bed was a mountain of soft feathers layered in silk. The captain's own attendants waited upon me during the day, and entertained me at night. These women were scarce more than girls in appearance. Several played the peculiar wailing pipes of Calimshan with great skill, and a pair of them danced in such a way that this old heart's rhythm was dangerously accelerated.

It was almost with regret that I stepped onto the dock at Moray. This town did not even boast a castle, as had the other capitals of the Ffolk I had visited. Instead, two or three high, round towers stood upon prominent hills a mile or so inland. In the event of a formidable raid, the population of the town would retreat to these towers, leaving their community undefended in the face of the northmen.

I settled into a comfortable inn, the Silver Sword and enjoyed a tasty, if plain, meal of potatoes and mutton. It was late afternoon, but the place had already begun to fill with revelers. A few introductions were made, and I had begun some fascinating conversation, when the King of Moray himself arrived, pledging in a booming voice to make my visit a memorable one. He ordered the barkeep to produce huge mugs of the special ale reserved for his majesty and the guests of the king, and we began to form a lasting friendship.

King Dagdar is a man who looks like he might have received the body of a bear through an error of birth. His arms are thicker than the legs of a stout man and are covered by thick, black hair. His face disappears behind a huge black beard; flowing hair of the same color tumbles across his shoulders and far down his back.

The king spoke with considerable pride of his little island. His conversation was interspersed with derogatory references to those overly civilized lands to the east, such as Corwell and Callidyr. Occasionally he mentioned the northmen, never failing to spit contemptuously onto the floor following each such phrase.

But then he would turn again to the wonders of his own land. The green farmlands of the Shannyth River Valley took on a mystical air of fertile beauty through the king's words. He told of lively water sprites who played along the placid river's banks, and of the mischievous leprechauns who teased the unwary traveler. He spoke of the orcs and trolls as though they were mere nuisances, not worth the cost and trouble of a campaign to remove them.

None of the people of the Ffolk spoke in such a warlike manner as King Dagdar. I felt that I talked with one who truly believed that the only true measure of a man was the test of steel and blood. He spoke of the battles he had fought and won. The northmen had landed several times on Moray during his lifetime. Always they had been driven away after a series of bloody engagements. Once, the king reluctantly admitted, he had accepted the aid of King Kendrick and a company of Corwell warriors to help banish the enemy; I sensed that, beneath his gruffness, King Dagdar was truly grateful this aid.

Eventually I was invited to join the king on a hunting expedition to the center of the island, and I readily accepted. Not only did I genuinely enjoy his company, but the wild nature of Moray had begun to intrigue me considerably.

We left on the morrow, a bright and chill dawn that highlighted the emerald green of the land around us. The king, his head hunters, a number of retainers, and I galloped forth from the town in a caravan of sturdy war chariots, six vehicles strong. Each was pulled by a pair of powerful chargers. The whole expedition was preceded by a score or more of the giant moorhounds.

Two hound masters followed the pack astride a pair of nimble gray mares that seemed willing to follow the hounds through any obstacle.

The Shannynth Valley was one of the most idyllic locales I have visited among all of the Realms. The river was a winding ribbon of silver in the distance, deep blue as it passed near us. We rode on a primitive path—I wouldn't really call it a road—of rutted dirt, but the chariots had no difficulty rolling along.

All around us, to the low rim of the river valley to right and left, were fields of lush green grass, sprinkled with red, yellow, and blue flowers of a million varieties. Butterflies and bees flitted about these vast fields, and small mammals scurried for cover upon the approach of our party. I was impressed to notice the discipline of the hounds, who did not veer from their path to pursue any of this minor game.

We passed through Cantrev Dynneghall on the third day of the trip, enjoying the hospitality of the Red Stag Inn. This tiny community seemed at first glance a craven and impoverished collection of hovels, but as we spent time there I came to realize the people were proud and very self-sufficient, caring little for the impression their squalid living quarters made upon visitors.

Finally we had our opportunity to hunt, as the hounds scented a herd of the great red deer of Moray. For a day we gave the dogs their heads, and they led hound masters and hunters upon a merry chase across the fields. Occasionally the chariots had to take a roundabout route to follow the horses and dogs, but I was impressed by the difficult terrain that the two-wheeled carts could negotiate. We eventually brought the prey to ground, and the dogs cleanly killed two bucks and a large doe. The hunters cleaned the quarry which, to my amazement, the dogs had not worried, and the hunt was declared a success.

That night, around the bright circle of a campfire, we heard a chilling cry that ululated down from the valleys of the nearby Orcskull Range. This seemed to put King Dagdar in a pensive mood, as he reflected upon the origin of the sound.

"'Tis the maiden of Highpeak, it is," he announced. "Crying for the lost souls of her children." Upon my gentle questioning, he elaborated. The maid, according to legend, dwells in a beautiful castle of glass high in the Orcskull Range. Her castle is surrounded by a grove of enchanted fruit, fruit so blessed that none who eat of it need ever fear disease or death. The castle is separated from the surrounding mountains by wide chasms. Here the maid lived in peace, raising many fine sons.

But the sons grew restless in their isolated home, and they built a drawbridge of glass to extend to a nearby mountain. Then the sons left the castle, over the drawbridge, to explore the world.

But they found that as soon as they left the castle, it disappeared behind them, and they could see neither bridge nor castle, even on the clearest of days. And so they wandered the world. They were fine, strong men, and soon found employment in the armies that fought back and forth among the surrounding lands. One by one, they died in battle, until only one—the oldest—remained alive.

Despairing for the grief that had come upon his family, he made a final effort to return to the home of his mother. At last, in the height of a winter storm, he saw the castle before him, with long bridge of glass leading toward it. Rejoicing, he set across the drawbridge, but it was slippery with ice, and he could not retain his footing. He slipped, and tumbled to his death upon the jagged rocks below.

Now, the king explained, on days of wondrous summer warmth or savage winter cold, the mother mourns for her children in a long, keening wail that carries plainly to the fields beyond the mountains. No mortal, it is said, has ever seen the glass castle or its slender bridge. But perhaps one day, say the legends, a young man or woman who is a descendant of the maid in the castle will enter the Orcskull Range, see the castle of glass, and cross the drawbridge to relieve the suffering of the mother who has grown old with the pain of her sorrow.

From the looks of the retainers, who had listened, enraptured, to the king's tale, I felt certain that each was wondering if he might be the descendant who would discover the castle and bring proof to the tale. I myself was strangely touched. When the strange cry was repeated later in the night, I found myself wondering about the poor mother. I devoutly hoped that she would one day find her peace.

Our party, more thoughtful than a day earlier, headed down the valley toward Moray-town on the following day. Once there, I found the trader's galleon still in port, and I was able to persuade the captain to carry me as far as his next port of call at Norland. With a mixture of relief and regret, I bid farewell to the lands of the Ffolk and began my journeys among the northmen.

Game Information

The Cantrevs of Moray are well-defended communities of $1d6 \times 100$ inhabitants, the exception being Moray itself which has 1,000 people. Each town has one round tower for every 300 people, or fraction thereof.

Each cantrev can field a militia unit of 25% of the cantrev's population. The unit consists of 1st-level fighters, half of whom are also archers. Their ferocious nature and warlike bearing grant a +1 bonus to Morale and Attack Ratings, for BATTLESYSTEM™ rules purposes.

The humanoid monsters of the highlands provide regular threats to the Ffolk. The monsters attack in sudden raids, seeking to capture provisions and treasure more than to eliminate the communities. In the heights of the Orckull Range is a community of some 500 orcs, securely nestled in a network of caves and mineshafts. This represents the focal point of monster power on the island.

As far as the castle of glass goes, it is indeed up there somewhere. Whether or not a PC in your campaign should unlock the mystery of the place is entirely up to you.

Snowdown: The Forgotten Isle

At a Glance

The island of Snowdown is unique among the lands of the Ffolk for several reasons. As the southeasternmost island in the Moonshaes, it has the balmiest climate, and is generally spared the howling winter storms that ravage the rest of the islands. Also because of its location, it is most distant from the lands of the northmen and thus is rarely the target of raids. And because of its relatively mild climate, it is agricultural-ly the most productive of the islands.

The farmlands of Snowdown are divided among several dozen lordships, each centered around a fortified manor and surrounded by the cottages of the workers of the lands. The King of Snowdown, King Pwyllloch, dwells in the only castle on the island, Caer Westphall. This stone fortress is located above a small cove on the southern shore of the island. Snowdown is noticeably lacking in decent deep-water ports, the cove at Caer Westphall being representative of the natural harbors on the island. This lack has doubtless contributed to the self-sufficient nature of the place, as trade with other regions is rendered quite difficult.

On the farms of Snowdown are grown barley, wheat, alfalfa, potatoes, grapes, apples, and many other types of fruits and vegetables. Hogs, cattles, poultry, sheep, and horses are common livestock. Ale, mead, wine, and whiskey are all brewed from the grains and fruits of the island.

Snowdown is the most democratically run of the lands of the Ffolk, with the larger cantrev lords such as Pengram, Harloch, Llandrian, and Brannoch all having meaningful input into the king's official policies. The king taxes his subjects to a much larger extent than elsewhere among the Ffolk, but these taxes are used to build good roads across the island, and to train an effective militia.

The primary external threat to Snowdown's security comes from pirate raids by the buccaneers based in the Pirate Isles. The fighters of Snowdown have been organized into effective small units of skilled troops that are capable of responding quickly to such threats.

Elminster's Notes

I did not have the pleasure of journeying to Snowdown during my travels among the Moonshaes. It was noteworthy that this island was not discussed by the Ffolk of the other isles with any great frequency.

The two occasions I heard reference to Snowdown, however, provide a certain amount of insight into the way it is viewed by the rest of the Ffolk.

In one instance, I was enjoying a cold ale in the Silver Salmon (at Cantrev Kingfish) when a scuffle broke out among the customers. Despite my annoyance at the disturbance (amplified by the fact that young Winifred was knocked from my lap to the floor, where she sustained several ugly bruises), I observed the resolution of the fight, which most of the patrons joined. Those few of us who neglected to choose sides were referred to by the others as "Snowdowners" after the incident.

In another case, during my discussions with King Dagdar, that worthy pointed to an well-dressed visitor in sneering tones, deriding the man as being "as fat as a Snowdowner."

Game Information

Snowdown has been virtually cleared of marauding monsters by the aggressive patrolling of the king's militia, so hostile encounters with orcs, trolls, and goblins are rare. Each cantrev has a population of from 700-1200 Ffolk, and can field a militia numbering 20% of the community's total population.

These units are made of 3d-level fighters, as the king sees that each warrior receives extensive training. Each fighter is proficient in the use of the long sword and either the long bow (50%) or spear (50%).

Caer Westphal is a stone castle that models many of the towers and high walls of Caer Callidyrr, albeit in miniature. The treasury of the king, located in a sealed dungeon deep beneath the castle, contains at least 250,000 gp of treasure—certainly one of the richest hordes in the Moonshaes.

LANDS OF THE NORTHMEN

*From the north comes the wild wind
The cold wind,
The ice wind.*

*Barren trees, barren fields
The barren hearth, unlit
As icy winter's fingers seek
To end life, to bring chill death*

*From the north comes the death wind
The deep winter
The mountain waves.*

*The gray sea, the pounding sea
Upon the shores, smashing
As frozen water's heavy fists
From the north comes the blizzard wind
The snowy gale,
The water white.*

*Every winter, every darkened Yule
The north wind brings its message
Until the spring's awakening,
The long night holds its thrall.*

*From the north comes the wild wind,
The cold wind,
The ice wind.*

*From the north comes the death wind,
The deep winter
And dreams of the sun's rebirth.*

—From "Song of the North Wind" by Carlyth Grylloch, a bard of the Ffolk

The northmen arrived in the Moonshae Islands quite recently. Their original homes are the coastal lands north of Waterdeep and the island kingdoms of Tuern and Gunderland. Viewing the Moonshaes at first as regions to plunder and raid, they gradually settled upon the lands they had terrorized, merging with the Ffolk who remained to create a strong and vital race of seafarers.

Those Ffolk who remained on the northern isles accepted the gods, the kings, and the customs of the northmen. At first, this was the cost of staying alive, but soon it became accepted into the culture of these Ffolk.

The lands populated by the northmen have become stable kingdoms, well-populated and prosperous. But the urge to travel the seas never sinks too deeply into the breasts of these fierce sailors, and this desire bursts forth into action with regular frequency.

The lands of the Ffolk are not the only target of the sailing northmen. They have been known to raid the length of the Sword Coast, striking Amn, Tethyr, and even Calimshan as they venture boldly southward.

They sail north as well, though not so much to raid as to trade the profits of their southern expeditions at the market in Waterdeep, or to either of their related nations at Tuern and Gunderland.

The northmen have developed a rough alliance among their kingdoms on the Moonshaes, with Grunnarch the Red, Thelgaar Ironhand, and Raag Hammerstaad exerting great influence over their subject lords. When these three kings agree on a course of action, their men and ships can unite into a formidable force. Fortunately for the peace-loving Ffolk of the Moonshaes, such alliances are rare.

Gods of The Northmen

The northmen are not the most religious of peoples, although they hold several deities in a state of some reverence. These deities are generally represented by shamans among the northmen. As the practitioners of religion have a much lower status than the warriors, such shamans are not common. Rarely is a northman cleric encountered who is higher than 7th or 8th level.

The deities held most sacred to the seafaring raiders include Auril, the Frostmaiden; Tempus, the Lord of Battles; and Umberlee, the Bitch Queen. Of course, a cleric declares his fealty to only one of these deities, but a typical northman warrior or sailor pays homage to all three, at different times.

Auril is viewed as the bringer of winter upon the world, and as such plays a major role in the raiders' society. She is mollified with offerings of food and strong drink in autumn and throughout winter. These offerings are placed upon a raft or small boat and launched into the winter swells of the Sea of Moonshae or the Trackless Sea. If a particularly heavy storm or unusually savage and enduring winter threatens to cause a famine, Auril may be gratified with a human sacrifice or two, placed upon a similar raft and sent to sea and certain death. Such sacrifices are usually drawn from the ranks of prisoners or slaves, but the northmen may send members of their own people if there is no alternative.

Tempus, the god of battles, receives offerings from warriors before the start of a battle. He is the patron of the berserker and is generally viewed as the protector of those raiders who succumb to the berserking frenzy. After a particularly successful battle, the northmen may sacrifice one or more prisoners to their battle god in gratitude for his favor.

Umberlee, goddess of oceans, waves, and currents, is greatly respected and feared by the seafaring northmen. It is customary to make an offering to the Bitch Queen before every voyage. The longer the journey, the more significant the offering. As with the other deities worshiped by the northmen, Umberlee occasionally receives a live human sacrifice from her awestruck followers. Even so, Umberlee is held to cause shipwrecks, drownings, and is the mistress of the sharks that imperil stranded sailors.

Norland: Cutting Edge of Winter At a Glance

Norland is the westernmost of the Moonshae Isles, and one of the farthest north. Much of the force of the great, driving gales that blow off of the Trackless Sea is spent bashing against the seaward side of this rocky island.

But just inland of this worn coast runs the jagged spine of the Jotunhammer Mountains. These peaks, separated by deep valleys that are often marked by the white trails of glaciers, block much of the winter storms, protecting a wide lowland region of pine forest and blue lakes.

It is at the fringes of these forests, in small communities of wooden huts, that the northmen have made their homes. Facing the sheltered Sea of Moonshae, the northmen of all these communities use the sea as their highway to the world.

The King of Norland is Grunnarch the Red, who rules from his great lodge called Rottesheim. Grunnarch rules another dozen or so kings, all of whom live along the eastern coast of Norland. Together these kingdoms make one of the most populous and mightiest nations of the northmen.

The northmen have made their homes along sheltered coves with shallow, gravelled beaches. They have little use for deep harbors or sturdy docks, as their preferred method of anchoring is to slide their vessels onto the beach until they are safely above the high-water mark.

The vessels of the northmen are their most cherished possessions, valued beyond other property or family. A true northmen derives a sensual pleasure from the appearance of a sleek longship, its gracefully curving lines slicing easily through a smooth or choppy sea.

The kings of Norland command perhaps 45 longships among them, the largest fleet (six) calls Rottesheim its home port. Each of these vessels is crewed by 40 burly sailors, so the kings can assemble a small army and transport it easily overseas.

Indeed, the longships are among the fastest ships along the Sword Coast in most types of weather. Each of the sailors has a seat before a long oar, and during calm weather the steady straining of human muscle carries a longship at a rate faster than that of the largest galley. The relatively light hull and the keen lines, zealously created by master shipwrights, combine to enable the longship to slip along with little resistance.

Under full sails, a longship leaps before the wind like a seabird, springing from the crest of one wave to settle upon that of another. No ship in the world can outrun a longship with a strong breeze to her stern.

Some of the multi-masted pirate ships that roam among the pirate isles can outdistance a longship in a crosswind or upwind tack, but even under these conditions a northman captain can pilot his ship with speed and accuracy. A longship, lacking a deck or sealed hold, is more susceptible to foundering in mountainous seas than are other types of vessels. However, the keen weather sense of the northman enables him to land his ship before such a storm strikes, in most cases.

These ships, the movers of a nation, are arrayed along the beach of any sizeable community in Norland, as long as the men are not at war or trading. Although the northmen feast regularly upon salmon, herring, and cod, they do not use their longships for mundane fishing tasks, preferring smaller vessels that can be manned by crews of two or three.

The thick pine forest of lower Norland can provide the timber for hundreds more longships before it will begin to show the loss. Most of the island is blanketed by these dark spruces and pines. The forest is virtually primeval, as the northmen have little interest in exploring the interior of their island.

They have cut no roads among the trunks, so travel between communities of the northmen must be accomplished by sea, or by a laborious overland trek through uncharted wilderness. Each kingdom is a long community on the coast, an island of human life surrounded by a few fields, pastures, and farms, and then gradually fading into the untracked wild lands.

The ferocity of the northmen has allowed them to venture regularly through these primeval forests, clearing them of most of the orc and troll inhabitants that had dwelled here since the early history of the isle. The occasional brown or cave bear still claims a human meal, but most of the humanoid monsters have been exterminated or driven into the high country.

The Jotunhammer Mountains, on the contrary, are a place where humans do not often enter, and even less frequently return from. Ancient glaciers emerge from the mountains to all sides. Although these ice paths thus mark the only real pathways into the mountains, their surfaces are treacherous. Concealed crevices are common, and the shifting nature of the ice rivers subjects them to frequent convulsions and avalanches.

The glaciers and surrounding highlands are home to numerous frost giants. These fearsome humanoids resemble the northmen more closely than they do the other giant race of the isles, the firbolgs. The frost giants rarely emerge from their mountain fastnesses. On their rare forays, however, the giants are treated with respect by the northmen, who often leave offerings of food and drink in caches where the frost giants have been known to pass.

The highest peaks of the range occur in the northwestern corner of the island. These vantage points offer a view across the Trackless Sea for dozens of miles on a clear day. These peaks are home to one of the few dragon aeries on the Moonshaes. Here a family of white dragons has taken up residence, carving caves and lairs among the mountains of ice where no other creature dares to travel.

Elminster's Notes

The voyage to Rottesheim proved every bit as diverting as the journey to Moray had been. The Calishite captain debased himself most completely in trying to offer me every comfort and gratification a man could desire. In truth, it became rather tiresome; when the heavy galleon dropped anchor in the cove at Rottesheim, I was quite ready for a change.

And the very appearance of the community of northmen promised such a change. The lodge of the king dominated the entire scene. It was a huge, rectangular building made of solid timbers. It had a high, peaked roof and a variety of intricately carved ornamentation along the walls, mostly wooden heads in the shape of bears, boars, walruses, wolves, and other wild animals of strength.

The other houses were simple wooden structures, surrounded by muddy pens which held pigs and chickens. Many tough fishing nets hung along racks on the wide gravel beach.

But the most striking feature of the view was the rank of longships, a half dozen in number. These sleek vessels looked larger on land than I had recalled them. They lay poised upon the beach as if eagerly awaiting the summons that would send them again to sea.

The galleon stood offshore by several hundred yards, as the cove was too shallow for her keel. The captain lowered a longboat over the side to ferry me and some of the goods he had come to trade to the King of Norland's stronghold.

I met King Grunnarch the Red at the hearth of his lodge. I was immediately impressed by the realization that this man was a true leader.

His head was framed by flowing red hair and beard. He stood only average height, but he seemed much larger. There was an undefinable quality to the way he moved and talked that communicated his authority.

The Red King bade me welcome and offered the pleasures of his lodge for my amusement. With a broad wink, he admitted that they would not likely compare to the pleasures of the Calishite accommodations, but I wearily assured him that I was ready for a pleasant respite.

Grunnarch showed me about his lodge. I saw that the place had a curious feature of construction. At its center stood one of the round towers that had been so common on Moray. I saw that the northmen had simply erected a huge wooden building around this tower, expanding it into a royal lodge and fortress.

And the huge structure was indeed a fortress. The walls were massively thick. Three tree trunks was the average strength, with a layer of horizontal timbers between two layers of vertical trunks for added strength. Even a giant, I felt, would be hard pressed to batter through this barricade.

I enjoyed the hospitality of the Red King for several days, slowly recovering my strength. My noble host, upon learning of my mission, pledged me his vessel for a tour of the northern lands of the Moonshaes. Though I suspect he thirsted for any excuse to put to sea again, I accepted his offer gratefully. We immediately began preparations to sail the following day.

Game Information

Each of the lesser kingdoms along the coast of Norland is home port for 1d4 +1 longships. Each king on the island commands one crew of 2d-level fighters, with the remainder being 1st level. Grunnarch's hand-picked crew is 3d level, and he has a crew of 2d-level men to command another of his ships.

The frost giants of the Jotenhammer Range are engaged in a war with a small colony of dwarves that is struggling to retain its last few caverns. No other dwarven or human communities on the islands know of the existence of these dwarves, though they are struggling to get word to their kin in Highhome.

The dragons among the high mountains number about a dozen. A huge ancient white dragon is the matriarch of the clan. She resides in an icy mountaintop lair with most of the treasure collected by her family. She is always attended by two medium adult white dragons.

Norheim: The Fractured Lands

AT A GLANCE

The kingdom of Raag Hammerstaad is spread among a series of barren and stormswept isles at the very fringe of the Trackless Sea. The people of this hardest of kingdoms take pride in their isolated lands, deriving a sense of superiority from their enforced ordeals.

Most of the small kingdoms making up the nation of Norheim are tucked into sheltered coves on the leeward sides of the various isles. Like the kingdoms of Norland, the realms of Norheim are focused upon the sea, using little even of the small amount of land that is available to them.

Of the Norheim Islands, only Giant-spine has much surface area. This rocky isle contains several sheltered pockets of forest among the narrow valleys between the rugged ridges that give it its name. The rest of the Norheim Isles are virtually devoid of trees.

Although the Norheimers practice a limited amount of agriculture, growing barley and wheat and tending sheep and goats, they are much more dependent than most of their kin on contact with the outside world for survival. This contact is in the form of raids against the Ffolk and farther peoples. Their purpose is to return with food as well as wealth. The Norheimers also trade with the lands to the north where their captured wealth is often bartered for food. The Norheimers, alone among the northmen, occasionally serve as mercenary soldiers or sailors in the fleet or army of some lord of the Realms who is in need of fierce fighting men, and who can pay in solid coin.

The Norheim Isles are riddled with sea caves, and these have given birth to many of the legends among these superstitious peoples. They talk of long underground passages, and swiftly flowing rivers of seawater running into the earth. The legends say that these passages are linked to vast underground lands, peopled by strange creatures, and full of hidden menace, but also stocked with unthinkable treasure.

ELMINSTER'S NOTES

The sleek longship of Grunnarch the Red moved easily through a high swell. Of all the types of vessels that had carried me thus far on my journey, none could compare to the easy grace of the Red King's pride. Standing in the bow, with the salt spray lashing my face, I began to understand more of the fundamental nature of these fierce sailors.

We sailed first to Hammerstaad, on the Norheim Isles, where Grunnarch explained we would find his cousin and ally, Raag Hammerstaad, King of Norheim. We beached upon the shore at Hammerstaad, on a narrow shelf of land that lay shaded by the near ridge of mountains that rose a few hundred yards from the sea. We met the king of Norheim in his lodge, a huge, smoky building that was not as grandiose as Grunnarch's, but employed the same technique of expanding one of the round towers built long ago by the Ffolk.

Our host was busily engaged in the preparations for a long voyage and asked our pardon for his lack of hospitality. (Grunnarch explained that normally such a visit would be the cause of much feasting and dancing).

Truthfully, I was not all that disappointed, for the northmen of Norheim seemed an uncouth and smelly people. We took advantage of Raag's shelter for that single night. The following morning we embarked to continue our journey among the northmen. Raag Hammerstaad and six ships sailed the same day, toward the warmer waters off of Tethyr, he said.

Game Information

The sea caves of the Norheim Isles provide a number of entrances into Deepearth, the vast realm below the ground (and seal. Some of these passages take the form of rivers, while others are dry land tunnels and shafts.

The raiders of Norheim are a poor folk, but they are mighty fighters. The six northmen kings can assemble a force of 25 longships, but fully half of these are crewed by 2d-level fighters. Raag himself has a picked crew of 4th-level fighters. All of the crews above 1st level are berserkers.

Oman: Center of Northman Might

AT a Glance

The kingdom of Oman covers more land than any of the other northman realms, for it encompasses all of Oman's Isle and a good portion of northern Gwynneth as well. It is the most populous and most powerful of the northman kingdoms upon the Moonshaes.

A great deal of this might stems from the personal strength of the king of Oman, Thelgaar Ironhand. Thelgaar assumed the throne at a very young age, and has led his nation for nearly five decades. During that time, he has united the lordships under his domain into a solid alliance, and he has steadily expanded his influence among the other kings of the isles.

Thelgaar's fortress is known as the Iron Keep; it dominates the steel-gray waters of Iron Bay. This is the best natural harbor among the lands of the northmen. The high rocky pinnacles at either side of the entrance to the bay choke off the passage to less than a mile, screening the worst of the high seas before opening into a wide anchorage surrounded by smooth beaches.

All of Oman's Isle falls under the control of Thelgaar and his subject kings. In addition, the northmen have claimed the northern coast of Gwynneth as their own, absorbing the small communities of Ffolk that had dwelled there for centuries. Their area of control on Gwynneth extends as far south as the mountains of Highhome, the dwarven fastness that guards the northern border of Myrloch Vale. As with other realms of the northmen, their land includes great tracts of forests, but they exert little control over the land, preferring instead to view the sea as their world.

The northmen of Oman are superb shipbuilders, the best of their race. Thelgaar and his minions have the largest fleet of longships of any ruler in the Moonshaes. Because of the dominant will of their ruler, these warriors are capable of acting as a single force of tremendous power.

The towns of Thelgaar and his subjects are large by the standards of the northmen, many numbering well over 1,000 inhabitants. They tend to be prosperous, securing food through hunting and fishing, as well as growing a variety of crops, including potatoes, wheat, and barley. They have many types of livestock, breeding ever-larger herds and flocks of cattle, swine, sheep, goats, and horses.

ELMINSTER'S NOTES

The bow of Grunnarch's longship sliced easily through the rolling waves as a strong tailwind carried us across the Sea of Moonshae to Oman's Isle in a few days. As we entered Iron Bay, I was immediately impressed by the obvious might of the king of Oman.

Thelgaar Ironhand's huge fortress, the Iron Keep, stood proudly upon a rocky hill very near the water. Below the keep spread the long houses of the town. Surrounding these were the fields and pastures. But the fortress was easily the dominant feature of the view.

The Iron Keep had as its base a castle of the Ffolk that must have been built centuries earlier. From this square core now spread earthen battlements, protected by sharpened, downward pointing stakes that reminded me of a frilly skirt. The stone heart of the castle had been expanded with massive wooden halls extending along the crest and down the sides of the hill, until the place nearly rivaled Caer Callidyr in size. A high stone tower, obviously much newer than the castle, climbed skyward from the heart of the fortress. (I later learned that the Iron King had employed Ffolk slaves to build the tower as the working of stone is not an art found among the northmen.)

As Grunnarch's ship slid onto the beach, we were greeted with an assortment of dancing, screaming children and young women. Soon a company of warriors arrived to aid with the beaching of the boat. They had identified their visitor's boat as soon as they saw the crimson sail, and Thelgaar had extended an invitation, asking us to join him for a meal at our earliest convenience.

My curiosity had been piqued by the visible signs of the Iron King's might, and I must admit that I looked forward to the meeting with considerable anticipation. I was not disappointed.

The Iron King greeted us from his throne at the center of his great hall. He acknowledged the greetings of Grunnarch the Red with a nod of his head, and accepted my introduction with the same gesture. In anyone else I would have accounted such imperial mannerisms to be supreme arrogance, but somehow it seemed acceptable in Thelgaar Ironhand.

Thelgaar was a massive man, even by standards of the northmen. His great black beard, just beginning to show streaks of gray, seemed to amplify his appearance in the eyes of this old sage. His voice required no such amplification.

I began to sense something of the magnetism of this leader as he spoke, asking of our journey and inviting us to sit beside him and partake of the food that was placed before us. The king was waited on by slave girls from many different realms. Each brought a different food or beverage for our pleasure. Though there were just the three of us in the hall, enough food and drink was provided to satisfy a whole company of hungry warriors.

After the meal, which Thelgaar pronounced merely fair, though I found the lamb chops and wheat bread to be among the finest I had tasted, the Iron King gestured us to follow him. Again this was a motion that, in a lesser man, would have been insulting, but it seemed appropriate when performed by Thelgaar Ironhand.

We followed him to a high rampart of his fortress, where he gestured to the beach beside the 10 longships that had been drawn up there. An eleventh vessel sat upon a long runway of boards, as a team of boatwrights worked to finish the task of preparing her for launch.

A bright red stain, which the king explained had been distilled by alchemists from a mixture of roots and fish oil, was applied to the boards of the hull. A number of old men stood nearby, twisting strands of twine into thick, strong ropes. A blacksmith hammered at a piece of hot iron as he shaped it to the transom. I guessed (correctly, in the event) that this was the socket for the steersman's oar.

The hull was propped upright by a long series of timber supports upon each side. Beyond the hull sat a group of old women, each stitching with a long bone needle and coarse thread to assemble multicolored sheets of canvas into the huge square sail that would propel this vessel to the far corners of the Realms.

Over the following days, as I enjoyed the hospitality of the Iron King, I watched carefully the final stages of work on the longship. Several times, boatwrights labored against the hull with heavy adzes, smoothing any irregularity from the boards. Blacksmiths made additional iron nails, and these were used to firmly fasten parts of the hull that might be exposed to extra pressure from a rough sea. At last, the vessel was ready to slide down the runway into the bay.

Thelgaar himself supervised the launching, and it seemed that the entire community turned out to watch the event. Kegs of dark ale were rolled out to celebrate after the work was done.

Twenty strong men stood upon each side of the sleek hull, removed the wooden support beams as a man, and then strained to move the vessel forward. It creaked slowly across the boards, and then gained speed. The workers struggled to push her ahead. The ship moved faster and faster until, with a shimmering silver splash, the bow struck the waters of the bay, and the slim vessel glided lightly away from shore. Now the men hauled upon a pair of stout lines, arresting her motion and then, slowly, swinging the elegant ship back toward shore. A cheer arose from the watching throng, and Thelgaar allowed himself a thin smile of pleasure. Grunnarch slapped his friend heartily on the back, and the two kings turned toward the ale. The work of the day, and of many days before, was at last done.

The feasting and drinking that followed lasted far into the night. A few of the revelers (this old sage among them, I might add) even witnessed the coming of dawn to Iron Bay on the following morn. Thelgaar had announced his intention of captaining the new ship upon her maiden voyage, and Grunnarch had invited him to sail beside us as we continued our tour of the lands of the northmen.

Thus, on a still and cloudless day in late summer, escorted by the two mightiest kings of the northmen, I sailed from Iron Bay to again cross the Sea of Moonshae and visit the island of Alaron. This time my destination was not the realm of the High King of the Ffolk, but the kingdom of the northmen that had been formed on the northern shore of Alaron. Now we sailed to Gnarhelm.

Game Information

The realm of Thelgaar Ironhand is the home of the fiercest armies of all the northmen. Each of the minor kingdoms in his realm can field a force of 400 warriors and 10 longships. Two ships from each kingdom are manned by 2d-level berserker crews, and one ship from each kingdom has a crew of 3d-level berserkers.

Thelgaar himself commands his personal legion of 5th-level berserkers, numbering 80 men and two longships, in addition to the normal complement of 10 ships.

The northmen must contend with raids from the firbolg giants that emerge from the mountains of Highhome to strike the kingdoms along the north coast of Gwynneth. On Oman's Isle, all organized resistance to the king has long since been eliminated.

Gnarhelm: The Northmen on Alaron At a Glance

Gnarhelm shares the island of Alaron with the kingdom of Callidyrr. The two kingdoms have little in common beyond this land mass, however.

Where Callidyrr is primarily smooth or gently rolling terrain, Gnarhelm covers land that is steep and rocky. The climate of Gnarhelm is ruled more by the storms of the Trackless Sea than the currents along the Sword Coast. The Fairheight Mountains that keep much of the bad weather away from Callidyrr ensure that Gnarhelm is a very cloudy and rainy place.

The separate kingdoms of Gnarhelm are ruled by King Sigurd Helmudson from his lodge at Gnarhelm. This town is located at the end of the long and sheltered Firth of Helmsgate. The firth makes a sea journey to the other kingdoms of Gnarhelm a long and difficult expedition. Thus, this kingdom is crossed by more and better roads than the other lands of the northmen. Most of the roads are laid along the tracks of the thoroughfares of the Ffolk, built when all of Alaron was united under the rule of the High King.

As a consequence, however, the northmen of Gnarhelm have become, of all their peoples, the most used to traveling and fighting on land. While they retain several dozen longships, and have not lost their skill as sailors, the men of Gnarhelm are also practiced in marching. They keep far more horses than the other realms of northmen, and King Helmudson is served by two trained troops of cavalry.

In addition, Gnarhelm is the only place where the northmen have taken up mining seriously. The mineral-rich Fairheight Range, so vigorously exploited by the Ffolk to the south, has also yielded generous portions of iron, copper, silver, and gold to the picks and shovels of the northmen. Though the dwarves of the Moonshaes have generally scorned the northmen, the raiders have brought hundreds of dwarven miners from Ironmaster and Citadel Abdar. The output of Sigurd Helmudson's mines now approaches that of the High King's.

Though the harsh climate will not provide food for any more northmen than already live here, the wealth of mineral resources has ensured that those who live here live very well. Cautious trading arrangements have even been established with Callidyrr—some of the excess raw metal mined by Gnarhelm is traded to Callidyrr for food and drink. Thus far, efforts to persuade the Ffolk to also offer their fine steel weapons for trade have met with failure.

Gnarhelm is the original home of the Roaming Bear legend so commonly heard among the northmen. The legend tells of a great bear that paces across the highlands on misty evenings, devouring whole families with a single bite. Some versions claim that the bear can shift its shape into that of a man. Most of the tales state that the bear moves as a ghostly apparition that cannot be killed.

ashore. Now we could see, in the distance, throngs fleeing through the wide and muddy streets toward the rolling hills of grass and clover beyond the town. Smoke already rose from several small fires, but the pirates plainly intended to plunder the town before burning it.

The two longships advanced under the power of their oarsmen. The kings urged speed as they saw the battle raging before them. The vessels fairly flew through the water, swiftly closing toward the pirate vessels. The raiders, meanwhile, had noticed our arrival and scrambled back to their boats so as not to get caught between the forces of the northmen.

They were too late. With howling cries for vengeance, the northmen drove their vessels alongside the anchored pirate ships, crushing many of the dinghys in their advance. Grunnarch's men leaped to the deck of one of the pirate vessels and quickly swept the remaining crewmen away. Thelgaar's men had likewise seized an enemy vessel, setting it quickly ablaze before swinging across to the remaining pirate ship.

I stood, enthralled, at the scene, for it had been many years since I had witnessed a true battle. Many of the northmen flew into a berserking frenzy, offering no quarter even as the pirates lost heart for the fight. In 20 minutes the fight was over. One of the pirate ships had burned to the waterline, while the other two were eagerly plundered by the northmen. Some pirates had surrendered to the townsfolk, and would doubtless be used as slaves, but the majority had gone to meet their gods.

The berserking fit left the northmen as soon as there were no more pirates to fight. The damage to Gnarhelm was minimal, as we had surprised the pirates in the early stages of the raid. Although King Helmudson and most of his warriors were gone, the people that remained were eager to host a victory celebration for their rescuers. I thus had one more opportunity to enjoy the hospitality of the northmen before embarking on my journey home. This feast offered a whole steer and a large pig for our consumption, as well as some fine Callidysh ale that these people had traded for.

Somewhat gleefully, the northmen chained their pirate prisoners to a wall of the feasting hall in the king's lodge and forced them to watch our revelry. I had no sympathy for the buccaneers, knowing that, had they been victorious, they would have been feasting and drinking in our place.

The following day a band of horsemen arrived, led by King Rolf Olafson, from the nearby realm of Olafstaad. A messenger had reached him late the previous day with news of the raid, and Rolf had immediately dispatched a troop of his swiftest riders. Not knowing of our arrival, but aware that the warriors of Gnarhelm were at sea, King Olafson had expected to do little more than avenge a massacre. Now, however, he declared that nothing short of a celebration feast would do, and so for a second day the northmen of Gnarhelm feasted and drank to toast their victory.

When Rolf learned that the reason for the visit, aside from trying Thelgaar's new longship, was to show me the lands of the northmen, he insisted that I accompany him to his steading as his honored guest. I did not refuse, and here bid Grunnarch and Thelgaar farewell. These two kings, dynamic and charismatic men, I felt certain would be heard from again in tales and legends.

I rode overland with Rolf and his horsemen and saw many differences between Gnarhelm and the other kingdoms of the northmen I had visited. Farms were larger and more prosperous here, many of them resembling the fields of the Ffolk more than those of northmen. Livestock was more numerous, and I noticed in particular many splendid horses. Indeed, the mount that carried me to Olafstaad was a strong and spirited gray, much like the sturdy horses I had seen in Corwell.

We took several days to reach Rolf's steading, and the length of the journey made me doubly impressed that the riders from Olafstaad had passed this way in a night and a day of riding. The road was good, hard clay—not paved quite so well as the King's Roads in Callidyrr or Corwell Road, but certainly grander than any other thoroughfare developed by the northmen. Small villages, often no more than an inn, several cottages, and a mill, dotted the landscape. More so than any other northmen, it seemed that the people of Gnarhelm had adopted some of the habits and livelihoods of the Ffolk when they had settled here.

Finally we reach Olafstaad. The little coastal town was centered about the huge wooden lodge that served as Rolf's family home. Many small cottages and work buildings for the fishermen and farmers sprawled neatly along the shore. I saw when I entered the place that Rolf had indeed spent valuable coin to provide his home with as many comforts as he could.

Deep, plush bearskins lined the floor. We ate and drank from platters and goblets of crystal and gold. He even displayed works of art, such as sculptures and tapestries, along the walls of his great lodge. Despite the fact that many of these pieces must have been the gains of piracy and raiding, they had been arranged tastefully, providing the most cultured setting I had experienced since leaving Caer Callidyrr.

I spent upwards of a week at Olafstaad, and enjoyed my stay immensely. Rolf had a young son who wished to study the ways of the world, and as a result of my stay we decided to send him with me back to Waterdeep. There he would join my apprentices and become literate—a rarity among the northmen.

Finally, Rolf outfitted his own longship, captaining it himself, and we sailed into the Sea of Moonshae. He would take me all the way to Waterdeep, he promised, and I thus prepared to close the book on my adventures on the Moonshaes.

Game Information

Gnarhelm has a large standing army, prepared to deal with any threat from the Fairheight Mountains, the Ffolk of Callidyrr, or pirate raids. Each lesser kingdom can field a force of 400 1st-level footmen, 100 of whom are armed with short bows, and 120 2d-level riders and horses.

The Korinn Archipelago: Outposts To The North

At a Glance

The Korinn Archipelago is a chain of small islands that extends northward into the Trackless Sea from the northern tip of Alaron. It is a wild and unlawful place, settled primarily by northmen, although remnants of the Ffolk live here as well.

Most of the terrain on the islands is hilly or mountainous, with very few places suitable for farming. Although some of the islands are wooded with a hardy breed of pine tree, most of them are barren moors, tundra, or simply bedrock.

Most of the people living here are either fishermen, who seek the great schools of herring, cod, and salmon that course regularly around the islands, or herdsmen who tend goats, sheep, or pigs. The rest of the inhabitants are pirates, cutthroats, criminals, and other rogues.

The islanders make and trade wool, leather, salt pork, fish, and mutton among themselves and with the rest of the realms of the northmen. A few of the islands have legitimate port towns upon them; these ports are the centers of trade. Most of the rest of the human settlements are simple villages, erected on a narrow shore in the lee of some protective natural breakwater, such as another island.

A century ago, the archipelago was tamed by the sword of a northman king named Viledel. For 40 years the islands flourished during a time of peace, when pirates were banished to the north and south, and men did not live every day in fear of a buccaneer's raid. With the death of the king, however, the islands fragmented, and the weak fell prey to the strong. Since then, no leader has been able to unite them under one banner. Thus, the Korinn Archipelago, unlike the other realms of the northmen in the Moonshaes, is just a collection of small kingdoms. It plays little role in the greater politics of the northmen versus the Ffolk.

Some of the major islands are listed here:

Caftenor: This island offers the most resources of all the archipelago. It has a sizeable population of halflings and a decent port (also called Caftenor). It is surrounded by well-stocked fishing grounds.

Dennik: This island has few coastal villages, as these have long since been ravaged by the pirates who live on many of the surrounding isles. It is ringed by mountains and bluffs, but the central plateau is covered by many broad fields, where herds of livestock graze and some crops are grown.

Ventris: This island, the largest of the archipelago, is mostly covered by thick pine forests. Though heavily mountainous, enough of its land has been cleared to allow several farming communities to prosper. This island has sizeable populations of dwarves and halflings and even a few elves. The elves are from the mainland races, not the Llewyr.

Pandira: This is one of the largest of the islands of the archipelago. It boasts a good port and a population almost exclusively made up of ruffians and cutthroats. Pandira's port is a thriving pirate base, used by buccaneers who venture far north and east of the Moonshaes, as well as among the islands themselves.

Elminster's Notes

Rolf's longship, aided by a fair wind, took us northward past a long chain of small islands. I noticed that the northmen remained very vigilant as we made this passage. When I asked for comment, Rolf simply grunted "Korinn pirates. They're as likely to rob a kinsman as a blood enemy."

I noticed that the men did not relax until the islands of the archipelago had dropped well astern.

OTHER LANDS OF THE MOONSHAES

Myrloch Vale: The Soul of The Goddess

At midday they turned from the narrow ledge and walked into the high, wind-swept pass. Behind them stretched miles of rocky highlands and dense forests. The pastoral farmlands of Corwell were invisible in the haze of distance.

And ahead of them, seen by each for the first time, lay Myrloch Vale.

The glimmering blue waters of Myrloch itself were barely visible. Many smaller lakes dotted the nearer landscape; rows upon rows of craggy peaks stretched away to the right and left. The trail to the north of the pass descended steeply across a wide, snowy slope into a lush forest of aspen and pine. Broad meadows, bright with flowers, broke the green canopy of the forests. Sparkling waterfalls too numerous to count spilled from the highlands into the vale, feeding the many brooks that created a silvery network of waterways connecting the many lakes.

In one place only, below them and to their right, did Myrloch Vale seem unhealthy. A sprawling region of spindly, leafless tree trunks surrounded a marshy fen. Numerous ponds dotted the area, but they did not seem to sparkle with the sunlight as did the water elsewhere. Much of the fen was obscured by thick growths of tangled brush and slumping, mossy trees.

As the companions passed over the summit, staring in awe at the scene before them, each of them felt a little prickle across the scalp, as if lightning was prepared to strike nearby. Yet the sky was cloudless.

"Magic!" barked Pawldo, nervously scratching the back of his neck. "Mark my words—we'll all be salamanders if we take another step into this accursed place!"

—From Darkwalker on Moonshae

AT a Glance

Myrloch Vale is named for the deep blue lake that is its dominating geographical feature. The huge valley is the most pristine wilderness that remains in the Moonshaes. It is regarded as a place of great sanctity by the druids and the Ffolk.

A nearly solid ring of high mountains surrounds the vale, serving as a protective buffer against the encroachments of humans. The few passes that cross these ranges are hard to find, follow tortuous and difficult approaches, and often present false trails that dead-end in box canyons or against sheer cliffs.

The only exceptions are some passes that connect the valley to Corwell to the south. Here the mountains are not so rugged and the connecting valleys not so difficult to follow. But also here dwell the Ffolk, who have little wish to disturb such a location of high religious significance.

Myrloch Vale is home to a thriving population of creatures, but very few humans are numbered among them. The only humans here are those druids privileged enough to be charged with guarding the goddess's most sacred lands. The grove of the Great Druid of Gwynneth, Genna Moonsinger, stands upon the shore of Myrloch itself.

Among the inhabitants of the vale are numerous faerie dragons who buzz like bumblebees among the wild flowers and park-like woods. Dryads can be found here, dwelling peacefully in their oaken homes. The vale also is home to leprechauns, eagles, sylphs, nymphs, centaurs, pixies, and Llewyr. All of these creatures inhabit the pastoral woodlands and fields in peace and harmony.

An occasional element of strife is introduced into the valley from some more malicious inhabitants, including harpies, giant weasels, rocs, and the savage firbolg giants. Still, the area is large and the populations of the various creatures are well-balanced, so life carries on from year to year in much the same pattern.

Myrloch Vale is a deep, clear, and cold body of water. Tales speak of an ancient kingdom of the faerie folk, lying beneath the water, that will become the final home of these creatures when human encroachment has driven them from the lands of the Moonshaes. The lake is certainly large enough to shelter such a place, but no clue as to its existence is visible upon the surface.

Among the many lakes and ponds of the valley are scattered more than a dozen Moonwells, each entrusted to the care of a mature and responsible druid. The Moonwell of Genna Moon-singer stands beside the shore of Myrloch itself, and is surrounded by the ring of stone arches that often characterize places of particular sanctity among the Ffolk. This is also the ring where the entire council of the druids of Gwynneth will gather to meet when their mistress commands.

Most of the other inhabitants of the vale live where they please, in burrows among the woodlands and pleasant groves, or in some of the many caves that pocket the foothills surrounding the valley. Only the firbolgs have made an attempt to disrupt and master the land, building crude stone huts in places and chopping down any trees that get in their way.

The Fens of the Fallon is the only inhospitable area of Myrloch Vale. This dingy swamp is centered around one of the Moonwells, but the well has been polluted by the diligent efforts of the firbolgs, in answer to the commands of their master, Kazgoroth. Now the fens are a dark and stagnant reach, seldom visited by the more wholesome inhabitants of the vale. Its waters are foul and are host to leeches, poisonous toads, and other unpleasant animal life. Even the druids shun the place, for a persistent malaise seems to afflict these clerics of the goddess if they linger too long within the rank region.

Hunting parties of Llewyr are not uncommon in Myrloch Vale, and the goddess welcomes their delicate enhancement of the Balance. The elvenfolk, upon the hunt, prey upon the old and weakened of their quarry, thus strengthening the breed in the long run. They also use all of any creature they slay, not wasting the bones, horns, or other parts, as human hunters often are wont to do.

Bands of dwarves have also come down from the mountains of Highhome to explore the wild places of Myrloch Vale. Occasionally they mine for gold and other precious metals in the bubbling streams that carry the minerals from the rocky highlands to lay them in gravelly streambeds. Unlike human miners, however, the dwarves do not tear up the streambed and muddy the waters in the pursuit of riches. Instead, they carefully dip their pans into promising patches of gravel, removing the glittering specks of gold, or the occasional plump nugget, and return the rest of the gravel to its bed in the stream.

Myrloch Vale is the home of Kamerynn the Unicorn. This mighty creature is lord of all the wild things, when he chooses to be. The sight of the great white unicorn is uncommon, for even in this wildest of places he seeks out the most remote thickets, the most tangled byways, to avoid contact with others. Still, he is there, and when he is seen in all his wild majesty, the sight remains with the viewer for life.

The centaur tribes that roam the vale tend to remain in the north, for they avoid the firbolgs as much as possible. The centaurs live more like wild animals than humans, primarily because, in such a land of plenty, there is no reason for them to practice agriculture or any other type of innately human activity. Of course, they hunt very skillfully and use spears with stone heads or clubs of wood and flint, but like the Llewyr they kill only what they need and use all of what they kill. This is hunting that enhances the Balance, and the goddess can rejoice in the killing, as well as the birth of the new lives that replace the prey.

Elminster's Notes

Several times during my travels on the Moonshaes, I heard mention of Myrloch Vale. When spoken of by the Ffolk, it sounded like a place of infinite beauty and peace. They spoke of it almost as if it were a mystical, not a real, place. I never spoke to a person who claimed to have seen it, but all had a definite picture of what it looked like.

The northmen spoke of it less frequently. In fact, I only recall one mention of it, and that during the feast in the lodge of Thelgaar Ironhand. (The vale, of course, forms the southern border to Thelgaar's kingdom.) When it was mentioned here, the northmen looked around suspiciously, and spoke of the place in hushed tones, as if it were a land of unspeakable horror and grim death.

These two views of the same place perhaps illustrate better than anything else the different views of the land held by the Ffolk and the northmen. It is why, I fear, the two races may never learn to live together in peace.

Game Information

Myrloch Vale is a place of health and beauty. Characters who visit it find themselves benefiting from the purity of the place, but only as long as they do nothing to disrupt its balance.

A character regains 1 extra hit point per day when recovering from wounds in Myrloch Vale. This hit point can be regained even if the character travels and fights during the day—he does not have to spend the whole time resting.

Hunting, as long as it is not wasteful, is good in the vale, since the wildlife is plentiful and has not developed a significant fear of humans. However, wasting game or cutting down or damaging living trees brings the wrath of the druids upon the intruders. This wrath manifests itself in nuisance attacks of bugs and bad weather, if the infraction was a mild one; if the characters caused extensive damage, they are subject to deadly attacks by enraged wild animals and the full range of druidical magics.

The Fens of the Fallon is a separate locale, not bound by these penalties. However, the hunger of the monsters there will cause many attacks against intruders.

In the heart of the fens, the firbolgs have erected a giant stone stronghold, using blocks they have dragged here from nearby mountains. This stronghold is garrisoned by some 60 firbolgs, but it contains a treasure room with many magical items and about 50,000 gp worth of treasure.

Synnoria: Land of The Llewyr

At a Glance

In a high valley among the sheer mountains bordering Myrloch Vale lies the elven land of Synnoria. It is a small realm by the standards of the Moonshaes, but is completely unlike any of the other lands on the islands.

Synnoria is nearly impossible to find if one does not have excellent directions. There are three passes that lead into the valley, but each is a narrow path through many winding gorges, with a number of false trails to deter the uninvited.

From above, Synnoria appears to be simply a continuation of the sprawling peaks that surround it, for a mass illusion masks it from aerial observation. The mountains that insulate the valley from Myrloch Vale are rugged, and those separating Synnoria from Corwell are altogether unclimbable.

Synnoria is crossed by many small streams and brooks; the music of flowing water is everywhere. The Llewyr have used their magic to shape the land so that the streams flow as works of art. Bridges of wood, glass, and silver cross the brooks in particularly beautiful locations. The land as a whole has been carefully wrought into a garden—not a formal garden, where nature has been brought to heel by her masters, but a wild garden, where nature can display her beauty in a wonderfully balanced pattern.

The Llewyr enjoy their art as they move about Synnoria. They travel often in boats of bark, wood, or even glass. Sometimes they ride their white horses along winding paths—paths that have been designed not so much to connect two locations as to show travelers the wonders between two places.

The elves of Synnoria have locked themselves away from the rest of the world to insure their survival as a pure race. The origins of the Llewyr upon the Moonshaes are locked with them, but it is suspected that the Llewyr are descended from the shipwrecked survivors of an elven vessel that was making the great journey to the west. Whether this is true or not, these origins now lie millennia in the past, so that even the elves have passed many generations since those original settlers. When the humans began to spread across the Moonshaes, the parents and grandparents of the current generations of Llewyr elected to fall back to Synnoria, which had long been a favored place of the elves.

Here they expanded the wondrous capital city of Chrysalis. Aided by their magics, they enhanced its beauty, and that of their land, in a way that was pleasing even to the goddess. She rewarded the Llewyr with gifts of her own: Mirror Lake, where one can always learn the truth, and the Grove of Meditation, which the elves use to enhance their already considerable magic power.

And the music of the falls is also a gift of the goddess. This last gift is perhaps the most precious, for it ensures that Synnoria will always be the province of the Llewyr. Humans can enter it only with difficulty, and those who do almost always go mad from the sheer beauty of the music of the falls.

But the Llewyr pay a price for their isolation. Their population is slowly but steadily shrinking. Births are rare and cause for great celebration. A new baby is born only every 8-10 years to the elvenfolk. Deaths from natural causes nearly match this rate, but accidental deaths and deaths in battle have caused a steady decrease in the numbers of the Llewyr. Males are especially rare, so many of the activities that had been performed by males have now been adopted by the females.

This includes the defense of the realm. Now the warriors of the Llewyr are the Sisters of Synnoria. This elite band of knights is armed with silver lances and enchanted long swords, more gifts from the goddess. In exchange for these gifts, however, the sisters have taken a pledge. They ride white chargers into battle—horses of a line supposedly descended from Kamerynn himself. The stallion of the herd, named Avalon, is not ridden by a knight. Instead, he is locked in a corral, fed well, and guarded carefully.

For the pledge to the goddess requires that, if ever a human of royal blood should mount and ride Avalon, the sisters must serve that person for a full year.

The Llewyr grow and eat a variety of fruits and vegetables, shunning all meat. The animals of Myrloch Vale are trusting friends of the elves, and the deer in particular are treated more like pets than wildlife.

Trout are regarded as sacred creatures. Some Llewyr think that the fish represent the spirits of their ancestors, while others regard them as the sages of the land. The clear streams and lakes of Synnoria teem with the fish, many of which have grown to enormous size.

The heart of Synnoria is the city of Chrysalis, rising upon its rounded hill from the center of a circular lake. The city is a dazzling display of glass, crystal, and silver. Clear, strong walls surround it. Slender towers climb skyward from many places within it. Some of these are shining silver needles, while others have been etched from such perfect crystal that someone standing upon them seems to be suspended in midair.

But much of Chrysalis is now abandoned, for the city was built for three times more elves than now live in all the land of Synnoria. Legends tell the Llewyrr of an eventual return to greatness—to a reassumption of their mastery of the Moonshaes.

But after these many centuries, it is doubtful that even many of the elves believe.

Game Information

Synnoria contains several beautiful things that can hold unexpected menace for the inquisitive player character.

The music of the waterfalls is an effect caused by the clear water that flows from the high mountains into the streams and brooks of Synnoria. This water is the melt from glaciers that have been enchanted by the goddess herself—perhaps through Moonwells that lie locked beneath the snow.

The water sings a song of heart-wrenching beauty as it spills over waterfalls and babbles along rocky streambeds throughout Synnoria. This sound is a lovely backdrop to the Llewyr, a part of the loveliness of their land.

But to humans, the music is a deadly menace. Each time a human character approaches a stream in Synnoria, he must roll a successful saving throw vs. spell or become enraptured by the music, sitting beside the water and content to listen for the rest of his life. He refuses food and drink and resists to the utmost any attempts to move him away from the water. Once out of range (300 feet for a stream, 2,000 feet for a waterfall), the enchantment is broken. Each body of water must be checked for separately. If the sound is caused by a waterfall, a -6 penalty applies to the saving throw. However, if the sound is masked by a silence spell or other music—the playing of a bard’s harp, for instance—the effect can be avoided.

Mirror Lake, a deep blue lake in a corner of the realm, has the ability to answer questions. It will always speak the truth.

The questions must be asked by a character at dawn, when the surface of the lake is undisturbed by ripples. Up to three questions can be asked. Single-sentence answers are given by the lake. If the character asking the questions has not been completely true to his alignment, deities, and companions, however, the lake will tell of these failings in painful detail.

The effect of this revelation is to compel the character to set the situation right, as if a geas spell had been cast upon him.

The Grove of Meditation is a stately circle of pine trees that have proven of great help to elven magic-users. Only elven magic-users or fighter/magic-users with Intelligences of 17 or greater can benefit from the grove.

The Grove enables elven mages to exceed the usual racial level limits. If the elf has received enough experience points to advance to a level that he would not otherwise be allowed to attain, he must spend every day, from dawn until dusk, meditating in the grove. After 1d6 months, the elf will have received enlightenment from the goddess sufficient to allow him to advance an additional level.

An elven magic-user or fighter/magic-user can use the grove indefinitely, advancing in level as far as his earned experience points allow.

Flamstead: The Unusual Isle

AT a GLANCE

Flamsterd is an island settled by magic-users. The man who gave the island its name is of course the mage Flamsterd, who emigrated from Waterdeep seeking a locale where he could practice his arts in privacy. He was a (relatively) gentle man, and the native Ffolk accepted his arrival willingly.

The great mage proceeded to erect a high tower on the southern peninsula of the island—a promontory that extended far out to sea. He brought over many apprentices from the mainland, or recruited them from among the native Ffolk.

The island prospered. Aided by the spells of the wizard and his apprentices, crops flourished, livestock thrived, and the nasty storms that beset the rest of the Moonshaes seemed to pass to either side of Flamsterd.

The apprentices that Flamsterd had brought to the isles increased in level and power. They began to bicker among themselves, and with their teacher. Soon their conflicts had escalated to the point where several young mages died from the acts of their fellow students.

The Ffolk began to flee from the region of Flamsterd's tower as these incidents grew more frequent and more violent. Hideous monsters emerged from the chaos to wander free on the island. Owl bears, leucrotta, and other bizarre creatures terrorized the people of the isles.

The long peninsula of Flamsterd became a wasteland, subject to the ravages of magic. Throughout this conflict, the hand of the great mage was missing; it seemed to be only the destructive acts of his young disciples that caused noticeable effects.

And then one night the peninsula and the tower exploded.

Half of the island vanished, and the sea quickly rushed in to cover the scars. No one knows exactly what happened, but Flamsterd and most of his apprentices have not been seen since.

Now the island is a bleak wasteland of poor farms, small fishing villages, and the occasional wandering horror that survived the cataclysm.

ELMINSTER'S NOTES

I make this entry with sadness, for Flamsterd and I had become fast friends in our decades together in Waterdeep. The mage was always a trifle, well, eccentric, but he was a true master of his craft. In fact, he was in many ways a pioneer in the development of the arcane arts.

I find it hard to accept the fact that he is dead.

Game Information

Well, he isn't, actually. Tired of the bickering of his apprentices, the lack of discipline in those who had talent, and the clumsiness of those who did not, Flamsterd got rather angry.

Many of the warty toads and slimy salamanders slithering around the shores of the island testify to the mage's mercy—he didn't really kill all those youthful apprentices. After he had taught them a lesson, those who did not flee into the night were turned into various small slimy creatures. He retreated once again to a private location to pursue his studies.

This time he took his laboratory, and a good part of his island, with him. Through the use of powerful magic, and employing the aid of high-level druids, he sank part of his island to the bottom of the sea. There he works in peace, developing magical spells, and testing them upon unwitting fish.

His tower is now surrounded by a great bubble of air, so that the mage can enjoy a walk in the garden, or throw open his window on a hot day. The bubble may be freely passed through by living creatures, but the seawater itself is barred. In fact, the mage and his servants eat quite well upon fish that fall through the ceiling.

APPENDIX A:

Using The Moonshaes

The many adventuring possibilities of the Moonshae Islands can be explored in a number of different types of campaigns. Several suggestions are presented here.

Campaign Themes

Module N4, Treasure Hunt, provides a unique opportunity for starting a campaign, as it is designed for 0-level characters—i.e., PCs who have not even selected a character class. It is set in the Korinn Archipelago, and players can easily develop a campaign there or move to other parts of the Moonshaes.

The first FORGOTTEN REALMS™ novel, Darkwalker on Moonshae, presents another possible campaign track. This campaign places one PC in the role of the crown prince of Corwell, with the others as his companions. The campaign works well when started with mid-level characters. Use the following guidelines to employ PCs from the novel:

Tristan: 6th-level ranger
Daryth: 7th-level thief
Robyn: 5th-level druid
Pawldo: 4th/5th-level fighter/thief
Keren: 13th-level bard
Arlen: 8th-level fighter
Finellen: 5th-level fighter
Brigit: 4th/5th-level fighter/magic-user

Other campaigns can be developed in any of the lands detailed in this source book. Player characters can be human northmen or Ffolk, halflings, dwarves, Lewyrr, or visitors to the isles. With some idea of what your players are interested in (do they want to explore dungeons, fight wars, right great wrongs, wrong great rights, or what?), you should be able to add the game details necessary to provide a full career of adventuring right on the Moonshae Islands.

Suggested Adventures

Try adapting some of the following adventure ideas for your campaign. Some are well-suited for low-level play, while others work better at mid level or higher, but you can always fiddle with the balance to create a challenging adventure for any level of PCs.

Pirates Off The Port Bow!

This adventure can work with PCs in the roles of the pirates or their victims. Young fighters and other adventurers are recruited by pirates. Non-pirates can become involved in adventures chasing the pirates in an effort to recover their valuables.

The Lore of The Land

Druid adventures play a big part in Moonshae campaigning. Many situations make for good solo adventures. It is also likely that a druid will enlist the aid of fellow adventurers to deal with problem such as an infestation of goblins or the desecration of an ancient barrow by an evil cleric, who might even animate the buried bodies to bring a plague of undead upon the land.

Werewolf in The Mist

The ravaging werewolf roaming the highlands is a splendid theme for a Celtic-type adventure. This can be used to draw inexperienced characters away from lives of sheepherding or hunting and into lives of adventure.

Battles and Campaigns

If you enjoy playing miniatures battles, many BATTLESYSTEM™ game scenarios can be designed to fall within the Moonshae campaign. Pirate and northmen raids can be played as miniatures battles. The sahuagin might emerge from the sea in force, providing several scenarios, or the PCs can become involved in a power struggle that results in a revolution within a single kingdom.

Underwater Adventuring

The undersea locations of Caer Allyson and the Tower of Flamsterd can provide unique adventuring opportunities. Also, the menace of the sahuagin can be played up in the Moonshaes and used to provide a setting for large-scale undersea encounters.

APPENDIX B:

Magical Items Unique To The Moonshae Islands

The following items might be discovered in some of the locales upon the Moonshae Islands, at the DM's discretion. Alternately, certain PC classes such as the druid might be able to make one or two of these items.

Druid's Cudgel

This magical club can be fashioned by a druid from the limb of a freshly dead oak tree. The tree must have been killed by some natural cause, such as lightning, drought, blight, or flood, that does not cause a weakening of the wood. The cudgel cannot be fashioned from a tree that has been killed by the actions of man.

The cudgel must be whittled smooth on the day preceding a full moon, and then immersed in the waters of a Moonwell from sunset to sunrise through the night of a full moon. When removed in the morning, it will be enchanted.

A druid's cudgel is a +1 magic weapon that inflicts 2-7 points of damage to small- and medium-sized creatures, and 2-5 points to large victims. It can be enhanced with a shillelagh spell, which adds an additional +1 to hit and damage.

Torque of The Goddess

This is a silver band that can be worn about the neck. It is commonly used as ornamentation by druids and other members of the Ffolk. The torque of the goddess functions in all respects as a ring of protection, +1 or +2, and can be used in conjunction with most magical rings, but not with other rings of protection.

In addition, the torque of the goddess provides its wearer with immunity to the disease of lycanthropy, though not the damage from a lycanthrope's attacks. The wearer receives a +2 to all attack and damage rolls against lycanthropes. Although the torque does not give a weapon that cannot harm a lycanthrope the ability to do so, the wearer can damage a lycanthrope with his bare hands or biting attacks. A torque can also be used as a collar for a dog.

Cauldron of Doom

This unique and potent item was cast by an ancient blacksmith under the watchful eye of the Beast, Kazgoroth. Its last rumored location was the Castle of Skulls in Llyrath Forest on the island of Gwynneth.

The cauldron can be used to create a zombie-like monster from a human corpse. If a corpse is thrown into the cauldron, it is imbued with a mindless form of animation; it will answer the commands of the one who threw it into the cauldron.

The zombie thus created is identical to a normal zombie, with a couple of exceptions. It has 4 (rather than 2) Hit Dice and thus attacks as a 4-HD monster. It also has an Armor Class of 5.

Yoke of Boar Harnessing

These rare devices are of druidic design and can be used to harness a pair of boars or giant boars to the will of the bearer. Such boars can be harnessed to a chariot, cart, plow, or other towed object. Alternatively, the harness can be separated into two pieces, mastering two boars for riding purposes. Creatures larger than dwarves or elves (Llewyr) can ride only giant boars.

The harnessed boar responds to all of the commands of the bearer, but it does not receive any magical increase in intelligence. Thus tasks that could normally be learned by the creature can automatically be performed while under the harness, but the boar cannot perform unusually complicated tasks.

Yoke of Flight

This large yoke can be used to harness a pair of horses. When in use, the horses have the power of flight and can pull a chariot through the air at a speed of 36".

To take off, the chariot must race in a straight line at a speed of at least 12" per round. When the command word is spoken, the vehicle lifts off the ground and soars into the air. It must travel at least 12" per turn to remain airborne; at a slower speed it automatically crashes. The chariot flies with Maneuverability Class E.

Landing requires a straight path at least 18" long. It takes two rounds to slow down enough to maneuver freely on the ground.

Yoke of Underwater Action

This yoke, like the yoke of flight, enables a pair of horses to carry a chariot through a medium it could not normally enter. In this case, the environment is water.

The horses can pull the chariot at their normal movement rate. The horses have no difficulty breathing, nor do any riders who remain upon the chariot.

Avenging Hammer

This is a mighty war hammer that requires a Strength of at least 18 to wield. It functions as a lucern hammer +2 in most combat situations.

When the hammer of vengeance is wielded against an opponent wearing metal armor, including chain mail, the hammer's special ability can be employed. On any hit upon a metal-armored individual with a roll of 18 to 20 (on 1d20), the metal armor is smashed and rendered useless. The shards fall immediately to the ground, leaving the victim unprotected for all subsequent attacks.

Sword of Cymrych Hugh

This potent artifact is the personal weapon of the first High King. It serves as a long sword +4 for combat purposes. It also has the special ability of detect demons within a 36" radius. This ability is usable at will.

The sword was specifically designed to battle the Beast, Kazgoroth. When that enemy is within 36" of the sword, and the wielder touches the sword by the hilt, he must make a successful saving throw vs. spell or be compelled to seek out the monster and battle it directly.

Druid Staff

The druid staff is a shaft of oak with a head carved in the shape of a wild animal, usually a boar, wolf, deer, or eagle. The staff allows the user to perform several special functions.

It can be used to summon animals of the type carved onto the staff. At a cost of two charges, the user can send out a call. All animals of the appropriate type within 12 miles hasten to the druid as quickly as possible. Once they reach the druid, they act as if under an animal control spell.

The staff can also be used to cast animal control on any animal within sight of the staff, at a cost of one charge.

The staff functions as a magical weapon, with a +2 bonus to attack, inflicting 1d6 + 2 points of damage on a successful hit.

The staff also functions as a python staff, with the characteristics of the staff of the serpent as detailed in the DMG. This includes the destruction of the staff if the snake is killed. Using the staff as a snake costs one charge.

At a cost of two charges, the staff can be used to cast one of the following druidical spells:

Call Lightning
Dispel Magic
Cure Serious Wounds

Plant Growth
Cure Disease
Speak With Plants

Once per month, with no cost in charges, the staff can perform one of the following greater abilities:

Wall of Fire
Transmute Rock to Mud
Conjure Fire Elemental

Insect Plague
Wall of Thorns
Conjure Earth Elemental

After using its greater power once, the staff only regains this ability if it is recharged in a Moonwell beneath a full moon, as explained in the Deities of the Moonshaes section (page 21).

Runestick

The runestick is a kind of magical wand that can be created by a druid of 7th level or higher, but only if he has a Dexterity of at least 14. The runestick is a short piece of oak (about 12 inches long), carved with a detailed pattern of runes, and then wrapped in mistletoe or holly. It can be used to store up to five spell levels of druidical spells.

The stick takes 1d4 hours to create for each spell level cast into it (roll separately for each spell). Upon completing the runestick, the druid must cast upon it the spells he wishes to store. The runestick crumbles to dust one month after its creation; it cannot be recharged.

The spells stored in the runestick are cast at the level of the druid who enchanted the runestick. It can be used by any druid who knows the command word. It can also be used by any maiden of pure heart (use the unicorn test to determine this) who knows the command word. However, when used by a non-druid, the effects of the spells (radius, range, damage, etc.) are halved and victim receives a +4 modifier to his saving throw.

Magical Sickles

These devices are of two types, as explained below. In addition to the special effects listed, a magical sickle can be used as a magical weapon: +2 to hit and inflicting 1d4 + 2 points of damage to all sizes of victims.

Golden Sickle

A golden sickle contains 2d6 charges when found. It has two abilities:

* Without expending a charge, the golden sickle allows the user to pass without trace, exactly as the druid spell of the same name. This does require the user to concentrate.

By expending a charge, the user can employ the plant door spell to open a pathway through tangled or solid plant growth. Unlike the normal spell, however, the plant door spell from the sickle always lasts one turn and the path can be used by anyone. It can be up to 120 feet long.

Black Sickle (Blightbringer)

The black sickle is an arcane device of potent evil. When it strikes a plant, that plant and all others within a 30-foot radius immediately wither and die. Animated plant-type creatures, such as treants, shambling mounts, and mobile fungi, receive a saving throw vs. spell to avoid the effect. Even if the save is successful, however, the animated plant must remove itself from the area of the blight as quickly as possible.

Mug of Plenty

This device is a large clay beer mug. When a command word is spoken, it immediately fills with light or dark ale or thick mead, as the user wishes. When drained, the command word will cause it to fill again. While not particularly useful on adventures (although you never know...), this is perhaps the most popular magical item among the isles.

Helm of Seabreathing

This is a limited version of the helm of underwater action. It allows the wearer to breathe underwater, at any depth, but in no way enhances his movement or vision.

Figurehead Of Blessing

This device is most commonly employed by the northmen to guard the longship of a king or other important individual.

A vessel with this figurehead can go 1" faster than the usual top speed for that type of vessel, regardless of whether it is under oar or sail power. Whenever the steersman or captain makes an Intelligence Check to avoid or detect hazards, a +2 bonus applies to the character's Intelligence score. The figurehead increases the hull value of a vessel by 10% (round fractions up).

Perhaps its most important function is to grant the ship a partial immunity to turbulent seas. A ship with this figurehead treats any type of rough weather as the next calmest weather type, as shown of the Wind Direction and Force Table of the DMG, page 54. Thus a hurricane is as a storm to this ship, a storm is treated as a strong gale, etc.

Finally, if a fire strikes the vessel, the degree of damage inflicted is also modified to the next more favorable class, as also shown in the DMG, page 54. Heavy Damage becomes Moderate to Heavy Damage, and so forth.

Folding Coracle

This device is similar to a folding boat, except that it does not create such a grand vessel nor does it take up as much space when it is collapsed.

The folding coracle looks like a small leather patch when folded — about the size of a large playing card. In fact, the patch may be sewn to a piece of clothing as a means of disguising it. When the command word is spoken, it expands into a skin-and-strut craft that is circular and about eight feet in diameter. Up to six human-sized passengers can travel in it.

THE FUTURE IS HERE FOR MILLIONS OF AD&D® GAME PLAYERS

Step into the Forgotten Realms. The fantastic new campaign world where many future ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS® adventures will now take place. A beautiful and wondrous land, so richly defined, it's been ten years in the making.

It's all been laid out in glorious detail in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set. Four sprawling full-color maps. Two massive 96-page booklets: for players, the Cyclopedia of the Realms and the invaluable DM's Sourcebook of the Realms.

On the horizon are many sourcebooks, modules and exciting new novels. The first FORGOTTEN REALMS novel, Darkwalker on Moonshae, takes you to the mystical Celtic Isles. A battle erupts between the old Ffolk and the evil Bloodriders over the secrets of the mysterious Moonshae Islands.

Novels to follow in 1988 include The Crystal Shard, by Bob Salvatore, and Black Wizards, by Douglas Niles. Black Wizards is set in the Moonshae Isles, and is a sequel to Darkwalker on Moonshae.

Also look for adventure-packed source books, including Waterdeep and the North, and Empires of the Sun. And these titles just scratch the surface! Look to the Forgotten Realms for all of your AD&D campaign adventures.

©1987 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved. Printed in the U.S.A.

FORGOTTEN REALMS™

COMPANION SET

Scale: 1 inch = 30 miles

	MOUNTAINS (high)		FOREST (heavy)		RIVER LINE
	MOUNTAINS (medium)		FOREST (medium)		CLIFFS
	MOUNTAINS (low)		FOREST (light)		SNOW
	POOHILLS		CONIFEROUS FOREST (heavy)		GLACIER
	ROLLING HILLS		CONIFEROUS FOREST (medium)		CITY
	BARREN		CONIFEROUS FOREST (light)		CASEL: KEEP
	VOLCANO		JUNGLE (heavy)		TOWN
	DESERT (hard)		JUNGLE (medium)		RUINS
	DESERT (soft)		SEA		COMMUNITY
	PLAINS / GRASSLAND		LAKE		ROADS
	CLEAR		RIVER		TRAILS
	SWAMP		DELTA		BRIDGE
	MARSH		BEACH

FORGOTTEN REALMS is a trademark owned by TSR, Inc.

Trackless

Wave Rocks

Sea

Nerth

Norheim Isles

NORLAND

So o
Moon

KORINN ARCHIPELAGO

bles

Glauspik Range

Northwind Strait

DRAGONSTONE

VENTRIS

CAPTENOR

LUCHOBAT

DENNIK

Sea of Moonshae

Falnreigh Range

Whitefish Bay

Gull Rocks

Crackless Strait

MORAY

SUNSET

Strait of the Leviathan

Flamsterø

OMAN'S
Isle

Strait of OMAN

AIAORN

GWYNNETH

Strait of ALARON

MYNLOCH

Kingsbay

LYRATH
FOREST

SNOWDOWN

FORGOTTEN REALMS™

COMPANION SET

Scale: 1 inch = 20 miles

	MOUNTAINS RANGE		FOREST (deciduous)		ROLLING HILLS
	MOUNTAINS (medium)		FOREST (coniferous)		CLIFFS
	MOUNTAINS (low)		FOREST (tropical)		SNOW
	HILLS		CONIFEROUS FOREST		GLACIER
	ROLLING HILLS		CONIFEROUS FOREST (medium)		CITY
	ROLLING HILLS		CONIFEROUS FOREST (high)		CASTLE/KEEP
	MARSH		TROPICAL FOREST		CROWN
	VOLCANO		JUNGLE (medium)		SKINS
	DESERT ISLAND		SEA		COMMANDERY
	DESERT		LAKE		ROADS
	SAVANNA		RIVER		CAULS
	PLAINS - GRASSLAND		DELTA		BRIDGE
	SWAMP		BEACH

FORGOTTEN REALMS is a trademark owned by TSR, Inc.

Norland

Rogarsheim

Chirelloch

Norheim Isles

Hammersta

Giantspire

Sea
OF MOONSH

Crackless Strait

MORAY

MORAY

Jorenhammer Range

Nyth River

Dyngnegall

Horst

Kork

Storaab

Cronbheim

MORAY

STRAIT

MORAY

MORAY

SUNSET

Seawolf Strait

Graystaab

Rotteshelm

Dragonshome

KORINN Archipelago

Caftenor

Highport

Ventris

Dennik

jae

staab

Northwind Str

Seawolf

Grayslaab

O Olarstaab

Blackstone

Callioyrr

White Rock

Whitefish Bay

Fairheight Range

O Gnarhelm

O Sunderstaab

X Highrock

Carter

prloch
Vale

Gulf of Oman

Iron Keep MAN'S SLE

AMADORN

Doncasille

Callibyrn

Ogben

Horsas

Swanma's
River

High King's Road

AMADORN

Biythe

Llewellyn

Kythys

G W Y N N E L L I

Strait of Alaron

Advanced Dungeons & Dragons®

Official Game Accessory

Source Book for the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

Moonshae

by Douglas Niles

Amid the storm-tossed vastness of the Trackless Sea west of the mainland, a group of rocky islands lies exposed to the full brunt of winter gales. These isles—the Moonshaes—are home to some of the hardest folk of the Forgotten Realms.

Now the Moonshaes—the setting of the first FORGOTTEN REALMS novel, Darkwalker on Moonshae—are detailed for your role-playing campaign. The cultures, deities, and locales of the isles are described in AD&D® game terms. This source book includes full-color maps displaying the Moonshaes and surrounding islands, many close-up maps depicting particular regions of the Moonshaes, and all the information you need to establish a campaign on these misty lands with Celtic roots.

©1987 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

Printed in the U.S.A.

TSR, Inc.
POB 756
Lake Geneva,
WI 53147 USA

TSR UK Ltd.
The Mill, Rathmore Road
Cambridge CB1 4AD
United Kingdom

ISBN 0-88038-494-8

FORGOTTEN REALMS™

Official Game Accessory

Empires of the Sands

by Scott Haring

An Accessory for Characters of All Levels
for use with the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

TSR, INC.
PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION™

Empires of The Sands

by Scott Haring

Table of Contents

Introduction	2	Geography and Climate	24
Amn	3	Money and Commerce	25
General Description	3	Cities	26
Languages	3	Places of Interest	41
Social Customs	3	Characters	45
Monsters	4
History	4	Calimshan	48
Government and Politics	5	General Description	48
Religion	6	Languages	48
Geography and Climate	7	Social Customs	49
Money and Commerce	7	Monsters	49
Cities	8	History	50
Places of Interest	13	Government and Politics	50
Characters	18	Religion	51
		Geography and Climate	52
Tethyr	21	Money and Commerce	52
General Description	21	Cities	53
Languages	21	Places of Interest	58
Social Customs	21	Characters	62
Monsters	23
History	22	Index	64
Government and Politics	23	Pull-out Section	27-38
Religion	23

Credits:

Editing: Karen S. Martin Cartography: Dave LaForce
 Cover and Interior Art: Jeff Easley Typography: Betty Elmore
 Keylining: Stephanie Tabat

TSR, Inc.
 POB 756
 Lake Geneva,
 WI 53147 USA

TSR UK Ltd.
 The Mill, Rathmore Road
 Cambridge CB1 4AD
 United Kingdom

ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS, AD&D BATTLESYSTEM, FORGOTTEN REALMS, PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION, and the TSR logo are trademarks owned by TSR, Inc.

Distributed to the book trade in the United States by Random House, Inc. and in Canada by Random House of Canada, Ltd. Distributed to the toy and hobby trade by regional distributors. Distributed in the United Kingdom by TSR UK Ltd.

This material is protected under the copyright laws of the United States of America. Any reproduction or unauthorized use of the material or artwork presented herein is prohibited without the express written permission of TSR, Inc.

©1988 TSR Inc. All Rights Reserved. Printed in U.S.A.

ISBN 0-88038-539-1
 $7.95 US
 9224

9224XXX1501

INTRODUCTION

Introductions (particularly introductions to games and game supplements) invariably fall into three categories. They can be truly useful overviews of the product, with good advice on where to start and what to do. They can be self-congratulatory, indulgent tripe in which the author tries to convince the reader what a tremendous amount of work went into the project, and how lucky he is to even have it in his hands. The last type is an obsequious, fawning thank-you note in which the author tries to mention every friend he ever had by name, detailing the invaluable contributions of third-grade teachers, girlfriends, pets, and other people you couldn't care less about. This introduction has to fill an entire page, so I'll give you a little bit of all three.

Useful Overview

With a title like that, this had better be good, huh? Anyway, Empires of the Sands is a sourcebook for the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ world setting for the ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS® game. It covers three major areas in the southwest corner of the main continent of the planet: Amn, Tethyr, and Calimshan. They are called the Empires of the Sands because of their generally warm climate and large areas of dry, inhospitable land. The book is divided into three main sections, each dealing with one of these countries.

Opening each section is a General Description, which includes a discussion of the races (both human and non-human) present, the languages spoken, and the social customs of the land. The social customs section will be particularly valuable to those wanting to understand the personality of a resident of one of these lands for better role-playing. For example, trying to bribe a judge will have a totally different result in Amn than it will in Calimshan, and understanding the social customs and personality of the two countries will help the DM know what to do.

Other sections cover the history, government and politics, religion, geography and climate, and money and commerce of the different countries. Together, they give a detailed background to each country, filled with the little details (names of coins, typical expressions, etc.) that make roleplaying more fun.

Of course, the action-lovers out there will have plenty to do, too. The remaining sections list dozens of opportunities for bands of hardy adventurers to right wrongs, bring criminals to justice, alter the course of history, or just make a little profit and pick up a little treasure.

The Cities section provides descriptions of every city listed on the two-part map provided in this sourcebook. (The maps, by the way, are the same scale as the detailed maps in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ campaign set, and fit together with them. If you also add the map in FR2—Moonshae—you are well on your way to having a map of the Forgotten Realms that will completely cover your wall!)

After the cities are described, all the other places of interest are discussed (in a section titled, appropriately enough, "Places of Interest"). The mountains, swamps, ruins, castles, islands, and rivers—plus the dangers and rewards which lurk there—are described.

Last, but not least, is a section called "Characters" which lists some of the important people and groups of people in the Empires of the Sands, along with the necessary statistics for play. The list includes heroes and villains, potential enemies and possible allies, people who will have an impact on campaigns set in this area.

My goal was for a typical DM to take any single city, place, or character description, and be able to come up with an adventure stemming from the circumstances described that would entertain his or her players. Taken as a whole, there should be enough ideas here for a campaign to run for a very long time, with a mix of high drama, low humor, great enrichment, and selfless sacrifice.

As part of the center pull-out section we have included campaign-tailored character sheets, specific to the Forgotten Realms. Seven of these are filled in, and one is left blank for your personal photocopying use.

Please address any questions regarding this product to: FR3 Questions, c/o Scott Haring, TSR, Inc., POB 756, Lake Geneva, WI 53147.

Indulgent Tripe

When I think of this project, I don't think of it as a labor of love, or a labor of duty, but just a labor. Deadlines fell victim to procrastination and self-doubt, and soon even my friends began to shun me like a leper. Friendly (and not-so-friendly) hints were dropped with the subtlety of a falling brick. Office supplies were destroyed. There was much wailing and gnashing of teeth.

But finally, I finished. And I can't help but think that despite the delays, it's a pretty good product. Normally, an introduction like this is written well before the art and maps are finished. But this thing is so late that I've already seen the art and maps—I'm very pleased, and I hope you like them, too. And I promise to start earlier next time.

Fawning Thank-Yous

I want to thank my editor, Karen Martin, for being so patient; my boss, Jim Ward, for destroying only selected portions of my office and not the entire thing; Warren Spector, for understanding; and the other TSR staffers, especially Mike Breault, Douglas Niles, and Jeff Grubb, for letting me bounce ideas off them; and my mother, for letting me use her computer to write part of this book.

And a big thank-you to Ed Greenwood, whose 10-year-old AD&D® campaign is the basis of the Forgotten Realms, and whose extensive notes provided the skeleton for this work.

Amn

General Description

Of the three “nations” said to comprise the Empires of the Sands, Amn is the only one that is, truly, a nation. Ruled for over 20 years by a “Council of Six” made up of the richest and most cunning merchants in the land, Amn has enjoyed unprecedented years of peace and prosperity.

Amn’s borders are the Cloud Peaks and the Troll Mountains to the north; the Snowflake Mountains to the east; the Sea of Swords to the west; and the northern edge of the Forest of Tethir to the south. This includes the Tethir Road and all the towns along it, from Riatavin to Murann.

Races Appearing

Amn is, first and foremost, a human society. There are no known groups of elves or dwarves living anywhere in the country. There are the ever-present rumors of a lost dwarven kingdom in the Snowflake Mountains, filled with fantastic treasures from a forgotten time, but this story is more of a favorite childhood fairy tale than a legitimate legend.

This is not to say that there are no elves or dwarves to be found; Amn is a country where money talks, and as long as there are non-humans willing to sell their special talents to men and put up with being away from their own kind, a resident of Amn can find an elf or dwarf. Nearly every marketplace worthy of the name has shops either run directly by elves or dwarves or by someone who claims to have been trained by one. These claims are sometimes not very authentic, and travelers will have to ask around: Not every “Dwarven Armory” is run by a dwarf—some shop owners, in fact, wouldn’t recognize a dwarf if one walked through the door.

There are, on the other hand, a considerable number of halflings residing in Amn. In fact, nearly 15% of the population is made up of halflings. While there is no discrimination against the halfling population, it is also true that the halflings tend to live in their own sections of town and do business with their own kind. But a halfling with a talent for business can rise quickly in Amn society, just as a human can.

Gnomes are rarely seen in Amn; the appearance of one in a town would be a cause of great interest. Half-orcs are also almost unheard of, with the exception of the town of Purskul, which has a sizable half-orc population (see below).

Languages

Amn is a merchant nation. As such, a traveler could enter the country speaking practically any known language, and somebody could be found fairly quickly who could handle the translation chores.

However, anyone who wishes to rise in Amn society must know Thorass, the ancient language of trade and commerce that is the ancestor of the “common” tongue spoken throughout the Realms. All contracts and legal documents are written in Thorass, and all court proceedings, government meetings and high-level trade negotiations are done in that language. Generally, the higher up in Amn society one is, the fewer other languages one has to speak.

Social Customs

Amn is a land where money talks, and wealth is the sole judge of social status. This leads to a number of interesting facets to Amn society that are different from practically anywhere else in the Forgotten Realms.

Knowledge and wisdom are not prized and revered traits in Amn; neither are exceptional talents in music, athletics, fighting, art, or any other pursuit. The only measure of success is material wealth. The inspired artist who refuses to “sell out” and dies penniless is a reviled failure, a freak; the mediocre artist who, through shrewd dealing and tireless self-promotion, becomes fabulously wealthy, is a role model for others.

The display of wealth is the only way to gain and retain status. It is not uncommon for a family to scrimp and save for a year, then blow it all on a party for the entire town that is completely beyond their means. Even the simplest and most humble stores have trays of expensive sweets and other delicacies for their customers. And big-money merchants regularly give each other the most outrageous and ridiculous gifts as tokens of goodwill before embarking on delicate negotiations.

Dress, as you may imagine, is gaudy, bright, intricate, and all too expensive. Elaborate headdresses are common among the women, while the men are more fond of long capes of the finest material. Elaborate embroidery, often using real gold and other precious metals, is also common. The only exception is at the very top of the social ladder—the upper crust of Amn society, refusing to become involved in the “petty status games” of those less powerful than themselves, dress in very simple clothes, with a minimum of ornamentation. (Of course, this is in itself a petty status game, but this is a complex society.) However, these clothes are always perfectly tailored, cleaned and pressed, and are always of the highest quality fabric and construction.

Even the common slang expressions of everyday life in Amn reflect a preoccupation with money and business. Some examples:

- Sold— Convinced. “I sold my wife we weren’t at the tavern, but at your workshop fixing that cabinet, so you’ve got to sell your wife the same thing in case they get together.”
- Bought into— Understood. “I really bought into that message today, Your Holiness.”
- Good Business— A standard greeting, this can mean “Hello,” “Goodbye,” or even “Get lost.”
- Found The Pearl— Enjoyed good luck. “So, Mikos has put 500 danters into this wagon, and he’s got no takers. Then, he really finds the pearl. Some rich out-of-towner breaks down right in front of his shop, and buys it right there, at full markup."

- Lost The Pearl – Suffered bad luck. "Then, Mikos' wife hears of the deal, and spends the entire purchase price on a new headdress. Talk about losing the pearl! "
- Foreclose – To kill. Can refer to practically anything. "I finally caught that stoat that had been rummaging through the trash out back. Foreclosed on him real good, too." Or, "He was just asking too much and not giving me enough security, so I just foreclosed the whole deal."
- Outbid – Was more impressive or convincing than. "Since the innkeeper's crossbow outbid their beer mugs, the brawlers quieted down real fast."
- Take Delivery – Acquire. "Did you hear Deurthon and his wife took delivery on a new son?"
- Red Ink – Bad News. "Red ink, friend. The tavern's closed."
- The Ink Couldn't Be Any Redder – Things couldn't be any worse.
- Finance – To get something you either couldn't afford or didn't deserve. "You must have done some serious financing to get such a fine husband, Meg."

Amn society has a very paradoxical attitude toward the less fortunate. On the one hand, most people believe that "poverty is the ultimate sin" (to quote a famous Amn proverb). On the other hand, donating large amounts of money to charity is one way of showing off just how wealthy you are. The result is significant amounts of money given to the poor, none of it for the right reasons.

Nearly all the charities operating in Amn are run by various churches. There are, however, a few private charities that operate "for profit." The ultimate in free enterprise, these charities solicit donations and actually do help the poor, sick, and disadvantaged, but keep a large percentage of the take for themselves. In an area where more than one of these "for profit" charities is in competition, each tries to gain the most donations by doing the most for the unfortunates in the area; this is very good for the poor, who benefit from the better treatment.

Moving about in Amn society is a tricky proposition, because there is a very high degree of attention paid to status, etiquette and protocol. Fortunately, almost every rule of Amn society derives from one simple precept known in Amn as "The Golden Rule": He who has the gold makes the rules.

This means, in general: The poor defer to the rich; the rich defer to the richer; and when in doubt, the person who is paying for it gets to decide.

Monsters

Amn is a civilized country; as such, monsters are rare, and practically nonexistent in the big cities. Of course, there's also a good deal of open country in Amn, and monsters are not uncommon there.

There are several tribes of ogres living in the Cloud Peaks, as well as several groups of hill giants. The largest threat in the area, a family of cloud giants that raided caravans in the Fang Pass, was defeated nearly 15 years ago. Mount Spear-top is rumored to be the home of several immense sleeping dragons, but little stock is given the story.

The central agricultural region of Amn has been rid of intelligent monsters long ago, but there are still incidents of lone farmers, single families, or the occasional small village being attacked by a hungry beast. Typical monsters include jackals, bears, wolves, owlbears, and the like. More rare but still seen are such monsters as the purple worm, ankhheg, bulette, gargoyle, gorgon, werewolf, umber hulk, and will o' wisp.

Of course, the Troll Mountains and Trollford in the northeast part of Amn aren't named that for nothing. A large military presence in Eshpurta has convinced the remaining trolls to pick their targets carefully, but they are still a danger. Recent reports indicate that large bands of goblins and orcs have joined forces with the trolls in the northern end of the Troll Mountains. In some cases, reports claim that troops of orcs and goblins actually are commanded by trolls.

As mentioned above, the cities of Amn are for the most part monster-free, except for the occasional experiment gone awry or other summoned or magical monster resulting from human interference: various undead, elementals, familiars, demons, devils, daemons, and golems, plus liches, aerial servants, beholders, and the like.

Last, but not least, there is something (or several somethings) at the bottom of Lake Esmel. Numerous sightings have been reported, and several boat disappearances have been blamed on the monster, or "Esmelda" as she (or he, or they) has been dubbed by the locals, but no monster has ever been caught. (For more on Lake Esmel, see "Places of Interest," below.)

History

Amn has had the good fortune to be in an area abundant in natural resources—some say Amn is the richest land on the continent. This has worked in Amn's favor for generations, because even when the land was conquered, the new masters were gentle, looking to gain wealth from the land, not put it to the torch.

Amn has been a center of trade and commerce for as long as anyone can remember. Oral traditions handed down from father to son tend to support the theory that Amn has been a trade center for at least 800 years. Unfortunately, written records are difficult to find and incomplete. It seems the typical Amn citizen was too busy trying to make money to write down what was going on.

Amn has always been more interested in the present and the future than the past, and this makes an accurate history difficult to nail down. The best records, the business papers of the oldest trading companies, are jealously guarded. It seems the fear of revealing "trade secrets" is stronger than the call of history; as a result, the average citizen knows very little about Amn history.

It appears that the Amn of 100 years ago was very much like the Calimshan of today. That is, each major city was basically an independent entity, banding together for defense when necessary, fighting for control of territory and profitable trade routes the rest of the time. A particularly brutal trade war began 24 years ago, with each city exacting prohibitive tariffs on goods imported from other cities. Soon, the trade war escalated, and city troops began to raid caravans sponsored by other cities. In a matter of months, trade had been brought to a halt, a number of cities were under siege, and the war threatened to engulf the entire region.

Into the breach stepped a young merchant with some magical training named Thayze Selemchant. Thayze was very smart, very charismatic, and very well connected (the Selemchant trading house was one of the oldest and richest in Athkatla.) Thayze secretly contacted representatives of the five other richest merchant houses in Amn, and started to plan.

The first part of the plan involved the careful sprinkling of rumors about outside threats. One rumor involved a pirate invasion from the Nelanther, another was about a massing of orcs just on the other side of the Cloud Peaks. Thayze even started a rumor about an elf army in the Forest of Tethir, ready to pounce on a divided Amn. None of the rumors were true, but they began to turn people's thoughts toward unity, not war.

Thayze knew that if he was to take control of Amn along with the other members of his council, he would need broad-based popular support. Rivalries between cities and merchant houses were still high; to get that support, Selemchant and the others agreed to drop their family names and never use them again.

So when news of a "Council of Six" spread throughout the land, a group that would unite Amn under one rule, governing for the benefit of all instead of one city or trading company over another, many people accepted their rule. The Council raised an army (at great personal expense) to quell the few pockets of resistance that remained, and have been in total control of Amn for the past 22 years.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

The Council of Six still has a firm grip on Amn, and their true identities are still unknown. What started as a deception necessary to gain the trust of the people has become a sign of power backed up by the full force of Amn law. Speaking, writing, or revealing the real name of any member of the Council is a crime punishable by slow torture and painful death.

The head of the Council is known as the Meisarch. The other five members are known (in order of rank) as the Tes-sarch, the Namarch, the Iltarch, the Pommarch, and the Dahaunarch. It is widely known that the members are representatives of the most powerful trading houses, but nobody (except the council and their closest advisers) knows which houses are represented, and who the members of the Council really are. When a member of the Council dies, all members below him move up a notch on the Council, and a new member (usually a powerful merchant) is chosen to become the new Dahaunarch. This has happened twice so far in the history of the Council.

The Meisarch, Thayze Selemchant, has grown very powerful in the past 22 years. He is now a 9th level magic-user of Chaotic Neutral alignment with a Strength of 18/56 and an Intelligence of 18. He has hundreds of personal servants and bodyguards, all trained from birth to be absolutely loyal to him. There are a minimum of 15 bodyguards with the Meisarch at all times, all of 6th level.

The Meisarch is also living proof of the truth of another old Amn proverb: "Decay follows power as night follows day." The Meisarch is a petty, bitter, jaded man, engaging in perversions and debaucheries that would make a harlot blush. Politically, he changes positions at a whim (and with no warning), and will crush a person, family or business simply for the fun of it.

The other members of the Council are not much better. Fortunately, one of the major tenets of the Council is, "The business of Amn is business." Free to make as much money as they can, the merchants of Amn do quite well, and the money they bring in provides even the lower classes with a reasonable standard of living. Whether the Council, or the merchants, or just good luck is responsible for all of this is not very important. To quote another Amn proverb: "No matter who prays for the rain, everyone gets wet."

"The Council of Six is responsible for defending Amn, both economically and militarily. To accomplish this, the Council has its own army (independent of the various town militias) and spy network. Current troubles for Amn include the constant pirate activity off the coast, and disquieting rumors of a goblin and demon army in the lands to the north of the Cloud Peaks.

The Council also has the power to set tariffs, rates of exchange, and interest rates for all businesses. This power has only been used once, to correct some imbalances brought on by a kickback conspiracy between a Riatavin trading house and some Thay merchants.

The Council's love of free enterprise ends when it comes to activities that could threaten the government. Freelance companies of adventurers are not permitted; if a group of adventurers wishes to operate in Amn as mercenaries for hire, they must be registered and licensed by the national government. Small bands of adventurers have their uses—and the Council of Six demands a modicum of control over those uses.

By the same token, magic use (and magic-users) are also very closely watched. When a magic-user (of any sort) reaches 5th level, he or she is given three choices: register with the government and do one month of service each year for the Council, but otherwise be free to do whatever he wants; banishment; or death. The first option is the most popular, though a few principled mages (notwithstanding the traditional Amn notion that there is no such thing as a principled mage) opt for banishment.

The average citizen of Amn has little to do with the Council of Six, anyway. The decisions important to daily life are made locally, by a Town Council. Rural areas are usually under the jurisdiction of the closest town large enough to have a council. Criminal matters are decided by a judge, who is appointed by a Town Council. Each Town Council appoints as many judges as it thinks it needs. Judges are usually chosen from the upper classes and serve for two years (although it is not unusual for a judge to be reappointed after his two years are up if he wants to continue). Appeals to a Council Judge (answerable directly to the Council of Six) are possible, but rare.

Restitution and fines are the most common punishment for petty crimes, up to and including minor theft. More serious crimes are also punished by fines, but the fines are usually so high that the offender has no choice but to become an indentured servant (that is, a slave). If possible, the victim of a violent crime is often given possession of the offender as part of the restitution. The death penalty is standard for murder, treason, and other capital crimes.

Religion

It might come as a surprise given Amn's preoccupation with money and wealth, but Amn has a very strong religious streak. The Council of Six has a strict "hands off" policy toward religion, with the exception of those religions that criticize the Council—those are quashed rather quickly. Accustomed as they are to dealing with people of all races and backgrounds, a good Amn businessman would never let a difference of religion get in the way of a good deal. With no official sanction or deterrence, therefore, nearly every religion known to the Forgotten Realms is practiced somewhere in Amn. A few are more common than the rest, however, and they are listed below:

Waukeen

Also called "Merchant's friend" by her many worshipers in Amn, Waukeen is the Neutrally aligned goddess of trade and money. Many business negotiations begin with a prayer and small ceremony in her honor, especially if both parties in the deal are believers. It is also common for a tradesman to donate a (small) percentage of particularly profitable business deals to Waukeen's church. Most of Waukeen's believers, however, feel that appeasing the goddess is more for avoiding bad luck than attracting good fortune. As another Amn proverb goes, "The trader's skill finds the pearl; the fates lose it."

Lathander

Lathander, the Morninglord, is the god of (among other things) creativity and new beginnings. He does not have an unusually high number of worshipers in Amn, but he is mentioned here because it is common for devotees of other religions to make a special offering to this Neutral Good god when beginning a new venture or forming a new company.

Selune

This Chaotic Good goddess has dominion over the moon, the stars, and navigations. Also called "Our Lady of Silver," she has been known to aid lost travelers in the dark of night by providing a little magical moonlight by which to see. Almost every merchant or caravan rider has, at one time or another, offered a prayer to Selune in the middle of a dark, forboding night.

Sune

That Sune is worshipped by many people should not be a surprise—she is the goddess of love and beauty, and is the most beautiful of all gods and goddesses in the Forgotten Realms. What is surprising is how many otherwise-mercenary citizens of Amn are among her worshipers. In fact, Sune is the second-most worshipped deity in Amn, behind only Waukeen (of course). Sune's followers tend to be vain and a little overly fond of ostentatious display, and her worshipers in Amn have no trouble living up to that reputation. Sune's temples are among the most magnificent in all the world; a new temple to the Chaotic Good goddess that may be the biggest ever built is currently nearing completion in Es-meltaran.

Chauntea

Chauntea, also called the Earth Mother, is the goddess of agriculture. As such, she has many worshipers in Amn, among both the producers of food and the traders. A bad harvest hurts the merchants, investors, and speculators as well, and many of them have been known to make an offering to this Neutral Good goddess near harvest time.

Leira

Leira has very few worshipers outside the realm of illusionists. However, she is mentioned here because many businessmen make an offering to her (or at least a respectful prayer) because of her position as goddess of deception and illusion. It is thought that by placating this Chaotic Neutral goddess before an important decision is made, the chances of being deceived or making a bad judgment are reduced.

Geography and Climate

Amn is an open and fertile land, especially between the Cloud Peaks and the smaller mountain range (called the Small Teeth) to the south. This area is rolling and gentle, with four or five major rivers and scores of smaller streams crossing the land.

The Cloud Peaks themselves are a surprisingly tall mountain range for their small size. The tallest mountain, Mt. Spertop, reaches 14,500 feet. The Small Teeth are much less severe, averaging only 8,000 or so feet in height. The Troll Mountains to the northeast average about 11,000 feet, and have extensive iron deposits. The Snowflake Mountains, on Amn's eastern edge, are a much larger and taller range. Little else is known about them in Amn; travelers and merchants prefer to simply go around them.

The southern foothills of the Small Teeth is good land for growing grapes, olives, teas, and herbs. The small strip of land further south leading to the Forest of Tethir is flat and unremarkable, good for little but livestock grazing.

The climate in Amn is both warmer and drier than average, but only slightly so. The rainy season begins in Uktar (November) and continues through early Tarsakh of the Storms (April). The summers are hot (daytime temperatures in the 90s) and dry; the winters are mild, with only two or three hard freezes a year. There is little snow in the lower lands of Amn, but plenty in the Cloud Peaks and the Small Teeth; it is this melting snow that provides water for Amn's vast system of rivers and streams.

Money and Commerce

By order of the Council of Six, Amn has its own minted coins, which are supposedly the only legal tender in the country. While all taxes and official business are transacted in Amn currency, many other business deals and day-to-day purchases use whatever medium both parties agree on, including barter. The coins of Amn are:

Fandar: This is the standard copper piece (1 cp), and while common among the lower classes, it is considered too cheap for most self-respecting Amn citizens to carry.

Taran: This silver coin (1 sp) is worth 10 fandars, and is commonly used by all but the richest folks.

Centaur: This coin is made of electrum (1 ep), and is worth 100 fandars or 10 tarans. This coin is also often called a "decime" (pronounced deh-SEEM).

Danter: This is the Amn equivalent of the gold piece (1 gp). It is worth 200 fandars, 20 tarans, or 2 centaurs. The prices of all major goods and services in Amn are quoted in danters. This coin is also called the "little pearl."

Roldon: This platinum coin (1 pp) is worth 1000 fandars, 100 tarans, 10 centaurs, or 5 danters. This coin is not really necessary for commerce, but since it is the pinnacle of showing off, it is used frequently anyway. This coin is also called the "pearl."

For large purchases and business contracts, trade bars are used. These are electrum or silver bars stamped with a denomination and the seal of the issuing company. Trade bars are generally issued in denominations of 500 or 1000 danters; the largest trade bar ever issued was struck when the Fenzik trading house of Athkatla ordered 14 cargo vessels from Minik the Shipbuilder and paid the contract in full with a single trade bar worth 3½ million danters.

Paper contracts are still rare in Amn, but as bankers and financiers discover new ways to bankroll business ventures and manipulate the markets for profit, the importance of "paper fortunes" will increase.

Amn's reputation as a trading nation has been forged by centuries of travel throughout the Forgotten Realms, trading practically anything to anybody. Exports from Amn itself include fruits and grains, herbs, timber, gems and precious metals, fine textiles, and high-quality furniture, jewelry, and other handcrafts. Importers have learned that the residents of Amn are a tough lot to please; they're accustomed to getting the best, and there's little they haven't seen. As a result, traders are always looking for something new or different that may catch the fancy of the jaded Amn consumer and become the next fad. Andruth Pearlseeker of Keczulla made an unexpected fortune when he bought three wagonloads of eggs in Cormyr; bad weather delayed his return trip, and by the time he got back to Amn, nearly half the eggs had hatched, revealing strange, small, blue, flightless birds. Suddenly, the birds became a fad pet for the women of Amn upper society, and instead of getting mere fandars per egg, Andruth sold every bird (over 23,000 of them) for 150 danters apiece.

Many Amn merchants go years without setting foot in their home country, preferring to trade among outside countries than travel back and forth to Amn. There is no cargo so strange, no trip so long or hazardous, that an Amn trader won't try it if the money is right. The term "an Amn job" is used throughout the Forgotten Realms to describe a task of any sort that, despite the eventual profit, is so much trouble that only a fanatic would attempt it.

Cities

The following is a list of the major cities and towns of Amn:

Amnwater

Amnwater is an important crossroads in north central Amn. It is the meeting place of the Eshpurta Road, the South Fork (to Purskul), and the Esmel Road (to Esmeltaran). It is a fairly small town (population: 11,000), especially in view of its importance.

As one would expect, the main business of Amnwater is to cater to caravans and other travelers passing through. There are several excellent inns, many more adequate ones, and dozens of taverns. In addition, there are several places where wagons can be bought or repaired, and numerous stables and horse dealers.

Many guards-for-hire call Amnwater home, because it offers the best opportunity to find work in many different directions. Frequently, a caravan will come limping into town after an accident or bandit attack, looking to bolster its security. For this reason, there are also several armorers who work in town; their work is reputable, but because they often have their customers at a disadvantage because of an emergency, the prices can be inordinately high.

Athkatla

Athkatla is the largest city in Amn (population: 425,000), its capital. The Council of Six lives and meets here; the rest of the Amn bureaucracy is also headquartered in this port city. The National Mint (where all the coins are struck), the Council Library (containing mostly business records), and other important national offices are here as well.

If one city can be said to be the center of Amn business, it is Athkatla. It is Amn's largest port, and the home of the country's most powerful merchant houses. Many houses that got their start in other parts of the country move to Athkatla when they get big enough. Moving to Athkatla is a sign that a business has "arrived" in the upper crust of Amn commerce. Most smaller trading houses also have representatives in Athkatla, because it is nearly impossible to break into the big time without dealing in the capital.

As befits a city of such stature, Athkatla has the largest and most diverse market quarter in all of the Forgotten Realms, including Waterdeep. The expression "draw air in Athkatla" means to fail in a can't-miss situation; if you can't find a particular item in this market (legal or otherwise), you're not looking in the right places.

Actually, there are very few items that are illegal in Athkatla. Only the most dangerous and addictive drugs are banned; sales of other things, like liquor, powerful magical supplies, and dangerous alchemical compounds are not allowed to minors (defined in Amn as persons under 14 years of age).

For as long as anyone can remember,

Athkatla has been embroiled in a not-so-friendly rivalry with Waterdeep for the position and status of top trading city on the Sword Coast. Both cities employ spies to find out what new trade routes and markets the other is exploiting, and neither is above arranging the occasional "accident" to one of the others' caravans. Current rumors are that Waterdeep is increasing the size of its militia in anticipation of an invasion by Athkatla forces. Athkatlans find the idea sort of amusing—"Don't they know that war ruins business?"—but are more worried that Waterdeep is using the story as an excuse to plan its own attack.

Athkatla is also the home of many large and influential organizations and guilds. One of the most powerful and notorious is the Shadow Thieves, one of the largest thieves' guild in all the Realms. Expelled from Waterdeep long ago, the Shadow Thieves' choice of Athkatla as a relocation spot sparked the great rivalry between the two cities. Waterdeep has long feared that the Shadow Thieves are planning a bold stroke to exact their revenge—a fear that is not entirely without justification.

The Shadow Thieves are run by a man known only as "Deepshadow." Deepshadow makes an occasional public appearance (he is not a total recluse), but he prefers to operate in private, most often in his own guild hall (called "Shadowhouse"). Rated strictly by income, the Shadow Thieves are the ninth-biggest business in Athkatla. This makes Deepshadow one of the most powerful businessmen in the city, and he has used his position to further his own personal fortune (rumored to be in the tens of millions of danters) and the position of his organization. There is now no chance that the Shadow Thieves will be cast out of Athkatla like they were in Waterdeep; too many powerful people—including the Council of Six—depend on them.

Deepshadow is a human of Lawful Evil alignment. He is a 12th level assassin and a 5th level thief with a Strength of 17, an Intelligence of 17 and a Dexterity of 18. The Shadow Thieves have over 500 thieves and assassins actually living and practicing in Shadowhouse, another 3500 or so active members living elsewhere in the city, and a "reserve roster" of part-time and retired operatives (plus specialists) numbering over 10,000.

Shadowhouse is also an extensive training facility. Guild members (even those not living there) are encouraged to use the facility, though it is understood that if a member uses the facilities, he owes a service to the guild. Shadowhouse is also the location of the original "Assassin's Run," a training ground copied by many others. For more on the Shadow Thieves, see below (under "Characters").

Crimmor

Crimmor is a medium-sized town (population: 80,000) that owes its prosperity to its location. It is a major crossroads, freight and trading center, as well as the center for Northwest Amn's agricultural and mining concerns.

Crimmor is perfectly located for trade. The Alandor River flows from Lake Weng through town toward Athkatla and the sea. Goods use both the Alandor and the River Road along its banks to get to the capital. To the east, the Eshpurta Road is the major east-west road in northern Amn. And to the north and south, of course, the Trade Way extends all the way to Calimport in the south and beyond Baldur's Gate in the north.

Crimmor sees a tremendous amount of trade goods and freight pass through its gates and docks. Goods from all over the Realms are routinely brought by road to Crimmor, then transferred to barges for the last leg of the journey to Athkatla and the sea. Freight from Athkatla follows the reverse route; there is never a lack of work.

In addition, Crimmor is a major center for the processing of precious metals and gems mined in the nearby Cloud Peaks. A good portion of the metal is shipped directly to the capital for minting into coins, but Crimmor is also a major jewelry-making center. (While Crimmor's jewelers are certainly adequate, for some reason jewelry from here has fallen into disfavor among Amn's upper crust—it is seen as somehow inferior.)

One area in which the Crimmor name is synonymous with top-of-the-line is in carts and wagons. Zan Zoldafstel is known throughout Amn as the finest wagon maker that ever was, a reputation that has spread into other lands and has also inspired counterfeiters. Zoldafstel has been forced to place a magical dweomer on his authentic "ZZ" logo so that buyers can tell the difference between his wagons and the fakes.

Over the years, Zoldafstel has taken on many apprentices who have gone on to run their own wagon-making shops. Some of these apprentices have nearly as good a reputation as Zoldafstel himself, and they can also be found in Crimmor. One of the conditions Zan imposes on would-be apprentices is a promise that should the apprentice complete the training and start his own business, that business must also be located in Crimmor. Zan isn't worried about the competition, and besides, there's plenty of work for everybody. This is Zoldafstel's way of making sure that Crimmor remains pre-eminent in this field.

Crimmor is also the center for northern agricultural products—apples, pears, winter wheat, corn, oats, barley, hops, malt, and mild and sweet peppers. Crimmor beers and ales are also well-known for their quality, though they are considered too "common" for the upper crust of Amn society.

Eshpurta

Eshpurta is a town with an image problem. It is good-sized (population: 110,000), nestled in a beautiful valley in the foothills of the western end of the Troll Mountains. But despite its abundant natural resources and great beauty, Eshpurta is regarded by most of Amn as a frontier backwater on the edge of civilization.

Eshpurta has a very large military garrison, and this is greatly responsible for its reputation. The garrison is considered necessary; military strategists have long ago decided that the open plain between the Troll Mountains and the Snowflake Mountains to the northeast of Amn was the most likely route an invader would take. As a result, Eshpurta is the military headquarters for the entire eastern half of the country.

Nearly 20,000 soldiers, officers, instructors and other military specialists live and work in Eshpurta. Amn's largest military training center (The Golden Fortress) is here, as well as the government's arms and armor makers. The military is Eshpurta's major industry.

In addition to the large-scale arms makers, a number of fine craftsmen have moved to Eshpurta to set up shop and cater to the officers and other more well-to-do members of the military, selling higher quality (and frequently magical) arms and armor.

Eshpurta has very little violent crime (there are easier targets for bandit gangs than cities with permanent military installations), but is rife with the so-called "victimless crimes" that cater to the vices of the soldier—gambling, and loan sharking, among other things. While Amn's notion of "free enterprise" protects most of these operations most of the time, the administrators of The Golden Fortress take note of those establishments which seem to cause the most trouble for their soldiers. Frequently, these establishments end up the victims of "accidents" during catapult practice.

While the military is not Eshpurta's only claim to fame, most of its other industries are somehow related to the army. There are extensive iron deposits in the mountains to the east, and extensive mining in the area provides the raw material for the arms and armor makers of town. Smaller deposits of coal, nickel, and electrum are also exploited.

In what is probably an overreaction to its "backwater" reputation, Eshpurta has an extensive arts and culture program, with a fine opera and several handsomely-paid "town artists" who provide murals and sculptures throughout the city. Also, the city hosts an "Ice Sports Festival" every other Deepwinter (January). The festival's sledding, tobogganing, skiing, and speed skating events attract competitors from throughout the Realms. The popular winter game "Icedrop" (played with toboggans and an inflated sheep's bladder) was invented here, and at every festival Eshpurta's town team takes on all comers; they haven't lost yet.

Esmeltaran

Esmeltaran is perhaps the most beautiful city in all of Amn. Situated on the shore of Lake Esmel in the very center of the nation, Esmeltaran is well-known as a playground for the rich and a meeting place where many of the biggest deals in Amn are made.

Lake Esmel is the largest freshwater lake in the Empires of the Sands, and ideal for swimming, boating, and fishing. Fed by four rivers which originate in the melting snows of both the Cloud Peaks and the Small Teeth, the lake (particularly the eastern half) is quite cold. However, hot springs near the city provide both temperate swimming waters in the lake and spas for the wealthy in town.

Tourism is this small (population: 35,000) city's main industry. Hotels, inns, spas, theaters, exclusive clubs, and luxury villas abound. Esmeltaran has gone to great trouble to cultivate the image of the city as the "in" place for the top rank of Amn society. This campaign has been very successful. Nearly every family that can afford it has a summer home in Esmeltaran, and families that can't afford it still brag to their neighbors about taking a holiday to this city.

Because of the high concentration of the upper crust of business and society in town, two things are common. One, some of the most lavish parties ever seen are thrown here, as rival families and trading houses try to outdo each other on the social scale. The second is that Esmeltaran is often seen as "neutral ground" for business rivals to meet and hammer out their differences.

Esmeltaran's other major industry is fishing. The waters of Lake Esmel are full of fish of all kinds, and the risks are low—the waters are calm, and storms are rare. The dunchow, a fish found only in this lake, is a specialty of most Esmeltaran inns and boarding houses, and is also a prized delicacy elsewhere in Amn.

Imnescar

Imnescar is a small (population: 17,000) town that is the center for agriculture in southwest Amn. It is also a popular way station and overnight stop for travel on the Trade Way.

Imnescar is also the end of the South Road, a good but small road that follows the Small Teeth (for this reason it is sometimes referred to as "The Gumline") to the three Hillforts (described below) and then turns north to Eshpurta.

The agricultural region Imnescar is the center of is a fertile, warm area famous for its fruits. Oranges, tangerines, grapes, dates, lemons, limes, avocados, and artichokes all grow in abundance here, and the region is also a major grain producer. Just a few miles to the west of town are Amn's finest wineries.

The continuing instability in Tethyr has the people of Imnescar worried. There was a lot of trouble here years ago when the first wave of refugees from Tethyr hit, as the long-time residents worried about losing jobs and land to the "foreigners"; the local authorities want to make sure that doesn't happen again. And even though the town isn't exactly on the Tethyr border, there is also concern an expansionist leader could take power and make trouble. The Council of Six is not as concerned, but they have responded to a request by the Imnescar Town Council and sent 150 army regulars to bolster the town militia.

Keczulla

Keczulla was started centuries ago as a mining town. After the mineral veins were played out, the town nearly disappeared before it became a popular stopping place for caravans and other travelers on the Eshpurta road. Recently, discoveries of new gem and mineral deposits have swelled the population of this city to over 42,000.

Every few years, a new example of a “dirt to diamonds” story (as they are called in Amn) happens to reaffirm the people’s belief that Amn is a land where opportunity is everywhere. Last year, the lucky example was Keczulla shopkeeper Pulth Tanislove. He purchased the books and papers of a hermit who lived on the edge of town from the hermit’s heirs, who came to Keczulla to settle the hermit’s estate upon his death. Upon examining the papers (something the heirs hadn’t bothered to do), he discovered an entire book devoted to finding a lost gem mine that most thought never existed. Convinced he could find the mine based on the information in the hermit’s book, Tanislove sold controlling interest in his book shop, bought the necessary equipment, deeds and permits, and left Keczulla amid much laughter.

The laughter ended three months later when Pulth returned to Keczulla with just under half a million danters’ worth of rubies. He used the money to buy up more land along the Ridge north of town, where he had discovered more gems and minerals. Today, only two years later, Pulth Tanislove is the owner of Tanislove Mines, the largest gem, mineral, and precious metal mining company in all of Amn. His personal fortune is estimated at 700 million danters, and his success is single-handedly responsible for the rebirth of Keczulla as a major city.

Many other successful mining concerns have sprung up around Keczulla in the past two years, producing everything from iron and electrum to salt. Precious gems and metals of all kinds have been found, and they are even rumors that one company (the rumors disagree on which one) has found a vein of adamantite and is secretly smuggling it out directly to Athkatla.

While thousands have flocked to Keczulla to try and duplicate (or perhaps just share in) Tanislove’s success, the other businesses of Keczulla continue. A major travel stop on the Eshpurta Road, the town is filled with inns, taverns, stables, wagoners, and guards for hire. There is also an army outpost here, with 1000 men (200 of them cavalry) charged with keeping the Eshpurta Road clear from Amnwater to halfway to Eshpurta.

Murann

Murann is the second largest port in Amn. It has a very important position in Amn commerce, both as the end point of the Tethir Road (that crosses the entire country along its southern border to Riatavin) and as a port of first opportunity for shipments from the south that wish to avoid close contact with the Nelanther. Both The Race and Asavir’s Channel can be very dangerous when the pirates are active, and many Calishite merchants send their north-bound goods by land to Murann, where they are then put on a ship for the journey further north.

With a population of 130,000, Murann has an extensive shipyard where vessels of all kinds, from private yachts to massive cargo ships and huge ships of war, are built. There are also many drydocks for repair and refitting of existing vessels. Nowhere in Amn is the flavor of the sea stronger. While the port of Athkatla is larger, it is just one feature of a diverse city: Murann’s port is the heart of the city. Amn boys who crave the life of the sea don’t go to Athkatla—they come here.

Murann is also the home of Amn’s navy, such as it is. Amn expects most merchants to pay for their own private protection, but the Council of Six has allocated some funds for a small navy in the realization that with a concentrated attack, the pirates of Nelanther can mount a challenge beyond the ability of any single private fleet to handle. The navy does not have very many ships, mostly small, fast boats for pursuing the speedy pirates. In an emergency, the navy may force any private escort vessels it wants to help repel an attack, but this is a right reserved for full-scale invasions, and has never been used.

Murann has one other claim to fame. It is the home of the largest and most respected Alchemist’s Guild in all of Amn. Murann residents love to brag that the guild is the equal of any in Cormyr or Thay, but there’s really no way of knowing if that’s true. Wherever it ranks in the overall list, there is no doubt that the group in Murann is impressive. They have been credited with the creation and refinement of many important potions and compounds, including the potion of treasure finding (which, considering Amn's preoccupation with money, should come as no surprise).

The guild runs a very complete shop in the market plaza where nearly any alchemical component or finished product can be purchased at a reasonable market price. The shop will also purchase rare components at a fair price, though the guild has no need for common components or finished products.

Nashkel

Nashkel is the northernmost city in Amn, and the coldest. Situated on the north side of the Cloud Peaks on the Trade Way, this small town (population: 4,500) bears the brunt of every winter storm that spends itself on the Peaks. The townspeople are hardy, however, and never complain about the weather, no matter how miserable.

Nashkel is an important stopping place for southbound caravans and other travelers. Here they can get the information, guides, and equipment necessary to successfully cross the Cloud Peaks if they are not already prepared. At least once a winter, a caravan (always on a first trip through the Peaks) ignores help in Nashkel, gets surprised by a quickly rising winter storm, and has to be rescued. Sometimes, such a caravan takes a wrong turn in a mountain pass and isn't discovered until the spring thaw.

The people of Nashkel also make a fair amount of money hunting and trapping the local wildlife for both meat and furs. There is not a very large demand for furs in Amn because of the generally warm climate, but Amn traders still recognize value.

Purskul

Purskul is another important trade and freight center in the center of western Amn. It is also the location of the largest grain warehouses in the country. Grain from throughout central Amn arrives via either barge on the Esmel River or caravan on the Trade Way or the South Fork, and is stored, graded, and brokered here. Other goods come through the vast barge docks on the banks of the Esmel as well, but grain is Purskul's lifeblood.

Handling the grain, transferring it from cart to barge to silo, bagging it, and shipping it is difficult, heavy work. This is the main reason that Purskul has the only significant half-orc population in all of Amn. The half-orcs are paid fairly well (for menial labor) but are looked down on by the general population. "Discrimination" is probably too strong a word for it (there are no businesses, for example, from which they are banned), but the human majority definitely considers the half-orcs inferior. Of the 16,000 people living here, about 2,500 are half-orcs.

Riatavin

Riatavin is a major center of commerce, especially when it comes to business with Chondath, the Shaar, and points further east. It is one the largest cities in Amn (population: 220,000) and considers itself a rival to Athkatla in sophistication and importance. Most Athkatlans feel that to even compare the two would be giving Riatavin too much credit.

Athkatlan snobbishness aside, Riatavin is an important city. Riatavin serves as an anchor of Amn influence in the southeast corner of the nation, and could serve as a springboard for expansion into northeast Tethyr or the area east of the Snowflake Mountains. It is also where the merchants of Amn arrange business throughout the east—as far as Thay, and often farther.

Like most other major cities in Amn, there is a spectacular market where nearly anything can be bought or sold. The usual “support industries” of commerce can be found here: wagon makers, fine taverns, moneylenders, guards for hire, stables, and inns. In addition, Riatavin is an important livestock center. Cattle, hogs, and oxen are plentiful in the grasslands surrounding the city, and these livestock are known throughout the country: “Tender as a Riatavin steak” is a common expression.

Riatavin is also the home of Samdusk Sorocine, a maker of musical instruments with a reputation throughout the Realms. Sorocine makes all kinds of instruments, but his specialty is lutes. A bard’s lute made by Sorocine costs twice as much as normal, but the bard using the instrument gets a ten percent bonus to all spells associated with songs played on it.

Trademeet

Trademeet is a crossroads town where the Trade Way and Tethir Road intersect. It has a population of 8,800, and all the standard businesses and facilities expected at a major crossroads; it is not remarkable in this sense.

What makes Trademeet remarkable is the tradition of “Merchant’s Peace” that has existed there unbroken for (the legends say) over 430 years. It is said that this peace was declared by the goddess Waukeen herself, and a large shrine to her is in the center of town, on the spot where she is said to have appeared.

“Merchant’s Peace” is a state in which a merchant must be in complete accord with his fellow tradesmen. All negotiations must be completely honest, withholding nothing; no ambushes or thefts may be carried out, or even planned within the town; merchants cannot even disagree on what to have for dinner.

Peer pressure among merchants is usually enough to ensure the “Merchant’s Peace” is preserved. If that is not enough, there are many stories (some even verified) of businessmen who break the peace having terrible bad fortune strike them shortly thereafter, usually something having to do with the way the merchant broke the peace in the first place.

The story is told of a merchant of Keczulla, his name lost in the passing of time, who sent his guards to delay another merchant’s caravan on the edge of town, hoping to enter ahead of the other merchant and get the last room in Trademeet’s best inn. The approaching guards panicked some of the horses in the second merchant’s caravan, his personal carriage overturned and slid down an embankment into a stream, and before help could get down the embankment, the merchant inside was drowned. The first merchant continued his journey to Murann, and boarded a boat for Waterdeep. A terrible storm struck the fleet the first night out, and a tremendous wave struck the lead ship, carrying the merchant from Keczulla overboard. As soon as the merchant was lost, the storm stopped; the merchant was never heard from again.

Trailstone

Trailstone is little more than a collection of inns and taverns that cater to travelers along the Tethir Road. The town was completely built from the personal fortune of the Spulzeer family, to give travelers a place to stay other than Castle Spulzeer; given the unfortunate history of that castle (see below), it seems as good an explanation as necessary.

Places of Interest

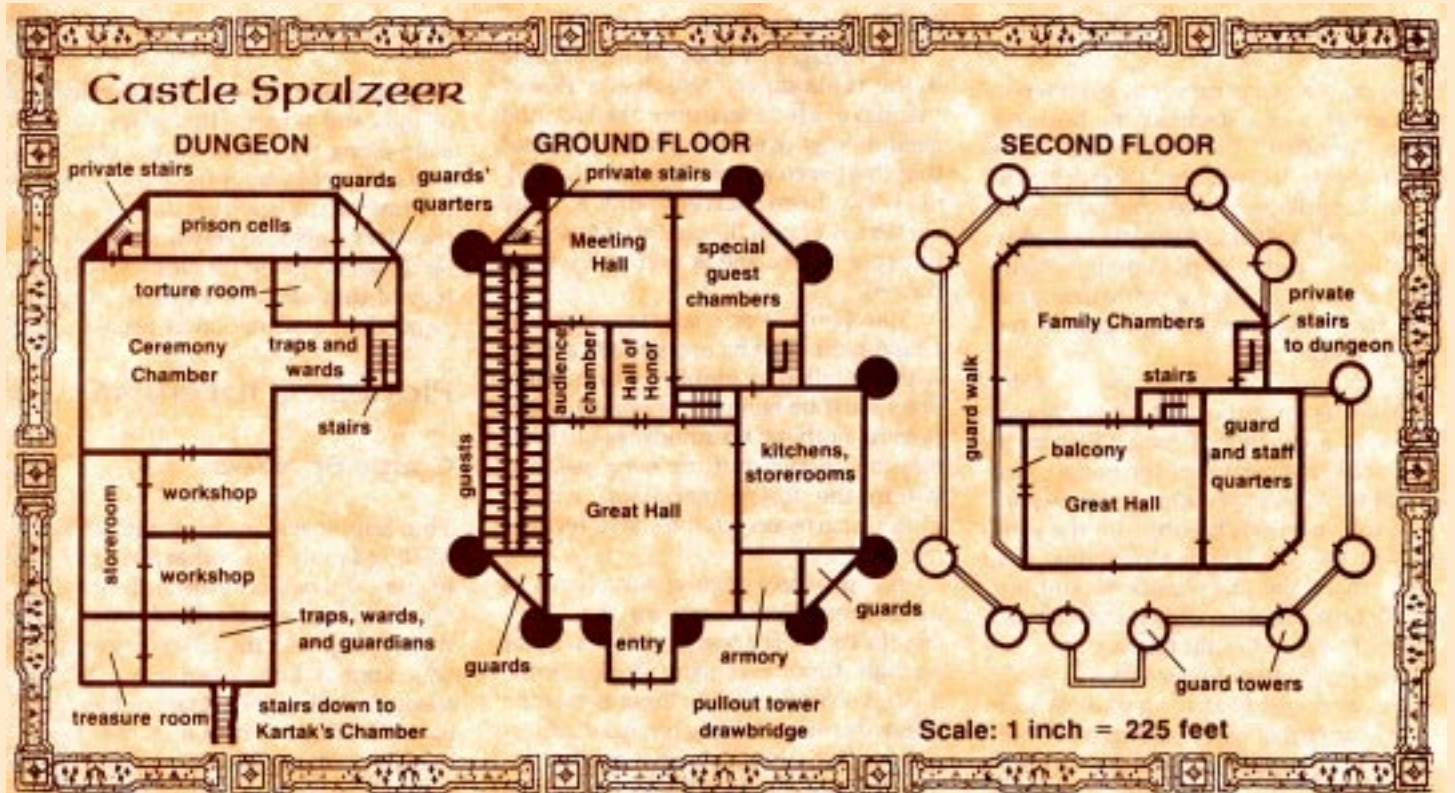

Castle Spulzeer

The Spulzeers were a major landholding family in southern Amn; in its heyday, the family castle and surrounding buildings were a small town unto themselves, and the castle’s hospitality was known and taken advantage of throughout the area. Many a merchant caravan with a choice of routes would take the Tethir Road for an opportunity to spend a night at Castle Spulzeer.

It was eight years ago that things began to change. The outer grounds fell into disrepair, and the castle itself was somehow less wholesome. Entire branches of the Spulzeer family disappeared; the ones that were left continued to offer the hospitality of the castle to travelers, but the visitors began to sense it was out of duty and tradition, not from any real desire to help.

The remaining Spulzeers began to attract a whole new kind of servant and retinue: tall, fur-clad barbarians; painted tribesmen from faraway lands; half-(and some more than half) orcs; and a morbid collection of misshapen and disfigured freaks of all races.

The rumors (fed by the imagination of frightened travelers) of Castle Spulzeer grew ever worse. There were stories of muffled cries in the middle of the night, shadows that passed over the sun on cloudless days, darkened shapes of unknown monsters circling the castle in the hours before dawn, and other fantastic stories. Most discounted the rumors as campfire stories told to scare children, but as more and more people returned from Castle Spulzeer with similar stories, the doubts ended.

Things got so bad that eventually travel on the Tethir Road suffered, and so did business. Once that happened, the Council of Six was quick to intervene. An emissary was sent to the castle; he returned, shaken, but with an agreement. The sole surviving Spulzeer family member, Chardath, agreed to build an inn and tavern and several other buildings in the farming community of Trailstone, directly on the Tethir Road. Travelers now use the road regularly again, but nobody takes the 12-mile side trip to visit Castle Spulzeer.

Nine years ago, Chardath Spulzeer found an ancient book left by a centuries-dead ancestor named Kartak Spellseer. Intrigued by the book's promise of great wealth hidden in the depths of the castle, Chardath carefully followed the instructions in the book—and awoke the long asleep lich form of Kar-tak Spellseer. Kartak rewarded Chardath with gems and magic (including an unholy avenger sword +5: as a holy avenger +5, but lawful Evil) worth hundreds of thousands of danters, and began his plans to reestablish his power in the region. Chardath was completely intimidated by Kartak, and did whatever he was told.

Kartak was never a particularly wholesome person, and he became downright bizarre as a lich. The freaks and strange servants were his idea of entertainment; other members of the Spulzeer family who objected were brutally murdered, usually by unseen magical creatures. Only after the visit from the emissary of the Council of Six did Kartak agree that allowing visitors to stay in the castle was probably a bad idea.

The past two years, Kartak has been busy practicing his rusty magical skills and re-establishing the magical guards about his various treasure chambers and workshops. Chardath is the only surviving Spulzeer; Kartak finds him useful, and also senses a closeness of spirit between the two (note the similarity in their names). Today, Castle Spulzeer is filled with magical creatures of every type, magical libraries and workshops, and fantastic treasure rooms. (The map shows the castle as it was eight years ago; today, many of the guest rooms and family chambers have been converted to treasure rooms and magical workshops.) And Kartak has made plans with many would-be allies: demons, devils, orc and hobgoblin chieftains, and even a dragon.

Soon, very soon, Kartak will emerge as a terrible lich with the spells of a 31st-level magic user, and will start building a kingdom for himself. He will look first to the chaotic land of Tethyr to the south, but his appetite is sure to grow.

Amnur Citadel

The Citadel of Amnur is one of two heavily-fortified military outposts recently completed in the Cloud Peaks in response to the ever-growing trouble with demon and orc armies farther to the north. The citadel has 720 soldiers and officers permanently assigned; if necessary, an additional 1500 troops will fit inside.

The citadel's outer walls are 40' high and 6' thick. There is a 10'-wide walkway around the top for defensive troops. In addition to being adequately defensible under attack, it is also strategically placed as a jumping-off point for offensive action.

Morale is low at Amnur Citadel, because of dissatisfaction with the commander, Endrick Hardl. Hardl is an inexperienced soldier (only 3d level) with a very nice suit of armor (+4 scale mail and shield) and a rich family with connections. He can't decide whether he wants his men to like him, respect him, or fear him—as a result, they do none of the three. The situation is bad, but nobody in authority will believe how bad until the troops enter battle. By then it will be too late.

Rashturl Citadel

The Citadel of Rashturl is identical in design and make-up to Amnur. The difference is in its commander; the two are as different as night and day.

Reyni Delapond is a skilled, experienced soldier and leader who came up through the ranks. He is 7th level, with a Strength of 18/35, Dexterity of 17, and Charisma of 18. He is much-loved by his troops, who would gladly die for him. However, they are so well trained, that doesn't seem likely to happen.

Rashturl Citadel is considered one of the "pearl" assignments in the Amn army, because of Delapond and also because of a training program of remarkable effectiveness devised by Delapond and his staff. Fighters must be members of the Amn army assigned to Rashturl to qualify, but those who participate in the program fulfill their training requirements for level advancement in 1/3 the normal time.

The Fangs

The Fangs are a pair of steep crags in the Cloud Peaks. The Trade Way passes directly between the two (in Fang Pass, naturally), and the spot where the road passes directly between the two peaks is generally considered the northern boundary of Amn (even though the town of Nashkel is a little farther north). The spot is marked by a large standing stone.

The Fangs are not the tallest mountains in the range, but they are the most difficult to climb because of their sheer sides and treacherous ice sheets. A remorhaz was slain in Fang Pass a few years ago, and though many adventurers searched for its lair, it was never found. Fourteen men have died in mountain climbing "accidents" in the various searches since then; 23 more were never found and are presumed dead. It is reasonable to assume that the dead monster left behind a mate and young, who are even now growing to maturity.

Ishla Hillfort

Unlike the citadels to the north, which are newly-constructed and state of the art military design, the Hillfort of Ishla (as well as the other two hillforts) has been around longer than anyone can remember. There are no surviving records to indicate when they were built; they've just always been there.

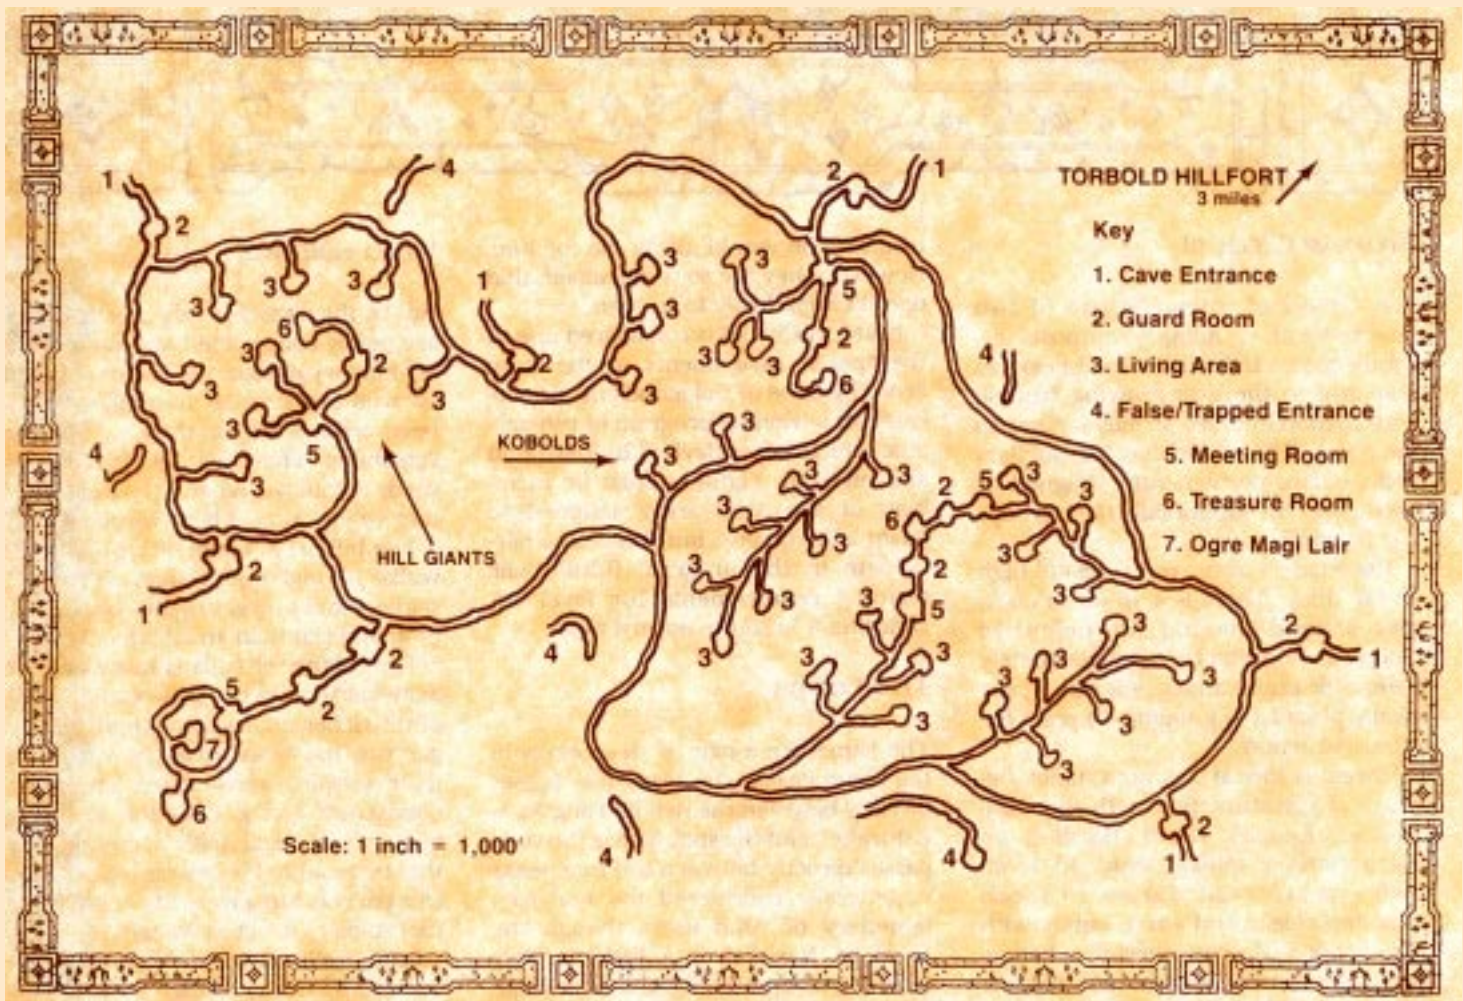

The hillfort is made of log-and-earth walls, 15' high and 3' thick. It has 315 soldiers and officers regularly assigned to it, and can hold an additional 500.

The Hillfort of Ishla is fairly close to Esmeltaran, and for that reason, many of the richer nobles living there feel the garrison has been put at the hillfort for their personal convenience. Squads are constantly being dispatched to Esmeltaran to deal with "emergencies" that turn out to be demeaning errands. One party hostess wanted a company of foot soldiers to act as waiters. The only reason this is allowed to continue is the businessmen pay rather handsomely, including a sizable bonus for the officer who dispatched the troops.

Keshla Hillfort

The Hillfort of Keshla is substantially the same as Ishla Hillfort, except it is somewhat bigger. It has a permanent garrison of 435, and can hold another 900 if necessary.

Keshla Hillfort is the most remote outpost the army has. Assignment to Keshla is a standard punishment for officers and soldiers who make particularly expensive or stupid mistakes. After a few years of this, Keshla has collected most of the misfits and serious incompetents in the entire army. It's a good thing nothing happens out here.

Torbold Hillfort

The Hillfort of Torbold is the same size and construction as Ishla Hillfort.

The soldiers of Torbold Hillfort are battle-hardened and tough, as the garrison has been involved in a prolonged battle with a tribe of hill giants for the past 18 months. The giants have attacked the hillfort seven different times, but each time they were repulsed. Punitive raids into the Small Teeth have met with only limited success because the giants know the terrain much better than the soldiers. It is also believed the giants have several underground lairs and a series of tunnels connecting the lairs.

The soldiers of Torbold Hillfort don't know it, but the hill giants are the least of their problems. The giants are working for a mated pair of ogre magi who are carving out an underground empire in the Small Teeth. The tunnel system links not only several large treasure troves, but also the lairs of several thousand kobolds, also under the control of the ogre magi (see the map). The kobolds are currently doing nothing but breeding and training; when the time is right, the ogre magi will send them out.

Lake Esmel

Lake Esmel is the largest body of fresh water in the Empires of the Sands. It is so deep it has never been accurately measured. It is fed by four rivers on three sides, and hot springs on the fourth, the west. The resort city of Esmeltaran lies on the western bank of the lake.

Because of the different temperatures in the lake—cold water in the eastern, snow-fed river end, and warm water in the western, hot spring-fed end—a wide variety of fishes are available in abundance. The lake is not prone to dangerous currents or storms, either, and the fishing is very good (and profitable) year round.

The only black spot on this otherwise perfect situation is the Monster of the Lake. The locals affectionately call it “Esmelda,” and while it is blamed for the occasional disappearance of a fishing boat or lone swimmer, most of the area residents believe the monster to be a quaint myth, a convenient excuse to tell tall tales at a tavern and scare visitors, but not really true.

They're wrong. There is a Monster of the Lake (actually, just over a dozen of them), and they are as dangerous as they are reclusive. The monster's real name is pythosaurus, and it is nearly 200' long from head to tail when fully grown. Its central body is only 120' long and 30' across, with four large flippers for guidance. The 60' to 80' long neck appears to be that of an eel, and the head in which it ends looks like a cross between a snake and a dragon. An eight-foot-tall, rigid dorsal spine runs along the back of this gill-breather's neck.

The pythosaurus is not particularly intelligent, but is an efficient, ravenous eater that is usually quite hungry. Fortunately for the human users of Lake Esmel, the pythosaurus prefers cold water, so it stays away from the western end of the lake and the surface. The pythosaurus is usually a solitary animal, meeting others only to mate and to teach the young how to hunt. Since the pythosaurus is such a fast learner, the family usually stays together only a few weeks after the eggs are hatched, and then the offspring are left to fend for themselves.

PYTHOSAURUS

FREQUENCY: Rare
NO. APPEARING: 1
ARMOR CLASS: 4
MOVE: //30"
HIT DICE: 18
% IN LAIR: Nil
TREASURE: Nil
NO. OF ATTACKS: 1
DAMAGE/ATTACK: 5-30
SPECIAL ATTACKS: Swallow whole
SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil
MAGIC RESISTANCE: Standard INTELLIGENCE: Animal
ALIGNMENT: Neutral
SIZE: L

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

Attack/Defense Modes:

Nil/Nil

LEVEL/X.P. VALUE:

VI/2200 + 20/hp

If the Pythosaurus attacks any creature less than 10' long (or tall, or whatever) and rolls 10 higher than is needed to hit (or a 19 or 20 in any case), the victim is swallowed whole. A swallowed victim will take 2 hit points per round as the monster digests it. A body killed in this manner cannot be resurrected, regenerated, raised, or brought back in any way short of a full wish.

Mt. Speartop

Mt. Speartop is the tallest mountain in the Cloud Peaks, and can easily be seen on clear days from Athkatla. It is such a stunning sight that it is part of daily life in the capital, clear day or no; "I swear on Speartop" is a common oath among the lower classes of not only Athkatla, but all of Amn.

Climbing Speartop is a popular challenge for the athletically-minded of Amn's rich. It is a difficult climb, but if the proper precautions are taken, a mistake is not likely to be fatal. This makes the mountain perfect for the serious hobbyist. Climbers have disappeared from Speartop, but most blame foolhardiness—ignoring weather, climbing alone, or not having the right equipment.

Actually, most of the disappearing climbers are the work of Icehaupt, a great white wyrm that lives in an inaccessible cave on the northeast face of Speartop, some 750 feet below the peak. It is usually undisturbed because there are no good climbing paths to the top using that face. The foolish few that try to climb the northeast face for the challenge run into Icehaupt, and their deaths are usually chalked up to climbing accidents.

Icehaupt has not lived to become a great white wyrm by being foolish or stupid. He knows that the best way to deal with humans is to leave them alone. He rarely leaves his lair any more, and he only attacks lone humans or small groups, and only then if they are in danger of stumbling on to his lair.

As you might expect, Icehaupt has a spectacular treasure, including nearly half a million danters' worth of gems and jewelry, and over 30 significant magical items. If word of it (or of Icehaupt's existence) were to become widely believed, then more fortune seekers than the Great Wyrms could handle would be sure to follow. Icehaupt has not had to move in over 350 years; it is not about to start over in a new territory at this stage in life. For that reason, Icehaupt prefers to stay low, and to attract as little attention as possible. (For more on Forgotten Realms dragons, see page 38 in the Cyclopedia of the Realms in the Campaign Set.)

The Ridge

The Ridge is an exposed fault line that runs for over 50 miles along the south edge of the Cloud Peaks at the eastern end of that range. The fault is not active (there have been no earthquakes or tremors in Amn history), but still an impressive sight. At its very center, the Ridge is nearly 280' tall. The face is rough enough for a skilled climber to find the foot- and handholds necessary, but it is harder than it at first looks.

The Ridge is a premium source of all sorts of metals and minerals. Everything from diamonds to granite to gold to sandstone has been mined from some section of the Ridge's face.

Trollford

The Trollford is the spot where the South Rd. crosses the Amstel River south of Eshpurta. It is the only place where the Amstel River is crossable for scores of miles to either side.

The Trollford (and the nearby Troll Mountains) got its name because the area was the home of a large civilization of trolls before men arrived centuries ago. The trolls were hunted to near extinction, but the survivors retreated to the most remote areas of the Troll Mountains. While there are not nearly as many trolls as there used to be when they controlled the region, there are undoubtedly many more now than there were just 50 years ago.

The military troops in Eshpurta receive special training in dealing with trolls, and will escort any caravan that requests it (for a price) from the town to past the Trollford. Not every caravan wants to pay the price (even though it is not unreasonable), and the troll raiders are becoming bolder by the month.

Even though the trolls were nearly wiped out all those years ago, it is widely known that the bulk of the trolls' magic and treasure was never captured by the human armies. Considering the amount of loot taken from caravans in the past few decades, the total must now be truly impressive.

Characters

The Shadow Thieves

The Shadow Thieves are the largest and best organized thieves' guild in all of Amn. Headquartered in Athkatla, their influence extends far beyond that single city; most of the other guilds in Amn (and a few in Tethyr) have "agreements" with the Shadow Thieves, and the rest of the Amn guilds will fall in line soon.

These "agreements" work like this: The Shadow Thieves train and advise other guilds, helping them organize themselves and plan their work. Guild members can come to Athkatla to receive advanced individual training at Shadowhouse, the guild hall of the Shadow Thieves. The Shadow Thieves also use their extensive influence in Amn government to insure that interference is minimized. Last but not least, the Shadow Thieves will lend specialists to its "affiliate" guilds for specific jobs. All it costs the other guilds is 10 percent of everything they make.

The Shadow Thieves were founded in Waterdeep many years ago, but were thrown out by town leaders who feared their growing power. Since that humiliation, the Shadow Thieves have vowed two things: one, that they would work themselves into a position of such power that a disgrace like that would never happen again; and two, that Waterdeep would pay.

Athkatla was a perfect choice to achieve both goals. The Council of Six preferred a strong, controllable thieves' guild to the random actions of thousands of independent criminals, and Amn in general has never had any great love for Waterdeep. Shadow Thieves spies have proved very useful in the ongoing trade wars between the two merchant powers.

The Shadow Thieves have their headquarters in a walled-off block called Shadowhouse, near the central business district. Approximately 500 thieves, assassins, and trainees live in the house at any one time. There are also 3,500 other Shadow Thieves members living and working in Athkatla who do not actually live inside Shadowhouse, though they frequently go there to pick up assignments, meet partners, and deliver goods and payments.

On top of that, the Shadow Thieves keep a "reserve roster" list with over 10,000 names on it. The people on this list include part-time, retired and semi-retired, and imprisoned and enslaved members, as well as specialists and experts who are willing to work for the Shadow Thieves on a case-by-case basis.

To keep the image up (and to keep the protection money flowing in), the Shadow Thieves take a very dim view of unauthorized, independent theft in areas they control. Members of the guild usually work harder than the town watch to catch a free-lance operator; when the thief is caught, he or she is given a chance to join the Shadow Thieves in exchange for everything the thief makes the first year. Most of the residents of Shadowhouse are people who took this option. The free-lancer can always refuse, but if he is ever caught again, his body is handed over to the city watch.

The leader of the Shadow Thieves is a man who is known only as "Deepshadow." His real name is unknown.

Deepshadow is a 12th level assassin and 5th level thief of Lawful Evil alignment. He has ST 17, IN 17, WS 15, CN 13, DX 18, CH 13 and 42 hit points. He always wears bracers of defense armor class 0 and a cloak of protection +3, and uses a dagger +3. Deepshadow is a master of poisons of all types, and it is safe to assume that his dagger is usually poisoned, as are a number of other hidden needles and secret compartments on his person.

Deepshadow commands a great deal of personal loyalty in Shadowhouse, but he did not rise to his position of power by not being careful. He has at least three bodyguards with him at all times (one 8th level fighter and two 10th levels)—more should he ever leave Shadowhouse.

Cowled Wizards of Amn

The vast majority of the populace of Amn considers the Cowled Wizards to be no more than a legend, and the Cowled Wizards prefer it this way. The Council of Six's laws against magic have guaranteed that many average residents know nothing about them, and what people don't understand, they fear and try to destroy. Given that climate of ignorance and fear, the Cowled Wizards are just as happy to be left alone.

The Cowled Wizards of Amn are a secret society of high-level magic users who have managed to escape the control of Amn's government and the Council of Six. Information on their numbers, strength, disposition, and most importantly, their goals, is very hard to come by. Spies attempting to infiltrate the organization often emerge with totally different stories, testimony to the Cowled Wizards' ability to outwit the government.

The Cowled Wizards are based in Athkatla, though there are members of the society in every major city of the country. The other major cells of the organization are in Riatavin, Murann, and Keczulla. There are nearly 200 magic users in the organization, some as powerful as 23d level. The majority, however, are in the 8th - 12th level range. The group's goals are to further magical practice and knowledge in the face of a repressive government. The Cowled Wizards are also willing to research, manufacture and sell spell scrolls, enchanted weapons, and other magical items, but only if they're sure the buyer isn't an agent for the government.

Actually, the Cowled Wizards have little to fear in the way of major government reprisals. This is because Thayze Selemchant, the Meisarch of the Council of Six and the single most powerful person in all of Amn, is a member of the Cowled Wizards. His fellow wizards know him by another name, of course, and the Meisarch is careful to limit his contacts so that he is not accidentally recognized (the group's famous cowled hoods help considerably in that regard).

The Meisarch uses his knowledge of the Cowled Wizards' plans to make sure that the Council of Six's agents don't get too close to them. The Namarch, a fighter with years of army experience, is particularly keen on wiping out the Cowled Wizards. The Meisarch is playing a dangerous game; if his membership became known, the other five members of the council would likely turn on him, and despite his great wealth and power, he would not survive.

Order of The Blue Boar

The Order of the Blue Boar is a group of adventurers that keeps a very low profile due to the local government's dislike of professional adventuring companies. Still, the Blue Boars have done very well for themselves by staying away from jobs that would draw too much attention or stir up too much trouble. Much of the order's work is actually carried out in other countries, another reason the Council of Six doesn't bother with them.

The Order of the Blue Boar was at one time headquartered at Castle Spulzeer; with Chardath Spulzeer's blessing, at least three members of the order could be found there at any one time. Recent developments in Castle Spulzeer have changed that, however, and the order now calls Riatavin home.

The Order of the Blue Boar is a group restricted in membership to experienced, veteran fighters of some wealth, each of whom must be approved by the "Boar's Heads," or governing council of seven warriors. The council maintains a membership roll of "Swords" (approved members), each of whom then can expel persons at will for unprofessional conduct. Members can elect to participate or not to participate in any Order activities (if there are too many applicants for a small-fee job, membership seniority is used to decide who'll get the job).

Each participating member takes a share of the fee, and can take part alone or bring along any assistants or agents (other beings who are not members, including mages, fighting-men, and even trained beasts) he wishes, although he is responsible for the deeds, payment, and care of the hirelings. Some members who are crippled by age, disease, or wounds and can no longer fight are represented by their hirelings, who, if their service meets the council's standards, may well themselves later become members.

The collective experience of the Order's members has earned it the reputation of being wary, cunning, and alert in its work, even though its method of sharing fees generally means that comparatively few swords take the field when the Order is hired. The active membership of the Order is known only to the Heads, although most Order members in any given area know each other. The total is thought to be around 400 at full muster. Many adventurers who belong to the order, however, may be unavailable at a given time due to their own ongoing activities (or recovery from such).

The levels and abilities of the Order vary with its members, which range from 3d to 10th level, but tend to average about 6th. The council determines how many people are needed for a given job, and once the members are selected, the council also chooses the leader. Those seeking the aid of the Order of the Blue Boar must apply in person (or by messenger) to its headquarters in Riatavin. These "Boar's Heads" are all fighters of Lawful Neutral alignment. They are:

Thantan Rhyrdyl, 12th level
Sinnom Thul, 9th level
Ghont Tavvas, 10th level
Gaurundur Thasz, 10th level
Bromdurr Tathen, 11th level
Dustar Klathor, 11th level
Risamar Rhalls, 10th level

The sorts of jobs the Order considers include the rescue of kidnapped people, the return of stolen items, repelling invaders, escorting caravans and emissaries, and the like. The Order will turn down morally repugnant offers (killing children, ambushing rightful leaders) immediately. Morally ambiguous offers usually require a higher than normal fee.

The fees the Order charges depend entirely on the type and scope of the job. Escorting a single wagon for a day through normal territory wouldn't cost much more than 1,000 danters; escorting a 2-mile caravan for three months through enemy territory during a war could cost millions.

Knights of The Shield

The Knights of the Shield are a group about which little is known, other than they have some influence in Amn (among other areas, including Tethyr, Baldur's Gate, and Waterdeep). They seem the most active currently in Waterdeep, where it is rumored that they are trying to recruit members among the important Lords of Waterdeep.

The other persistent rumor about the Knights of the Shield is that the group is headed (or heavily influenced, depending on the particular version of the rumor heard) by an arch-devil disguised as a human. Just which arch-devil it is tends to vary with each individual rumor.

The Knights of the Shield are mentioned here because of two very important Amn citizens who are rumored to be involved. The first is the merchant Morntel, a wealthy trader working for the Redolo house of Athkatla. Morntel was foully murdered in his bedchamber while his bodyguards stood faithfully outside the door, hearing nothing. Magic or a magical or demonic creature is suspected. Morntel was rumored to be in disagreement with the Knights' leadership; those who believe the arch-devil rumor also believe that Morntel discovered that particular secret, and that was why he was murdered.

The other member of the Knights of the Shield is very much alive—Lord Bormul of Crimmor. Nadlok Bormul is very well-known in his home town, as he owns a sizable chunk of it. The Bormul family owns most of the inns and taverns in town, too, and it is said that Bormul has "ears" in all of his businesses to learn news from throughout the Realms.

Bormul is an 11th level fighter of Neutral Evil alignment. His stats are ST 16, IN 14, WS 10, CN 17, DX 12, CH 16, and he has 83 hit points. He wears a ring of protection +2 at all times, but carries no other magical items in his day-to-day dealings. When trouble is a possibility, however, he dons plate mail and shield +1 and wields a spear +3 or sword +2. He is accompanied by two bodyguards at all times; they are both 5th level fighters.

The ultimate motives of the Knights of the Shield are still unclear. Only one thing is certain: the Knights include Amn in their plans.

Tethyr

Tethyr is a land of both great danger and fantastic opportunity. Because of the lack of any central authority, the land has become a haven for soldiers of fortune, would-be kings, petty tyrants, hunted criminals, persecuted zealots, and profiteers of all types. A strong, daring person could carve out a place in history in Tethyr—or he could meet a quick, violent end.

General Description

The borders of Tethyr are generally agreed to be the Tethir Road to the north, the Snowflake Mountains to the east, and the Sea of Swords to the west. The southern boundary is harder to define, but is considered to be a line cutting through the middle of the Forest of Mir and extending to the coast to the west, turning to the southeast as the forest turns south.

It's easier in some ways to define the boundary by listing what towns and places are on which side of the line. The port city of Myratma, for example, is in Tethyr; its close neighbor Memnon is in Calimshan. Saradush, Ithal Pass and Kzelter are all in Tethyr; everything south of the Marching Mountains is in Calimshan. Monrativi Teshy Mir is considered to be in Calimshan, even though most historians agree that the civilization that used to live there is more directly connected to the people of Tethyr.

Races Appearing

Ten years ago, Tethyr was almost exclusively a human nation. All that changed with the upheavals that deposed the royal family. Humans are still the predominant race in Tethyr, but their days of exclusive monopoly are over.

There have always been rumors of a large elf tribe (perhaps several) in the huge Forest of Tethir, but the elves have been reluctant to show themselves in the past. (Given the former royal family's attitude toward elves, this should be no surprise.) Information on the elves of Tethyr is still sketchy, but one of two things has happened: either a large number of new elves have moved to the forest in the past five years, so that their sheer numbers make them more visible; or the elves that have always lived there have decided to become more outgoing. Travelers on the Trade Way have reported seeing (and sometimes meeting) large groups of elves. The towns on the edge of the forest, such as Velen, Mosstone, and Port Kir, have also reported increased contact.

There has never been a very large dwarf population in Tethyr, and things have not really changed in the past ten years. There is one small tribe in the eastern end of the Starspire Mountains that regularly sends trading expeditions into Zazesspur, but that's about the extent of it. Saradush and Ithal Pass have an increased contact with dwarves because of the large numbers living throughout the Snowflake Mountains.

Halflings are also common throughout Tethyr, though they are most often found in the Purple Hills near the seacoast. No halflings (or any other non-humans, for that matter) were allowed to participate in Tethyr government, even on a local level, but that has changed. Today, there are several halflings sitting on Town Councils in Tethyr; their influence is greatest in Myratma and Zazesspur.

Gnomes are more common in Tethyr than they are in Amn, but that isn't saying much. They are still a rarity, and when they do appear, it is usually in the employ of a rich noble or businessman.

Half-elves are very common and treated well; half-orcs are nearly as common, but not treated nearly as well. Orcs are considered monsters, not another equal race—they are shunned and hunted down at every opportunity. Half-orcs are barely tolerated in Tethyr society. Of course, there is no institutionalized persecution (there are no institutions), so even a half-orc can succeed in Tethyr, given luck, quick wits, and a strong sword arm.

Languages

Due to the diversity of people in Tethyr, a wide variety of languages are spoken there. All alignment and race languages are spoken regularly, but nearly everyone also knows the "common" tongue. Common is used if necessary, but is widely despised as a "second," inferior language.

Much of Tethyr's problems with language are political. The former royal family insisted on a common language for all, and outlawed any official documents or communication (even contracts between two agreeing parties) in any other language. Today, liking common is considered a sign of support for the "old days" of the monarchy, a politically unfavorable position. Today, people use common only when necessary; however, it is necessary quite often.

Social Customs

Tethyr society is very open and fair-minded, but also cautious. Another way of saying this is that everyone distrusts everyone else, regardless of race, creed, or position.

This is understandable given the recent history of the area. The treacherous way the royal family was deposed, the subsequent rise and fall of dozens of would-be kings, the town-against-town raiding, and the continued lawlessness of the region have all contributed to a carefulness that borders on paranoia. This is a fairly new outlook, of course—Tethyr is full of long-time residents who love and trust their fellow men and treat them with kindness and respect. A famous Tethyr proverb goes, "Have many friends . . . but know where they keep their weapons."

The people of Tethyr put a very high value on the land itself. Landowners are held in the highest respect, followed closely by anyone who works the land. Even in urban areas, Tethyr citizens take great pride in their individual vegetable gardens and window boxes. City parks in Tethyr are known throughout the Realms for their beautiful and exotic gardens.

The people of Tethyr are still status-conscious, but that status is associated with the land, not with material wealth.

The hostess who wants to impress at a Tethyr social function makes sure the tables are loaded with the finest fresh fruits and vegetables available. Dress is simple and hardy, with the most popular styles variations of work clothes.

The people of Tethyr also greatly admire personal accomplishment in individual work. Inventors, craftsmen, artists, musicians, and writers are well-respected. People here have nothing against money, but simply owning things is not considered proof of a person's value. "Better to create than to buy," is a popular Tethyr saying.

While the current political situation is full of opportunities for ambitious people, the average Tethyr citizen is surprisingly cautious. The former rulers controlled nearly every aspect of Tethyr life, and the residents have gotten used to not making decisions or taking initiative. Rather than stepping forward and taking a hand in shaping the future of the country, most are laying low and waiting for the power struggles to end. Once a winner is established, most people will follow the new leaders with the same unthinking devotion they had for their former king.

Monsters

In the days of the royal family, there were very few monsters in Tethyr; a well-trained army, complete with powerful magic-users, took care of any threats to the people. Now, it's as if someone pulled a cork out of a jug. Nearly every monster known to the Forgotten Realms has been spotted, at one time or another, in Tethyr sometime in the past ten years.

Some suspect a conspiracy of sorts, or that some kind of "all clear" signal was given to monsters across the continent once the royal family was deposed. More likely is that in the absence of the persistent efforts of the royal army, monsters have flourished naturally. But no matter the cause, the fact remains that monsters of many varieties are making Tethyr home, and more are appearing every day.

One of the largest sources of the problem is the Forest of Tethir. This area was never really tame in the old days, and now the denizens of this deep, ancient forest have taken to raiding neighboring areas (especially to the east and south) for food, captives, treasure, or just thrills. Bugbears, ogres, kobolds, treants, owlbears, wolves, orcs, trolls, leprechauns, spiders, and hobgoblins are common. Less common, but still present, are manticores, basilisks (lesser and greater), ankhegs, stirges, bloodthorns, choke creepers, bulettes, norkers, greenhags, atomies, wyverns, and dragons (particularly green and white ones). Of course, many dangerous groups of humans (bandits, berserkers, and the like) also use the cover of the forest for a base, adding to the danger.

The open areas in central Tethyr are not as filled with monster life, because of the higher concentration of people, and the lack of suitable places to hide when enough of those people get mad enough to organize a hunting party. Creatures that can make their own hiding places, like bulettes, purple worms, and flying monsters, still do well in the open country, feeding regularly on cattle, game, and the occasional village.

Magical monsters are also common throughout Tethyr, but generalizations are more difficult when it comes to them. There is a sizable number of undead of all varieties in the vicinity of the Gorge of the Fallen Idol, but no one is sure of the relationship between the two. The headwaters of the River Ith (running from the Gorge of the Fallen Idol to Survale Ford) is the home of many water-based monsters, including water elementals, naga, the ice and ooze para-elementals, dryads, and the like.

Lastly, it is said that an arch-devil of great power is establishing a power base in the Forest of Tethir, and is recruiting all manner of evil creatures (and even humans) to further his plans on this plane, whatever they are.

History

For the past 1500 years, Tethyr has had a single, strong royal family ruling with absolute power. When a king died or became incapacitated, his oldest son took the throne. As the family trees of those close to power became more intertwined and complicated, there were the inevitable wars of succession and bickering over which second cousin was the "true" heir to the throne, but the civil wars were brief. And once the fighting was over, the system returned to normal, until the next major dispute in a few hundred years or so.

All that changed 10 years ago. The current ruling family had been in power for over 350 years, so long that they had dropped their own family name centuries ago (no one even remembers it now) and simply called themselves Tethyr. King Alemander IV was comfortably ruling from Castle Tethyr, and the country seemed happy enough.

But there was a broad current of dissatisfaction among the people of Tethyr. Non-humans were forbidden by law to own land, and since most rights and privileges accorded citizens were based on land ownership, they became second-class citizens as well. Things were especially bad for elves, who were driven deep into the Forest of Tethir by royal armies. Alemander IV took land away from rightful owners and gave it to nobles who promised larger contributions to the royal treasury. These social and economic inequities, coupled with several harsh winters and bad harvests in a row, made the time ripe for a change.

But it takes more than just a couple of lousy winters to depose a king; it takes treachery.

In the case of the fall of House Tethyr, it took an ambitious general and impatient royal heir. Prince Alemander grew tired of waiting for the robust Alemander IV to make room for him, so he struck a deal with General Nashram Sharboneth, commander of the king's largest army. While Sharboneth marched his army toward Tethyr, bringing along a sizable group of angry peasants recruited with the promise of land reform, the would-be Alemander V downplayed the alarming reports from the king's spies and advisors. The prince silenced his father's most persistent counselors permanently, either through murder or exile. By the time Sharboneth's army arrived and laid siege to Castle Tethyr, it was too late for loyalists to help.

The final step of the plan was ready to be set in motion. As Sharboneth launched a direct assault on the castle (using the expendable peasants as shock troops), a handful of elite soldiers let in a secret entrance by the prince would eliminate key guards and open the gates. At the same time, the prince (one of the few people allowed to see the king directly) would murder his father. A fire set by the elite troops would destroy the evidence of treachery, and the general and the prince would emerge from the conflagration and announce a new, joint government.

The plan was executed perfectly, up to a point. Sharboneth double-crossed the prince—his men were much too efficient in setting the castle ablaze, and Prince Alemander (along with most of his fellow conspirators) died horribly in the fire. At about the same time, a spy planted on the general's inner staff by the equally duplicitous Alemander murdered the general and dissolved his body with a powerful acid before anyone could come to Sharboneth's aid.

To make matters worse, everyone had underestimated the resentment the people felt for the royal family. Once Castle Tethyr began to fall, there was no holding back the mob. In one night, the proudest, strongest castle in all the country was reduced to a smoking ruin. Everything of value—fine tapestries, plates and silverware, furniture, jewelry, weapons, clothes, armor, paintings, statues, etc.—was either stolen, burned, or just ripped apart and stomped into the dust.

As news of the fall of the royal family spread, so did the chaos. In what is now known as the "Ten Black Days of Eleint," anyone known (or even suspected) of blood connection to the royal family was put to the sword. This led to some darkly humorous moments, as social climbers who had bragged just a week before of being a sixth cousin twice removed of a royal aunt tried in vain to convince an angry mob that they were "only kidding."

The nobles who were the biggest supporters of the royal family also came under attack, and some baronial keeps fell. Local leaders who had adequately distanced themselves from the Tethyr family, or were popular enough (or feared enough, or strong enough), survived. These surviving nobles became the initial players in the fight to decide the fate of Tethyr.

One thing was certain; any leader or type of government that too closely resembled rule under the Tethyrs would not be accepted. "Royalist" became a dirty word in Tethyr society. Today, the power struggle continues, and there is no sign of it ending anytime soon.

Government and Politics

Simply put, there is no central government in Tethyr. Individual nobles exercise control over relatively small areas, mostly cities and towns. The vast majority of the land has no controlling authority; law and justice are what the people involved decide it is.

There are some strong nobles or other governments, most notably in the major cities of Zazesspur, Myratma, Ithmong, and Saradush. Each of these rulers has hopes of reuniting Tethyr under his own banner, but some are more ruthless in their ambition than others. Most of the other towns and villages of Tethyr have ruling councils or some similar form of local rule, but would gladly throw in with a larger, more powerful government—if one appeared.

The elves of Tethyr wasted no time upon hearing of the fall of the royal family in forming their own Elven

Council. The elven residents of the Forest of Tethir now consider themselves a sovereign nation, and persons who break elvish law and are caught can expect to be fully subject to elvish justice. If a strong ruler were to rise up in Tethyr and invite the elves to join the new government, they wouldn't necessarily turn the offer down. But elves have long memories, and their treatment at the hands of the Tethyr family is a sharp, bitter memory. Strong assurances would have to be made by any government that hoped to include the elves.

In a similar fashion, the halflings of the Purple Hills have established their own government, though it is not as independent as the elves'. The Purple Hills Council is in close contact with the governments of both Zazesspur and Myratma, and may someday serve as the bridge by which one ruler may emerge over the entire area.

The attitudes toward crime (and, in fact, the very definitions of what is and is not a crime) varies from area to area. The larger cities and towns have regular patrols, and a court system of sorts to dispense justice. Laws and penalties, of course, vary from town to town. For example, offenders are regularly forced into slavery by Myratma courts for a variety of offenses, while slavery is itself a crime in Saradush.

In small villages and outlying areas, justice is entirely of the vigilante variety. If enough people are incensed enough by a crime, they band together, hunt down the criminal, and execute sentence. This sort of justice is harsh—there are no jails, so penalties are usually either forfeiture of possessions or death.

Religion

There is complete freedom of religion in Tethyr. What little government there is is too busy consolidating its power and defending itself to worry about religion. As a result, every religion in the Forgotten Realms is known here. There are a few religions, though, that are traditionally more popular than the others. They are:

Eldath

Eldath is the goddess of stillness, peace, and quiet places, and is the guardian of druid-groves. As such, this Neutral deity has many worshippers among the people who live in and near the Forest of Tethir. Many elves are also followers of Eldath.

Sune

Sune, also known as Firehair, is the goddess of love, beauty, and passion. She is a favorite of the city-dwellers of Tethyr, especially those in Zazesspur. Sune is aligned with Chaotic Good.

Silvanus

Silvanus is the God of Nature, and the patron of Druids. As such, this Neutral god has many worshippers in the great Forest of Tethir. But Silvanus is also the most-worshipped god in the open lands of south and east Tethyr. Whether widespread worship of Silvanus came about because of the people's natural love and respect for the land, or the other way around, is not clear.

Bane

Bane is the god of strife, hatred, and tyranny. It should come as no surprise to anyone familiar with this country's history that Bane has a wide following here. The recent history of Tethyr has been filled with little else but strife, hatred, and tyranny. It is even whispered in some circles that this Lawful Evil god had a hand in the fall of Castle Tethyr, though this almost certainly has no truth to it.

Beshaba

This Chaotic Evil goddess of bad luck, betrayal, misfortune, and treachery has many followers in Tethyr for the same reason as Bane, above. It is said that Beshaba appeared to both General Sharboneth and Prince Alemander on that fateful night, predicting their deaths at the treacherous hands of each other.

Ilmater

Ilmater is the god of endurance, suffering, perseverance, and martyrdom. There is a strong streak of subservience to both tyrants and the forces of nature in the Tethyr national personality, and that would explain the above-average number of worshippers of this Lawful Good god in Tethyr.

Geography and Climate

Any discussion of Tethyr's geography must begin with the Forest of Tethir, the largest in the Empires of the Sands and one of the largest in all of the Forgotten Realms. The forest is thick and dark, made up of many different types of trees, most of them evergreen. There are numerous small lakes, spring-fed streams, pools, and waterfalls throughout the forest. It is a vibrant, living place, filled with game, birds, and creatures of all sizes and shapes.

The Forest extends onto the Tethyr Peninsula, all the way to the far western tip. It is said that pirates from the Nelanther cross Asavir's Channel and cut down their own timber for boats because it is easier than buying or pirating it. The peninsula is sparsely populated, except for the towns of Velen and Tulumage. There are a few hermits and other loners that have carved out a humble life on the peninsula, but they are few and far between.

There is no known explanation of the difference in the spelling of "Tethir" and "Tethyr" other than, "that's the way it's always been." Undoubtedly, the two names were at one time the same; when one changed, why it changed, and even which one was the original name, is unknown. But to keep things straight, the forest (and the Amn road that runs along its northern edge) is spelled with an "i"; the country, the peninsula, and the castle of the former ruling family are all spelled with a "y".

The Tethyr Peninsula creates some interesting perils for shipping along the Sword Coast. The peninsula forces ships to run a gauntlet of sorts past the Nelanther, called by many the Pirate Isles. (Of course, there is another set of islands in the Sea of Fallen Stars called the Pirate Isles; while area residents, who have no use for names half a continent away, call these islands the Pirate Isles, scholars—and this book—will refer to them as the Nelanther.)

The Nelanther are called the Pirate Isles because of the large number of pirate ships based there, waiting to attack passing merchant ships. These attacks usually take place in one of two places: Asavir's Channel and The Race. Asavir's Channel gets its name from a famous pirate of several hundred years ago who was personally responsible for the sinking of over 100 cargo ships (after depriving them of their cargo, of course) before being lost in a storm. The Race gets its name from the strong winds (30 to 40 knots) that constantly blow through the area. The high winds make the kind of maneuvering necessary to overtake and board a merchant vessel particularly hard; discussions of the abilities of various pirates always boil down to their performance on The Race. The good pirates can catch their prey even there; the others wait in Asavir's Channel.

Just to the south of the Tethyr Peninsula is Firedrake Bay, a safe harbor from storms, but not necessarily from ambitious pirates. Just south of that is a spur of the Starspire Mountains that extends in the Sea of Swords; it is known, imaginatively enough, as the Starspire Peninsula. It is rocky and unremarkable, though it is rumored that a band of sea orcs has taken up residence there (for more information, see the listing later in this section).

The Starspire Mountains themselves are mountains only when compared to the otherwise flat terrain of Tethyr; the highest peak is only 7,200' high, and the average is closer to 4,500'. The only other relief from the flatness is The Purple Hills, which is a fertile, gently rolling land.

There are only two major rivers in Tethyr. The Sulduskoon is neither particularly wide or deep but it is persistent, crossing nearly the entire breadth of the country before emptying into the sea at Zazesspur. River Ith is a much more energetic river; born of the runoff from the Snowflake Mountains, it is swift and dangerous in the east, cutting deep gorges in the land. By the time the river reaches Ithmong, it has calmed down substantially; beyond Ithmong, the river is wide, strong, and deep.

Only two major roads cross Tethyr. The Trade Way enters from Amn in the north, cuts through the Forest of Tethir near the coast, and passes through Zazesspur, Castle Tethyr, and Myratma before continuing into Calimshan. The Ithal Road crosses the southern end of Tethyr, starting at Kzelter, and continues through Ithal Pass and Saradush, then on to Ithmong and finally Castle Tethyr, where it joins the Trade Way. Many goods and travelers heading west get off the Ithal Road at Ithmong, and board a river vessel to Myratma, rather than taking the road to Zazesspur.

Tethyr is a very temperate country. Summers see temperatures in the 90s regularly, with occasional spells over 100. Many entire winters go by without a hard freeze, although one is not unheard of. There is some rain in the Forest of Tethir, especially out on the Tethyr Peninsula, which is very wet as the peninsula intercepts all the storms blowing in from the northwest. The open lands to the south of the Starspire Mountains are quite dry, though there is enough rain and other water to support dry-weather crops. The eastern half of the country is warm and dry.

MONEY AND COMMERCE

There is no accepted coinage system currently operating in Tethyr. The larger cities have started minting their own coins, but they are only legal tender in the areas controlled by those cities; outside those areas, whatever you can persuade someone to accept as payment, is money.

As a result, barter is a very popular medium of exchange in Tethyr. In rural areas, livestock is a very common method of payment, as is flour, salt, and herbs and spices. A good deal of barter goes on even in cities where there is an established money system; the coins are, for the most part, fairly new, and not everyone is comfortable with them.

Most businessmen are most comfortable with well-established hard currency from other countries, particularly Amn and Calimshan. Any trader with connections in either country will almost always accept these coins as payment, since he knows he can get value for them. Coins of more distant lands (such as Thay and Cormyr) are more rare, but occasionally seen; only the most experienced and traveled merchants deal in these coins.

An interesting unofficial market has recently arisen among Tethyr speculators who trade the various coins issued by the different cities. As the prosperity and political fortunes of a given city increases, the value of its coins goes up; smart traders who can predict these trends have begun to profit by these price changes. Currently, the trade rates, compared to the stable Amn dander, are as follows:

Zazesspur gulder: This coin is currently the most valuable of the Tethyr coins. It costs 107 guilders to buy 100 Amn danders.

Ithmong molean: Only slightly less valuable than the gulder. It would take 113 moleans to buy 100 Amn danders.

Myratma myrat: Myratma has recently had pirate troubles, and the value of its currency shows it. It takes 138 myrats to buy 100 Amn danders.

Saradush zoth: The city of Saradush just began minting this coin in the past year, and confidence in it is still low. It costs 175 zoths to buy 100 Amn danders.

Trading goods in such a way to take advantage of the differences in currency value is very difficult to bring off, because prices for real goods vary in accordance to the value of the currency. A sword that costs 100 danders in Athkatla will cost 175 zoths in Saradush; by the same token, a job that pays 20 zoths a week in Saradush may only pay 13 moleans in Ithmong. But both wages, in their respective cities, will buy about the same amount of goods, so it works out.

Tethyr does very little trading outside its borders. Most agricultural villages are self-supporting, hopefully producing a small surplus that can be traded for equipment and things the village cannot produce itself. The bigger cities rely on trading, shipping, and small manufacturing. Myratma and Zazespur are both major ports, and Ithmong handles a great deal of cargo as well. Saradush is a gateway to the east and the lands beyond.

The people of Tethyr take great pride in their craftsmanship. Zazespur is the home of the finest woodworkers in the Realms, and the quality of Myratma cloth is equally well-known. Much of the finest work is done in small quantities by individual craftsmen. The Tethyr people take great pride in quality work, and they believe that there can be no pride in the products of large, impersonal factories. Distinctive individual effort, what is called "the maker's blood," should be seen in every product. "Covered with the maker's blood" is one of the highest compliments that can be paid a craftsman's work in Tethyr.

Cities

Brost

Brost is a small waystation and trading post on the northern edge of the Forest of Tethir. It is also connected by a well-traveled trail to the Tethir Road just to the north.

Brost is currently the topic of political debate in two countries, a remarkable thing for a town of its small size (population: 6,500). Fed up with the instability of Tethyr's political situation, the Town Council has officially asked Amn's Council of Six to annex Brost into Amn.

Traditionally, Amn's claim to the south ends at the Tethir Road. Brost's position is that because of their location, they are much more a part of Amn than Tethyr, anyway. While Amn considers the situation, several of the stronger cities in Tethyr (particularly Ithmong) have urged Amn not to annex the town, reasoning that someday soon, a central power will be reestablished in Tethyr, and that power will want Brost back.

Nothing is settled yet. While it seems natural that Amn would accept Brost's offer, there are some powerful people in Amn that believe that the town is not worth the trouble. And while it seems natural that most people in Tethyr would be upset about losing part of their territory, there are some that would be more than happy to let Brost go.

There's more to Brost than just its location near the Tethir Road. Several merchants and craftsmen in town have begun trading with a band of elves that live in the nearby forest. The elves are still very cautious around humans, and only visit certain people they've come to trust, and then only at night. This trade is very profitable, and the businessmen who have been left out are understandably upset; they have recently begun using spies to find out more about the elves and their dealings.

Brost is also well-known for the wide variety of mushrooms that grow wild on the forest's edge to the west and southwest of town. Brost mushrooms (depending on the type) are highly prized by gourmets, alchemists, magical researchers, and assassins. A number of town residents hire themselves out as guides, leading expeditions to "mushroom country." These guides often used highly trained dogs to help sniff out the specific kind of mushroom a group is looking for.

Ithmong

Ithmong is one of the major powers in the new order of Tethyr. Its central location gives it many advantages over the Saradush and the coastal cities of Zazespur and Myratma. Another reason Ithmong is on the rise is the appearance of a new, powerful leader ready to expand his influence throughout Tethyr.

Ithmong controls all east-west travel through Tethyr. The Ithal Road and the River Ith cross at this large (population: 220,000) city. The river is a wide, strong one, and the only crossing for hundreds of miles in either direction is the Ithal Bridge in the middle of town. In addition to controlling the overland traffic, Ithmong has enough river patrols and troops on the bridge to also control river traffic. In the past two years, the city has begun charging small tolls to all traffic passing through. The tolls are not large enough for the travelers to complain, but given the volume of traffic, a substantial boon to Ithmong's coffers.

Ithmong's location in the center of Tethyr's main agricultural region is another source of power. Grain and livestock are produced in great quantity throughout the region, and the city controls these valuable food shipments to all the other major cities of the country; while Ithmong has never used this power to blackmail these other cities, the possibility is always there.

The factors listed above have been true about Ithmong for decades, but this city's rise to power is a fairly recent phenomenon. The difference is the son of a blacksmith named Ernest Gallowglass. With the enthusiastic support of the populace, Gallowglass has begun a plan to put Ithmong, previously dismissed as an unsophisticated farm-and-crossroads type of city, on the map as the focal point of a new Tethyr—a new Tethyr ruled by Gallowglass.

Gallowglass took over the Ithmong Town Council 3½ years ago, using a combination of fierce loyalty and generosity to his supporters and ruthlessness to his opponents to solidify his control in the next year. Gallowglass is very intelligent, and a consummate politician; he makes sure that the people of Ithmong see a direct benefit from any of his ideas, and this guarantees their support. For example, when he wanted to start charging tolls on the Ithal Bridge (defying over 80 years of tradition), Gallowglass designated ¼ of the tolls to go directly to civic improvements, such as new roads, more water wells in the poor part of town, and stronger town defense. The townspeople went along cheerfully.

Gallowglass has begun flexing Ithmong's economic muscles to get the attention of the other major powers of Tethyr. Grain and livestock shipments to

CHARACTER RECORD SHEET

Player _____

Character _____

Race _____ Class _____ Level _____

Alignment _____ Exp. Pts. _____

Home City or Country: _____

COAT OF ARMS OR IDENTIFYING SYMBOL

Adventuring Group: _____

Special Abilities: _____

Languages: _____

Wealth: _____

Statistics	Abilities
STR
DEX
CON
INT
WIS
CHR

BASE AC		Surprised _____	Hit Points
		Shieldless _____
		From Behind _____

SAVING THROWS	Paralyze/Poison _____	Petrify/Polymorph _____
	Rod/Staff/Wand _____	Breath Weapon _____
	Spells _____

COMBAT

Weapon	#AT	Dmg.	THAC0	Special Information

SPELLS

MAGIC SCHOOL: _____

EQUIPMENT

MAGICAL ITEMS

SKILLS/PROFICIENCIES

THIEVING ABILITIES

Pick Pockets _____	Locks _____	Traps _____
Move Silently _____	Hide _____	Hear Noise _____
Climb Walls _____	Read Languages _____

Total Encumbrance _____
 Base Move _____
 Modified Move _____

FORGOTTEN REALMS is a trademark owned by TSR, Inc. ©1988 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

CHARACTER RECORD SHEET

Player _____

Character MAELYN HARES DOWN

Race Human Class Fighter Level 11th

Alignment Neutral Good Exp. Pts. 912, 680

Statistics Abilities

STR	16	+1 Dmg.; +350 wt.; opendoors 1-3; bend bars 10%
DEX	14
CON	14	system shock 88% resurrection 92%
INT	12	3 add'l languages
WIS	16	+2 save
CHR	12

Home City or Country: Castle Tenyre, Tenyre

Adventuring Group: The Company of Eight

Special Abilities: +10% exp. pt. bonus

Languages: Common, Neutral Good, Elvish

(Elmanesse), Dwarvish, Orcish

Wealth: 3,040 g.p. in gems + coins

COAT OF ARMS OR IDENTIFYING SYMBOL

BASE AC	-1	Surprised	-1
		Shieldless	2
		From Behind	2

Hit Points

69

SAVING THROWS

Paralyze/Poison	7	Petrify/Polymorph	8
Rod/Staff/Wand	9	Breath Weapon	8
Spells	10

COMBAT

Weapon	#AT	Dmg.	THACO	Special Information
(specialty) DANCING BROADSWORD +3	2/1	8-14	6	8-13 vs. L; Dances!
BROADSWORD	2/1	5-11	9	5-10 vs. L
(proficient) COMPOSITE BOW	2/1	1-6	10
(proficient) BATTLE AXE	3/2	2-9	10
(proficient) DAGGER	3/2	2-5	10	2-4 vs. L

SPELLS

MAGIC SCHOOL: _____

EQUIPMENT

BROADSWORD	LIGHT WAR HORSE*
COMPOSITE SHORT BOW	Saddle + tack
2 QUIVERS	Saddle bags
30 ARROWS	3 lg. sacks
10 SILVER-TIPPED ARROWS	2 weeks' rations
BATTLE AXE	2 waterskins
DAGGER	3 torches
	lantern tent bedroll

MAGICAL ITEMS

SCALE MAIL +3
LARGE SHIELD +3
DANCING BROADSWORD +3
EXTRA-HEALING POTIONS
RING OF SWIMMING

SKILLS/PROFICIENCIES

SMITH/PLETCHER (15)
HORSE RIDING (16)
HEALING (16)

THIEVING ABILITIES

Pick Pockets	Locks	Traps
Move Silently	Hide	Hear Noise
Climb Walls	Read Languages

* Move 24"; AC 7; 9 h.p.

Total Encumbrance	2 80*
Base Move	12
Modified Move	9

CHARACTER RECORD SHEET

Player _____

Character PADDY STOUT FELLOW

Race Halfling Class Fighter/Thief Level 6/6

Alignment Neutral Good Exp. Pts. 39, 475

COAT OF ARMS OR IDENTIFYING SYMBOL

Statistics Abilities

STR	11	open doors 1-2; bend bars 2%
DEX	15	-1 AC
CON	16	+2 h.p./die system check 95% resurrection 96%
INT	10
WIS	14
CHR	8	-5% loyalty

Home City or Country: THE PURPLE HILLS, TETHYR

Adventuring Group: The Company of Eight

Special Abilities: +5% exp. pts.; +4 save vs. rod/staff/wands, spells, poison; 60' infravision; can detect slopes; can move silently

Languages: Common, Neutral Good, Durlerish, Elvish, Gnomish, Goblin, Halfling, Orcish, Thieves' Cant

Wealth: _____

BASE AC

4

Surprised 5
Shieldless 4
From Behind 5

HIT POINTS
44

SAVING THROWS

Paralyze/Poison 11/7 Petrify/Polymorph 11
Rod/Staff/Wand 8 Breath Weapon 13
Spells 9

COMBAT

Weapon (specialty)	#AT	Dmg.	THACO	Special Information
BROADSWORD +2	3/2	6-12	13	6-11 vs. L
(proficient)
LT. CROSSBOW	1	1-4*	16*
(proficient)
DAGGER	1	1-4	16
strike from behind w/
Broadsword +2	1	8-26	13	12-27 vs. L
strike from behind w/
Dagger	1	3-12	15	3-9 vs. L

* plus magical bolts, if any

EQUIPMENT

ELFIN CHAIN MAIL
LT. CROSSBOW
2 CASES
15 BOLTS
10 SILVER-TIPPED BOLTS
4 DAGGERS

PONY*
Saddle + tack
Saddle bags tent
bedroll
2 weeks' provisions
2 waterskins
space leather armor thieves' tools

* MOVE 12", AC 9, 7 h.p.

Total Encumbrance ± 50#
Base Move 12
Modified Move 9

SPELLS

MAGIC SCHOOL: _____

MAGICAL ITEMS

BROADSWORD +2, Green Dragon Slayer
5 BOLTS +1
5 BOLTS +2
5 BOLTS +3

SKILLS/PROFICIENCIES

HORSE RIDING (14)
ALERTNESS (14)
FISHING (14)
ROPE USE (15)

THIEVING ABILITIES

(leather armor / elfin chain)

Pick Pockets 60/40% Locks 52/47% Traps 50/45%
Move Silently 57/42% Hide 52/42% Hear Noise 25/20%
Climb Walls 72/57% Read Languages 25/25%

Player _____

Character TARETH LANISTAPH

Race Human Class Ranger Level 15th

Alignment Neutral Good Exp. Pts. 2,110,608

CHARACTER RECORD SHEET

COAT OF ARMS OR IDENTIFYING SYMBOL

Statistics Abilities

STR	18 ²³	+1 to hit; +3 Dmg.; +1000 wt. open doors 1-2; 20% bend/lift
DEX	13
CON	17	+3 h.p./die; system shock 97% resurrection 99%
INT	15	4 add'l languages; 65% chance to know spell
WIS	16	+2 save
CHR	14	+5% loyalty +10% reaction

Home City or Country: ITHMONG, TETHYR

Adventuring Group: The Company of Eight

Special Abilities: +10% exp. pt. bonus; +15 Dmg. vs. giant class; surprise feat 3 in 6; surprised on 1 in 6; Can use sewing magical items; can track

Languages: Common, Neutral Good, Thorsan

Elvish (Elmanesse & Suldush), Halfling

Wealth: 375 g.p. in various coins

BASE AC

-3	Surprised	-3	Hit Points 100
	Shieldless	-2
	From Behind	-2

SAVING THROWS

Paralyze/Poison	2	Petrify/Polymorph	2
Rod/Staff/Wand	3	Breath Weapon	2
Spells	4

COMBAT

Weapon (specialty)	#AT	Dmg.	THACO	Special Information
LONGSWORD +3 (proficient)	5/2	9-16	1	9-20 vs. L; throw spells
LONG BOW (proficient)	2/1	1-6*	6*
SPEAR (proficient)	2/1	5-10	4	5-12 vs. L
DAGGER (proficient)	2/1	4-7	5	4-6 vs. L
LT. CROSSBOW	1	1-4	6	1-4 vs. L

* plus arrow bonus, if any

EQUIPMENT

LONGBOW	Med. war horse*
Large shield	Lt. crossbow
Quiver, (case)	20 bolts
10 arrows	50' rope
9 silver-tipped arrows	Saddle + saddle bags
Dagger	2 waterskins
	1 wineskin flint + tinder
	tent
	spellbook

* MOVE 18", AC 7, 12 h.p.

Total Encumbrance	3 50#
Base Move	12
Modified Move	12

SPELLS

(DRUID)

- 0) Pass without Trace
- (1) Speak with Animals
- (2) Reflecting Pool
- (2) Cure light Wounds

MAGIC SCHOOL:

(MAGIC-USER)

- (1) Magic Missile
- (1) Protection from Evil
- (2) Read Magic
- (2) Invisibility

MAGICAL ITEMS

RING OF PROTECTION +3	SPEAR +1
CHAIN MAIL +4	AMULET VS. UNDEAD
LONGSWORD +3 - Neutral Good;	(13) ARROWS +1
INT 15, EGO 2; detect traps;	(6) ARROWS +3
magic; heals once/day;	ARROW OF DRAGON SLAYING
Speaks NG, Common.	ARROW OF GIANT SLAYING

SKILLS/PROFICIENCIES

HORSE RIDING (16)	DIRECTION SENSE (16)
ANIMAL HANDLING (16)	FIRE-BUILDING (16)
ANIMAL LEE (15)	WEATHER SENSE (16)
BLIND-FIGHTING

THIEVING ABILITIES

Pick Pockets	Locks	Traps
Move Silently	Hide	Hear Noise
Climb Walls	Read Languages

The Shining Sea

The Singing Rocks

Player _____

Character LAWANTHA SILENDIA

Race Human Class Magic-User Level 12th

Alignment Neutral Good Exp. Pts. 884, 910

CHARACTER RECORD SHEET

COAT OF ARMS OR IDENTIFYING SYMBOL

Statistics Abilities

STR	9	open doors 1-2; bend bars 1%
DEX	16	+1 reaction/missile attack; -2 to AC
CON	13	System shock: 85% resurrection: 90%
INT	17	75% chance to know spell; 8-14 spells/level; 6 add'l lang.
WIS	15	+1 save
CHR	16	+20% loyalty +25% reaction adj.

Home City or Country: CAUMPORT, CALIMSHAN

Adventuring Group: The Company of Eight

Special Abilities: +10% exp pts.

Languages: Common, Neutral Good, Elvish
(Elmensesse & Suldusk), Dwarvish, Halfling, Orcish

Wealth: 8,450 g.p. in gems and coins

BASE AC	-1	Surprised 1
		Shieldless -1
		From Behind 1

Hit Points	33
------------	----

SAVING THROWS	Paralyze/Poison 8	Petrify/Polymorph 6
	Rod/Staff/Wand 4	Breath Weapon 8
	Spells 5

COMBAT

Weapon	#AT	Dmg.	THACO	Special Information
(proficient) QUARTERSTAFF	1	1-6	16
(proficient) Dagger +2	1	3-6	14	3-5 vs. L THACO 12 if thrown
Dagger	1	1-4	16	1-3 vs. L THACO 15 if thrown

SPELLS

- | | |
|-------------------------------------|-----------------------|
| (1) Read Magic | (4) Polymorph Self |
| (1) Magic Missile (x2) | (5) Hold Monster |
| (1) Sleep | (5) Teleport |
| (2) Knock | (5) Telekinesis |
| (6) Mirror Image | (5) Conjure Elemental |
| (2) Wizard Lock | (6) Stone to Flesh |
| (2) Stinking Cloud | |
| (3) Lightning Bolt | |
| (3) Fly | |
| (3) Protection from Normal Missiles | |
| (3) Invisibility 10' Radius | |
| (4) Dimension Door | |
| (4) Ice Storm | |
| (4) Polymorph Other | |

MAGIC SCHOOL: _____

EQUIPMENT

- | | |
|---------------------|----------------------------|
| QUARTERSTAFF | Light Warhorse* |
| 4 DAGGERS | Saddle + tack |
| | Saddle bags |
| | Tent |
| | bedroll |
| | 2 weeks' provisions |
| | 3 waterskins |
| | 1 wineskin |
| | spell books |

* MOVE 24", AC 7, 9 h.p.

Total Encumbrance	≈ 10 #
Base Move	12
Modified Move	12

MAGICAL ITEMS

- | | |
|---|--|
| CLOAK OF PROTECTION +3 | SCROLL OF PROTECTION VS. DEMONS |
| WAND OF LIGHTNING BOLTS (40 charges) | RING OF AIR ELEMENTAL CONTROL |
| DAGGER +2 | CRYSTAL BALL |
| BRACERS OF DEFENSE AC 4 | GEM OF SEEING |
| POTION OF GREEN DRAGON CONTROL | |
| SCROLL OF PROTECTION vs. UNDEAD | |

SKILLS/PROFICIENCIES

- | | |
|----------------------------------|----------------------|
| HORSE RIDING (15) | ROPE USE (16) |
| SWIMMING (9) | HEALING (15) |
| FUNGUS IDENTIFICATION (7) | |
| SOUND ANALYSIS (15) | |

THIEVING ABILITIES

Pick Pockets	Locks	Traps
Move Silently	Hide	Hear Noise
Climb Walls	Read Languages

CHARACTER RECORD SHEET

Player _____

Character MANFRED ARBUSTLE

Race Human Class Druid Level 3d

Alignment Neutral Exp. Pts. 7,085

COAT OF ARMS OR IDENTIFYING SYMBOL

Statistics Abilities

STR	12	+100 wt.; open doors on 1-2; bend bars +7%
DEX	10
CON	12	system shock: 80% resurrection: 85%
INT	14	4 add'l languages
WIS	15	+1 save
CHR	15	+15% loyalty; +15% reaction

Home City or Country: VELEN, TETHYR

Adventuring Group: The Company of Eight

Special Abilities: +10% exp. pts.; +2 save vs. fire & lightning; Identify plant, animal, pure water; pass without trace.

Languages: Common, Neutral, Druid, Elvish

Wealth: 14 g.p. in assorted coins

BASE AC

8

Surprised 8
Shieldless 8
From Behind 8

Hit Points

16

SAVING THROWS

Paralyze/Poison 10 Petrify/Polymorph 13
Rod/Staff/Wand 14 Breath Weapon 16
Spells 15

COMBAT

Weapon	#AT	Dmg.	THACO	Special Information
(proficient) QUARTERSTAFF	1	1-6	20
(proficient) SLING & BULLETS	1	2-5	20	2-7 vs. L
DAGGER	1	1-4	20(+4)	1-3 vs. L

SPELLS

- (1) Animal Friendship
- (1) Entangle
- (1) Invisibility to Animals
- (1) Detect Snares & Pits
- (1) Shillelagh
- (2) Cure Light Wounds
- (2) Flame Blade
- (2) Obscurement
- (3) Call Lightning

MAGIC SCHOOL: _____

EQUIPMENT

- Leather Armor
- Quarterstaff
- 4 throwing daggers
- Sling
- 20 Sling Bullets
- Light Warhorse*
- Saddle + tack
- 1 lg. sack
- 1 weeks provisions
- 1 waterskin
- Bowls
- 2 small boxes of mistletoe, holly, etc.

MAGICAL ITEMS

SKILLS/PROFICIENCIES

- Horse Riding (15)
- Plant Lore (14)
- Animal Lore (14)

THIEVING ABILITIES

Pick Pockets _____	Locks _____	Traps _____
Move Silently _____	Hide _____	Hear Noise _____
Climb Walls _____	Read Languages _____

* Move 24"; AC 7; 6 h.p.
Total Encumbrance ± 20 #
Base Move 12
Modified Move 12

Player _____

Character Arkaneus Silvermane

Race Human Class Druid Level 12th

Alignment Neutral Exp. Pts. 412,119

CHARACTER RECORD SHEET

COAT OF ARMS OR IDENTIFYING SYMBOL

Statistics Abilities

Home City or Country: MOSSTONE, TETHYR

STR	10	open doors 1-2; bend bars 2%
DEX	13
CON	15	+1 h.p./die system shock 91% resurrection 94%
INT	15	4 additional languages
WIS	18	+4 save
CHR	15	+15% loyalty; +15% reaction 7 henchmen max.

Adventuring Group: The Company of Eight

Special Abilities: +10% exp. pt. bonus; +2 save vs. lightning + fire; identify plant, animal, pure water; immune to woodland charm; shape change 3/day

Languages: Common, Neutral, Druid, Centaur, Dryad, Elvish, Gnome, Hill Giant, Lizardman, Manticore, Sprite, Treant, Green Dragon, Halfling, Dwarvish

Wealth: 112 gp. in assorted coins

BASE AC

8

Surprised 8
Shieldless 8
From Behind 8

HIT POINTS

69

SAVING THROWS

Paralyze/Poison 6 Petrify/Polymorph 9
Rod/Staff/Wand 10 Breath Weapon 12
Spells 11

COMBAT

Weapon	#AT	Dmg.	THACO	Special Information
(proficient) STAFF +2	1	3-8	12	STAFF OF THE WOODLANDS HAS spell capability
(proficient) DAGGER	1	1-4	14	1-3 vs. L
(proficient) HAMMER	1	2-5	14	1-4 vs. L

SPELLS

MAGIC SCHOOL: _____

- (1) Animal Friendship / Ceremony
- (1) Detect Magic
- (1) Detect Snares & Aps
- (1) Entangle
- (1) Invisibility to Animals
- (1) Speak with Animals
- (2) Create Water
- (2) Cure Light Wounds
- (2) Fire Trap
- (2) Flame Blade
- (2) Goodberry
- (2) Heat Metal
- (2) Warp Wood
- (3) Call Lightning
- (3) Cure Disease / Know Alignment
- (3) Neutralize Poison
- (3) Tree
- (4) Animal Summoning I
- (4) Cure Serious Wounds
- (4) Dispel Magic
- (4) Plant Door
- (4) Speak with Plants
- (5) Insect Plague
- (5) Moonbeam
- (5) Wall of Fire
- (6) Conjure Fire Elemental
- (6) Cure Critical Wounds
- (7) Creeping Doom

EQUIPMENT

Leather Armor
10 throwing daggers
Hammer

Medium Warhorse*
Saddle + Tack
Saddle bags
3 waterskins
Silver Sickle
Bowls
5 small boxes with oak, mistletoe, holly, etc.

* Move 18", AC 7, 12 h.p.

Total Encumbrance ≈ 25 #
Base Move 12
Modified Move 12

MAGICAL ITEMS

STAFF OF THE WOODLANDS +2
(37 charges)

SKILLS/PROFICIENCIES

Healing (18)
Weather Sense (18)
Animal Handling (18)
Horse Riding (18)

THIEVING ABILITIES

Pick Pockets _____ Locks _____ Traps _____
Move Silently _____ Hide _____ Hear Noise _____
Climb Walls _____ Read Languages _____

Player _____

Character SYLVANUS MOONDROP

Race ^{Wood} Elf Class Fighter Level 6th

Alignment Neutral Exp. Pts. 63, 814

CHARACTER RECORD SHEET

COAT OF ARMS OR IDENTIFYING SYMBOL

Statistics

Abilities

STR	15	+200 wt.; open doors 1-2; bend bars 7%
DEX	17	+2 reaction/misile attacks; -3 AC
CON	14	system shock 88% resurrection 92%
INT	13
WIS	13
CHR	16	+20% loyalty +25% reaction

Home City or Country: FOREST OF TETHIR

Adventuring Group: The Company of Eight

Special Abilities: 90% resistance to Sleep + Charm,
+1 to hit with bow, short sword, or long sword;
60' Infravision; can find secret doors; moves silently;
+10% exp. pts.

Languages: Elvish, Common, Neutral, Treant,

Woodland Mammat

Wealth: 1,120 g.p. in assorted gems + coins

BASE AC

0

Surprised 3
Shieldless 1
From Behind 4

HIT POINTS
36

SAVING THROWS

Paralyze/Poison 10 Petrify/Polymorph 11
Rod/Staff/Wand 12 Breath Weapon 12
Spells 13

COMBAT

Weapon	#AT	Dmg.	THACO	Special Information
(proficient) LONGSWORD +1	1	2-9	14	2-13 vs. L
(specialty) LONG BOW +2	2/1	3-8*	11	* Point Blank (6'-20') +2 hit / +2 dmg + double damage Short Range (300'-750') +1
(proficient) SHORT SWORD	1	1-6	15	1-8 vs. L
(proficient) DAGGER	1	1-4	16	THACO 14 if thrown

* plus arrow bonus, if any

EQUIPMENT

SPUNT MAIL	LIGHT WARHORSE*
LARGE SHIELD	Saddle + tack
2 QUIVERS	Saddle bags
20 ARROWS	1 weeks' provisions
10 SILVER-TIPPED ARROWS	2 water skins
DAGGER	50' rope
SHORT SWORD	small chest

* Move 24", AC 9, 13 h.p.

Total Encumbrance 32 70[#]
Base Move 12
Modified Move 9

SPELLS

MAGIC SCHOOL: _____

MAGICAL ITEMS

LONG BOW +2	POWDER OF FIRE GIANT STRENGTH
LONG SWORD +1	STONE OF GOOD LUCK
BOOTS OF SPEED	RING OF REGENERATION
8 ARROWS +2
2 ARROWS +1

SKILLS/PROFICIENCIES

HORSE RIDING (15)
HUNTING (13)

THIEVING ABILITIES

Pick Pockets _____	Locks _____	Traps _____
Move Silently _____	Hide _____	Hear Noise _____
Climb Walls _____	Read Languages _____

Zazesspur and Myratma are delayed unless additional payments to inspectors are made; imports from those cities and Saradush are refused entrance without the "proper permits." This is not a total embargo; only a few shipments each month get this treatment for now. But it could get much worse, and that's the message Gallowglass wants the other cities to get. They are paying more for Ithmong goods, and can't recoup the money losses with their own exports.

There is talk in Ithmong that the other major cities of Tethyr are raising an army to march on the city and put an end to these economic actions. There is no truth to this at all; in fact, it is a rumor started by Gallowglass. If the people believe an attack is imminent, it will make the next phase of his plan easier—the military conquest of Tethyr. Within the next two years, Gallowglass plans to raise an army of his own to conquer the rest of Tethyr. He has already begun to assemble the officers, mercenary captains, and magicians necessary to do the job.

At his core, Gallowglass is a tyrant. He is slick and a good speaker, and he makes sure his people always think they are getting some benefit from his actions, but in reality the people of Ithmong are not as well off as they were before he came to power. Gallowglass' activities have come to the attention of the Company of Eight (see "Characters," below), and they are looking at ways to stop Gallowglass' plans.

Kzelter

Kzelter is a small (population: 4,000) town at the east end of the Ithal Road. During the centuries of royal power in Tethyr, Kzelter was much larger, mainly because of a large garrison of troops protecting the pass between the Snowflake Mountains and the Forest of Mir. There were only 2,000 or so troops stationed in Kzelter, but the accompanying families, armorers, taverns, fest-halls, and other related businesses swelled the town to nearly 20,000.

When the Tethyr family fell, most of the troops deserted, but only after looting the garrison for whatever arms, armor, food and money they could get. Rioting townspeople finished the job, and the Kzelter fortress is today a ruin, a haven for petty criminals, the poor, and rats. Some of the soldiers, especially those with families, stayed in Kzelter or the surrounding countryside. Most, however, left the area, either going to their homes elsewhere in Tethyr or adventuring into Calimshan or to the east.

There was no marauding invasion force ready to take advantage of the fall of the Kzelter garrison; the town has lived in complete peace since the downfall of the royal family ten years ago. Kzelter is little more than a peaceful farming village today; frequent caravans of traders from the east passing through to get on the Ithal Road are the extent of the town's excitement.

Rumors still occasionally surface about a well-hidden vault room surviving the townspeople's attack on the garrison, filled with magic weapons and money. Every once in a while, a group of former soldiers will return, convinced they know the location of the secret vault. Most of these groups return to town frustrated and empty-handed; the others are never seen again. It is assumed that the groups that disappear simply left the area rather than return to town and admit defeat. This may be true.

Mosstone

The life of Mosstone is very much connected to the Forest of Tethir. The town depends on the forest for its livelihood, yet it fears many things about the forest (and for good reason). But if the Forest of Tethir wasn't such a dangerous place, Mosstone would not be nearly as prosperous as it is.

Located where the Trade Way exits the forest in the southwest, Mosstone is a gathering place for forest guides, trackers, mercenaries, guards, animal handlers, wagonmasters, and anybody else a merchant caravan may need. Mosstone does a healthy business with travelers in both directions; some are preparing to cross the forest, others are recovering from the trip.

This is not to say that every caravan or traveler through the Forest of Tethyr gets waylaid; if that were the case, the route would quickly fall into disuse. But the threat of disaster is enough that many cautious travelers will hire extra guides, scouts, and guards in Mosstone. In addition to its large personnel pool, Mosstone also has a number of excellent inns and taverns, as well as armorers, blacksmiths, and wagoners.

Mosstone also has a very large druidic population, and one of the biggest druid churches in all of the Realms. Those looking to hire druids or rangers frequently come to Mosstone, and rarely leave disappointed.

Myratma

Myratma, located in the southwest corner of Tethyr, is one of the country's "Big Four" cities. It is very similar in many ways to the great cities of Calimshan, which is understandable given its closeness to Memnon and the Calim Desert.

Myratma depends greatly on commerce and trading for its livelihood, though there are small but important agriculture and manufacturing activities in town. Myratma handles nearly all the bulk agricultural products from the center of Tethyr. Wheat and other grains come down the River Ith by barge, and are stored, sold, and shipped (both overland and by sea) throughout the area. Calimshan is a particularly important customer for Tethyr grain sold through Myratma.

The Purple Hills to the north are rich in fruits and vegetables, and Myratma does a big business in them, too. Ship building and repair is also a major business here. But the most famous business in Myratma is the Tethyr Mills, a huge textile mill right along the banks of the Ith known throughout the Forgotten Realms for its fabrics. Of particular fame are its silks, which are the choice for the finest clothes in both Ca-limshan and Amn, and a light canvas of such tight weave that it is waterproof. This canvas is in great demand for use in the sails of the largest ships on the Sea of Swords and beyond. It is also very popular for use in tarpaulins and tents in rainy areas.

The current Town Council, headed by a merchant named Reshtiva Gullifort, is ambitious enough to want to reunite Tethyr under their banner, but realizes it doesn't have the clout to pull it off—yet. Gullifort, with the approval of the council, has begun negotiating with the Pasha of Calimshan a secret deal in which the Calimshan army would help Myratma take control of Tethyr in exchange for a huge sum of cash (to be taken from the other parts of Tethyr), some land, and favorable trade arrangements for perpetuity. These negotiations have just begun, and no one else in Tethyr other than the Myratma council and their advisors know about it. There is some debate on the Myratma council over whether or not the Calishites can be trusted, and this may prove to be a major stumbling block to any deal.

Port Kir

Port Kir is located at the end of an inlet in the southeast corner of Firedrake Bay. Primarily a small fishing village (population: 3,700), Port Kir has a ready market for its products as the Trade Way runs right along the edge of town.

Port Kir is in a natural location. Firedrake Bay does not get hit by many storms because of the protection of the Tethyr Peninsula, but even when the weather gets so bad that even the bay is affected, the Port Kir inlet is calm. During the heaviest storms, Port Kir may serve as refuge for over 100 ships.

When the seas are calm, Port Kir has a major fishing fleet working Firedrake Bay to great success. Fish and shellfish of many varieties are harvested in abundance in the bay, and the townspeople that aren't fishing are busy working in the various canning, pickling, salting, and curing operations on the waterfront. Port Kir fish are frequently sold to caravans passing through, both for sale in foreign markets and to feed the caravan on its trip.

Port Kir has recently put out a call for adventurers with some sailing experience to investigate the disappearance of several fishing boats in clear weather to the west of the fleet's usual fishing grounds. Pirates are not suspected, because they have left fishing boats alone for years. (For more on this, see the entry on Starspire Mountains, below.)

Saradush

Saradush is located in the southeast corner of Tethyr in the foothills of the Snowflake Mountains. As one of the "Big Four" cities in Tethyr, it has its aspirations of power, but unlike some of the other cities in the country, these aspirations are tempered by reason and motivated by more than just a blind lust for power.

Saradush is the headquarters for all agriculture in far eastern and southeastern Tethyr. Tobacco, cotton, teas and other herbs, and a few exotic vegetables are the most common crops. Hunting for wild game in the open lands to the northwest provides much of the food for the area, though there is little left over for export. There is some mining in the mountains to the east, but it is not particularly profitable.

In the days of the royal family, Saradush was an important government city, filled with bureaucrats and emissaries from the lands to the east. After the overthrow, the Royal Quarter (as it was called) cleared out overnight. Ambassadors returned to their native countries, and most bureaucrats took new names and tried to blend in with the population.

Saradush is not ruled by a Town Council, but by one man—the self-titled Lord Mayor Oon Santele. Santele is a popular and powerful leader, and most importantly—and this is a rarity in Tethyr today—a good leader. Santele has the welfare of Saradush first in his mind at all times. He is neither petty nor vengeful, and he administers justice to the rich and poor in the same fair way.

Santele is no saint; he is overly fond of titles, pomp, and ceremony. But these are minor faults in the eyes of the people of Saradush when compared to his strong points. Like any other leader in Tethyr, Santele has dreams of ruling a reunited country, but he is not ruthless enough to do the things necessary to seize power. He also thinks that an attempt to expand his power over all of Tethyr would keep him from doing a good job in Saradush, and since that's his first priority, he probably won't try. This is Tethyr's loss.

Tulmene

Tulmene is a small village on the southern coast of the Tethyr Peninsula. Fishing is the town's major source of livelihood, and occasional merchant ships stop here to pick up cargo and trade finished goods (everything from arms and armor to furniture) to the townspeople.

Tulmene would normally not be mentioned here but for two things. One, it is the largest fishing village on the peninsula's south coast (population: 4,200). And second, Tulmene is a popular trading post for many of the pirate fleets based in the Nelanther. Many have wondered how a town as large and comparatively well off as Tulmene has escaped the pirates' attention, and the answer is simple. Tulmene trades with the pirates (at very favorable prices) and provides them with valuable information on merchant ship movement in The Race in exchange for not being looted and pillaged. No one suspects (least of all the merchants) that the Tulmene fishing fleet is, in effect, one giant scouting network for the Nelanther pirates. If the news ever got out, it's hard to say whom Tulmene would have to worry about more—the angry pirates or the betrayed merchants.

Velen

Velen is the largest town on the Tethyr Peninsula, with a population of nearly 13,000. Life is not easy in Velen. The north face of the peninsula bears the brunt of storm after storm every winter, and the pirates of the Nelanther are a constant threat. But the townspeople love the sea and consider Velen their home, and they'll do anything to defend it.

Velen is the home of one the best-known shipbuilding and repair yards on the Sword Coast. Simon Andrusky runs the Andrusky Yard, a relatively small operation that turns away hundreds of orders a year. A custom-built Andrusky ship is the finest on the seas—the most maneuverable, the most watertight, and the fastest. The Andrusky reputation is legendary. Pirates take extra care when attacking an Andrusky, hoping to capture the ship intact for their own use. The story is told of a pirate captain who, realizing that his attempt to capture an Andrusky had a good chance of actually sinking the ship, broke off the attack rather than taking a chance on destroying such a piece of craftsmanship.

Velen is also a haven for sailors looking for work. Crewmen of all types and experience levels are available for hire here. Velen is a common drop-off point for ransomed pirate captives, sailors rescued from shipwrecks, and other crewmen who've lost their current jobs for a variety of other reasons.

Many of these sailors are recruited into Velen's town watch, which patrols the seas surrounding the town and protects it from pirate attacks. It's been 17 years since the last successful attack on Velen, and the size and efficiency of the watch is in no small part responsible. The watch has over a dozen ships on patrol at any given time (except during storms, of course), and can put over 30 additional ships to sail with an hour's notice. This fleet, along with substantial shore-based catapult and ballista batteries, has proven enough for any threat since then.

Zazesspur

Zazesspur, located on the Sword Coast just south of the Starspire Peninsula, is Tethyr's largest city. Its population (now up to 375,000) has swelled over the past ten years with the influx of refugees from Castle Tethyr and the surrounding area.

Zazesspur is a major port, and its location on the Trade Way makes it a center for trading and commerce as well. The open land to the southeast is too dry for anything more than livestock grazing, but the Purple Hills to the south are very fertile and provide the city with a good deal of its food.

Zazesspur is also the home of many of Tethyr's finest craftsmen and artists. Of particular repute are the town's leatherworkers, weavers, dyers, and tailors.

Zazesspur, though one of the "Big Four" of Tethyr cities, has had to tread a fine line, politically. Most of the survivors of the destruction of Castle Tethyr fled here ten years ago, and not all the Tethyr family sympathizers were found. As a result, there is a strong underground political movement trying to find a surviving Tethyr heir and reestablish the Tethyr monarchy. This will be difficult, as there are no living members of the family left in Tethyr, but it doesn't stop this small but powerful underground group from trying.

A larger group, one that is actually gaining power in Zazesspur, is promoting the idea of a return to a royal family system of rule, with a new king chosen by some as-yet-undetermined method. The reasoning this group is trying to use is that while the overthrow of a decade ago was necessary, the problem was the excesses of the Tethyr family, not the system of monarchy itself. While this is still not the opinion of the majority, it is growing significantly. One sign of its growing acceptance is that proponents of a monarchy can say so in public today with little fear of being killed by a mob—this wasn't true five years ago.

Given time, this position has a good chance of winning over the majority, first in Zazesspur, then throughout

Tethyr. There are many former bureaucrats and minor nobles living in the city under new names who are using their hidden wealth and still-considerable influence to bring about this return to monarchy. Of course, there are factions in Ithmong and Myratma who have other plans

Places of Interest

Asavir's Channel

Asavir's Channel is the sea lane between the Nelanther and the northwest coast of the Tethyr Peninsula. Every merchant ship that must travel between Amn (and points north) and Tethyr and Calimshan (and points south) must use this channel.

This heavy traffic and the close proximity to the Nelanther, a notorious haven for pirates, adds up to one thing. Between the merchant ships, the pirates, the armed merchant escorts, the scout ships, and the scavengers and profiteers, Asavir's Channel is the most crowded sea lane in all of the Forgotten Realms.

But despite all the bustle, the idea of "safety in numbers" definitely does not apply here. Pirate activity is very heavy, and it is a remarkable day on the channel when the tell-tale plume of smoke from a burning ship can't be seen somewhere. Merchants still use the channel because, even with the risk of loss to the pirates, it is cheaper to move goods by sea than over land. Or, as many merchants are fond of saying, "On land, anything can happen. At least here, we know where the pirates are."

Even though there are a lot of pirates, there's even more merchant traffic, so the odds of any one ship being hit are fairly low; low enough for merchants to risk it, anyway. Another attraction to Asavir's Channel is the reasonably calm seas (the Nelanther tend to break up storms before they reach the channel) and the close proximity of havens such as Velen and Firedrake Bay.

Castle Tethyr

There's not much left to Castle Tethyr; the remaining ruins are little more than a sketchy outline of the size and scope of a castle that was the largest and grandest in all of the Empires of the Sands.

The castle itself was about 450' square, with three stories above ground and walls 45' high. A wide, deep moat surrounded the castle, which also had an extensive underground dungeon. Outside the castle proper were buildings for the many servants, stables, pens for livestock, workshops for armorers and smiths, barracks for the royal guards, and storehouses for food and other material. It was all destroyed that one night ten years ago.

Soldiers, servants, and peasants made off with most of the riches of the castle; the rest burned. From time to time, stories resurface of fantastic treasures still buried deep within the dungeons of Castle Tethyr, but most people believe that the place was stripped bare the night it fell.

The area is still fairly rich agriculturally

(at least for livestock), and the meeting of the Ithal Road and the Trade Way is not more than a mile away from the castle, so the area still has lots of people living in it. However, no one lives within ½ mile or so of the castle ruins—for good reason.

The ruins of Castle Tethyr and the surrounding grounds are haunted by the spirits of all who died by treachery that night ten years ago. It's an impressive list of ghosts, ghosts, haunts, shadows, and other undead. Legends tell of the ghosts of Prince Alemander V and Gen. Nashram Sharboneth, locked in an eternal struggle as each tries to avenge his murder by treachery at the hands of the other. As the occasional lost traveler or foolhardy adventurer has entered the castle ruins, the numbers of the various spooks and undead have increased, much to the dismay of local residents.

Ithal Pass

Ithal Pass is a crossroads community that is not organized enough to be considered a city or town. There is no government of any sort, and the residents like it that way. In fact, Ithal Pass is completely neutral when it comes to questions of Tethyr politics. They don't care who comes out ahead—they just hope that whoever does will leave them alone.

Ithal Pass is a farming community, and they raise just enough food to feed themselves. There is one tavern with a handful of rooms to rent, as a concession to travelers who may wish to stop for the night.

Forest of Tethyr

The Forest of Tethyr is the single most important thing that determines the culture and personality of the entire country. The forest is dark, cool, vast and mysterious—and in a land where most of the people live in open, rolling country, the imagery of the forest still dominates the expressions and attitudes of the people.

The forest is dense and dark in the center, though it thins considerably within 10 miles of its edge. The forest is also less thick on the Tethyr Peninsula, because of the rockier ground. Heavy rainfall on the peninsula, however, makes the forest very wet in that area, and a haven for molds, slimes, fungi and other unpleasant things.

There are two major tribes of elves living in the Forest of Tethir. The larger of the two, the Elmanesse, live in the forest in a large area just east of the Trade Way. Travelers and merchants who report encounters with elves on that road have met the Elmanesse. After years of isolation, this tribe seems ready to reestablish contact with the humans of Tethyr—but only on the elves' terms.

The other major elven tribe, the Suldusk, lives in the southeast area of the Forest of Tethir. Few humans know that the Sulduskoon River gets its name from this elf tribe, and even fewer know that the tribe still exists. This is just fine with the Suldusk, who would as soon be left alone by the outside world.

The Gorge of The Fallen Idol

The Gorge of the Fallen Idol is found where two smaller feeder rivers combine to form the River Ith in far eastern Tethyr. The gorge itself is 250' deep, with steep, crumbling sides that are very unpredictable and difficult to climb (-15% to all climbing rolls). The river itself is deep, cold and swift.

At one point in the gorge, a small clearing opens up to one side of the river, leaving some open, flat ground. In this clearing stands (well, lies actually) the fallen figure of a great stone idol. It was nearly 50' tall when it was standing, and its age is unguessable. The idol has fallen on one side, breaking into several pieces. The last pieces (including the head) have fallen into the river near the bank, and the rushing waters have worn the submerged half of each piece smooth.

Those using magical tests on the fallen statue will find that the idol radiates both magic and evil. There are no inscriptions or carvings of any sort to help decipher the origin or purpose of the statue.

The statue marks the place of worship of a tribe of humanoids now extinct for over 2,200 years. The worshipers weren't quite human, but they weren't orcs or goblins, either. The idol was carved over decades out of the same rock that makes up the sides of the gorge. These humanoids invented elaborate rituals—including sacrifice of their own kind—in worshipping this idol. Some of the rituals began to have magical power, but not deliberately; the humanoid priests began casting spells almost by accident.

As the centuries of worship and sacrifice went on, the idol itself began to take on magical power. This malevolent power became quite great in time, and the idol began to direct the tribe in its search for new lands to acquire and new peoples to enslave.

Eventually, the idol's reach exceeded its grasp, and it sent the tribe out against a human nation of great size and power that worshipped good gods. The idol-worshipers were wiped out, and an army of these people (whose descendants settled the Volothamp area in Calimshan) hunted down the humanoids and put every last one to the sword. They found the idol, and pulled it down. That was over 2,000 years ago.

Today, the broken statue radiates with only a fraction of its former power. If all the pieces were to be reassembled, the idol's power would increase greatly, to the point where it would try to possess the most likely member of the group that did the assembling (at a power equal to a 30th level spell). The idol would then bide its time, learning all it could about the new society it found itself in, and then it would begin to reestablish its evil practices.

The Nelanther

The Nelanther is a chain of hundreds of islands just off the Tethyr and Amn coast in the Sea of Swords. The Nelanther is also known in the Empires of the Sands as the "Pirate Isles" because of the large number of pirates that use the islands as a base of operations.

Only the largest islands in the chain are named; hundreds of others are simply there. There are thousands of places where pirate ships can hide, and hundreds of places where groups of pirates can set up land bases. Each pirate crew knows the route to their own base by memory; no maps of the treacherous shoals, tricky currents, or hidden harbors exist.

It is not known exactly how many pirates prey on merchant shipping from the Nelanther; but best estimates are that there are five or six major pirate operations, each with ten ships or more; another three or four operations with 3-5 ships; and anywhere from 10 to 30 one-ship endeavors. The total is nearly 100 pirate ships operating in the area, each with a crew of anywhere from 40 to 150, depending on the size of the ship.

Nelanther pirates prefer to prey on shipping in Asavir's Channel or The Race, especially since the instability of Tethyr means there will be no organized navy harassing them. The Nelanther pirates do operate off the coasts of Amn and Calimshan as well, but the risks are greater because of those country's navies. The pirates will also mount an occasional raid on a coastal city, but these are extremely risky and not common—not as long as there are easier pickings in the sea lanes.

The Purple Hills

The Purple Hills are located on Tethyr's west coast between Zazesspur and Myratma. It is a rolling, fertile land, filled with fruit orchards, vegetable gardens, and small fields of grain. The Purple Hills are populated almost entirely by halflings, who have migrated from throughout the Empires of the Sands to this area.

The halflings of the Purple Hills are entirely self-governing. They have friendly relationships (based primarily on trade) with both Zazesspur and Myratma. Both cities are courting the halfling's support in the upcoming power struggles, and as a result are as cooperative as can be. Should any trouble arise in the Purple Hills the locals can't handle (a rampaging anhkheg or some such), the two nearby cities will practically get in each others' way in their attempts to be the first to help the halflings out.

Should one leader emerge over Tethyr, the halflings would most likely rejoin the new nation. The halflings of the Purple Hills are not fighters, and are more interested in a good harvest than a good argument.

The coastline to the west of the Purple Hills is nearly deserted. The land is not suitable for the kind of farming the halflings wish to do, and most of the Purple Hills residents are deathly afraid of boats and large bodies of water, anyway.

Sea Tower of Irphong

The Sea Tower of Irphong is a maritime landmark on the east coast of Irphong, a large, uninhabited island at the north-east end of the Nelanther. Sailors for generations have used the tower as a marker indicating the northern entrance of Asavir's Channel. The tower extends some 150' above the shore of the island, and is lit at night. Since the island is totally uninhabited, it is believed that some sort of continual light spell has been cast on an object at the top of the tower (perhaps the roof itself). Why the light is only visible at night or during storms is a mystery.

No pirates have set up camp on Irphong in years, mainly because of superstitions concerning shipwrecks, fires, and other maritime disasters that have befallen groups that have stayed too long in the area. These superstitions are based on fact; a very large, very old dragon turtle has lived in a cove on the north side of the island for decades. This beast is one of the biggest of its kind ever seen (107 hp), and values its privacy greatly. Pirate bands that try to land on the island usually meet the dragon turtle within a week of their arrival, much to their permanent regret.

The dragon turtle does not leave its lair for more than a few hours at a time, so it poses less of a threat to regular shipping than it could. And since its main prey seems to be pirates, no one complains very much. The dragon turtle's lair—a large cave half-filled with water, the only way in is to swim an underwater channel over $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile long—cannot be located without magical help. It's also important to remember that no one alive knows of the dragon turtle's existence. Adventurers who find (or are found by) the dragon turtle and can find its lair will be well rewarded: Thanks to years of a diet rich in pirates, this particular dragon turtle has three times the listed treasure in its lair.

The tower itself is well-built and solid, and completely empty. A winding staircase inside the tower leads to a small platform at the top. The only magic to be found is the continual light spell that has been cast on the entire roof cap of the tower. The enchantment is very tough to dispel—it was cast at 47th level.

Sea Tower of Nemessor

The Sea Tower of Nemessor is very similar in construction to the one on Irphong, but it is different in many other ways. The Nemessor tower is located on a 100' tall cliff on the northeast face of Nemessor, and island at the far southeast end of the Nelanther. (Actually, sages contend that Nemessor Island is not part of the Nelanther at all—something about differing rock formations—but that is neither here nor there.)

The Sea Tower of Nemessor has the same continual light spell cast on its roof, and the tower itself is just as empty as the one on Irphong. But the island of Nemessor is inhabited by almost 800 members of the "Black Skull" pirate clan. The Black Skull are excellent sailors, and do most of their pirating in the treacherous winds of The Race. Of the 800 or so clan members, only 150 are actually pirates; the rest are shipwrights, farmers, craftsmen, captives, slaves, wives, children, etc.

No one from the Black Skull ever goes into the sea tower, except for children on a dare. The pirates are superstitious, and are content to leave the obviously magical structure alone.

Starspire Mountains

The Starspire Mountains are a small mountain range as mountains go, but they are the only mountains in all of Tethyr. The Starspires are very wet mountains, receiving lots of rain in summer and a fair amount of snow in the winter at the higher elevations. This is one of the reasons the open country to the south is so dry.

There is a small tribe of dwarves living deep under the peaks at the eastern end of the Starspire range. This particular tribe likes to keep to itself, although it sends three major trading expeditions each year to Zazesspur, where they trade rare metals and dwarven arms and armor for cloth, leather goods, and other items they do not make for themselves.

The Starspire range extends into the Sea of Swords as a barren, rocky peninsula. This peninsula helps define Firedrake Bay, but has no other features to redeem it.

Which is exactly why a band of sea orcs have chosen the Starspire Peninsula as their new home. The orcs, who call themselves the Split Mast tribe, are still a small group, numbering only 80 (including women and children). They have three ships, but only one is fast enough and reliable enough for serious pirating. The Split Mast have started small, capturing single fishing boats that have strayed too far west from Port Kir, and they must still resort to the "women's work" of farming, fishing, and hunting to keep the tribe fed. But the tribe grows stronger by the month, and larger targets, such as the halfings of the Purple Hills or the many small fishing villages on Firedrake Bay, will soon be attacked by the orcs of the Split Mast.

Survale Ford

This ford is the only place where the River Ith is crossable between the Gorge of the Fallen Idol and the Ithal Bridge in downtown Ithmong. An old, narrow trail winds from the ford south to Saradush and north to Trailstone in Amn. The road would be a more-frequently used trade route if it weren't for the general chaos and lawlessness throughout Tethyr.

A prime example of that lawlessness is Harfour's Raiders, a large bandit gang that operates in the area of the Survale Ford. The Raiders travel all over eastern Tethyr, taking what they want from small villages, family farms, and lone travelers. The Raiders number 75 or so men, and are led by Axian Harfour, a 5th level fighter of Neutral Evil alignment. Harfour's men range from 1st to 5th level, and are all proficient in short bow and long sword.

Harfour's Raiders prefer lightning strikes on horseback, hitting the enemy hard, taking what they can, and fleeing before the target has time to recover. If circumstances dictate, however, Harfour can also orchestrate a siege or other drawn-out military style engagement.

Anyone trying to cross Survale Ford will certainly meet the Raiders. The Ford is always guarded, and a toll is demanded. If the travelers are aggressive, rude, or simply look rich, the Raiders will attack without warning, picking up what's left after the battle is over. The Raiders are confident, but not stupid—if an obviously superior force approaches the Ford, they will withdraw.

Characters

The Company of Eight

The Company of Eight is a band of adventurers sworn to each other and the cause of peace, freedom, and justice in Tethyr. The Company has many powerful enemies, but many powerful friends, too—and their exploits are quickly becoming legend among the common people of the country.

Oddly enough, the Company of Eight has only seven members. Only the leader, Tardeth the ranger, has been with the company since it was formed nearly 13 years ago. He has told the other members of the company (and anyone else who asks) that "the Lady of Truth and Justice is our eighth," but those closest to him believe there is something more to it than that.

The current members of the Company of Eight are:

- Tardeth Llanistaph (AL NG), a 15th level human ranger. Tardeth (no one ever uses his last name) has ST 18/23, IN 15, WS 16, CN 17, DX 13, CH 14. He wears leather armor and a ring of protection +3, but he also owns a set of chain mail +4 which he dons when he knows that combat is imminent. Tardeth wields a long sword +3 that he calls "The Scales of Justice." The sword is intelligent and has spell-throwing abilities. He also uses a long bow with a variety of magical arrows.

- Marilyn Haresdown (AL NG), an 11th level human fighter. Haresdown has ST 16, IN 12, WS 16, CN 14, DX 14, CH 12. She wears scale mail and shield +3 and wields a dancing broad sword +3. Marilyn has been in the Company for six years.

- Arkaneus Silvermane (AL N), a 12th level human druid of many years. He has ST 10, IN 15, WS 18, CN 15, DX 13, CH 15. He has only a staff of the woodlands and a considerable array of spells. Arkaneus is the second most senior member to Tardeth, having been in the Company for 11 years.

- Manfred Arbustle (AL N), a 3rd level human druid and Silvermane's apprentice. Manny (a nickname everyone uses, even though he hates it) has ST 12, IN 14, WS 15, CN 12, DX 10, CH 15. He has no magical items, although he carries a "staff" that is little more than an uncured sapling. Arbustle is the newest addition to the Company, joining less than a year ago.

- Lawantha Silendia (AL NG), a 12th level human magic-user. Lawantha has ST 9, IN 17, WS 15, CN 13, DX 16, CH 16. She wears a cloak of protection +3, and owns several potions, scrolls, and other magical items, including a wand of lightning bolts. Lawantha has been in the Company for four years.

- Sylvanus Moondrop (AL N), an 6th level elf fighter. He has ST 15, IN 13, WS 13, CN 14, DX 17, CH 14. He wears no magical armor, but does own a pair of boots of speed. He also uses a long bow +2 and a long sword +1 to good effect. He has been a member of the Company for six years.

- Paddy Stoutfellow (AL NG), a 6th level halfling fighter/thief. Paddy has ST 11, IN 10, WS 14, CN 16, DX 15, CH 8. Paddy wears chain mail armor, and fights with a broad sword +2, green dragon slayer which he must use with two hands. He is also quite handy with a crossbow, and owns a handful of magical bolts for special uses. Paddy joined the Company just over two years ago.

The Company of Eight uses the vast Forest of Tethyr as its base. While they are likely to be in any part of the forest, they are most frequently in the southwest corner; Tardeth and Arkaneus have important contacts in Mosstone, and the Trade Way is a valuable source of information and work.

While the Company of Eight is not above some simple escort or guard work, they are most concerned with the welfare of the people of Tethyr. The Company (and Tardeth in particular) keeps close tabs on the latest in Tethyr politics on all levels, and works to make sure their three-part goal (Peace, Freedom, and Justice) comes to pass.

Currently, that means keeping a careful watch on Ernest Gallowglass, the ruler of Ithmong with designs on the rest of Tethyr. "No tyrant will rule this land again," Tardeth has vowed on more than one occasion.

The Company of Eight has performed a number of services throughout Tethyr over the past 13 years, many of which have brought great fame to the group. These include the slaying of several rampaging monsters (including two dragons), negotiating the end of a bloody range war in northeast Tethyr, and the overthrow of the former ruler of Ithmong, a tyrant so bad that no one thought anybody could be worse—that is, until Gallowglass came along.

Knights of The Shield

The Knights of the Shield are a secretive group with members all up and down the Sword Coast. The aims, real power, and exact activities and goals of this group is not known. It is only mentioned here because Lord Inselm Hhune, a very powerful member of the Zazesspur Town Council, is one of the leaders of the society.

Lhaeo

Lhaeo is the scribe of the famous Elminster the Sage, one of the most learned and wise men in all of the Forgotten Realms. Elminster and his many servants and associates (including Lhaeo) live in Shadowdale, north of Sembia and southeast of Thar, thousands of miles away from Tethyr.

The only reason this humble scribe is mentioned here at all is because of a great secret—Lhaeo is the last surviving member of the Tethyr royal family! Son of King Alemander IV and younger brother of Prince Alemander V, Lhaeo was sent to Elminster the Sage for training and protection when he was still an infant.

Lhaeo's birth was not announced to the people of Tethyr, and as much secrecy as possible was kept even in the royal castle. The queen never appeared in public very much anyway, and many residents of the castle never knew of the child. Apparently, Alemander IV was more suspicious than history gives him credit for. Lhaeo was to be his last card should conspirators eliminate the other heirs to the throne (little did Alemander IV suspect that the treachery would come from within his own family).

Today, Lhaeo is completely forgotten by those in Tethyr vying for power. Elminster is a wise man, and he knows that the news of a legitimate Tethyr heir, especially one not directly connected to the abuses of Alemander IV's rule, would turn the political situation upside down. Elminster also realizes that there are many different power factions that would hunt Lhaeo down if they knew he lived. So Lhaeo continues to work as a faithful scribe. Whether or not Elminster has told Lhaeo the truth about his heritage is not known; if he has, then Elminster has also convinced Lhaeo to keep it a secret for now.

Calimshan

The kingdom of Calimshan is a vast, arid land of magic and wonder. The land is not abundant in natural resources or particularly good for farming, so the people of Calimshan have learned to depend on trade, craftsmanship, tinkering, a little theft, and a good deal of magic to get by. And they do more than just get by—Calimshan is a glorious, splendid place, full of magic, mystery, and danger.

General Description

Calimshan is a coastal nation, bordered on the west by the Sea of Swords, and to the south by the Shining Sea. Calimshan's northern border is generally accepted to be a line that starts between Memnon and Myratma, goes east through the center of the Forest of Mir, and then turns southeast. The east border is currently in dispute; most in the Realms believe it to be the continuation of the Snowflake Mountains south of Kzelter, passing east of Almraiven and continuing to the Shining Sea. The Pasha of Calimshan believes his eastern border extends past those mountains, down the peninsula to the city of Suldolphor. Suldolphor, and the other cities on the peninsula, while in close contact with Calimshan, prefer to be independent city-states, answering to no one. The pasha is currently not pressing the point, and the dispute is more the source of tavern arguments than the cause of real aggression.

The culture of Calimshan is dominated by the great desert in the west, the Calim Desert. Even though it covers less than one-fourth the total land area of the country, the Calim forces itself on the consciousness of all of Calimshan. The attitudes, rituals, and habits necessary for survival in the Calim are part of everyday life throughout the country.

The land east of the Calim River is more hospitable than desert, but it is still a dry, difficult place. Very little grows in abundance, and the farmers of the region depend greatly on hardy livestock such as goats and sheep. Fresh water is scarce, and many battles have been fought over the right to water a herd. To the north and east is the Forest of Mir, a vast pine forest that can best be described as "stifling." The hot sun fights its way down to the forest floor, yet the trees cut off any semblance of a breeze. Only the occasional clearing or spring provides any relief.

The last important factor in the life of Calimshan is the water, the Sea of Swords and the Shining Sea. It is on these waters that food comes to this country, and exotic spices, magics and other items go out. And it is on these waters that Calimshan claims supremacy over the "barbaric North" in the fields of sailing, sea trading, fishing, and naval warfare.

Races Appearing

Calimshan is primarily a human kingdom, but it is still a diverse, cosmopolitan land because of the many different types of humans that live and work there. A small majority of Calishite humans are of one race, shorter than average, with brown skin and dark hair. There is also a race containing a large amount of Tethyr blood, taller and more fair-skinned than the regular Calishite. Two other races, the tall, ebony-skinned traders of Chult and the long-faced, slightly yellow-tinted men of the Shaar are also in large numbers in Calimshan.

This is not to say that non-human races are nowhere to be found. There are elves in nearly every major city in Calimshan, many of them magic-users, alchemists, and helpers and apprentices. There is also a large tribe of Drow elves living in the western leg of the Forest of Mir, but they are very much interested in keeping to themselves—almost as interested as their neighbors are in keeping away. The Drow in general have a bad reputation, and this tribe in particular is well-known for its ruthless tactics in battle and cruel treatment of prisoners.

Dwarves are very popular in Calimshan for their natural talent with metal, arms and armor. However, there are very few of them in this country. When dwarves are found, they are working in the cities of Calimshan, living in small family groups. There are no large tribes living in their own communities, even in the Marching Mountains. Gnomes are even more scarce.

Halflings are less common in Calimshan than in Tethyr or Amn. Like the elves, halflings are just not happy in the hot weather that is so common in this southern realm. There is a small fellowship of halflings that lives and works together in Calimport, but they are hardly noticed in the general bustle of Calimshan's largest city.

Half-orcs, on the other hand, are common throughout Calimshan. Unlike many other places in the Forgotten Realms, half-orcs are considered a normal part of society here; they are not relegated to menial tasks or the poor parts of town. In fact, half-orcs can be found in positions of responsibility and power throughout Calimshan, as shopkeepers, skilled workers, bureaucrats, soldiers, business owners and even politicians.

Even orcs are tolerated, but they are widely regarded with suspicion—an orc must spend years establishing a reputation in a particular locale before he will be accepted by the community.

Languages

The common tongue of the Realms is, of course, known throughout Calimshan. Because of the country's great dependence on trade and other contacts with other parts of the Realms, knowledge of common is necessary for survival. However, common is not the language Calishites prefer to use when speaking among themselves.

The language of Calimshan is called Alzhedo. It is very closely related to the language spoken on the Elemental Plane of Air, and this fact lends credence to the theory that the first civilizations in the Calimshan area were made up of travelers from that plane. Alzhedo is spoken at court, in all government and judicial proceedings, and throughout polite Calimshan society.

The Chult and Shaar races in Calimshan speak their native languages among themselves, but speak either Alzhedo or common when dealing with other Calishites.

Alzhedo is a very difficult language to learn; even many natives who grow up speaking it do not speak it well. Calishites are well aware of this fact, and while they are proud of their language and are honored by outsiders' attempts to use it, they understand the need to speak common in many situations.

Social customs

Calimshan society is a great lover of wealth. Not wealth for wealth's sake (like in Amn), but for what wealth can do for you. Leisure time is very highly prized in Calimshan; anything that makes a job easier is embraced by society. "He does what he doesn't have to" is an insult in Calishite circles; it says the subject doesn't know what's important in life and works harder than necessary.

The Calimshan ideal is to be a member of the "idle rich," devoting a small amount of time each day to maintaining your fortune, and spending the rest of the day in luxury, attended by servants. This is not to say that Calishites are a lazy people; on the contrary, they work very hard to achieve their goals, and they do not do anything halfway. It's just that the goal this society works so hard to achieve is to not have to work so hard.

Very few Calishites actually achieve the goal of early retirement and a life of idle wealth. But the pursuit of leisure time is still important. Toward that end, three things are common in Calimshan society: slaves, servants, and gadgets.

Nearly anyone who can afford a slave has one (or more). Slaves are used in Calimshan primarily as personal servants—cooks, food servers, maids, clothes washers, nannies, gardeners, and the like. Many businesses also use slaves, especially those that need a large amount of manual labor. Trade in slaves is brisk in Calimshan, and any race, human or non-human, can be found in the ranks of slaves. Slaves are frequently imported from other parts of the Forgotten Realms as well.

Servants are more common than slaves, because they are less expensive. A servant only has to be paid a wage, while slaves must not only be bought, but also housed, fed, and clothed. Servants are exclusively of the domestic variety, handling household chores and other menial tasks. Businesses use servants all the time, of course, but they are more accurately called "employees."

Most fascinating in the Calimshan national character is the people's love of labor-saving devices and gadgets, preferably magical. Many of these items are whimsical in nature—in Calimshan society, the more trivial a task a device can perform, the higher status it affords. Typical devices are as follows:

- Torches that light and extinguish themselves on verbal command.
- Shoes that tie themselves on command.
- A wine pitcher that knows when a glass at the table is empty, and then floats over to that empty glass and fills it.
- A bed that makes itself.
- A door which recognizes members of the household and opens to let them in.

And so on. The more silly the job, the more likely someone in Calimshan has a gadget that will do it. If this gadget is magical, so much the better.

Charity is practically unheard of in Calimshan; most people are too busy amassing their own fortunes to worry about others. And jobs are not particularly scarce. If worse comes to worst, a person could take a job as a personal servant—there's always someone willing to take on another servant.

Calishites also have a fascination with magic. Magic-users are held in very high esteem, even low-level mages and apprentices. Nearly anyone with the free time and money hires a mage in order to learn a few simple spells; it is a hobby among the rich merchants and bureaucrats of Calimshan to have a few minor spells and cantrips at their disposal for the amusement and amazement of their friends.

One last thing that must be said about Calimshan society is their incredible ego. To hear a Calishite tell it, this southeast corner of the continent is the only repository of culture and civilization in all of the Forgotten Realms. A Calishite thinks little of the cultures of Cormyr, Waterdeep, the Moonshaes, the Shaar, Thay, Sembia, Thar—they are all "barbarians." They do not mind when people from these lands take offense. In fact, they almost expect it. But this assumed superiority is ingrained in the very heart of Calimshan society so deeply that only the most careful and diplomatic will avoid insulting a foreigner as almost a matter of course.

Monsters

As would be expected of a magical, dangerous land, there are many monsters in Calimshan. The Calim Desert is a perilous place, with common hazards including giant scorpions, sphinxes, jackals, dustdiggers, giant ant lions, dune stalkers, vortexes, poisonous and constrictor snakes, various demons, devils, and daemons, and elementals from the planes of air, earth, and fire, such as djinni, dao, efreeti, jann, and marid, as well as earth, air, and fire elementals and smoke and magma paraelementals.

The Forest of Mir is also a relatively evil place, where adventurers can find orcs, kobolds, ogres, hill giants, goblins, stirges, choke creepers, bloodthorns, ettins, forester's banes, driders, giant spiders, centaurs, dryads, harpies, and the ever-growing drow elves. There are also rumors of dragons of various colors using the Forest of Mir as a base, but no one has returned from the forest with proof.

Because of the large number of experimenting magic-users throughout the country, practically every magical monster capable of being summoned exists somewhere in Calimshan. All sorts of elementals, para-elementals, golems, homunculi, aerial servants, invisible stalkers, demons, devils, daemons, modrons and naga can be found guarding treasure chambers, wandering in ruins and graveyards, and rampaging free over the countryside after disposing of those who would try to control them.

Of course, the people of Calimshan are also troubled by the more “mundane” monsters as well, including purple worms, hydrae, wolves, bears, bats, umber hulks, bulettes, anhkhegs, goblins, bugbears, and the like. Every day can be a challenge in Calimshan—provided one knows where to look.

History

Calimshan is an old country, older than either of the other Empires of the Sands. Calimshan was first settled over 7,000 years ago by the Djen, a humanoid race from the Elemental Plane of Air. These Djen were known to be very magical, and had a number of inherent powers, such as create whirlwind, summon air elemental, and a weak form of weather control. In addition, many Djen became powerful magic-users, learning new spells previously not available on the Elemental Plane of Air.

The Djen prospered for over 1,000 years in Calimshan, but their reign was ended by an invasion of creatures and minions from the Elemental Plane of Fire. Some say this is where the bitter hatred between djinni and efreeti started, others say this was just a result of a hatred that was already there. Whatever the cause, the battle was long and bloody, taking over 100 years to complete. The Djen finally beat off the attackers from the fire plane, but were greatly weakened in the attempt. They slowly died off after that, and the last mention of the Djen is just under 6,000 years old.

The next 4,000 years or so, Calimshan was dominated by nomadic tribes of humans. Various tribes from various places—Chult, the Shaar, The Shining Plains, Chondath, even Amn and Cormyr—took turns dominating, only to be conquered by the next, nearly identical tribe.

Slowly, the nomadic nature of Calimshan began to change. As explorers and traders from Amn, Waterdeep, and Cormyr discovered the wonders of the area, some tribes began to settle down and take up new means of support, like fishing, farming, or trading. These communities began to band together for mutual protection, and soon a civilization was born. It was only 1,300 years ago that the Shoon Empire (now called Iltkazar) came into being.

The Shoons were a grand and glorious empire, and their excesses were the foundation of Calishite snobbery today. They grew wise and powerful in the ways of magic, and ships and caravans bearing the Shoon flag traveled across the Forgotten Realms. Shoon, a particularly powerful mage, created a book of great power during this time called the Tome of the Unicorn. The exact location of the Tome has been lost in time, but since the book is 2' by 3' and made of pure metal, it is likely to still be around . . . somewhere.

Then, 900 years ago, the Shoon empire vanished. A great magical upheaval was at first suspected, but the wise and learned mages of other lands dispute the claim, saying a force that great would have disturbed magical powers and beings throughout the Forgotten Realms, and that didn't happen. Sages who have studied the Shoon at great length have reached no definite conclusions, but the most popular theories today center around a plague or disease decimating the population.

Today, the Shoon impact on Calimshan is still great. The grandeur of that empire is responsible, more than anything else, for the strong national character of Calimshan today. The ruins of the Shoon's greatest city, Monrativi Teshy Mir, can still be found in the wilderness to the west of the edge of the Forest of Mir (see below for more on Monrativi Teshy Mir).

Since the fall of Shoon, no force or people has risen to dominate the land. There are a half dozen or so major cities, each of which exerts its own power over its own area. About 170 years ago, a man in Calimport declared himself “Pasha” over the land, and began to amass a large army. Before that army could march, however, the representatives of each major city got together and agreed to recognize the Pasha's authority in limited areas, and to pay a small tribute to him, enough to pay for the works the Pasha was expected to do. The oldest son of each pasha inherits the title; if there is no son, the mayors of each large city select a new one. The current Pasha, Rashid Djenispool, has ruled for over 18 years, and is the grandson of a pasha elected by the mayors of Calimshan 44 years ago.

Government and Politics

Calimshan is ruled, in theory, by a Pasha in Calimport. In practice, Calimshan is ruled by a consensus of the various leaders of the largest cities, along with the most powerful military leaders and the wisest and most fearsome mages.

There are actually very few important things the Pasha can just go out and do. Any changes in taxation, major new expenditures, or large-scale troop movements, if not done in consultation with many of Calimshan's most powerful men and women, are viewed with great alarm. The Pasha will quickly be reminded of his true place in the power structure of Calimshan, even if the action was in the country's best interest. If the action is met with widespread disapproval, it will often be revoked. And a Pasha who oversteps his bounds too frequently finds him or herself on the wrong side of an assassin's dagger.

Who are these other powerful people whom the Pasha rules at the apparent whim of? They are the high viziers of the great cities of Calimshan—Almraiven, Calimport, Keltar, Man-shaka, Memnon, Teshburl, and Volothamp. Some of these viziers rule their cities with absolute power; others, like the Pasha, have counselors who must be consulted before major decisions are made. Others who counsel the Pasha include the four generals of the Calimport army and the two admirals of its new navy, the Pasha's court wizards, and the leading traders and landowners of the empire.

Obviously, not all of these powerful men are consulted for every decision; that would lead to paralysis and nothing getting done. The Pasha decides who will be consulted and who will not. Those in the "inner circle" receive and send messages nearly every day to the palace in Calimport; for those on the fringes of power, it is considered a great honor for the Pasha to request an opinion on a matter.

For most residents of Calimshan, the Pasha is an object of near worship, an icon of wisdom and goodness to be obeyed without question. This is exactly the image the truly powerful men of Calimshan want the populace to believe.

It is on the local level that the day-to-day decisions that affect most people's lives take place. Every village, town, or city has a system of drudaches, or precincts it is divided into (some smaller villages have only a single drudache; Calimport has 143). Each drudache is led by a druzir, who is responsible for everything that happens in the drudache. The druzir petitions the vizier for money to repair roads, bridges, dig wells, and the like. The druzir collects all taxes, and is responsible to the vizier if those taxes come up short. The druzir also hears minor disputes and dispenses justice, and brings more important cases to the Vizier's Court. All but the smallest villages have a city watch, troops under the vizier's direct control. A druzir may ask the vizier for control of a small squad of troops to deal with a particular problem—this sort of request is frequently granted automatically. Some drudaches where trouble is frequent have permanent garrisons of the city guard assigned to them, under the control of the druzir or one of his assistants. Druzirs serve at the whim of the vizier, and can be replaced at any time.

Calimshan justice is cruel and swift; as a result, crime is not common. The death penalty is common for most serious crimes (murder, kidnapping, any sort of assault or other crime that results in injury to another). Maiming, branding, or slavery are typical punishments for less serious crimes.

Religion

Calimshan is a land of many races, both human, and non-human; as such, there are many different gods worshipped here. There is no religion mandated by the government—all Calishites are free to worship (or not worship) how and who they choose. Some of the more common religions in Calimshan are:

Azuth

Azuth is the patron of magic-users, a lawful neutral god with great control over magic and magical items. The reasons he is worshipped here in Calimshan to such a great extent should be obvious. Nearly every person in the country, tycoon to slave, has a fascination with magic. Even the most humble citizens have magical items, even if they are no more than a self-cleaning stewpot. Azuth is frequently invoked when greeting (or saying goodbye to) business associates, fellow travelers, and even relatives.

Tymora

Tymora (also known as Lady Luck) is the goddess of good fortune, luck, victory, and skill, and she is the patron of adventurers and warriors. Tymora is best known for helping those who show initiative and innovation in helping themselves, and many of the Calimshan middle classes call on this Chaotic Good goddess' favor to get that stroke of luck necessary to vault into the upper crust of Calishite society.

Bhaelros

Bhaelros is the name Calishites give this Chaotic Evil god of storms and destruction, known throughout the Forgotten Realms (other than Calimshan) as Talos. With typical Calishite smugness, however, they claim that Talos is simply the "barbarian" name for Bhaelros. Bhaelros has many followers among the members of the various evil alignments in Calimshan, especially the Drow elves in the Forest of Mir, who abandoned their elven gods long ago.

Deneir

Deneir is the god of literature and art, two activities that Calimshan claims superiority to the rest of the Realms in. This Neutral Good god is also invoked frequently by sages and scribes as they begin their day's work in many of the places of learning in Calimshan.

Selune

Selune is the goddess of the moon, stars, and navigation. Given the large merchant fleets and the soon-to-be-completed Calimshan navy, rising interest in this Chaotic Good deity is understandable.

Sharess

Sharess is a chaotic good aspect of Shar, the goddess of darkness, night, loss, and forgetfulness. Sharess is particularly popular among Calimshan's idle rich. She is a goddess of lust, free love, and sensual fulfillment; she is worshipped in prolonged feasts with scented baths, music, good food, dancing, and other sensual activities. The Pasha of Calimshan himself is said to be a great devotee of Sharess.

Geography and Climate

Calimshan is located on a great coastal plain in the southwest corner of the continent. It is very flat, much more so than either Amn or Tethyr. Unlike some other areas of the Forgotten Realms, there are no abrupt changes in geography in Calimshan; the terrain alters gradually, as if the landscape were painted with a very broad brush.

The single most important feature of Calimshan geography is the Calim Desert, which dominates the western half of the country. It is a flat, trackless waste where only the hardiest cactus and desert flowers grow. The final leg of the great Trade Way road cuts directly across this desert on the way to Calimport. For traders from the north, the desert is a final challenge to a long, wearying journey; for those heading north, it is an early test.

The only thing that keeps the desert from claiming a larger section of Calimshan is the mighty Calim River, a wide, broad river that begins in the Marching Mountains and flows southwest to the Shining Sea near Calimport. Water from the Calim River is the major source of agriculture in Calimshan's central plain. Calimshan's other major river, the River of Ice, has no ice in it at all. The river got its name from its unusually cold waters, fed by great melting underground ice packs in the eastern Marching Mountains. The River of Ice isn't even really that cold, but compared to the sweltering temperatures of the country in general, the contrast is significant.

The Marching Mountains are a small, insignificant range. The tallest mountain is only 8,500' high, and the average is closer to 5,000'. The slightly higher altitudes make the mountains one of the coolest places in Calimshan, and for that reason alone, many of the country's wealthiest families have estates there.

The other major feature of Calimshan geography is the Forest of Mir. As mentioned above, it is a hot, stifling, dense forest, with none of the cool, shady, restorative qualities usually associated with forests. Pines and other warm-weather trees (most with roots that sink more than 50' into the ground to get to water) dominate, and along with other types of dry, hardy plants, they manage to get by in this hot, inhospitable area.

The only other interesting feature to the Calimshan landscape is the Spider Swamp, just south of the Forest of Mir between Volothamp and Almraiven. This is a particularly nasty place, with tall cypress trees dripping with moss and fungi, great still pools of shallow brackish water, and swarms of stinging and biting insects and other small pests. All in the swamp is perpetually damp, and the smell of rot and decay is everywhere.

The climate of Calimshan can be summed up in one word: hot. The winters are brief and provide little relief, and the summers are both long and difficult. Highs throughout the five- to six-month period Calishites refer to as summer stay above 90, with temperatures nearer 100 (and occasionally higher) in the hottest two months. The night is little comfort in a Calimshan summer, as the temperatures rarely drop below 80, even near dawn. The only exception is in the Calim Desert, where the night temperatures are a more reasonable 60 to 70 degrees. Of course, the daytime temperature on the desert floor rises to 120, so travelers must take the bad with the good.

What little rain Calimshan gets comes in the winter and early spring. There is no "wet season" here, just a time of year where showers are more likely. Violent thunderstorms are not uncommon on the Calim Desert, but the rain they produce falls too fast and is over too soon to do much good. Even more common on the desert are windstorms (some magically created or aided by the many air elementals and related creatures in the desert). There is always wind on the desert, obscuring tracks just minutes after they are made, blowing sand into the eyes of pack animals, and stinging the unprotected flesh of travelers, but the windstorms are particularly dangerous, because of their great power and how quickly and unpredictably they can come up.

The ocean waters off of Calimshan are warm and calm. There are very few storms in the Shining Sea at all, and storms in the Sea of Swords are usually spent long before they get to the Singing Rocks.

Money and Commerce

Calimshan has a very strong trading economy, dealing with nearly every other nation in the Forgotten Realms. There are many things—magical items, exotic spices, alchemical supplies, fine horses, gems, and silk—unique to Calimshan that the rest of the Realms wants. This is good, because there are a number of things that Calimshan needs in return that it can't provide for itself. Food is at the top of this list; the dry lands of Calimshan cannot produce enough food to feed the population. Meat is not a problem—there are many large ranches in the central plain, where the land is good for little else but grazing. But there is a severe shortage of grains, fruits and vegetables. Bread is very expensive in Calimshan, and many fruits and vegetables are simply not available to the common people. Beers, wines, and ales also have to be imported, though trika, a sweet and potent wine made from palintri, a cross between a breadfruit and a date that grows in abundance along the entire coast, is a popular drink.

Calishite traders travel throughout the Realms, seeking buyers for their special goods and looking for things that will turn a profit back in their home country. Unlike Amn traders, Calishites will not follow any lead in search of a profit. They tend to be more conservative, sticking to established (but extensive) trade routes and tried and true merchandise. Another distinction between Amn and Calimshan traders is that Calishites return home more regularly, probably because of their great love for their home (and because they grow tired of traveling among “barbarians”).

Calimshan has a stable money system. The major cities of the country all strike their own coins, but each carries the Pasha's mark certifying its value, and the coins are of identical value. A gold pulan minted in Teshburl is worth exactly as much as a gold rekatik minted in Volothamp. Calimshan uses the money system common to the entire Forgotten Realms: 10 cp = 1 sp; 10 sp = 1 cp; 2 ep = 1 gp; and 5 gp = 1 pp. There is a wide variety of coins in the country because of the individual mints throughout the area, and each of those coins has a name. Most people don't care about the distinctions between coins, however: a tribute to how effective Calimshan's monetary system really is. A Volothamp merchant will call a handful of gold coins “rekatiks”, even if there are five different types of coins from five different Calimshan cities in the pile.

Some of the more common coins in use in Calimshan today are:

Copper: the unarche of Calimport; the rada of Almraiven; the niften of Teshburl; and the spanner of Manshaka.

Silver: the decarche of Calimport; the messine of Keltar; the red worm of Memnon; and the espedrille of Volothamp.

Electrum: the centarche of Calimport; the tazo of Almraiven; the zonth of Memnon; and the djendive of Manshaka.

Gold: the bicenta of Calimport; the pulon of Teshburl; the great worm of Memnon; and the rekatik of Volothamp.

Platinum: the kilarche of Calimport; the djendjen of Manshaka; the mandrille of Volothamp; and the redoline of Keltar.

This is by no means a comprehensive list, but it does include the most common coins in circulation. Visitors are sure to see other coins, as well.

The larger businesses of Calimshan also use trade-bars with great frequency when dealing with each other. This is a common practice. There is also a small amount of barter that still goes on in the rural areas of Calimshan, but with so many different coins in circulation, the use of money is much more common.

Cities

Calimshan is an extremely urban country. Except for the vast livestock herds of the central plain, there is little the open land of Calimshan has to offer. So most of the population (over 90%) lives in just a handful of major cities. They are described below:

Almraiven

Almraiven is a large (population: 475,000), cosmopolitan port city filled with diversity. The city is not dependent on any one industry. The land surrounding Almraiven is particularly foul and ill-suited for farming, so the large docks along the Shining Sea have been built primarily for the large grain-hauling ships and other bulk carriers that bring the precious food the city cannot provide for itself.

What Almraiven offers in return is items that are not nearly as bulky, but are still valuable enough to offset the tremendous cost of the imported food. Magical items of all types are produced in Almraiven, with an emphasis on the less-powerful, more common items that are more affordable and can be made more quickly. Competitors in other cities complain that Almraiven magic sellers are “flooding the market,” but local merchants ignore the complaints and go on.

Almraiven is also a major shipbuilding center, especially since the establishment of the Pasha's Navy a few years ago. Because the Almraiven port is the farthest from the action in the Sea of Swords, and the farthest from any potential spies, the navy's most ambitious, most secret projects are underway here.

Most interesting of these projects is the Pasha's Palace, a prototype vessel that, if successful, could revolutionize naval combat in the Forgotten Realms. The Palace is perhaps the largest warship ever built, over 1,300' long and with nine decks, four below the waterline. The Palace is practically a floating city, and will have a crew of over 4,000. Officers and messengers on many of the decks will use horses to get around this massive vessel more quickly.

The top deck of this ship is a floating artillery platform, littered with dozens of catapults, trebuchets, and firethrowers. There are nearly 50 more ballistae on the second and third decks as well, and there are a number of platforms from which magic-users can cast both offensive and defensive spells. Sea trials for the Pasha's Palace are set for next summer, and if all goes well, the Almraiven shipyards will go into high gear and begin work on five more.

The Vizier of Almraiven, Majel Arpooristan, rules only with the advice and consent of a council of 15 or so of the most powerful men in the city. Lately, Admiral Eshtar! Eshram, one of only two admirals in the Pasha's Navy and a close advisor to the Pasha, has exerted a great deal of power over Arpooristan and the entire council while overseeing construction of the Pasha's Palace and other major warships.

Calimport

Calimport is the largest, grandest city in all of the Empires of the Sands—and it never for a moment lets anyone forget it. Larger than Athkatla, larger and richer than even Waterdeep, Calimport has a population of over 2,000,000 humans and non-humans of every known race and type. Included in that mix is the only large community of halflings in all of Calimshan.

Calimport is at the mouth of the Calim River, and is also the southern end of the great Trade Way road that leads eventually to Waterdeep and beyond. Calimport is a major port (as might be expected from the name) and trading center, collecting livestock from the central plain and fish from the Shining Sea for export as well as the manufactured goods from within the city, and trading them for both grain, food and other necessities, and exotic items and amusements from across the Realms.

Calimport has a nearly insatiable appetite for the unusual, exotic, and bizarre. The Calimport market quarter is a crowded, chaotic place, with small shops tucked into impossibly narrow alleys, hawkers yelling from second-story windows, and merchants selling from carts stopped on the edge of the road. Everything from the latest fashions to precious jewelry to inexpensive trinkets to minor magic items to high-quality specialty items are available. Most sellers will also buy interesting items in their line of expertise, and no price is set in stone; haggling is a respected tradition in Calimport, and most established merchants are very good at it.

Calimport also has large manufacturing businesses, making everything from furniture to armor to horse-drawn carts to cooking equipment to fine clothes to magical items. Somewhere in Calimport, nearly any item imaginable is being made by somebody.

Calimport is also the home of some of the great sages and researchers in all of the Forgotten Realms. While no single man has the knowledge or resources of the famed Elminster of Shadowdale, there are several learned men just a notch or two below him. And taken as a whole, the sum of knowledge in Calimport is greater. This is due to the great private libraries located here; information on every subject, some of it lost for ages, is in the various books and tomes of these libraries. Some of the information is still lost, as the libraries are so vast that many of the books have not been read (or even opened) in centuries. However, given time and the permission of the owners of the various libraries, nearly anything can be found by a diligent researcher. Unfortunately, permission can be difficult to obtain. The owners of the various libraries see each other as rivals, not as cooperative custodians of a common body of knowledge, and their petty rivalries can make a researcher's life very complicated.

The Vizier of Calimshan is Punjor Djenispool, the oldest son of Pasha Rashid Djenispool. The pasha considered the position good training for Punjor's eventual succession, and the other viziers of Calimport agreed. Punjor is not always in agreement with his father, and he is learning as much as he can as quickly as possible, frequently consulting with his father's advisors and developing his own "inner circle" of trusted counselors. There are great expectations among the people of Calimshan—while few have complaints about the reign of Rashid, it is widely believed that Punjor could well be one of the greatest leaders Calimshan has ever seen.

Calimport is also a major religious center. Many of the leaders of the country's largest religions are located here, as are some of the most spectacular temples in all of the Forgotten Realms. Typical is the Plaza of Divine Truth (see map), a large, richly-decorated temple dedicated to the worship of Bhaelros. The temple is built of fortified stone walls 4' thick, with guardhouses at all the corners and gates of the structure, as well as at intervals along the outer wall. The Outer and Inner Plaza are open-air (that is, there is no roof) and open to all. Guards at the Outer Gate will stop heavily-armed or suspicious-looking visitors, although weapons are not specifically prohibited in either of the outer two plazas.

Another set of guards screen people at the Middle Gate. Swords and other large weapons are confiscated, though daggers and other small items frequently get by. Tourists or non-believers don't usually get past the Middle Gate without making a "donation" to one of the guards—the Initiate's Plaza is for prayer, meditation, and special small ceremonies. The shrines to either side are reserved for scheduled events, such as funerals, weddings, special classes in the faith of Bhaelros, prayer services for specific causes, etc. The clerics who lead these services enter from the back, to minimize direct contact with the worshipers.

A large wall just inside the Inner Gate guarantees that non-believers will not ever see the great Idol of Bhaelros at the far end of the Chosen Plaza. The wall also makes the gate easier to defend, as attackers have only two narrow openings to squeeze through. The most sacred services in the worship of Bhaelros are held here. Only clerics in the service of Bhaelros, worshipers with years of devotion to the religion, and really large benefactors of the church are ever allowed into this Plaza. The guards (who are all clerics or cleric/fighters) have their quarters and storerooms to the sides of this plaza.

The Idol of Bhaelros itself is a spectacular statue over 30' high, covered in beaten gold and inlaid with huge, precious gems. In fact, the entire temple, and particularly the Chosen Plaza, is covered with the finest paintings, tapestries, sculptures and other artwork imaginable. The followers of Bhaelros believe that his spirit inhabits the idol, so they show it the greatest respect possible. It is also believed that if the temple is desecrated in any way, Bhaelros (accompanied by a great dragon which Bhaelros keeps on a chain by his side) will emerge from the idol to exact his revenge.

Keltar

Keltar is known as the "Edge of the Desert." It is an appropriate title—the vast Calim Desert stretches west for what seems like forever. Keltar is located on the Calim River at its deepest, swiftest point, to take advantage of the water power available to operate mills and other industries. Below Keltar, the river becomes wide, shallow and sluggish, meandering to the sea at Calimport.

Cattle is king in Keltar, though other livestock, including camels, buffalos, and other more exotic animals are also herded, slaughtered, and packed here. Most of the city is on the west side of the river, but the livestock pens and slaughterhouses are on the east side. This attempt to cut down on the smell is only partially successful; Keltar still smells like a barnyard, though it would undoubtedly be even worse if the animals were any closer.

In addition to the processing and shipping of livestock and meats, Keltar is also well known for its leather products. Every Calishite horseman wants a Keltar saddle, and Keltar craftsmen are also known for their leather armor, whips, and saddlery for more exotic animals, like camels and bison. There is even one Keltar craftsman who says he can custom-make saddles for riding dragons, though few dragons are ever brought into town for a fitting.

Keltar is a fairly small city (population: 240,000) with a powerful vizier. Duncan Ashnarti is one of the richest men in town, with interests in meat-packing, shipping, and horse breeding. Ashnarti has a strong grip on the city, and does not depend on a group of powerful supporters to keep him in office. He is a reasonably good leader, however, so his position is likely to remain stable for some time.

Manshaka

Manshaka is a coastal town of over 300,000, located directly south of the central plain of Calimshan. While Keltar handles the livestock business for the northern half of the central plain, many ranchers and herdsmen in the south find it more convenient to drive their stock south to Manshaka.

There is a much wider variety of livestock available in Manshaka, because a great deal of it is loaded live onto cargo ships, instead of being slaughtered and prepared in town. Cattle are still the most common animals found, but they are joined in Manshaka holding pens by pigs, sheep, buffalos, elephants, dromedaries, chickens, and deer, among other things.

Manshaka is a common stop among Calishite coastal traders, boatsmen who hug the coast, stopping at nearly every port from Suldolphor to Teshburl and occasionally Memnon. The traders don't stop for the livestock (though most take advantage of the opportunity to bring a little fresh meat on board)—Manshaka has become a major financial capital of Calimshan because of the large number of moneylenders that have chosen to set up shop here. The interest charged ranges from a quite reasonable 10% or 15% a year to 100% a month or even more. The rates are totally dependent on the riskiness of the proposed venture and the moneylender's trust in the borrower and his abilities. A person could get money in Manshaka for nearly any purpose, no matter how far-fetched; how much he would have to pay in interest is another story. The traders stopping in Manshaka are either looking for money (to finance a new expedition, pay for repairs, whatever) or are there to pay off debts.

Nominally, the Vizier of Manshaka is a moneylender named Artouk Fanzir, but he has no real power. All important decisions are made by a group of 12—made up of nine rich businessmen, two powerful magic-users and a sage—which decides everything of importance. Fanzir (who is one of the businessmen on the council) then passes on the decisions.

Memnon

Memnon is an important trading city on the coast of the Sea of Swords in the far northwest corner of Calimshan. Because of its location on the edge of the Calim Desert, nearly every caravan on the Trade Way (in either direction) stops there for at least a full day, either preparing for or recovering from the arduous journey across the desert. As a result, Memnon has far more inns, taverns, stables and the like than there should be in a city of only 310,000.

In addition to the great many people employed in the service of travelers, Memnon is also well known as a fishing center. The area of the Sea of Swords directly off the coast is famous for the quality and abundance of fish, shrimp, and shellfish available.

Strategically, Memnon serves as the base for the scout and advance forces of the new Calimshan navy. Most of the ships stationed here are small and fast, designed to report on pirate locations unseen, or if possible, to hit quickly and run. The navy is growing faster than new docks can be built, and some fishermen are being forced to move to less convenient moorings. This has led to little more than grumblings so far, but the vizier is in the tough position of keeping the local fishermen and the Pasha's Navy happy at the same time.

The Vizier of Memnon is a half-orc named Anders Gnurlbrach. Anders is a very popular vizier, and he voluntarily shares his power with an elected Town Council ("to better listen to the people," he says.) Gnurlbrach is well-respected by the other viziers of Calimshan despite his heritage; he is one of the Pasha's most frequently consulted viziers, and should the viziers be forced to elect a new Pasha from among themselves, there is a good chance it would be Anders.

Suldolphor

As mentioned above, there is some dispute as to whether or not Suldolphor is really in Calimshan or not. The Pasha occasionally makes grand proclamations "welcoming" Suldolphor into the Calimshan fold, making mention of the benefits of being part of the country (armed forces protection, trade regulation, etc.) and also noting the taxes due. These proclamations are always promptly and politely answered by one of the members of the Suldolphor Mage Council (they take turns), thanking the Pasha for his "kind offer" but reluctantly declining.

With growing pirate trouble on the Sea of Swords and continuing instability in Tethyr, Calimshan doesn't have the resources to try to take (and then keep) Suldolphor by force, so the Pasha does not worry too much about the "Suldolphor problem." In addition, many of Calimshan's most powerful men believe that Suldolphor is more valuable as an independent ally than as an unhappy possession, and counsel against any takeover attempt.

And Suldolphor is an excellent ally and trading partner. Goods from across the Lake of Steam come to this port city, and merchants from Calimshan and beyond avoid the unpleasant waters of the Lake of Steam and visit Suldolphor instead. Fruits, grains, and vegetables from the region are in especially high demand in the rest of Calimshan, as are many specialty magical items made in Suldolphor itself.

Magic plays an even bigger role in Suldolphor daily life than in Calimshan, if such a thing is possible. The city is ruled by a Council of Mages, a group of seven magic-users, none less powerful than 15th level. Magic is constantly used on a daily basis, for everything from lighting cooking fires to watching the city walls for intruders. Spell scrolls are one of the city's biggest exports, closely followed by many other types of magical items.

Despite its tolerance on a official level of Calimshan's expansion plans, deep down the people of Suldolphor are worried, and not just of Calimshan, either. There is a definite paranoid streak in the Suldolphor character—rumors constantly circulate of planned invasions, economic embargos, or other hostilities from many different fronts. Calimshan is referred to the most in these rumors, but Chult, Thay, Tethyr, Waterdeep, and even Cormyr have been suspected. The fact that none of these rumors has ever proven to be true does not stop their proliferation.

The people of Suldolphor are still polite to visitors, especially if their intentions are known. Traders who stay in the business district, for example, are afforded the full hospitality of the city. Foreigners with vague or unknown intentions (like a band of adventurers), however, will be watched carefully and treated warily. If they stay long enough, they may even find themselves the subject of a new rumor in the back rooms of Suldolphor society.

Teshburl

Teshburl is the most isolated city in Calimshan. Located at the far west end of the country, Teshburl is widely considered by navigators the point where the Sea of Swords ends and the Shining Sea begins. It is not a very large city (population: 190,000), and entirely dependent on the ocean for its livelihood.

Land travel to or from Teshburl is very difficult. It is possible to stay along the coast and get to either Memnon or Calimport, but the coast is very rocky, with high cliffs and steep gorges. And of course, a desert crossing is so perilous it hardly needs discussion. So if people, food, and trade goods are to get in or out of Teshburl, they do it by ship.

This total dependence on the sea has made the people of Teshburl excellent sailors. While most children get small wagons or pedal carts as toys, Teshburl children are given small boats. Merchant fleets, navies, pirates—all know the value of a Teshburl sailor.

Calimshan probably recognizes that value more than anyone else. Teshburl is the headquarters of the new Pasha's Navy, and the largest fleet of that new navy is being built in the Teshburl shipyards. Admiral Mond Vitendi is in personal command, overseeing the construction of the fleet and the training of the sailors. After some recent disagreements with the vizier over allocation of dock space between military and civilian fleets, Vitendi replaced the vizier (with the Pasha's approval) and now has total control over the city. Many of the townspeople haven't really noticed any difference, however, because Vitendi is too busy tending to his navy to spend time ruining the lives of the residents.

Tulmon

Tulmon is a small (population: 123,000) city on the southern coast of the Lake of Steam on the Suldolphor Peninsula. It is mentioned here because, like Suldolphor, it is also periodically claimed by Calimshan.

The people of Tulmon, like Suldolphor, prefer to remain independent. Unlike Suldolphor, the people of Tulmon realize that Calimshan's army is not going to come marching up main street tomorrow, and that even in the long run, the Pasha's bark is much worse than his bite.

Tulmon is primarily an agricultural city, storing and selling the produce of the fertile land of the peninsula. Tulmon fruits, grains, and vegetables go a long way toward feeding the eastern cities of Calimshan. Calishite merchant ships willing to go the extra distance profit by sailing directly to Tulmon rather than stopping at Suldolphor. By going that extra distance, they get produce that is fresher, higher quality, and at a slightly lower price. Sailing on the Lake of Steam is not a pleasant experience, however. It is hot, and winds are light. Sometimes the winds go away altogether, and ships can be becalmed for weeks. These dangers must be weighed against the additional profit in making the trip, and most merchants decide to stop at Suldolphor.

VoloThamp

VoloThamp is a medium-sized (population: 370,000) city on the Shining Sea coast between Almraiven and Man-shaka. It has the usual coastal industries—shipping, shipbuilding, fishing, sailmaking, etc.—although, for some reason, the VoloThamp shipyards have a reputation for building poor-quality ships. “Came apart like a Volo frigate in a stiff breeze” is a Calimshan expression for someone who cracks under pressure.

VoloThamp does have some claims to fame, of course. Some of the finest goldsmiths and jewelry makers work in this city. And since many high-powered magical items (particularly swords and other weapons) are inlaid with gems and precious metals, some very well-established mage consortiums have also set up shop in VoloThamp, in order to be closer to the smiths and jewelers necessary to their work.

There is a dark side to life in VoloThamp, however. Crime is low, the weather is pleasant (as pleasant as it can be in southern Calimshan, that is), and business is good. Yet many residents refuse to go out at night, and even those who stay indoors report strange sounds and an unearthly chill that no fire can drive away.

The people of VoloThamp are subject to occasional raids from the giant spiders and other foul creatures from Spider Swamp, only a few miles to the east. These creatures are the minions of a great spider demon who has taken up residence in the swamp. The demon is trying to expand its influence, first to VoloThamp, then perhaps Almraiven, then beyond. Toward that end, the demon has charmed some of the more important members of VoloThamp society and government. That is how the raiding monsters have been able to avoid city patrols, and it is also why there has not been a great outcry for a large-scale raid on the swamp. VoloThamp suffers silently while its leaders sit idly by.

The vizier of VoloThamp is Ramslett N'door, the son of a Chult trader. N'door is a lifelong resident of VoloThamp, however, and a respected leader despite his mixed racial background. Unfortunately, N'door is controlled by the demon of Spider Swamp, as are a good number of his senior advisors. The other advisors who have suspected something was wrong and let the wrong people know about those suspicions have mysteriously disappeared.

Yeslipek

Yeslipek is a small fishing village on the south coast of the Lake of Steam on the Suldolphor Peninsula. Like the other cities on the peninsula, Calimshan claims Yeslipek as its own. However, Yeslipek is so small (population: 14,000) that it is a bit player in what is not that serious a conflict in the first place. The Pasha of Calimshan has not even bothered to send Yeslipek a proclamation announcing its status as a Calishite city. It's just as well—the Yeslipek mayor would only tear it up.

What makes Yeslipek worth mentioning is tadjani, a delicacy found only here and loved throughout the Forgotten Realms. Tadjani is a rare shellfish, similar to mussels but much more flavorful, and different in a way that defies description (though many have tried). The tadjani grows only in the warm waters of the Lake of Steam, and for reasons unknown to the sages, only in the area around Yeslipek. (Attempts to move living tadjanis to other areas to start new beds have always failed, and no one knows why.)

Tadjani can be prepared dozens of ways—all delicious—but for shipping long distances, it is most commonly pickled in vinegar and spices. Most of the Forgotten Realms, in fact, has only seen tadjani prepared this one way, and is not aware of the other things that can be done with it. Only the towns on the Lake of Steam, and eastern Calimshan, have the privilege of knowing better.

Places of Interest

Calim Desert

The Calim Desert is a large, inhospitable place. The daytime temperatures are brutally hot, though it cools down to a comfortable level at night. Strong and unpredictable winds blow at all times, reducing visibility, obscuring tracks, and blowing sand into everything—clothes, eyes, food, water, blankets, and all but the most tightly sealed containers.

The greatest peril to travelers, though, is the lack of water. The air over the desert is bone dry, and most animals (including people) must double their water intake just to maintain a healthy typical water level. Since there's hardly any water to be found, that means that people who journey across the Calim must bring plenty of water with them, and use it carefully.

There are oases in the Calim, but they are not very frequent. A Calim oasis is not marked by an open pool of water, but by a small patch of scrubby trees and other greenery. The vegetation signifies water close enough to the surface for the plants to get at it. To get to the water, of course, someone in the group must know how to dig an artesian well.

It is also quite easy to get lost in the Calim Desert. Blowing sand often makes the sky hazy, so simply following the sun is sometimes difficult. Navigating by the stars at night is easier, because the winds die down and the sky is clearer. The best way to avoid getting lost, however, is to stick to the Trade Way, which crosses the desert between Calimport and Memnon. The road has several oases along it, and these mark the road as well as anything else. Signposts, tracks, and other markings are quickly destroyed by the desert.

Many travelers prefer to cross the desert by night, and try to sleep during the day. This has some advantages, including easier navigation and less use of water. But night travel has one main drawback—the large number of monsters that come out at night to feed. Snakes, scorpions, small, silent desert cats, and birds of prey are all on the hunt at night, and many are not above a man-sized meal.

Other monsters could be encountered at any time. Particularly dangerous are the efreeti, djinni, and daos who, when they are not fighting each other, are attacking caravans of “intruding mortals.” Last but not least is the threat of other humans. Bandit activity is surprisingly high in an inhospitable place like the Calim Desert. For more on the Desert Raiders, see “Characters,” below.

Forest of Mir

The Forest of Mir is another dangerous locale in Calimshan. While not as obviously deadly as the Calim Desert, the dangers of the Forest of Mir are more cunning and less apparent. The forest is hot, but there is plenty of water. Getting lost is a possibility, but there are a large number of trails and streams that can be followed until one’s bearings are regained.

The primary danger to be found in the Forest of Mir is the monsters lurking within. The south leg of the forest has many different types of monsters, usually living alone or in small family groups. Ogres, goblins, and orcs have carved out small chunks of territory, but all are potential prey for the other monsters of the forest. Some human villages exist on the very edges of the forest, clearing a little timber and farming small plots of land, but the residents never go more than a mile or two into the forest. Brave hunting parties sometimes go deep in the forest in quest of a particular beast rumored to live within, and a few even come back.

The single biggest threat in the Forest of Mir, however, is the large population of drow elves in the western leg. Only the ignorant or the foolhardy enter this part of the forest; even the Pasha recently admitted that for all practical purposes, North Mir belongs to the drow.

No one really knows just how many drow elves inhabit the Forest of Mir, but the best estimates give the total population at over 80,000. This total is divided into 8 to 10 tribes, each holding a small section of the forest for itself. The tribal leaders select one from among themselves to act as King of the Drow. The tribes are very independent, however, and meetings of all the tribes are very rare. They are usually called only when one of the many tribe-vs.-tribe rivalries gets out of hand and erupts into war.

The drow have substantial underground dwellings, storehouses, and passages dug out beneath the forest floor. Some say these tunnels connect with a vast underground network beneath all the Forgotten Realms. The drow want very little to do with other surface-dwelling people (which is generally counted as a good thing by the people of Calimshan), and are more than happy to leave humans alone provided that they in turn are also left alone. Some brave explorers and traders have contacted the drow to acquire some of their weapons, handcrafts and other goods for sale to the outside world, but this does not happen often. There are three reasons: one, the drow never trade their best goods; two, the prices are outrageous; and three, not all the traders that enter the Forest of Mir come out.

The Marching Mountains

The Marching Mountains, as mentioned above, are not particularly high or steep. Little is known about them, however, because so few Calishites live in the area. The people of Keltar are familiar with the mountains from looking at them, but even they don’t go there. The average Calishite’s opinion of the Marching Mountains is that they are a convenient barrier separating the Forest of Mir from the rest of Calimshan.

There is very little life of any type in the Marching Mountains, other than the occasional monster or hunting animal. There is rumor of an abandoned Duergar complex deep within the mountains, built by those evil dwarves centuries ago when they were chased out of the north by enemies. Even if this complex does exist, it is supposed to be empty today, its duergar builders having long ago returned to their original homes.

Monrativi Teshy Mir

Monrativi Teshy Mir (which is Alzhedo for “First Kingdom of Mir”) is a massive ruin along the northern border of Calimshan, north of the small finger of the Forest of Mir that extends west of the main forest. The area is uninhabited; the closest Calimshan cities are Keltar to the south and Memnon to the west.

Monrativi Teshy Mir is the ruins of the capital of the Shoon Empire, Shoonach, and the surrounding keeps, baronies, and villages. It is a vast ruin; the portion that can still be seen on the surface of the open grassland is nearly 20 miles across, and the catacombs beneath the surface are supposed to be twice as large, and extending some 500’ down.

As would befit ruins of such magnitude, the stories and rumors about what lies within the First Kingdom of

Mir are staggering. Vast piles of gold and gems, warehouses of weapons and armor made by smiths using secret techniques lost to the craftsmen of today, powerful and arcane artifacts and other magical items, unlike anything known in the Realms today—all this and more is rumored to exist deep in Monrativi Teshy Mir. Despite the rumors, there is no long line of adventurers and prospectors waiting to explore the ruins, for a variety of reasons:

First, the same rumors that describe the vast wealth of the ruins also describe the fearsome guardians of those treasures. Diabolical traps, deadly spells, demons, naga, elementals, undead, liches, and even bound dragons are among the defenses named in the stories. Many of these are undoubtedly exaggerations—but many are not.

Second, the area is very inhospitable, and perilously close to the drow. The land is dry, with precious few sources of fresh water necessary to sustain a long-term expedition. And no one can say with any certainty how the drow living in the Forest of Mir will react to any given group of explorers, though it is fairly certain that if they disappeared, the intruders would be in for a great deal of trouble.

And third, it is widely believed that, after 900 years, all the easily-obtained treasure has already been stripped from the ruins. What is left is hidden in the deepest chambers, guarded by the most fearsome monsters, spells, and traps, and can be reached only after long, dangerous travels through miles of empty catacombs. It is also believed that the drow's tunnel system and the abandoned duergar tunnels in the Marching Mountains connect with Monrativi Teshy Mir deep underground, thus adding to the uncertainty behind any expedition here.

The Singing Rocks

The Singing Rocks are a tiny group of islands in the Sea of Swords. It is due west of a point almost exactly between Memnon and Myratma, and for that reason, it is considered the boundary point between Calimshan and Tethyr waters. It is also an important navigation point for sea captains afraid of drifting too far west in their travels.

The Singing Rocks is worthy of mention, however, not for its navigational importance but for the odd phenomenon that gives the islands their name. Sailors passing close by the rocks report beautiful singing, as if by hundreds of women. The music has an elusive, haunting quality, but does not seem to have the charming effects of the song of the harpy or siren. Ships that have sent landing parties to the rocks report that the singing stops when the landing party gets within 150' or so of the islands, and that when the sailors land, they can find no living thing or other explanation for the singing. Attempts to detect magic come up positive, but the use of other spells or magical items to examine the islands in greater detail or at a distance are not effective, as some force blocks the attempt.

Spider Swamp

Spider Swamp is a flat, foul, fetid patch of lowland on the Shining Sea Coast between Volothamp and Almraiven. It is fed by two small, sluggish rivers extending south from the Forest of Mir, as well as several springs in the swamp itself. The swamp is thick with vegetation, including sprawling, moss-covered cypresses, cedars, and other trees. The result is a shadowy, dark swamp that is still hot, humid, and breezeless. It reeks of decay, and is often referred to by Calishites as the "Tenth Plane of Hell." They do not know just how close that jest is to the truth.

The Spider Swamp is also a thoroughly evil place, filled with giant spiders, snakes, will-o'-wisps, poisonous toads, giant wasps, and minor demons of many shapes and descriptions. All of these creatures are under the control of a Demon Lord named Zanassu. Zanassu appears in the form of a great spider, 15' across and 6' high, and is simply called the Spider Demon by most of his subjects. In addition to the denizens of Spider Swamp, the Spider Demon has charmed many of the leaders of the nearby city of Volothamp (see description above). Zanassu's description is as follows:

FREQUENCY: Unique (very rare)
 NO. APPEARING: 1
 ARMOR CLASS: -2
 MOVE: 9"
 HIT DICE: 103 hp
 % IN LAIR: 60%
 TREASURE TYPE: Fx2, R, U, V
 NO. OF ATTACKS: 1
 DAMAGE/ATTACK: 2-16
 SPECIAL ATTACK: Poison (see below)
 SPECIAL DEFENSES: See below
 MAGIC RESISTANCE: 75%
 INTELLIGENCE: Genius
 ALIGNMENT: Chaotic Evil
 SIZE: L
 PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil
 Attack/Defense Modes: Nil/Nil
 LEVEL/X.P. VALUE: X/48,000

The Spider Demon's bite requires a saving throw vs. poison at -4. A failed throw results in instant death; even if the saving throw is made, 3-18 points of damage is taken.

Zanassu is immune to poison, and takes only half damage from cold- and electricity- based attacks. He is not affected by non-magical weapons (even silver), though non-magical cold iron weapons will do half damage. Magical cold iron weapons get a +2 damage bonus. He saves as a 30th-level magic-user against all attacks (including magical ones that get past his 75% magic resistance).

In addition to the powers typical to all demons, the Spider Demon can at will, one at a time, once per round, use at the 30th level the following spell-like powers: charm monster, charm person, command, darkness (15-foot radius), detect good, detect invisible, dimension door, dispel magic, fly, invisibility, know alignment, protection from good (10-foot radius), speak with monsters, telekinesis (up to 5,000 gp), teleport, and unholy word once per day.

Zanassu can gate in the following types of demons, up to three times per day per type: 1-4 Type I, 80% chance of success; 1-4 Type II, 60% chance; 1-2 Type III, 50% chance; 1 Type VI, 10% chance; 1-6 Babau, 75% chance; 1-10 Chasme, 80% chance; and 1-4 Dretch, 30% chance. The Spider Demon can also summon, once per round, 1-20 of any of the six types of spiders (Giant, Huge, Large, Phase, Giant Water, and Giant Marine) he wishes. These spiders are under the permanent control of Zanassu, and remain until he is killed or voluntarily releases them.

Should Zanassu be killed, he will not be allowed to return to the Prime Material Plane for 10 years. At the end of that time, however, it is certain he will return to exact his revenge.

Characters

Desert Raiders

The Desert Raiders are not one group, but a type of bandit common in the Calim Desert. Typically, they number from 10 to 20, and are excellent horsemen and experts in desert survival. There are dozens of such groups operating in the desert, and while they are usually strong rivals, they are not above banding together to take on a big caravan if the situation calls for it.

The raiders prey on caravans and other travelers crossing the desert, often shadowing a group for days, harassing them with minor raids, giving the target no opportunity to rest, until finally swooping in on the weakened prey. The victims are not always slaughtered; often, they are only robbed and left with enough provisions to ensure they can get out of the desert alive. Victims that are polite, don't try to hide valuable goods, and don't kill too many raiders will usually be allowed to live. Of course, there are some raiding groups that kill as a matter of course. These raiders are the least popular among their fellows, but they don't seem to care.

Desert Raiders are led by a fighter, usually of 6th to 8th level. He will have two or three lieutenants of 5th or 6th level, one of which may be a magic user;

the rest are fighters of 1st to 4th level. All are as adept at fighting on horseback as on the ground, and all ride the finest quality Medium Warhorses (the desert heat is too much for Heavy Warhorses). The raiders (and the horses) are dressed in silks, with some raiders wearing leather armor. The heat prohibits the use of anything heavier, so rings of protection, bracers of defense and other magical protection items are very highly prized by the raiders.

Desert Raiders like to fight with curved scimitars that are the equivalent of broadswords, and roughly half of any group will also be armed with short bows. Raiders are not above the use of poisoned arrows, but there is only a 10% chance that any given group has any.

In addition to robbing, Desert Raiders have also been known to kidnap people (if they look rich enough) and hold them for ransom. Delivering a kidnap victim alive upon payment is a point of great honor among Desert Raiders; any raider group that does not safely return a hostage will be hunted down by the other groups and wiped out.

Index

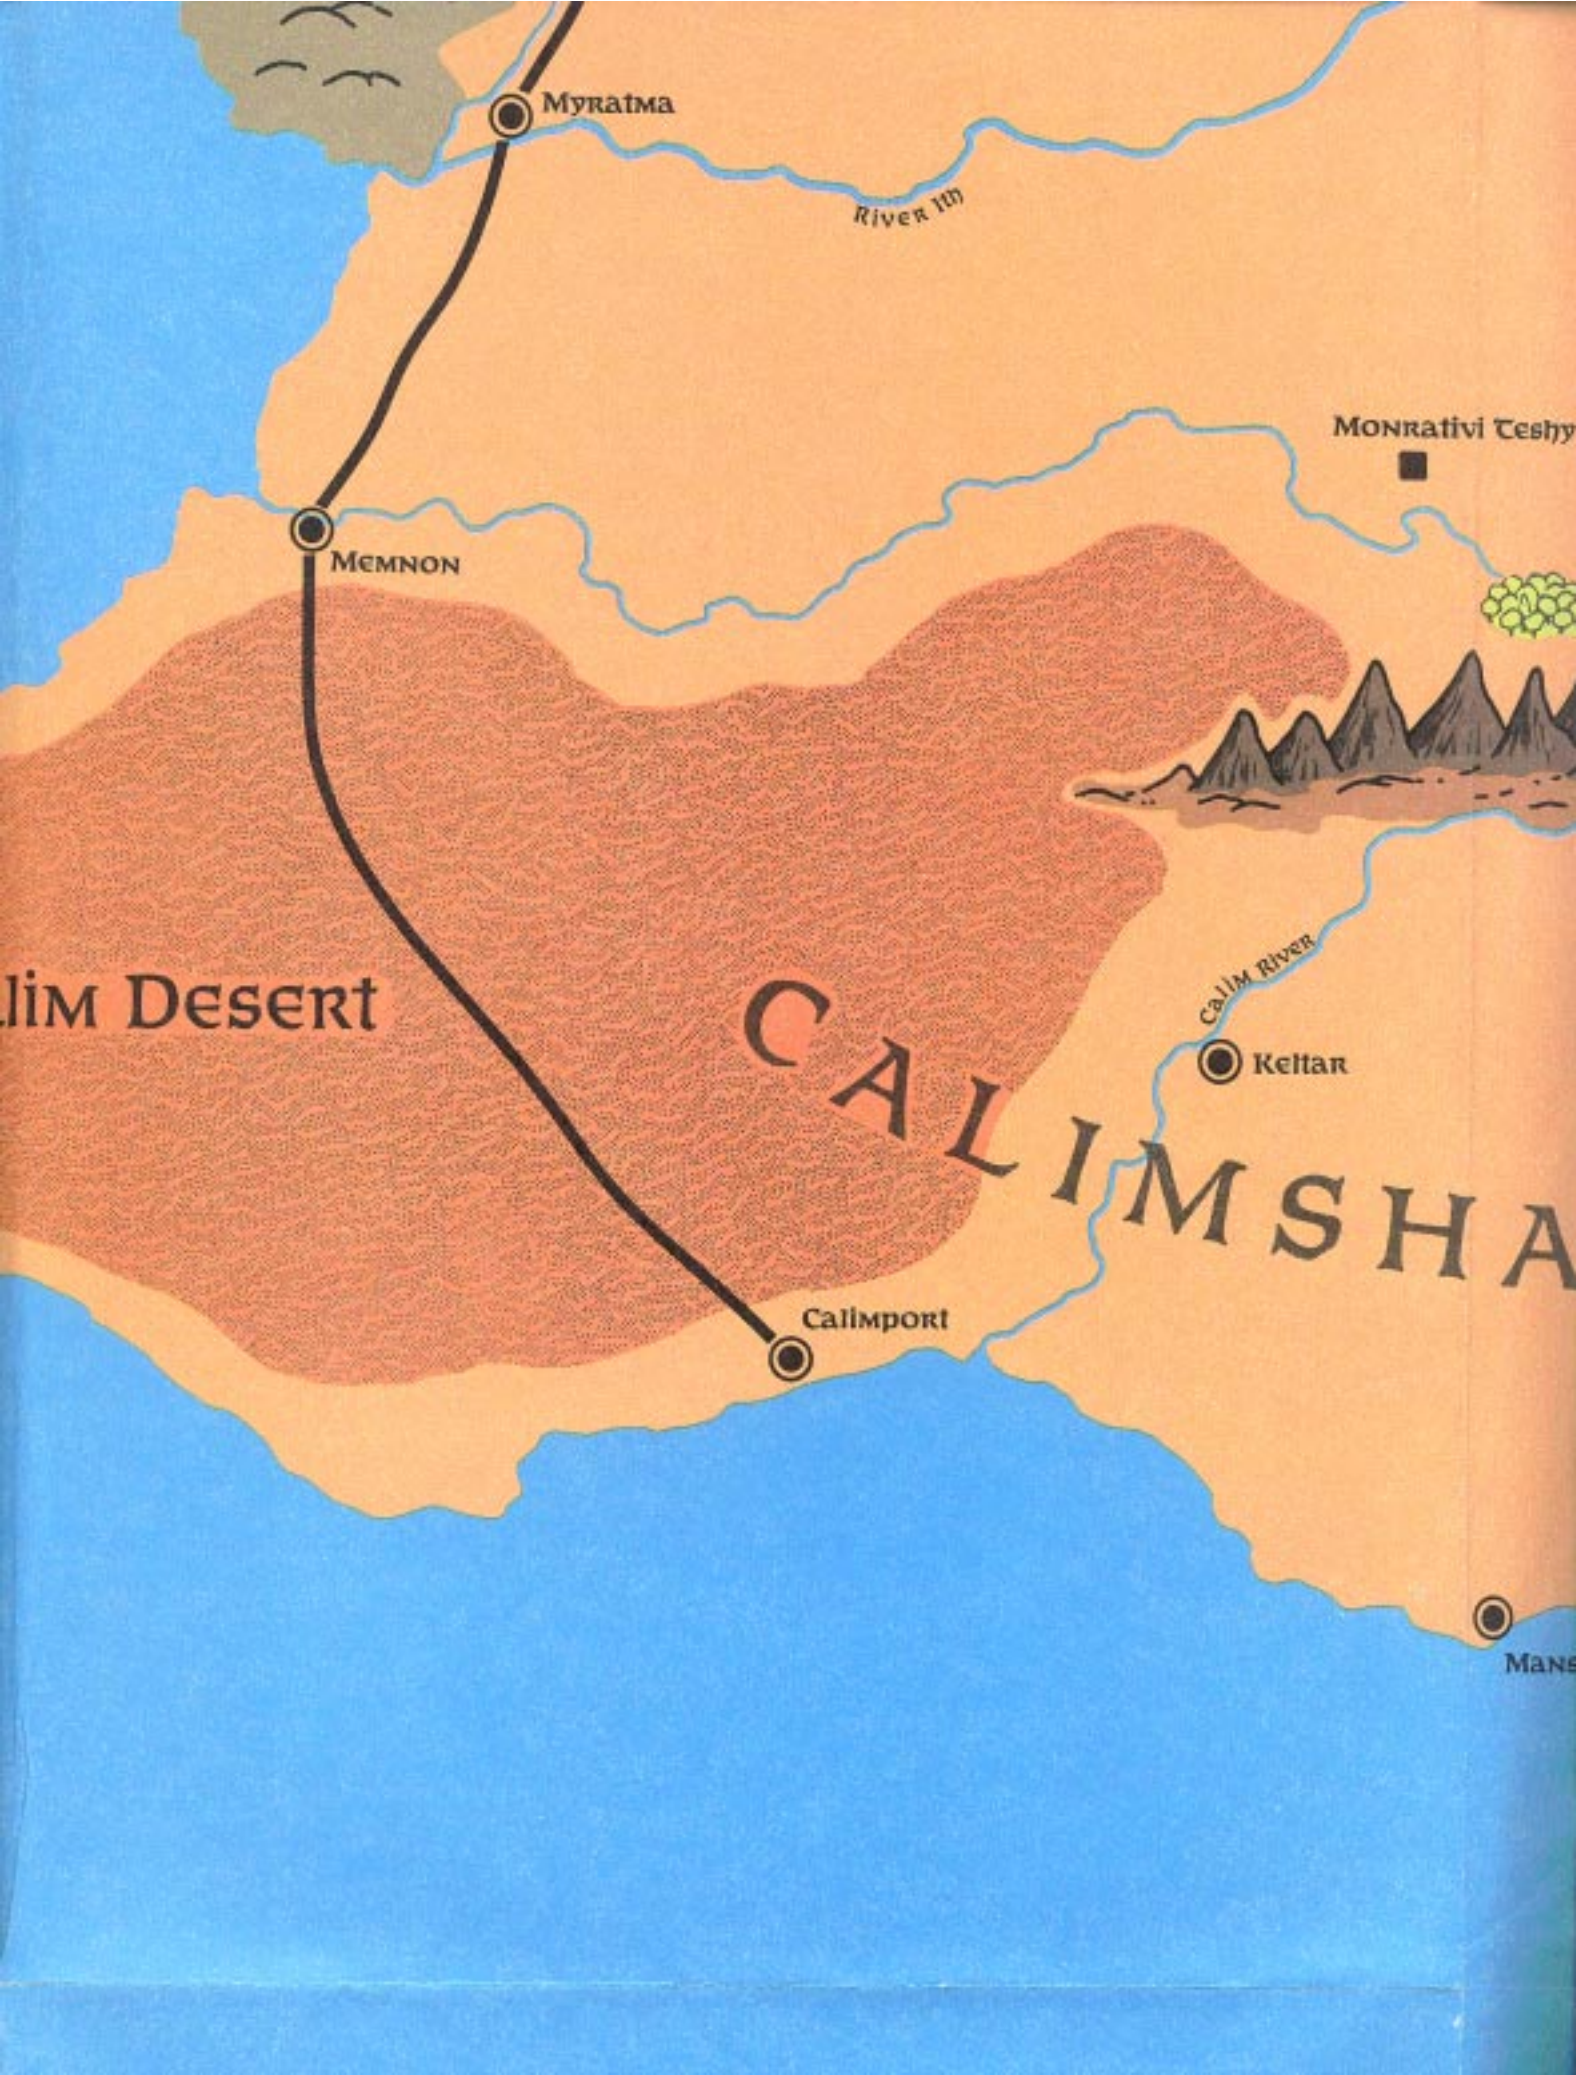

Alchemists' Guild	11	Ilmater	24	Riatavin	13
Alemander IV	22	Iltarch	5	Ridge, The	18
Alemander, Prince	23	Iltkazar	50	River Ith	25
Almraiven	53	Imnescar	10	Roldon	7
Alzhedo	48	Irphong, Sea Tower of	44	Saradush	21, 40
Amnur Citadel	15	Ishla Hillfort	15	Sea of Fallen Stars	24
Amnwater	8	Ithal Pass	21, 42	Sea of Swords	3, 21, 48
Arkaneus Silvermane	46	Ithal Road	25	Sehne	6, 52
Asavir's Channel	24, 41	Ithmong	26	Shaar, the	48
Athkatla	8	Kartak Spellseer	13	Shadow Thieves	8, 18
Azuth	51	Keczulla	11	Sharess	52
Bane	24	Keltar	56	Shining Sea	48
Beshaba	24	Keshla Hillfort	15	Shoon Empire	50
Bhaelros	51	Kilarche	53	Silvanus	24
Bicenta	53	Knights of the Shield	20, 47	Singing Rocks, the	60
Brost	26	Kzelter	39	Snowflake Mountains	3, 21, 48
Calim Desert	48, 49, 52, 58	Lake Esmel	4, 10, 16	Spanner	53
Calim River	48, 52	Lathander	6	Spider Swamp, the	61
Calimport	54	Lawantha Silendia	46	Starspire Mountains	21, 24, 45
Castle Spulzeer	13, 19	Leira	7	Suldophor	57
Castle Tethyr	42	Lhaeo	47	Sulduskoon	25
Centarche	53	Mandrille	53	Sune	6, 24
Centaur	7	Manfred Arbustle	46	Survale Ford	45
Chardath Spulzeer	13	Manshaka	56	Sylvanus Moondrop	46
Chauntea	6	Marching Mountains	52, 59	Taran	7
Chult	48	Marilyn Haresdown	46	Tardeth Llanistaph	46
Cloud Peaks	3, 4, 5	Meisarch	5, 19	Tazo	53
Company of Eight	45	Memnon	56	Temple of the Divine Truth	54
Council of Six	5	Messine	53	Teshburl	57
Cowled Wizards	19	Molean	25	lessarch	5
Crimmor	9	Monrativi Teshy Mir	59	Tethir Road	3, 11, 13, 21
Dahaunarch	5	Mosstone	39	Tethyr Peninsula	24
Danter	7	Mt. Speartop	17	Thayze Selemchant	5, 19
Decarche	53	Murann	11	Thorass	3
Deepshadow	8, 19	Myrat	25	Tome of the Unicorn	50
Deneir	51	Myratma	39	Torbold Hillfort	16
Desert Raiders	62	Nimarch	5	Trade Way	25
Djen	50	Nashkel	12	Trademeet	13
Djendive	52	Nashram Sharboneth	23	Trailstone	13
Djendjen	53	Nelanther	5, 24, 43	Troll Mountains	3, 4
Drow	48	Nemessor, Sea Tower of	44	Trollford	4, 18
Drudaches	51	Niften	52	Rrlmene	40
Druzir	51	Order of the Blue Boar	20	Tulnron	57
Eldath	24	Paddy Stoutfellow	46	Tymora	51
Elven Council	23	Pasha's Palace	53	Unarche	53
Ernest Gallowglass	26	Pirate Isles	24	Velen	41
Eshpurta	49	Plaza of Divine Ruth	55	Vizier of Calimshan	54
Esmelda	4	Pornmarch	5	Volothamp	58
Esmeltaran	10	Port Kir	40	Waukeen	6, 13
Espedrille	53	Pulan	52	Yeslipek	58
Fandar	7	Purple Hills	21, 23, 43	Zanassu	61
Fang Pass	15	Purskul	12	Zazesspur	21, 41
Fangs, The	15	Pythosaurus	17	Zonth	53
Forest of Mir	21, 49, 51, 59	Race, the	24	Zoth	25
Forest of Tethir	3, 24, 42	Rada	53
Golden Fortress	9	Rashturl Citadel	15
Gorge of the Fallen Idol	43	Red worm	53
Great worm	53	Redoline	53
Gulder	25	Rekatik	53

The SINGING ROCKS

Teshburi

Myratma

River Im

MEMNON

MONRativi Teshy

Calim Desert

CALIMSHAH

Calim River

Keltar

Calimport

Mans

Ithal Road

Forest of Mir

vi Teshy Mir

The Marching Mountains

River of Ice

AN

Manshaka

Voliothamp

Spider Swamp

Aimra

Saradush

Ithal Pass

Kzelten

Yeslpek

Almraiven

Tulmon

FORGOTTEN REALMS

COMPANION SET

Scale: 1 inch = 30 miles

	MOUNTAINS (high)		FOREST (heavy)
	MOUNTAINS (medium)		FOREST (medium)
	MOUNTAINS (low)		FOREST (light)
	POOHILLS		CONSPICUOUS FOREST (heavy)
	ROLLING HILLS		CONSPICUOUS FOREST (medium)
	HARBEN		CONSPICUOUS FOREST (light)
	VOLCANO		JUNGLE (heavy)
	DESERT (heavy)		JUNGLE (medium)
	DESERT (heavy)		JUNGLE (light)
	DESERT (heavy)		JUNGLE (light)
	PLAINS (barren)		SEA
	CLEAR		LAKE
	SWAMP		RIVER
	HARBEN		DELTA
			REACH

FORGOTTEN REALMS is a trademark owned by TSR, Inc.

The SHINING Sea

Culmon

Sulbolphon

Theymarsh

Sea of SWORDS

Berec

Ati

← Nelanther (Pirate Isles)

□ Sea Tower
of Irphong

Asavir's
Channel

● Velen

Mu

Croll Mt

The Ridge

Reczulla

Eshpunta Road

N

Eshpunta

Lake Esmel

Crollford

South Road

Hillfort of Keshla

Port of Ishla

Hillfort of Tonhelt

Small Mtns.

Giant's Run Mtns.

Forest of Shadows

Snowflake Mtns.

● Velen

MU

● TULMENE

Firebra Bay

□ Sea Tower of NEMESSOR

The Race

URANN

Trademeeet

Brost

FOREST OF TETHIR

Mossstone

Port Kir

Starspire Mtns.

Zazesspun

Castle Tethyr

TETHIR

The Purple Hills

Hillfort of Torbold

Cethir Road

Trailstone

Riatavin

Castle Spulzeer

Subuskoon River

HYR

IIMONG

River Inn

Survale Ford

GORG Fall

atavin

SNOWFI...

Impresk Lake

Gorge of the Fallen Ibol

Advanced Dungeons & Dragons®

Official Game Accessory

Source Book for the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

Empires of the Sands

by Scott Haring

In the southwest corner of Faerun, a thousand miles south of Waterdeep on the great Trade Way road, lie the three lands known collectively as the Empires of the Sands. They are harsh lands that have produced tough people—proud, fierce, and hard-working.

The Empires Of The Sands are now fully detailed for your role-playing campaign. The cultures, personalities, economies, cities, towns, and wilderness are described for an AD&D® campaign of any size or level. Amn, land of merchants, where everything has a price; Tethyr, where petty tyrants vie for a vacant throne and evil grows; and Calimshan, a dry land where great magic is commonplace— all are waiting for you. This sourcebook includes two full-color maps showing the Empires of the Sands that link up with the maps provided in the original FORGOTTEN REALMS™ boxed set, and all the information you need to establish an exciting campaign.

©1988 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

Printed in the U.S.A.

TSR, Inc.
POB 756
Lake Geneva,
WI 53147 USA

TSR UK Ltd.
The Mill, Bathmore Road
Cambridge CB1 4AD
United Kingdom

ISBN 0-88038-539-1

FORGOTTEN REALMS™

Official Game Accessory

The Magister

by Ed Greenwood and Steve Perrin

An Accessory for Characters of All Levels
for use with the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

TSR, Inc.
PRODUCTS OF THE REALM

Magical Item Tables

When using random treasure determination to stock a dungeon or other area of adventure in the Forgotten Realms, use the table marked "III. Magic Items" on page 121 of the DMG or page 84 of UNEARTHED ARCANA with the following changes.

III. Magic Items

Dice Results

01-10	Potions (A. or III.A)
11-15	Potions (A. or III.A.2)
16-24	Scrolls (B. or III.B)
25-27	Scrolls (B. or III.B.2)
28-29	Rings (C. or III.C.)
30	Rings (C. or III.C.2.)
31-32	Rods Staves & Wands (D. or III.D.)
33-35	Rods Staves & Wands (D. or III.D.2.)
36-37	Miscellaneous Magic (E.1 or III.E.1.)
38-39	Miscellaneous Magic (E.2 or III.E.2.)
40-41	Miscellaneous Magic (E.2 or III.E.3.)
42-43	Miscellaneous Magic (E.3 or III.E.4.)
44-45	Miscellaneous Magic (E.4 or III.E.5.)
46-47	Miscellaneous Magic (E.4 or III.E.6)
48-50	Miscellaneous Magic (E.5 or III.E.7.)
51-58	Armor & Shields (F. or III.F.)
59-66	Armor & Shields (F. or III.F.2.)
69-72	Swords (G. or III.G.)
73-78	Swords (G. or III.G.2.)
79-85	Miscellaneous Weapons (H. or III.H.)
86-92	Miscellaneous Weapons (H. or III.H.2.)
93-00	Use Forgotten Realms Magic Item Appearance Table

Forgotten Realms Magic Item Appearance Table

Dice

(3d6)* Result

3-14	Use Rare Item Table
15-17	Use Very Rare Item Table
18	Use Unique Item Table

* Add 1 to the roll for every three levels down in the dungeon.

Rare Item Table

01-05	Laeral's Spell Shield
06-09	Cloak of Battle
10-12	Cloak of Comfort
13-18	Cloak of Echoes
19-24	Cloak of Guarding
25-27	Cloak of Reflection
28-30	Cloak of Survival
31-33	Cloak of the Shield
34-35	Girdle of Lions

36-38	Rhun's Horned Cloak
39-41	Tabard of the Mystics
42-43	Censer of Thaumaturgy
44-46	Fire Gyregam
47-48	Flagon of Dragons
49-52	Glowing Globe
53-54	Greenstone Amulet
55-56	Helm of Darkness
57-59	Kybal's Cords
60	Orb of Holiness
61-63	Trumpet of Doom
64-65	Jhessail's Silver Ring
66	Ring of Lore
67-68	Catstaff
69	Staff of Ethereal Action
70-71	Staff of Skulls
72-74	Wand of Armory
75	Wand of Banishment
76-77	Wand of Darkness
78-79	Wand of Eyes
80-82	Wand of Hammerblows
83-84	Wand of Magical Mirrors
85-86	Wand of Warding
87-88	Wand of Whips
89-90	Whisper's Rod of Transportation
91-93	Arbane's Sword of Agility
94-96	The "Singing Sword"
97-00	Darts of Branding

Very Rare Item Table

01-04	Laeral's Storm Armor
05-09	Cloak of Delight
10-13	Cloak of Fangs
14-18	Cloak of Many Colors
19-23	Cloak of Stars
24-29	Cloak of Symbiotic Protection
30-35	The Wonderful Hand
36-40	Bowl of Blood
41-46	Goblet of Glory
47-48	Other Harp of Myth Drannor
49	Azlaer's Harp
50	Dove's Harp
51	Esheen's Harp
52	Janthra's Harp
53	Methild's Harp
54	Nithanalar's Harp
55	Rhingalade's Harp
56	Valarde's Harp
57	Zunzalar's Harp
58-62	Mists of Rapture
63-68	Nidus' Wand of Endless Repetition
69-73	Wand of Displacement
74-78	Wand of Knock
79-83	Wand of Obliteration
84-88	Wand of Ochalor's Eye
89-93	Wand of Teeth
94-98	Syrar's Silver Sword
99-00	Use Unique Item Table

Unique Item Table

If one of these items is found, and then appears again on a roll, re-roll on the Very Rare Item Table.

01-05	Adjatha, the Drinker
06-10	Albruin
11-14	Demonbane
15-19	Dzance's Guardian
20-24	Grimjaw
25-29	Hawks tone's Bulwark
30-33	Ibratha, "Mistress of Battles"
34-38	Mierest's Starlit Sphere
39-43	Namarra, "The Sword that Never Sleeps"
44-48	Reptar's Wall
49-53	Shazzellim
54-58	Shoon's Buckler
59-63	Susk "The Silent Sword"
64-68	Taragarth, "The Bloodbrand"
69-73	Thurbrand's Protector
74	Aubayreer's Workbook (FR—86)
75	Bowgentle's Book (FR—71)
76	Briel's Book of Shadows (FR—76)
77	The Book of Num "The Mad" (FR—74)
78	The Book of Bats
79	Book of Thorns
80	Caddelyn's Workbook
81	Detho's Libram
82	Glanvyl's Workbook (FR—80)
83	Jaluster's Orizon
84	The Libram of Lathintel
85	Nchaser's Eiyromancia (FR—62)
86	Orjalun's Arbatel (FR—87)
87	The Red Book of War (FR—81)
88	Selvar's Ineffable Conjurations, Magicks, and Phantasms
89	The Spellbook of Daimos (FR—72)
90	Sabirine's Specular (FR—77)
91	Shandaril's Workbook
92	The Alcaister (FR—83)
93	The Chambeeleon (FR—64)
94	The Tome of Rathdaen
95	The Tome of the Covenant (FR—91)
96	The Tome of the Unicorn (FR—41)
97	The Shadoutome
98	The Workbook (FR—68)
99	Unique Mageries
00	Vaerendroon's Ineffable Enchantments

(FR—##) Page reference in FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Boxed set, DM's Sourcebook. Page number in parentheses.

OFFICIAL GAME ADVENTURE

The Magister

A Sourcebook For The Forgotten Realms

By Ed Greenwood with Steve Perrin

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Foreword and Introduction	2	Cloak of Many Colors	35	Wand of Banishment	49
How to Use This Book	3	Cloak of Reflection	35	Wand of Darkness	50
Magical Books of the Realms		Cloak of Stars	36	Wand of Displacement	50
The Book of Bats	4	Cloak of Survival	37	Wand of Eyes	51
Book of Thorns	6	Cloak of Symbiotic Protection	37	Wand of Hammerblows	51
Caddelym's Workbook	7	Cloak of the Shield	37	Wand of Knock	52
Detho's Libram	8	Girdle of Lions	37	Wand of Magical Mirrors	52
Jaluster's Orizon	10	Rhun's Horned Cloak	37	Wand of Obliteration	52
The Libram of Lathintel	12	Tabard of the Mystics	38	Wand of Ochalor's Eye	53
Selvar's Ineffable Conjurations,		The Wonderful Hand	38	Wand of Teeth	53
Magicks, and Phantasms	14	Miscellaneous Magical Items		Wand of Warding	54
The Shadowtome	17	Bowl of Blood	40	Wand of Whips	54
Shandaril's Workbook	19	Censer of Thaumaturgy	40	Whisper's Rod of Transportation	54
The Tome of Rathdaen	22	Fire Gyregam	40	Swords
Unique Mageries	24	Flagon of Dragons	40	Albruin	55
Vaerendroon's Ineffable		Glowing Globe	41	Adjatha, The Drinker	55
Enchantments	26	Goblet of Glory	41	Arbane's Sword of Agility	56
Spells of the Forgotten Realms	28	Greenstone Amulet	41	Demonbane	57
Magical Items of the Realms		Harp of Myth Drannor	42	Ilbratha, "Mistress of Battles"	57
Armor		Helm of Darkness	44	Namarra, "The Sword
Dzance's Guardian	30	Kybal's Cords	44	That Never Sleeps"	58
Grinjaw	30	Mierest's Starlit Sphere	45	Shazzellim	58
Hawkstone's Bulwark	30	Orb of Holiness	45	The "Singing Sword"	59
Laeral's Storm Armor	31	Trumpet of Doom	46	Susk, "The Silent Sword"	59
Laeral's Spell Shield	31	Potions		Syrar's Silver Sword	60
Reptar's Wall	31	Mist of Rapture	47	Taragarth, "The Bloodbrand"	60
Shoon's Buckler	32	Rings		Weapons
Thurbrand's Protector	33	Jhessail's Silver Ring	47	Darts of Branding	61
Clothing		Ring of Lore	47	Creating Magical Items	62
Cloak of Battle	34	Rods, Staves, and Wands		Magical Item
Cloak of Comfort	34	Catstaff	48	Tables	inside front cover
Cloak of Delight	34	Nidus' Wand of Endless Repetition	48	Saving Throw
Cloak of Echoes	34	Staff of Ethereal Action	48	Table	inside back cover
Cloak of Fangs	35	Staff of Skulls	48
Cloak of Guarding	35	Wand of Armory	49

Credits:

Editing: K. S. Boomgarden
 Cover Art: Jeff Easley
 Interior Art: Valerie Valusek
 Typography: Kim N. Janke
 Keylining: Stephanie Tabat

TSR, Inc.
 POB 756
 Lake Geneva
 WI 53147 USA

TSR UK Ltd.
 The Mill, Rathmore Road
 Cambridge CB1 4AD
 United Kingdom

ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS, AD&D, BATTLESYSTEM, DRAGON, FORGOTTEN REALMS, PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION, and the TSR logo are trademarks owned by TSR, Inc. Distributed to the book trade in the United States by Random House, Inc. and in Canada by Random House of Canada, Ltd. Distributed to the toy and hobby trade by regional distributors. Distributed in the United Kingdom by TSR UK Ltd.

This material is protected under the copyright laws of the United States of America. Any reproduction or unauthorized use of the material or artwork presented herein is prohibited without the express written permission of TSR, Inc.

Foreword

by Ed Greenwood

Well met, and welcome! In your hands you hold one of the keys to the great color and splendor of life in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ campaign setting—the magic that shapes and aids (and, all too often, rules) the lives of all who inhabit Abeir-Toril. Magic alone should not govern the course of events in any fantasy role-playing campaign, but it always seems to wind up as a dominant force, and one that adds much of the richest flavor to play. Certainly it has done so over the years in the original Realms campaign, even with its player characters of comparatively lowly levels. So, here is a good chunk of the magic of the Realms.

We haven't the space for it all, of course—all that Elminster has seen fit to reveal so far, that is; I know there is far more yet to come, and if I can worm more details out of him in our future encounters, rest assured that I will! Much of the magic in these pages is known in the Dragonreach lands, on the Sword Coast, and in the lands between—there's much more as yet unrevealed of the local magics of, for example, Thay and the Utter East, of the High Elven Magics (or so Elminster has called them) of Evermeet, that may well see print soon, or may lie hidden for many years to come yet; only Elminster knows. The caprices of Elminster are responsible for many of the gaps in magical lore and knowledge presented herein and elsewhere, thus far; we could never, of course, make up information to fill in the gaps he has absently (or deliberately; one can never be too sure) left! (Could we?)

Longtime followers of Realmslore will recognize some of the lore herein from the pages of DRAGON® Magazine, but we could not include it all.

Oh, yes; why is this called The Magister? “The Magister” is the title borne always by a single worker of the magic arts, chosen by the goddess Mystra as Her personal champion. Elminster has vividly told me the details of the choosing of the latest Magister, one Noume'a, in the year 1354; her present whereabouts and powers remain mysterious.

The following quotation from Of The Wonders of Magery by the sage Albaerum of Neverwinter describes both the role of the Magister, and of this book that bears the same name:

Of old, the mouths of Mystra made known to all who have Power, this: that by the blessing of the goddess, one mage shall be the Lady's champion, and master of magery. This one, called the Magister, does not rule, but rather wanders the Realms doing as desired, for good or ill; and in time is cast down by other mages, and the mouths of Mystra shall name a new Magister. Thus the Art shall live and grow, in strife and mystery, and never know the stifling yoke of law nor of authority. And the Art shall grow stronger, for magely ambition grows with skill-in-art, and those waxing stronger will seek out incumbent weakness; from strife-of-art shall come greater strength. In the proper choosing of an enemy, each Magister brings glory, and greater strength, to the office. And in the seeking of that office, each magic brings glory, and greater strength, to the Art.

Introduction

by Ed Greenwood

Elminster and I have been rather busy lately; getting all the details of the Realms I've needed out of the Old Sage has taken all the time (and food, and drink) I could spare. . .time formerly used for luxuries as writing “Pages From The Mages” articles, sleeping, and so on. Time, I must add, that finally ran out on us.

With realms of scrawled Realmslore stacked untidily around the study, and six times as much or more still inside Elminster's head, there came the fateful day when Jeff Grubb told us that both space and time had run out, and all the rest of it was just going to have to wait for days and other projects to come.

I put down the phone and considered how to get the rest of the family to talk to me again after playing the Invisible Scribe around the house for months.

Elminster sucked on his pipe behind me and regarded me from beneath bushy brows. “Talked them out, did we? Good, then—we can get back to the noble converse of magecraft, which ye've sadly neglected these past days, mind ye, and try some more of thy pinak kholawda, or whatever it be called, the sweet milk.” He chuckled, and settled himself in the most comfortable armchair. “I have a feeling dweomercraft in the Realms is going to be soon seeing greater traffic, and some of them are going to need something to do, if they are not to be a greater trouble than nuisance to us all. Wherefore details of some of the lost and sought-after spellbooks of the Realms may prove most useful.” He leaned back and drew hard on his pipe, the smoke already beginning to curl about his head in the shapes of little dancing horses and tattered banners. “So ye need not try to conceal thy voice-catching machine, this time.” And he winked, and grinned, and I went to make him a pina colada as he began to speak.

How To Use This Book

by Steve Perrin

DM Usage

This is a book of primary usefulness to the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ campaign DM. Herein you will find magic books full of new and useful spells for mystifying, educating and terrorizing players, and many new magical objects to spice up the occasional treasure trove. Of course, DMs from other campaigns can make use of these materials, too. Just file off the Forgotten Realms serial numbers, adapt the connected lore to your own campaign, and your campaign is that much richer for new magic and strange treasures.

For now, you, as DM, should read the book over once or twice and make careful note of the lore (if any) connected to each item. The spells are all new, and you should decide whether you want any of them to join the general spell list available to magic-users in your campaign, or keep them all hidden away until one of the books is found. You might also want to change some of the spells around, either altering the spells themselves, or changing the location, so that some other book contains the spell.

Some of the magical items contained herein are new, and some have been seen before in DRAGON® magazine. Some of them are unique, and should be placed carefully in treasures or the hands of certain NPCs. Others, such as most of the clothing, some of the swords, and some of the miscellaneous magical items, are common enough (considering the commonness of most magical items) to be added to the magical item lists you may use for random placement of treasure either in dungeons or for wandering bands of bandits or adventurers. Some items, such as the wands of darkness, should be immediately added to the arsenals of prominent evil bands throughout the campaign.

Again, check the lore of these items for clues as to where in the campaign they might appear. Some of the items are too common to have any lore.

Keeping The Mystery

Inevitably, some players are going to have copies of this book. In fact, we encourage some players—those with characters who are legitimately interested in lore—to obtain the book to add to their lore of the Realms and take some of the load off the back of the DM. However, this leads to the problem of players who know too much, a situation which takes much of the wonder and mystery out of role playing.

The responsibility for reintroducing this mystery and wonder gets dumped right back on the DM. Flatly denying the players access to this book is rarely possible. Every play group has the player who absolutely has to know everything ahead of time, and there is frequently no way to keep him or her from buying every module that comes out.

The solution is simple in concept, but time-consuming in practice. Change everything. Change the sword descriptions so that Taragarth looks like Demonbane and Demonbane looks like Shazzelim. Exchange the appearance of Shandaril's Workbook with Jaluster's Orizon. Make Shandaril a sweet pillar of law and goodness, and Lathintel the evil stealer of men and magics. Of course, you shouldn't tell the players you are changing everything, or anything. Or should you?

Perhaps all you need to do is announce that you are changing some things, and every buyer of the book will walk warily no matter how many times they have read the book. You should probably change a couple of things that the players find early on, just to make them wary of their information.

Remember that anything you read here is what Elminster knows about it. Elminster is an amazingly well-informed sage, or so he seems. But what do we really know about him? He may have made everything up about these items, or based great speculation on snippets of information, or even been deliberately fed false information. The possibilities for false information are endless; use them.

Player Usage

The usefulness of this book is not limited just to DMs. Unlike other DM-oriented books, this one is also of use to the player whose character—perhaps a magic-user or bard, or studious cleric—might have some knowledge of the Realms beyond the quality of the ale in every tavern in a two-mile radius. The Magister provides a good substitute for the character's own knowledge of the lore of the Realms.

If you are the player of such a character, you should not, of course, study every word of this book. Instead, read it over once or twice and put the book away. Don't take it to gaming sessions. Rely on your memory of what you read, just as your character must. The bits and flashes of memory that come to the surface of your mind as you study the crescentiform spell book you just wrested from the bandit chief will make the session just that much more of an intense role-playing experience. It is truly said that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing, but what little knowledge you have might be the difference between possessing a book of incredible usefulness or having a dread tome guardian begin to burn you up from the inside out.

If you do find yourself with one of the magic books or items described in this book, first ask the DM if it is all right to look up the item in your copy of this book. If he tells you not to—don't.

Of course, if he tells you it is all right, there could be one of two reasons. The first reason is that the item is very straightforward, and you won't learn anything you shouldn't already know if you read the description.

The second reason is that he has taken the DM's privilege of altering the item considerably, and what you get from the book (your "lore" on the subject) is wrong.

Happy reading.

The Book of Bats

Appearance

This gruesome-looking tome is tall and narrow, being three handwidths across but nine handwidths top-to-bottom. Its twenty-two pages are of polished electrum, stamped and etched with the symbols and script of spells, one to a page. The book's covers are plates of blackened, sealed oak, bound about with the tattered, leathery hides and wings of black bats of large size, claws still attached.

History and Description

This fell tome is of unknown origin. It contains spells created by (or at least attributed to) the long-ago mages Belytyn and Shaeroon, but may well have been assembled long after their deaths. It first appears in recorded Realmslore among a satrap's treasures in Calimshan some two hundred and ten winters ago, and since then has had a bewildering variety of owners, being stolen or seized many times by mages or minor rulers who slew the previous owner. Its present location and owner are unknown; thieves plundered a ship in Calimport that was to carry the book to Tashluta last summer, where it is believed the archmage Malhardu had arranged to purchase it.

The mage Khondall Sszundar catalogued the volume's contents when it was (briefly) in his hands—he purchased it from the merchant Chulu Thall of Ithmong, and lost it when his tower was destroyed by demons sent by an unknown foe. The tome reappeared in Innarlith soon after, but was stolen again. Khondall's catalogue tells us that the Book contains the following spells: the rarely-seen clerical prayer censure (described below), and the magic-user spells feign death, protection from good 10' radius, slow, Belytyn's burning blood (a unique spell, described below), dimension door; fear, polymorph other, wall of fire, animate dead, cloudkill, cone of cold, feeblemind, hold vapor (a unique spell, described below), telekinesis, wall of iron, anti-magic shell, death spell, geas, invisible stalker; project image, and Shaeroon's scimitar (a unique spell, described below).

Censure

(Conjuration/Summoning)

Level: 4 Components: V,S,M

Range: Touch

Casting Time: 4 segments

Duration: 66 turns/level

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: One Creature

Explanation/Description: To enact this spell, the cleric must touch a target creature with his or her holy symbol (the material component of the spell, which is not consumed in the casting). If a successful hit roll indicates that the cleric has done so, the cleric then by word and gesture "casts out" the target of the spell. That target creature is allowed a save vs. spell, and if this fails, the creature is marked by the spell. The mark is visible only to the casting cleric and others of the same faith. Other clerics of the same alignment who worship other deities instinctively react with fear, hatred, and aversion to a censured creature, and do not trust nor willingly aid it.

Those faithful to the same deity able to see the mark will refuse to aid or even approach the creature, and will ignore it if it attempts to deal with them, or drive it away if it tries to enter a building, home, or even a territory controlled by one who can see the mark. The mark is invisible to the one bearing it, who may not even know of its existence if it was bestowed in a battle or while the victim was asleep or unconscious, and shines clearly through clothing or disguises.

Worshippers can thus readily spy upon and follow those marked as enemies, even in crowds or busy city streets. It will be revealed to others by a detect magic, and can readily be removed by a dispel magic. Clerics are warned that misuse of such a spell will bring about divine disfavor.

Belytyn's Burning Blood

(Necromantic)

Level: 4 Components: V,S,M

Range: 1"/level Saving Throw: Neg.

Casting Time: 4 segments

Duration: 3 rounds

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a magic-user can cause any creature who is presently bearing open, bleeding wounds (i.e. one who has been damaged by edged weapons recently and those wounds have not yet been dressed or healed) to suffer 3-12 hit points worth of additional damage per round, by causing a subtle, temporary change in the victim's blood which causes it to be corrosive to adjacent tissue.

Obviously, the creature must have blood to be affected (elementals, undead, and many non-Prime Material Plane creatures are immune—as are all creatures immune or even resistant to corrosive or fiery damage), and the material components of the spell are the presence of exposed blood in the victim and a pinch of saltpeter. The spell causes no damage if the target's saving throws (versus spell, and all at -3) are successful; for each of the 3 rounds of the spell (during which the caster need not continue concentration, but may turn to casting other spells or undertaking other activities) the target must save. In any round in which the target saves, no damage is inflicted by the spell but such a result has no influence on the saving throws of any remaining rounds; a successful saving throw never means the spell is unable to ever affect the target. No hit roll is required for this spell, and the target need not even be visible to the caster, but the target must be within range of and known to the caster, and cannot be astral or ethereal, to be affected. The caster must visualize the target (or the target's location) during casting.

Targets who have altered their shape or entered other objects (such as a tree, or stone) are still vulnerable to this spell.

Creatures who have powers of regeneration may only be vulnerable to this spell for a single round, or two rounds.

Hold Vapor

(Conjuration/Summoning)

Level: 5 Components: V,S,M

Range: 1"/level

Casting Time: 5 segments

Duration: Special

Saving Throw: Special

Area of Effect: 2" radius globe +1" radius/level

Explanation/Description: This spell allows a magic-user to halt or prevent the movement of any visible cloud(s) or vapor in a given area distinct from the air around, such as a breath weapon, pyrotechnics, fog cloud, cloudkill, or incendiary cloud. Such enforced immobility may be continued for as long as the caster continues to chant and concentrate on holding the vapor. If such a hold is ever lost (through the caster being silenced for an entire round—the chant can be interrupted for short periods—or rendered unconscious, or ceasing concentration to cast another spell) it can never be regained except by use of another spell: the hold is broken and the magic expires. The hold prevents the gas cloud(s) from altering shape, breaking up, or moving about in any way. Oxygen (i.e. the “air”) may pass freely through and about such vapor, dissipating it if its formative magic expires, and allowing, for example, a flammable vapor to burn or explode if it is held by a hold vapor and attacked with fire.

The hold is absolute, even in the face of natural gales or magical gusts of wind (unless these affect the chanting magic-user, not the vapor, enough to break the hold, as described above). If the gaseous form is that of an intelligent creature who is normally in control of personal movement, such as a wind walking cleric or a vampire in gaseous form, the affected creature receives saving throws as follows: the hold is absolute in the first round of its existence, a saving throw versus spell at -6 is allowed on the second round, at -5 on the third, at -4 on the fourth, and so on, up to a maximum of +6 on the 14th round and any rounds thereafter. If such a saving throw is successful, the spell ends instantly, and the creature is free to move. Until the spell is so broken, a gaseous-form creature cannot move, nor can it change to a non-gaseous form even if it normally has the ability to do so. Note that spectral, ethereal, and insubstantial forms (such as those of many undead) that are not gaseous cannot be affected by this spell. This spell cannot be used to push or direct a vapor, or control it in any way, but only to halt and hold it.

The material component of this spell is a balloon or bladder into which the caster blows.

Shaeroon's Scimitar

(Evocation)

Level: 6 Components: V,S,M

Range: 2"

Casting Time: 6 segments

Duration: Special

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a magic-user brings into being a shimmering, scimitar-shaped blade of force. This scimitar appears in the air directly above a target creature, hanging point downwards some two feet above the head (or uppermost point) of the target creature. Invisible to all but the caster and those employing detect magic, the scimitar has no physical existence, and cannot be attacked, magically repulsed or dispelled, or left behind by teleportation or travel to other planes. It will fall (upon the target creature only, regardless of physical or magical barriers) upon the fulfillment of a single condition set verbally during casting of the scimitar, doing one point of damage per level of the caster of the scimitar. The unwitting target creature is allowed a saving throw at this time (versus spell) and if successful, the scimitar dissipates harmlessly into nothingness, and the spell is wasted. Otherwise, it plummets downwards in 1 segment, vanishing upon contact with the target's body, dealing its damage in a convulsion of wracking pain that momentarily affects movement, speech, spellcasting, and even posture—victims of a scimitar often fall, writhing, to the ground. Typical conditions include the target creature uttering a certain name or word, or commencing spellcasting, or drawing a weapon, or going to sleep. The condition cannot be tied to a specific time or location (i.e. it can be “entering a room”, but cannot be “entering a particular room only”), and in some cases many years have passed between the casting of a scimitar and its striking. A limited wish, wish, alter reality, or similar very powerful magic can destroy the scimitar—unless, of course, the casting of such a magic is the condition which will cause the scimitar to fall. The material component of this spell is a miniature scimitar carved of rock crystal, clear diamond, or clear sapphire (of a value of not less than 300 gp; miniatures of the latter two substances may cost ten times that).

Book of Thorns

Appearance

Two plain oak boards, two handwidths wide by three tall, bound with thornroot vine to four parchment sheets, on which are set down four druidic prayers (spells), one to a page.

History and Description

This plain tome was given to the reclusive Aubaerus “the Ravenmaster”, a druid of the Dalelands, by the Battle-dale Seven, a now-vanished circle of druids. They in turn had it from an earlier circle of druids, the Ring of Wyvernwater. Its maker is unknown, but said by some to be the Hierophant Druid Khamlautas Irifar of Cormyr.

The book’s spells are call lightning, greenwood (a rarely-seen druidic spell, detailed hereafter), control vapor (a rarely-seen druidic spell, described hereafter), and wall of thorns.

Greenwood (Alteration)

Level: 3 Components: V,S,M

Range: 1"/level

Casting Time: 3 segments

Duration: 1 turn/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: Nine cubic feet, plus 1 cubic foot per level

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a druid can temporarily make dead and withered trees appear living, green and healthy. Dead or bare (e.g. in winter) trees, shrubs, or vines can be made to cloak themselves in leaves (enough to afford concealment, but not enough to use for an entangle spell). Dry firewood can be made damp enough that it won’t light—or, if already alight, the flames will die down to a thick, choking smoke (in a cloud equal in effects to that produced by the druidic pyrotechnics spell). Dry, seasoned wood (such as a ship’s mast) can be made to bend and snap under a strain like green wood; rotten wood (such as an old bridge or ruin) will usually collapse or become unsafe to carry any future load.

Damage to plants suffered by such a condition is permanent, but the wood will otherwise revert to its former state at the expiration of the spell.

Control Vapor

(Alteration-Conjuration/Summoning)

Level: 5 Components: V,S,M

Range: 4"

Casting Time: 6 segments

Duration: 1 round/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 1"/level radius hemisphere

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a druid is able to alter the movement rate and direction of natural or magical smokes and vapors, including incendiary clouds, smoke ghosts, breath weapons, and creatures in gaseous form. Within the area of effect, wind effects are negated, even if of magical origin, and the druid is able to hold the vapor stationary or move it up to 1"/level per round in any desired direction. If the vapor passes out of the stationary area of effect of the spell, control is lost.

Unlike the fifth level magic-user spell hold vapor, creatures in gaseous form (such as vampires) and those wind walking receive no saving throw against the spell. Vapors cannot alter their form or split it unless the druid wills, although creatures normally able to alter their gaseous form into another form can do so despite the druid’s wishes, although this process takes twice as long as it ordinarily does. Clouds of insects and similar insubstantial or amorphous-form but non-gaseous creatures or groups of creatures are not affected by this spell.

Phezult’s Sleep of Ages

(Alteration) Reversible

Level: 9 Components: V,S,M

Range: 1" per level of caster

Casting Time: 3 rounds

Duration: Permanent

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: All living creatures in range

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a stasis field is created about the spell focus, radiating outwards in an expanding sphere through solid rock and other physical or magical barriers (only an anti-magic shell; prismatic sphere, or a closed cube- or spherically-shaped wall of force will stop its effects), 2" per round, until it reaches a maximum spherical volume of 1" radius per level of the caster. All living creatures within this field except the caster and any beings protected as noted above must save vs. spell or be placed in suspended animation, whether they wish to or not. Creatures of level or hit dice equal to, greater than, or up to three levels or dice less than the spell-caster save “at par”; creatures of 4 to seven dice or levels less than the caster save at -1, and creatures of even lesser levels save at an additional -1 penalty per level less than seven below the caster’s. The body functions of affected creatures virtually cease, but they do not die as a direct result of this state—nor will they grow older as the years pass. If a creature in stasis is slain by another means (physical attack, crushing or burial or drowning due to physical changes around the body, and the like), stasis ends instantly and the body will decay normally, for the affected victim only.

The caster requires his or her own blood (at least nine drops) smeared into an unbroken ring on any stable surface (usually stone) of a radius not more than the overall length of the caster’s hand (wrist to fingertips), into which are placed at least six 500-gp value gems, of any sort. This is the “spell focus” referred to above. When the spellcasting is complete, four of these gems vanish, consumed in the act of releasing the spell’s power. The rest fuel the stasis field, and dwindle slowly as the time passes (roughly 1 year of stasis being yielded per 10 gp of gem value). Removal of any gemstone from the circle, except by its consumption by the field, or the breaking of the ring itself, instantly ends the stasis effect, as will using up all of the gems, but any number of gems that will fit can be added to the inside of the ring at any time to "refuel" the spell, extending its period of efficacy.

Caddelyn's Workbook

The stasis can be lifted from individual creatures without harm and without releasing other creatures under the same stasis by casting temporal reinstatement (cf. temporal stasis in the PLAYERS HANDBOOK) or the reverse of this spell, Phezult's awakening (which requires neither gems nor blood in its casting, but merely seven drops of pure or holy water) upon the spell focus rather than upon individual creatures. The stasis field shrinks gradually to nothingness at the same rate at which it originally expanded, freeing any creatures formerly within it instantly, and without any lingering effects as it does so. No further gemstone material is lost.

Creatures entering the field after it has reached its full extent, even decades or centuries after the spell was cast must save vs. spell to avoid falling into stasis. The penalties for their level or hit dice described above apply, but so does a +3 bonus to the save for any creature arriving in the field after it has stabilized at full extent. Such a save must be made each time a creature enters the stasis field, even if it has entered and been unaffected before; but each creature need save only once per exposure to a particular sleep of ages stasis field. Creatures who are physically removed from such a field without being magically roused will wake up by themselves 2-8 rounds after such removal, with no ill effects; the casting of a dispel magic will awaken such beings instantly if cast upon them when they are outside a field, but physical means will not hurry the process. A creature taken out of a stasis field and then taken back in before awakening returns to stasis without becoming conscious. Creatures in stasis who are mentally contacted by magic or psionics while within the field do not respond, and the being contacting them is placed in stasis (temporary, awakening after 2-8 rounds as described above) each time such contact is attempted.

Appearance

A slim volume covered with sheets of polished silver, sealed against corrosion, over slate sheets, and hinged with electrum about sixteen sheets of fine parchment, all but three blank.

History and Description

This tome was recently plundered from the tower of the long-ago mage Caddelyn, by unknown hands. Caddelyn's tower rises from a mountain north of The Great Glacier and was only recently discovered by the famous explorer Dabron Sashenstar, of Baldur's Gate. Dabron's band examined the book but did not take it, and continued on in their expedition. On their return, they camped at the tower again—and found the book missing.

Caddelyn, a good mage who is remembered with respect, died peacefully while on a visit to Waterdeep, and is entombed with other mages in The City of the Dead there.

The tome's three written pages (the book was obviously incomplete at the mage's death) bear two unique spells, described below, and the complete process of creating a minor magical item. The spells are Caddelyn's catastrophe and spell ward; the magical item is the magemask. The properties of the finished item are given below: Dabron's band lacked the time to copy out the entire process.

Caddelyn's Catastrophe (Enchantment/Charm)

Level: 5 Components: V,S,M
Range: 1"/level
Casting Time: 5 segments
Area of Effect: 1-4 creatures
Saving Throw: ½

Explanation/Description: This improved version of the fumble spell allows the caster to affect up to four creatures if desired, all of whom must be visible to the caster during casting. If four creatures are attacked, their saving throws (vs. spell) are normal; if three are attacked, all save at -1; if two are attacked, all save at -2; and if only one is attacked, the save is at -3. Creatures who make their save are slowed (cf. slow spell, PLAYERS HANDBOOK) for the duration of the spell; creatures who fail immediately drop all held objects, trip or stumble if running or charging, fall if balanced on a ledge or climbing, and have any spellcasting ruined. Any missile attack launched by an affected creature will miss (the spell takes effect instantly!), and any physical attack will be at -2 to hit. If it was a weapon attack, the weapon is dropped and the attack becomes a bare fists attack. Dropped items may well suffer damage (saving throws to avoid). Target creatures must be within range, but need not be together; they may be on opposite sides of the caster. Affected creatures who move out of the spell range are freed of the spell, but they will suffer its effects again (no saving throw) if they re-enter spell range before the spell expires. (Magic may be cast normally from outside the spell range into it.)

The material components for this spell are a banana peel or melon rind and a tallow candle or lump of animal fat.

Spell Ward (Abjuration)

Level: 9 Components: V,S,M
Range: Touch
Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 1 turn/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, which utilizes as its material component a drop of the caster's blood and a powdered diamond (of not less than 6,000 gp initial value), the caster confers immunity on him or herself or a single other creature touched by the caster during casting to a single spell.

The particular spell must be chosen at the time of casting, and the protection does not extend to different spells which have similar effects, although it does extend to lesser versions of the same thing (protection against delayed blast fireball does extend to fireballs, for instance, but not Melf's minute meteors — and not a fireball effect created by a limited wish or wish spell, or an illusionist's shadow magic fireball), and slightly different versions of the chosen spell as cast by other character classes. Immunity is total; i.e. even where no saving throws are normally allowed, the protected being will simply be totally unaffected by the spell, as will clothing and objects held or carried on his or her immediate person. The spell can be an area-effect spell, but the individual's protection cannot be extended to others, even if the protected being embraces or shields them.

Detho's Libram

The protection lasts for 1 turn per level of the caster regardless of how many times it is tested. A maximum of two spell wards can be in place on any one person at any time.

Magemask

The experience-point and gold piece value of this item is unknown; examples are so rare and little-known. A mage-mask is a half-mask of leather with crystal lenses; through these, a wearer views surroundings as if using detect magic, and can see concealed glyphs, runes, and inscriptions. If these are magically concealed or not yet activated, the mask-wearer will see only the outlines of the areas covered by such. The mask's lenses also confer ultravision upon the wearer, enable anyone who wears them to read magic (although a non-spellcaster will not understand anything more than the general nature and intent of a spell), and allows clear and easy reading (of spellbooks, scrolls, maps, inscriptions, and non-magical writing) in near darkness. Such a mask cannot be used in conjunction with other magical lenses or spectacles.

Appearance

A thin, red volume consisting of dyed rothe-hide stretched over wooden boards and bound with brass hoops, enclosing twenty-two parchment pages. It bears no title or mark on the exterior.

History and Description

The Libram was left to the library of Piergeiron's Palace in Waterdeep by Detho son of Navro, a mage who disappeared seven winters ago and doubtless met his doom in the vast dungeon of Undermountain. Elminster, Laeral, and Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun all perused the book and copied the spells they wanted from it, ere the book was lent to the mage Peregar "the Invisible" to aid him in his expedition into the North. Peregar himself vanished in a ball of blue flame north of Yartar (either a spell of his own that went wrong, or an attack upon him by an unseen enemy), and his band of adventurers scattered. The Libram was in Peregar's saddlebags, not on his person, when he was destroyed, and is widely thought to have survived and fallen into other hands, presently unknown.

The book's pages contain twenty-two spells, one per page, as listed below. All spells are in standard (PLAYERS HANDBOOK) form unless otherwise noted.

The book's spells are: burning hands, catapult (a unique spell, detailed below), dancing lights, detect magic, Detho's delirium (a unique spell, detailed below), enlarge, erase, feather fall, hold portal, jump, light, mending, push, read magic, spider climb, unseen servant, continual light, decastave (a unique spell, detailed hereafter), detect invisibility, ESP, flying fist (a unique spell, detailed below), knock.

CaTApUlT (Alteration)

Level: 1 Components: V,S,M
Range: 14" Casting Time: 1 segment
Duration: 1 round
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: One object
Explanation/Description: By means of this magic, the caster causes any single, small (i.e. of less than 30 gp weight) object touched to immediately flash in a straight line along the caster's pointing finger to its maximum range (when it reaches that maximum, the object will fall harmlessly straight down to the ground). Although this spell is sometimes used to move harmful objects away or transfer keys, coins, and the like to other beings, it is most often employed as an offensive weapon. If any being is struck by the flying object, it does whatever its normal damage would be (i.e. normal sling stone, bullet, dart, or dagger damage, or 1-2 for small stones, and 1-3 for larger stones) plus 1 point due to its velocity. It strikes as a +3 magic missile weapon, considering the base hit chance as equal to the spellcaster's when striking directly. This spell can only so affect one object. If the object (the spell's material component) touched is heavier than the spell's limitations, it quivers, but does not fly, and the spell is lost.

Detho's Delirium (Necromantic)

Level: 1 Components: V,S,M
Range: Touch
Casting Time: 2 segments
Duration: 1 round plus 1 round/level
Saving Throw: Neg
Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: The caster of this spell touches a being who is drugged, drunken, sleeping, or unconscious, while speaking the mystic words and ringing a small silver or brass bell. The touched creature receives a saving throw against spells at -2; if the save is failed, the creature will begin to speak. (A creature feigning drunkenness or unconsciousness will never be affected by the spell.) The affected being speaks at random, in all languages known to it, and on random topics, rambling. It cannot hear questions and cannot be forced by mental or magical control to give specific answers—any attempt to use such control is 96% likely to awaken the creature. While the creature speaks, there is a 22% chance per round (not cumulative) that it will reveal names, truenames, passwords, words of activation, codes, directions, and other useful information. Note that the speaker will rarely identify such fragments of speech for what they truly are, and hearers must speculate themselves on meanings. Dreams, rumors, jokes and fairy tales may be mumbled by a speaking creature, not merely factual information.

The spell will be broken before its expiry if the affected creature is awakened.

Decastave (Evocation)

Level: 2 Components: V,S,M
Range: 0 Casting Time: 2 segments
Duration: 1 round plus 1 round/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: By means of a piece of wood and the gestures and phrases of casting, a magic-user can create a temporary "ten-foot pole" of force with this spell. The material component is instantly consumed, and from the caster's forefinger a two-inch-radius, ten-foot-long, faintly glowing beam of force springs into being. It moves as the finger is pointed, and lasts as long as the caster wills (or until the spell expires, whichever occurs first), or until the spellcaster casts another spell.

The pole cannot be cut—any metal which passes through it will cause it to harmlessly wink out of existence—or bent, but will support any weight. It also cannot be shortened; if it strikes an obstacle, the caster must move it, or the obstacle, or will it out of existence, to proceed. It cannot be removed from the end of the caster's finger, although the caster (and other creatures) can grasp it. The staff can be used as a weapon, for 1-6 damage, by sweeping it from side to side, or jabbing it forwards, by movements of the caster's guiding finger. Normal hit rolls apply; it is considered a magical weapon with no pluses. Note that no shock or blow felt by the magical staff is felt by the finger.

A creature grasping the staff must exert a total of 18 strength to hamper its movements. Once only if the caster wishes, a decastave can be used to rob a target of 1-4 hit points and transfer them to the wielder of the staff. The target must be touched by the end of the staff (hit roll required) and the caster must will the staff to drain energy. It will vanish in a pulse of force, draining 1-4 hp (no saving throw) and transferring them instantly to the caster. If the caster is uninjured, excess hp are lost after 1 turn. Any damage incurred by the caster during that time is first taken from these phantom hit points; if the caster is at less than full hp at the end of the turn and phantom hit points remain, all remaining points are absorbed at that time as healing, any excess being lost.

The excess hit points can never be transferred to any other creature. Such phantom hit points do not confer any higher-level or hit-dice saving throw bonuses on the caster.

Flying Fist (Evocation)

Level: 2 Components: V,S
Range: 1" distant per level
Casting Time: 2 segments
Duration: 1 round/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: Invented by the mage Alcimer (and once known as "Alcimer's Flying Fist," ere he died and his apprentices all made use of it), this spell enables the caster to create a "fist" of force. Forming at the end of the round in which the spell is cast, the hand is invisible to all but the caster.

It can move 12" per round, but cannot pass beyond 1" distant from the caster per level of the caster. The fist can hover in mid-air, swoop, swerve, and dart through openings as the caster directs, but it will disappear if the caster casts another spell or is rendered unconscious. Physical combat, speech, climbing, movement, and other activities on the caster's part will not destroy the fist.

Although the fist can exist for one round per level of the caster, it can perform only three things. It can grab falling, floating, or levitating objects of hand-size or less, any 10gp weight or less and carry them about for up to 2 rounds ere it drops them. Such objects (keys, ioun stones, etc.) may be in the possession of another creature, but the fist does not have the strength to tear weapons free of fastenings, material components or scrolls out of a being's grasp, etc. It can overcome magnetic pulls, but can only hold its own against a gust of wind or other severe opposing air disturbance. It can push or slap a single creature sufficient to cause a missile attack to be at -1 to hit, a catching attempt by the being to be 20% more likely to fail than otherwise, and to delay (not ruin) spellcasting for one round. It can also attack, striking as a blow (not a missile, and hence unstoppable by a shield or any protection from missiles magic), as though it was the caster (but at +2 to hit), and doing 1-2 points of damage. A successful punching attack by the fist ruins spellcasting during the round it strikes.

A flying fist can be readily dispelled by a dispel magic cast on the fist or on its caster, and cannot penetrate walls of force, anti-magic shells, or more powerful magical barriers. It is AC 4 (AC 7 to opponents who can see invisible as an ability or by means of temporary magic), and can be destroyed by any attack that deals it 5 or more points of damage, or any combination of attacks dealing it at least 5 hit points of damage in a single round (cumulative damage does not apply to the fist).

Jaluster's Orizon

Appearance

A stout, battered book of embossed and painted cowhide stretched over wooden boards, edged and clasped about with iron. It is battered, brown, and radiates a faint dweomer (see below). It contains twelve pages, each a thin plate of slate upon which vellum has been stretched and clamped with beaten electrum edgings. Seven pages are blank; the first five bear spells, one to a page.

History and Description

An orizon is a book in which a far-traveling mage inscribes spells found or gained while exploring or traveling far from home. This is done also when one believes a spell can be improved or isn't quite right; it is only later, at home and leisure, and with the spell perfected, that the mage sets down spells in the orizon into his or her proper, level-by-level spell books. Thus, an orizon is usually a jumble of spells of varying levels, sometimes interspersed with spell research notes or other information, or even spells usable only by other classes. Most of the books described in these pages and other locations, including the DM's Sourcebook are orizons.

Jaluster was a mage who never ceased to travel; he filled many orizons, but always sold them after transcribing the spells into his proper books. The orizon that bears his name today is the one he carried, incomplete, at his death.

Jaluster was torn apart by demons in Ascalhorn (now known as Hellgate Keep) as he tried to save that city from their domination. He is said to have destroyed three liches and at least five demons that day ere he died. His orizon was borne out of the city by the bard Maerstar, one of the four survivors of the fall of Ascalhorn. Maerstar was later robbed of it in Everlund, and a trail of mysteriously-slain owners (see below) led westwards, but the tome's present whereabouts are unknown.

The volume is guarded by a strange creature, a tome guardian, detailed below. The five spells it contains are rope trick (detailed in the PLAYERS HANDBOOK, or "PH"), Quimby's enchanting gourmet (a unique spell, described below), feign death (q.v., PH), waves of weariness (detailed below), and Adelimer's aural augmentor. This latter spell is merely a variation of extension I (q.v., PH) that has a somatic as well as a verbal component, but takes only one segment to cast (it remains fourth level).

Quimby's Enchanting Gourmet

(Conjuration/Summoning)

Level: 2 Components: V,S,M

Range: 0 Casting Time: 2 segments

Duration: 6 turns plus 1 turn/level

Saving Throws: None

Area of Effect: 4" radius of spellcaster

Explanation/Description: The fat, food-loving mage Quimby devised this improved unseen servant magic as a means of providing himself with gourmet meals while studying in solitude or traveling alone. It is a magical force under the control of the magic-user, able to stir, carry pots, measure ingredients, cut, garnish, turn hot food while it is cooking, and so on. It is no stronger than an unseen servant, nor more dextrous than its caster, but it can cook without the direct concentration of supervision of the caster, if the menu is a meal the magic-user has seen prepared (or prepared him- or herself) at some time. The enchanting gourmet can be dispelled (at will by the caster, and by the use of dispel magic by others), or destroyed by dealing it 6 points of damage. The material components are the foodstuffs to be prepared, a drop of the caster's blood, a piece of string, and a block of wood of any size.

Waves of Weariness

(Enchantment/Charm)

Level: 2 Components: V,S,M

Range: 12" Casting Time: 2 segments

Duration: 1 round Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, the caster causes all movements (including speech) of one creature to be slowed down enough to delay spellcasting and physical attacks for one round. Missile attacks and attacks using magic wands, rings, and similar items can be performed in the same round they were begun by a determined victim of this spell who continues to struggle against its effects (i.e. to utter a word of activation), but this attack always takes effect last in the round. Any intended target of this spell must be seen by the caster at some point during spellcasting, must be pointed at, and must be within range for the spell to take effect. Intended targets save vs. spell (no modifiers apply) to avoid.

Only targets with either intelligence or wisdom of greater than 12 can struggle against the weariness effect of this spell enough to deliver the aforementioned attacks; all others collapse for the round due to the intense sleepy, tired, worn-out feelings the spell causes. Climbing beings must make a Strength Check to avoid falling.

Tome Guardian

FREQUENCY: Very Rare

NO. APPEARING: 1

ARMOR CLASS: 2

MOVE: 12" (or as guarded object moves)

HIT DICE: 4 + 4

% IN LAIR: Nil

TREASURE TYPE: See Below

NO. OF ATTACKS: 1

DAMAGE/ATTACK: See below

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Nil

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil

MAGIC RESISTANCE: See below

INTELLIGENCE: Average

ALIGNMENT: Neutral

SIZE: S

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

Attack/Defense Modes: Nil

The tome guardian (sometimes mistakenly heard and passed on as "tomb guardian") is a creature of the Elemental Plane of Fire. Its nature and activities there are unknown, but it can be summoned to the Prime Material Plane by magical means to serve as a guardian.

Jaluster's ORIZON

A magic-user summons the tome guardian by casting and ensnarement (sending or demand work if the guardian's name is known; they do have personal names), and compels it to service by the use of a truename or binding spell. The object to be guarded must be visible to the magic-user, who indicates it (by pointing and speaking) to the guardian. Tome guardians do not mind protecting an object, for unknown reasons of their own, and unless otherwise attacked are not hostile. Door and torment spells do not affect guardians, and are viewed as attacks. Charms of all sorts except a geas do not affect tome guardians; they cannot be psionically dominated, and anyone attempting ESP or similar mind-meeting magic, by spell, item, or natural ability, finds that attempts to attack, control, or change a guardian cause it to attack—and that it can somehow employ its fireburst attack (see below) through such a mental link.

The guardian envelops, and appears to merge with, the object it has been bound to, becoming invisible. The object radiates a faint dweomer, and infravision detects the presence of the guardian—but the creature cannot be telepathically contacted or in any way coerced, tricked, or forced to leave its object except as described below, under “driven out”. A guardian can only guard one physical object—and if the object is composed of readily separable parts, only one part (i.e. a sword or its scabbard, not both). The guarded object must be small (of less than 4 cubic feet volume), and non-living. Usually magical tomes of lore are so guarded, hence the guardian's name.

An individual can summon only one tome guardian per 24 hours. Only one guardian can be bound to any object. Guardians who are summoned to the Prime Material Plane but not successfully bound to an object, or who have been driven forth (see below) from the object they were guarding, assume what is known as their “free form,” and remain on the Prime Material Plane for 2-40 turns before “dwindling away,” returning to their own plane by natural means. They are not under any being's control during this time, and attack any creature who attacks (or attempts to control) them. Otherwise, they are attracted to large fires, of natural (e.g. volcanoes and forest fire) or man-made (e.g. bonfires, forges, even isolated campfires) origin. Statistics given on p. 10 are for the guardian's free form.

A tome guardian can absorb fiery energy impinging upon it (when it guards an object, it envelops it, and thus absorbs all fire directed at the object), whether of natural or magical (e.g. fireball) origin. It gains a number of hit points equal to the number of points of damage the fire(s) would deal to an unprotected creature, which replenish any damage it has suffered and then increase its own hit points temporarily (i.e. for the following 24 hours). During this time, the tome guardian can add any or all of this additional fiery energy directly to the damage dealt by any fireburst attack(s) it makes. Heat energy (such as that caused by melt or heat metal spells) the guardian merely absorbs.

If it wishes, a tome guardian can deliver a fireburst attack thrice per 24 hours to any creature(s) touching it or the object it guards (it never so attacks any master it is guarding an object for). A fireburst is a pencil-thin, white-hot flame that operates directly into the target creature (thus, it cannot miss) and does not generate any incidental heat or flame that might damage surrounding creatures or objects—such as the item being guarded). If two or more creatures laid hands on a guarded object simultaneously, and the guardian generated a fireburst in one of them, the other(s) would not even feel it.

Only one such attack can be unleashed in a round. A fireburst can operate through clothing or armor; it deals 6-24 points of internal damage (no saving throw) to all creatures not immune to the effects of heat or fire. A tome guardian always uses this attack against a bookworm (q.v.) or any other creature attempting to consume or strike the object it is guarding. Human, demi-human, and humanoid beings who survive a fireburst attack are rendered unconscious for 2-5 turns unless they save vs. poison at -3, due to the shock of their blood boiling momentarily in the area affected by the fireburst.

Jaluster's Orizon

Tome guardians can be affected by all spells save (as noted earlier) enchantment/charm magics such as maze, sleep, and suggestion (although geas is an exception). Cold does them double damage (water, it should be noted, does not), and all physical attacks upon the object they are guarding do not harm the object until the guardian is destroyed, as it gathers its form into a rigid shell to ward off blows; but because of this, all such attacks do the maximum possible damage to the guardian. When in free form, physical attacks do it normal (not necessarily full) damage.

Note that fiery protective spells such as explosive runes and fire trap can be cast upon a tome guarded by a guardian, but the creature absorbs the spell energy as it is being cast, so that the spell's protection does not exist (and the guardian gains for a day hit points equal to the maximum damage these spells would have dealt).

Symbols and glyphs can be cast upon a guarded object without affecting it, and function normally (without harming the guardian). Save for the exceptions noted above, tome guardians have standard magic resistance.

A tome guardian can be "driven out" of the object it is guarding by the casting of a dispel magic (the guardian gains a save vs. spell; if successful it is unaffected). Even the individual who bound the guardian to the object can dismiss it only in this way. The guardian will be seen leaving the object, even in darkness. A tome guardian is immune to the attacks of, but cannot itself harm, a fire elemental, salamander, will-o-wisp, and xag-ya. If a guardian is brought into the presence of a xeg-yi, they attack each other at once. Tome guardians can coexist peacefully with guardian daemons, guardian familiars, homonculi, and the like. More than one tome guardian can guard the same object, although it is very rare. Tome guardians can conduct their fireburst attacks through metal weapons and armor if they wish, and gain hit points from electrical attacks just as from fiery attacks. They can apparently hear and understand Common and perhaps other languages, but not speak them.

The Libram of Lathintel

Appearance

This is a square, thick, maroon-colored volume with maple boards covered in tanned leather, and bound with wire in six circlets to which have been sewn sixteen parchment pages. The book looks well-used but not dilapidated. It has no known traps or defenses.

History and Description

Lathintel was a dignified mage of Athkatla who perished some seventy winters ago of a winter fever. His effects were sold by a merchant of Amn, Oristel—almost certainly after several mages had been allowed to copy individual spells from the Libram upon payment of stiff fees. The purchaser of the Libram, and its present whereabouts, are unknown.

From Oristel's notes and the spells copied by the mage Narlbar, the Libram's contents are known to be as follows (one spell to a page, all standard PLAYERS HANDBOOK spells except as otherwise noted): enlarge, feather fall, light, read magic, sleep, spidereyes (unique spell, described hereafter), unseen servant, audible glamer, invisibility, locate object, wizard lock, dispel magic, fly, ghost pipes (unique spell, described hereafter), hover (unique spell, described hereafter), and tongues.

Spidereyes (Alteration)

Level: 1 Components: V,S,M

Range: Special

Casting Time: 1 segment

Duration: 1 round/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effects: Special

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a magic-user can temporarily see through the eyes of any living arachnid (material component of the spell), which the caster must touch. Small, harmless living spiders are usually employed, the caster using them as spies to see things where the caster dare not go.

More rarely, this spell is cast on a giant spider (successful hit roll required

The Libram of Lathintel

if the spider is hostile and not surprised) to see through its eyes while battling it, so that its opponents can take advantage of striking from where it cannot see.

This spell does not give the caster any control over the arachnid nor even direct mental contact with it, merely a mystical linkage with its eyes.

Most spiders have eight eyes—simple eyes whose vision is readily understandable to most intelligent races, not compound eyes. The sight afforded by the spell has the effectiveness (range and possible ultra- or infravision) of the spider, and unlimited range as long as the spell duration lasts—limited, of course, by how far the spider travels. (The caster cannot continue to see through the spider's eyes if either arachnid or caster move to another plane of existence, including the astral or ethereal.)

Usually this spell is used to try to spy out a cavern, hall, or other guarded area before the caster or companions enter or attack it—but often, frustratingly, the chosen spider refuses to cooperate and look where the caster wants it to, unless controlled or influenced by additional spells. Certain magical barriers sever the link between spellcaster and spider.

Ghost Pipes

(Alteration-Illusion/Phantasm)

Level: 3 Components: V,S

Range: Touch

Casting Time: 1 round

Duration: Permanent

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One instrument

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, the magic-user causes any one musical instrument, which must be non-magical in nature, and whole and unbroken, to play by itself. The instrument need not be one the spellcaster knows how to play; he or she merely hums or whistles a short tune (i.e. one complete in 9 segments or less) after the initial casting, while touching the instrument. When the instrument is released, it glows with a faint, amber faerie fire-like radiance, levitates in the position in which it was released, not moving about but not falling to the ground, and plays the tune, parts of the instrument (e.g. strings) moving as if it were actually being played by an invisible being. When touched, the instrument instantly stops playing and falls to the ground, its radiance winking out. This spell was devised as a court entertainment by Vangerdahast, Royal Magician of Suzail.

No known way has yet been devised to trigger it with other spells or barriers, to serve as a warning. Various magical means used to cause temporary silence mute the music normally without stopping the playing of an enspelled instrument.

Hover (Alteration)

Level: 3 Components: V,S

Range: 1"/level

Casting Time: 3 segments

Duration: 4 rounds

Saving Throw: Special

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a magic-user can instantly arrest the movement of a falling, jumping, or flying creature within spell range (including the caster him- or herself), stopping all movement for a short time.

This allows the hovering being to launch missile weapons, cast spells (the lack of mobility is an absolutely stable fix), read scrolls, open locks, shout instructions, catch ropes or thrown items, and the like. The spell affects only one creature, of the caster's choice—and thus the magic can readily serve to separate a being riding an aerial steed from the (unaffected) mount.

Willing or not, target creatures visualized or seen and concentrated upon by the caster of this spell are affected for 1 round. (Thus, a fleeing monster could be halted to receive a round's-worth of spells or missile weapons.) On the next round, the creature (even if willing) receives a saving throw versus spell; if successfully made, movement begins again, magically slowed for 1 round to feather fall (q.v.) rate, and thereafter continues normally.

If the save fails, hovering continues as long as the caster concentrates on it. However, the target gets a saving throw every round it is held, whether willing or not. No powers can affect these saving throws or the initial stoppage (even a dispel magic cast on itself by the affected creature), but creatures able to become astral or ethereal or plane shift may escape the spell in this way. Creatures wearing a ring of free action are halted for one round by a hover spell, but are thereafter free to move normally without being slowed in any way.

Selvar's Ineffable Conjurations, Magicks, and Phantasms

Appearance

A medium-sized tome (three handwidths broad by four handwidths tall) of ash boards covered with stretched, white-tanned cowhide. The covers have brass corner-caps, and a binding of brass rings, which hold thirty-three parchment pages, each containing a spell, one to a page, except for the first page. It is a title page, and bears Selvar's personal rune, thus:

History and Description

Selvar was a mage of Taruin, in the southern realm of Samarach, who in his latter days became involved in a feud with another local mage, Phelpar of Rassatan. For some years Selvar hopped about as a frog thanks to Phelpar's spells, and during that time Phelpar stole all of Selvar's spells and magical treasures. Selvar hopped for many miles across Samarach to a cave in the mountains north of Sorlmar Pass, where he had hidden a cache of magic, and by means of the powers there regained his own form. He then set about trapping Phelpar, whom he eventually enspelled into the form of a horse and rode to death. Employing magic to speak with Phelpar's corpse, Selvar learned the location of Phelpar's cache, wherein his own stolen magic was hid, and went there to a tomb in the Rathgaunt Hills, on the southern edge of the great plains of the Shaar. There the elderly mage set about collecting and refining his spells, and setting them down in books—one of which, the Ineffable Conjurations, Magicks, and Phantasms, he gave to the young maid Ilistar, who later became an apprentice of Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun. Ilistar set down Khelben's warding whip on the hitherto blank last page of the book.

The book is unusual in that it begins with a section of illusionist spells, written in the magical secret language of that class, Ruathlek, and concludes with a section of magic-user spells. These spells are listed hereafter.

Color spray, detect invisibility, gaze reflection, phantasmal force, blacklight (a unique spell, detailed below), hypnotic pattern, invisibility, magic mouth, mirror image, plague (a unique spell, described below), dispel illusion, fear; mailed might (a unique spell, described below), paralyzation, spectral force, dispel exhaustion phantasmal killer, maze, shadow door, demi-shadow magic, turnshadow (a unique spell, described below), web, dispel magic, haste, water breathing, ice storm, remove curse, hold monster, wall of force, globe of invulnerability, power word: silence (a unique spell, detailed below), Khelben's warding whip (a unique spell, detailed below).

Blacklight (Alteration)

Level: 2 Components: V,S,M

Range: 1"/level

Casting Time: 2 segments

Duration: 1 round/level

Saving Throws: Neg

Area of Effect: 20' radius globe

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, an illusionist creates a stationary, temporary area of darkness. The darkness is total and impenetrable, foiling even infravision and ultravision.

Normal and magical light is negated unless light or continual light magics, or a dispel magic, is used to destroy the area of blacklight. This spell is different from the usual magical darkness in that the caster (only) can see normally in the area of effect, seeing the spell effect only as a faint, smoky grey or blue haze. Thus the illusionist can move, attack, cast spells, and the like normally.

Creatures within the area of effect are adversely affected in combat by the darkness, although a blindfighting proficiency aids against this. Creatures in the area of effect of blacklight are allowed a saving throw versus spell (at -3) for each round in which they remain in the blacklit area; if successful, they can see as well as the illusionist who cast the spell can, for that round only (i.e. a saving throw must be made each round; if made one round and then failed the next, a creature's blindness will return). The caster of a blacklight can end it at will, although continual concentration is not necessary to maintain its existence, and the illusionist may cast other spells after the blacklight is created, without destroying it. (Note that spells that depend upon victims seeing the spell effect will not work if the victims are blinded by the blacklight.) The material components of this spell are a piece of coal and an eyeball (from any creature; it may be dried and preserved).

Plague (Illusion/Phantasm)

Level: 2 Components: V,S,M

Range: Touch

Casting Time: 2 segments

Duration: 100 turns/level

Saving Throws: Neg.

Area of Effect: Creature touched

Explanation/Description: This spell allows an illusionist to cast a special type of spectral force requiring no continued concentration, on any one creature. The illusion created involves smell, texture of skin, appearance, and the like, in a simulation of the symptoms of any severe contagious disease the caster has closely seen examples of before. If the caster has never observed such a disease, he or she can invent and visualize symptoms, but they are 30% likely to be seen as false and magically created. Otherwise, such an illusion is only 6% likely to be detected. The victim suffers no damage (and indeed, may not be aware that the illusion exists, as the victim cannot see the illusion, but only his or her real form), but may well be slain or driven away by others ere the spell expires. Cure disease and similar magics have no effect on the plague illusion, but dispel magic or dispel illusion have the usual chances, i.e. 50% base chance adjusted by 2% downward, or 5% upward, for each level of experience lesser/greater of the caster of the dispel compared to the illusionist who cast the plague of nullifying this magic. The material components of this spell are a scrap of human skin (from any source, of a size at least as large as a gold piece) and a pinch of soot or charcoal or black mold or fungus growth.

Selvar's Ineffable Conjurations, Magicks, and Phantasms

Mailed Might (Evocation)

Level: 3 Components: V,S,M
Range: Touch (or self)
Casting Time: 3 segments
Duration: 1 round/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Creature touched

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, an illusionist protects him- or herself or another touched creature with temporary, illusory armor. The armor has no weight, nor does it encumber its wearer or in any way affect movement or the drawing of weapons or rearrangement of clothing “under” the armor. To the wearer, it is “not there”—invisible and undetectable, making no metallic sounds when struck or moving, and so on. To others, it appears as translucent, ghostly armor, visible in outline but non-reflective and soundless. It protects the wearer as if it were real plate mail (i.e. AC3), but is immune to rust monster attacks, and does not conduct electrical discharges. It cannot be disbelieved by opponents, and lasts for the spell duration regardless of how much damage it absorbs (it absorbs 3 hp of damage per attack directed at the wearer). This improved phantom armor does not hamper spellcasting or the exercise of any class abilities, confers a +1 bonus against all attacks protected against by magic armor, and completely covers the protected creature, who may be of any size (e.g. a horse or mule), fitting perfectly. The armor wearer looks as if it were shadowed by far larger, more powerful armored creatures who stand behind it and move with it. Creatures of 2-7 intelligence (“Semi-” and “Low”) who observe this effect will flee in fear of the strange and powerful armored creature they face; more intelligent creatures are disconcerted and may respect the potential powers of the protected being more than they otherwise would. The material component of this spell is a small fragment of real armor: plate or metal mail-weave.

Turnshadow (Abjuration)

Level: 6 Components: V,S
Range: 6"
Casting Time: 1 segment
Duration: 1 round/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: 4"x4"

Explanation/Description: This spell allows an illusionist to turn shadow monsters, demi-shadow monsters, shades, and shadows (either those conjured up and controlled by means of a summon shadow spell, or encountered undead) and cause them to flee away from the caster and/or companions in a chosen direction at 10" per turn or to attack a single target creature of the caster's choice. Thus, a shade of a dragonne created by one illusionist and directed at another illusionist could be turned against the first illusionist (who would lose control of the dragonne, including any ability to dispel it without a separate spell).

Power Word: Silence

(Alteration)
Level: 6 Components: V
Range: 1"/level
Casting Time: 1 segment
Duration: 2 rounds
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This spell enables a magic-user to magically silence one creature and an area extending all about that creature to a distance of 1 foot. The silence occurs instantly upon the utterance of the power word, ruining any spellcasting in progress, and continuing in the round following the round in which the power word was uttered. The silence foils spellcasting, the utterance of any word of activation or command words, normal speech or shouted alarms, banging noises, and blocks all sound, effectively deafening the target.

The target can of course move, breathe, or even ring a gong or operate a magical noisemaker (including such items as a horn of Valhalla or blasting and a chime of opening) without any effect except the expenditure of charges, if applicable. Dispel magic or dispel silence will not affect the silence created by a power word; a limited wish or more powerful spell is required.

Khelben's Warding Whip

(Abjuration/Evocation)
Level: 7 Components: V,S,M
Range: 1"/level
Casting Time: 7 segments
Duration: 1 round/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: Developed specifically as a counter to the various Bigby's Hand spells, this magic enables a caster to combat magical attacks which take the form of pushing, striking, or crushing forces. It creates a whip-like, flexible lash of invisible force directed by one of the caster's hands, which when directed against magical forces has the following effects:

- All cantrips that cause loss of balance or affect physical person: presence of whip confers immunity on whip - wielder.
- Push: presence of whip confers immunity on whip - wielder.
- Shield: touch of whip instantly dissipates shield; whip unaffected
- Tenser's Floating Disc: touch of whip has 40% chance (per strike; 1 per round) of destroying disc; whip unaffected
- Bigby's Interposing Hand: touch of whip instantly destroys hand; 20% chance of whip being destroyed too.
- Bigby's Forceful Hand: each strike of whip on hand (one per round) has a 90% chance of destroying the hand and a 30% chance of destroying the whip.
- Bibgby's Grasping Hand same as above, except the chances are 80% and 40%.

Selvar's Ineffable Conjurations, Magicks, and Phantasms

- Bigby's Clenched Fist same as above, except the chances are 70% and 50%.

- Bigby's Crushing Hand same as above, except the chances are 65% and 60%.

The caster need not concentrate on the whip to maintain its existence, but can cast only verbal-only spells to avoid destroying it before the spell expiration. No hit roll is required to strike or parry with the whip, but the caster cannot also wield physical weapons without causing the whip to dissipate. The material components of this spell are a piece of wire and a pinch of powdered electrum.

The whip has no effect on the effects of such spells as gust of wind, levitate, hold person, slow, fumble, repulsion, reverse gravity, trip, and various non-moving magical barriers, from wall of force up to prismatic sphere, and cannot itself be used as a weapon—it simply and harmlessly passes through living objects as though they did not exist. It may be used to parry the physical attacks of normal and magical weapons, including telekinesed missiles and other weapon-like spell effects (such as spiritual hammer, flame blade and Mordenkainen's sword) and of magical items (such as a shillelagh or ring of the ram), with a base 60% chance of success, plus 2% per level of the caster of the whip. Thus a 14th level magic user, the lowest level able to use 7th level spells, will have an 88% chance of parrying, whether the attack be a +1 dagger or a flame blade, with a maximum chance (regardless of level) of 96%. The whip can parry only one attack in a round, so it can foil only single-missile magic missile attacks, and remove only one point of damage (per round) from blade barrier attacks.

The Shadowtome

Appearance

An octagonal volume of two wooden board covers, over which are stretched sections of black-and-silver crocodile-skin, enclosing nine sheets of beaten electrum, each bearing, stamped and etched, a single spell. The book is fastened with a clasp opposite the electrum hinges—a black left human hand that swivels at its wrist to grasp a black bestial hooked tail. The book bears no title.

History and Description

This book was compiled by the mage known only as Shadowhands, lieutenant to Nelazra, the Old Mother (though she was never called that to her face twice), Guildmaster of the Nighteyes, the guilded thieves of Calimport.

Shadowhands, whose real name has never been known is believed to have been Nelazra's lover and confidant, and is believed to have been slain in a battle with The Brothers Six, a group of mages who sought to control much merchant trade in Calimshan, and saw elimination of the Nighteyes as necessary to the success of their ventures. The Brothers Six had been reduced to just two in number by the time they finally slew Nelazra and broke the power of the Nighteyes in Calimport—and they were in turn slain by Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun when they attempted to control trade entering and leaving the harbors of Baldur's Gate and Waterdeep.

The Shadowtome was found in a concealed room in the back wall of the temple of Mystra in Calimport by the mage Azkhazan, who was slain by hobgoblins when adventuring in the mountains north of Iriaebor, and the tome traded by them to the evil mage Maerglor of Elturel, in return for weapons, food, and fine armor. Maerglor sold it to Elminster, who after copying what of its contents he needed, sold it to Evinther the Blue of Neverwinter, who was blasted to nothingness two winters later by an unknown magical assailant who presumably has the book now, unless meeting with subsequent misfortune.

The Shadowtome's pages bear the following spells (unless otherwise noted, they are all standard PLAYERS HANDBOOK spells): dispel magic, missile mastery (a unique spell, detailed below), night scar (a unique spell, detailed below), polymorph other, animate dead, cloudkill, ironguard (a unique spell, detailed below), death spell.

Missile Mastery (Alteration)

Level: 3 Components: V,S

Range: 1"/level

Casting Time: 3 segments

Duration: 3 rounds

Saving Throws: Special

Area of Effect: One missile

Explanation/Description: This spell allows its caster to change the flight of a single missile (per round) in mid-air, hurling it back at its sender or at any other creature. Such a missile strikes as though wielded by the caster of the mastery directly, as a proficient weapon, at +4 to hit, and does its normal damage. They may in turn be readily deflected by magical means (such as shield or gust of wind).

Magical missiles only gain a saving throw vs. spell (that of their caster or sender), aided by any pluses they have. Magic missiles (the spell or wand) are negated (dissipated into nothingness) by any attempts to use mastery upon them—but only one of the multiple missiles created by this spell when it is employed by a mage of respectable level will be deflected by use of mastery. Further spellcasting is impossible while a magic-user is using mastery; it can, however, be ended instantly by the cessation of the mage's concentration. Concentration is not broken by physical attacks on the magic-user, who can freely engage in physical combat without wasting the second and third rounds of mastery.

The only benefit this spell gains a mage trapped in a blade barrier is a +1 to the initial saving throw representing the magic-user's chance to escape the forming blades. The mastery must have already been in effect, however; if the time is taken to cast it, the blade barrier will have fully formed—no saving throw is then allowable, and there are far too many blades moving about for mastery to be of any use against them.

Night Scar (Illusion/Phantasm)

Level: 3 Components: S

Range: 3" Casting Time: 3 segments

Duration: 10 turns/level

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: One creature or object
Explanation/Description: This magic is brought about by will and gesture only; it creates an invisible, unique mark (the night scar) on a creature or object. The target is entitled to a saving throw versus spell to avoid the mark, but unless the target is a creature who both observes and recognizes the gestures of casting, the target will be unaware that any spell has been attempted. This mark is visible only to the caster and those creature(s) who touch the caster during the casting of the scar (up to seven M-sized creatures could conceivably do so). The scar will not be revealed by true seeing or the like because it is not really there, nor can another creature be enabled to see it by having the caster (or another who can see it) describe it to them. The scar fades at the spell expiration, and can be removed by dispel magic or remove curse. It does not radiate magic, and cannot be thus detected. The scar shows through clothing, disguises, etc., and to those who can see it, appears to glow slightly—thus, a marked person can be readily distinguished in a crowd if one is within visual range. This spell is primarily used to trace thieves or murderers who escape from the scene of a crime but live or remain in the area (so that they can be apprehended later).

Backlash (Enchantment/Charm)

Level: 3 Components: V,S

Range: Touch

Casting Time: 4 segments

Duration: Special

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: One creature

The ShadowTome

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a magic-user can affect another spellcasting being. (This spell will not work on creatures who have spell-like natural powers.) The magic is lost and wasted if cast on a non-spellcaster. The backlash leaves only a faint magical trace, and can only be removed by a remove curse or stronger spell, not by a dispel magic. It does not take effect until the victim employs an offensive spell that fails (regardless of distance or time removed from the placing of the backlash). A backlash will occur when a victim's target is unaffected by making its saving throw, when the victim has spellcasting interrupted or ruined, or when an offensive spell is incorrectly used on a target that is immune to it. The backlash causes the spell to work (even if the casting was botched) with full effects upon the caster of the offensive spell, who is allowed no saving throws or immunities in this case.

The backlash only works once, although any number of backlash spells may be placed on a single spellcaster; only one will take effect at a time.

IRONGUARD

(Abjuration/Alteration)

Level: 5 Components: V,S,M

Range: 0

Casting Time: 5 segments

Duration: 1 round/level

Saving Throw: None

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, the caster confers immunity from any normal metallic weapons upon him or herself or any other creature the caster touches during the casting. Such weapons pass through the protected person as though he or she were a phantasm, and not solid flesh. Such contact does no harm whatsoever, and the protected person can pass through iron bars, gates, and other metallic objects. The protected person cannot grasp or pick up metallic objects, either, and thus cannot open most locks, carry metal chests, or even put on or take off a metal helm, or wield most weapons. Note that the protected person still suffers damage from heat (hot metal) and flame (flaming blades), poison on metal spikes, and so on.

Magical weapons do damage according to their pluses (i.e. a +2 long sword will do a protected being 2 points of damage per strike). Metal bars and gates that carry any sort of dweomer cannot be passed through by means of this spell, and spells and magical items that use metal in their attacks (e.g. blade barrier) but do not have pluses will do half damage if they cannot be avoided by the protected being. Such protected beings can clearly see (and smell, if hot or smeared with poison or tar) metal objects.

The material components for this spell are a handful of iron filings and a drop of aqua regia.

Shandaril's Workbook

Appearance

A crescent-shaped tome, five handwidths in height by three handwidths across, of two glossy, polished black covers of ebony. The covers are hinged with copper at the center of their curve and enclose twenty-six pages of thin, burnished copper sheets.

History and Description

Shandaril is a mage of great power, now coldly evil and selfish. She uses this Workbook as a means of ensnaring other mages, so that she may lessen potential competition by slaying them, after first strengthening herself by learning what she can of their unique magics.

Born in Telflamm, Shandaril was brought to Sembia by her merchant parents when young, and is known to have studied under the mages Halakoun (good) and later Mairgaer (neutral) in Selgaunt. She was of great beauty from childhood, and soon learned to manipulate men masterfully. While still a youth, she became apprentice to the adventurer-mage Thalaver, of The Company In Crimson, and accompanied the band on a perilous adventure into the ruins of The Stone-lands. There she slew Thalaver and all his companions at some point, and acquired their magic, in particular Thalaver's staff of power and spellbooks. Returning to Suzail to ransack Thalaver's Tower, she was confronted by Vangerdahast and other mages of note in the city who demanded to know of the whereabouts of the Company. She barely escaped alive, by means of a teleportation device. Before doing so, she triumphantly admitted her deeds; there is still a royal warrant for her arrest outstanding in Cormyr.

Shandaril's present lair is unknown but she is thought to dwell somewhere to the south, and is known to have grown greatly in power. She has released her Workbook into circulation amongst mages as a trap, to gain her yet more magic. Few know or even suspect its true nature.

The first page of the crescentiform tome bears Shandaril's sigil, thus:

It also bears the invisible activation rune of a tracer Shandaril has cast upon the tome, which if revealed by detect magic (note that the rune is not itself a "trap") looks like this:

The pages thereafter bear the following spells, one to a page (all are in standard PLAYERS HANDBOOK form, unless otherwise noted): burning hands, dancing lights, detect magic, hold portal, shocking grasp, sleep (this spell has been incorrectly written; the sleep it causes lasts only 1 round, and its range fluctuates from casting to casting, from 1" to 3" , at random), spider climb, audible glamer; circle dance (a unique spell, detailed hereafter), detect evil (this spell has also been botched; all creatures receive a saving throw against it; if made, they do not detect as evil if truly evil, and if good or neutral, they may falsely detect as evil), fools gold, rope trick, shatter, skyhook (a unique spell, detailed hereafter), dispel magic, gust of wind, Leomund's tiny hut, suggestion, tongues, confusion, dimension door, firebrand (a unique spell, detailed hereafter), fumble, polymorph self, and wall of ice.

Circle Dance (Divination)

Reversible

Level: 2

Components: V,S,M

Range: 0

Casting Time: 2 rounds

Duration: 1 round Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: The magic-user

Explanation/Description: This spell enables the caster to learn something of another creature. A gem or gems of not less than 1,000 gp total value are powdered prior to spellcasting. The caster sprinkles this powder in a circle of at least ten feet in diameter on any solid surface (even if temporary), and dances an intricate, weaving pattern within it while concentrating on the target creature and singing a repetitive rhyme (e.g.

"Reveal to me/For I would see", et cetera) which names the individual creature concentrated upon.

This naming need not be accurate; it is only a focussing aid to the caster, and nicknames and descriptions can be used. If successful, at the end of the dance the caster receives mental images and impressions of the target creature's general direction from the caster—if on another plane, that is clear, but which plane, and any details of the current surroundings and state of the target, remains entirely a mystery.

If the target creature is on the same plane as the caster, a confused impression of how distant the target is, and something of the target's current surroundings and mental (i.e. dead, asleep, unconscious, spellcasting, alert, happy, sad, etc.) and physical state may be apparent. The base chance of success of 4% per level of caster, plus: +25% if the target is fairly well known to the caster, +40% if the target is intimately known to the caster, +10% if the target is upset or excited, +15% if the target is currently using magical items or is spellcasting, +5% if the target is close to the caster (i.e. within a radius of 1 mile per level of the caster).

DMs must determine how much a circle dance reveals by the percentile total of the caster; 100% should give a clear mental picture of the target's surroundings and precise distance and direction of such whereabouts. Note that this is not an ESP spell, nor does it allow hearing or spellcasting at a target (it is not seeing the target for the purposes of casting a magic missile, but may well aid in teleportation).

The reverse of the spell, circle charm, involves the same material components, but a reversed dance, and has the effect of hiding the caster (only) and objects on his or her person from all locate object, ESP, know alignment, and other spells that locate and divine the thoughts of other creatures, including circle dance. Wizard eye, sending and the like are not affected by a circle dance, nor does it provide a mental barrier or protective aid.

Shandaril's Workbook

Skyhook (Evocation)

Level: 2 Components: V,S,M
Range: 6" Casting Time: 2 segments
Duration: 3 turns + 1 turn/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: With this spell, the magic-user creates a solid hook of force, invisible to all but the caster, at a desired location. The hook need not be attached to anything, and indeed is usually created in midair over a pit or chasm, but remains absolutely immobile. Creatures can hang onto it, ropes be tied to or hooked over it, and so on. It supports up to 666,666 gold pieces weight.

If the weight limit is exceeded, the skyhook instantly vanishes. Otherwise, it lasts until the spell expires, fading out of the caster's view as a warning in the final two rounds of its existence. It is too small to be stood upon (e.g. to climb further, or cast spells or fire missile weapons from), but its hook is large enough to permit thick cables and many grasping hands to find purchase. A skyhook, once created, can never move. Ropes, etc., secured to it appear to creatures other than the caster to be tied to nothing. The skyhook is solid enough to harm creatures flying into it or striking it, cannot itself be physically harmed, and, aside from limited wish and more powerful magics of the same sort, can only be affected by a disintegrate spell which usually destroys a skyhook instantly (the skyhook saves as if it were its own caster). A dispel magic can only so affect it if the skyhook fails a saving throw equal to its caster's save vs. spell plus 4.

The caster of a skyhook can will it out of existence in 1 segment, but need not concentrate upon it to maintain its existence. The material component of this spell is a miniature metal fishhook.

Firebrand (Evocation)

Reversible
Level: 4 Components: V,S,M
Range: Touch
Casting Time: 4 segments

Duration: 2 rounds plus 1 round/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, which involves a pinch of sulphur and a spark of normal flame, the caster creates everburning flame that blazes until the spell duration expires without consuming the object or location it is cast upon. Instead, the conflagration sucks air into itself and somehow feeds upon the aether and the spell energy for its burning.

The spell must be cast on an object or particular physical spot, and cannot be subsequently transferred to another. It can be ended at any time by deliberate will of the caster, but does not require continued concentration on the caster's part for its existence. The maximum spread of flames created by means of a firebrand is a volume the size of the caster's fist, times the caster's level.

This spell is usually used to make a sword into a flaming-blade weapon. The spell renders it magical for hit purposes, and adds normal fiery damage and chances of causing further combustion, but does not make any weapon a flametongue or give it any magical pluses. It can also be used to create a torch (cast upon a stick or pole) that remains alight underwater and despite gusts of wind and the like.

The spell can also give a caster or fellow creature touched by the caster a non-painful, non-injurious flaming hand or limb, equal in effect to a normal torch or lamp, able to readily burn hair, paper, cobwebs, cloth, and other flammables, and able to deal to others not protected by the spell 2-7 points of damage per contact (2-5 for a blow, 4-7 for a firm grip upon an unarmored area). Note that although this latter application of the spell can be visually impressive, care must be taken or damage results due to the flamehand thus created touching its owner's own hair, clothing, or flammable oil (which, if ignited, will burn any part of the creature it touches, including the flaming areas). Note that more than one hand or foot can be so affected by a single spell, if the caster is of high enough level (a surface area of 6 square inches per level is affected by such a spell) and these are placed together (e.g. clasped hands) when the spell is cast upon them. Non-living matter used as a spell focus and then separated into smaller pieces (e.g. a flaming stick broken, or a flaming blade shattered) does not become many smaller fires; only one fragment retains the magical effect, and the others do not. Note also that the bearer of such everlasting flame is in no way immune to the effects (heat, flame, smoke) of other fires.

The reverse, quenchtouch, requires a drop of water as an additional material component, and is cast upon a limb or object in identical manner to firebrand, having identical duration and area of effect properties. The effect created is painless, shimmering black flames that give off no heat nor cold, and do no damage. Whenever they come into contact with flame of any sort, however, that flame is instantly and utterly quenched. Any heat in excess of its surroundings is drained as well. Normal fires may be extinguished in this way, as can minute meteors and delayed blast fireballs ere they go off, by someone adroit enough to touch or grasp them. Permanent or long-lasting magical (e.g. flametongue swords, fire traps, walls of fire) or natural (e.g. red dragon breath, Type VI demon flames) sources of fire are instantly quenched and prevented from re-igniting or being set off for 1-4 rounds, determined randomly for each instance. Fires of great extent are quenched in a 4" radius globe per touch of black anti-flame and real flame. Fiery explosions within 4" of quenchtouch darkflames neutralize and destroy the darkflames, but themselves dwindle into nothingness in a scattering of sparks, doing 1-4 hit points of damage only to any creatures who are within 4" of the darkflames (saves versus the explosions—e.g. fireball—still limit such injury to half damage if successfully made by such creatures).

Shandaril's Tracer

(Divination)

Level: 5 Components: V,S,M

Range: 0 Casting Time: 1 round

Duration: Permanent

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 1 object of up to 1 foot cubic volume

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a magic-user places a normally-invisible rune on a single, non-living, solid object (typically a chest, book, wand, or gem). Unless dispelled, or destroyed when the object it guards is destroyed (both occurrences its caster is immediately aware of), it is permanent. Whenever the protected object is concentrated upon, the spell provides the caster with an awareness of the direction and distance between caster and object—even if on another plane—and whether the object is being handled or used by another creature or creatures.

Creatures coming into contact with the object are only hazily revealed to the caster of the tracer, who can learn of each its alignment, race, and presence or absence of magical ability—but not a creature's name, description, or level.

This precise fix on the location of the object provides the caster with a focus for teleportation or sending other creatures to the traced object. Various magical means can reveal the presence of a tracer, but the caster of the tracer is always aware of their being used, and can act accordingly to prevent him- or herself from being traced in turn, if desired.

Shandaril always promptly sends two invisible stalkers off after anyone with magic ability who handles the tome, with instructions to disable, disarm, strip and render unconscious without slaying or mentally damaging any such being, and then bring tome, being's belongings, and being to her. She then sends the tome elsewhere by means of magic or servant creatures to where another may find it, and sets to work to wrest what magical knowledge she can out of the unfortunate being ere slaying it.

If the two stalkers are defeated, Shandaril sends more powerful creatures. She takes great interest in who has her Workbook, but she also takes care to conceal herself from magical tracing, and does not herself come after the book and risk an ambush or facing a much-superior foe on its own home ground. Shandaril is thought to be a 19th level CE archmage, and the possessor of many magical items. She is known to wear two magical rings and bear a wand and a staff at all times.

The Tome of Rathdaen

Appearance

Four scorched pages of parchment—three complete, one only partially preserved—kept within a folder of finest parchment sandwiched between two polished ivory plates.

History and Description

Rathdaen was a mage of note some seven hundred years ago, who explored the Realms extensively, traveling much and making many friends by aiding others with his Art. He was sometimes repaid with magic, and his Tome is said to have contained close to sixty of the most colorful and potent magics known to the spellcasters of five races. When he died he bequeathed the book to his apprentice, the weakling Narsel, a vain and foolish braggart given to insulting others and carelessly harming creatures and property with his magic. Four pages are all that is left of it now; the rest were destroyed when Narsel, who was carrying it in his pack at the time, was slain in the sky above Ironmaster by the mage Sapphail, with whom he was duelling.

Sapphail slew Narsel with a meteor swarm, and in the conflagration and subsequent fall of Narsel's charred corpse to earth, the Tome was reduced to ashes, two cracked slates, and these pages, rescued by Sapphail and passed on to her apprentices Jorzoon and Ili-phil.

The partial page preserves a fragment of polymorph any object (in standard PLAYERS HANDBOOK form), too incomplete to use, but enough to substantially aid spell research and/or recognition of the spell written down elsewhere. The remaining three pages each bear a single unique spell, detailed hereafter; ray of Ondovir, icelance, and Xult's magical doom.

Ray of Ondovir

(Enchantment/Charm)

Level: 2 Components: V,S

Range: 8" Casting Time: 2 segments

Duration: 1 round Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: By means of this magic, the caster creates a ray of glowing light leaping from his or her fingertips to one target creature. This beam fades out at 8" distant and has no effect beyond that; if the target creature is beyond range, and no other creature intercepts the ray ere a round passed, the magic has no effect and is lost. But if one living creature is touched by the ray (if several touch it, only the first to do so is affected, regardless of the caster's wishes), the ray of Ondovir takes effect. A saving throw versus spell at -3 is allowed to any creature so touched by the ray; if failed, the victim attempts to exactly repeat the actions it took in the preceding round. Any attacks and spellcasting begun in the round in which the victim was struck by the ray are ruined. The victim moves about in exactly the same way as he or she did on the previous round, although such actions are not in exactly the same spot as in the previous round if the victim made any movements during the second round, prior to the ray's strike. Such movements are carried out even if they lead into obstacles or over cliffs or into chasms. If the target spent the previous round readying weapons, it spends this round doing so too; if it fought with weapons, it duplicates its movements (thus a mobile opponent can easily avoid the victim's attacks, and strike the victim with relative ease; consider the victim to be -4 on AC). If a spell was cast on the previous round, the victim again attempts to cast the spell, but if a second identical spell has not been memorized by the victim, no spell effect occurs. When this round of helpless repetition is complete, the victim is instantly released from all control.

Icelance (Alteration)

Level: 3 Components: V,S,M

Range: 1" per level

Casting Time: 3 segments

Duration: Special

Saving Throws: None

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This spell only works if ice is present (i.e. in cold or arctic condition, or on the round following the release of an ice storm spell). Using a piece of ice and a drop of his or her own spittle, the caster causes scattered pieces of ice, augmented if necessary by water, snow, or even moisture from the air, to form a solid lance of ice. The lance, a slender, pointed cylinder 12 feet in length, forms in mid-air in front of the caster, floating horizontally, within the round of casting. It is vulnerable to physical and magical attack in the six segments in which it is forming; in the seventh it flies with blinding speed at a target pointed to by the caster, up to 1" distant per level of the caster. If it strikes nothing ere reaching its maximum range, it falls apart harmlessly in midair into a cloud of water droplets. The target (which must be a single creature) or any creature that intercepts the lance's straight path to the target creature suffers the lance's effects. An icelance strikes as if it were its own caster striking, at +4 to hit, and is for striking purposes (not damage) considered a +4 magical weapon.

Any creature struck is stunned for one round and thrown to the ground violently if they are protected by a wall of force, shield, or similar magic (the lance is not a "normal missile"). Unprotected structures suffer 1 point of structural damage. Smaller objects are affected as if by a "crushing blow." An unprotected creature suffers 5-30 points of damage. An icelance is never deflected to strike something to one side; it shatters completely upon striking any solid object. This spell creates only one lance, and it can only strike once, without delay. If the spell is attempted without ice present, it is wasted; no spell effect occurs.

The Tome of Rathdaen

Xult's Magical Doom

(Alteration)

Level: 5 Components: V,S,M

Range: Touch

Casting Time: 5 segments

Duration: Special

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: 1" radius

Explanation/Description: By means of a caterpillar cocoon and a pinch of dust, and the tracing of runes during the casting, a magic-user seals a certain object with Xult's magical doom. The runes are traced with one fingertip over the pages of a book, or a map, and are visible only to a detect magic (they may be harmlessly removed by dispel magic). They prevent unauthorized perusal of the guarded object. Only the caster or someone who is (by chance or deliberately) named in or on the material viewed, or who utters the secret word of deactivation (determined during casting) when touching the guarded object, can safely examine the object without suffering the doom.

The doom affects all creatures within a 1" radius when it is activated (the activator saves vs. spell at -3; other beings within that radius save at -1). The doom is a specialized polymorph other spell that works instantly upon creatures within its radius who fail their saving throws. Affected beings suffer a system shock roll during their transformations.

Transformation is permanent, and is always into the form of a bat, frog, toad, or snake (determine randomly). The intelligence of affected beings is not altered, so if the transformed victims can activate magical items or communicate with others so as to bring about their release (another system shock survival roll applies), they are free to do so.

The doom lasts only for one activation if cast by a magic-user of 11th level or less. A mage of 12th to 23rd level may if he or she desires make the doom last for up to four activations. Mages of higher levels can elect to have their dooms last for one additional activation per level above 24th. Note that the passage of time has no effect on a doom unless the object it guards is destroyed, and that a single activation can affect more than one creature.

Transformed creatures affected by this spell typically go insane if of over 7 intelligence, as follows: if of 8-12 intelligence, insanity after 6 months; if of 13-16 intelligence, insanity after 8 months; if of 17 intelligence, insanity after 12 months; if of 18 intelligence, insanity after 24 months; if of greater intelligence, there is a 13% chance (not cumulative) per year of insanity occurring. Such insanity is one of the following forms (from the DUNGEON MASTER'S GUIDE; roll 1d4 to determine which, for each creature): 1) homicidal mania, 2) hebephrenia, 3) suicidal mania, 4) catatonia.

Unique Mageries

Appearance

This large, thin tome measures four handwidths across by ten in height, and its covers are of carved and polished ivory, with black obsidian inlays picking out the letters of the title, surrounded by a circle. The book has twenty-one gilt-edged parchment pages; each contains one spell.

History and Description

This boastfully-titled volume is the work of the long-ago mage Nezram "Worldwalker", who left it behind some seven hundred years past when he ventured to another plane—and never returned.

Nezram's tower in the sparsely-settled southwestern reaches of Mulhorand was later destroyed by a young green dragon, Chathuuladroth. The dragon tore apart the tower and seized the tome along with Nezram's other treasures, flying off westward into lonely, mountainous areas. Somewhere therein Chathuuladroth laired, and held the book in its hoard for six centuries, growing vast and terrible and amassing much treasure.

The adventuring company known as The Black Gauntlet finally slew the great dragon, and bore Unique Mageries back to their stronghold near Star-mantle. The company later disbanded in disarray after the deaths of its leaders, the fighter Jhastan and the mage Quarra, at the claws of an improperly-summoned demon. The book disappeared. In the meantime, in need of money, Quarra ("a fey lady," Elminster comments) had rented the book to Elminster for a time, and he noted its contents and copied those spells he needed.

The book contains four truly unique spells (that is, hitherto found nowhere else) and seventeen standard (PLAYERS HANDBOOK) spells, all listed below.

The volume contains: magic missile, stinking cloud, wizard lock, dispel magic, feign death, gust of wind, infravision, tongues, water breathing, fear, fumble, polymorph self, remove curse, wall of sand (unique spell, detailed below), wizard eye, telekinesis, anti-magic shell, Nezram's ruby ray (unique spell, detailed below), spelltrap (unique spell; detailed below), power word: blind, spellstrike (unique spell, detailed below).

Wall of Sand (Evocation)

Level: 4 Components: V,S,M

Range: ½" level

Casting Time: 4 segments

Duration: 1 round/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This spell creates a wall of swirling, opaque sand, 1' thick per level of the caster, 12' high, and 4' long per level of the caster. It must be cast so that it rests on a solid surface, and must remain in contact with that surface, although the caster may move it about. The sand is thick and choking; insects cannot fly through it, but will be battered to death, their wings crushed. All creatures save those with infravision will be rendered blind for as long as they are within the wall's confines, and are -2 to hit and -3 on AC on the round after they emerge from the wall, as they try to draw breath, clear their eyes, ears, mouths, and noses of sand, and so on.

The sand will extinguish any open flame, and renders breathing difficult. Any creature that needs to breathe will lose 1 hp per round spent within a wall of sand, after an initial round of exposure in which no damage occurs.

Spellcasting and speech are both impossible within a wall of sand, and normal vision and tracking also cannot occur. Opponents fighting within a wall of sand are at -4 to hit unless they possess infravision, which reduces their penalty to -2. Creatures possessing infravision can see dimly within the sand (though they must keep clearing sand from their eyes) but cannot see through the sand to areas outside the wall. The sand does not slow movement, nor is it solid enough to support weight or resist passage. The sand vanishes at spell expiration. A caster can move a wall of sand about, shifting it 1" per round in which such movement is concentrated upon (in other rounds, the caster can take part in such activities as normal combat and/or spellcasting without the wall ceasing to exist), so as to block different areas or keep opponents within it. A wall of sand can fit into a smaller space than its dimensions allow, simply by collapsing into itself (i.e. the same sand fits into a smaller space). Once so collapsed, it can never expand into its larger dimensions again. The compressed form does no greater damage to creatures within it.

The caster of such a wall can dispel it at will. The material component for this spell is a handful of sand. Note that electrical discharges of any sort (including lightning bolts) are conducted through-out a wall of sand, free of all its effects, by providing a protected area around the caster. No such spells, short of a limited wish, will permit a continuous hole in such a wall. The tunnel created by a passwall spell, for instance, is clear on the round following casting, begins to collapse on the following round (conducting electricity and obscuring vision, but not preventing speech or spellcasting, or causing hp damage or combat penalties), and is gone completely, obliterated by the shifting sands, by the third round.

Nezram's Ruby Ray

(Alteration)

Level: 7 Components: V,S,M

Range: 1"/level

Casting Time: 7 segments

Duration: 1 segment/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: The material component for this spell is a ruby of not less than 1,000 gp value, which is consumed in the casting, and causes a red ray of force to lash out from the caster's pointing finger; where it touches, webs (a la the spell or magical item function) and viscid globs melt away, locks (normal and magical) open, triggering any traps attached thereto, knots untie, and chains and straps loosen and fall away.

Unique Mageries

A ruby ray will destroy wizard locks, holds on portals, and permanently break holes in forcecages, shields, and walls of force (although it does not cause such effects to be totally destroyed.) The ray may be ended at will by the caster. It can affect only one creature (see below) or device per segment. It will destroy any magic jar upon contact.

If a ruby ray touches any creature (or the direct shape or prison of a concealed creature) that has been magically transformed (e.g. turned to stone, polymorphed, affected by Tenser's transformation, et cetera) or concealed (e.g. by a statue spell, an illusion, or invisibility), the ray restores the creature to its original form. If a creature has been altered several times, it is changed back to its original form. Such transformations are empowered by the ray's magic with such delicacy that a system shock survival roll is never required. Such transformations are involuntary (no saving throw), taking one entire round to complete after the touch of the ray. During that time, the creature being changed back can only think and use psionics. It is physically helpless—it cannot voluntarily move, speak, attack, or cast spells or exercise spell-like powers. Such creatures are in no way under the control of the caster of the ray. Beings who are astral or ethereal, or in another dimensional space through the use of blink, rope trick, or a portable hole or similar magical item, cannot be reached by a ruby ray. The ray cannot penetrate anti-magic shells or stronger magical barriers (e.g. prismatic sphere) and cannot penetrate solid matter (with the exceptions already noted). Thus, it cannot reach imprisoned creatures. A ray will be destroyed if its caster begins to cast another spell, teleports or dimension doors or passes into another plane, or is rendered unconscious or feeble-minded.

Spelltrap (Abjuration/Alteration)

Level: 7 Components: V,S,M

Range: Special

Casting Time: 7 segments

Duration: 1 round/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: When this spell is cast, the magic-user causes an oval, glowing ball of silvery hue to form in the air over (1' to 2' above) his or her head. It floats there silently until the spell expires, and need not be further concentrated upon to maintain its existence. Any spell, spell-like power, or magical item effect that is cast directly upon the magic-user (as opposed to area-effect magics) will be attracted to, and utterly absorbed by, this floating spelltrap. This includes magic missiles and other never-missing spells. Except by visual observation, the caster of the spelltrap will not know the precise nature (and level) of any spells absorbed by the trap, but will always feel the absorption of each and every spell absorbed by the trap. The trap can only absorb spells of the sixth level and lower, and spell-like abilities of like or lesser power. During any round in which the caster is awake, alert, and not engaged in spellcasting, he or she may mentally direct the spelltrap to unleash one spell upon a target, who must be within 1" per level of the caster.

The spelltrap unleashes the spell exactly as it was cast (except for the new choice of target and the above-mentioned range) and with normal effects.

Only one spell per round can be so unleashed from a spelltrap. At the expiration of a spelltrap, its energies (including any stored spells) dissipate harmlessly and are lost. But if a spelltrap is ever overloaded, it will explode with deadly effect, in a burst of pure energy that deals 6-24 points of blast damage to all within 2", and stuns all survivors for 1-2 rounds thereafter. (All items within this radius must save vs. fireball; no creatures' saving throws are allowed to lessen or escape damage.) A spelltrap can only hold spell energy in spell levels equal to twice the number of experience levels of the caster, at any one time. Thus, a seventeenth-level wizard's spelltrap could hold a maximum of thirty-four spell levels during any round, and would explode if thirty-five or more were taken in. A spelltrap can absorb any number of spells during a single round—if a party hurls a variety of spells and item effects at it, all will be tracelessly absorbed until the maximum capacity is exceeded. Even a mage who realizes the danger from overloading can unleash only one spell per round from the trap, and will never be aware what is being released until the effects begin. (Released magics could well aid opponents.) Such releases are at random once the controlling magic-user wills the trap to let something out, never first in, first out or any similar pattern. A caster cannot will a spelltrap out of existence, nor escape it by teleporting or employing protective barriers; the spelltrap will always accompany him or her. There is one curious anomaly to spelltrap absorption; the casting of a dispel magic on a trap will always cause the trap to—by itself, and in addition to any unlashings directed by the trap's wielder—unleash one spell at random directly at the caster of the dispel magic. (This is the only case in which a spelltrap will release more than one spell in a given round; if the caster wills it to release a spell, both spells will be cast out of the trap.) If no spells have been absorbed by the spelltrap, nothing will be unleashed, but in both cases the spelltrap will absorb the dispel magic and itself remain in existence.

Missile attacks upon a spelltrap have no effect; direct physical attacks drain a spelltrap of one spell, at random (unleashed directly upon the attacker in addition to any unlashings ordered by the trap-wielder). The material components of this spell are a diamond or diamond fragment of not less than 2,000 gp value and a moonstone of any size, both consumed in the casting.

Vaerendroon's Ineffable Enchantments

Unique Mageries

Spellstrike (Alteration)

Level: 9 Components: V

Range: 1"/level

Casting Time: 1 segment

Duration: Permanent

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This rare and potent magic enables the magic-user to instantly negate, and cancel all effects of, any one spell. The spell may only be one that took effect in the previous round, or that is being cast in the same round as the spellstrike is uttered.

The precise nature of the spell need not be known to the caster of the spellstrike, but a particular spell must be willed to not be—i.e. “whatever spell that being is casting” or “the spell that made X turn purple last round”, not “any spell that affected X last round.”

Spellstrike does not cause a spell to be reflected back on anyone, but merely to cease to exist, and dissipate harmlessly. Spell-like powers are affected by this spell, but magic item and artifact powers are not. Permanency is affected by a spellstrike, but contingency (and spells tied to it), alter reality, limited wish, and wish are not.

Appearance

A slim volume bound in red-dyed rothe hide, into which have been sewn six vellum sheets, each sheet being edged all around with electrum edge-channels. The hide of the cover is stretched over slabs of slate, and has electrum corner-caps. The tome's title is branded in small, flowing letters in Thorass into the cover, and each letter has been picked out in silver.

History and Description

Vaerendroon was a sage of magical lore who was known to trade much magic for a particular spell he desired, often approaching the poor apprentices of great mages to get these magics. He has not been seen for some twenty winters, and is generally presumed to have died or been slain (although Elminster suspects he may have taken up residence on another plane). Once, when in great need of cash, Vaerendroon assembled his manual, a collection of only six spells, and sold it in Baldur's Gate for 90,000 gold pieces. Its purchaser was the magic-user Haljann, who was murdered by the thief Galmorgh, who in turn was slain by unknown hands in the city of Scornubel.

Galmorgh's belongings were ransacked, and a magic dagger, all his gold, and the manual were taken. Its present whereabouts are unknown.

The manual's six pages bear six spells, one to a page. The first three are standard PLAYERS HANDBOOK magics—disintegrate, astral spell, anti-magic shell — and the last three are unique spells, collected in the manual for the first time. They are the magics dire charm, vipergout, and The Simbul's synostodweomer, the latter a spell devised by the famous ruler of Aglarond.

Details of these spells are given hereafter.

Dire Charm

(Enchantment/Charm)

Level: 2 Components: V,S

Range: 12" Casting Time: 1 segment

Duration: 1-4 rounds plus 1 round/level

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: One person

Explanation/Description: By means of this magic, the caster charms one person (“person” is defined as for the charm person spell) to enjoy killing, and to indiscriminately attack friend or foe nearby. The target creature is allowed an initial saving throw, but if this is failed the victim instantly attacks all living creatures visible to him or her, seeking to slay, until the spell expires (the 1-4 extra rounds beyond the levels of the magic-user are determined randomly and secretly by the DM). The caster is the sole exception to this murderous behavior; the charmed creature never harms or menaces the caster, and always attacks beings approaching the caster over other creatures. Such a berserker is not under the direct control of the caster, and gains no special physical endurance, strength, or other abilities by means of this spell.

Vipergout

(Conjuration/Summoning)

Level: 7 Components: V,S,M

Range: 0 Casting Time: 7 segments

Duration: 5 rounds plus 1 round/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: By means of this magic, the casting of which involves a piece of snakeskin (or a portion of a dead snake) which is consumed by the magic, the caster instantly teleports snakes to his or her location. These living snakes appear in the caster's mouth, and are vomited forth. They do not choke or otherwise harm the caster, and never attack him or her. Until the spell expires, they serve the caster, fighting to the death. The snakes are normal- and not giant-sized varieties, and may be both venomous and constrictors. One snake appears for every three levels of the caster (rounding down); a maximum of six serpents can issue from a caster's mouth in any one round. Until they have all issued forth, speech, spellcasting, or pronunciation of magical item activation words on the caster's part is impossible. The caster can breathe normally, can swallow without affecting the arrival of the snakes, and can freely engage in movement and combat.

Vaerendroon's Ineffable Enchantments

Summoned snakes range in armor class from 9 to 6, move 12" to 16" per round, have up to 2+2 hit dice, and attack by biting for 1-2 damage (plus, if venomous, poison of Insinuative Types A, B, or C) and/or constricting for 2-5 points of damage per round. While the spell lasts, the caster's control of the snakes cannot be broken by any means except slaving the caster or the snakes — dispel magic and charm magics do not end or overcome the caster's control of the reptiles. Controlled snakes attack or not as the caster wills, switch targets if desired, constrict without harming (or biting), use their coils and jaws to gnaw ropes or turn keys, carry wands to the caster or move other small objects about, and engage in other non-combat activities.

However, a vipergout does not enable a caster to empower a snake with special powers, increased dexterity or intelligence, or force a snake to attack itself.

The Simbul's Synostodweomer

(Alteration/Necromantic)

Level: 7 Components: V,S

Range: 0 Casting Time: 7 segments

Duration: Special

Saving Throws: None

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: Similar to a power possessed only by the most powerful of the mysterious incantatrices (see description), this spell allows the caster to use the magical energy of any spell already memorized by the caster to heal the caster or another being.

This second spell must be cast in the round following the casting of the synostodweomer; even if this subsequent casting is incomplete or interrupted, the synostodweomer works. The second spell is lost from the caster's mind, and any material components are consumed in the normal manner—but rather than taking effect, the spell's energy is channeled into the caster, who can absorb its energy as healing or pass it on by direct touch to another (single) being. Only if there is excess energy can the caster choose to heal both self and another being—the other being is completely healed, and the remaining energy heals the caster (excess energy being lost). Such healing occurs in the round following the infusion of spell energy. If the caster has extra energy but is unable to touch another injured creature during this time, the extra energy is lost. A spell used to heal by this means yields energy enough to heal 2 hp of damage per level of the spell. Once the synostodweomer is cast, whatever spell the caster casts on the following rounds is used to heal, regardless of the caster's subsequent wishes or the level of the spell unleashed. If no spell is cast on the following round, the magic is lost and no healing occurs. Spells from scrolls and spell-like magical items effects, as well as spells cast by beings other than the caster of the synostodweomer, cannot be used for such healing.

The Spells of The Forgotten Realms

On these pages is a table showing all the unique spells described both in this volume and in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ DM's Sourcebook. It serves as a complete reference for spells unique to the Forgotten Realms as described up to the publication date of The Magister. More spells will probably be described in later books.

These spells are those known by Elminster to be in the books described. Some of them may very well pop up in other books carried by other mages who have not made their spell collection known to Elminster. As described in the histories of each of these books, many of them have had many holders, with ample opportunity for others to copy the spells into their own orizons.

Availability of Spells in The Forgotten Realms

There are three categories of access to AD&D® game spells in the Forgotten Realms: common, rare, and unique.

Common spells are spells that any wizard can gain access to as long as his Intelligence permits him to assimilate the spell. They are spells and cantrips common in the Realms for centuries, and almost everyone, not just magic-users, knows about them and their effects. The names of their creators have long since been lost. They have generic names like magic missile or charm person.

Rare spells are not so rare as their name implies. These are the “named” spells such as the various Bigby's hands, Tenser's Disk, Leomund's assorted shelter spells, etc. Their creators (or at least popularizers) are still known. Apprentices are not commonly taught these spells as a matter of course, and a wizard may not have one in his repertoire because he has never been taught it or researched it, rather than just not being able to assimilate it.

Still, these spells are well known at least by name to most of the magical fraternity. The knowledge of these names is actually something of a puzzle to those who consider such things. The wizards for whom the spells are named in the AD&D rulebooks are all Greyhawk wizards, and most of their histories will be somewhat described in upcoming Greyhawk sourcebooks. Why do these Forgotten Realms spells carry their names?

There are several answers. One simple answer is that they don't carry those names—they were invented by other wizards entirely, but it is a lot simpler for the AD&D game player and DM's to assimilate if they carry over the Greyhawk names for the sake of play. Another answer is that the wizards did some gate traveling and brought their spells to the Forgotten Realms, perhaps starting the entire study of magic in the Realms. Another is “parallel development.” Wizards with exactly the same names created exactly the same spells in the Forgotten Realms as their namesakes did in Greyhawk. The DM can make his own choice as to which to promulgate as the true word.

Unique spells are those that are only found in obscure spellbooks, such as those described herein.

Level	Spell Name	School	Book
can.	Catfeet	(Alteration)	SS
can.	Cut	(Alteration)	TA
can.	Gallop	(Alteration)	TA
can.	Horn	(Evocation)	GW
can.	Listen	(Alteration)	GW
can.	Scorch	(Alteration)	GW
can.	Snatch	(Evocation)	SS
can.	Spark	(Evocation)	SS
can.	Sting	(Alteration)	TA
1	Catapult	(Alteration)	DL
1	Detho's Delirium	(Necromantic)	DL
1	Spidereyes	(Alteration)	LOL
2	Agannazar's Scorcher	(Evocation)	TOTC
2	Blacklight	(Alteration)	SICMP
2	Bladethirst	(Alteration)	SS
2	Circle Dance	(Divination)	SW
2	Decastave	(Evocation)	DL
2	Dire Charm	(Enchantment/Charm)	VMIE
2	Dispel silence	(Abjuration/Alteration)	BB
2	Flying Fist	(Evocation)	DL
2	Plague	(Illusion/Phantasm)	SICMP
2	Quimby's Enchanting Gourmet	(Conjuration/Summoning)	JO
2	Ray of Ondovir	(Enchantment/Charm)	TOR
2	Skyhook	(Evocation)	SW
2	Waves of Weariness	(Enchantment/Charm)	JO
3	Ghost Pipes	(Alteration-Illusion/Phantasm)	LOL
3(d)	Greenwood	(Alteration)	BOT
3(c)	Holy Flail	(Invocation/Alteration)	RBOW
3	Hover	(Alteration)	LOL
3	Iceland	(Alteration)	TOR
3	Laeral's Dancing Dweomer	(Alteration/Enchantment)	TW
3	Mailed Might	(Evocation)	SICMP
3	Missile Mastery	(Alteration)	TS
3	Night Scar	(Illusion/Phantasm)	TS
3	Tasirin's Haunted Sleep	(Enchantment/Charm)	TW
4	Archveult's Skybolt	(Alteration)	TW
4	Backlash	(Enchantment/Charm)	TS
4	Belytn's Burning Blood	(Necromantic)	BOB
4	Bowgentle's Fleeting Journey	(Alteration)	BB
4(d)	Briartangle	(Alteration)	BONTM
4	Caligarde's Claw	(Conjuration/Summoning)	TW
4	Censure	(Conjuration/Summoning)	BOB
4	Encrypt	(Illusion/Phantasm)	OA
4	Firebrand	(Evocation)	SW
4	Hailcone	(Evocation)	AW
4	Ilyykur's Mantle	(Abjuration)	TOTC
4	Merald's Murderous Mist	(Evocation)	SS

The Spells of The Forgotten Realms

Level	Spell Name	School	Book
4	Nchaser's Glowing Globe	(Evocation)	NE
4	Phase Trap	(Alteration)	AW
4	Presper's Moonbow	(Evocation)	TOTC
4(c)	Reveal	(Divination)	RBOW
4	Secure	(Alteration)	OA
4(d)	Smoke Ghost	(Alteration)	GW
4	Spendelard's Chaser	(Necromantic)	TW
4(d)	Thorn Spray	(Alteration)	BONTM
4	Thunderlance	(Evocation)	AW
4	Tulrun's Tracer	(Divination/Alteration)	TW
4	Wall of Sand	(Evocation)	UM
5	Caddelyn's Catastrophe	(Enchantment/Charm)	CW
5(d)	Control Vapor	(Alteration-Conjuration Summoning)	BOT
5	Flame Shroud	(Alteration)	SOD
5	Grimwald's Greymantle	(Necromantic)	TOTC
5	Hold Vapor	(Conjuration/ Summoning)	BOB
5	Ironguard	(Abjuration/Alteration)	TS
5	Nulathoe's Ninemen	(Abjuration/Alteration)	NE
5	Shandaril's Tracer	(Divination)	SW
5	Watchware	(Evocation)	SOD
5	Xult's Magical Doom	(Alteration)	TOR
6	Power Word: Silence	(Alteration)	SICMP
6	Reconstruction	(Alteration/Phantasm)	TA
6	Shaeroon's Scimitar	(Evocation)	BOB
6	Turnshadow	(Abjuration)	SICMP
7(c)	Bladeless	(Necromantic)	RBOW
7(d)	Death Chariot	(Evocation, Conjuration/ Summoning)	BONTM
7	Khelben's Warding Whip	(Abjuration/Evocation)	SICMP
7	Nezram's Ruby Ray	(Alteration)	UM
7(c)	Sacred Link	(Evocation/Alteration)	RBOW
7	The Simbul's Synostodweomer	(Alteration/Necromantic)	VMIE
7	Spelltrap	(Abjuration/Alteration)	UM
7	Stealspell	(Enchantment/Charm)	TOTU
7	Vipergout	(Conjuration, Summoning)	VMIE
8	Body Sympathy	(Necromantic)	TA
8	Great Shout	(Evocation)	SOD
8	Spell Engine	(Abjuration/Alteration)	SS
9	Dismind	(Enchantment/Charm)	TW
9	Spell Ward	(Abjuration)	CW
9	Phezult's Sleep of Ages	(Alteration)	BOT

(d) Druid Spell, (c) Cleric Prayer

Abbreviations for Book Titles

AW = Aubayreer's Workbook (FR—86)
 BB = Bowgentle's Book (FR—71)
 BBOS = Briel's Book of Shadows (FR—76)
 BONTM = The Book of Num "The Mad" (FR—74)
 BOB = The Book of Bats (4)
 BOT = Book of Thorns (6)
 CW = Caddelyn's Workbook (7)
 DL = Detho's Libram (8)
 GW = Glanvyl's Workbook (FR—80)
 JO = Jaluster's Orizon (10)
 LOL = The Libram of Lathintel (12)
 NE = Nchaser's Eiyromancia (FR—62)
 OA = Orjalun's Arbatel (FR—87)
 RBOW = The Red Book of War (FR—81)
 SICMP = Selvar's Ineffable Conjurations, Magicks, and Phantasms (14)
 SOD = The Spellbook of Daimos (FR—72)
 SS = Sabirine's Specular (FR—77)
 SW = Shandaril's Workbook (19)
 TA = The Alcaister (FR—83)
 TC = The Chambeeleon (FR—64)
 TOR = The Tome of Rathdaen (22)
 TOTC = The Tome of The Covenant (FR—91)
 TOTU = The Tome of The Unicorn (FR—41)
 TS = The Shadowtome (17)
 TW = The Workbook (FR—68)
 UM = Unique Mageries (24)
 VMIE = Vaerendroon's Ineffable Enchantments (26)

(FR—##) Page reference in FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Boxed set, DM's Sourcebook.

(##) Page reference in The Magister.

Armor

Most of the items (largely shields) described herein are one-of-a-kind items that might be found in great treasures or secreted away in some tyrant's treasure house—or on the arm or body of a bandit king. As such, each has a bit of lore associated with it that is described in the following.

Of course, there may be more than one of these one-of-a-kind items floating about the Realms, but if there are—Elminster hasn't heard about them.

Dzance's Guardian

Experience Point Value: 1,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 10,000

Lore: The ranger Dzance found this shield in a chest in the depths of Gauntlgrym, the Lost City; its origin is unknown, but it is thought to be of dwarven manufacture.

Dzance's Journals tell us of the properties of this item. When he retired from adventuring to live in the Lady's Court at Silverymoon, Dzance gave the Guardian to Belpir, a young knight of that city. The new owner forthwith went adventuring and has not been seen since. The fates of Belpir and the Guardian are yet a mystery.

Function: The Guardian is a "+0 shield," magical in nature but conferring no armor class bonus to its bearer besides the one-place benefit provided by any shield. However, it has a special defensive power: when worn, it radiates an insubstantial magical energy field that envelops its bearer, and only the bearer, like an aura. Any magic missile directed at the Guardian's bearer from any direction—not just ahead—strikes this field and is reflected unerringly back at the sender with no damage to the shieldbearer.

The field also absorbs all electrical discharges of natural or magical origin, such as shocking grasp, lightning bolt, or chain lightning, without harm to the bearer. These attacks dissipate gradually and harmlessly if the shield is taken off, but if the shieldbearer can bring the shield into physical contact with a foe within 4 rounds of any such discharge(s), the entire stored electrical energy of the field can be transmitted to the foe (save vs. paralysis for half damage). The bearer is made immediately aware of this storage and discharge power whenever the field intercepts electrical energy.

When this discharge is activated by the bearer's will, there is a 30% chance that the bearer and shield (but not any companion creatures or foes unless direct, physical contact is present at the time) will be plane shifted to a random known plane of existence. This power is unknown to the bearer until it actually occurs; identify and sage lore do not reveal it.

Grimjaw

Experience Point Value: 800
Gold Piece Sale Value: 5,000

Lore: Named for the small common tongue inscription found deeply engraved on the inside top rim of the shield, this plain iron shield is dented and blackened, and of normal and unassuming appearance. It bears no rust, and rusting does not affect it regardless of the handling it receives, due to the protective magics cast upon it. Grimjaw was first identified by the sage Ragefast of Baldur's Gate, as borne by the adventurer Krystus and having a certain awesome power described hereafter. Krystus the Proud soon met his death at the hands of a dwarven patrol half the continent away, in the mountains near Thethyamar, in a dispute over passage through the dwarven mines there. Grimjaw is known to have been in the hands of the ruling dwarven clan "Iron House" for many years, but was lost in battle when orcs and evil mages drove out or slew all the dwarves of Thethyamar. The present head of the "Iron House," Ghellin, wishes to regain the shield.

Function: Grimjaw confers no magical armor class bonus to its wearer, but it has a powerful ability to affect any magical items that come into direct physical contact with it, regardless of the shieldbearer's wishes. The effects of any single such contact are determined by percentile dice, as follows:

- 01-20 Item has one charge drained from it by Grimjaw; if the item has no charges as such, its powers are negated for 3-12 turns.
- 21-65 Item instantly turns and attacks wielder for one round, either striking as if the wielder were attacked by someone of equal class, strength, and level (if a weapon), or firing one charge or magical attack (if a charged staff or similar item).
- 66-80 Item has all magical powers and abilities negated for 2-12 rounds.
- 81-95 Item is completely drained of all magical powers forever, as if struck by a rod of cancellation. Artifacts are likely to be unaffected, but may, at the DM's option, teleport away to a random location, with or without wielder.
- 96-00 Grimjaw, discharges some of its stored magical energy into the contacting item; the item gains 1-6 additional charges permanently, or a +1 on hit and damage bonuses for 1-6 turns.

If a magical weapon or item is wielded against the shield bearer, and the item misses the armor class of the shieldbearer by 1 point (i.e. scoring what would have been a hit except for the shield's presence), then it is considered to have struck the shield.

Hawkstone's Bulwark

Experience Point Value: 1,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 9,000

Lore: The ranger Hawkstone bore this shield in his war against the giants of the Great Glacier and the beast-men (ogres) of Thar. Some time after his death, his grave was violated and all his treasures stolen, among them the blade

Armor

Durelva and this shield, known in ballads as Hawkstone's Bulwark. It is generally believed that Hawkstone won this shield from the hoard of the black dragon Yindoth. Its origin is as unknown as its present fate.

Function: The shield is a single slab of 2-inch-thick polished steel of a beautiful blue hue, a fine metal unique in its quality in the Realms. It has the usual two straps within of black bullhide, and weighs no more than a wooden shield. It has the abilities of a +2 shield, and upon command the shield grows magically into a bridge. (The command word, known throughout lore but not written anywhere on the shield, is "Bulwark.") The shield disappears from the bearer's possession and reappears at the start of the following round as a 5-inch-thick span of fine steel, 2' wide by 60' long. Its length is not variable, and the change is not always automatic; if the command word is spoken when the Bulwark does not have enough room to expand, the power simply fails to function.

The bridge extends out in the direction the bearer of the shield is facing, beginning just in front of the bearer's feet. Once placed, the bridge cannot be moved (although it can be shrunk back to a shield and re-expanded in another direction). It can support up to 5,000 pounds of weight at a time; exceeding that limit causes it to "collapse" back into a normal shield (see below), leaving the creatures and objects upon it without any visible means of support.

If its weight capacity is not exceeded, the bridge remains for 33 days, or until the bearer of the shield holds onto one of the straps and utters the reverse-command word "Krawlub." (When it is in bridge form, the shield's straps are located on the top surface of the bridge at either end.) The shrinking process works essentially the same as the expanding process; the bridge disappears upon utterance of the command word, and at the start of the following round, Bulwark reappears at the bearer's feet in shield form.

No magic short of a limited wish, alter reality, or wish can cause the bridge to shrink, break, or otherwise move (although the ground on which it rests could be affected by disintegrate, dig, or similar magic). The bridge conducts heat, electricity, and other similar forms of energy, and in such respects acts as normal metal does.

Laeral's Storm Armor

Experience Point Value: 1,800
Gold Piece Sale Value: 13,500

Lore: This armor was devised by the wizardess for whom it is named. She devised several sets for champions of her far northern kingdom. The secret of making it died with her, though mages of the North have been trying for centuries. Of the dozen or so sets created, two have been known to be destroyed, and three others are being used in the North. The other seven have disappeared, and it is not known whether they are still in existence.

Function: Storm armor is plate armor, +2, of a peculiar non-metallic alloy. It does not conduct electricity, and has the power to transfer heat to and from the surrounding air, so that the wearer remains comfortable in a freezing gale or under the hot desert sun. The wearer is thus largely unaffected by fireball and ice storm or cone of cold spells, and immune to electrical damage of any type. The wearer can stand securely, or move forward at normal speed, in the face of even the most powerful winds (including the magical gust of wind).

If storm armor is struck simultaneously in different areas by spells causing hot and cold (such as cone of cold and wall of fire or heat metal), it becomes brittle and may be shattered by physical attack(s) doing it 9 points of damage. (The character takes any points of damage over this amount.) The armor is only brittle while both hot and cold spells are affecting it and for one round thereafter. When it shatters, it does so thoroughly; a chain reaction occurs in the unstable heat-transferring components of the alloy and the armor disintegrates into unusable fragments.

Laeral's Spell Shield

Experience Point Value: 500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 5,000

Lore: Named for the wizardess who devised the prototype, these shields can still be made with much travail.

Function: A spell shield protects the wearer from the following spells, so that he or she will suffer no damage: all Bigby's spells (note that it does not negate an interposing hand), blade barrier, shillelagh, and spiritual hammer. In addition, there is a 60% chance (per missile) that the shield will negate magic missile attacks.

Against normal missiles, Laeral's spell shield acts as a +1 shield. All such physical missiles which strike the shield (if a to hit missile attack roll directed at the wearer indicates a miss, roll 1d6: a 5 or 6 indicates that the missile struck the shield) rebound at the source of the missile, flying back at +1 to hit. A returning missile arrives on the round following that in which it struck the shield, strikes once (and is considered +1 magical for that one strike), and is thereafter normal and non-magical.

RepTar's Wall

Experience Point Value: 2,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,000

Lore: Named for the ranger who once bore it, the wall is a large, heavy shield constructed of iron plates riveted to an iron frame. Its origin, lost in antiquity, is unknown. Two words are engraved on the frame in the common tongue, facing the bearer at eye level when the shield is held ready for battle: "Eiruvan" and "Thammis."

Functions: The shield is magical, and has the following powers and abilities:

- Despite its construction, the wall does not rust or corrode, or conduct heat and cold. Its metal remains inactive. It is a +1 shield, and gives forth no sound when struck or dropped. It does not ring or grate, but is absolutely silent; the heaviest blows falling upon it cannot be heard.

Armor

- When the bearer (not another creature, nor anyone not wearing the shield slung on an arm, ready for battle) speaks or whispers the word “Eiruvan,” the shield and bearer, plus any accoutrements worn and held, become invisible to both normal sight and infravision for 2-8 rounds. During this time the shieldbearer moves silently, because of the shield’s sound-absorbing qualities, and can move about or strike at opponents while so concealed. A successful attack made on an opponent by the bearer causes the shield and bearer to immediately become visible.

Carrying an active source of light does not affect the invisibility of the bearer, but the light is clearly seen and can be used to determine the location of the invisible shield carrier. The casting of light, detect magic, or dispel magic in the area where the invisible shieldbearer is suspected to be does not reveal the presence or precise location of the shieldbearer. Once exercised, this power does not work again until 16 hours have elapsed from the cessation of invisibility.

- The shield’s major power, made active when the bearer speaks or whispers the word “Thammis” while wearing the shield slung for use, is the ability to fly (as per the magic-user spell) for 2 turns. Shield and bearer, plus any non-living accoutrements of up to 4000 gp weight, are empowered to fly at maneuverability class A, with a movement rate as per the spell; the magic also confers full stability for wielding weapons in midair. The flight ability lasts until 2 turns have elapsed or the bearer wills it to end, whichever occurs first.

Use of the fly has a side effect in that at the onset of flight, the nearest magical item or artifact is permanently drained of one charge, which serves as energy to power the shield. If the nearest item is of a permanent nature and has no charges (e.g. a magical dagger), all of its powers are negated for four turns. The item closest to the shield is always affected, regardless of the shieldbearer’s wishes.

The shieldbearer is usually unaware of the “draining.” If no magical item is within 9” of the shield when the fly power is activated, the shield’s own other abilities—including the sound absorption and the +1 bonus—are negated for 6 turns. The wall is directed in flight by the will of its bearer, who must remain in full physical contact with it, or the shield and former bearer both plummet to the ground; the shield does not fly alone.

Shoon’s Buckler

Experience Point Value: 2,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,000

Lore: The adventurer Shoon briefly possessed this magical shield. Its true origin is unknown, but he seized it from the body of a slain male drow during a battle deep beneath the Hill of Lost Souls. Amongst the drow, as speak with the dead has revealed, the buckler was known as a “blink shield”; it was unique, and its making a mystery. Shoon later gave the shield to the fighter Gorlaung “Blackhelm” in exchange for training; Gorlaung fell in battle with orcs in the Stonelands, and his body was stripped of weapons and valuables by his slayers. The present location of the Buckler is unknown, but Shoon spent so much time complaining that he should never have let Gorlaung have it that it has become known as “Shoon’s Buckler” and become a phrase to describe any wonderful item lost through folly.

Functions: The buckler is a 1’ diameter disk of black metal with a fist grip, all fashioned of one piece, and bearing no inscriptions. Despite its small size, the buckler functions as a +2 shield. Its other easily discernible power is the ability to glow equal in radiance to a light spell upon the mental command of its bearer; the light dies away to nothing when the bearer wishes it to, falls asleep, dies, or loses sanity or consciousness. This power is discovered whenever the bearer thinks about the poor light, wishes he could see better, and so forth. Whenever the buckler operates thus, three words in the common tongue appear in small glowing letters around its inside edge: “Tethema,” “Sekoe,” and “Brund.”

If “Tethema” is said aloud by any creature holding the shield, that figure becomes the master of the buckler until another creature holds the shield and repeats the word. Control of the buckler enables a being to override the mental commands of another character holding the buckler regarding its radiance, even from afar (up to 16” away). Control also allows the following two powers to be enacted when the master is not touching the buckler, and is up to 16” distant:

If the word “Sekoe” is spoken, the buckler levitates for up to 6 rounds, moving about under the mental direction of the master, or the bearer if the master is someone different and does not countermand the orders. The shield can carry or support up to 600 pounds of weight resting upon it or suspended from it, and any number of creatures or items can make up this cargo. If its load ever exceeds this limit, the shield instantly ceases to levitate for at least 6 rounds and falls. Thus, the bearer can levitate himself up or down at will, and also move horizontally about by pushing off walls, or the buckler’s master can from afar move the shield about—plus, perhaps, an unwilling cargo.

If the word “Brund” is spoken by the master of the buckler, any other active shield powers cease; then the shield and any creature(s) touching it blink, as per the magic-user spell, about the location of the shield when it was activated, until 7 rounds have elapsed or the master wills it to end (whichever occurs first).

These powers can be used repeatedly in consecutive rounds and in any order (although only levitate and light can be used in combination) if the commands are known. Anyone who discovers the buckler is not informed of any facts about its operation by any revelation or by magical means short of a wish, but must learn them by trial and error. The blink power does not function for anyone who discovers the shield until that character has established himself as the master of the buckler by using the command word "Tethema."

ARMOR

Thurbrand's Protector

Experience Point Value: 5,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 25,000

Lore: This shield is named for the fighter who found it in a dragon's hoard. It was later sold to King Osbrun of Chesagol, whose treasury and armory were looted six winters ago, some say by magic. The protector vanished in that theft, and its present whereabouts and owner are unknown. The shield is a plain, battered, kite-shaped construction of bronze plates bolted to a sturdy wooden frame. It bears no maker's mark or inscriptions.

Functions: The shield is magical, and has the following powers and abilities:

- Any damage that pierces or parts the bronze plates, or cracks through or breaks the wooden frame, is magically mended overnight. Minor dents, scratches, and scars are not so repaired. Manual repairs by a blacksmith or the bearer seem to have no effect on the shield, undoing themselves even as they are done.

- The protector has all the powers of a +1 ring of protection. In addition, whenever the bearer raps the wooden frame three times rapidly with a finger or knuckles, the shield radiates and maintains, through some unknown magical means, a 10' radius globe of air, cool and breezeless. This globe withstands the pressures of deep water, gusts of wind, and the like without altering its shape or location, remaining centered upon the protector. Large, solid, immobile objects like stone walls cause the "air bubble" to flatten out along the wall or around the object. Creatures within the globe of air cannot drown, suffer harm from poisonous gases, etc. As many creatures can be protected by the globe as can fit into its volume, usually 40 or so, or, if freedom to move and fight is required, 8 or 9 man-sized beings. The air supply can never be "overloaded" or used up.

Most creatures are not physically constrained from entering or leaving the globe. It keeps out only creatures who cannot breathe or move in air (such as living fish), and those who are gaseous in form (air elementals, a vampire in gaseous form, etc.) In fact, if such a creature appears in the middle of the globe through teleport, changing shape, or summoning, it is immediately expelled out of the globe. The globe of air persists until the bearer again raps the wood frame thrice; to be effective, such rapping must be on the inner side of the shield, directly on the frame, and the bearer must have the shield slung on his arm or strapped to him. However, the sound of the rapping need not be heard and the impact need not be forceful, thus allowing one to activate the powers if suddenly submerged, deprived of all air, etc.

Clothing

The magic-weavers of the Realms are much more likely to make more than one copy of a magic cloak or other article of apparel than are the makers of magical armor. Thus, the following descriptions are, in the main, bereft of lore.

Cloak of Battle

Experience Point Value: 2,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,000

This cloak entangles any weapon parried by it (treat any unsuccessful hit roll of an opponent upon the cloak wearer or wielder as a parry). Magical weapons must then make a saving throw of 20, with a bonus equal to their magical bonuses; those magical weapons without combat bonuses save on a 20, and all artifacts save at +5 on the die or at their own plus, whichever is greater. Failure to make the save binds the weapon fast to the cloak for 1-3 rounds. This entanglement prevents further attacks using that weapon, and a bend bars/lift gates strength roll is needed to pull the weapon free prematurely.

If the attacking creature leaves or moves away to engage another opponent before the 1-3 rounds are up, it must part company with its weapon, which remains in the possession of the cloak-bearer.

The cloak has one other function; upon the speaking of a command word while the cloak is held, but not worn, the cloak transforms into a stout bar or cudgel for 5-8 rounds. The cudgel is largely composed of magical force, cannot be damaged by normal usage (e.g. all except contact with magical weapons or spells), counts as magical for hit purposes but has no bonuses, does 1-6/1-3 hp damage, and cannot be used to entangle other weapons as above. The cloak can be destroyed by parrying (in the above manner) eight blows from magical weapons while in this form (changing it from cloak to cudgel and back again an hour later lets it start over again), and it can be wielded by characters of any class without proficiency penalties.

Cloak of Comfort

Experience Point Value: 1,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 7,500

This cloak imparts (to the wearer only) equable temperatures for comfortable studying, physical activity, sleep, and so on. It does this by alternatively exuding heat or cold that it has magically absorbed, including the heat of the sun, the chill of night breezes, and extremes of temperature common to deserts, glaciers, and other inhospitable regions. The cloak's outlines are always clearly visible to creatures having infravision. Notably, cold- and heat-based magical attacks are absorbed by the cloak harmlessly; thus, the wearer is immune to cone of cold, heat metal and similar spells.

However, most fire-based spells and magics such as ice-storm do damage for other reasons than merely the temperature of their effects. The wearer of a cloak of comfort suffers -2 hp per die of damage from ice storm and fire-based magics of all sorts, although the cloak itself is immune to the effects of flame and freezing. Electrical and other energy attacks are unaffected by the cloak. The capacity for absorption of such a cloak is not known—none is known to have “overloaded” nor, when destroyed, to have exploded or emitted any bursts of heat or cold. The wearer of such a cloak never suffers the effects of exposure to the wilderness, such as reduced constitution, dexterity, etc. Hypothermia and the fatal effects of frigid water are not possible to the wearer. Sunstroke (due to ultraviolet radiation) and water damage to accoutrements, etc., are still possible.

Cloak of Delight

Experience Point Value: 3,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 35,000

These strange, most rare garments cause all who view the wearer to feel calm and at peace in the latter's presence, and feel friendly towards the wearer. At first sight of a wearer of a cloak of delight, regardless of the latter's natural charisma, all who fail to save vs. spell will feel loyalty and love for the wearer, and will tend to carry out the latter's most bizarre commands with enthusiasm and alacrity. All who wish to attack the wearer of such a cloak must save vs. spell at every attack or strike at -2 due to reluctance and remorse. Once per day the cloak wearer may entrance creatures who fail to save vs. spell by causing the cloak to display the ultimate pleasure and goal of each (creatures of low or animal intelligence save at -3, non-intelligent creatures are unaffected). Entranced creatures will remain in a motionless trance for 1-8 rounds, oblivious to their surroundings, but will attack manically any creature or thing obstructing their view of the cloak. Use of darkness, pyrotechnics, or similar obscuring spells ends the trance. Entranced creatures cannot employ psionics or cast spells.

A side effect of the cloak's powers is that everyone who views the garment will see it differently, and give widely different descriptions of it later.

Cloak of Echoes

Experience Point Value: none
Gold Piece Sale Value: 3,000

This cursed item is identical to a cloak of elvenkind (q.v., DMG), and functions properly as such an item at all times. When a wearer is attempting to be quiet and stealthy—and only at such times—all noises made by the wearer are greatly magnified, and echo loudly. Thus, the sound of a footfall or that of a weapon being drawn would alert other beings to the presence—if not the precise location—of the cloak-wearer. Whenever such an echo-activated cloak is taken off, it will emit a weird, echoing falling cry as it is parted from the being who has just worn it.

Clothing

Cloak of Fangs

Experience Point Value: 1,500

Gold Piece Sale Value: 10,000

This cloak can be worn as a normal, heavy-wear, all-weather cloak for an unlimited time, but when magically activated it serves only once. The word of activation for all such cloaks is "Feerond," the name of their maker. When this is spoken, the cloak is dangerous to the wearer's friends and foes alike; it fires darts of pure force up to 3" distant in all directions. This spray of invisible missiles lasts for 7 rounds regardless of the wishes of the wearer. The cloak wearer cannot be struck by the missiles, nor do the missiles ricochet, but all creatures within 3" of the cloak-wearer (who may, of course, move and fight normally) suffer 6-24 hp damage per round; a save versus spells means half (3-12) damage, and spells such as shield, wall of force, anti-magic shell and the like offer complete protection against the missiles. The missiles also cannot penetrate other planes (i.e. the ethereal) or extra-dimensional spaces (e.g. those created by a portable hole or rope trick spell), although if the cloak wearer enters such a space or plane by some means, the flurry of missiles accompany him. The missiles do not hamper the movement rates of affected creatures, but do prevent spellcasting that involves somatic and material components. At the end of the seven-round flurry of missiles, the cloak vanishes forever.

Cloak of Guarding

Experience Point Value: 1,500

Gold Piece Cash Value: 10,000

This garment is identical in weight, texture, and appearance to a normal woolen cloak, and is typically grey in color. When it is worn and the user is struck by a physical blow, the cloak instantly becomes rigid at the point of impact, deflecting all non-magical missiles and absorbing part of the force from any other physical attack (-2 on each die of damage, down to a minimum of 1 point of damage per die). After the attack has landed and withdrawn, the cloak instantly becomes flexible again. The cloak cannot be torn or otherwise damaged by any physical attack, except under the circumstances described below.

If a cloak of guarding is subjected to constriction or sustained pressure (as in a deadfall trap, or caught between two walls that are closing together), the garment protects the wearer in the manner of a rigid suit of armor until it has suffered 25 hit points of damage, whereupon it disintegrates. A cloak that is damaged in this fashion, but not to the point of disintegration, does not bestow its powers of protection upon the wearer again until it has "rested" for as many rounds as the number of points of damage it absorbed, or until it is taken off and not worn for at least one round.

The construction of a cloak of guarding (which involves metal spun into fine threads) is such that the wearer takes maximum damage—no saving throw—from heat, cold, or electrical attacks of all sorts. The cloak itself does not burn.

Cloak of Many Colors

Experience Point Value: 1,200

Gold Piece Sale Value: 8,000

This rare garment can so shift its pigmentation that its wearer is immune to the effects of color spray, prismatic spray, and the like, and can pass through a prismatic sphere or wall (together with all items carried or worn within the cloak) as though the barrier did not exist. The wearer only (not companions) is so protected, and he is likewise solely protected from blindness due to blur, pyrotechnics, hypnotic pattern, darkness, blinding light of all sorts, and magical effects.

The cloak itself does not seem to an observer to alter its own colors, but always seems to have a swirling and indistinct surface (aiding the success of a wearer hiding in shadows by + 10%);

more so when it is acting to shield its wearer's gaze from color affects cast at the wearer. The cloak cannot, however, deliberately be used to camouflage the wearer by blending with its surroundings, nor does it have any powers to affect creatures other than the wearer, either by attack or conferring protection.

Once every 12 turns, the wearer, by effort of will, can cause the cloak to glow (equivalent to a light spell, but not blinding) white, such glowing lasting for nine rounds, without any concentration required, or ceasing sooner if the wearer wills. Obviously the wearer cannot hide in shadows while the cloak is so used.

Cloak of Reflection

Experience Point Value: 1,500

Gold Piece Sale Value: 10,000

Lore: These cloaks were made to protect rangers and other traveling messengers in the service of the High Lady of Silvermoon. The precise magical defenses against each spell are now unknown, the knowledge having died with the maker of the cloaks, the mage Irentalar. The attacking caster or wielder can escape the cloak's reflective effects only by escaping into another plane (or extra-dimensional space). Momentary dislocations such as blink, dimension door, and teleport are not sufficient to escape, and distance is not a factor. Elminster does not know of any instance in which the wearer of such a cloak faced a creature having spell-like natural powers akin to the spells reflected by the cloak, but believes that such spell-like powers would be reflected as are spells and magic-item functions.

Functions: This cloak (many have been made) confers a limited spell immunity upon any one living creature wearing or covered by it. The following spells and spell-like magical item functions—and only the following spells—are directed back at the caster/wielder as follows:

Clothing

- Magic missile — reflected back at caster with full effect (no saving throw).

- Shocking grasp — discharge directed back instantly into caster and nullified; caster takes no damage, but spell is lost.

- Forget — Spell distorted and thrown back at caster, who is confused as per the 4th level magic-user spell confusion for the following round (no saving throw); the forget spell is lost, and neither caster nor cloak wearer forgets anything.

- Irritation — Reflected back at caster, who is affected normally unless save is made (negates effect).

- Ray of enfeeblement — Reflected back at caster, who is affected normally unless save is made (negates effect).

- Hold person/animal/monster (if cast at cloak wearer) — Distorted by the cloak and reflected back at caster, who must save vs. spells (at par) or be slowed for two rounds.

- Tasha's uncontrollable hideous laughter — Reflected back at caster, who is affected normally unless save is made (but the caster's saving throw is always at par, never at a minus due to intelligence).

- Polymorph other — Reflected back at caster, who must save at +2 or be affected normally (system shock roll must be made, form received is as caster intended.)

- Feeblemind — Reflected back at caster, who must save vs. spells at +2 or be affected normally.

- Color spray — Reflected back at caster, who must save vs. spells or be struck unconscious for 1-2 rounds.

- Entangle — Cloak wearer is unaffected by entangle, but the spell has normal effect on other creatures within area of effect; magic is not reflected back on the caster.

Cloak of Stars

Experience Point Value: 1,200

Gold Piece Sale Value: 7,500

The inside of this cloak contains four stars around the neck and front hems, six-pointed shapes of silver cloth. These are enspelled and radiate magic. If a star is touched and the name of its maker spoken (Thalanta the Fair made most of these cloaks), the star vanishes and the spell stored within the star is activated. The knowledge of the making of such stars is lost, and thus they cannot be replaced. Moreover, there is nothing to identify what spell is linked to what star, although a few sages know the secrets of the patterns in which the stars were placed, and can deduce what spell each star triggers.

Only one star may be activated per round; it causes a spell to be cast as though by the cloak wearer or bearer (regardless of that being's class or level), and the spell takes effect as though cast by a magic-user of 20th level, for that is what Thalanta was when she made the stars.

The usual spells stored in a cloak of stars vary according to which of three types of cloaks is found:

1. Teleport, enchant an item, spiritwrack, limited wish
2. Anti-magic shell, repulsion, reverse gravity, imprisonment
3. Death spell, legend lore, statue, shape change

Such cloaks are rare, as the steady attrition of used stars reduces the numbers without replenishment. Version #3 is especially rare. The patterns in which the stars were placed inside the cloaks vary as well. The three known variations (which do not necessarily correspond to the three types of cloaks as noted above) are: a three-star triangle inside the right front facing, one star in the center of the triangle; four stars in a square on the left front placket; and two stars down the right front placket, and two stars down the left front placket. Some speak of a fourth combination—four stars in a diagonal row by the right front placket—but what spells any of these patterns correspond to, only a few sages know or are able to discover. The stars can, of course, be activated without knowing what spell will occur; knowledge of the spell power fills the star-activator's mind in time for the spell to be directed at an area or specific target (but not negated or saved for later).

Clothing

Cloak of Survival

Experience Point Value: 1,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 6,000

While wearing this cloak, any being gains a +2 bonus on all saving throws vs. poison and has a -03% penalty to the chances of contracting any disease or parasitic infection. In addition, the cloak maintains a supply of pure, breathable, air—enough for the wearer only to breathe for one turn—within itself, replenishing this supply constantly whenever the surrounding air is pure. The cloak automatically envelops the cloak-wearer's head in it whenever breathable air is not present. If the cloak-wearer is enveloped in choking smoke or plunged into water, he or she can see, breathe, and act normally up to one turn.

The wearer of one of these cloaks is immune to nausea and its effects, and to the person affecting cantrips belch, cough, sneeze, and yawn. Note that poisonous vapors are protected against for one full turn, and only after that must the wearer save (at +2) to avoid any effects.

Cloak of Symbiotic Protection

Experience Point Value: 3,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 20,000

This type of cloak is very rare. It is impregnated with an immobile, non-intelligent living substance of unknown identity and origins which cannot be isolated by alchemists and naturalists for study. The symbiote drains one hit point of vitality from the wearer every other time it is put on (or, if worn continuously, once every two days) and makes the wearer color blind while the cloak is worn.

In return, the cloak confers immunity to the effects of green slime, olive slime, obliviax, violet fungi, yellow musk creeper, yellow mold, and russet mold (but not brown mold). In addition, spore attacks of all other sorts (including those of the myconid, ascomoid, basidiroid, and similar creatures) are saved against at +4. The symbiotic life form in the cloak seems to feed upon and neutralize spores and microscopic airborne life of all sorts; in many cases, this power confers upon the cloak wearer a -06% penalty to the chance of contracting diseases.

Cloak of The Shield

Experience Point Value: 1,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 10,000

The wearer of this cloak can project a shieldlike field of invisible force once every two turns, maintaining and moving this force field by conscious mental control. The field lasts up to three rounds, in the form of a square 10 x 10 across and four inches thick. The wearer can employ this shield without strain within 4" of himself as a shield, protecting himself or another single being, so that it acts as a wall of force (as per the magic-user spell), a weapon (striking as an invisible ramming force, doing 1-10 points of damage per blow, one blow per round, no saving throw), as a bridge or a barrier (like a door), or as a "floating disk" (like Tenser's spell). The wearer can shift the force field to fulfill any or all of these functions in any order, but it may so serve only in one capacity per round.

If not maintained by constant mental control (i.e., the wearer cannot be struck unconscious, stunned, charmed, confused, feeble-minded, or psionically attacked, and cannot himself cast spells), it ceases to exist immediately.

Attacks upon the field of force do not affect the cloak. Elminster reports that some of these cloaks have lost their powers when used often—and therefore advances the hypothesis that such cloaks have a limited number of magical charges or uses before they are exhausted. The truth of this, it must be stressed, is presently unknown (DM's option).

Girdle of Lions

Experience Point Value: 2,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 8,000

This belt appears to be like any other magical girdle when first encountered. When it is put on, the wearer gains several special abilities. Wearing a girdle of lions enables one to speak with felines (as with the spell speak to monsters). The felines, from house cat to saber-tooth tiger, view the wearer as if he had a charisma of 18 for purposes of reaction checks. Often the cats give advice or assistance to the girdle wearer and may obey his reasonable commands.

The wearer also gains the ability to land after a fall in such a way as to minimize physical damage: subtract 3 points from every die of damage incurred from falling, to a minimum of 1 point of damage per die.

The girdle enables the wearer to move silently as per the thief ability, with a minimum 50% chance of success. If the wearer is a thief, assassin, monk, or other character or creature who already has the ability to move silently, then the chance of success is adjusted upward by +50%, to a maximum of 99%.

Finally, the girdle confers a sort of night vision similar to that possessed by cats. If any light source is within view of the wearer, he can see in the dark as clearly as if he were in broad daylight. This power is not related to infravision or ultravision; the girdle does not allow someone to see in pitch darkness or detect "light" that lies outside the visible spectrum.

Rhun's Horned Cloak

Experience Point Value:	horns visor tail
Value:	2,000/2,200/2,500
Gold Piece Sale Value:
Value:	7,000/7,500/10,000

This garment acts as a +2 cloak of protection, and is dark brown or russet in color. The wearer of this cloak can pass without trace at will.

The cloak is hooded, and upon the hood are mounted two long horns resembling those of a bull. The cloak allows the wearer to take the form of a bull (shape change) up to 6 times a day (24-hour period) and change back again at will. However, every round spent in bull form, there is a 1% (not cumulative) chance that the cloak will vanish forever, trapping the wearer in bull form. This condition may be rectified by dispel magic, shape change (which leaves the cloak wearer in his or her original form when it expires), or wish-related spells.

Clothing

Only M-sized creatures may wear these cloaks so as to employ their powers. Some cloaks have a visor-like face mask allowing the wearer invisibility (corresponding to his or her normal range of sight), and 20% of these cloaks have a prehensile tail mounted in the cloak's back, between the wearer's shoulders.

This tail is under the mental control of the wearer, and can wield a weapon, item, or shield simultaneously with normal two-handed combat at no dexterity penalty. Actions requiring fingers (such as picking locks, drawing bows, et cetera) are not possible with the tail.

Tabard of The Mystics

Experience Point Value: 2,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 15,000

This garment is typically green with golden trim, having a stiff stand-up flared collar, and may be worn over armor. Its construction is expensive (powdered gold and serpentine, for example, must be worked into the fibers of the cloth), difficult, and known only to a few.

Tabards may be worn by any class, and have the following properties: they will not burn, and all fire damage suffered by the wearer is reduced by 1 point per die. Wearers are immune to the effects of a scarab of insanity, and gain saving throw bonuses of +1 vs. a magic jar attack, and +4 vs. all enchantment/charm spells. A symbol may be cast upon the tabard (typically upon the breast), and rendered invisible (inoperative) until it is touched and a command word spoken, or until the garment is removed from the wearer without a command word being spoken. In any case, the wearer or owner is immune to the effects of the symbol. Magic-users wearing a tabard may open a wizard-locked or held door or portal as though they are a level higher in experience.

The Wonderful Hand

Experience Point Value: 1,400

Gold Piece Sale Value: 16,500

This unusual creation is actually two devices: a gauntlet of steel which changes size to fit the hand of any wearer (halfling through human), and a "hand" of solid steel which is identical to the gauntlet in size and appearance. The two items are magically linked, so that the hand mimics all actions of the gauntlet from a distance of 1" per point of wisdom possessed by the wearer.

Clothing

Thus, the wearer of the gauntlet may grasp at empty air and the hand, some distance away, will grasp at an enemy. The positioning and movement of the hand are under the complete control of the gauntlet wearer as long as the hand is within the maximum allowable distance and within sight of the wearer. Otherwise, it falls to the ground until both conditions are fulfilled again.

All attacks made by the hand are at -1 to hit due to the difficulty of accurately judging distances from afar. The hand may transport weapons, but cannot be used to wield them or hurl them; its chief use is in the manipulation of traps and locks from a distance. As such, it is particularly suited for use by thieves, although members of all classes may employ the item.

The hand, unless its speed is markedly increased (by telekinesis or other means), does 1-8 points of damage per blow. For purposes of bending bars, opening doors, etc., it has the same effective strength as the gauntlet wearer. It cannot be destroyed by physical attacks, but becomes inert if it takes cumulative blows amounting to 20 points of damage. It can be "recharged," negating all damage it may have suffered, by bringing it into contact with the gauntlet before the 20-point limit is reached. If it falls inert, either from damage or by moving out of sight of or too far away from the gauntlet wearer, it must be "replenished" by keeping it within the maximum distance for a period of one day for each day (or fraction thereof) it was inert; thus even a momentary loss of control over the hand causes it to be useless for one day thereafter. The gauntlet and hand cannot be employed with any other magical gauntlets. The hand cannot be controlled when the bearer is being psionically attacked, or is the target of some form of mind control magic; however, it remains functional, and can be used again as soon as the wearer is no longer under mental attack.

The hand cannot be damaged by fire, heat, cold, or electricity, but if it is hit by a magical force of one of these sorts, the spell effect is transmitted at half-strength to the wearer. For instance, if the hand is hit by a fireball of 8d6 strength, the gauntlet wearer takes 4d6 of damage, or 2d6 if a saving throw is made. The gauntlet and the hand are not subject to any form of rust or corrosion, including such forces as the attack of a rust monster.

Miscellaneous Magical Items

Bowl of Blood

Experience Point Value: 500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 1,000

This bowl resembles other magical bowls (cf. bowl of commanding earth elementals) save that it fills with blood either once per day (24 hours), upon command, or of its own volition once every 4 rounds after being activated. While in the bowl, blood will not congeal, and can be used as a material component, writing ink, medical supply (it will be compatible with all to whom it is given), sturge lure, or hurled at opponents to blind them temporarily in a fight, et cetera. Eighty percent of these bowls contain human blood. Others contain elvish, gnome, and even (most rare) dragon blood. Such bowls fill from 9-90 times, and then vanish.

Censer of Thaumaturgy

Experience Point Value: 2,500
Gold Piece Cash Value: 12,000

This perforated metal vessel is typically (75%) made of electrum, but may be formed of any precious metal. If it is filled with incense and the contents are lit, the vapors from the incense permeate a 1" radius after 1 round and increase by 1" per round thereafter until reaching a 7" radius after the seventh round.

The effect of the vapors depends on what sort of character or creature ignited the incense (which may be someone other than the owner of the censer). If the lighting was done by a member of a spellcasting class or a creature with spell-like abilities, all magic-user spells cast by someone within the vapors are treated as if cast by an 18th level magic-user. If the lighting is done by a character or creature with no spellcasting or innate spell-like abilities, then all magic-user spells cast within the vapors take effect as if cast by a character of 5th level. A ranger or paladin who has obtained spell abilities because of high level is considered a spellcaster for purposes of this determination.

All forms of magic that are equivalent to any magic-user spell (such as a monster's innate spell-like abilities or druid, illusionist, or cleric spells that directly duplicate magic-user spells) are affected by the magic of the censer. Psionic powers, magical items, and other magical or magic-like effects are not altered.

The "high-level" effect of the censer's magic gives any spell cast the range, duration, and effectiveness afforded to a magic-user of 18th level, but does not allow the casting of any spell the caster did not already possess. The "low-level" version of the magic limits the spells usable within the vapors to magic that available to a 5th level caster; in other words, nothing higher than a 3rd-level spell can be successfully cast. Any attempt to use a spell of 4th level or higher simply fails, and the spell is wasted. As with the "high-level" version, no caster can use a spell to which he would not normally be entitled.

The censer burns for 3-12 turns unless deliberately extinguished. A gust of wind spell, the approach of a wind walker, or the presence of similar air currents which markedly affect the vapors disperse them and end the effect. When the censer goes out or is extinguished, the vapors persist for 1-4 rounds thereafter before losing their power.

Fire Gyregam

Experience Point Value: 900
Gold Piece Sale Value: 9,500

The origin of these magical devices is now forgotten, but they were as plentiful in the past as they are rare today. Gyregams are fist-sized spheres of a silvery, mirror-smooth non-ferrous metal that will not corrode and is unmarked by physical blows.

When a command word is spoken, the gyregam begins to spin, and hangs in mid-air wherever it is released. Within 1 round, it is glowing a blinding white and spinning faster than the eye can follow. It can then be activated on the spot by speaking a second command word, or it can be tossed at a target. The person speaking the first command word (who must also speak the second) tosses the gyregam by simultaneously speaking the second word and pointing at any visible target within 14". The gyregam, untouched by its commander, teleports instantly to the location desired. On the segment following its arrival, it discharges a 6d6 lightning bolt (cf. the magic-user spell) at the nearest concentration of metal. It remains in place, spinning and casting 1 bolt per round, until it is destroyed or 6 bolts have been fired (whereupon it sinks to the ground—an ashy, worthless shell). If it is activated on the spot and not directed at a target, the first bolt will be discharged 1 segment after the utterance of the second command word.

While spinning, a gyregam is AC5, and drains all magical weapons which strike it, save for artifacts and relics. These are not drained; their contact causes the gyregam to instantly explode, doing 3d12 blast damage to all within 1", 3d8 damage to all 1-2" distant, 2d10 damage to all creatures 2-3" distant, 1d12 damage to all within 3-4", and 1d4 damage to all within 4-5". It is said that the artificer Leifand has recently devised a similar weapon, Leifand's Girandole.

Flagon of Dragons

Experience Point Value: 6,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 40,000

This large, silver vessel never tarnishes, and bears no device (scratches and painted or chalked marks will fade and disappear in 2-8 turns). A stoppered flagon is always heavy, and if shaken, a liquid sloshing noise is heard from within. When it is opened, a single dragon breath weapon attack will issue forth from its neck—acid stream, bolt of electricity, cone of gas or vapor, cone of fire or cold—such attacks being at random and not at the choice of the flagon-wielder, as follows:

Miscellaneous Magical Items

- (roll 1d10)
- 01 black dragon acid: does 36 points of damage
 - 02 blue dragon bolt: 48 points
 - 03 brass dragon sleep or fear gas
 - 04 bronze dragon repulsion gas
 - 05 copper dragon slow gas
 - 06 green dragon chlorine gas: 48 points
 - 07 red dragon cone of fire: 56 points
 - 08 silver dragon paralyzing gas
 - 09 white dragon cone of cold: 36 points
 - 10 gold dragon fire: 64 points

These attacks have the range of the breath weapons they duplicate. Once such a flagon has been unstoppered, an attack is launched immediately, regardless of the flagon-bearer's wishes, and after that attack has occurred, directed outwards from the flagon's throat whether targets are present are not, nothing more occurs until the flagon is stoppered (and then unstoppered) again. Stoppering and unstopping each take one round.

The flagon appears to be empty; nothing amiss occurs if weapons, etc. are poked into it. It can even carry liquid without harm; but if it is stoppered, the liquid vanishes and a breath weapon attack emerges when the flagon is next opened.

Glowing Globe

Experience Point Value: 100
Gold Piece Sale Value: 200

Lore: These globes are often found in ancient delvings and ruins. Their origin is unknown, although it is rumored among magic-users that a globe of controllable brightness can be made by the use of Nchaser's glowing globe, a spell of the 4th level. This is said to require a normal glass globe of the finest quality. The mage Nchaser has not been seen for nearly twenty years.

Function: A luminous globe that floats always above and just behind the shoulder of the person who first touched it. Its brightness is under the owner's mental control, from dark to blinding (a brief flash; effects last for 1-6 rounds). Typically, such a globe can be removed from an owner by a limited (or full) wish or remove curse, whereupon the next person to touch the globe inherits it. One type of globe remains brightly lit (equivalent to a continual light) at all times; the brightness cannot be controlled. The glowing globe does not radiate any heat, and cannot be rendered invisible save by wishes. It is affected by changes in its owner's states and drops to the ground, lightless, if its owner is killed, petrified, goes ethereal or astral, or travels to some other plane in some fashion in which he cannot take the globe with him.

Owners attempting to use the globe as a carrying device (by rigging a harness) have found that it can carry 200 gp. However, any weight above 25 gp slows it down to a slow walk, and the owner must match his pace to the globe's. If the weight carried is more than 200 gp, the globe settles to the ground and does not move until its load is relieved. Savvy orcs and other dark-seers have used the tactic of weighted nets on such globes to separate careless human adventurers from their light sources.

Goblet of Glory

Experience Point Value: 1,250
Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,000

This magical container appears as a heavy goblet of worked gold, and is similar in some respects to a beaker of plentiful potions. Although it always appears to be empty, the goblet dispenses a clear, glowing liquid when its rim is brought up to the holder's lips and the container is tilted.

Draining the goblet takes one round; all of the liquid in a dose must be consumed for it to take effect. During the following round, the liquid affects the drinker as follows: 1d4 hit points of damage that the drinker may have suffered are restored. If the drinker is 12th level or lower, he immediately grows larger (as per a potion of growth, but enlargement is only another six inches in height) and temporarily gains energy levels in the manner of a potion of super-heroism. A member of any character class may receive this last benefit, but the increase in level applies only to physical combat. Thieves do not gain improved thieving skills, spellcasters do not gain spell knowledge or comprehension, and clerics do not receive the level benefit when attempting to turn undead.

A character of 13th level or higher who drinks from the goblet has 1d4 hit points restored, but gains none of the other benefits—and is drained of one level of experience.

The growth and level gains bestowed by the goblet of glory last for 4-16 rounds. The goblet dispenses one dose of the liquid per day, and each such item typically contains only 3-36 draughts. When the last of these doses is drunk, the goblet crumbles into dust.

The liquid cannot be spilled or removed from the goblet except by drinking. If the drinker is hit by a physical or magical attack or otherwise interrupted during the round in which he is consuming the liquid, then that dose is wasted and the goblet cannot be used again until the following day.

Greenstone Amulet

Experience Point Value: 5,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 30,000

Lore: These are rare, highly-prized devices, made by some forgotten magical means. They are fist-sized green stones that glow when operating. They are very brittle.

These amulets are prized highly throughout the Forgotten Realms and are generally found in the possession of high-level adventurers and experienced diplomats.

Functions: When worn next to the skin they confer upon the wearer the protection of a mind blank spell, as well as immunity to: chaos, forget, geas, hold person, hypnotism (but not hypnotic pattern or fire charm), mass charm, quest, scare, and sleep. The wearer also gains a +4 saving throw against fumble, ray of enfeeblement, and trip, and is allowed a saving throw against both Otto's irresistible dance and maze spells (if made, the durations of effect are halved, rounding up).

Miscellaneous Magic Items

These amulets may be worn by any class of character. The protection they give is involuntary (i.e. the wearer cannot communicate telepathically even if she or he so desires). Protection only extends to 11-44 (1d4 x 11) spell levels before the amulet is exhausted. (For this purpose, protection against a psionic attack drains the levels of the equivalent spell.) The amulet only counters the spells (and equivalent psionic powers) listed, and is in no way affected by other spells, such as lightning bolt. Pending exhaustion of the amulet is mentally evident to the wearer, and visually evident to others; the amulet blazes fiercely for 4 segments before slowly fading to darkness.

The amulet recharges on its own at a rate of 1 spell level per turn, but will not counter spells which it lacks sufficient power to negate—its protection is all or nothing.

Harps of Myth Drannor

Experience Point Value: Depends on Harp

Gold Piece Sale Value: Depends on Harp

Lore: In the long ago days of glory of Myth Drannor, many magical harps were devised by elven, half-elven, and human craftsmen of skill; a few of these instruments still exist and retain their powers. Elminster the Sage has located descriptions of nine of these instruments.

These harps resemble Irish harps in appearance, with a roughly triangular shape formed by carefully crafted pieces of wood: a robust “body” arm which leans against the player’s shoulder and is covered by a tapering sound board, down the center of which the harp-strings are set, knotted to pegs which fit into holes in the sound-board; an upward-curling “neck” of wood which holds the tuning pins at the top ends of the strings, and stretches from the top of the “body” outwards to form the top of the harp, and join the outward-curving, prow-like “fore-pillar,” which curves down to the base of the “body” and completes the harp. Most Myth Drannan harps are small; two to three feet in overall height, and have copper, brass, and electrum strings, of twenty to thirty-six in number. They require great skill to play pleasantly, for the strings are closely placed and very resonant; half the skill of playing lies in damping the sound of already-plucked strings, but not others. Nevertheless, the magical properties of Myth Drannan harps do not require the hand of a bard or even a trained musician to be unleashed—and for this reason they are sought after by bards and non-bards alike. Myth Drannan harps retain their powers when restrung; the magic does not lie in the strings. All were initially of finely-wrought appearance, with ivory and gilt inlays on black and dark red glossy-polished wood; all radiate a faint good dweomer. They may be used without harm or penalty by all creatures able to stir their strings (regardless of race or alignment), and have powers and properties as described below. Bards who employ Myth Drannan harps increase their chances of charming by a base chance bonus of 9% plus 1% per bardic level.

Elminster believes that a score or more of each of these nine types of harps may still exist, with powers intact; others that have lost their powers are known to be in the private collections of mages and kings. A harp loses its powers by having the wood frame smashed (even if it is repaired, the dweomer is gone). If anyone does find an intact harp of one of the types described, or even one not so described but that is obviously of Myth Drannan make, Elminster is interested in acquiring it.

Azlaer's Harp: When struck, the tones of this harp soothe rage of all sorts, and drive away fear, hopelessness, and despair of natural or magical origin within one round of being heard; maximum range about 8', more if played in caverns, in a breeze—downwind only, or a quiet place. While it is played, all charms and mental controls of any sort are blocked (not removed or ended, but held in abeyance) in all creatures hearing the harp's tones—and no new charms or suggestions can be successfully laid on those listening to the harp, even by a bard using the harp for this purpose. The strings of the harp glow with bluelight (as in the magic-user cantrip) while they are being played.

Experience Point Value: 3,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,000

Dove's Harp: This harp has gained its current name because the Ranger Dove, a member of the Harpers, possesses one. Such is her fame that the previous name for the harp has been lost.

Miscellaneous Magical Items

The playing of this harp causes a gentle soothing in the minds of all within 2" who hear it; this soothing temporarily (only while the harp is playing) quells insanity and instantly (and permanently) calms listeners, dispelling fear, despair, discord, rage, and hopelessness of any sort, and lightens black moods or grief.

The music of Dove's harp also cures light wounds once in any listener within 2" who hears the harp's song for at least two full rounds in succession, such curing being effective in that creature only once every 9 days. The harp cannot otherwise combat the effects of poison. While the music of Dove's harp is aiding a being as described above, the harp and harpist (not the being aided, unless the harpist is that being) radiate a faint white faerie fire or nimbus.

Experience Point Value: 500

Gold Piece Sale Value: 2,500

Esheen's Harp: The tones of this harp cause all glass and metal within 3" to ring and resonate, "singing along with" the playing of the harp: an eerie and attention-getting effect. When the harp-player plucks the lowest string on the harp, any glass or metal objects up to 3" distant that the end of the body of the harp is pointing at must save versus "crushing blow" or shatter instantly into tiny shards. This path of effect is approximately 1' wide.

Magical armor, bracers, weapons, and other magical items (a metal or glass vial that contains a magical oil, ointment, or potion is not itself magical) gain a bonus on their saving throws of +1 or whatever their magical "plus" may be, whichever is greater, to avoid being affected by the harp. The harp can shatter items that have saved successfully against it on earlier rounds, but the harp-player cannot choose to affect some items in the harp's path of effect and not to affect others. The harp can be so used once per round.

Experience Point Value: 5,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 25,000

Jantha's Harp: At the end of a round of harping the harp-player and any other creatures touching him or her, up to a limit of four creatures, are concealed. They are invisible even to animals and infravision (cannot be scented or tracked), can pass without trace (as in the 1st level druid spell), and move and speak cloaked in silence, even though their speech and movement are clearly audible to one another. This protection lasts for as long as the harp is played (its own music can be clearly heard, but always sounds far-off and as though coming from all directions). Any creature losing even momentary contact with the harpist instantly becomes audible and visible, and cannot regain this protection even if it touches the harpist or other protected creature again, until the harp has been stilled. When it is so stilled, and the playing begins anew, a full round of playing must always occur before the concealment is resumed. Spellcasting is possible when under the harp's concealment, but at the instant of the spell's taking effect, the caster appears even if contact with the harpist hasn't been lost. A creature cannot play the harp and cast spells or cantrips of any sort simultaneously, nor activate and control magical items.

Experience Point Value: 5,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 25,000

Methild's Harp: The music of this harp parts all webs, opens all locks, breaks all bonds, and unties all knots within 1" of the harp. Magical locks and knots gain a saving throw versus "breath" to avoid being affected; anything thus saving against such a harp is forever immune to that particular Methild's harp. All webs, bonds, locks, and knots affected by the harp are outlined with an orange faerie fire from the moment of their being affected (within 1 round of being within effective range of the harp's playing) for 1 turn. Magical barriers such as protective symbols and pentagrams, shields, walls of force, force cages and the like without a designed opening are not affected by the harp. A rope of constriction, rope of entanglement or rug of smothering within 1" of the harp when it is played temporarily (for 1-4 rounds) ceases to function and releases any creatures it has entrapped; a creature actually entrapped by such an item could not play the harp itself.

Experience Point Value: 4,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 20,000

Nithanolor's Harp: The music of this harp affects only its player, and all things held or carried by the player. The player is instantly protected (and this protection lasts for as long as the harp is played) as though by a stoneskin spell (see the fourth level magic-user spell), and the harp and all things worn or carried, no matter how fragile, are similarly protected; they are almost immune to physical attack. No other creatures or items can be protected by the harp-music, even if they touch the harpist.

In addition, a moving field of protection exists about the harp and the player's arms, so that it is extremely difficult to physically prevent or restrain the harpist's playing. Magical attacks are unaffected, and the harp's protection can be ended by a silence 15' radius or a hold person cast upon the harpist.

Experience Point Value: 2,500

Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,500

Rhingalade's Harp: The tones of this harp cause the harpist to blink (as in the third level magic-user spell) for as long as desired, and the harp is played. In addition, 1-4 mirror images (as in the second level magic-user spell) of the harpist are instantly created, and these blink in the same manner as the harpist himself, and at slightly different times, so that the harpist (or rather, at least one image of the harpist) is always in view. Such images vanish forever when struck by a weapon, but otherwise remain in existence until the harp is stilled. The harpist cannot cast other spells or make attacks during this time—for when the harping ends, so do these effects, and they cannot be re-evoked until the harp has rested for at least 3 rounds of silence.

Miscellaneous Magical Items

Experience Point Value: 2,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,000

Valarde's Harp: The character playing this harp can at will cause either of two effects to occur, each taking effect at the end of one complete round of play: a gust of wind (as in the third level magic-user spell), moving outwards from the end of the body piece of the harp, or a wind wall (as in the third level magic-user spell) of 2" square, lasting for 3 rounds, although the harper can end it sooner if desired. Tiny points of radiance appear, flicker, dance, and wink out on the strings of this harp, and about the brow or head of the being playing it, while its strings are in motion.

Experience Point Value: 1,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 6,000

Zunzalor's Harp: The tones of this instrument create a 3" radius globe of pearly-white continual light centered upon the harp; this radiance lasts as long as the harp's strings sound, and within this radiance the following effects are present: dispel illusion (as in the fourth-level magic-user spell), dispel invisibility (all sorts except psionic), and reveal glyph or symbol (such magical things—and all magical or illusionary runes, marks, or inscriptions, including wizard mark, illusionary script, unreadable magic-protected writings, glyph of warding, symbol, and the like, are revealed in outline; they glow a luminous blue, and can be precisely located or even, if a spell book, scroll, or expert knowledge can be consulted, tentatively identified or drawn for later study, for the harp's music does not "set such things off" and cause them to visit their effects upon persons studying them. (The harp does not prevent the normal operation of such magical things if they are set off by being touched or in some other prescribed manner.) Shadows, tweens, and other hard-to-see creatures are clearly visible, outlined in blue radiance, if they are even momentarily within the harp's globe of radiance. A mage employing duo-dimension appears as a thin vertical line of blue radiance in mid-air while within the sphere of Zunzalor's Harp.

Experience Point Value: 4,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 25,000

Helm of Darkness

Experience Point Value: 2,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 45,000

A helm of darkness, or nighthelm, appears as an ancient, battered iron helm (even when newly enchanted), with a great black sapphire of no less than 500,000 gp value set in the brow, and twelve black opals set around the lower edge of the helm. The helm radiates a strong dweomer.

Donning the helm will instantly inform the wearer of its powers (it may be worn by all classes and alignments). These are as follows: darkness 15' radius may be called forth 99 times from the great gem (such darkness lasting 9 turns and not banishable earlier by the will of the helm-wearer), and each of the opals will, whenever the wearer fails a saving throw, automatically protect him or her once against the following attack forms, being consumed in the process: death spells (including rays such as those of the beholder and catoblepas), disintegrate, magic jar, and all energy-drain, petrification and polymorph attacks. Removal from the helm destroys the opals. The great gem cannot be recharged, and will explode if any attempt is made to remove or destroy it, disintegrating (as in the spell, save at +1) everything in a 4" radius.

The helm will crumble into dust when all of its gems are gone, but until that time the wearer commands the following powers: the ability to see in darkness (including the magical sort) as though normal daylight prevails; immunity to fear and related spells, the aging of ghosts and the "awe" power of dragon auras; the ability to pass without trace during the night (from twilight to twilight)—not usable underground; the ability to erect a curtain of blackness, which can veil the sight against vision-related enchantment/charm attacks such as the gaze of a vampire, dire charm, and similar spells; speak with the dead, usable by the helm-wearer once per day, as a 9th level cleric (if different beings don the helm within a 24-hour period, this power can be used only once—not once for each wearer); chill metal, thrice per day, lasting 7 rounds, and affecting up to 900 gp weight of metal and 4 separate targets; lower temperature in a 15' radius, lasting 4 turns, from 10-40 Fahrenheit degrees; protection causing all cold-based attacks to do half or (if save made) no damage, even including magical cold and such unusual forms as the chilling touch of a lich.

Kybal's Cords

Experience Point Value: 750 (per knot)

Gold Piece Sale Value: 1,000 (per knot)

These ropes are only found in crypts, treasure vaults, ruins, and other places that have been long undisturbed.

Miscellaneous Magical Items

Made of a now-lost fiber that neither rots nor frays, these cords can be cut only by magic or silver weapons. Typically 2-4 feet in length, such cords usually have a number of enspelled knots tied in them. Untying such a knot unleashes its magical effects. Much research and experimentation must be undertaken to learn the process of enspelling such knots (which are only effective when tied in a cord of this type), but the knots themselves are easily tied, recognized, and untied.

Enspelled knots and ordinary knots are identical in appearance, and many cords have ordinary knots with enspelled ones as safeguards or to deceive buyers. Feared mages such as Sespetar and Turgohn the Two-Fingered are known to wear such cords as belts when they travel.

Powers of some of the known knots follow. Untying one type will call up a strong, steady wind lasting 3-36 turns, which blows in the direction in which the unbinder points the free end of the cord. Such winds have been used to aid navigation at sea, cause storms, and drive vessels onto rocks.

Another knot calls down a flame strike upon anyone within 20" whom the unbinder points at with the free end of the cord. Yet another dispels web or entangle spells. One negates polymorph spells; another breaches wall of force. One knot binds all creatures within 6" of the knot, when it is undone, existing on two or more planes to the Prime Material for 1 turn (undead are not destroyed by this temporary restriction, but lose any energy-draining attacks they normally possess for the duration). One causes all non-magical ropes within a 2" radius to silently untie themselves. One negates an anti-magic ray within a 4" radius around the cord, moving with it and remaining effective for 9 rounds. A rare knot frees summoned creatures (such as elementals, efreeti, and invisible stalkers) from the control of their conjurer. Another rare knot may be retied around a magical item of the rechargeable type, and restores 1d12 charges to the item. This process involves the draining and destruction of the cord, regardless of how many or few knots remain; all crumble into nothingness.

Mierest's Starlit Sphere

Experience Point Value: 200

Gold Piece Sale Value: 2,000

Said to be a gift from the purple-cloaked archmage to a traveler who visited Shamblegate, the Sphere is of shining silver metal that no blow can crush or mark and that will not tarnish, rust, corrode, or show any effects of heat or flame. It has a diameter of four inches, weighs about a pound, and always feels comfortably warm to the touch.

The sphere twinkles with a shifting pattern of cold, blue-white pinpoints of light, whose soft glow will clearly illuminate a 2" radius area. Within this area all sounds are hushed, no winds blow, and all dancing lights, darkness, faerie fire, and light, and illusion spells are dispelled. Within the area of the globe's illumination, all vision is aided by true sight. If passed through an open flame, the sphere emits a soft music of muffled chimes, which dies away in 1-4 rounds if the sphere is not brought into a flame again. This music can be heard up to 11" away, and will still shriekers who hear it, as well as fascinating most bards.

Undead will not willingly enter or remain in the sphere's illumination, and the more powerful among them usually seek to cover the globe and kill its bearer by magical means.

Orb of Holiness

Experience Point Value: 7,500

Gold Piece Sale Value: 90,000

These rare items are usually found at the heart of a temple, grove, or other holy place sacred to the worshippers of a particular deity. Fashioned by powerful divine servants or magically-skilled human worshippers of great power, such orbs are carefully guarded by high priests and other powerful devout beings, and are seemingly indestructible. Each orb has an ethical alignment corresponding to that of the deity whose holy symbol(s) the orb is always inscribed or adorned with. Orbs are unbreakable spheres of some unknown glossy white crystal-like substance, smooth and spherical, and about six inches in diameter. If an Orb is found unguarded, determine its alignment as follows (roll 1d20):

01-06	Evil
07-14	Good
15-20	Neutral

If a character of a particular ethos (lawful and chaotic considerations are ignored) touches an Orb of a different ethos, a saving throw versus magic must be made; if it is failed, the being instantly suffers 4-24 hit points of damage and is feble-minded. If the save is made, the being is merely stunned for 1-4 rounds and takes 2-12 points of damage.

Any being of the same ethos as an Orb can wield without harm the following powers:

- By immersion and command, the orb can purify water or drink once per day (24 hours), to a maximum volume of 22 cubic feet.

- By touch and command, the orb can cause sleep in any one creature (saving throw negates). If the target creature is a true worshipper of the deity the orb is dedicated to, the saving throw is always made unless the creature is willing to be made to sleep.

Any being of the same specific alignment as a particular orb, or any being who truly worships the deity a particular orb is dedicated to, can wield two additional powers of the orb:

- Cure serious wounds thrice per day (24 hours), by touch and command (cured creature may be of any alignment), the orb cannot cause serious wounds.

- Regenerate once per day; the orb cannot wither.

Such an orb also has constant, involuntary powers which operate continually. All such orbs glow with a white continual light (bright light, but not blinding, in a 4" radius), which dims in the presence of strong evil (creature or place), and can be temporarily negated up to a maximum of nine rounds by darkness or a dispel magic cast upon the orb.

Miscellaneous Magical Items

No other powers of the orb can be affected by a dispel magic. The touch of an orb does 5-30 points of damage to any undead. The orb acts as a constant, 6" radius prayer (q.v. third level clerical spell) with regard to all beings of the same specific alignment as the orb, or who truly worship the deity the orb is dedicated to. The presence of an orb calms all creatures of intelligence 4 or less within 6" in 1-2 rounds, ending fear, anger, and all combat. On creatures with an intelligence of 5 or more, an orb acts only as a remove fear.

Trumpet of Doom

Experience Point Value: 900
Gold Piece Sale Value: 5,000

This item is a magical horn, similar in appearance to a horn of Valhalla. Some specimens of this item appear to be battered, a few seemingly about to fall apart. If the trumpet of doom is winded, all human, demi-human, and humanoid skeletons and corpses within a 60' radius about the horn are brought into unlife, as per the spell animate dead. All of the undead obey the bearer of the horn without question, to the utmost of their ability.

The greater the number of undead animated, however, the shorter the time they remain active. If only one skeleton or zombie is animated, it remains active for 60 hours under the horn-bearer's control. If two are animated, they are active for 30 hours, three are active for 20 hours, and four or more are active for only 10 hours before they collapse again.

The undead created by the trumpet of doom may be commanded to "go down" (at which they disintegrate into dust) if the user of the horn wishes it; otherwise the undead serve until destroyed, dispelled, or their time runs out. Use of a trumpet of doom is not considered to be a good act, though sounding it to test its properties is not evil. The trumpet of doom may only be sounded once per month. Using it more often produces no results.

Potion

Mist of Rapture

Experience Point Value: 200
Gold Piece Sale Value: 9,000

The art of making this rose-colored gas is lost in antiquity. Usually found in fragile glass globes or small metal vials, the mist wafts out when released to form a spherical cloud. The diameter of this cloud varies from 15 feet to 45 feet depending on the amount of gas. The vapors are heavy, and remain in this volume for 1-4 days in dead air; they drift very slowly with any air currents (typically ½" a round). The vapors are damp and cling to clothing and skin.

Any human breathing the mist writhes in pleasure for 1d6 rounds (1-3 rounds if saving throw versus breath weapon is made), oblivious to all his surroundings. Affected persons blissfully ignore danger, and even physical attack does not arouse them. The mist closes minds to all other stimuli, and thus confers a temporary immunity to magical attacks involving will force (such as charm, magic jar, suggestion, etc.). Unless restrained, those affected drop everything they carry and sink to the floor, twisting and shuddering. Anyone in telepathic contact (or even psionic combat) with a person breathing the mist is also affected, for the same duration. However, non-humans are immune to the vapors. During the round after rapture has ended, movement is slow (half speed) and clumsy (no dexterity bonuses apply); such characters never win initiative over more alert creatures, and are easily (1-5 on 1d6) surprised.

Rings

Jhessail's Silver Ring

Experience Point Value: 3,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 11,000

This ring confers upon the wearer protection from mental attack. No control magic works upon the wearer, and all successful charm spells work on the caster, not the wearer.

For example: a magic-user attempts to charm the ring wearer, and wearer fails his saving throw. The charm is turned upon the magic-user—who gets no initial saving throw—placing him under the control of the ring wearer. Any being thus charmed gets a saving throw to break the charm every 7 turns, and is instantly freed if the ring is taken off or destroyed. If the ring wearer makes his saving throw vs. the initial attack, the spell merely fails, and the ring has no effect. This property extends to gaze charm attacks, and is a magical property rather than a physical “reflection.”

The ring wearer also gains a +4 saving throw bonus against stunning, confusion, and feeblemind. In addition, the wearer gains +4 on rolls to disbelieve illusions. The ring acts as a tower of iron will (defense strength of 77 points, no attack points) against psionic attacks.

Ring of Lore

Experience Point Value: 3,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 23,500

This appears identical to other rings, but when worn it can be commanded to exercise various powers if the correct command words are known.

This ring can also act as a legend lore through mental visions to its wearer. This power can be called for only once per week, and the visions require the wearer's total concentration for a period of 4 turns after the ring is commanded. If concentration is not maintained, all visions are lost. The ring must be touched to an item, or a name of a person or place must be spoken over it as the command is given; otherwise, the visions are random, having no common focus or theme.

The ring also acts as a stone tell once per week, upon being touched to stone while the command “Speak!” is uttered.

Upon the command “Shine forth!”, the ring causes any symbols, hidden runes, or powerful dweomers within 1" to glow visibly. This power only works once per day.

The ring can also endow the wearer with a power identical in effect to psionic sensitivity to psychic impressions once per week. This power is not infallible; there is only a 40% chance it is effective. Even if the attempt fails, the ring cannot operate this way again for a week. The psychic power is activated silently, by will, and it requires the wearer's complete concentration to work.

All of the ring's powers have durations identical to the spells or effects they resemble. Any and all of them may be used in quick succession (but not simultaneously); the use of one has no effect on the others.

Every time the ring is used, there is a 5% chance it will vanish forever from the wearer's finger without operating as desired.

Rods, Staves, and Wands

Catstaff

Experience Point Value: 6,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 13,000

Functions: This item is a black, 7-foot-long staff of stout wood topped with a sculpted knob resembling a cat's head. When carried on or strapped to one's person, it imparts abilities related to silent movement and concealment. The holder/bearer of a catstaff is able to climb walls (if both hands are free) and move silently as a 9th-level thief, hide in shadows with a 94% chance of success, see with ultravision to a 60' range, and cast shadow six times a day. This shadow is a 1" radius glove of semi-darkness centered on the staff; this gloom does not block infravision or ultravision, and is negated by a light source within its confines. It can be dispelled by magical (but not normal) light which touches its periphery, and unless dispelled or cancelled by the desire of the staff-holder, it remains in effect for 2-4 turns. The shadow does not allow normal vision into or through its area of effect, and as such serves as a defense against visual attacks (gaze weapons, hypnotic and dazzling effects, and the like).

The catstaff is a magical weapon and can be used in combat as a normal quarterstaff; however, it has no bonuses to hit or damage. It can be employed as a weapon while any or all of its magical properties are being utilized. The staff never makes any noise itself while tapping, scraping, striking, or otherwise contacting any solid object. Many such staves contain secret compartments for the carrying of small items such as thieves' tools, spell components, magical tokens, and the like. If it is broken in two, all of its magical properties are lost.

Nidus' Wand of Endless Repetition

Experience Point Value: 3,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 25,000

Named for the legendary mage who by its use gave us the oath "Nidus' Curse!", examples of this device typically have only 4d12 charges when found. The art of its fabrication is lost and has not yet been rediscovered. Upon command, this wand emits a grey cone of light, range 4", diameter at maximum range: 1½". This cone may be continually maintained at a cost of 1 charge per round. Creatures caught in its light are allowed a saving throw (success means the character is unaffected). Any victim no have special magic resistance who is physically touched by the wand has no saving throw.

Anyone affected by the wand is forced to endlessly repeat actions taken during the preceding 2 rounds (or at least mimic them, as in the case of a spellcaster, who would continuously try to cast a particular spell even after his components and magic are exhausted). This automaton-style cycle of 2 rounds of action, 2 rounds of the same actions in reverse to the starting position once again, and so on continues until dispel magic, remove curse or a limited (or full) wish is cast upon the victim. Even if the victim should die from lack of food and water, or of damage inflicted by passing creatures, the corpse endlessly repeats the cycle of action until it falls apart.

Staff of Skulls

Experience Point Value: 900
Gold Piece Sale Value: 15,000 or (both functions) 25,000

Functions: This staff, usable by all classes, can animate skeletal remains. Each such operation, triggered by the word "Arise!", drains 1 charge. Animated skeletons are under the command of the wielder of the staff (cf. animate dead spell). If the staff should change hands, control of the skeletons goes with it. Skeletons need not be complete, but the skull must be present, and skeletons lacking parts of course have their actions and/or mobility impaired. Such animation is permanent, lasting until the magic is dispelled or the skeletons destroyed.

Twenty-five percent of these staves have a secondary function: mending broken bones of both living and dead creatures. This takes 1 charge, and in a round will reattach a severed limb or digit, although it does not restore hp lost due to the wounds. Limbs or bones not belonging to the recipient may be used; thus a heap of bones can serve as "spare parts" for a guard of skeletons. Typically, these staves are of ebony topped with an ivory skull, or constructed of a smooth-polished skull and a thighbone of giant size.

Staff of Ethereal Action

Experience Point Value: 7,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 15,000

Also known as a blink staff, this item appears to be a normal wooden staff, but when a command word is spoken, it allows the holder to blink, as in the spell, for a cumulative period of up to 2 turns per day. In battle, the blinking stops (and begins again) in one segment upon the holder's command.

Rods, Staves, and Wands

The staff is a +1 weapon, and is able to strike creatures on the ethereal plane (such as a couatl, ghosts, phase spiders, and characters using armor or oil of ethereality), as well as those on the Prime Material.

This staff neither has nor requires charges.

Wand of Armory

Experience Point Value: 600
Gold Piece Sale Value: 5,000

Lore: The long-ago wizard Hosta worked on this device for many years, and he had many apprentices; not a few of them carried knowledge of the making of the complete and final item away at his death. The sorceress Myschanta of Arabel is known to possess one; others are in the royal treasuries of Cormyr and Aglarond. Many other specimens of this wand are believed to survive—most (since Hosta lived in the North) probably now lie in tombs or dragon-hoards. One used in a tavern brawl in Waterdeep many years ago had the command word “Plessendar”; the tome High Magic of Mirabar lists among the treasures of that city a wand of armory (since gone missing) with the command word “Skulpin.” Elminster suspects that the parchment found behind paneling in the throne room at Suzail, which bears only the word or name “Ailun”, preserved the command word of Azoun II's vanished wand of armory.

Function: When touched to a target creature (or activated upon the wielder's person), this wand envelops the recipient from head to foot, and on all sides, with an invisible, magical field of force which slows and deflects physical attacks, affording the equivalent of armor class 0 protection.

This field of force can be destroyed by dispel magic, limited wish, disintegrate (which does not affect the protected person, however), or similar, stronger spells, but otherwise lasts for 6 rounds. During this time it absorbs magic missiles and all electrical attacks (including magical ones) so that they do no harm to the wearer—or anything else coming into contact with the field—but otherwise does not affect spells cast into, or out of, its confines.

The “force armor” may be cast over and in addition to real, physical armor worn by a target, and completely covers any size M or S creature (who need not be conscious, alive, or even willing to be so protected; no saving throw allowed). Size L creatures have only their heads and torsos protected by the field of force. All classes may use this wand, which cannot be recharged. Each use of the wand drains one charge.

Wand of Banishment

Experience Point Value: 5,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 30,000

Lore: Savengriff was a young magic-worker of Waterdeep who fell in with a band of reckless adventurers and was slain in battle with a beholder. His corpse was found by the Archmage Khelben “Blackstaff” Arunsun, who arranged for his resurrection. Savengriff became a loyal apprentice, but has devoted much of his time since then to devising means of avoiding fearsome beings—and another death like his first.

The wand of banishment was one result. Savengriff made over a dozen of these before he vanished into other planes than this; most passed into the hands of good mages across the North, one Savengriff took with him, one he gave to Khelben, and he is thought to have hidden away at least one. Elminster gives the command word of one he examined, but has not revealed in whose possession that wand was, or is now. The word is “Baerlaguth.”

Function: This wand is usable only by magic-users; it cannot be recharged, and each use (effective or not) drains one charge. Upon command, a needle-thin ray of flickering green light shoots from the wand's tip up to 4" distant, striking a single target creature (the target is allowed a save vs. spell at -1; a successful save means the ray missed). Creatures struck by the ray are affected as follows:

- A summoned creature (from another plane) is instantly banished back to its own plane; it must save vs. wand at -4 to remain. If it does remain, it is held for one round.

- A creature summoned from elsewhere on the Prime Material Plane (i.e. by monster summoning, call woodland beings, or the like) is driven away; it leaves instantly at normal movement rate, stopping only to defend itself if attacked, and does not return.

- A hostile creature of 2+2 hit dice or less (including enemy familiars or homunculi) is affected as if by a repulsion spell, for 4 rounds. The target is allowed a save vs. wand; if successful, the repulsion lasts for 2 rounds.

- A hostile creature of more than 2+2 hit dice must save vs. wands at -4; if unsuccessful, it is slowed for 2-5 (at random) rounds. If save is successful, there is no effect.

- By draining 6 charges at once the wielder may attempt to repel any other wands within 4". The power does not work if fewer than six are left, but the charges are drained anyway. All wands are allowed a save vs. “Lightning” on the Saving Throw Matrix for Magical and Non-Magical Items at -3. If successful, they are unaffected. Any affected wands are instantly and violently telekinised away from the wand of banishment at a distance of 10"-60", and held that distance for 1-4 rounds. Wands carried in the hand or belt will tear free; wands in backpacks and chests drag the owner or item with them—unless very heavy or bulky, in which case the wand smashes about within the item, perhaps being destroyed. Wands in extra-dimensional spaces such as a bag of holding or that produced by a rope trick are immune to this effect.

Only one creature can be attacked with a wand of banishment per round; the ray only affects one creature at a time, although it may affect any number of wands. Any given creature can be affected by any particular wand of banishment only once every 12 hours; a creature cannot be repeatedly attacked, or attacked a second time or with a different function of the wand, if an initial attack fails. Subsequent attempts merely waste charges; a creature that has saved once against the wand (or endured one successful attack) cannot be affected by the wand again until the dweomer built up around the creature by the wand dissipates in 12 hours.

Rods, Staves, and Wands

Wand of Darkness

Experience Point Value: 4,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 25,000

Lore: Human and drow mages acting at the behest of the powerful forces of evil that inhabit the Lower Planes are believed to have made these fell magical devices. They enable the weakest servants of evil to hold their own, and can be found throughout the Realms. They are made of black ebony-wood or carved and polished bone, and a few have small, ornamental claws at one or both ends. Elminster warns that they are dangerous to those of good alignment. Demons, devils, illithids, and other creatures of evil seem attracted to the use of such wands. From sources he does not disclose, Elminster reports six known command words for such wands: "Orgul," "Meth," "Kulmur," "Druu," "Ulgukh," and "Ssleer." After the command word is spoken, choice of the wand function is by mental concentration of the bearer.

Functions: A wand of darkness has four separate functions. It can be wielded by any intelligent, speaking creature of neutral or evil alignment. Creatures of good alignment cannot make the wand function and suffer 1-2 points of damage per contact with the wand—or, if they, grasp it continuously, 1-2 points of damage per round. It can be recharged.

The powers of the wand are these:

- It can cause darkness 15' radius lasting 4 rounds and centered on the tip of the wand, at a cost of 1 charge. The bearer of the wand (and anyone else, while touching the wand) can see perfectly in any darkness produced by the wand.

- The wand can be commanded to summon a nightmare (see Monster Manual at a cost of 3 charges. This summoning has a 4 in 6 chance of success; the charges are lost even if it fails. The nightmare is brought from an evil Outer Plane, and appears in an explosion of black smoke and a brimstone stench within 3 rounds, whereupon it immediately knows and serves its summoner. It can be commanded to fight on the summoner's behalf, or take the summoner into the Astral or Ethereal Plane. It so serves for 9 turns at a time, and then vanishes. If the summoner is then astride it, he or she is taken along for the ride, or flung off, usually to be hurt when landing.

- By touch, and at a cost of 2 charges, a wand of darkness can break a protection from evil circle, or deal any creatures of good alignment 2-5 points of fiery damage. Creatures immune to fire, or creatures of neutral or evil alignments, are unharmed, but the charges are lost.

- By touch, and at a cost of 4 charges, a wand of darkness can animate a single corpse of a size S or M creature. A zombie, skeleton, or animal zombie is thus produced and can be commanded by the wand-wielder as though an animate dead spell had been cast. The undead creature serves until destroyed or until 6 turns have elapsed, then it collapses. If it is still intact, a corpse or skeleton can then be animated anew by the expenditure of 4 additional charges. Attempts to animate incomplete skeletons fail, but still drain 4 charges. The wand cannot be used to control existing undead, but only undead creatures created by the wand.

In addition, 10% of these wands can summon a shadow when so ordered. This function has a 1 in 3 chance of success (2 in 3 if in deep caverns or ancient ruins) and expends 4 charges if successful or not. The shadow arrives in 3 rounds, and does not attack any creature holding or touching the wand.

Wand of Displacement

Experience Point Value: 3,500

Gold Piece Sale Value: 25,000

Lore: This wand is exceedingly rare; probably only a dozen or so exist, and most are in the possession of thieves' guilds in large cities. The inventor is thought to be the long-ago mage Scholus, who made a few which he sold for vast sums of money before disappearing forever into other planes. He alone knew the secret of their making.

These wands are among the most closely guarded (and eagerly sought) treasures of dweomercraft. The Guild in Baldur's Gate is known to hold one, and it is thought that another lies in the hands of thieves in Hillsfar. Several are rumored to be in the rich cities of the South (due to the number of inexplicable thefts there), but the precise whereabouts of none can be heard or read. Elminster can only give a partial set of command words for but a single wand (which one is not known), from all his books of lore; three of the six words for that wand are: "Tamyrr," "Urembom," and "Lairu."

Function: A wand of displacement can teleport without error single pieces (or several pieces fastened together in some way) of non-living material (which may be organic or formerly alive) up to 16" away from their initial position. The wielder must touch the material to be teleported with the wand while speaking a command word, and later touch the intended new location of the material while speaking the same command word. The material will then be teleported from one location to the other within one segment. Once the teleport has been accomplished, the command word can be used for another object.

Magical items (or any items bearing a dweomer) may be transported without affecting their magic in any way, but the following limitations apply; if the material is of over 30 cubic feet in volume (weight does not matter), or is contained within a magical prison (such as a protective circle, protection from evil, a forcecage, imprisonment, etc.), or the intended new location is over 16" distant from its location at the time the wand-wielder speaks the command word a second time, the teleport does not work and the magic is lost. The command word is again free for use.

Rods, Staves, and Wands

Material that is destroyed, consumed, or made living (e.g. a corpse resurrected) also cannot teleport.

The wand may touch the intended location(s) any number of times without activating if the command word is not spoken. A magical prison (such as a petrified creature, magic jar or the like) could itself be teleported, and the teleportation circumvents any physical or magical barriers around the new location—or between the two objects. The wand cannot move objects from plane to plane.

Each wand has six set and unchangeable command words; up to six items can be simultaneously carried, or held ready to teleport.

Teleports can be made in any order; the first word need not be spoken a second time before the second, third, or fourth is spoken. The teleport will not work, however, if a location is touched before the item. A dispel magic cast upon the item does not negate or foil a not-yet-completed teleportation; only magical imprisonment (see above) of the item can prevent the teleportation. Once teleports are wasted by failing to work or used successfully, the command words corresponding to them are freed again for re-use. Knowledge of only one or two command words permits simultaneously carrying only one or two items.

This wand may not be recharged, and each teleport, successful or not, drains one charge. This wand may be used by all classes.

Wand of Eyes

Experience Point Value: 3,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 20,000

Function: This wand emits a wizard eye (cf. the fourth level magic-user spell) upon command; each such use drains 1 charge. The range and duration of the eye is as if cast by a 6th level magic-user, regardless of the level of the wand wielder. Any user who has never employed a wizard eye spell before typically requires 1-2 rounds to master movement about, focussing, and comprehension of what is seen by an eye. The wand can also cure blindness by touch and command (at a cost of 4 charges per use). If touched to the eyes of any one creature (including the wielder) and properly commanded, the wand can confer the ability to see invisible creatures and objects within the affected creature's normal range of vision for the following round only, at a cost of 3 charges. Note that this ability is not X-ray vision; items and beings concealed behind solid barriers cannot be discerned. This wand functions only once in a round regardless of how it is wielded, and not once for each of its functions. No known method of recharging such wands has yet been perfected.

Wand of Hammerblows

Experience Point Value: 1,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 8,000

Lore: The mage Phultan recently developed this device, and has used it to shatter potion vials, delicate jewelry, brittle parchment maps and scrolls, lanterns, mirrors, ladder rungs, and even the material components of rival spellcasters. It can't directly affect living creatures, and is thus little sought after by rival mages, but Phultan has sold several to thieves and assassins in Westgate, Amn, the Vilhon Reach, and the Kingdoms of the South, who have seen its potential. Elminster has examined one that was found on a thief slain in Waterdeep, and sets down its powers below. Its command word, he reports, is: "Dessout."

Rods, Staves, and Wands

Function: This wand, when activated by a whispered command, causes objects to be affected as if by a “crushing blow” (forcing a saving throw to be made at par on the Saving Throw Matrix for Magical and Non-Magical Items, DMG p. 80). Targets must be non-living items, of any size, but at least some portion of them must be within 6” of the tip of the wand—and they must be visible to the wand-wielder when the wand is activated.

No known physical or magical barriers can stop the wand’s effect, which is silent and does not affect or alert surroundings—such as a creature holding the item—at all. No actual physical blow is dealt, but rather, there is a magical assault on the internal structure of the item.

The wand can be used by any class, and is rechargeable. One charge is expended per “hammerblow”, regardless of the blow’s effectiveness. It is not possible to hit an alternate item by accident—the intended target is chosen mentally by the wand-wielder, and if it is missed, nothing at all occurs.

Wand of Knock

Experience Point Value: 2,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 15,000

Functions: This rare and unusual type of wand has a variety of powers. It can perform only one such function in a round, and so operates only once in that round. Its most common function is to open all normal locks at a touch, noiselessly and within 1 round per lock. This drains one charge per lock, but does not alert the wielder to, or deactivate, any traps or alarms associated with such locks. Magically held or wizard locked portals, doors, and hatches can be passed through freely at a touch of this wand. The hold on held things is negated, at a cost of 1 charge per level of the caster who put it there; a wizard lock is opened for 6 rounds, not destroyed, for the same cost in charges. This process takes 1 round for magical holds, and 1-3 (determine randomly) for locks; once begun, the wand wielder need not keep the wand in contact with the door and can turn his or her attention elsewhere. Again, the wand neither detects nor affects traps or alarms connected to such magics.

The wand can alert creatures up to 6” distant, when grasped and soundlessly directed. This function does not expend charges, and takes the form of either an audible, faint but distinct “knocking” sound, or a soundless tap on one creature—a force insufficient to deal damage, or affect balance or spellcasting—as the wielder chooses.

At a cost of 1 charge, this wand can also operate as a shatter spell (cf. 1st level magic-user spell; 6” range, non-magical glass only). This wand can be recharged.

Wand of Magical Mirrors

Experience Point Value: 3,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 20,000

Lore: These wands were made by the arch-mage Glendar who, though good and noble in life, became a lich, and was later destroyed. The knowledge of their making is now lost. Perhaps twenty were made, and most survive about the Realms in the possession of powerful mages, or in treasure caches. Elminster has found four known command words in his researches: “Phasral,” “Talusta,” “Ormduth,” and “Resshemma.” To which wands these apply—and indeed, where specifically any of these wands are—is not known.

Function: Activation of this wand creates an opaque, silvery, and reflective circular shield of force. This shield appears wherever the wand is pointing, 1” distant from the wielder of the wand, facing outward. Its surface reflects images (including the gaze of the catoblepas and basilisk) like a mirror; the wand wielder can look through the mirror as though it was a window without suffering any harm from such attacks—and when viewed through the shield, things appear as they truly are: illusions are invisible; creatures or items disguised by magic, mutable form, or invisibility (e.g. dopplegangers, shapechanged individuals, leprechauns, demodands, and devils) are revealed in true aspect; and so forth.

The mirror-shield lasts for 3-8 rounds (at random, not at the wielder’s command) and moves as the wielder moves the point of the wand. Each wand can only have one shield created from it in existence at a time (the first shield instantly disappears if the second is activated). The caster need not concentrate on the shield to maintain its existence, and can even put the wand down or pass the wand to another (who thereby assumes control of the shield’s location) to engage in spell casting or other activities.

The shield has no tangible physical existence; it can neither ward off attacks or be used as a weapon. Creatures pass through it as though it does not exist. It does, however, reflect color spray spells striking it from any direction directly back at the caster, and harmlessly dispel darkness and prismatic spheres, walls and sprays upon contact. A dispel magic, limited wish, wish, or alter reality destroys such a shield; it cannot otherwise be affected. Each creation of such a shield drains one charge from the wand, and such wands are not rechargeable. Magic-users, illusionists, clerics, and druids may use this wand.

Wand of Obliteration

Experience Point Value: 2,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,500

Lore: The origin, and means of making, these rare and powerful wands is now lost. Six were discovered in a chest on the island realm of Ruathym over a hundred years ago. One is now thought to be in the treasury of that nation—the finders sold the others at enormous prices and their descendants are now wealthy merchant families of that nation.

If any others have been found since, no one knows about it. The whereabouts of all are unknown.

Rods, Staves, and Wands

Elminster believes that only about ten have ever existed in the Realms; he can find no hint of even a single command word for any of them. The wands are said to be dangerous; sometimes they turn back upon the user.

Function: This wand can harmlessly erase and dispel symbols, glyphs of warding, and other written messages and runes (such as wizard mark). It can obliterate scrolls, and even pages from spell books, but all such items (regardless of how written and on what) gain a saving throw vs. “magical fire” on the Saving Throw Matrix For Magical and Non-Magical Items, as if they were “parchment or paper,” with bonuses and penalties as follows:

- Normal, non-magical writing: -3
- Wizard mark, identifying rune or sigil for magical person or thing, command word, message concealed by unreadable magic: +1
- Symbol, glyph of warding, protective circle or other magical rune: +2
- Single written spell (e.g. scroll), secret page magic: +3
- Spell book page (or scroll if in close proximity to other scrolls or spell books); includes all multi-spell scrolls, but not secret page spell book pages: +4

Messages and marks deeply cut into stone cannot be destroyed by this wand. Only one message (regardless of extent), spell, or magical rune can be affected with the wand per round, and the fading (if successful) takes a full round. If an erasing attempt is unsuccessful, there is a 5% chance the wand will explode, doing 10-54 (4d12+6) points of damage to all within 1". The wand cannot be recharged, and each use, successful or not, drains one charge. Only magic-users, illusionists, and incantatrixes (see DRAGON® Magazine, issue #90) can use this wand.

Wand of Ochalor's Eye

Experience Point Value: 3,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 15,000

This wand is topped with a fiery orange gem, known as Ochalor's eye, or the eye of fear. It pulses with light, and when glowing acts as an extra-strong fear spell; all creatures within its 6" range (cone-shaped area of effect as in fear spell) drop anything in their hands and quake in fear, rooted to the spot. They stare at the eye gem in a trance, oblivious to all else. Creatures of under 6 hit dice get no saving throw; creatures of 6 hit dice and over get a saving throw as follows: 6 hit dice save at -3, 7 hit dice save at -2, 8 hit dice save at -1, 9 hit dice and up save normally. Creatures which are afraid are frozen to the spot unless the gem is hidden from their view if they are physically struck, whereupon they break free of their trance and flee blindly, screaming in terror, for five rounds (or longer if they are not out of sight of the wand by that time).

It is said that those who look into the lighted gem see the manner of their death, endlessly replayed. Others speak of some cold and malignant intelligence which seems to know all their faults and fears—and to laugh contemptuously at them. Few afterwards remember what of this is true, but their fear and hatred of Ochalor's eye remain. Any creature who has suffered the effects of the wand is 50% likely to attempt to destroy any wand of this type subsequently encountered, regardless of whether it is held by friend or foe.

Each wink of the gem expends 1 charge. Upon draining all charges, the gem shatters. It cannot be recharged.

Wand of Teeth

Experience Point Value: 3,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 15,000

Lore: Lantan of Pelmarin, that sinister and rotund mage notorious for his ruthless domination of the mages of the South through poison, subterfuge, and awesome magics, is said to have looked like a pomegranate in death. “Full of holes,” said the merchant Zustel of Amn, who viewed the body, “holes right through!” Lantan came out the loser in a battle with the bard Tamshan, a grim but gentle man who possessed a spell Lantan wanted. Tamshan still holds the cause of Lantan's demise—a wand of teeth, one of the only seven known to exist.

The origin and method of manufacturing these devices is lost in antiquity, and the few remaining wands are all thought to still possess only a few charges each. Anczibul of Neverwinter spent much of his apprenticeship to the Archmage Khelben “Blackstaff” Arunsun studying Khelben's specimen of the wand, and from his diaries Elminster has decoded the hidden command word of Khelben's wand: “Neverretha.” The “Book of Bulgoz,” written by the Southern merchant of that name, attests that Elzir of Calimshan possessed a wand of teeth and that its word of command was “Orlethar.”

Function: This wand is not rechargeable; it calls forth a certain number of “teeth” (one per charge), firing at targets up to 7" distant. The missiles it fires are daggerlike wedges or blades of force that coalesce out of nothingness within one second of activation. (Actually, Elminster believes they are drawn from material and kinetic energy from the Positive Material Plane.) In the next segment they flash arrow-straight from the tip of the wand to the extent of the wand's range, passing through everything in their paths except spheres of annihilation, prismatic spheres, shield spells, and walls or cubes of force, all of which swallow or absorb them. A forcecage spell, or an existing armor (as in the 1st level magic-user spell or that caused by the wand of armory, see above) deflects a tooth.

A strike by a tooth does 4-14 (2+2d6) points of damage (save vs. spell reduces the damage by half), and strikes (as though a hand weapon directly wielded by the wand-wielder) at +2 to hit. Solid rock deflects a tooth; any other material is struck and damaged by it, although magical items cause any plus they possess to be subtracted from the tooth's hit roll. Wind wall and gust of wind spells, and similar air disturbances (such as those caused by windwalkers or air elementals) have no effect on the flight of a tooth. All classes may employ this wand.

Rods, Staves, and Wands

Wand of Warding

Experience Point Value: 4,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 20,000

Function: This device is not rechargeable. It can perform a variety of spell-like functions, one at a time and only once per round. All such spells are cast as if by a 12th level magic-user, rather than operating at the 6th level of expertise. All such effects emanate from the wand (i.e. the push and shield), and protect (i.e. protection from evil) the wand wielder only. Protection from evil (2 charges), push (1 charge), shield (1 charge), wall of force (4 charges), guards and wards (6 charges), repulsion (5 charges).

Ten percent of such wands cast protection from good rather than protection from evil, but are not themselves aligned, and otherwise operate identically.

Wand of Whips

Experience Point Value: 2,500
Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,000

Lore: First heard of in use by the fell Wizards of Thay, whose wands create red, barbed whips (and have never been known to pass out of the wizards' possession), the secrets of making such wands were passed west through unknown means (probably a renegade apprentice, such as the Adept of Mulmaster or one of the Cowled Wizards of Amn). Mages such as Nelver and Tusprun of the Ten Smokes are known to use such devices. One is thought to have been lost in the Vast Deeps when the sorcerer Alamanth was slain in battle aboard a ship off of Port Llast.

Alamanth set down precise details of the powers and means of using his wand—save for the command word, which is thought to have died with him—and it is from his records that Elminster passes on all details of this type of wand.

Function: This wand shoots forth a whip-shaped field of white, shimmering magical force to a maximum (horizontal and vertical) range of 7". The wielder of the wand names, looks at, or concentrates upon a specific target creature or automaton (i.e., golem, undead, homunculus, or the like), and the whip attacks this creature and this creature only. The whip remains in existence for 4 rounds; if the target is beyond 7" from the wand when it is cast, the whip flashes instantly (in one segment) to the limit of its range, and hangs motionless, waiting, at the point closest to its target. Otherwise the whip strikes once per round, as a Qual's feather token (see DMG) does: at +1 to hit and on damage, doing 2-7 hit points of damage per strike, and binding fast an opponent for 2-7 rounds if a save vs. spell is not made after each successful strike.

Once a whip has bound an opponent, the wand wielder cannot release it to strike again. The whip cannot change targets. A whip may follow an opponent that it has struck at least once beyond 7" moving with the target, even if the target teleports, blinks, plane shifts, enters a rock or plant, etc. The whip can hit invisible and ethereal, but not astral, creatures without penalty. The wand of whips may be recharged. Only magic-users, illusionists, and incantatrixes may wield it.

Whisper's Rod of Transportation

Experience Point Value: 5,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 15,000

This rod, devised by the wizard Whisper, allows the bearer to change his location in but 2 segments. He or she may blink (drains 1 charge), dimension door (drains 2 charges), or teleport (drains 3 charges). Each of these functions may be used twice a day.

Five percent of these rods can also plane shift (drains 5 charges), but the destination is not known to, or under the control of, the rod's employer.

The rod's powers may affect not only the bearer but other creatures and objects in direct physical contact with the bearer, up to a limit of 6660 gp weight. The rod may be deliberately "boosted" to affect 7770 gp weight by the bearer, but this drains 1 additional charge, and drains a magical item (at random) within 2". (If no such item is present, the boost will not work, and someone or something—determine at random—is left behind.)

The rod will not transport objects that are firmly anchored (e.g. walls, most altars, et cetera), and if the rod ever lacks enough charges to fulfil the desired function, a lesser function for which charges remain will operate.

Large groups of people blinking will scatter, blinking randomly apart, unless they maintain firm physical contact.

Swords

Albruin

Experience Point Value: 5,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 25,000

Description: Albruin is a broadsword of a steel/electrum/silver alloy, demonstrably as effective as silver against undead and other creatures who suffer particular effects from contact with that metal. It is +1 to hit and +3 on damage. It sheds an eerie blue radiance (up to 1" radius) when drawn from its scabbard. It is of chaotic neutral alignment (Intelligence 17, Ego 13), communicates by speech (alignment tongue, common, elvish, drow, thieves' cant), and can read languages and magical writing.

Albruin's bearer can, at will, activate—and maintain by concentration—the sword's power to detect invisible objects in a 1" radius. Albruin can also neutralize poison once every three days, and heal its bearer once every 12 days. These powers are evoked at the will of the bearer, or by the sword if the bearer is unconscious and Albruin deems it advantageous to itself to activate either power. Physical contact between Albruin and flesh of the bearer is necessary for the powers to work, but the sword need not be drawn to let it neutralize or heal.

Lore: Albruin is believed to be the creation of the long-dead smith Surdee, who was famous in his day for the craftsmanship of his work that came out of the forges of ice-bound Glistar, where he worked ore fresh from the mines above the city on the edge of the glacier. The blade itself evades questions as to its origins: there are no markings or definite touches of workmanship that identify Albruin as the work of anyone in particular.

Albruin was held for decades in the royal house of Cormyr, kept as a family treasure but seldom (due to its alignment) borne by the kings of that land. It was stolen from the palace at Suzail some ninety winters ago by the thief Nypan ("Nipe"), a halfling who was soon arrested at Wheloon by soldiers of Cormyr and slain when he attempted escape. Nipe did not have the blade when seized, and did not reveal its whereabouts. It was rumored among the thieves of that place that he had sold it to a "grey trader" (fence) by the name of Blusken Shult, who had a merchant barge on the Wyvernwater, and that Blusken had sailed from Wheloon up to a part on the northern shore of the Wyvernwater and delivered the sword to a waiting buyer.

The blade's whereabouts were uncertain for some twenty-four winters, until a lady of high birth in Selgaunt, one Shamur, found the blade left behind in her bedchamber by a visitor fleeing the city guard. He never returned, and Shamur sold it when she married. It was bought by an adventurer visiting the city of Selgaunt on matters of trade (gold for mercenaries) and wielded thereafter in several minor skirmishes about the Eastingreach before its owner died in an ambush. His slayer, the adventurer-prince Thaum of Telflamm, used Albruin to help take the lands of Impiltur forcibly from his father's rule and found his own kingdom. Thaum eventually died by magic (hired by his father Kuskur, who was unable to regain control of the lost lands militarily), and Albruin was acquired by one of Thaum's warriors, who fled the dead king's keep and took the blade back westward into the Dalelands.

This warrior, one Adjuz by name, perished at the hands of brigands on a northern road, and Albruin disappeared from view—but not before Adjuz had sought out a sage (Elminster, of course) in Shadowdale to learn the blade's true nature and powers.

After the death of Adjuz, the trail of the sword is hidden for some eight winters, but it is known to have been in the hands of the mercenary general Malakar on his visit to Zhentil Keep in the spring of the ninth year thereafter, and was identified again by the sage Murail of Sarbreen when a mercenary warrior sought him out to learn the blade's properties in that city some six winters beyond that time. From then to now, the whereabouts of Albruin are unknown, but Elminster is careful to remind us that its plain appearance and its ability to control many of its bearers contribute to this anonymity.

Adjatha, The Drinker

Experience Point Value: 7,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 35,000

Lore: The Drinker is first known to have existed more than four hundred years ago, in the reign of Kurskos Ironhand; it was the sword of that monarch's herald and chief counselor, Amrok of the Dwarves. Kurskos slew Amrok in a night of revelry after one Shieldmeet, and took Adjatha the Drinker—plus the enmity of the dwarves—as his own. Amrok was of almost human stature, and it has often been said Adjatha is of human and not dwarven manufacture, for it is of full size and heft for a strong, long-armed swordsman.

The stories of its making are many and colorful—and most are doubtless as fanciful as the tale told by Thyri of Amn, who looted Adjatha from the palace vaults in the sack of Aumreayum upon the death of Kurskos. Thyri held that Adjatha was given to his grandfather by the gods, and made any of the family who wielded it invulnerable in battle.

Swords

Thyri was easily—almost contemptuously—slain by the first man who challenged him, a merchant from Calimshan. That merchant, whose name is lost, was slain while on caravan soon after by a mischievous kenku. In like manner, The Drinker has often changed hands over the years, usually remaining only a short time with any one owner.

Elminster saw Adjatha forty winters ago at the court of Nesker of Mulmaster, when the sorcerer-king was studying it to increase his own arts. It disappeared before Nesker's death and came to light briefly in reports of fighting in the Shaar, apparently being wielded by one of the nomad chieftains. The sword was stolen from him, and despite sending agents far afield, he was unable to recover it. The present whereabouts of the blade are unknown.

Description: Adjatha is a +2 long sword of fine blue steel, hilted with steel in single cross-quillon and a plain, spherical, polished knob pommel. Set in the heart of the tang, where the quillons meet just above the fine chain-wrapping of the hilt, is a large (one-inch diameter) cabochon-cut black sapphire (worth 6,000 gp). There are no known markings or runes on the blade, and it does not shed any radiance.

However, upon touching any magical item (not including scrolls, but including potions if these are poured over the blade or it is immersed in them) Adjatha siphons off magical energy, causing the item in question to glow, shedding a pale green-white radiance, until the item is drained of dweomer or the sword and the item are separated.

The Drinker can never permanently drain an artifact or an item with permanent magical abilities, such as another magic sword; but it can steal the magic of lesser items. In all cases, the touch of Adjatha causes one power or effect per round of contact of the item to be nullified for 1-4 turns after contact. If the item has limited charges, or operates but once, sufficient contact with Adjatha can drain it entirely of magic at a rate of one charge or use per round. The blade absorbs the dweomer into itself in a peculiar way, retaining magical energy to protect itself and its bearer.

Per charge drained or round of contact, Adjatha gains 2 "hit points." It has 9 "hit points" worth of personal strength, and may add any magically drained points to its own, without known limit. Any attacks on Adjatha or its bearer must exhaust these phantom "hit points" before they can harm the physical entities of blade or bearer. When reduced to its original 9 hit points, Adjatha cannot absorb further harm to its bearer, and is itself vulnerable. Anyone grasping the grip of Adjatha can receive its hit point protection; there is room for a maximum of two bare human hands to grasp the grip at one time.

Adjatha cannot repeatedly drain the vitality of the same item; after two contacts with any single item, the Drinker cannot drain anything more from it—but a contact, if uninterrupted, can continue for up to 1 turn before any bearer must withdraw or risk the onset of a feble-mindedness due to magical backlash (non-cumulative 10% chance each round beyond one turn of continuous contact). Drained "hit points" gained by Adjatha in no way cure existing damage to its bearer, but merely absorb all further attacks until exhausted.

Adjatha cannot drain or negate spells cast at it or its bearer; it confers immunity to psionic domination, charm spells, and similar direct mind-control spells. This immunity does not extend to sleep, suggestion, ESP, and the like.

Arbane's Sword of Agility

Experience Point Value: 4,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 15,000

Lore: The first of these swords was created by the elf wizard-lord Arbane of Myth Drannor many centuries ago. His first was stolen from him, so he made a second with the aid of an apprentice, who sold the secret to two other magic-user/swordsmiths. The form of manufacture is thought to be forgotten now—Elminster has heard of no one making one in the last five hundred years—but there are over a dozen in existence. Some have even been created with sentience and further powers.

Description: This is a +2 weapon which boasts several powers. These are under the mental control of whoever holds its hilt. The wielder can jump, as in the spell (a single leap) twice a day. Two rounds of hasted action per 24 hours are also possible—and such activity does not age the character (though it may age the sword).

The sword grants the wielder immunity to hold and slow spells and glows brightly. This glow fluctuates as the sword moves and strikes, in a strobe-like manner; this property of the sword negates magical darkness, and destroys the effects of hypnotic pattern or fire charm within a 20' radius of the drawn blade. The wielder of the sword gets a saving throw vs. color spray (and saves at +1 if 6th level or higher).

SWORDS

Demonbane

Experience Point Value: 4,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 20,000

Legend speaks of a great, many-hued blade of which the origin has been forgotten, but which was wielded by the great paladin Nord in his single-handed destruction of the Citadel of Conjurers. It is written that he overthrew succubi and glaberzu "beyond number" with his sword Demonbane, and caused the summoned demon-lord Ndulu to flee from this plane. Demonbane earned its name in this battle, but its whereabouts now are unknown. Nord disappeared shortly after the fall of the citadel, and "not a stone of his keep remained when the sun rose that morning," or so write the sages.

With Demonbane in hand, a warrior is rendered immune to all enchantment/charm spells cast by demons, and gains a +3 bonus on saving throws vs. other magical attacks by demons. The user also becomes unusually alert, and can only be surprised with a roll of 1 on a d12.

Demonbane glows with a cold, blue light (equal to a light spell in effect) when brought within 60' of a demon, and emits no light at any other time. It can cause a demon's amulet to shatter at a touch (amulet must save vs. disintegration).

The weapon is a bastard sword with a +3 bonus to hit and damage normally, improving to +5 when used against demonkind. Only fighters and cavaliers and good-aligned members of their subclasses may use this weapon; it falls immediately from the grasp of anyone else who tries to seize it. Naturally, this sword has earned the utter hatred of all demons and can be identified at a glance by any of them. Anyone using this sword gains the instant and permanent wrath of all demons who see him, and they communicate the sword's location and ownership to all their fellows.

Ilbratha, "Mistress of Battles"

Experience Point Value: 1,500

Gold Piece Sale Value: 7,500

Description: Ilbratha is a bronze short sword with a row of six matched bloodstones set into the helve of the blade on its left face. Each bloodstone is worth 70 gold pieces; as an undamaged set of stones, they might bring 500 to 600 gold pieces if sold shrewdly. Ilbratha does not glow and bears no inscription. It is +1 to hit and +1 on damage, and when grasped by a fighter of any alignment, its powers are communicated telepathically to the holder. This is a feature of its magical manufacture; it is not sentient.

Ilbratha gains its nickname from its powers, which are very useful in combat. When grasped (flesh to handgrip) and mentally ordered, Ilbratha can with its bearer jump (as in the spell, 1 leap only) three times per day, blink itself and its bearer once per day, and create a mirror image of itself and its bearer once per day.

It also rings like a struck chime or tubular bell when it is touching magic; this includes spell effects from devices and physical contact from enchanted items, but not physical effects (such as a stinking cloud or a gust of wind) caused by an already-cast spell. This power is a warning only, and is no way a protection against magic.

Lore: Ilbratha was created by unknown hands at the behest of Azoun I, long-dead king of Cormyr. He bore it once into battle, at Ithmong in his war with Tethyr, and then lost it in a storm that wrecked his ship on the rocks of the Neck.

The sword was found by fishermen of Teziir and sold to a rich merchant, Sevan of Anmwater. He took it west on caravan along the Trader's Road and the river Chionthar to Scornubel, where he sold it to Phelas Urm, a merchant of Thentia. Phelas brought it overland through Cormyr, where it was recognized in Arabel. Agents of King Azoun attempted to recover it, and slew Phelas, but in the confusion the blade was lost (or stolen by one of the agents for himself).

All trace of it was lost until, two hundred winters later, the sage Thallastam of Procampur was offered the blade for 1,500 gold pieces by a peddler from a nearby town who seemed ignorant of its true nature. Thallastam brought the blade to Elminster in Shadowdale, the only fellow Loremaster interested in swords whom Thallastam trusted.

Elminster identified the blade from the writings of Azoun I (the old king's great-grandson had then just come to the throne), and Thallastam bore it back toward Procampur by way of Tilver's Gap and Essemra. But he was never seen again, and did not reach Procampur. His ruined diary, staff, and a skeleton were found some years later when the Pool of Yeven in Battledale was dragged, but the sword was not found. Elminster believes it is in the hands of brigands, or perhaps mercenaries, who have not drawn the blade in battle near the Dales.

Swords

Namarra, "The Sword That Never Sleeps"

Experience Point Value: 2,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 10,000

Description: Namarra is a long sword (+2 to hit, +4 to damage) of fine steel forging. It glows with a pale mauve radiance when drawn, and it spits white sparks when striking other metal. On one side of the blade is etched in common: Namarra, and on the other face: Never Sleeps. The bearer may, at will, evoke the sword's power to emanate silence 15' radius.

Namarra is as heavy as a normal weapon, but floats on top of any liquid—fresh water, brine, oil, wine—it has so far been dropped into. The sword has no alignment or sentience.

Lore: Namarra appears in many legends and tall tales, but the term "The Sword That Never Sleeps" appears to be derived from the inscription on the blade, not from any specific property of the sword. Its origin is unknown; Namarra appears to have existed for as long as tales have survived, wielded by such mythic heroes as Eth and Brensyl the Tall. Even the most critical of sages (Kumur the Skeptic, First Speaker of Evernoster) cannot determine Namarra's probable time or place of origin, or find any references in the tales of a world to a time "before Namarra was forged."

Within the last five hundred years, Namarra has been the blade of Serrus the Great, founder of Amn, and a blade borne there by his descendants for three generations; the fourth, Ereskas, bore Namarra north to found the city of Mirabar.

Ereskas died without issue, and Namarra was carefully preserved atop his tomb in the city. There it remained for sixty years, until Mirabar was overrun and plundered in the Goblin Wars. The goblin chieftain Nethaug seized the sword and bore it back to a ravine that the goblins, who were subsequently almost eradicated from the North, still hold today.

The blade remained in goblin hands for almost two hundred seasons, until a goblin named Ghaur was slain by a band of adventurers—the Company of the Gryphon. The leader, a warrior called Flar, gave the blade to Thulmar One-Eye of Port Llast in exchange for training some eighty winters ago.

Thulmar bore the blade until his death in the Cold Winter, whereupon it passed to the Mistress of Port Llast, Stormraven the Proud Queen. Stormraven, who rode and fought at the head of her men with her jet-black hair flowing wildly about her, briefly made Port Llast great. She is fondly remembered by old warriors, and will live long in fireside tales. At length she married a former foe, Parldulph of Neverwinter, and gave Namarra to her son Rivenhelm.

Rivenhelm became one of the greatest knights, and eventually passed the sword on to Tamper Tencoin, an adventurer. Tencoin stood over the wounded knight in battle with the mercenary Company of the Flaming Fist for most of a day in a vain attempt to save Rivenhelm's life. The tiny band held on til nightfall, when the mercenaries fell back and drove in their tracking dogs to ravage the wounded enemy. Rivenhelm handed Namarra to Tencoin in the darkness and said, "This is yours, now." Leaving a trail of blood behind him, Rivenhelm crawled forward to choke the life out of one dog and died under the jaws of half a dozen more.

Tencoin lost the blade when he was poisoned in the Whistling Wizard Inn four winters ago. The poison made him mad for days, and when he returned to sanity, the blade was gone. Elminster, who saw the blade when Tencoin visited Shadowdale some years before this event, believes it was stolen by local thieves and will soon turn up again. And when it does, Tamper Tencoin will come looking for it.

Shazzellim

Experience Point Value: 1,000
Gold Piece Sale Value: 5,000

Description: A scimitar of rather poor steel but keen edge, with a guard of iron curved into rearing serpents. Its grip is of leather, dyed red, but this may now have been replaced or be brown with age. Shazzellim is neutral evil, has an intelligence of 16 and an ego of 14, and communicates by speech (alignment tongue, common, thieves' cant, orcish). It is +1 to hit, can detect magic in a 1" radius if the bearer so wills while wielding it unsheathed, and in like manner can locate object in a 12" radius. It can also detect secret doors in a 1/2" radius at the bearer's will, and read any non-magical languages or into the hands of Lhemako's superior, Meer. The scimitar does not seem to have passed on to Meer's superiors in Zhentil Keep (unless one of the lords of that city is hiding it from his fellow lords for some reason), and may have been stolen, hidden, or passed to another by Meer before his disappearance.

SWORDS

The "Singing Sword"

Experience Point Value: 1,600

Gold Piece Sale Value: 10,000

Lore: It is rumored that these relatively recent additions to the armories of the world were created for use by the Harpers. Certainly the primary attribute of the sword has to be created with some connivance of one or more bards. With their usual taciturnity, the Harpers are not taking any credit for them, and no bard has actually been seen using one—though this may be more a factor of a dislike of competition than holding the sword in disfavor as a sword.

Description: This is a silver bastard sword that sings constantly, and loudly, while drawn. It is +3, but this may be temporarily negated by magical silence. While the song is heard, the bearer of this sword is infused with a sense of confidence and excitement, and never checks morale. The song confers upon the bearer immunity to charm, command, confusion, fear, friends, repulsion, scare, and suggestion. Emotion cast on the bearer only evokes a rage result (focussed on the spell caster). The sword's song can still shriekers and negate the song effect of harpies, but a bard can easily negate its powers by singing a counter-harmony. The sword's song can entrance intelligent creatures of up to 2 hit dice (not including undead or creatures from other planes). If such creatures fail to save versus spells, they are subject to a suggestion from the sword's bearer.

Anyone capable of using a sword can use these swords, though it is rumored that some have been created with sentience and alignment, usually good.

Susk, "The Silent Sword"

Experience Point Value: 2,500

Gold Piece Sale Value: 12,500

Lore: Susk is a blade mentioned repeatedly in tales and legends of the north. Its origin is unknown—and curiously, never mentioned in any folklore—but it seems to have always been around in the hands of someone or other. Its present whereabouts are a mystery; the sage Elminster can speak of its location with certainty only over a short span of time beginning some twenty winters ago, when he recognized it in the hands of Abadda, a prince of the Fallen Kingdom, who was then a proud wanderer and bandit leader.

Abadda was challenged by Distyl of Nesme at the court of Alustriel, High Lady of Silverymoon, in Elminster's presence. During the fight that followed, Elminster and at least one other—the adventurer Urnen of Yartar—recognized the blade for what it was.

Abadda was slain in combat, and Distyl rightfully took the sword. Shortly thereafter, he was found dead by his campfire on the Trollmoors, and Urnen was seen in Longsaddle not much afterward, brandishing a blade that demonstrably was Susk—to Urnen's eternal dismay: when he let it go involuntarily in a tavern brawl, it hung in midair, beyond his grasp, as he was dragged to the floor and stabbed to death.

A local bully, Usk Harpell, claimed the blade, but was found dead in a nearby alley within the night, the blade gone. It disappeared from view at that time, but recent reports from Shadowdale (some six winters back) and Mulmaster (some two winters back) suggest that the strange blade is still "changing hands the hard way" among the adventurers and caravan merchants of the Realms.

Description: Susk is a slim long sword of fine make and good (oil-) slaked steel, devoid of adornment or inscription. It does not glow of itself or even reflect light, so that it does not appear to be metal from afar. Its nickname comes maps. It will heal its bearer once per day, at the bearer's will, and has a special purpose: to slay bards. Any bard struck by Shazzellim is disintegrated unless the victim saves vs. spell.

Lore: Shazzellim was created by (or at least under the orders and with the assistance of) Lauzoril of the Red Wizards of Thay, in order to destroy his enemies, the Harpers. The cause of Lauzoril's enmity toward the Harpers is unknown.

Elminster saw Shazzellim when Ahlzul, a captain of the armies of Thay, brought it to Archendale to slay the ranger Dove. Mistakenly, Ahlzul attacked the wrong woman—the knight Jasilmer—and was himself slain. Ahlzul's men recovered Shazzellim and their captain's body, but were later killed by men of Archendale over a code-of-conduct dispute.

Shazzellim disappeared from view briefly, was later identified by the sage Helavaster of Hillsfar when brought to that city by the caravan master Lhemako Tarsakh, and subsequently passed from its magical silence: the sword never rings, clatters, scrapes, or emits any sound. A blade struck against it may ring, but Susk itself remains silent. This silence in no way affects creatures, spells, objects, or any area around the blade, including its bearer.

SWORDS

Susk is +3 to hit, but does normal long sword damage. It has no apparent intelligence or sentience, and only one other magical property—it levitates involuntarily. That is, it can never rise, fall, or move in any way by itself, but always remains stationary when released, even if in midair. It can be moved while so floating by being struck with other objects, or by magical means (such as telekinesis), but stops quickly when such force is removed.

Susk cannot therefore be effectively hurled at an opponent, or tossed away to prevent its capture—it stops mere inches from the point of release and hangs in midair. There is no known limit to, or way to nullify, this power. If grasped by the hilt, Susk stops levitating, even if the grasper wants it to continue. On the other hand, objects no more than twice its 3-pound weight can be hung on its blade and it remains in midair. Any further weight causes it to descend to the nearest flat surface at varying rates of speed, depending on how much weight has been put on it. Anything over 60 pounds causes it to fall at normal speeds.

Any creature may grasp (and if not a spell caster to whom cold steel is forbidden, wield) Susk without harm. It confers no magic resistance or spell immunities upon the bearer.

Syrar's Silver Sword

Experience Point Value: 1,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 4,000

This +1 silver weapon employs a combination of spells devised by the archmage Syrar. These magics allow the blade to breach the barriers between planes in much the same manner as a cockatrice and similar animals do. Thus, it can strike targets on the astral and ethereal planes which are susceptible to magical weapon attacks. But when so wielded (user on the prime material, target on another plane) it is treated as a normal weapon to hit. The +1 to damage applies in all cases.

Anyone holding the sword can see into either the astral or ethereal plane (one at a time) at will, viewing a spherical area with a 3" radius centered on the tip of the drawn blade. The user need not employ the sword offensively in order to be able to use the viewing power; thus, clerics and magic-users can make use of this ability of the sword. However, such viewing can only be maintained for a number of rounds equal to the holder's intelligence, plus 1-4 additional rounds, and the viewing ability only functions once per day, regardless of the length of time each viewing is sustained.

Only the sword itself, and never any part of the wielder, any other physical object or form of attack or spell, can reach into the other planes. To creatures residing on the other planes, the weapon is clearly visible whenever drawn, and its bearer appears as a shadowy, indistinct figure which they may reach through the planes to attack, but at -2 to hit.

The viewing ability also works for users on the astral and ethereal planes with respect to their ability to see into the Prime Material and the plane they are not in at the moment.

Taragarth, "The Bloodbrand"

Experience Point Value: 1,000

Gold Piece Sale Value: 5,000

Description: Taragarth is a bastard sword, of steel fire-blackened along the length of the blade so that only the sharpened edges gleam. On the base of the blade, just ahead of the simple crossbar guard, is a rune etched into the metal. The rune is non-magical and evidently the mark of the blade's maker, but who the maker is has been lost over time.

Taragarth requires strength and stature to wield. While it is held unsheathed, the bearer is protected from fire (effects equal a ring of fire resistance) and is protected by a feather fall if descending 10' or more precipitously.

Taragarth strikes normally but does +3 damage. It does not glow and is not sentient. While gripping Taragarth (even sheathed), the bearer is protected from ESP and detection spells (including know alignment). Such spells simply have no effect. This protection does not affect charm, sleep, other control-related spells, or psionic attacks.

Lore: Taragarth was forged by Elfgar of Silvermoon in the early days of the North, and was given to the champion Aeroth when he led the armies of the kingdoms of the North against the trolls of the Evermoors. The might of the trolls was broken at the Long Battle (of nine days duration) across the moors, and Taragarth was brandished aloft bloodily so often by the valiant Aeroth that it was dubbed "The Bloodbrand."

Much later, when Aeroth was grey-bearded, Rayuth of Silvermoon died, and the throne passed to his son. Aeroth, grieving for his lord (and none-too-fond of the sadistic, proud, Tulven Rayuthson), took ship west from Waterdeep, sailing first to the isle of Toaridge-at-the-Sun's-Setting and later to the Moonshae Isles. There, with his wife and six sons, Aeroth founded the city of Vlan. His descendants, the nucleus of a group swelled by other disenchanting or dispossessed mainlanders, were to become the feuding merchant houses of the Moonshae Isles.

But Aeroth's sword was not seen on his voyage, and most legends hold that he left it in Silvermoon, where it has been lost in some concealed hoard or in one of the many warren-like caverns beneath the city. A few sages know that, in truth, Aeroth hid the blade in a ruined well on the island of Toaridge so that his argumentative sons would not fight over it.

Swords

There it lay while ages passed, until an exploration party of illithids found it and carried it to their underground city on the mainland near what is now Beregost. There it was studied for only a short time before a band of adventurers plundered much of the city and gained it.

The names of the adventurers are now lost; one was a fighter who later took service in the merchant-guards of Amn and died battling bandits on the banks of the Sulduskoon river. It seems likely that he bore Taragarth, but no word of it can be found after it (presumably) fell into the hands of the bandits, until a wandering peddler offered it for sale in a market at Berdusk. It brought 400 pieces of gold from an adventurer who recognized it, but he mistakenly told a companion what he thought the sword was, and was dead by the next morning. So was the companion, murdered in turn by the assassin Turl.

Turl carried the blade north to the city of Scornubel, using it to pay off a debt to his guildmaster Iritan. Little is known of Iritan, who evidently ruled the guild with an iron hand for more than twenty winters. One spring he appeared in Waterdeep, dying of poisoned wounds, and gave the blade, plus more wealth, to the wizard Marune. Much of Marune's wealth was lost in subsequent upheavals, and the Bloodbrand fell into the hands of an unknown someone in Waterdeep. Where it traveled then is not known, but four winters ago it was brought to Elminster for examination when he was visiting Westgate by a swarthy, much-scarred fighting man of Calimshan who gave his name as Vulph. The present whereabouts of Vulph and of the blade Taragarth are unknown.

Weapons

Darts of Branding

Experience Points Value: 200

Gold Piece Sale Value: 1,500

When thrown, darts of branding burst into blinding flame unquenchable by water or cold, and this conflagration leaves a branded mark where such a dart strikes. These marks may be shaped by careful construction of the dart into runes or devices (and usually are). The dartfire consumes the weapon and does 5-9 points more damage than normal darts. Non-fire-resistant creatures get no save vs. this fiery damage, but the dartfire is relatively feeble and will do no damage if the target is protected by a resist fire, dispel magic, or more powerful protective spell. Darts of branding can pass undamaged through a wall of fire, however, and will derive additional heat from the wall, doing 1 point of additional damage for every 1" (and remaining fractions) of flames they pass through. Flame strike and flame arrow spells have no effect on darts of branding.

Creating Magical Items

As described in the DMG, a magic-user must first use the enchant an item spell to prepare the materials for the item, then put the spell in the item, then apply a permanency spell to make it a permanent magical item. Unfortunately for the enthusiastic young wizard ready to start up production with his enchant an item and permanency spells, there are two ingredients in the above procedure that call for both long hours of research and bravery on the part of the magic-user or his hirelings. The first ingredient is the materials, the second is the spell.

Materials for Items

The DMG states that the magic-user must obtain new, "pure" items of great expense to put spells into to create a magical item. Not mentioned there, but implied in the description of how to make a potion, the item-maker must obtain parts of magical creatures that either perform the same functions as the item is to perform, or are in some way connected with the function of the item.

A partial list of necessary ingredients is found in the DMG in the discussion of making magic potions. Just as a potion of giant control needs part of the brain of the appropriate giant, a ring of human influence must have human brain material in its manufacture. Since such material is perishable, the magic-user must either petrify it to use in the setting of the ring, or supervise the making of the ring and use the material in the alloy of the ring itself.

And, since the aforesaid ring of human influence also adds to the charisma of a character, as well as lets him control humans, the brain matter used must be that of a great leader of some humanoid race. A wizard cannot be sure that a purveyor of magical ingredients will truly have the right sort of brain matter, so he must effectively gather it himself, either by killing or participating in the killing of an enemy leader of great reputation, or robbing the tomb of some great leader (adding to the danger of this activity is the fact that the tomb must usually be recent—otherwise there is no surety that the ingredients are still present). Both activities are fraught with potential disaster for the magic-user and involve activities that are repugnant to a lawful-good adventurer. This is one reason such rings are usually found on the fingers of chaotic evil magic-users and their minions.

Other items do not use such cannibalistic ingredients, but acquiring them is still a major adventure in itself. For instance, a ring of X-ray vision needs the eye of an umber hulk or xorn (both creatures use X-ray vision to find their way while burrowing through the earth), which again must be petrified before being used as the setting in the ring.

A ring of fire resistance needs salamander scales; a figurine of wondrous power needs the original animal (most of which are no longer available in the Realms, and must be created with a polymorph others spell); a periapt of proof against poison needs unicorn horn; all of these are relatively easy to find, if difficult to acquire. The components for other items are much more difficult to determine and, as is mentioned in several descriptions in this book, the exact materials necessary have often been lost. Usually they call for a part of an animal or tree or mineral whose properties are not well known.

Purity of Materials

Another limit on materials already discussed is their purity. All authorities on the making of magical items agree that this purity is vital. A ring made for enchanting cannot be made from metal used for any other purpose. It must be taken from the ore and made into the ring directly.

In actual fact, using secondhand materials does not necessarily preclude the enchanting of an item. However, it does have an influence on the item. Any artifact (not meaning the major magical item, just anything made by hand for use) picks up the aura of the person who handled it before and the pattern of use of its previous incarnation. Thus, it is difficult to "convince" silver that has been tableware that it must be a magical ring of invisibility. It is part of the function of tableware, after all, to be seen. In normal crafting, this is not a real problem, but the intrusion of magic into the making awakens these auras and patterns and seems to give materials a mind of their own.

For this reason, the next best thing to pure materials is the remnants of a magical item which fulfilled a similar purpose to that needed. Thus, the remnants of a magic sword can be used to make a new magic sword, the remnants of a ring of invisibility are good for making a new ring of invisibility, and so forth. However, unless the intent is to make an exact duplicate of the previous object, there must be pure materials alloyed with the reused ones, or the dweomer may come out somewhat different from that intended. Also note that just because an object had a particular enchantment in a previous form does not mean that the new enchanting does not have to re-enchant the object for that ability. Once a magical item is broken, the enchantment is lost, and simply reforming it does not bring the dweomer back.

Correspondence Between Monetary Value and Magical Worth

If the DM wants to make a direct relationship between the value of the materials and the effectiveness of the enchanting, assume that the value of the materials must be equal in thousands of g.p. to the level of the spell contained by the item. If there is more than one spell, then the value must be equal to the levels of all the spells. If the item is Intelligent, the materials must also be worth the Intelligence rating -10 in thousands of g.p.

This value of materials may have nothing whatsoever to do with the g.p. value of the magical items found in the DMG and UNEARTHED ARCANA. This is because the value given in those books is that which the player characters can get by selling the item. Buying the materials to make the item is bound to be more expensive.

This value may be just the value of the material, or the value of the workmanship done to bring the material up to standard. Of course, a magic user can avoid this cost entirely by going out and mining or gathering or hunting his own materials and then working it himself, but the first is tedious and dangerous, and the second means that he has to have the secondary skill (DMG, pg. 12) to finish the product. If he has that skill, and can make a roll of the average of his Intelligence and Dexterity or less, then he can do the finishing work himself. If he does not have the skill, then he must get a craftsman to do it for him, at the usual rates. Note the effect of having someone else handle the material on the final saving throw or the Magical Item Creation Saving Throw Table (inside back cover).

If he has the skill but does not make the necessary roll, then the material is ruined and he must try again.

The Actual Effects of Materials

Making magical items is a tricky thing in any case. As stated in the description of the enchant an item spell in the PLAYERS HANDBOOK, the completed item must make a saving throw versus magic equal to the spell caster's or the whole enchanting process is a failure. There are a number of things that can influence that saving throw versus magic, as shown in the Magical Item Creation Saving Throw Table (inside back cover).

Unique Spells for Items

And of course, all the previous discussion has ignored the other major ingredient for magical items, the spell(s) that go into the item to make it magical. Simply having the correct materials, such as a petrified (and probably reduced) umber hulk eye for a ring of X-ray vision means nothing if the magic-user does not have the spell of X-ray vision to put into the ring.

Perusing the PLAYERS HANDBOOK and UNEARTHED ARCANA will not produce such a spell. It is also not among those given in the unique spellbooks of the Forgotten Realms found here and in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ DM'S Sourcebook. It is a unique spell and the magic user must either find it by following the spell research guidelines given in the AD&D® game rules or find a spell book that does have the spell.

If the DM wants the creation of such common (in the magical item tables) magical items more accessible to players, he can assign his own parameters to the spell and add it to the normal spell list for his campaign. He can make the spell common, rare, or unique, as described in The Spells of the Forgotten Realms section of this book.

If he does not want any casual magic-user wandering about with the spell, he might assign very cumbersome components (such as a 4' x 4' x 2" slab of lead—or radium, if you want to introduce mutation to the campaign—for X-ray vision) that no adventuring magic-user could possibly carry around with him.

Time for Creating Magical Items

The time needed to enchant a magic item is given in the PLAYERS HANDBOOK and repeated here to have all the necessary references in one place.

Casting time for the enchant an item spell is between 24 and 80 hours, split up into 8-hour days. Each spell placed in the item takes 8-16 hours per spell level after the initial enchant an item spell has been cast. Each spell must be started within 24 hours after the previous one has been cast, or it cannot be added at all. Of course a permanency spell is necessary to finish the job.

The Risk of Creating Magical Items

When the enchanter puts the permanency spell on the item, he (not the item) must make a saving throw versus spells. If unsuccessful, the permanency does not work and there is a magical backlash which affects the Constitution of the magic-user, decreasing it permanently by 1 point. The magic-user's saving throw result is increased by 1 for every spell in the item. Thus a wizard with a saving throw of 4 who is trying to enchant a sword with 7 spells in it has a saving throw of 11 or more. Even an item with one spell increases the saving throw by 1.

Creating Magical Items

The Reward of Creating Magical Items

Besides possession of the magical item (which he may have been making for someone else), the wizard who makes such an item gains Experience Points equal to twice the given XP value of the item. Thus, a wizard who creates bracers of defense AC 4 gains 6,000 XP.

Limitations of Magical Items

Limits on Wands and Staves

Wand damage effects are limited to those of a 6th level magic-user. Their fireballs, lightning bolts, and the like are all much weaker than the same effects performed by the creating wizard.

The reason for this is simple toughness of material. Even a spell waiting to be released, as with a wand's fireball, has a certain potential energy. Nothing the size of a wand, no matter what its materials, can contain that energy if it is too large. It is actually possible to make wands with larger individual payloads, such as 7, 8 or even 10 dice per shot, but the capacity of the wand is reduced by half with each increase in dice. Thus, a wand holding 7d6 fireballs has a maximum capacity of 50, one holding 8d6 fireballs has a maximum capacity of 25, one holding 9d6 effects has a maximum capacity of 12, and so forth.

Moreover, there is a certain inherent instability even with the reduced number of charges. A wand with 7d6 charges has a 5% chance of blowing up (with the same effects as a retributive strike with a staff of power) with any sharp blow, an 8d6 wand has a 10% chance, a 9d6 has a 20% chance, and so forth. Thus, the maximum effect possible in a wand is 12d6, which has only one charge and a 95% chance of blowing up if struck with a sharp blow (normally, this would be a 160% chance, but there is always a 5% chance the blowup will not happen).

Rods and staves are sturdier than wands, but even they have their limits. Rods rarely contain damage-causing spells, so they often have high-powered effects, but staves are generally restricted to 8d6 effects, as if being done by an 8th level magic user. They have the same limits as a wand as to number of charges before disaster occurs, but being sturdier, they do not start becoming unstable unless 9th or higher power spells are placed within them. Thus, like a wand, the most powerful staff has one spell causing 12d6 of damage, but unlike a wand, it has only a 40% chance of blowing up if struck by a sharp blow.

Time Limits on Items

Wizards have also found it impossible to make items that perform major activities more than a few times a day. The permanency spell can allow a sword to let its bearer use a sensory power any time he wants to, but any power/spell taking real energy, such as a strength spell, is limited to one use a day, just as if the sword had to memorize the spell. It is possible to put more than one use of the spell into the object, but each use is a separate spell, and the magic-user must have them ready at the time of the enchantment.

Intelligent Items

Any sword with Intelligence is imbued with the spirit of a sentient being. This being is not necessarily human or nonhuman, it simply has to have enough intelligence to react to its sensory input and give its user some idea of what is happening.

These spirits do not normally remember any past life they may have had. If the magical item maker wants to let the spirit remember its previous existence, he may do so, but there are stories of weapons with Intelligence who knew they had been free, and the revenge they exacted on their makers.

There are two ways of creating these spirits. One involves using a speak to dead spell to summon a spirit, then use the enchant an item spell to put that spirit in the magical item. Some mages make killing the person first part of the ritual, but these are chaotic-evil wizards.

The main problem with this necromantic system is that the spirit gets a saving throw versus death equal to that which it would have had in life. If the saving throw is successful, the spirit is not put into the item, and is freed to wander the world as a ghost. He automatically becomes a vengeful ghost, and cannot be laid to rest again until the person who summoned him is slain, permanently.

The other way is somewhat riskier for the magic-user. What he does is essentially put his Intelligence into the item. This involves a special use of the magic jar and enchant an item spells. The magic user must make a saving throw versus death or his entire spirit goes into the item and his body dies. If the enchanting is successful, the item has an Intelligence equal to that of the magic-user.

It is not necessary for the wizard to risk his life for this enchantment; he can use a consenting partner (including an animal such as a dog) to provide the Intelligence for the item, with the volunteer taking the risks. The saving throw versus death for the volunteer, and the saving throw versus spells for the enchanted item, is that of the volunteer, not the magic-user, which usually means a reduced chance of success.

Rings of protection, protection from evil spells, and any other magical method of increasing the saving throw do not work in these circumstances. The throw must be that of the user, without any magical aid.

Dogs are favorite beasts for creating intelligence 12 and 13 swords, since they are oriented toward sensing things of interest to their masters.

Swords with more intelligence need higher-intelligence spirits. Moreover, each plus beyond one for the sword means that the source of the Intelligence must have 4 fighter levels for each plus on the sword. If the source of the spirit is a cleric, druid or monk each six levels equals one plus; a thief or assassin needs eight levels per plus, and a magic-user or illusionist must have ten levels for every plus on the weapon.

MAGICAL ITEM CREATION SAVING THROW TABLE

Influences	Modifier
Magic-User's Bonuses	+1 - +3
Item handled by others during fabrication	-1/handler
Materials previously used for similar item	- 2
Materials previously used for same item	- 1
Materials previously used for dissimilar item	-10
Perishable materials old before fabrication begins	-1/day
Each 1,000 gp. below the needed value for material	- 1
Each 10,000 g.p. above the needed value for material	+1
Other influences as determined by DM*	+3 - -10

* The DM may assign other influences such as right or wrong time of the year, magical influences from surrounding environment, attempts at sabotage from rivals, and so forth.

Effects of Missed Saving Throw

A missed saving throw versus magic in making an object does not necessarily mean that the object is not enchanted. It only means that the object is not exactly what the magic-user wanted. As stated in the enchant an item spell description, a saving throw roll of a 1 on d20 means total failure, but a missed roll that does not result in a 1 can mean almost anything.

Cursed items can arise from such failed rolls. So can items that work almost as wished, but have a few flaws, such as a ring of invisibility that only makes the wearer invisible, not his clothes and gear, or a sword that arbitrarily shifts alignment from day to day, or shifts its pluses to hit.

Advanced Dungeons & Dragons®

Official Game Accessory

Source Book for the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

The Magister

by Ed Greenwood and Steve Perrin

From Waterdeep and the Sword Coast to the jungles of Chult and the faraway lands of Thay, strange and powerful magics fill the Forgotten Realms. Ancient tomes, powerful spells, fearsome weapons—all these and more await adventurers who can overcome terrible dangers to wield great power.

Ed Greenwood, originator of the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ game world, and famous game designer Steve Perrin have spent many long days with Elminster of Shadowdale, perhaps the finest sage in the long history of Abeir-Toril. The result of all this work is in your hands: The Magister is a compilation of new spells and items for your FORGOTTEN REALMS™ campaign.

Some of the new magics described in The Magister were first published in numerous “Elminster” articles in DRAGON® magazine. The best of these, along with many new fabulous spells and items, appear in this volume.

©1988 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

Printed in the U.S.A.

TSR, Inc.
POB 756
Lake Geneva,
WI 53147 USA

TSR UK Ltd.
The Mill, Bathmore Road
Cambridge CB1 4AD
United Kingdom

ISBN 0-88038-564-2

0 46363 09229 0

FORGOTTEN REALMS™

Official Campaign Accessory

The Savage Frontier

by Paul Jaquays

An Accessory for Characters of All Levels
for use with the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

TSR, Inc.
PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION™

ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS, AD&D, FORGOTTEN REALMS, PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION, and the TSR logo are trademarks owned by TSR, Inc.

Advanced Dungeons & Dragons®

OFFICIAL GAME ACCESSORY

The Savage Frontier

by Paul Jaquays

Table of Contents

Introduction to the Savage Frontier2	Maps
Savage Frontier Overview	5	Economic Map of the North	7
The Peoples of the North	18	Ruins of Ascore	inside cover
Cities, Towns, and Villages	28	Grandfather Tree	inside cover
The Sea, the Ice, and the Islands	35	Hellgate Keep	inside cover
Lost Lands, Strongholds, and Ruins	39	Luskan	inside cover
Rivers, Mountains, and Rough Lands	45	Typical Ancestor Mounds	inside cover
The High Forest	49	The City of Waterdeep	outside gatefold
Uthgardt Ancestor Mounds	53	Icewind Dale	Trackless Sea map
Personalities of the North	56	The Ten Towns	Trackless Sea map
Appendices		Silvermoon	Trackless Sea map
Appendix A: Magical Items	60	Beorunna's Well	Trackless Sea map
Appendix B: Northern Proficiencies	60	Hall of Mists	64
Appendix C: News of the Land	61
Appendix D: Adventures in the Savage Frontier	63

Credits:

Editing: Karen S. Boomgarden
Cartography: Dave Sutherland,
Dennis Kauth,
& Paul Jaquays

Cover Art: Larry Elmore
Typography: Kim Janke
Interior Art: Esteban Maroto
Keylining: Stephanie Tabat

TSR, Inc.
POB 756
Lake Geneva,
WI 53147 USA

TSR UK Ltd.
The Mill, Rathmore Road
Cambridge CB1 4AD
United Kingdom

ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS, AD&D, FORGOTTEN REALMS, BATTLESYSTEM, PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION, and the TSR logo are trademarks owned by TSR, Inc.

Distributed to the book trade in the United States by Random House, Inc., and in Canada by Random House of Canada, Ltd. Distributed to the toy and hobby trade by regional distributors. Distributed in the United Kingdom by TSR UK Ltd.

This material is protected under the copyright laws of the United States of America. Any reproduction or unauthorized use of the material or artwork presented herein is prohibited without the express written permission of TSR, Inc.

©1988 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved. Printed in U.S.A.

ISBN 0-88038-593-6

$7.95 US

9233

9233XXX1501

INTRODUCTION TO THE SAVAGE FRONTIER

“Civilization ends here.”

Although no sign in the North actually says this, the folk of the North know this to be true (Well, to be honest, there was a sign over the door to my laboratory that said it, but I made Ereke take it down. Who I am I, you ask. Let it be known, that I am Amelior Amanitas, alchemist extraordinaire and supreme sage of the North. At the request of Elminster, I am dictating the history and wealth of information regarding my savage homeland to my manservant Ereke, who has promised to edit out digressions such as this when he recopies it. But as I said, I digress).

To walk past a city's walls is to rely only upon one's own skills and strength of arms. It is truly a Savage Frontier, where man has yet to tame the land or its denizens. You have been warned.

What is The Savage Frontier?

“The Savage Frontier” is a descriptive name for what many also call “the North”. In this book, the North refers to those lands north of the city of Waterdeep, between the Sword Coast and the Great Desert; the term also encompasses the islands of the Trackless Sea, including Tuern, Ruathym, and Gundarlun.

It is a rugged, heavily wooded wilderness marked by cool, mild summers and harsh, bitter winters. What little civilization can be found hugs the coastal regions and a few inland river valleys. The rest is the domain of orcs, trolls, barbarian tribes, and uncountable other monstrous denizens, who regularly hurl themselves in fury upon the palisades of the towns and villages in the wilderlands.

It is a land of riches. Mineral wealth unequalled elsewhere in the known realms is found here, along with seemingly endless stands of timber of a size not often found elsewhere. Here too is the wealth of history, the plunder of lost civilizations and vanished realms.

Using This Book

This book is intended to be read by Dungeon Masters only. Much of the information contained within would not be known to players and their characters under any circumstances.

Read this book in its entirety before running a campaign in the Savage Frontier: it describes the major features of the North, beginning with history and ending in adventure. In between, it looks at the geography, climate, creatures, peoples, religions, politics, cities, island realms, areas of mystery, and personalities. Though it hoards a wealth of detail, this book only scratches the surface of adventure opportunities of the North. The rest has been left to the most potent force present in the North... your imagination.

History of The North

Eons before men walked the earth, ages before the elves were civilized enough to record history, in a time when the North was always warm and the seas of the world were deeper, the lands of Abeir-Toril were dominated by vast empires of inhuman peoples. In the elven oral tradition, these were known as the “Days of Thunder” when cruel lizard, amphibian, and avian peoples (known to the elves as the Iqua’Tel-’Quessir or creator races, but with no honor or respect intended) tamed the mighty dinosaurs, built towering cities of stone and glass on the shores of the warm seas and spanned the wilderness with shining roads, and fought constant wars of extermination, such was their hatred towards each other.

The stuff of magic was rawer in those days, less refined, more potent. These ancient peoples experimented endlessly with magics more powerful than can be even imagined today. Powerful mages hurled devastating bolts of seemingly god-like power, leveling armies and mountains; and like gods, they played at creating life, wryly choosing to release their monstrous mistakes rather than destroy them. To those who made them, the mistakes were unnatural horrors, unlike anything that walked the land. Most died in the cruel jungles, yet many lived and as thought awakened in them they hid themselves from their creators. When the end came at last, it was they, not the surviving creators who seized control of the suddenly colder realms. And so it was that the first of the elves, the dragons, the goblin races and an endless list of creatures of a new age took possession of their heritage. Their creators, the ancestors of the lizardmen, bullywugs and aarakocra, declined into endless barbarism, never to rise again.

The unmeasured age that followed was known as the Time of Dragons, when those mighty creatures reigned supreme. Not until the elves themselves became powers in the world would the rule of dragons be challenged.

Elven sages still speculate on the events that brought about the “overnight” destruction of the creator races. There are wildly diverging theories, but all agree that a rapid climate change occurred, creating a world unsuitable to most of the creator races and the dinosaurs. Many believe that the change resulted from a cataclysm the races brought upon themselves. Proponents of this theory point to the Star Mounts in the central High Forest, whose origins are most likely magical and otherworldly. The elves believe that around this time, the greater and lesser Powers began to manifest themselves in the world, particularly the beings known as Chauntea and Corellon Laretheian, aiding the new races and confounding the survivors of the creator races.

There has been civilization in the North since before the Time of Dragons, yet little more than tantalizingly vague myths survive. For millennia, gold elves dwelt in Illefarn (where Waterdeep now stands) and Eaerlann (along the River Shining). From their ornate forest cities, they traded with primitive, emerging human nations like Netheril and Illusk and repulsed the constant attacks of the goblin races. Yet as men began to dominate the world, the elven lands declined and now little or no remnants remain of those lost and abandoned realms. When the elves chose to leave the North and travel to Evermeet, their works quickly disappeared, leaving only places like the Old Road and a ruined port in the High Forest to mark the passing of Eaerlann, while a mysterious ruin called the Crumbling Stair may be the last remnant of fabled Illefarn.

Meanwhile, in the far North, the dwarven burrow clans united as the dwarven nation of Delzoun, named for the dwarf who forged the union. The dwarven nation, which existed primarily underground, extended from the Ice Mountains in the Utter North to the Nether Mountains in the south. Silver Moon Pass was its western border and the Narrow Sea its eastern.

To the east, on sandy shores of the calm and shining Narrow Sea, human fishing villages grew into small towns, then joined together as the nation of Netheril. Sages believe that the fishing towns were unified by a powerful human wizard who may have discovered a book of great magic power that had survived from the Days of Thunder—a book that legend calls the Nether Scrolls. Under this nameless wizard and those that followed, Netheril rose in power and glory, becoming both the first human land in the North and the most powerful. Some say that this discovery marked the birth of human wizardry, since before then, mankind had only shamans and witch doctors. For over 3,000 years Netheril dominated the North, but even its legendary wizards were unable to stop their final doom.

Doom came as desert, devouring the Narrow Sea and spreading to fill its banks with dry dust and blowing sand. Legend states that when the great wizards of Netheril realized their land was lost, they abandoned it and their countrymen en masse, fleeing to all corners of the world and taking the secrets of wizardry with them. More likely, this was a slow migration that began some 3,000 years ago and reached its conclusion some 1,500 years later.

Whatever the truth, the wizards no longer dwelt in Netheril and to the north, once-majestic dwarven Delzoun had fallen upon hard days. Then the orcs struck. Orcs had always been foes in the North, surging out of their holes every few tens of generations when their normal haunts could no longer support their burgeoning numbers. This time they charged out of their caverns in the Spine of the World, poured out of abandoned mines in the Graypeaks, screamed out of lost dwarfholds in the Ice Mountains, raged forth from crypt complexes in the Nether Mountains and stormed upward from the bowels of the High Moon Mountains. Never before or since had there been such an outpouring of orcish power.

Before this onslaught Delzoun crumbled and was driven in on itself. Netheril, without its wizards, was wiped from the face of history. The elves of Eaerlann alone withstood the onslaught and, with the aid of the treants of Turlang and other unnamed allies, were able to stave off the final days of their land for yet a few centuries more.

In the far west, men also dwelled — wise, clever primitives called the Ice Hunters. They lived their simple lives on the Sword Coast since time beyond reckoning, countless generations before Netheril's first founders set foot on the Narrow Sea's western shore. Yet this peaceful folk fell prey to another invasion. From the south came crude long ships to disgorge a tall, fair-haired, warlike race which displaced the Ice Hunters from their ancestral lands.

This race, now known as the Northmen, spread their farms and villages along the Sword Coast from the banks the Winding Water to the gorges of the Mirar. Their fierce warriors drove the simple Ice Hunters further and further north, forced the goblinkind back into their mountain haunts and instigated the last Council of Illefarn. Within 500 years of the Northmen's arrival, Illefarn was no more—its residents had migrated to Evermeet.

From the Sword Coast, Northmen sailed westward, finding, claiming and establishing colonies on the major western islands of Ruathym and Gundarlun, eventually spreading to ail islands in the northern sea. Others migrated northward, past the Spine of the World and became the truly savage barbarians of Icewind Dale.

Where Luskan now stands, the Northmen found the citadel of Illusk, built by a refugee wizard from Netheril. The Illusk wizards ruled for centuries until the folk of Illuskan (as the surrounding village was known) were "liberated" by raiders led by Uther Gardolfsson, a Ruathym Thane.

The angry Illuskani destroyed Gardolfsson's fleet and drove him inland where he and his warriors would die (theoretically) in the monster-infested wilderness. Instead, they forged the birth of a new people, the Uthgardt barbarians.

Meanwhile in the east, the elves of Eaerlann built the fortress of Ascalhorn and turned it over to refugees from Netheril, as the Netherese followers of Karsus built the town of Karse in the High Forest. Other Netherese founded Llorck and Loudwater. Still more wandered the mountains, hills, and moors north and west of the High Forest. These became the ancestors of the Uthgardt barbarians and the founders of Silverymoon, Everlund and Sundabar.

In the centuries that followed, Ascalhorn became Hellgate Keep when it fell into the hands of demons, and Eaerlann collapsed under the attack of a new orc horde. The elves fled south-east, joining with Northmen, Netherese descendants, and dwarves to form what would later be known as the Fallen Kingdom. This realm was short-lived and collapsed under the next orkish invasion—though in dying, it dealt the goblin races a blow from which they have yet to recover.

Yet along the coast, in what was once elven Illefarn, humanity was once again rising in power. Merchants from the south, tribesmen from the North, and seafarers from western islands had created a village around a trading post on a deepwater harbor, first known as Nimoar's Hold after the Uthgardt chieftain whose tribe seized and fortified the ramshackle village. Nimoar and his successors, known as War Lords, led the men of Waterdeep (as it had become known to the ship captains who called there) in a slowly losing battle against the trolls. In a final, climactic battle, the trolls breached the aging palisade and all seemed lost—until the magic of a Northern youth, Ahghairon of Silverymoon, turned luck against the trolls and the "everlasting ones" were destroyed or scattered.

Ahghairon, heir to the magical heritage and learning of Netheril, stayed in Waterdeep and in his 112th year he again saved the city... from itself. In so doing, he created the Lords of Waterdeep, the government that rules there today. The city has since grown into the largest in North, possibly in all Faerun. With Waterdeep as a firm anchor, "civilization" again forged cautiously into the wilderness. Illuskan (now just Luskan) was retaken from the orcs. Loudwater, Llorck, Longsaddle, Triboar, Secomber and other towns were resettled by pioneers from Waterdeep, sponsored by noble Waterdhavian merchant families.

Though it has been centuries since the last orc invasion, there is still constant strife. Barbarians harass merchants, travelers, and towns; the seas are filled with Northmen pirates; the demon forces of Hellgate Keep assault the east; and two wars have marred the land in recent years. Luskan, now a fierce merchant city known to harbor (and support) pirates, wages war with the island realm of Ruathym over an act of piracy against a Luskan merchant ship; and to the far north, in Icewind Dale beyond the Spine of the World, the Ten Towns are slowly rebuilding after being nearly destroyed by the monstrous forces of Akar Kessel.

It is a time of relative quiet in the North. Where once elves and dwarves reigned, men now rule, but their hold—as was true for all civilizations before — is tenuous at best.

Amelior Amanitas

Acknowledgements:

Like many fantasy worlds, this one owes its birth to a number of other folk. The culture of the seafaring Northmen comes from Douglas Niles, who described them in FR2, Moonshae. Icewind Dale, its heroes and tales are based on The Crystal Shard by Bob Salvatore. And last, but never least, gratitude is owed to Ed Greenwood, who gave us hints about The Savage Frontier in FR1, Waterdeep and the North, and whose copious notes and previously published material are the foundation of this book.

SAVAGE FRONTIER OVERVIEW

"You know, Erek, if Elminster hadn't been so kind to us when we were, um, avoiding the rather unfortunate consequences of that incident in Volkumburgh, I would never have agreed to this project. After all, how was I to know WHY the awtawmatawn had been shattered in the first place?"

"Oh well, I rather like the history chapter, didn't you? Showed some real pageantry there, I think."

"And Brother Lychor; he seemed like such a pleasant chap... Erek, you're writing this all down. Why you little weasel! That's it, no more letting you beat me at nine-draughts!"

Character Races in The North

With the exception of elves and halflings, most of the common character races of the AD&D® game are native to the Savage Frontier, though the demi-human population in the North is slowly declining. Players who wish to use characters of other races may of course do so, subject to DM approval (members of virtually any race, even drow, can be found in Waterdeep).

Humans: The Savage Frontier is populated by human peoples with a variety of cultural backgrounds. There is no unified human nation in the North, only individual towns, villages and city states loosely linked by trade agreements, and the barbarian tribes that roam the wilderness. A human character starting in the North might be from any one of these folk.

The most ancient are the primitive but peaceful Ice Hunters of the Ice Peaks. The war-like Northmen control the Outer Islands and much of the Sword Coast. Northmen scorn agriculture, preferring to raid and make war.

In the far North, beyond the Spine of the World, the fierce tundra barbarians have recently allied with the folk of the Ten Towns in Icewind Dale. The powerful Uthgardt barbarians roam the wilds of the North, bickering amongst themselves and warring on orcs and outposts of civilization.

In the northeast, the cultured folk of Silvermoon produce the finest bards in the land. They and the stalwart defenders of Sundabar and Everlund are descendants of an ancient, dark-haired race known as the Netherese.

Then there are the Waterdhavians, the folk of Waterdeep, the melting pot of nations—nearly all lands on Faerun (and other worlds) are represented here.

Elves and Half-Elves: Though at least two elven realms once existed in the North, the closest elven land is Evereska to the south. Elves in the Savage Frontier are usually wanderers and adventurers, though an Deepearth realm of drow is said to exist far beneath the North. Elves of most non-aquatic subraces dwell in Waterdeep. The Ardeepforest is known to house retired elven adventurers. Sundabar has a large half-elven population, and Loudwater a small one, due to half-elven descendants of Eaerlann who tend to marry other half-elves.

Some folk in the North (mostly Lawful humans and all dwarves) consider the elven withdrawal to Evermeet a kind of "desertion" from racial responsibility and will treat strange elves with suspicion and ill-disguised contempt. Except on rare occasions, drow and drow half-breeds are treated like filth... if allowed to live at all.

Dwarves: The dwarves of the north, whose population is steadily declining, live in scattered underground realms. These stocky folk are generally reclusive, but will ally with men to battle orcs. Two dwarven cities are still known to exist, Ironmaster in the west and Citadel Adbar in the east. Men trade freely within Adbar, but have few dealings with the isolated dwarves of Ironmaster, other than to purchase iron goods.

If encountered wandering in the wilderness, dwarves tend to be extremely suspicious of strangers. They think that others seek to find and loot the halls of their ancestors (which is often what the dwarves themselves seek to do).

Gnomes: This once-populous race of wry little folk is nearly gone from the North. Their underground realms have been overrun by orcs until few remain. The survivors wisely avoid contact with all but dwarves. Still, merchants in Waterdeep are constantly on the lookout for their clever little toys and illusionary gew-gaws.

Halflings: There is something about four to five months of fierce winter that doesn't appeal to the average halfling. While Waterdeep has a fair halfling population (and a much milder winter), it is rare to find them elsewhere in the North.

Half-orcs: Given the vast orc population in the north and the amount of raiding, one might suspect a plague of these half-breeds, yet they are few. Northerners have a distinct and strong dislike for anything even vaguely orcish and only the most human-looking can pass safely among northern folk.

Character Classes in The North

Rangers: In the Savage Frontier, rangers are well-respected for their vigilance and diligence in the service of the Harpers and the Lords' Alliance. In the wilderness, the word of a name-level ranger is the law and the Lord's Alliance will enforce it as such.

Bards: While bards are not common in the North, they are respected. Northmen treat "skalds" like heroes, particularly if they sing of Northmen victories. Even the Uthgardt barbarians treat bards as near equals. More often than not, bards are members of the Harpers.

Clerics: Many of the major gods and faiths of Faerun are represented in the North, though few are "native" to the residents here. Over the centuries, missionary clerics have come north to establish their churches meeting with varied success. Predominant "civilized" gods in the North include Mystra, Lathander, Mielikki, Tempus, and Tymora. The barbarians have their own private gods. The gods section in this chapter lists the major temples in each city, town or village, though a shrine (attended only by lay folk, no clerics) to most any deity will exist in each civilized area.

The city folk are generally tolerant of most religions so long as they do not harm others or their property, but Northmen often eject foreign clerics as rudely as possible. The savage Uthgardt barbarians tend to exterminate whom-ever their shamans label as heretics.

Each Uthgardt tribe worships an ancestral beast totem spirit (a demi-power). Their clerics are shamans (tribal spell casters) of limited power. Yet they all have access to the magical beast power of their clan totem.

Witch doctors are found among the orcs and Ice Hunter clans. These tribal spell casters may cast a restricted number of magic-user and clerical spells. The most ancient witch doctors of the Ice Hunters gain limited use of powerful ice, snow, and cold magics.

Druids: These followers of Mielikki have a stronghold in the eastern reaches of The High Forest, an area known as the Tall Trees. Another holy grove exists in Silverymoon, where the druids maintain a shrine and sacred college. Although the North is heavily forested, there are no other known druid holy areas. Though druids are rare, they are respected by civilized and barbarian folk alike.

Fighters: The ready call for a strong sword arm in the north draws men and women to this commonest of professions. Warriors are constantly needed to defend against orcs and other monsters; to patrol the hills, valleys, and wastelands; to fend off barbarian raiders; and to keep the peace in the cities. Most fighters in the North are barbarians, either the sea-roving Northmen, the wandering Uthgardt or the savage tundra barbarians of Icewind Dale. Most civilized fighters in the north are just that, normal fighting men. A select few are rangers, many in the service of the secretive Harpers. A very few are cavaliers and paladins. Other than the mercantile nobility of Waterdeep and city rulers, the Savage Frontier is not a source for the upper classes that produce the members of these character classes.

Magic-Users: Although magic-users and illusionists have never been popular with the barbarians who populate the North, in the cities they wield vast amounts of power and command either great respect or great fear. Waterdeep is noted for producing powerful mages like Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun; Longsaddle has its magical Harpell family; and Silverymoon is home to several colleges of magic and a number of independent tutors. Magic-users in Waterdeep would be wise to join that city's Watchful Order of Magists & Protectors, the magic-user's guild which provides training, spell components, scrolls, respectability, and occasional employment to member mages.

Thieves: Waterdeep has the greatest concentration of thieves in the North, yet there is no official Thieves' Guild here, only "free-lancers." Neverwinter, Silverymoon Sundabar, Mirabar, and even Loudwater have small thieves' guilds (several of which are said to be allied with the mysterious Harpers). Many suspect that a thieves' network also exists throughout the Savage Frontier, but those who learn of the Kraken Society often do not live long enough to reveal its secrets (see Power Groups).

Outside the cities in the North, the thief's profession is rarely safe or profitable. Northmen (those who have things worth stealing) regard stealing from others as a way of life, but one who is caught stealing from them is certainly killed. The Uthgardt barbarians have little worth taking, but what they do have often has religious significance—and sacrilege is a fatal offense.

Although it is quite reasonable for any character class to be found adventuring in the North, assassins are rare (even among the bad folk of Waterdeep).

"Erek, put that sign out in front of the shop again, you know the one that says 'You're late, you should have been here a half hour ago', just in case any adven-

Economic Map Key

	Caravan Services Fishing
	Mining
	Agriculture
	Trade
	Cattle
	Shipbuilding
	Scholarship and The Arts
	Other Manufacturing
	Trade Routes

turers show up. Keeps 'em off guard in any case. Oh, and get the word out that love philters and mother'sleaf tonics are on special this week. And where is my chart on local businesses? What! You sold it... to a Zhentarim? For five toals? Erek . . . Erek? EREK!"

Economics of The North

The North is a land of economic opportunity, rich in resources and open to those willing to take the risks to exploit them. The mountains in the north are mineral rich, the soil is fertile (though often rocky), open grassy spaces can support huge herds of livestock, vast tracks of lumber are still unharvested and the warm southern currents swarm with fishy delicacies. The outer islands have their resources and riches, but the Northmen who dwell upon them would rather raid for riches than reap the bounty of their own lands.

Trade in The North

The economic map above shows the primary trade routes in the North (mainland only) and major industries. These products and industries include: mining, agriculture, caravan services, cattle herding, trade (a primary center of commerce), fishing, metal-working, ship building, other manufacturing, and scholarship and the arts. The size of the icon represents the relative importance of the industry to the economy of the Savage Frontier.

Trade Routes

The Major trade routes are listed with the time it takes outbound to reach the final destination and major stops along the way (based on the DMG rules for Wagon travel). Water route travel times are given coming and going to accommodate ocean and river currents. For foot movement along the roads and trails (under an average load), multiply travel times by 1.25. For light horse travel, multiply travel times by 0.4.

High Road: Waterdeep to Baldur's Gate in 32 days.

High Road: Waterdeep to Luskan. Leilon in 11 days, Neverwinter in 17, Port Llast in 19, and Luskan in 23 days.

Coastal Route: Waterdeep to Luskan. Outbound to Luskan in 6 days. Inbound to Waterdeep in 8 days.

Long Road: Waterdeep to Mirabar. Red Larch in 7 days, Triboar in 13, Longsaddle in 18, and Mirabar in 26 days.

River Route: Zundbridge to Silverymoon (by small barge). Outbound to Ironford in 6 days, The Stone Bridge in 14, Yartar in 20, Nesmé in 30, and Silverymoon in 43 days. Inbound, reduce travel time by 1/3.

Silvermoon Pass: Silverymoon to Sundabar in 6 days.

East Trail: Waterdeep to Llorkh. Secomber in 11 days, Loudwater in 20, and Llorkh in 27 days.

Evermoor Way: Triboar to Silverymoon. Yartar in 2 days, Everlund in 15, and Silverymoon in 20 days.

Coin of The Realms

In addition to the standard AD&D® game coins, several cities mint their own coinage. Each coin has two values, its value in the city and its value elsewhere.

Waterdeep: the 2/- gp square brass toad and the 50/2 gp crescent-shaped platinum harbor moon.

Silverymoon: the 2/1 ep electrum moon (shining blue crescent coin).

Mirabar: the 10/5-7 gp iron trade bar (1-foot-long spindle).

Power Groups in The North

"Are the drapes drawn and the doors locked, Ereik? What do you mean I'm acting like an old woman? Why shouldn't I worry? My trusted assistant doesn't know the difference between a Zhentarim and the Harpers. Is that reason for worry? Should I worry that he sells sensitive maps to mercantile spies? That Zhentarim agent was halfway to Llorkh before we caught him. Uh, no, I don't plan to let him out of the bottle. At least not for a while."

There is little “political” strife between cities in the North. Rather than waste lives, gold and energy on petty disagreements, most civilized folk in the North have banded together against their true foes: the harsh northern climate and the cruel monsters who dominate their land. Even so, there are many groups who weave their influence in the North for good and ill. These are the secret societies, the political blocs, foreign factions—the power groups of the North, each with its own leaders, goals, enemies and allies.

BEAST LORD

Leader: The Beast Lord (an illithid)

Base of Operations: Dekanter

Goal: Conquest of the North or part of the Deeperth.

Allies: The Zhentarim.

Chief Foes: The drow and the Harpers.

This secretive illithid mage has a pact with the Zhentarim. They provide it with dead monster bodies, and it agrees not to molest caravans passing near Dekanter. Though the Beast Lord fully intends to conquer part of the Deeperth, it begins in the North by capturing territory known to have access to the world below.

CAPTAINS’ CONFEDERATION

Leader: High Captain Taerl of Luskan

Base of Operations: Luskan

Goal: Conquest of the Sword Coast and control of all trade north of Waterdeep.

Allies: Luskan, Ruathym, Aurilsbaarg, Uttersea on Tuern, the Purple Rocks, the Whalebones, and the Hosttower of the Arcane. Zhentarim influence is definitely present.

Chief Foes: Waterdeep and the Lords’ Alliance.

With the treaty ending the Luskan/Ruathym conflict, the brutal Northmen kings discovered that they had more in common than they had as differences. They banded together to raid the coast in large numbers, disrupting trade and agriculture.

DRUIDS OF TALL TREES

Leader: Uthgang Jyarl—Great Druid of the North (14th level druid)

Base of Operations: Tall Trees in the High Forest.

Goal: Protect the ancient elven wood of the Tall Trees from harm.

Allies: The Harpers, and the treants of Turlang Wood.

Chief Foe: Hellgate Keep.

The druids of the Tall Trees are quite secretive and allow few other than druids (and vouched-for companions) into this part of the wood. The Great Druid is the leader here, but former Grand Druid (now an 18th level Hierophant Adept) Sinklayr Greenstroke resides here, as does the mysterious Gildenfire (a gold dragon in human guise).

THE HARPERS

Leader: Not Known

Base of Operations: Silverymoon

Goal: Protect the North, its peoples and resources from goblinkind and foreign influence or domination.

Allies: The Lords’ Alliance and the druids of Tall Trees.

Chief Foes: Orcs and other goblin races, the Zhentarim, and political powers in Amn and Calimshan.

Though this group was discussed in detail in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set, the importance of the Harpers to the North deserves more than a passing mention. Here in the North, where the society began centuries ago, the mystique that surrounds the Harpers generates respect, not suspicion, particularly since two of the most powerful leaders of the North, Khelben “Blackstaff” Arunsun of Waterdeep and High Lady Alustriel of Silverymoon, are avowed Harpers. Even the savage Uthgardt barbarians, who have little respect for the trappings of civilization, treat those who know the secret signs of the Harpers as if they were chieftains.

Originally, it was a loose society of bards and rangers, created to provide these wanderers with fellowship and shelter. Their fellowship grew, and with it came a desire to protect and preserve and maintain peace in the wild land they loved, acting against all who would despoil it.

In the North, they are arch foes of the burgeoning goblinkind races, and seek to thwart them at every turn. Elsewhere, the Harpers’ secret operations work to keep peace between human kingdoms—they oppose the Zhentarim and often act in a contrary manner to aggressive trading kingdoms like Amn.

The Harpers rarely work openly and never reveal their true goals to those not highly initiated into the society. Those who work at cross purposes to the Harpers often fail in their endeavors. Other than in the North, even those who are not their enemies harbor a mild distrust of the Harpers for this.

HELLGATE KEEP

Leader: Grinthalke (a type VI demon)

Base of Operations: Hellgate Keep

Goal: Acquisition of wealth and power to be used to gain favor in the Abyss.

Allies: None.

Chief Foes: The Harpers, Sundabar, Silverymoon, and druids of Tall Trees.

The demonic forces of this ghoul-hold continually seek to expand the boundaries of their domination and to acquire vast treasure and powerful magics. Grinthalke and his followers are exiles from the Abyss who may not gate in demons more powerful than manes (which are transformed into shadows and ghosts), rutterkins or dretches. If their physical forms are destroyed here, the demons reform as lesser creatures in the Abyss, only to be exiled again, here or elsewhere. Grinthalke’s armies include few actual demons, and they are quite reluctant to risk themselves in battle.

HOSTTOWER OF THE ARCANE

Leader: Arklem Greeth (18th level M-U)

Base of Operations: Luskan

Goal: Political and economic control of the North.

Allies: The Zhentarim, the High Captains of Luskan, and the Knights of the Shield

Chief Foes: The Lords’ Alliance, the Harpers, and the Kraken Society.

These power-hungry mages are the instigating factor behind the Captains' Confederation. The wizards in the tower constantly scheme ways to gain power for themselves or the Hosttower (in that order). They often hire adventurers to do their dirty work (and take the blame if necessary). While they wield great power in Luskan, they have little direct influence outside the City of Sails.

ICE MOUNTAIN ORCS

Leader: King Graul

Base of Operations: Dead Orc Pass (?)

Goal: Conquest of the North (beginning with Sundabar or Silverymoon)

Allies: Other orc tribes, including Citadel of Many Arrows, and the Ice Mountains frost giants

Chief Foes: The Harpers, Sundabar, Silverymoon, and Citadel Adbar.

King Graul is the most powerful of the known northern orc kings—it is suspected that more than 100,000 orcs fall under his sway (though this includes the 40,000 orcs known to inhabit the Citadel of Many Arrows).

THE KNIGHTS OF THE SHIELD

Leader: Unknown.

Base of Operations: Waterdeep.

Goal: Increase political influence of southern countries in the North.

Allies: The Captains' Confederation, Hosttower of the Arcane.

Chief Foes: The Harpers, the Lords of Waterdeep, and the Lords' Alliance.

Until recently, this secretive group, composed primarily of petty nobility and merchants, has had little influence in the North, other than in Waterdeep.

Though their true aims are unknown, they seek both political and economic influence in the cities and countries of the Sword Coast. It is probable that the Knights seek to place one of their own among the unknown Lords of Waterdeep. It is suspected that the Knights are a pawn of an evil, extra-planar power, possibly even an arch-devil (also see entry in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set).

There are claims now that agents for the Knights are involved with the High Captains of Luskan and the Hosttower of the Arcane.

THE KRAKEN SOCIETY

Leader: Unknown (possibly THE kraken)

Base of Operations: Yartar and Triboar.

Goal: Acquisition of information, particularly that which can be sold, or used to otherwise profit the society.

Allies: None.

Chief Foes: The Lords' Alliance, the Harpers.

A society of thieves, assassins, and mages who maintain an information network throughout the North. They are not associated with the official (or unofficial) thieves' guilds of Waterdeep. Based in Triboar and Yartar (the crossroads of the North), their symbol is a purple squid with an incredible number of tentacles, suggesting an association with the Kraken of the Purple Rocks.

THE LORDS' ALLIANCE

Leader: Lord Piergeiron of Waterdeep

Base of Operations: Waterdeep

Goal: Unified defense of northern cities and promotion of their economic interests.

Allies: The Harpers.

Chief Foes: The Zhentarim, Luskan, Amn, and Calimshan.

Also known as "The Council of Lords," or "the Lords' Council," it should not be confused with the Lords of Waterdeep. This lawful and essentially good economic and military alliance of the rulers of cities in the North and along the Sword Coast works to keep the overland trade routes along the Sword Coast and across the North as safe as possible and free from Zhentarim influence or annexation.

The alliance is open to all cities and nations in the west, but not all have chosen to join. Notable abstainees include fiercely independent Luskan, and the southern lands of Amn and Calimshan (who feel that troubled trade in the North can only profit their nations).

Member cities include Waterdeep, Mirabar, Neverwinter, Silverymoon, Sundabar and the island realm of Gundarlun. Southern cities include Baldur's Gate, Elturel, Berdusk, and Iriaebor. Smaller towns and villages in the north wisely join in the Alliance.

The member rulers of the Lords' Alliance communicate by means of both trained carrier pigeons (from Lord Piergeiron of Waterdeep) and the magical arts of archmage Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun. Smaller villages can correspond only with Waterdeep.

The military arm of the alliance is composed of both liveried troops from the larger cities and local militia in the smaller. Large cities and towns not only patrol their own local lands, but also maintain garrisons in the smaller towns and villages to support local militias and patrol the frontiers.

A typical garrison consists of 30 men: 10 will be professional soldiers supplied by a large city (often adventurers or mercenaries) and the rest will be local militia in the livery of the city's army, splitting time between patrols and their own business. In the deep frontier, at least 50% of the garrison will be trained as rangers.

Despite complaints of "gold ill-spent on grubby peasants," this policy maintains a constant flow of information between the cities and the frontier and creates a greater feeling of security within those who pioneer the wilderness.

LORDS OF WATERDEEP

Leader: Lord Piergeiron of Waterdeep

Base of Operations: Waterdeep

Goal: Rule Waterdeep wisely and protect its interests in the North and abroad.

Allies: The Harpers, The Lords' Alliance and its member cities.

Chief Foes: The 'Official' Thieves' Guild of Waterdeep, and Luskan.

THE ONE

Leader: The One (a.k.a. Radoc)

Base of Operations: The Star Mounts

Goal: Unknown.

Allies: Mongrelmen and the folk of Loudwater.

Chief Foes: None known.

This charismatic old man from another world appears to be a great healer—a powerful cleric. His secret is that he is an equally powerful archmage. “The One” seeks a return to his home plane, but is building up an organized power base in the remote Star Mounts. Due to the remoteness of his headquarters, little is known of what goes on there.

TREANTS OF TURLANG WOOD

Leader: Turlang the Thoughtful
Base of Operations: Woods of Turlang (High Forest)
Goal: Protect the High Forest from harm, cultivate and expand forests in the North.
Allies: The druids of the Tall Trees
Chief Foes: Orcs and trolls.

UTHGARDT BARBARIANS

Leader: Each tribe has a leader.
Base of Operations: No fixed location.
Goal: Keep civilization from expanding in the North.
Allies: The Harpers (loose association)
Chief Foes: Orcs.

ZHENTIL KEEP

Leader: Mythkar Leng (in the North)
Base of Operations: Llorkh
Goal: Domination of all trade routes in the North and along the Sword Coast.
Allies: Llorkh and the Beast Lord.
Chief Foes: The Harpers and the Lords’ Alliance.

Mythkar Leng is a lawful evil, 9th level cleric of Bane, who acts as an advisor to Lord Geildarr of Llorkh (a 7th level magic-user who is secretly a member of the Zhentarim). With the aid of Rakaxalorth (a beholder who is never seen in public), Mythkar keeps Geildarr in line with the Zhentarim goals for the North. Llorkh has been chosen as a foothold due to its distance from the powers in Waterdeep and Silverymoon.

The Zhentarim already monopolize trade between Loudwater and Llorkh, have a firm base in Secomber, and well-placed agents in Waterdeep, Zundbridge, Yartar and Triboar.

Common Themes & Conflicts

The Orcs vs. Everybody

The orcs in the North wage a constant war of raid and retreat on frontier outposts. Small wandering bands constantly harry farms and villages, stealing livestock and brutally killing people. Just as often, they take slaves. Attempts to negotiate or control them for any length of time end in failure. Bounties placed on orcish heads only seem to encourage the beasts to attack for sport.

The Luskan/Ruathym War

The status of this conflict depends on when the DM begins the campaign. During the Year of the Prince, these two are waging bloodthirsty war upon one another, with Ruathym getting the worst of it. Shiploads of Luskan raiders plunder and pillage the Ruathym coast and slay their leader.

During the Year of Shadows, Waterdeep forces a truce and ends the conflict. In so doing, an alliance, the Captains’ Confederation, is forged between the Luskanites and the island kingdoms. Confederation warriors raid cities along the Sword Coast in huge numbers and no ship at sea is safe from Northmen pirates. The Year of Shadows ends with the Lords of Waterdeep in council, deciding whether to declare war or not.

The Uthgardt Barbarians vs. Civilization

The average Uthgardt regards civilization as a cancer to be cut out. Most tribes regularly raid civilized settlements, slaying domesticated animals, burning buildings, and crushing crops. Captives become slaves, though youngsters are often adopted into the tribe if they seem sturdy enough.

The Uthgardt vs. the Orcs

This is a holy war. Its roots date back to the formation of the Uthgardt as a people. The barbarians and the orcs compete directly with one another for the same resources. Savage humans and bloodthirsty orcs fight to the death upon meeting. Adventurers in the North could do worse than to aid the Uthgardt in such a conflict.

Monsters vs. Humans

The monsters of the North, including the trolls of the Evermoors, treat humans—civilized and barbarian alike—as fruit ripe for the picking. There are always giants who raid villages, foul creatures who wake hungry and leave their lairs to feast on a village, dragons who crave treasure, vampires with unholy thirsts, and more.

Zhentarim vs. the Harpers

This society of Zhentil Keep on the far side of the Great Desert seeks a trade monopoly in the North. Even now, little is shipped overland to the east without Zhentarim involvement. The Harpers work to keep the Zhentarim and their evil plots out of the North.

Pirates vs. Merchants

Piracy is an accepted fact of life in the northern Trackless Sea. Pirates attack ships along the Sword Coast from Ches (March) until Uktar (November). Most are Northmen, but about a third hail from southern lands.

Hellgate Keep vs. Mankind

The demonic forces of Hellgate Keep continually press against the human and dwarven folk in the northeast. Men have not been able to drive the demons out, but mercenary companies and adventuring bands can always find employ as guardians in Turnstone Pass. A monastery of Helm, near Neverwinter, sponsors a company of 100 troops of all character classes each year. This group, called Helm’s Hundred, leaves Helm’s Hold each spring for Sundabar.

Religion in The Savage Frontier

The gods or “Powers” of the North include many beings worshipped elsewhere in the Realms, plus a number who have followers nowhere else but in the Savage Frontier. The majority of these deities, their abilities, alliances, alignments and power are described in both the Cyclopedia of the Realms from the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ boxed set and/or in the Legends and Lore cyclopedia (though the orc gods are to be found in Unearthed Arcana). Only the briefest details are given for these gods—for a proper understanding and perspective of their religions, the DM should have both the aforementioned volumes.

Deities are divided into four categories—civilized gods, barbarian gods, and orc gods. Each of the “new” deities in this section is arranged in the following format:

NAME (pronunciation) nickname or title(s)
Portfolio	Alignment
Power	Home Plane
Symbol

NOTES

The table on page 12 gives the name of each major deity, the location of its primary (underlined) and lesser temples or shrines, and information about the temple’s clergy. Other deities were worshipped in the Savage Frontier, but their followings are not worth noting.

Civilized Gods

The city folk have chosen gods who meet their needs in this harsh land. In the tolerant, cosmopolitan city of Waterdeep, a variety of gods popular elsewhere have large temples, like Gond, Lathander, Mielikki, Mystra, Selune, Silvanus, Sune, Tempus and Tymora. Likewise, Silverymoon’s gods complement the city’s quest for beauty, art and knowledge. Where evil must be constantly fought, as in Sundabar, the aid of Helm, Tyr and Torm is sought by the defenders. In Mirabar, men who mine for a living have adopted dwarven gods.

Where trade is important, such as Nesmé, the goddess Waukeen holds sway. In communities where life depends on the forest, such as Loudwater, Secomber, and Silverymoon, Silvanus, Mielikki and Shiallia (see below) are favored.

SHIALLIA (SHE-al-YUH)

Sister Goddess, Dancer in the Glades, Daughter of the High Forest

Goddess of Glades and woodland fertility NG

Demipower Twin Paradises
Symbol: A golden acorn

NOTES: Shiallia appears as a voluptuously beautiful female korred whose long blond hair is festooned with garlands of oak leaves and golden acorns. She said to be a sister or daughter to the Tree Ghost (collective forest spirit) of the High Forest and is an ally of Silvanus and Mielikki, served by clerics not druids. She is patron and caretaker of pregnant forest creatures, a planter of trees and a nurturer of seedlings. She rejoices in life and shields against death. She has been known to bestow acorns of desire on favored worshippers, which grant them the powers of a limited or full wish. Her worship is limited to the proximity of the High Forest.

Barbarian Gods

The barbarians live in a harsh, cruel environment and worship harsh, cruel, even evil gods. Auril is worshipped by the Northmen as the bringer (and mollifier) of winter. Umberlee is queen over the dark, deadly cold waters of the northern ocean. Tempus the god of battles (called Tempos by the tundra barbarians) is worshipped by all the barbarian tribes of the North and outer islands. Chauntea is the patron of the Uthgardt barbarian women. They have female shamans who serve her.

The Uthgardt barbarians who range across the northern wilds worship beast totems, minor demigods who take their names and forms from creatures of the northern wilds. These cults include the Sky Pony, Blue Bear, Great Worm, Elk, Grey Wolf, Red Tiger (Snow Cat), Black Lion, Thunder Beast, Griffin, and the Tree Ghost. Each of these demipowers is quite similar, with the exception of the Blue Bear cult— which is a chaotic evil demipower allied with the Abyss. The Red Tiger is used as an example of the other beast cults.

RED TIGER

Snow Cat

Beast Cult

Chaotic Neutral

Demipower Happy Hunting Grounds

Symbol: A red snarling tiger face.

NOTES: Red Tiger is the most primitive, most bestial of the beast totems defeated by Uthgar, the founder of the tribes. Red Tiger exchanged his freedom for worship and the right of the shamans to call upon his beastpower. The followers of Red Tiger are reclusive hunters, like their totem.

Beast powers are listed by tribe in The Peoples of the North.

The Gods of The Orcs

While it is difficult to imagine orcs as “religious” they are devoted followers of their primitive gods. Their shamans and witch doctors are often the most powerful members of the community. The orcs acknowledge evil Gruumsh One-Eye, He-Who-Never-Sleeps, as their lord and master (see Legends & Lore Cyclopedia and Unearthed Arcana). In addition to Baghtru the Leg Breaker, Shargass the Night Lord, Ilneval, Yurtrus the White-Handed and Luthic Cave Mother, each orcish tribe has a vile totem god similar to the Uthgardt totems, but based on their unpleasant (more to the point, disgusting) tribal symbols, like the Severed Hand, Bloody Eye, and Skull-Grin tribes. Major gods (like Baghtru and the others) are described in Unearthed Arcana.

DEITY	TEMPLE/SHRINE	LOCATION	CLERGY
Auril	Winter Palace	Luskan	Wiskar Strom (male 6th L shaman)
Bane	shrine	Llorck	Mythkar Leng (male 9th L cleric)
Beast Totems
Black Lion	Beorunna's Well	Beorunna's Well	Bogohardt Blackmane (male 7th L shaman)
Blackraven	Ravenrock	Blackraven River	Pureheartman (male 11th L shaman)
Blue Bear	Stone Stand	wilderness	Tanta Hagara (female, annis)
Elk	Flint Rock	wilderness	Berchtwald Bandylegs (male 5th L shaman)
Great Worm	Great Worm	Great Worm Cavern	Elrem the Wise (male great worm, 20th L shaman)
Grey Wolf	Ravenrock	Blackraven River	Clovis Greenteeth (male, 6th L shaman)
Griffon	Shining White	Shining Creek	Aldalfus Stormgatherer (male 9th L shaman)
Red Tiger	Beorunna's Well	Beorunna's Well	Gارين the Maker (male 5th L shaman)
Sky Pony	Morgur's Mound	wilderness	Valric High Eye (male 8th L shaman)
Thunderbeast	Morgur's Mound	wilderness	Kierkrad Seventoes (male 7th L shaman)
Tree Ghost	Grandfather Tree	unknown	Chungred Ghostheart (male 10th L shaman)
Chauntea	any Uthgardt mound	(see above)	Granna Luthanna (female 5th L shaman)
Gond	The House of Inspired Hands	Waterdeep	Priestess: Jhoadil Zulthind (female 8th L cleric)
Helm	Helm's Hold	Neverwinter	Founder: Dumal Erard (male 8th L monk)
	House Invincible	Silverymoon	Vigilant Master: Erssler Thamm (male 13th L cleric)
	Halls of Vigilance	Sundabar	Priest: Ruthard Fourl (male 10th L cleric)
Lathander	The Spires of the Morning	Waterdeep	High Priestess: Ghentilara (female 10th L cleric)
Mielikki	The Lady's Hands	Waterdeep	Briosar Helmsing (male 10th L ranger)
	Deep Glade	Tall Trees	Wanada Selemensa (female 8th L ranger)
	shrine	Secomber	none
Milil	Halls of Inspiration	Silverymoon	Laureate: Mandaliz (female 12th L cleric)
Mystra	The House of Wonder	Waterdeep	Magister of Mystra: Meleghost Starseer (male 10th L magic-user). First Seeker: Ilbrost Mythyl (male 7th L magic-user)
	Tower of Balance	Silverymoon	Magister: Thukmuul Teleshann (female 17th L magic-user)
Oghma	Halls of Inspiration	Silvery moon	Chief Priest: Sandrew the Wise (male 11th L cleric); First Singer: Winitar (male 6th L bard)
	House of Knowledge	Neverwinter	Chief Priest: Watger Brighthair (male 8th L cleric)
Orc Gods: Gruumsh, Shargass, Ilneval, Yurtrus, and Luthic are worshipped wherever orcs gather in number, often in rocky passes of the northern mountain ranges.
Selune	Temple of Silver Stars	Silverymoon	High Priestess: Shanathera Moonsoul (female 18th L cleric)
	The House of the Moon	Waterdeep	High Priestess: Naneathea Suaril (female 16th L cleric)
Shiallia	The Golden Oak	Silverymoon	Priestess: Izolda Three-corn (female 8th L cleric)
Silvanus	Deep Glade	Tall Trees	Great Druid: Uthgang Jyarl (male 14th L druid)
	Silverglen	Silverymoon	Willa O'Greensleeves (female 6th L druid) shrine	Waterdeep	Watcher: Anarkin Iriboar (male 2d L druid)
Sune	The Temple of Beauty	Waterdeep	High Priestess: Ssaeryl Shadowstar (female 14th L cleric)
Tempus	The House of Heroes	Waterdeep	High Sword: Turik Bloodhelm (male 8th L fighter); Prior: Maxtilar Rhebbos (male 6th L cleric)
	Hall of Warriors	Luskan	Axxium Korvis (male 6th L shaman)
Tymora	The Tower of Luck	Waterdeep	High Priestess: Seenrosa Halvinhar (female 14th L cleric); Prior: Markos Zellizands (5th L cleric)
	Fortune Hall	Silverymoon	Priestess: Shermata Cheng (female 9th L cleric)
Tyr (Torm)	Hall of Justice	Neverwinter	Reverend Judge: Oleff Uskar (male 10th L cleric); Prior: Hlam (male, 7th L monk)
	Hall of Justice	Sundabar	Reverend Judge: Triandial Truthhammer (male 8th L cleric)
Umberlee	Hall of Black Waves	Ruathym	Uther Jeroggean (male 5th L shaman)
	Temple of Red Sails	Luskan	Malakia (female 12th L shaman)
Waukeen	House of Fair Trade	Nesme	High Priestess: Jygil Zelnathra (female 10th L cleric)

Weather in The Savage Frontier

To the southerner's preconceptions, the North means endless winter, month after month of blizzards, ice storms and generally frigid weather. Fortunately for the hardy folk of the Savage Frontier, this is not true. There is no one type of climate or weather pattern in the North. Beyond the Spine of the World mountain range, arctic conditions prevail. From the Spine of the World south to Waterdeep, subarctic weather conditions are to be found. The mountains cause an abrupt climate change. South of the Wall (as the Spine of the World is often called), the climate is more like that of the southernmost reaches of the subarctic rather than a smooth transition from arctic to subarctic. However, the coastal areas as far north as Port Llast are temperate climates, due to the warm deep ocean currents that run from south to north along the coast. The outer islands fall into the subarctic climate, even distant Tuern, which receives the waning warmth of the coastal current. Note that weather at sea and on the islands is dealt with in greater specifics in Islands of the North.

The variety of climate conditions makes detailed weather tables for this region cumbersome and space intensive. DMs who require more than the general descriptions that follow, refer to World of Weather appendix in the Wilderness Survival Guide.

Arctic Climate

The arctic climate conditions which dominate Icewind Dale and the Sea of Endless Ice beyond the Spine of the World bring a bitterly cold winter with lows as cold as -40 degrees Fahrenheit and highs that barely exceed 30 degrees (still below freezing). Summer brings warm days of 70 degrees or more, but with lows that still can drop into the "teens." Near-constant, stiff breezes off the Trackless Sea force temperatures even lower, due to wind chill, by as much as 10 to 20 degrees. Precipitation falls as snow in winter and as rain or sleet the rest of the year.

Winter snowfall is heavy enough to regenerate the glacier mass that dominates the Utter North. This translates to about 20-50 inches of snow accumulation each winter, but no more than a few inches each snowfall. The rest of the year, drier weather prevails.

Subarctic Climate

As discussed previously, the vast majority of the North, including the islands and the Spine of the World mountain range fall within a mild subarctic climate (but still not quite temperate). This translates as long, bitter winters that effectively last from mid-Marpenoth (October) to late Tarsakh (April) with temperatures that drop into the low -30's and rarely climb past 40 degrees Fahrenheit. These winters are punctuated by fierce, often destructive storms that howl in off the western ocean, dumping mixed snow and rain on the more southerly coast line and heavy snow across the mountains and midlands. Frequent blizzards blanket the land in deep snow drifts (often 10 or more feet deep) and isolate northern communities from one another. In the mountains, temperatures approach arctic iciness, while the forests seem to shrug off the worst effects of winter (some woods, like Neverwinter Wood and parts of the High Forest, never feel winter at all). Most rivers freeze over, with ice thick enough to support wagons and draft teams between Uktar (November) and early Ches (March).

Summers in the North are short, but temperatures still climb into the 80s, which along with high humidity and warm breezes from the southwestern seas keep it warm enough for anyone (if not downright uncomfortable at times). Summer precipitation normally takes the form of rain, but hail, sleet and even snow are not unknown. Summer is also the time for Wizard Weather, when unpredictable and even magical weather patterns occur in the vicinity of the High Forest.

The cloud-cover over the North seems eternal and unbroken. Partially, sunny days are common, but a day without clouds in the Savage Frontier is difficult to conceive of and is usually worth noting.

Temperate Climate

The true temperate climate begins south of Waterdeep, yet the Sword Coast between the City of Splendors and Port Llast stays warmer and wetter throughout the year than the inland regions. Southerners are surprised to find such mild weather so far north. On the other side of the coin, the coast also bears the brunt of the fierce storms that shriek out of the sea. While winters are warmer on the average, the coast is often subjected to damp, bone-chilling cold far worse than that felt by the midlands. Summers are warmer here, reaching upwards to extremes of 100 degrees, but are relieved by nearly constant sea breezes from the Sea of Swords. As with the inland areas, the skies over the coast are often cloudy. This stretch of coast usually receives some precipitation every day, usually as rain (or sleet in winter). Thick fog is a trademark of the coastal ports and makes hugging the shore a deadly proposition near the tiny, rocky, offshore islands north of Waterdeep.

Island Climates

Though they fall within the scope of the subarctic climate, the outer islands of Tuern, the Purple Rocks, Gundarlun, and Ruathym have a different type of climate than found on the mainland. Like the Moonshaes farther south, they live at the mercy of the stormy seas. Yet unlike those southern islands, the outer islands of the North feel winter's bite nearly eight months out the year. When they are not locked in winter's ice (often a mile or more wide by Alturiak/February), they are shrouded in dense, late-rising fog (if it rises at all). The storms that lash the islands are far harsher than those on the mainland, and most settlements are wisely built on the lee sides of the islands, away from the “Auril’sbreath” as the islanders call the near-constant bitter northwestern winter winds. Island summers are cool, even by subarctic standards, though the white beaches of Ruathym’s southern shore often bake in the summer heat.

Wildlife in the North

“What adventurers? I didn’t hire any adven... oh, those adventurers. Well bring them in... and will you stop writing already?”

“Well, that was timely, those fellows certainly did a good job researching the flora and fauna... what?... plants and animals, Ereka, plants and animals of the North. No, I don’t think they met all those beasts, I certainly wouldn’t want to and I doubt if their adventure tales are true. I don’t care what Laeral said, I don’t believe in white rabbits the size of ponies, even in the High Forest. Enough already. Let me talk. You just write.”

The wilds of the North and the Islands are a hunter’s paradise. Mundane creatures of all descriptions and sizes usually escape an adventurer’s notice, yet they are vitally important to those would live off the land, including rangers, druids, and native barbarians.

Majestic elk wander the northern forests, hills and fens, as do the lesser fen deer and noble moose. Huge herds of shaggun (shaggy bovines, use buffalo statistics) range the central plains and hills, often competing with the less aggressive domestic cattle herds for pasturage. They provide both food and tests of courage for the Uthgardt barbarians. In the far north reindeer travel in thundering herds (often followed by tundra barbarian tribes), while the white-coated mountain ram, a mighty, wild sheep, commands the lofty mountain peaks. Huge, sometimes deadly wild boars lurk in the forests – fine eating, but often at the steep price of men’s lives.

Small animals abound everywhere: rabbits, squirrels, red foxes, mice, bats, water rats, prairie dogs, beavers, weasels, and ermines. Common bird life includes game birds like the pheasant, grouse, quail, duck, and geese, and song birds of all shapes, colors and sizes.

Fish are a diet staple of many northern towns, including the succulent shallass, found primarily in the Dessarin river network and the szorp, a brown, trout-like denizen of the Delimbiyr and Unicorn Run rivers. Each spring, salmon run up the Mirar, Neverwinter and Dessarin rivers to spawn.

Along the Sword Coast and all the outer islands, seals and sea lions play and breed among the rocks, as do sea otters and dolphins. Though their breeding grounds are farther south, pods of whales are a common sight in the northern ocean.

And last, but never least, there are the mundane predators. The northern mountain ranges are home to the agile red tiger or “snow cat.” Wolves are nearly everywhere and bears are common in all forested or mountain areas, while white polar bears stalk the Uttermost North. Fierce sharks and orca (killer whales) patrol the seas.

The North is also home to many unusual beasts as well, better known to common folk as monsters.

Encounters in The North

Rather than provide a set of random encounter tables for each terrain type in the North, The Savage Frontier sets forth a listing of creatures and folk common to the encounter areas in the north, and several unusual, unique encounters with monsters, NPCs, objects, or places. Using these lists and suggestions, and those provided in the specific area descriptions given in later chapters, the DM can choose the encounters he wishes to occur.

Those DMs who can’t live without random encounter tables should refer to the Outdoor Random Encounter Tables and the Aquatic Random Encounter Tables on pages 135-137 of Monster Manual II. These tables are excellent (but not absolutely perfect) for use with the Savage Frontier. Use the COLD CIVILIZED AREAS tables for land encounters occurring within 90 miles of the Sword Coast. Use the COLD WILDERNESS AREAS tables for land encounters taking place elsewhere in the North (including the islands). For encounters at sea, use the COLD SALT WATER tables on page 137.

Another alternative is to make personalized random encounter tables. Both the Monster Manual II and the DM’s Sourcebook of the Realms from the campaign set have informative guidelines for this. These tables can include monsters, members of power groups, NPCs, and special events.

Regardless of how encounters are selected, it is an excellent practice for the DM to predetermine a number of encounters before beginning play. This gives the DM a chance to set up the statistics and motivations for NPCs or monsters encountered – particularly important if the DM is running a “storyline” campaign, where seemingly random encounters are actually an important part of the overall adventure plot. It also allows the DM to answer questions like, “What tribe are these orcs from,” “What kind of goods is that Zhentarim caravan carrying and where is it headed,” or “Why are the barbarians wandering this far south?”

Barrenland Encounters

These bleak, often hilly, barren lands seem drenched in a feeling of depression. Even the spring blossoms of gorse and heather that cover the hills seem somehow faded. Trolls are common, as they claim these lands for their own, especially the Trollmoors near Nesmé.

In the Trollmoors, the trolls appear in double-size groups and are often encountered with a 3d level troll shaman or even giant trolls.

In the Fallen Lands and the Lonely Moor, the Beast Lord’s servants scour the land, searching for monsters for their master’s breeding programs.

Nearly any dungeon monster of 10 hit dice or less can be found in the Fallen Lands.

Clear Terrain Encounters

Clear terrain in the north is mainly a grassy prairie of easy rolling hills. The Rolling Hill terrain only indicates where the hills are the most convoluted. The area immediately around cities and towns is farmland, where common encounters include cows, sheep, farmers, herders, longriders (mounted ranch hands), and military patrols (usually Waterdhavian or Neverwinter troops of the Lords' Alliance).

Merchant caravans and military patrols are constantly on the move along the major roads and navigable rivers. Folk traveling between cities in the North usually attach themselves to one or the other of these groups.

Away from civilized lands, the savage barbarians (both Uthgardt tribes and Northmen raiding bands) and wild orcs roam free. Anyone weaker than they is fair game. Trolls are still a problem, but away from the barren lands, they tend to be solitary creatures.

Rangers roam these lands, but prefer to observe and remain unseen, though they will help folk in need.

In the northern tundra of the Cold Run and Icewind Dale, the fierce tundra yeti (whose color changes with the seasons from white to brown) and the remorhaz make travel difficult.

Near the ghoulish hold, Hellgate Keep, all sorts of twisted chaotic and evil creatures lurk in the pits that dot the plains, fighting amongst themselves and snaring the unwary. Demonic creatures patrol these areas in the service of the demon masters of Hellgate.

Forest Encounters

The woods of the North are primarily broad-leaved deciduous trees, similar to the oaks, maples, elms, and birches of other worlds. Farther north, the deciduous woods give way to conifers like spruce, larch and tamarack, white and ponderosa pines. Grizzly bears, werebears, and bugbears thrive in these woods, as do the fierce northern ogres. Manticore lurk in the darker glades and small green dragons are said to inhabit the Moonwood, Lurkwood, and the Kryptgarden Forest. Outside the High Forest, treants are known to dwell only in the Coldwood. Owlbears stalk the dark glades of Southwood and the Ardeepforest. And then there are the orcs.

High Forest Encounters

The High Forest is the wildest of all woods in the North. Trees are bigger here (some approaching gigantic stature) and wildlife is more numerous, and often of giant size. It is a fairy wood, home to bright creatures like brownies, pixies, sprites, nymphs, treants and unicorns, and dark creatures like kech, forlarren, stirges, perytons and mongrel men.

Men rarely roam the wood, though intrusions into the northeastern Tall Trees section will be watched and perhaps interdicted by the many druids who dwell there. Likewise, intruders into the Woods of Turlang in the northwest may be stopped by the treants who dwell therein.

As elsewhere in the north, hunting bands of orcs roam freely, as do parties of demon-folk from Hellgate Keep.

Hill Encounters

The rolling hills of the central plains and river valleys are much like Clear Terrain. The foothills of mountains are bleaker, rougher, often rocky. Bandits make their headquarters in hills along the major thoroughfares. Goblins in the North have their homes in the hills rather than the mountains (which are usually under orc control). Hill giants usually keep to mountain foothills, though at least three clans are known to range the hills around the Crumbling Stair. In winter frost giants come down from the mountains into the hills.

Island Encounters

The outer islands of the Trackless Sea are generally rough, even mountainous rocky lands, constantly swept by stiff breezes from the chill ocean. Life is hard and the people have become equally hard in order to survive, let alone thrive.

In general, the islands are similar to mountainous terrain, though the coastlines suffer from coastal and sea encounters. The islands have varying populations of Northmen who farm, fish and raid for a living (they are a common source of Northmen pirates). Most islands have one or more clans or tribes of giants, many of whom are sea-rovers themselves.

Demi-humans are not native to these lands, so dwarves, elves, halflings and gnomes encountered out here are either merchants, adventurers, or slaves of the Northmen. Orcs are also non-native to the islands, though lesser goblin and goblinoid races (like kobolds, norkers, and meazels) abound. Giant spiders and ettercap also roam the mountainous island wildernesses. On the coastlines, scraggs (sea trolls) seek victims and plunder.

Mere of Dead Men Encounters

This is an eerie foetid swamp filled with unpleasant creatures, strange glows, sucking bogs, scummy, reeking cesspools, deadly quicksand and a general aura of unwholesomeness. It is mostly uncharted. Literally any swamp or dungeon creature could be encountered here, regardless of its customary climate. Lizardmen are the predominant sentient race here, led by their mysterious shamans, though bands of bullywugs have been seen (these are probably raiders and not natives). Penanggalen are supposed to roam here, and will-o'-(the)-wisps are numerous, as are trolls, snakes of all sizes, and jillions of insects—from clouds of tiny biters to gigantic monsters.

Mountain Encounters

The mountains in the north vary from the lower coastal ranges to the bleak Graypeaks in the west, to the towering Spine of the World range that separates the North from the frozen wastes of the Uttermost North. Orcs infest the mountains of the Savage Frontier (even the coastal ranges), making it literally impossible to travel them without encountering at least one warband or hunting party.

Here too are giants. Verbeeg, frost and fog giants lair in the Spine and Ice Mountain ranges. The Graypeaks are home to tribes of stone and mountain giants and the coastal ranges are known to contain hill giants. A clan of evil fomorian giants lurks in the southern arm of the Spine of the World near the Dungeon of the Ruins.

Men are rare in the mountains. If found at all, they are often merchants, traveling the mountain passes. However, bands of dwarves are common in all mountain ranges, though they inhabit only the Ice Mountains. Dwarves seek lost dwarfholds and are extremely suspicious of strangers (who may be after their treasure).

Galeb duhr inhabit most ranges, and yeti and taer stalk the Spine of the World and Ice Mountains, as do ice toads, hoar foxes, and winter wolves.

Dungeon monsters can also be found, usually signifying the presence of nearby ruins.

Sea Encounters

The seas of the North are home to many creatures and a number of sentient aquatic races, including sea elves, sahuagin, and merfolk. Men who roam the seas include Northmen pirates (in their longships), southern pirates (in carracks and caravels), merchant ships from all lands (usually galleons, traveling in fleets of two to five ships for safety), and ships of the Waterdeep, Neverwinter, Port Llast, Ruathym and Luskan navies (though ships of the latter two are indistinguishable from pirates in appearance and deed).

The Sea of Moving Ice provides the northern sea with towering icebergs and islands of ice flow, though these are primarily concentrated along the path of the coastal current, moving westward along a line from The Ice Peak to Tuern.

Common and uncommon creatures of the ocean include dragon turtles, whales, scraggs (sea trolls), giant octopus, water weirds, sea wolves, dolphin, and an occasional white dragon.

Uthgardt Barbarian Encounters

These barbarians can be found almost everywhere south of the Spine of the World and west of the High Forest. Use the following table to select the encountered Uthgardt tribe (though one may also use the closest ancestor mound for this purpose).

2d6 Tribe	Mound
2 Black Lion	Beorunna's Well
3 Blackraven	Ravenrock
4 Great Worm	Great Worm
5-6 Elk Tribe	Flintrock
7 Thunderbeast	Morgur's Mound
8 Red Tiger	Beorunna's Well
9 Blue Bear	Stone Stand
10 Griffon	Shining White
11 Grey Wolf	Ravenrock
12 Tree Ghost	Grandfather Tree

Unusual Encounters

The following encounters are unusual events or encounters that an adventurers might meet in the wilds of the North. Unless an encounter entry states otherwise, it can occur anywhere. The DM should adjust the number of foes to provide a challenge for parties of any level.

TROLLFOES A band of trolls, including a 3d level troll shaman and a giant two-headed troll, is locked in battle with a military patrol. In the Trollmoors, these are Riders of Nesmé. Elsewhere, they are Waterdhavian troops. The soldiers are obviously losing.

LIZARD MEANIES A troupe of lizardmen, their skins painted with camouflage markings, skulks through the underbrush, desperately trying not to be seen. They are carrying something—no, someone who does not wish to be carried. At the DM's discretion, this may be:

- a beautiful maiden.
- an aarakocra from the Star Mounts.
- a halfling merchant from the south.

GHOST SHIP A shimmering, high-prowed galley cuts straight toward the party (even on land, far from the sea). A storm seems to blow ahead of it and the sky darkens eerily. The tattered sail flies the symbols of the god of death Myrkul, floating on the waves of Umberlee's sigil. Plants wither and die in its wake. The ship is crewed by 30 seaweed-draped skeletons in the command of a pair of spectres.

A LOST SHIELD A golden, decorated shield +3 lies half-hidden by shrubbery. The emblem design on the shield is that of a Griffon Rampant. A haunt (MM2), once a valiant cavalier, lurks nearby and attempts to possess any who take the shield. The dead cavalier's mission was to rescue a southern princess taken captive and sold in Waterdeep long ago. The princess is long dead too, but at least one of her descendants bears a remarkable resemblance to her.

AN ABANDONED VILLAGE The village is like a ghost-town—no bodies, occupants or signs of violence. A thorough search uncovers a painted stone showing stick men and women entering a dark hole. A battle is taking place between the trailing stick men and other figures (men? trolls?) who follow them.

FLAMES IN THE TWILIGHT The adventurers encounter an outlying farm in flames near an agricultural town. Dark figures are visible, skulking in the red light of the flames and fearful voice cry out in terror. Strange, green light streams out through the windows and cracks between the boards of the farmhouse.

HUNTERS At a roadside campsite, the PCs encounter a band of close-mouthed travelers. Eventually their leader reveals herself to be a bounty hunter who has been unsuccessfully looking for an adventuring band. The weary hunter offers to share the reward if the party can help her. The description she gives is a dead ringer for the party when they last visited a major city. Who has put a price on the PCs' heads and why?

NECROMHARGE Organized bands of undead ravage the major trade routes. They ambush travelers, kill everyone, steal valuables and take all the bodies. Dead victims swell the raiders' ranks. Rumor of a dark mage leading armies of undead spreads like wildfire, followed by a whispered word: "Necromharge." The Lords' Alliance offers rewards for the mage's destruction.

On a lonely road, the PCs get their chance to gain the fabulous reward, as skeletons, zombies, wights, and spectres swarm out of the woods to swell their ranks.

HISTORY MYSTERY The PCs encounter a battle between a band of confused elves in archaic garb and howling orcs who dance around them. If the PCs rescue the elves, it should be apparent that they are either from Faerun's past or from another world and do not know how they came to be here.

RANGE WAR! Longriders (mounted ranch hands) from Longsaddle ranches are at war with longriders from Triboar over pasture rights. The party are assumed to be mercenaries in the pay of one side or the other. Of course, a barbarian raid could change all this.

LOCKED IN THE ICE OF THE AGES (Sea Encounter Only) An iceberg contains a huge monstrous form and a glint of gold and colorful crystal.

SKY WARS Two flying castles of exotic design pass overhead. The air between them is electrified by fireballs, meteor storms and lightning bolts that blast and scar their metal surfaces. Small creatures swarm like ants over their surfaces until one suddenly belches forth great gouts of flame and begins to go down...

THE PEOPLES OF THE NORTH

"8 Myrtul. Today, my great master Amelior Amanitas, and I his ever-humble servant Ere, set forth on our journey to Silvermoon, over 500 miles to the north. Amelior believes that the Herald's Holdfast near there will help him write about our land. But, he just wants to see Lady Alustriel again. He's going to make a fool of himself, I can see it coming.

"10 Mirtul. As usual with our aerial trips, the A. A. became deathly ill when the gasbag rose into the air and has remained greenly semi-comatose since. The fire elemental has performed well, keeping the air bag hot, but the air elemental has been a real pain. Instead of avoiding the High Forest, we are now directly over it, on a collision course with some rather sharp mountains. Nothing to be done I guess. Might as well copy over Amelior's notes."

The two major human peoples in the North are barbarians: the fair-haired Northmen who dwell along the Sword Coast and upon the outer islands, and the dark-haired Uthgardt tribes who roam the wild interior. The third major race in the North is not human at all: orcs dominate the wilds and may be the true, though disunified power in the North.

Other folk, like the dwarves, the Ice Hunters, and the lizardmen, are native to the North, but wield no great political or economic power. And though they are prolific elsewhere in the world, members of the halfling and elven races are rare in the North.

The Northmen

"Deliver us, O Lathander, from the fury of the Northmen" –A Calishite prayer

The term Northmen refers to one of several seagoing, usually warlike, peoples found along the Sword Coast north of Waterdeep and the islands to the west, including Tuern, Gundarlun, and Ruathym in the Trackless Sea and Norheim and Norland in the Moonshaes.

The tall, fair-haired, sea-loving Northmen barbarians were the third human people in the north. According to dwarven records, the peaceful Ice Hunters had ranged the far North for centuries and the folk of lost Netheril had dwelled along the Narrow Sea for millennia before the Northmen arrived.

The Northmen's primitive ancestors built small villages along the Sword Coast. Many grew into places of importance, including fabled Illusk (ancient Luskan), Eigersstor (now Neverwinter), Port Llast, and Nimoar's Hold, which the world now knows as Waterdeep.

The early Northmen avoided the wild interior. They farmed the rocky, but rich coastal lands, fished coastal waters warmed by deep north-bound currents, hunted deer in the forests, seals in the coastal rocks, and whales in the depths of the Trackless Sea. Yet with the coming of summer, the call of the sea would be irresistible to the young men and they would go a-raiding.

From Kythorn to early Marpenoth, the fierce, barbaric battle-cries of Northmen were heard in Lantan, Amn, and Tethyr; in Calimshan and other countries and cities of the Shining Sea, even as far south as fabled Nimbral.

These wild barbarians explored the Trackless Sea, discovering Tuern, Gundarlun, Ruathym, The Purple Rocks, the Whalebones, and eventually the Moonshaes (though others had been there before them).

Other Northmen braved and explored the orc-infested interior, becoming the human partners of The Fallen Kingdom, ancestors of the Uthgardt tribes, and mercenaries for lost Ascalhorn.

Though they are often referred to as barbarians, not all Northmen fit this classification. Along the Sword Coast, many of these barbaric sea raiders have become civilized, primarily due to the influence of southern folk. They farm, fish, and mine their rugged lands, then smartly trade their goods with southern merchants. Many once-feared raiders have become merchants whose skill at bargaining equals or betters the warlike talents of their ancestors, such that many a Northman merchant returns with more southern booty than do the raiders.

Still, an edge of savagery remains. The Northmen of Luskan and the islands are fierce and warlike. The warrior known as the berserker is more often than not a Northman. Fierce, fearless dragonships ply the northern waters, wily pirates who are able to outrun and outmaneuver heavily-laden merchant galleons. And each summer, the fierce, barbaric battle-cries of Northmen raiders still ring loud in the south.

Northmen Attitudes

The barbaric Northmen are bold, macho, impetuous, fierce in battle, and callous in their treatment of others. Foreigners (read as "not Northmen") and non-humans are treated with respect only if their skill in battle is obvious. Otherwise, they are weaklings, deserving scorn from "real men."

Like other barbarians, Northmen dislike magic and magic-users. In rural communities or on outer islands like Tuern and the Purple Rocks, magic-use is punishable by death. Clerics are treated with aloof disdain (even Northmen shamans receive little respect).

Northmen love a good fight and prize physical strength and weapon prowess above all other things. To prove themselves, the Northmen constantly wage war with whomever they feel that they can defeat. It is uncommon to find a Northman kingdom that is NOT at war.

They enjoy hearty food, somber songs, good drink (particularly mead and ale), treat their women with respect, but value and cherish the precious long ships beyond other property or family. True Northmen derive sensual pleasure from the appearance of a sleek long ship, its gracefully curving lines slicing easily through even rough seas.

Weapons and Proficiencies

The battle ax is the Northman's weapon of choice. With ax in one hand and a sturdy shield in the other, the Northman believes he can conquer the world. Missile weapons other than the javelin are considered weaklings' tools since they do not rely on the pure strength of the warrior.

At sea, Northmen raiders rarely wear armor heavier than studded leather and shield (AC 6). Metal armor drags one down to Umberlee's bosom too quickly. For land raids, chainmail is donned by those lucky enough to own it (AC 4). A Northman king or High Captain usually possesses plate mail.

The island Northmen possess all the primary skills known by barbarians (survival, first aid, outdoor craft, and tracking) and know the following tertiary skills: running and small craft, rowed.

Gods of The Northmen

The surly Northmen are not what one would call a "religious" people. They pay grudging homage to several gods only because those powers have control over things the Northmen do not. Tempus, the god of battles, is the only deity who receives more than cursory piety.

Likewise, the earthly agents of the gods, normally shamans, are treated with similar callousness, having a lower status than warriors. Clerics and shamans are rare and are seldom more powerful than 7th or 8th level.

The deities whom the Northmen honor include Auril, the Frostmaiden; Tempus, the Lord of Battles; Umberlee, the Bitch Queen; and occasionally Valkur the Mighty. In rare instances Malar is worshipped, but usually only by those berserkers who revel in battle fury. Northmen rarely devote themselves to one god, but honor their three primary deities: Tempus, Auril and Umberlee, when they are within that deity's sphere of influence.

The Northmen see Auril as the bringer of winter on the world, an important part of their existence. They placate her with offerings of food and strong drink in autumn and winter, placed upon rafts set adrift at sea. In times of dire distress, human sacrifices may be the meal placed on the raft. Such sacrifices are usually taken from prisoners or slaves, but not always.

Warriors worship Tempus before battles. He is the berserker's patron, protector of those who succumb to berserking frenzy. He too takes human sacrifice—prisoners taken in battle.

The seafaring Northmen give great respect (and fear) to Umberlee, goddess of oceans, waves and currents—the ocean gladly accepts their customary sacrifices before each voyage. The longer the journey, the greater the sacrifice. As with other Northmen deities, Umberlee receives human sacrifices. She is believed to cause shipwrecks and drownings, and is the mistress of the sharks that endanger stranded sailors.

Berserkers

Some Northmen fighters (a 20% chance per individual) have the ability to drive themselves into a berserker frenzy in battle. Warriors who demonstrate this aptitude are often gathered by their king into a royal bodyguard or unit of elite soldiers. The fighters can bring on the berserker rage simply by contemplating imminent combat, or in response to a surprise attack.

Berserker Northmen receive either a +2 bonus to hit, or they may attack twice per round (never both) and need never check morale. For the purposes of BATTLESYSTEM™ Fantasy Combat Supplement rules, they have a discipline of 0. If a player wishes to avoid having his Northmen consumed by berserker rage, he can make a morale check before the fighters go berserk. This check suffers a -2 penalty, but if it succeeds, the Northmen do not become berserk during that fight.

Dragon Ships of The North

The long ship of the North is the love of the Northman's life. You will never find one of these war ships used as a fishing vessel. Also known as "dragon ships" due to the carved figureheads mounted on many of these proud northern warships, they conform closely to the drakkar (the Viking Dragon Ship described in the DMG, pp. 53-54). The long ship is a square-sailed, oared ship with a single mast that can be unstepped (removed). Their open, deckless, relatively light hulls are "clinker" built, that is, with overlapping planks riveted together. This flexible hull lets the ship sail over the waves, instead of having to force its hull through them. In mountainous seas, though, the open hold makes even the flexible long ship susceptible to foundering.

Long ships are the fastest ships along the Sword Coast in most weather. Even the multi-masted caravels of the south cannot outrun a long ship with a strong breeze at its stern.

A typical long ship is crewed by 40 men, warriors all. Each warrior's sea chest is his oar bench. See the Ships of the North table in Islands of the North for long ship statistics.

Regional Northman Differences

GUNDS The folk of Gundarlun are excellent merchants and fishermen, more reverent to the gods than the average Northmen. They favor the sword over the ax and even poorer folk dress in garb made of colorful southern cloth.

Gunds are found as adventurers or mercenaries along the Sword Coast. They have only a 50% chance to gain the benefits of the barbarian character class and are rarely berserkers.

The figureheads on their long ships often depict fish (perhaps marlins or swordfish) and predatory birds (such as ernes and ospreys).

TUERNISH The isolated folk of Tuern worship no gods (and argue that none exist) and tolerate no magic-users in their midst, but give tribute to the red dragons of the mountains. They try to enslave all non-Northmen and, when visiting other lands, deface temples of the gods.

They sail long ships big enough to house giants (which they often do), with figureheads that depict fierce warriors. Most have crews of over 100 warriors.

RUATHYN AND LUSKANITES

Though they are separated by 1,800 miles of open ocean, the Ruathyn (the people of Ruathym) and the Luskanites are closely related. They dress in furs, wear horned helmets, constantly raid settlements along the coast and on the Moonshaes, attack ships on the high seas, and hate Waterdhavians, elves, halflings, southerners, and each other.

They trust only their weapons. The figureheads on their ships favor red and white dragons, as do their sails.

ROCKLANDERS The people of the Purple Rocks were once a Gundarlun colony. There are no aged here and no children. The skins of all the people are unusually scarred and weathered. For Northmen, the Rocklanders are unusually warm and friendly, though their smiles may seem fake. They appear to worship the usual Northman deities, but their graven images of those gods all show many, tentacle-like arms. Their long ships favor squid-like figure heads.

The Uthgardt Barbarians

"Blood flowed like spring melt water from Uthgar's wounds as he stood before his sons on the massive skull of Gurt, the lord of the pale giants. With voice unweakened, he spoke of his gift.

"Mighty Tempus declares that I may no longer walk among you. I will not go without leaving you a final gift. You know that I have fought the beast gods and taken from each a part of their strength, which I in turn give to you.

“Teach the children these secrets. If they devote themselves to the beast gods, then they may call upon the beasts’ power.”

“And so speaking, Uthgar mounted his sky pony and joined his father Beorunna in the war halls of Tempus.”

The Uthgardt barbarians (named for Uthgar, their legendary founder) conform closely to the barbarian character class defined in Unearthed Arcana, and gain that class’s benefits.

The Uthgardt are a black-haired and blue-eyed people—large, hardy folk descended from a mixture of Northmen fugitives, Netherese refugees, and a few savage tribes, including the Beorunni (folk of Beorunna); who live by raiding, hunting, gathering, and farming.

The Uthgardt are divided into 10 tribes (at the present). Sometimes there are more, sometimes less. The tribes are named for the beast totems which Uthgar conquered—Black Lion, Thunderbeast, Red Tiger, Blue Bear, Great Worm, Sky Pony, Tree Ghost, Black-raven, Griffon, and Grey Wolf. Although civilization has come to the north in waves throughout history, much of the land is wild and untamed, the unbounded home of the Uthgardt. Their tribal lands extend north into the Spine of the World, south as far as The Stone Bridge, east to the Cold Wood, and west to Neverwinter Wood. They avoid cities, the High Forest and the lands around Hellgate Keep.

Although some tribes have embraced agriculture and fixed habitations, the Uthgardt have few stable villages. Most tribes wander the wilderness in small clan or family groups and live within a few weeks’ travel of their ancestor mounds, their holiest of holy grounds.

Uthgardt Attitudes

Tradition is the centerpole of Uthgardt life. Yet it is blind devotion to tradition that keeps them savages. Strength is everything and civilization is a weakness not to be tolerated. Among the Uthgardt, men are warriors and hunters, and women tend to food gathering and family needs. They have no written language and little art beyond geometric carvings and clothing decoration. Their religions and philosophies focus on war, plunder, and survival in a harsh land.

They are superstitious, with a paranoiac dislike of magic. To reveal oneself as a magic-user to an Uthgardt warrior is to ask him to kill you.

The Uthgardt barbarians have little to do with city folk, other than to treat them as prey. Lone traveler or large caravan, both are ripe fruit for plunder (still, some Uthgardt have made beneficial “civilized” alliances).

Though the Uthgardt prey on civilized folk and frequently fight among themselves, they are quick to unite, even with non-Uthgardt, against their common ancestral enemy: the orcs.

Clothing and Appearances

Most Uthgardt show the strong Netherese bloodlines in their dark hair and fair skin, like the folk of Silverymoon and Sundabar. From Northmen ancestors come mighty physique and blue eyes. The barbarians dress in fringed leathers and furs. They love bright colors, gaudy jewelry, and ornamental decoration—everything they own is embellished with complicated designs and geometric patterns interwoven with designs representing their tribal totems and other beasts. The men of the tribe tattoo their cheeks with simple images of their totem, and the women are the showcase for their warriors’ victories, wearing captured booty proudly.

Tribal Weapons and Proficiencies

In addition to the hand axe, knife, and spear, the Uthgardt favor the battle axe, atlatl and javelin, and the long bow. The most common Uthgardt armor is leather and shield (AC 7). Some warriors possess studded leather and shield (AC 6). A tribal chieftain may possess chain-mail and shield (AC 4). In most cases, the shield is a spiked buckler (which can be used as a weapon).

The Uthgardt possess all the primary skills known by barbarians (survival, first aid, outdoor craft, and tracking) and know the following tertiary skills: long distance signalling, running, and snare building.

Religion in The Tribes

Within the Uthgardt, all deities are allied to a central religion focusing on beast totems. Each tribe has its own totem. All other deities, including adopted “foreign” gods, are secondary and subservient to the beast gods. This includes Tempus (the Uthgardt war god) and Chauntea (the earth goddess, although she is worshipped exclusively by tribal women). Uthgardt legend tells that Tempus is the father of Uthgar, founder of the tribes (while other legends claim Uthgar’s descendancy from Beorunna). Chauntea is worshipped as the “grandmother,” whose daughters (fathered by Uthgar after he ascended unto the halls of Tempus) are the wives of the beast gods.

These nonbeast gods are represented among the tribes by shamans of lesser power (rarely above 4th level). Chauntea’s clerics are always women.

“Southern” gods are occasionally found in tribal strongholds, tolerated only because they or their clerics provide something valuable to the tribe.

Beast Totem Cults

The Uthgardt barbarian tribes each worship one of the beasts whose powers were taken by Uthgar. The totem cult encompasses the worship of the tribe’s ancestors, including Uthgar, his sons, and long-dead chieftains and shamans.

Tribal shamans (tribal spell-casters of limited power—see DMG p. 40) are the magical power within the tribes.

Shamans have the same hit dice as human clerics. They dress in barbarian garb, but their clothing is decorated with magical symbols and relics fortified with holy power and prayer. When a shaman dies, his relics are buried with him in his ancestor mound.

Sacred Bundle The holiest of these relics is the shaman's sacred bundle, an enchanted leather satchel containing spell components and objects too holy for others to see. These objects have been gained by the shaman at the request of his ancestral spirits. Each sacred bundle is protected by a guardian spirit (see summon ancestor below) who appears from the bag if it is opened by anyone other than its owner.

Spells and Powers In addition to their normal magical spells, the Uthgardt shamans have two special abilities—one a power and the other a spell.

Beast Power

Level: (usable once per day)
 Range: 0" (Touch)
 Duration: 1 turn/level of caster
 Area of Effect: One person
 Components: V,S,M
 Casting Time: 6 segments
 Saving Throw: None

Explanation/Description: A shaman may call upon the tribe's beast power once per day. Beast power is a special ability the effects of which are different for each totem cult. In essence, it allows the shaman to wield a special ability unique to his totem. The power may be personally used by the shaman, or its effects may be granted to another devoted follower of the totem.

Although not a spell, this power requires that the shaman possess a sacred bundle and a holy symbol (usually a carving symbolizing the totem beast). The individual power effects are given in the Uthgardt tribe descriptions.

Summon Ancestor

Level: 3
 Range: 1"/level of caster
 Duration: 2 rounds/level of caster
 Area of Effect: One spirit
 Components: V,S,M
 Casting Time: 4 rounds
 Saving Throw: None

Explanation/Description: When a shaman casts this spell upon his tribe's ancestor mound, it causes an ancestor to come forth, drawn back as a spirit, a ghost-like creature of neutral alignment. The spirit takes form as a transparent being, a combination of totem beast and primitive human. To select the type of spirit summoned, the DM rolls 1d20 and matches the result against the table below.

When the spirit appears, the summoner must make a Wisdom Ability Check to control it; otherwise the spirit becomes an uncontrolled ghost and immediately attacks all living beings around it. The number following the type of spirit is a modifier that is added to the shaman's 1d20 roll during the Ability Check. However, even an uncontrolled spirit may not travel more than 50 feet from the ancestor mound.

A controlled spirit may perform the following functions for a shaman: attack a foe (as a ghost), guard the ancestor mound for a year (until freed again at the next Runemeet), tell the shaman ancient secrets, initiate a new shaman (only ancestral shaman spirits may do this), or raise dead (as the 5th level clerical spell). This last power can only be performed by spirits whose name is followed by an "R." In payment for the last power, the spirit drains 1d4 experience levels from the person being raised and may demand (at the DM's discretion) an annual tribute of riches to be buried in or near its tomb.

The spell requires a sacred bundle, a relic of the desired ancestor (though another may appear) and a small bonfire.

Spirit Summoning Table

If a specific "normal" ancestor is summoned, roll 1d20. If the result is 15 or less, the desired spirit comes and the control roll modifier is -5.

d20 Ancestor	Modifier
1-5 Recently dead shaman	- 2
6-10 Recently dead chieftain	-3
11-13 Long dead shaman	+1 (R)
14-16 Long dead chieftain	-
17 Ancient shaman	+5 (R)
18-19 Ancient chieftain	+4 (R)
20 Special (see below)

Special Spirits

d20 Special Spirit	Modifier
1-12 Beast power incarnation*	+8 (R)
13-16 Son of Uthgar	+12 (R)
17-19 Uthgar	+15 (R)
20 Beast god 	+17 (R)

* This is the ghostly form of the beast totem. It can remain for a number of days equal to the level of the shaman. Unlike an ancestor spirit, it may leave the vicinity of the mound. Each day it can bestow the tribe's beast power on a number of followers equal to the summoner's level, minus the number of days it has remained on the prime plane.

 The beast gods are wild deities. If summoned, one usually possesses the summoner (or someone nearby) and then decides what to do with its newfound physical form. The possessed body becomes a 20th level barbarian (for hit points and attack rolls) with the spells and abilities of a 20th level druid. The avatar of the beast god can assume the beast form or use the tribe's beast power at will.

The Runemeet

The Uthgardt religion is close to nature and is tied to the change of the seasons. The holiest time of year occurs during the autumnal equinox during the month of Eleint (coincides with the festival of Higharvestide). At this time, all tribal clans converge on the tribe's ancestral mound for the annual Runemeet. These huge earthworks mounds, often shaped like the totem beasts, are sacred burial grounds, where only the greatest shamans and chiefs are interred. Here the Uthgardt worship their gods, set tribal policy, perform marriages, celebrate births, formalize adoptions, and mourn deaths.

During the Runemeet, youths desiring to be adults and warriors of all ages participate in the ritual of the Rune-hunt, in which those involved seek victory over one the tribe's ritual enemies—usually orcs.

The Uthgardt Tribes

Taken as a whole, the separate tribes form the Uthgardt people, yet they have individual distinctions that divide them and quash any possibility of unity as a people. This diversity is expressed as cultural variances, devotion to their unique totems, and tribal goals.

Each tribe has an ancestor mound where they worship their totems (and other gods) each fall during the Runemeet. Several share mounds with other tribes, while some mounds are lost or abandoned.

Each tribe is ruled by a chieftain, who may also style himself as king. The chieftains are barbarian class fighters, usually of 8th to 13th level.

Chief shamans are the most powerful in their tribe, usually 7th level or better and normally accompany the chieftain. Other shamans of lesser or even equal power exist within each tribe.

The ritual enemy is a foe whom young barbarians must challenge and overcome in order to become adults. It is also the focus of ritual hunts during the annual Runemeet. Orcs are the common ritual foe of all Uthgardt, but each tribe has its own personal enemy.

As described previously, the beast power is a magical ability possessed only by tribal shamans.

Black Lion Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Beorunna's Well

Chieftain: Alaric the Strong

Cleric: Patreveni Onehand

Shaman: Bogohardt Blackmane

Ritual Enemy: the tundra barbarians (tribes beyond the Spine of the World).

Beast Power: Lion's Roar. Deafens foes for 1d6 turns if they do not make a saving throw vs. spells. Only Bogohardt can still wield this power.

The black lion is long gone from the north, yet the tribe that bears its name lives on. Chief Alaric's badge of office is said to be a cape made of black lion skin (those who claim to have seen it recall only a mangy scrap of dirty black furl.

Nestled in the wide valley that separates the North from the glacier beyond is the small village of Beorunna's Well (mostly small huts, long houses and a few tents), which stands a respectful distance from the watery pit that is its name-sake. Here, the complacent Black Lions have forsaken tradition to become farmers and herders. Hunters still roam the wilds, but the tribe no longer depends upon them for survival. Agricultural success lets them trade with others for their needs.

In forsaking their barbarian traditions, they have also cast aside their tribal totem. Most folk of Beorunna's Well worship the Tyr alliance of Tyr, Torm, Ilmater and Helm.

Beorunna's Well is one of the most sacred sites of the Uthgar barbarians. The folk here sense its eldritch nature and fear it more than they revere it. During Runemeet, the Red Tiger tribe performs the required rituals while the Black Lions avoid entering the well.

Blackraven Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Ravenrock

Chieftain: Ostagar Tenfeather

Shaman: Pureheartman

Ritual Enemies: Griffon tribe and foreign merchants and clerics

Beast Power: Shapechange. The wily raven gives his shamans the power to assume the form of any natural animal (not dungeon monsters) native to the North.

Of all the Uthgardt, the Blackraven are the most conservative, holding tightly to the old ways and reacting violently to the new. Pureheartman and his assistant, Wulphgehar, are the only shamans tolerated by the tribe. As far as the caravans who ply the north are concerned, the Blackravens are the worst of the tribes. Blackraven warriors are renowned as bandits, gaining this reputation because they prey on those whom they despise the most—foreigners, especially merchants and missionary clerics. They seek to destroy that which may threaten their way of life. The tribe is aided in their quest by their totem, the gigantic ravens of Ravenrock. The raiders sit astride massive ravens, swooping down out of the sky to rob and terrorize caravans. The Blackravens have little respect for tribes who dwell in towns (particularly the Thunderbeast and Griffon tribes), since those tribes have adopted foreign ways. In return, they are enemies of those tribes. King Gundar Brontoskin (Thunderbeast chieftain) offers a bounty for the destruction of the Blackravens' eggs.

Because their raiding spoils are tainted with foreign influence (including gold, jewelry, weapons, fabric, etc.), these items are sacrificed to the Blackraven and secreted away in Blackraven shrine, near the Ravenrock ancestor mound. The Blackravens protect their shrine closely and do not welcome foreign intrusion. Woe betide the person who is caught searching for (let alone robbing) the tribe's treasure-laden shrine.

Blue Bear Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Stone Stand

Chieftain: Hlutwig Long-throw

Shaman: Tanta Hagara

Ritual Enemy: Civilized farmers

Beast Power: Bear fury. The recipient of this power grows claws, increases in strength and can claw and bear-hug attack like a cave bear.

This tribe is evil, a pawn of Hellgate Keep. The Uthgardt tribes stand united in their enmity towards the infamous Blue Bear tribe. No longer a mere spirit, the blue bear totem has become demon-like due to the tribe's association with the evil within Hellgate Keep. Likewise, the tribesfolk have degenerated and become brutal, possibly even more savage than orcs.

GAME INFORMATION: Tanta Hagara is not human; she is an annis, a haglike giantess from Hellgate Keep. She seeks Grandfather Tree, the tribe's lost ancestor mound. She has a unique way of dealing with the tribe's captives... she eats them.

Elk Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Flintrock
Chieftain: Zokan Thunderer
Shaman: Berchtwald Bandylegs (Elk totem), Trothgar Grunald (Auril)
Ritual Enemy: "The ancient ones" (any old ruin, tomb, or evidence of ancient civilization qualifies).

Beast Power: Horns of Wisdom. This is the same as the clerical spell commune, except that it causes elk antlers to grow from the skull of the shaman. Each use causes additional horn growth.

The Elk tribe's normal range includes the Evermoors, the plains east of the Dessarin and the Dessarin and lower Surbrin river valleys. Of all the tribes, they are the most arrogant, surly and self-indulging. Considered by many to be little more than bandits, they often raid other tribal settlements for food, women, and sport. They have loose ties with the rulers of Luskan but are unwelcome elsewhere. Chief Zokan Thunderer is regarded by most as a vulgar thug. Under his rule, clerics of the Talos alliance have gained a strong hold on the tribe.

Great Worm Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Great Worm Cavern
Chieftain: Bardawulf Boldheart
Shaman: Elrem, called "The Wise"
Ritual Enemy: Evil creatures
Beast Power: Breathe fire three times as a red dragon of same hit dice.

The most notable feature of this tribe is its chief shaman, Elrem the Wise. Imagine a gigantic, bat-winged snake with the head of a red dragon and you will have a picture of this tribe's mythical totem and its elder shaman. Unlike most other tribal shamans, Elrem is not human. He is a great worm, possibly the only great worm in existence (though tribal legend states that he was once human and may be one of Uthgar's sons). Elrem sleeps year round in the depths of Great Worm Cavern, waking once each year at the Runemeet to prophesy of the future, based on his dream travels.

Through Elrem's guidance, the tribe has chosen evil creatures (orcs, giants, creatures of Hellgate Keep, etc.) as ritual enemies.

Grey Wolf Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Ravenrock
Chieftain: Alrik Tenstone
Shaman: Clovis Greenteeth
Ritual Enemy: The orcs of Gauntlgrym
Beast Power: Lycanthropy. Regardless of the phase of the moon, the shaman may assume wolf form, or awaken latent lycanthropy in another tribesman.

Though they are not the most numerous or the most powerful, this is the most feared of the Uthgardt tribes. Long ago, the tribe adopted human refugees from the lost city of Gauntlgrym. The evil that had possessed the city caused the tribe to be cursed with lycanthropy. Any tribesman who possesses Greywolf blood becomes a wolf under the light of the moon (although those who are adopted by other tribes slowly lose the curse). On moonlit nights, the entire tribe roams the wilderness in search of prey.

During Runemeet, the Blackraven tribe tolerates the Grey Wolves at their shared ancestor mound of Ravenrock—so long as the moon is not full.

Griffon Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Shining White
Chieftain: Kralgar Bonesnapper
Shaman: Adalfus Stormgatherer
Ritual Enemy: The cities of the North
Beast Power: Griffonbeak. The spell target's head becomes a griffon head, capable of biting for 2d8 damage.

Chief Kralgar Bonesnapper is a popular man of great charisma, and even greater ambition. Since assuming leadership, he has pushed his people towards greater accomplishments, making the Griffons foremost among the tribes in power, skill, and learning. His great goal is the conquest and possession of one of the northern cities. To this end, he has declared ritual war on the cities. Unallied clans seeking either plunder or the benefits offered by cities have joined the Griffons, swelling their ranks.

Even so, Griffons' Nest, the primary tribal encampment, rivals some of the smaller northern cities. Without realizing it, Kralgar may accomplish his goal within his lifetime as Griffon's Nest slowly changes from camp to city.

While the tribe wages incessant warfare against the cities, they welcome contact with outsiders, considering all as potential allies in their quest.

Red Tiger Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Beorunna's Well
Chieftain: Adalwulf Longfang
Shaman: Garinen the Maker
Ritual Enemy: Blue Bear tribe
Beast Power: Shapechange to tiger, as the 7th level druid ability.

Like their totem beast (which is also called the snow cat, since its fur changes color in winter), this tribe is wild and solitary. They hunt in very small family groups and roam widely, primarily in the Cold Wood. They are wary of all strangers and would sooner avoid contact with things or folk which they do not know. The tribe has few shamans and no shrines other than Beorunna's Well. The men of the Red Tiger tribe are strictly hunters, leaving gathering and trading to the women, elderly and children. The Red Tigers believe that the true test of a hunter is the ability to bring down prey unaided. Often, their only weapons are “tiger claws,” short wooden handles embedded with three sharp stone daggers. The hunter holds these so the daggers project between the fingers like claws.

The Red Tigers are loyal to King Gundar Brontoskin of the Thunderbeasts, who won their respect during a Rune-meet Runehunt by bringing back a leucrotta, slain with only a pair of tiger claws.

Thunderbeast Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Morgur’s Mound
Chieftain: King Gundar Brontoskin
Shaman: Kierkrad Seventoes
Druid: Wisteria Borsdotter (Silvanus)
Cleric: Sigurd Gandolfsson (Tyr)
Ritual Enemy: Wolves
Beast Power: Cause skin to temporarily become tough and gnarly like dinosaur hide (AC 5). As the recipient of the spell walks, the ground shakes.

The Town of Grunwald on the edge of the High Forest is home to this most civilized of the tribes. Although, he wields no official power over the other tribes, King Gundar has the charisma and respect necessary to call the tribes together into a horde.

The tribe takes its name from the apatosaurus (brontosaurus), which in ancient times roamed here. Tribal shamans claim that thunderbeasts still dwell in the High Forest. The clan’s hearth at Morgur’s Mound is surmounted by an apatosaurus skeleton. It said that in time of great need, the tribal shamans can animate the skeleton to fight in the tribe’s defense.

In addition to the Beast Cult shamans, the Thunderbeast tribe in Grunwald has grown civilized enough to tolerate priests of other religions, primarily the druids of Silvanus, and the clerics of the Tyr alliance.

Tree Ghost Tribe

Ancestor Mound: Grandfather Tree
Chieftain: Gunther Longtooth
Shaman: Chungred Ghostheart
Ritual Enemy: Evil undead creatures
Beast Power: Druid magic. The shaman may perform any one druid spell up to 4th level (may be different each time).

The Tree Ghosts are wanderers who search for Grandfather Tree, their lost and abandoned ancestor mound. At Runemeet, they worship at whichever ancestor mound is most convenient before resuming their wandering again.

Unlike the other Uthgardt tribes, the Tree Ghosts totem is not a beast. The Tree Ghost is a woodland spirit, similar in some respects to an elemental, but drawing life, energy and intelligence from the forest and giving back its energy to the forest as a caretaker and guardian. Supposedly, each forest has a Tree Ghost whose power depends on the size of that forest. The elves disclaim the existence of such beings, but the Tree Ghost tribe stands firm in its belief in their tribal totem and are able to draw on the spirit’s power.

The Tree Ghosts are cordial to foreigners, but will not ask for outsiders’ help in their holy quest for their ancestor mound. Although as a rule the barbarians hold the civilized folk of the north in disdain, the Tree Ghost warriors owe allegiance to High Lady Alustriel of Silvermoon and would die to a man for her.

“20 Mirtul. Spent night in Hall of Four Ghosts. Real creepy. A. A. says the birdmen were aarakocra and that they’re really nice folk.”

“21 Mirtul. Out of all the places in the world, we run into someone Amelior knows here—a blue dragon! Dragon agrees to take us as far as Everlund!”

Other Folk of The North

Aarakocra

The aarakocra, the bird men of the Star Mounts, are the extremely secretive descendants of one of the ancient creator races. Were it not for an occasional sighting made of manlike forms flying above the High Forest, mankind would be totally unaware of their presence here. They dwell in six small villages on the upper slopes of the central mountains. At least one village is located at the headwaters of The Unicorn Run.

GAME INFORMATION: Each village has a shaman (6th level cleric) with access to the spells listed for tribal spellcasters in the DMG and the spells cloudburst and speak with dead.

Barbarians of Icewind Dale

“The men of the tundra”

The tribes north of the Ten Towns eke out a harsh and bitter life on the tundra between the Reghed glacier (part of the Endless Ice Seal and the Sea of Moving Ice. The men of the tundra are tall, taller than most southerners by a head. They tend to be fair haired (blond, red or light brown) and blue-eyed. Like all barbarians, they are suspicious of magic, equating it with both weakness and evil. The only power they recognize is the power of a man’s weapon arm.

Each of their several tribes was formerly ruled by a king. Known tribes were the Tribe of the Elk, the Tribe of the Wolf, the Tribe of the Bear, and the Tribe of the Tiger.

In the recent past, they sought to invade the Ten-Towns of Icewind Dale, only to be repulsed by an unexpected alliance of the Towns themselves and the dwarves of Kelvin’s Cairn. The barbarian warriors were destroyed.

Heafstaag, the wily king of the Tribe of the Elk, allied the survivors with the evil wizard Akar Kessell for the evil wizard’s attack on the Ten Towns. Wulfgar, a barbarian youth whose life had been spared by the dwarf Bruenor, slew Heafstaag in a challenge combat and became king. He brought the barbarians to the Ten Towns, but as allies of the Townsfolk, not enemies. With their aid, the Townsfolk repulsed Kessell's horde. Now only a few small tribes roam the wilderness, the others dwell in the Ten-Towns, slowly learning the ways of civilization. Their leader is Revjak, an older barbarian who succeeded Wulfgar Dragon-slayer, and who rules from Caer-Konig, which the barbarians rebuilt (along with Bremen) after the battle.

The tundra barbarians worship tribal beast totems and Tempos god of battle (their name for the war-god Tempus). Unlike the Uthgardt barbarians, the tundra barbarian shamans cannot call upon their totem's beast power.

GAME INFORMATION: These barbarians are identical to the fighter subclass described in Unearthed Arcana. The barbarians dwelling on the tundra can raise a horde of 250 men. The barbarians in the towns can manage 500.

Dwarves

In the North, the grim, dour dwarves normally choose to separate themselves from other folk. They stand alone when other races band together for safety. It should be no surprise that few dwarven communities survive here. Frigid Ironmaster on the shores of The Cold Run and Citadel Adbar in the Ice Mountains to the east are the only dwarf holds of any consequence remaining in the North, though several Northern cities, notably Mirabar, Neverwinter, Silverymoon, and Sundabar, have dwarven quarters within their walls.

Dwarves in the North acknowledge but one dwarven king, Harbomm of Citadel Adbar and are more loyal to tribe and clan than to king. Yet in time of need the clans unite under the king's banner.

The dwarves of the North are the finest forge-men and metal-crafters in Faerun (so they say) and produce armor and weapons beyond compare. Merchants of Sundabar still bring magical weapons south from Citadel Adbar for sale in the markets of the realms. While the demand for such wondrous weapons and armor is high, the production of them is rapidly diminishing.

Every year the number of dwarves dwindles; the birth of young dwarves does not keep pace with battle losses and the deaths of the aged and infirm. Craft masters die with their secrets and young smiths find too much call for their services in battle.

GAME INFORMATION: Dwarven NPCs and warbands who hail from Adbar or Ironmaster will usually be armed in the best possible armor and each dwarf has a percentage chance equal to his level multiplied by 5 (per item) of having one of the following: a magical weapon, a magical shield, and magical armor.

The Ice Hunters

"Ancient Men of the North"

This ancient people lived here long before other humans. They tend to be short, dark haired, broad-faced, with light-brown skin. They were the original primitives dwelling on the shores of the Trackless Sea. The arrival of the "Northmen" drove them further and further north until now they live only in small tribal communities along The Cold Run and on The Ice Peak (though several villages, like Icewolf, have become Northmen towns).

The Ice Hunters have stolidly resisted the culture of other peoples. They live simple, rarely violent lives — fishing and hunting seal, whale, walrus and polar bear on the vast floes of the Sea of Moving Ice.

On land, they travel by dog-drawn sleds. At sea, they use small water-tight boats of seal-hide called khyeks and larger boats call oumyeks.

Though quite primitive, the Ice Hunters are noted for their wisdom. They are protective of their real names, and use only nicknames when dealing with outsiders. Ice Hunter nicknames are based on nature and rarely indicate personal prowess or achievement, such as "Sky in the Morning," "Red Seal Man," "Ten Dogs," "Reindeer Girl," etc.

The Ice Hunters and their witch doctors (cleric/magic-users) worship beast totems, mostly animals important to their survival, including Clever Oomio the grey seal, Grandfather Walrus, Great White Bear, and Pindalpau-pau the reindeer mother.

GAME INFORMATION: Ice Hunters have higher wisdom than other peoples. An Ice Hunter character would add +2 to his Wisdom characteristic. Ice Hunters are usually of lawful alignments. An Ice Hunter witch doctor uses spells as described on page 40 of the DMG, but may also use the following spells upon reaching 4th level (as if they were 2nd level spells), but each only once per week: wind wall, monster summoning I (summons arctic creatures only), wall of ice, and cone of cold.

Lizardmen

The lizardmen of the Mere of Dead Men are the degenerate descendants of a reptilian creator race. While they do not hate mankind or demi-humans, they have no interest in them either. In fact, they treat all other sentient beings, except dragons, as animals (which are used for food). Sightings of lizardmen usually describe them dancing wildly around megalithic stone menhirs (rough stone pillars) or skulking about Uthgardt ancestor mounds.

GAME INFORMATION: Lizardmen of the Mere are always accompanied by a shaman of 1d6+1 levels. There is a 1 in 20 chance that the group will be in the service of a lizardman lich and an additional 1 in 20 chance that the lich actually accompanies the lizardmen! If lizardmen encounter either bullywugs or aarakroca, the lizardmen attempt to capture them for later sacrifice.

Orc Religion and Magic

The orcs in the North worship an alliance of chaotic, orcish gods, including Gruumsh, Bahgtur, Shargass, Ilneval, Yurtrus, and Luthic. As described earlier, these orcish gods are identical to the descriptions given in Unearthed Arcana. The shamans and witch doctors who worship these gods devote themselves to a single deity.

In addition to the clerical spells granted by the god, they may control creatures associated with their deity, using them as mounts, familiars, or body guards. Shamans of Baghtru are often mounted on mighty oxen. Shamans of Shargass can summon bats, including giant bats and the colossal doombats which can be ridden as mounts. Shamans of Yurtrus may animate dead to create skeletons and zombies. Priestesses of Luthic (also shamans) are often protected by several cave bears.

Orc holy spots are marked by huge cairns (piles) of skulls, including orc, human, elven, dwarven and other humanoid races. Orcs are so devoted to their holy sites that they become berserk if they discover a desecrated site, destroying all they encounter in their frenzy (see Northmen berserker rules).

Orc tribal names are variants of one of the orcish gods' holy symbols. Thus the holy icon of the Stinking Claw orcs would be a rotting claw, possibly a variant of Yurtrus's white hand.

Orc Regional Distinctions

In the North, the orcs are grouped into five rough divisions, based on geographical location: the Spine of the World orcs, the Trollmoor orcs, the Ice Mountain orcs, the High Forest orcs and the Fallen Lands orcs.

Spine of the World Orcs

In these bleak mountains, the most powerful orc tribes skulk in stone fortresses stolen from the dwarves and renamed. Eyegad, Tarne and Vokan with their gloomy squat buildings and oppressive black temples are the visible tips of sprawling underground tunnel and cavern complexes that house tribes with names like Skortchclaw, Skreetch, and Bleeding Eye. Others like the Slashers and Orcs of the Severed Tongue lurk in the unnumbered small caves that pepper the valleys and passes of these mineral-rich mountains.

GAME INFORMATION: The Skortchclaw tribe, under King Ugra Ngarl, is forcing goblin slaves to mine mithril beneath Fortress Eyegad. The mithril is apparently being sold in great quantity to someone in the High Forest.

Trollmoor Orcs

These orcs who dwell in the barren Evermoors are loosely organized and rove the moors in bands preying on travelers on the Evermoor Way, attacking boats on the Rauvin and raiding against outlying settlements near Nesmé and Everlund, and organizing in the fall to attack the Uthgardt Runemeet at Flintrock. Known orc tribes in the moors include the Vile Rune, Dripping Spear, Bonesnapper, Red Murderer, and Throat Slitter tribes.

GAME INFORMATION: Trollmoor orcs have only witch doctors, never shamans. They worship the non-orcish god, Bhaal.

Ice Mountains Orcs

Most of these are orcs loyal to King Graul, son of Eldoul. The rest (over 40,000 in the Citadel of Many Arrows alone) follow Obould, an orc of giant stature and fighting prowess (though Obould is said to pay fealty to Graul). The Ice Mountains orcs wage constant war with the dwarves of Citadel Adbar and stage frequent raids against Silvermoon and Sundabar.

The High Forest Orcs

These orcs dwell in tunnels and small villages about two days' journey into the wood. They are arch-foes of rangers and are suspected to possess forestry skills. They worship a demipower called the Wild Hunter, a lawful evil variant of the Master of the Hunt (as described in the Celtic Mythos section of the Legends and Lore cyclopedia). Orc tribes in the High Forest include the Tanglethorn, Sharpspike, Bloody Eye, and Horned Lord tribes.

GAME INFORMATION: Due to their woodland habitat, orcs of the High Forest have the non-magical abilities of rangers (but gain no pluses in battle against goblin class creatures). Wild Hunter shamans actually grow stag antlers from their heads and may substitute druidical spells for clerical spells.

The Fallen Lands Orcs

The orcs of the northern Fallen Lands and Graypeaks follow King Ogrash, a powerful orcish shaman and warrior who is reputed to wield Skullripper, a halberd +3. To the south, many petty orcish kings wage constant battle against each other. More often than not, orcs encountered in the southern region will be involved in battle with other orcs. Known tribes of the Fallen Lands include King Ogrash's Bloody Scar tribe, and the Black Slasher, Severed Fist, Seven Eye, and Black Bone tribes.

GAME INFORMATION: Orcs of the Fallen Lands have cavalry—20% of all encountered orc bands will be mounted on ugly, black, ostrich-like flightless birds (use ostrich statistics). Most mounted orcs have short bows and lances.

Trolls

After orcs, trolls are the scourge of the Savage Frontier. The "everlasting ones" roam the wilds, chasing, attacking and eating all they meet.

GAME INFORMATION: The trolls in the Evermoors (Trollmoors) travel in bands of 3-18 trolls. Each band has a 25% chance to include 1d3 giant trolls and an additional 30% chance to contain a 3d level troll shaman.

CITIES, TOWNS AND VILLAGES

"Hrrumphh. It is just beyond reason. I can't imagine the guardians of the Herald's Hold-fast refusing me, me of all people, en trance to the fortress. Were it not for the good Lady Alustriel our trip should have been for nothing."

(A.A. always pauses after saying her name. Gone gooney, I knew it).

"I am not gooney I should have let the dragon eat you when you said that about his mother The Moruemes are a principled clan. What they eat is none of your business. What was that? That is none of your business either."

Rare are the civilized folk who do not dwell in cities, and in the Savage Frontier, those cities are walled and heavily defended. Larger towns and cities have thick stone walls. Smaller towns and villages are surrounded by wooden palisades. In addition to their standing militia, most cities in the north have ballistae and catapults mounted on their wall towers, which can be trained on larger foes.

Although they are not shown on the map, the fortified frontier steadings of large farms or ranches and more powerful independent landholders are not shown. A typical frontier settlement would house 10 to 50 people in a cluster of wood and stone lodges, longhouses and huts within a high wooden palisade. Most of these small holdings are ranches and farms concentrated along the western banks of the Dessarin River and fishing communities on the Sword Coast.

Bargewright Inn

Population: 35

Government: Council of directors, chaired by innkeeper Feston Bargewright. A member of the Lords' Alliance.

Located at Ironford on the river Dessarin, Bargewright Inn is not truly a village, but more a collection of businesses that grew up to serve the needs of travelers and then later the farmers and ranchers who settled along the west bank of the Dessarin.

Economy: Travel services, including an inn, a tavern, a dry-goods shop, the "House of Good Cheer," a combined rent-a-temple and festhall, a ferry, a wagon repair shop and a pharmacist who specializes in sick pack animals.

Militia: Aldon Bargewright (brother of Feston), a 5th level ranger, leads five 1st level fighters and 20 0-level villagers. Except for Aldon's sword +1, they are armed with pole arms.

Citadel Adbar

Population: 14,000 dwarves

Government: King Harbromm (dwarf).

City Badge: The Forge-Mark of the king, an upright single-bladed handaxe enclosed by a circle of flames, in red on a silver field.

Built by the dwarven king Adbar during the waning years of ancient Delzoun (the dwarven Northkingdom), only the tip of this fortress shows above ground. The rest, miles and miles of granite corridors, can house 60,000 dwarves. Some of the finest mithril mines (outside of Mithril Hall) are found in Adbarrim (the proper name for the underground citadel). The number of dwarves who dwell here has been dwindling slowly, as few dwarves are born to replace those who die.

Economy: Mithril mining, metal refining, weapon and armor smithing. Noted for sword blades, forge bars, and ax and pick heads.

Militia: 200 dwarves are always on duty.

Another 1,500 dwarves can take up weapons on a moment's notice. A total of 9,000 dwarves can take the field.

Citadel of Many Arrows

Population: 40,000 orcs

Government: Ruled by self-styled King Obould, a giant, powerful orc.

This fortified city was once the dwarven hold of Felbarr, part of the realm of Delzoun. When that ancient realm began to falter, the dwarves abandoned ancient Felbarr (which was far from any productive mines) and turned it over to troops from Silverymoon. The human garrison of 3,000 troops immediately came under attack from orcs. Fifty years later, an orc horde of awesome magnitude poured down from Dead Orc Pass to the east, surrounded the citadel and, heedless of their own losses, slaughtered the human defenders to a man in what became known as the Battle of Many Arrows.

The orcs in the citadel are far too numerous to dislodge. They constantly harass travelers between Silverymoon and Sundabar, even attacking caravans in sight of the cities' gates. The citadel has too many residents, most are hungry and poor (even by orc standards).

Economy: Trades in plundered goods — particularly with other orc tribes and evil human merchants. Chief manufacturer of orcish-made weapons and armor of all types.

Militia: The citadel has 1,000 orcs on guard and another 1,000 patrol the wilds at all times. In times of need, 18,000 warriors can be summoned.

Everlund

Population: approx. 12,000 folk of non-evil races.

Government: Council of six Elders. A member of the Lord's Alliance.

This walled "open city" to the south of Silverymoon on the river Rauvin is the home of many human caravan masters, adventurers, and tradesmen. As in Waterdeep, the folk of Everlund are tolerant of other peoples, races and religions, but must be constantly wary of the monsters who lurk in the wilds. The council is negotiating with Silverymoon and the Lords' Alliance to fund the construction and maintenance of a true road along the Evermoor Way between Everlund and Yartar.

Economy: made—dominates the shorter overland routes between Silverymoon and Yartar. Rumored to deal in plunder obtained from bazaars in the orc Citadel of Many Arrows.

Militia: Standing army of 2,000, supplemented by patrols of 200+ adventurers and mercenaries.

Fireshear

Population: 15,000 miners

Government: Triumvirate of three Senior Merchants from Mirabar, Waterdeep, and Neverwinter. Member of the Lords' Alliance.

City Arms: A crossed blade, pick, and shovel at the base of a leaping flame on an ice-blue field.

This isolated mining town on the frigid tundra of the Cold Run is the site of extremely rich veins of copper and silver. The metallic ores were exposed by a long-ago volcanic explosion (or perhaps a meteor strike) that blasted out a large bowl-like crater, shearing away tons of rock—hence the name, "Fireshear."

The inhabitants are all miners (representing most major non-evil races) who dwell here year-round, though their families may live elsewhere. Everything else is imported: food, goods, services. The ruling triumvirate seeks to ensure that the valuable ores of Fireshear fall under the control of no other city in the North (particularly Luskan).

Economy: Mining.

Militia: All miners bear the responsibility of defense; essentially, Fireshear has a standing civilian militia of 10,000.

Griffon's Nest

Population: 900 Uthgardt

Government: Chief Kralgar Bonesnapper

This village of crude huts and longhouses surrounded by a palisade which encloses all but the outlying farms has been rapidly growing in the 10 years since Kralgar became chief.

Economy: Subsistence level farming, hunting, woven baskets and containers (which are sold to visiting traders), and gold panning in Shining Creek.

Militia: 300 Uthgardt warriors in residence, plus another 1,000 who can arrive to form a greater horde.

Grunwald

Population: 200 Uthgardt

Government: King Gundar Brontoskin

This tiny village is built upon the ruins of a dwarfhold. Most homes are built of stone rubble and timber from the forest. The tunnels beneath the city are known, but are taboo, off-limits to villagers and foreigners alike. A druid grove and a shrine to Tyr are located near the king's lodge.

Economy: Forestry. Sells logs and lumber to Mirabar and Longsaddle. Dark Shanut wood from Grunwald ends up in the hands of craftsmen in Sundabar and Waterdeep.

Ironmaster

Population: 9,000 dwarves

Government: Lord Clanmaster Strogue Sstar (LG 9th level dwarf fighter).

City Arms: A red anvil on a gray, diamond-shaped field, the long points of the diamond vertical.

Carved into the rocky walls of a frozen valley on the Cold Run, where the Shaengarne River flows into the Sea of Moving Ice, stands this isolated, stone-towered city of dwarves. Its tunnels and storage chambers weave in and out of stone and never-melting ice. The deepest mine shafts lead down to extensive iron deposits, far greater than any found elsewhere in Faerun.

Non-dwarves are unwelcome here and the city's trade goods are sold primarily in Fireshear to other traders.

Economy: Iron goods—pots, pans, and forge bars (flat bars that a smith can easily form into something useful).

Militia: 300-dwarf standing army with 3,000 dwarves ready to take up weapon and shield at a moment's notice.

Leilon (LEE-lun)

Population: 3,000

Government: Lord Pelindar Filmyra, Lord of Leilon. Leilon is a member of the Lords' Alliance and a firm ally of Waterdeep.

This small human mining town on the Sword Coast sprawls along the High Road.

Unlike most northern towns, it lacks walls. A wooden palisade atop an earthen bank shields the landward side, but the wall has no gate.

The mines east of Leilon are rich in copper, nickel and silver. The mountains are honeycombed with mine shafts and tunnels, including several that open up into the town itself, and some that go very, very deep. Leilon has no proper harbor. During good weather, a dozen massive ore barges are loaded in the shallows, then poled and rowed out to unload their cargo on waiting transport ships. Even in the best weather, the operation is tricky.

Llorkh

Population: 2,000 humans, 300 dwarves
Government: Lord Geildarr (LE 7th level magic-user).

The folk in the isolated town of Llorkh still delve in the old, nearly worked-out mines that honeycomb the mountains to the north and east. Now, many citizens find more profit in assisting the Zhentarim caravans that come in from the east.

The old lords of Llorkh, respected and retired former miners and fighters, never would have tolerated the Zhentarim in their midst. But the last of the old lords, Phintarn "Redblade," was found dead at the base of Lord's Keep. Overnight, a new Lord seized the Keep and the Throne. Since Geildarr the mage took power, the Zhentarim caravans have been arriving, bringing gold into the town, and the dwarves have been quietly leaving (there are whispers that many have been murdered as Phintarn was).

Geildarr keeps order in the town and his 400 purple-cloaked "Lord's Men" keep the town safe against orc and Hellgate Keep incursions. Still, he is not loved or even liked by the townsfolk.

Economy: Mining, farming, caravan services.

Militia: 400 1st-4th level warriors in chainmail and shield loyal to Geildarr (and the Zhentarim).

Longsaddle

Population: 130 (1,100 if outlying farms and ranches are included)

Government: The town is ruled by a council of elders. Ardanac Harpell (NG 9th level magic-user) is the chief elder, a member of the Lord's Alliance.

This tiny agricultural village is home to the Harpell family which has produced a number of influential mages in the North (including Malchor Harpell who now splits his time between Longsaddle and Waterdeep).

The village Elder, Ardanac Harpell, dwells in the "Ivy Mansion," the Harpell's ancestral home, high on a hill in the center of Longsaddle.

The village has a daily farmers' market, a way-stable, a stirrup maker and bell-caster, and The Gilded Horseshoe, an inn noted for its hospitality and its defensible wooden palisade.

Local stories say that griffins are bothering Longsaddle, preying upon cattle, horses and longriders who stray too far from local ranches.

Economy: Longsaddle is noted for beef and mutton. Large ranches continue to expand, encroaching further into monster-held frontiers.

Militia: Longriders (ranch-hands) from surrounding estates can be summoned to form a militia of 100 men. Most fight with spear, bow or lariat.

Problems: Griffons living nearby have slain the residents of several farmholds. Orc and Griffon tribe Uthgardt raid the herds.

Loudwater

Population: 4,000

Government: Ruled for 45 years by the High Lord of Loudwater, Nanathlor Grey-sword (NG 11th level cavalier) who came to the North from Nimbral to found his own realm, but instead, rose to rule a place that needed him.

Nearly a quarter of the inhabitants of this lovely town near the midpoint of the River Shining are half-elven, descendants of the Eaelrann elves. A thousand years gone, the dwarf Iirkos Stoneshoulder built a spectacular arching stone bridge for the elves who once dwelt here. The elves are gone, but the bridge and the wide pool which serves as a river harbor still remain. Here, of old, traders of the Eaelrann elves began the portage around the Shining Falls before journeying north on the river again.

Loudwater is an idyllic place, where green, grassy banks line the river, and great green trees shadow its waters. The town's wooden buildings are overgrown by hanging plants and ivy until they seem one with the forest.

Economy: Farming, fishing, caravan services to and from Llorkh.

Militia: 300 warriors, divided into patrols of 20 each under the command of Harazos Thelbrim (LN 5th level fighter) and Kalahar Twohands (CG half-elven 6th level fighter).

Luskan

"City of Sails"

Population: 16,000 (humans only!)

Government: Five High Captains: Taerl, Baram, Kurth, Suljack, and Rethnor, presumed to be retired pirates.

Luskan is a seafaring merchant city, home to fierce, proud and warlike Northmen. This important northern port city is located at the mouth of the river Mirar, a swift and icy, cold and rocky, unnavigable river.

Although it seeks merchant trade, visitors are few and often made to feel unwelcome. This probably has much to do with the fact that Luskan is a known harbor for northern pirates, if not an outright sponsor of their activities. Inns that serve travelers are rare; The Cutlass, a notorious dive on the docks (a pirate haven no doubt) and the Seven Sails Inn are the only known lodgings in the city.

Luskan wages almost constant war against naval powers that its Captains feel they can defeat; recently they crushed Ruathym. In the past, they been defeated by Mintarn and Orlumbor (supported by Waterdeep and Amn) and slaughtered on the seas by the ships of Lantan, who they no longer even speak of. Luskan warriors often raid inland, particularly when sea vigilance makes raiding the coast difficult.

The Zhentarim are said to be attempting an alliance with Luskan (but it is unknown as to their success).

Economy: Trade and piracy. In peacetime, the city's warships act as "unsanctioned" pirates (the High Captains direct them, but pretend they are independents acting in defiance of Luskan law), trying to make all shippers use only Luskan ships or only Luskan as a port by preying on all other ships, and on all shipping that visits Waterdeep (Waterdeep's navy is on constant patrol for this).

Militia: The city has a standing army of 200 spearmen, and a navy of 14 warships (dragonships), armed with 70 archers each. Luskan is involved in an "ego" war with Ruathym. Neither side will admit defeat so clashes continue. Waterdeep has threatened involvement if the two nations refuse to negotiate an end to the conflict.

Luskan Map Key

(map located on inside cover)

1. Reavers Muster Hall. The court of "Law" for officially-sanctioned Luskan Pirates. All booty must be surrendered for inspection here, with cuts going to the town treasury and the sponsoring High Captain.
2. Seven Sails Inn
3. The Cutlass (a notorious tavern)
4. Captains' Court (government palace)
5. Taerl's fortress (residence)
6. Suljack's lodge (residence)
7. Baram's palace (residence)
8. Kurth Tower (residence)
9. Ten Oaks (Rethnor's residence)
10. Winter Palace (Temple of Auril)
11. Hall of Warriors (Temple of Tempus)
12. Temple of Red Sails (Umberlee)
13. Red Dragon Trading Lodge & Warehouses
15. Mirabar District. Includes warehouses, ore bins, refineries and residences owned (and policed!) by Mirabar mercantile companies.
16. Whitesails Harbor. Busy port used primarily by foreign craft, which are not allowed to use Dragon Beach.
17. Dragon Beach. Private harbor of the High Captains, used by their navies, merchant vessels and, of course, the pirates who berth in Luskan.
18. Illusk Ruins. Remnants of ancient Illusk, used as burial grounds for rich Luskanites and said to be haunted.
19. Hosttower of the Arcane. This mercantile company and wizards' guild is composed primarily of magic-users and is tolerated only because it has power. While it presents a unified front to the world, factions within the Hosttower constantly vie for power within and without the guild, allying themselves with the High Captains, and aiding them in their own internal dealings (or urging them into war).

The Hosttower is currently under the guidance of Arklem Greeth, a NE, 15th level wizard. Arklem's lieutenants are Eldeluc and Dendybar the Mottled.

The Hosttower contains all manner of magical items and spellbooks (more than a few mages have died, leaving their belongings here). Like any wizards' tower, it is magically trapped and guarded. Basilisks and stone golems are said to wander its halls and storerooms.

Mirabar

Population: 19,000 men and 4,000 dwarves

Government: Elastul Raurym, Marchion of Mirabar, a fat, lusty, red-bearded man who loves pleasure and money.

Royal Badge: an upright, rust-red, double-bladed axe with a pointed haft and a flaring, flat base set on either a black or purple field (on ships' pennants, it appears on white).

This mining center for the Sword Coast is a cold, gray stone city, surrounded by mines, quarries, and talus. Grim men and grimmer dwarves crowd its unadorned streets. Richest of the cities north of Waterdeep, its mines provide vast amounts of most known metals, fine gems, and high quality metal goods from its ever-hot forges.

The Council of Mirabar meets each fall in the Hall of Sparkling Stones to determine where and when to sell their metal, mindful of who will use it to forge weapons to make war on whom.

Merchant families of Mirabar are very competitive. House guards often battle openly when mines accidentally connect, or when two ore caravans meet on trade roads. The merchants of Mirabar own many ships based in Luskan, but resent the High Captains' threats to cut Mirabar off from the coast if their constantly increasing "harbor fees" are not paid up for years in advance. Marchion Raurym makes a point of traveling south to warmer climes before the onset of winter, to negotiate trade agreements with rulers who have many luxuries, but little metal. His 64 bodyguards wear platinum plate mail, and are commanded by four "hammers," 6th level fighters named Djassar, Hulmm, Kriador, and Turvon.

Economy: Mining of ores and gems, metal refining and crafting.

Militia: 950 men mounted on ponies in summer and trained rothe in winter. Merchant families maintain house guards, adding another 500 foot soldiers.

Nesmé (NEZ-may)

Population: 6,000

Government: Theocracy under the clergy of Waukeen. First Speaker of the city council is High Priestess Jygil Zelnathra (N, 10th level cleric).

This trading town within its circular wooden palisade is the only settlement, human or otherwise, within the Evermoors. To the east, beyond the city walls are 40 or so farms who rely on the Riders of Nesmé for their safety. The spired temple of Waukeen-Merchant's friend dominates the central city. The clergy of Waukeen, who rule Nesmé, welcome all who come in the name of honest trade. A fortified bridge crosses the Surbrin river to the west, linking the city with paddocks, stock-pens, the city's river docks, and the fortified stables of the Riders of Nesmé, the city's militia and army.

Council meetings generally involve conflict between Tessarin "Longtresses" Alaurun, a wizardess (NG 13th level magic-user) and High Priestess Jygil Zelnathra (though both women respect each other's abilities). Tessarin opposes the Theocratic dominance of Nesmé and believes that her home city would be better off without the religious late-comers who now hold power.

Economy: Trade, farming, horses, livestock, barge making.

Militia: The 400 Riders of Nesmé patrol the Evermoors for two days ride on either bank around Nesmé, defending the city against orcs and trolls, and policing the population of Nesmé, which has a higher turnover than most settlements due to the total dominance of traveling trade.

Neverwinter

"The City of Skilled Hands"

Population: 17,000

Government: Lord Nasher (NG, ST 18/09, CHA 17 12th level fighter and former adventurer who gained much magic in his career)

Royal Badge: Three white falling snowflakes, surrounded by silver and blue haloes.

A city of skilled craftsmen noted for accurate water clocks, exotic lamps of multi-hued blown glass, and for its gardeners who fill the town with fruit-bearing trees and flowers. The town's name comes from the practice of raising hot-house flowers throughout the winter (tales of winter-free woods and the ever-warm waters of the Neverwinter River which keeps the city's harbor ice-free year-round may contribute to the truth—see chapter 7 for more on Neverwinter Woods). The folk here are noted for their efficiency, quiet manners and dedication to ensure that work gets properly done.

Lord Nasher is an amiable, but fearless balding man who enjoys music and hearing tales of other lands and peoples. Nasher is guarded by the “Neverwinter Nine,” who carry nearly as much magical gear as he himself.

Economy: Crafts and horticulture.

Militia: 400 archers and spearmen who carry explosive missiles devised by city craftsmen and wizards. They patrol the city as police, and protect the High Road as far north as Port Llast and as far south as Leilon.

GAME INFORMATION: An explosive missile does 2d8 damage, and is treated as a grenade-like missile. The manufacture of the explosive missiles is a closely guarded secret, not shared even with other members of the Lords’ Alliance. They are not for sale, though it is no secret that many groups covet them.

Port Llast

Population: 700

Government: First Captain Haeromos Dothwintyl, a retired stonemason (LN, ST 17, WIS 17, 0 level fighter). Port Llast is a close ally of Neverwinter.

This sleepy little coastal village between Neverwinter and Luskan is known mainly for its skilled stonemasons. Luskan covets the fine harbor, seeking a more southerly berth for its numerous warships. In olden days, when Luskan (then Illusk) was held by orcs and hostile duergar, this village was a thriving city, the “last port,” the northernmost access to the mineral wealth of the North. Then it was 20 times as populous as today. Orc raids destroyed that magnificent city, but shattered remnants of mighty walls still ring the village (though much has been plundered or used to repair local homes). Portions are used as gardens, graveyards or have returned to forest.

Economy: Stonework, fine and rough.

Militia: 50 local men, mostly retired stonemasons, a garrison of 50 Neverwinter troops, and a 30-man garrison from the Lords’ Alliance.

Secomber

Population: 900

Government: Traskar Selarn (CG, 11th level ranger). Traskar takes frequent council from Secomber’s “first citizen,” the eccentric wizard Amelior Amanitas.

There is little to distinguish this village on the lower reaches of The Unicorn Run River. Its folk fish the river, farm the plains, cut pink granite from the cliffs that mark the northern edge of the High Moor, and provide guides and guards for caravans traveling west to Zundbridge and Ironford. Orc and other monster raids are infrequent here and much of the village is outside its tiny palisade fort. If it weren’t for the on-again off-again residence of Amelior Amanitas, who has a tendency to blow up laboratories or send innocent pieces of furniture to other planes, life in Secomber would be quite duller than it already is.

Economy: Stone-cutting, caravan services, agriculture.

Militia: A 30-man garrison from the Lords’ Alliance, plus 100 0-level local irregulars, one iron golem and two unusual-looking stone golems provided by Amelior Amanitas.

Silverymoon

Population: 26,000

Government: Ruled by Alustriel, High Lady of Silverymoon (CG, IN 18, WIS 17, DEX 16, CHA 17, 22d level magic-user), a member of the Harpers.

Silverymoon is the largest inland city, strong and bustling with activity. Folk of all good races dwell here in a harmony that is attributed to the High Lady’s kindness, grace and diplomacy. It is not uncommon to find elves (yes real elves!) discussing things magical with dwarves, while perusing scrolls in the Vault of Sages, the town library. Most of the city lies on the north bank of the River Rauvin. Construction in the last century has spread out on the southern shore from the base of the arching magical “moon-bridge,” a bridge across the Rauvin constructed of invisible force fields. The bridge’s central arch can be reduced to nothingness by magical means to spill attackers into the river or allow tall-masted ships to pass.

Much of the city’s activity centers around higher learning, including the magical arts.

Some say that it echoes the spirit of lost Myth Drannor—the fabled lost city where elves, dwarves, and men worked together to bring knowledge, particularly magical knowledge—and the arts to a peak of perfection never achieved elsewhere.

Economy: Forestry, support services for popular schools of music, higher learning, and magic.

Militia: The gallant, heroic defenders of Silverymoon are known as “The Knights in Silver” (as they are called in a ballad penned by the bard Mintiper Silverhand). They number over 500.

Silverymoon Map Key

(map is located on color foldup map of the Outer Islands)

1. High Lady Alustriel’s Palace (heavily guarded by loyal magic-users of all ranks and numerous skilled warriors)
2. Courts and Assembly Halls
3. The Market
4. The Docks
5. Arken’s Invocarium (stone fortress, now a magical college)
6. The Moonbridge (a magical, invisible bridge)
7. The Golden Oak Inn & Temple to Shiallia (a demipower allied with Silvanus—Priestess/proprietress Izolde, ST 18(65), CG 7th level cleric)
8. Moorgate
9. Eastern Garrison Barracks
10. Hunter’s Gate (north gate)
11. Western Garrison Barracks
12. Sundabar Commons (assembly area for eastbound caravans)
13. Sundabar Gate
14. Lady’s College
15. Vault of the Sages (library)
16. Helmer’s Wall (once a gate within the old city wall, now a tavern popular with students)
17. Miresk’s School of Thaumaturgy (wizard’s home and magical school)
18. Utrum’s Music Conservatory
19. Dancing Goat (a bawdy tavern)
20. Mielikki’s Glade
21. Adbar Trading Coster (operated here by humans from Sundabar)
22. Fortune Hall (temple to Tymora)
23. Halls of Inspiration (temple of Oghma and Milil)
24. House Invincible (temple of Helm)
25. Tower of Balance (temple of Mystra)
26. Silverglen (sacred grove of Silvanus)
27. Temple of Silver Stars (temple of Selune)

Sundabar

Population: 36,000

Government: Master of Sundabar, Helm Dwarf-friend, a former adventurer (NG 14th level fighter), who served in the Bloodaxe Mercenary Company. Member of the Lords' Alliance.

Once a dwarven citadel, Sundabar was rebuilt by human refugees from Ascalhorn (now Hellgate Keep). This fortified city is known for woodworkers who make wonderful carved furniture, musical instruments and travel chests of unusual grace and durability. It trades extensively with the dwarves of Citadel Adbar and Sundabarian merchants are exclusive distributors for the wares of many prominent dwarven craft-clans. It is the base for the Bloodaxe Mercenary Company (see "For The Greater Glory" in Appendix D: Adventures).

Economy: Trade, primarily with Silverymoon, Everlund and Citadel Adbar. Manufactures wood items of enduring beauty. Also receives defense subsidies from the Lords' Alliance to defend against Hellgate Keep.

Militia: 2,000 warriors, including many companies sponsored by the Lords' Alliance and the temples of Helm.

Ten Towns

Population: 6,500

Government: A council spokesman, one from each town. In general the smaller towns follow the lead of Bryn Shander and Targos. Cassius, spokesman of the Ten Towns, is the accepted leader.

The Ten Towns of Icewind Dale, home to a multitude of men and women with "checkered" pasts, are truly on the cutting edge of adventure, in the farthest (and coldest!) reaches of the Savage Frontier. Built up around three lakes, Maer Dualdon, Lac Dinshere and Redwaters, the Ten Towns are relatively young, founded less than 30 years ago by exiles and renegades from southern lands. In the past five years, the towns have survived two major attacks, the first from tundra barbarians and the second from the forces of Akar Kessell, a mad wizard under the power of the evil artifact Crenshinbon, the Crystal Shard. The second attack destroyed and depopulated two of the towns. They were reconstructed and are now occupied by "civilized" tundra barbari-ans. The towns, Bryn Shander, Targos, Bremen, Termalaine, Caer-Konig, Caer-Dineval, Easthaven, Good Mead, Dougan's Hole, and Lonelywood, are all fiercely independent and fiercely competitive with one another, particularly with towns that share the same lake. Fighting between rival ships is not uncommon.

If one needs a place to hide, the Ten Towns may be the last place anyone will come to look... or the first.

Economy: Fishing provides primary sustenance, supplemented by meager farming. Scrimshaw-carved knucklehead trout head bones are sold to merchants from the south. The largest town, Bryn Shander, is the center of trade.

Militia: Each of the Ten Towns can field a home guard of 100 to 500 men armed with dwarven weapons and light armor. The towns of Bremen and Caer-Konig are home to tundra barbarians.

Triboar (TRY-bore)

Population: 2,500

Government: An elected Lord Protector, commander of the militia. For the last 30 years the post has been held by Faurael Blackhammer (NC, ST 17, IN 16, 6th level fighter)

This small town is strategically located where the Long Road intersects the Evermoor Way. Gathered armies have often set forth from Triboar to meet orc hordes. Triboar has two good smithies and Skulner Wainwright, a wagonmaker famed throughout the North. Skulner's latest project is the "rolling cog," a massive wagon that can double as a barge. Triboar's name is thought to have come from a traveler's tale of slaying three boars here in a day.

Economy: Trade, horses, cattle, farming, caravan services, forged iron goods, and wagons.

Militia: A standing militia of 50 men swells to 300 in time of need.

Problems: Triboar's friendly rivalry with nearby Yartar occasionally erupts into violence when a gag goes too far.

Waterdeep

"City of Splendors"

Population: 122,000 (during prime trade season this rises to 500,000+)

Government: Governed by the Lords of Waterdeep, men and women from all walks of life who rule fairly, yet remain unknown by the people of the city.

Waterdeep, "Gem of the North," is the largest and most important city in the Savage Frontier (and perhaps in all of Faerun). Anything one could want can be found in this mighty seaport—if the price is right. The sprawling walled city contains folk of all races (including evil) and all professions. Most religions have shrines here and many have large temples (see Religions in Overview).

There is a saying that says "As goes Waterdeep, so goes the North." The City of Splendors controls most of the trade in the North; almost everything grown, mined, or made in the Savage Frontier is taken to Waterdeep before finding its way farther south—few southern merchants are willing to travel the wilds, even for the chance of tremendous profit. Employers who seek adventurers' aid look to Waterdeep first and if one must spend a winter in the North, Waterdeep is the warmest, though not necessarily the safest, place to do it. Deep winter rarely lasts longer than two-and-a-half months here (much shorter than the rest of the North).

Waterdeep is guarded by a great wall with high towers, and by sheer 100-foot cliffs. Four gates pierce the wall: South Gate, River Gate, Northgate and Westgate. Sprawling Waterdeep fills its walls, except where construction is banned by the Lords' edict (such as the City of the Dead or the public streets).

The city is built upon rock and rubble mined from the innards of Mount Waterdeep in ancient days. It is divided into seven districts or wards. They are Castle Ward, which contains Lord Piergeiron's palace, army barracks, and the homes of the wealthy; Sea Ward, along the seacoast, which contains most temples and the homes of nobility; North Ward, a nice district where the best inns can be found; The City of the Dead, a great walled cemetery where none may live (or even spend the night); Trades Ward, the commercial area of the city—home of the well-to-do merchant class; Southern Ward, a poor but honest district where most trading companies and caravan masters have their offices; and Dock Ward, a rough district which encompasses the city's vital trade commerce and its shadier population.

At least three networks of underground passages are known to exist beneath Waterdeep's busy streets. Undermountain, a deep, many-leveled former dwarfhold and mine of great antiquity that, as its name implies, lies largely beneath Mount Waterdeep, is the largest and most famous. The Dungeon of the Crypt (so named for its entrance in the City of the Dead) lies under North Ward, and is less spoken of. The third labyrinth is the city sewers, which links much of the city with its vast, damp and smelly conduits.

The city's navy patrols its huge, walled harbor and mermen guard the underwater areas. Many of these armored ships sail the Sea of Swords to keep pirates (mostly Luskan pirates) at bay.

Economy: Trade, services, manufacture of all manner of goods, shipbuilding.

Militia: Thought to be 1,200 Guard (soldiers—heavily trained, fully armored men-at-arms) and 1,600 Watch (policemen—lightly armored). The Watch may search any person, place, or container in Waterdeep without hindrance or warning.

DM's who wish further knowledge on Waterdeep are directed to the information-rich FORGOTTEN REALMS™ sourcebook FR1, Waterdeep and the North, by Ed Greenwood.

Waterdeep Map Key

(map is located on color foldup map of the Outer Islands)

Castle Ward

1. Castle Waterdeep (Lord Piergeiron's palace)
2. Ahghairon's Tower (mage's tower/tomb)
3. Guard Barracks
4. Blackstaff Tower (home of Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun)

5. Spires of the Morning (Lathander temple)
6. Walking Statue of Waterdeep (a 90' tall stone golem: AC 1; MV 4"; 140 hp; #AT 1; Dmg 6d10, 3 points structural symbol damage per round, +3 weapon to hit. Six more like it are stored beneath Mount Waterdeep)

Sea Ward

7. The House of Heroes (Tempus temple)
8. The House of the Moon (Selune temple)
9. The House of Inspired Hands (Gond temple)
10. The Tower of Luck (Tymora temple)
11. The Lady's Hands (Mielikki shrine)
12. The Temple of Beauty (Sune temple)
13. The House of Wonder (Mystra temple)

The City of the Dead

Numerous tomb complexes in here are linked by gates to other (usually pleasant) planes, where the vast numbers of dead are actually interred.

The Trades Ward

14. "The Plinth" (an interdenominational temple often frequented by minor faiths and beings from other planes)

YarTar (YAR-TARR)

Population: 6,000

Government: The "Waterbaron," presently Alahar Khaumfros (LN, ST 16, 4th level fighter)

This fortified town is the site of a bridge over the Surbrin, just north of where it meets the Dessarin. Yartar is noted for its temple to Tymora, the Happy Hall of Fortuitous Happenstance, which the locals call "Two-hap-fort Hall." The major industry here is the construction of river barges, which are used the length of the Dessarin river network. The folk of Yartar fish the "Three Rivers" (the Dessarin, Surbrin, and Laughingflow) for their table fare. Each year, Yartar is the scene of the vast Shieldmeet of the outcasts, bandits, homeless, and isolated landholders of the North who gather here in thousands.

Economy: River barge construction, fishing, farming, and trade services.

Militia: "The shields of Yartar," a mounted army of 150 riders. A large barge can carry 75 riders or 200 foot soldiers. The army is usually involved in policing the town and defending it against wander orcs and trolls.

GAME INFORMATION: The Kraken Society (a secretive spy network—see Power Groups in chapter 2) is based here. Baron Khaufros, a member of the Lords' Alliance, is also the land-based head of the society (from which he draws much of his personal wealth). The Kraken Society meets in the back of the Three Rivers Festhall. All entrances are guarded by thieves and assassins.

"21 Kythorn. Ere here again. A. A. has been moping ever since the High Lady punctured his gooney bubble. Once again I must finish another chapter and now we are headed, not home, but to the outer islands to research the next chapter The river trip has been mostly quiet, though one of the merchant's barges was actually eaten in the Evermoors by trolls. A. A. hopes to catch a ship out of Port Llast."

THE SEA, THE ICE, AND THE ISLANDS

"20 Eleasias. Back on land again, praise be to Umberlee and Valkur. Waterdeep never looked so good. Never again. Currently staying in Blackstaff Tower. Khelben is off somewhere, but A. A. says he is always welcome here. Gundbarg was pleasant until King Olger recognized me (I told A. A. that I had a reputation out this way). We left immediately for the Purple Rocks."

The Trackless Sea

The northern extent of the Trackless Sea is cold, gray, bleak and unforgiving to those who venture across its depths. Yet the people on the islands must live with the sea. It gives them life, and in unpredictable moments, takes life violently away.

Weather at Sea

The Trackless Sea crosses both the arctic and subarctic climate zones. North of Luskan, arctic conditions prevail, while subarctic climate holds as far south as the Moonshaes.

Raging storms are common, and anything less than a stiff breeze quite uncommon, though the storms reach their peak in winter (making sea travel quite impossible).

A warm ocean current flows northward along the Sword Coast, warming coastal areas and giving them a milder climate than inland regions. This current turns west along the Cold Run and deposits its last dregs of warmth on the shores of Tuern. Due to this, icebergs are uncommon in coastal shipping lanes and a serious threat to travel between Tuern and other islands.

Travel at Sea

Competent Northmen navigators, most pirates, and a few hotshot southerners know the best routes between the islands and the coast, and sense the changes in current, star positions and even smells that tell them they are on course.

Assuming good weather and strong breeze, use the following travel times between the islands. The time in days for each trip is given below for a Raker (R), a Long ship (L), a Caravel or Cog (C) and a Heavy Cog (H). For all routes, assume that sailing against prevailing winds and currents adds 25% to the sailing time (multiply the time in days by 1.25).

The table at the bottom of page 36 lists ships commonly found in the North.

Route: Travel times in days

Waterdeep to Leilon: R-1, L-1 C-2, H-4
Waterdeep to Neverwinter: R-2, L-1.5, C-3, H-6
Waterdeep to Port Llast: R-2, L-1.5, C-3.5, H-6
Waterdeep to Luskan: R-2.5, L-2, C-3.5, H-7.5
Port Llast to Fireshear: R-1, L-1, C-1.5, H-3
Luskan to Fireshear: R-5, L-5, C-1, H-2
Luskan to The Ice Peak: R-1, L-1, C-2, H-3.5
Gundarlun to Luskan: R-1.5, L-1.5, C-3, H-5

Gundarlun to Neverwinter: R-1.5, L-1.5, C-3.5, H-5.5

Gundarlun to Waterdeep: R-2.5, L-2, C-5.5, H-9

Gundarlun to Ruathym: R-1.5, L-1, C-3, H-4.5

Ruathym to Luskan: R-2.5, L-2, C-5, H-8.5

Ruathym to Waterdeep: R-2.5, L-2, C-5, H-8

The Purple Rocks to Gundarlun: R-1.5, L-1, C-3, H-4.5

The Purple Rocks to Ruathym: R-2, L-1.5, C-4, H-7

Tuern to Gundarlun: R-2.5, L-2, C-4.5, H-7.5

Tuern to The Purple Rocks: R-1.5, L-1, C-2.5, H-4

Ocean Hazards

One might think that icebergs are a deadly danger to northern mariners. They are not. The sailing ships of the Sword Coast can easily avoid lone icebergs (and only foolhardy captains sail near them). However, packs of glaciers or floes of coastal ice in a ship's path are quite deadly. Should a ship collide with an iceberg, roll 3d6 and compare the result against the Fire Damage table on page 54 of the DMG. If the ship was moving slowly and cautiously, it receives the Hull Damage Equivalent (HDE). If the captain was moving quickly or without precautions, the ice does maximum damage. If the HDE is equal to 1/3 ship's Hull Value, the hull is breached. Unless repaired quickly, the ship sinks in a number of rounds equal to its hull value.

The Sea of Moving Ice

The Sea of Moving Ice is the dense pack of ice north of The Ice Peak, and includes both icebergs and thick floes of polar pack ice. The Sea is not a solid mass, but many ice islands, often separated by channels wide enough to allow ships passage. Such channels may wind for hundreds of miles into the ice pack, but the ice changes often, and what was a wide channel moments ago can quickly disappear. Many a ship has sailed into the Sea of Moving Ice only to be slowly ground to flinders by the shifting floes.

To the uninitiated, the Sea seems a frozen desert, void of all life. Yet it teems with life. Seals and penguins live upon the floes, stalked by silent white polar bears and walrus, who are in turn hunted by the nomadic Ice Hunters (though some hunters may be frost men). Ice-locked ancient ships are often ice troll lairs, and fiendish white dragons dwell in the crags of large icebergs.

Gundarlun (GOON-der-LEN)

Government: Organized into 15 Jarl holds and ruled by King Olger Redaxe. Gundarlun is the only island member of the Lords' Alliance.

Largest Settlement: Gundbarg (12,000 –the largest city in the islands)

Economy: Trade, fishing, farming, and mining.

Militia: Gundbarg has a standing army of 300 warriors who act as city guard and crews for the King's six raker warships. Each Jarl has 1d3 long ships crewed by 40 warriors.

Gundbarg

"Gateway Port"

Nearly every ship crossing the Trackless Sea puts in here during its journey for fresh water, food, repairs, replacement crew or goods to carry. Huge warehouses, drydocks, sailmakers, inns, and taverns all provide necessary services to seafarers... and at reasonable prices. The Dragon Turtle Inn on the harbor is noted as an adventurers' hangout and a place to find captains with ships for hire.

Ruins of Berranzo: Berranzo was a Calishite mining and refining colony on Gundarlun's western shore, that once housed 2,000 miners. Wizards used fire

SHIPS OF THE NORTH

Refer to the Dungeon Masters Guide and Wilderness Survival Guide for the meanings in this table.

Ship Name	Hull Value	Length/ Width/ Draft	Speed: Normal/ Max. Sail	Speed: Normal/ Max. Oar	Sail Speed per Round in Combat	Oar Speed per Round in Combat	Peacetime Armaments	Crew	Startup
Raker	36	90'/20'/6'	10/14 mph	5/8 mph	30"/42"	15"/24"	4 ballistae; 4 firepot catapults; armored ram	36	4 rounds
Striker	12	60'/10'/4'	12/14 mph	6/10 mph	36"/42"	18"/30"	4 ballistae; armored ram	44	3 rounds
War Nao	40	40'/20'/12'	4/6 mph	½/1 mph	12"/18"	1.5"/3"	2 catapults; can carry 200 troops	40	1 turn
Long Ship	14	80'/20'/3'	12/16 mph	7/10 mph	36"/48"	21"/30"	none	40	3 rounds
Fast Caravel	26	60'/10'/6'	7/10 mph	1/3 mph	21"/30"	3"/9"	1 ballista	10	4 rounds
Caravel	33	50'/10'/8'	5/8 mph	1/3 mph	15"/24"	3"/9"	1 ballista	10	5 rounds
Cog	40	45'/20'/10'	5/7 mph	1/2 mph	15"/21"	3"/6"	none	12	1 turn
Heavy Cog	60	60'/25'/15'	3/5 mph	½/1 mph	9"/15"	1.5"/3"	none	14	1 turn

(' = feet; mph = miles (nautical) per hour, assuming moderate, favorable winds and calm seas)

elementals to refine ore in this short-lived colony. Within three years all went mad for no apparent reason and most died. For months, Northmen captains encountered drifting ore ships, filled with corpses and gibbering madmen. For 25 years the ruins have stood empty—even the bold Northmen are fearful to plunder here.

Wreck of the Golden Crown: A Calishite treasure galleon went down in a storm near Berranzo and now lies, mostly intact, in 70 feet of water. It carried gold and silver ingots, electrum bars, and a fortune in gems. The wizard Hochmiraz of Calimshan and his personal effects also went down with the ship. He was said to own a staff of the magi; a ring of spell turning and a cube of force.

The Ice Peak

Government: First Captain Tranjer Rolsk rules Aurilssbarg, a Luskan colony, and acts as spokesman for other villages (whether they like it or not).

Largest Settlement: Aurilssbarg (3,000)

Economy: Sealing, whaling, and fishing.

Militia: Each community has several large fishing boats and 40 to 50 warriors. Aurilssbarg has a standing army of 100 men who man an ancient “Striker” craft with ballistae and ram, and 2d3 longships.

This ancient volcano is surrounded by near-permanent icepack. Villages like Bjorn’s Hold, Icewolf, and Aurilssbarg are populated by a mix of Northmen and Ice Hunters. Seal and whale hunting are the primary occupations here. Seal skins and whale oil are bought by Luskan merchants, then sold for lucrative profits in the South.

Many Ice Peak folk search for the lost lair of Freezefire, a great white dragon whose last recorded flight took place centuries ago.

Aurilssbarg: Like many Northmen communities, Aurilssbarg boasts “corduroy” streets made of logs laid side by side. The city is the trading post for other communities on the island, who buy supplies and sell skins, oil, scrimshaw and smoked fish here. Aurilssbarg is the only port with a bona fide harbor capable of serving large vessels. Luskan monopolizes their colony’s trade—their ships are the only ones that may dock here. A Luskan raker and crew (read “pirates”) is often berthed here to enforce this edict. The folk of Aurilssbarg are hungry for news—only rumors filter into the isolated town.

Bjorn’s Hold: Bjorn, son of Bjorn is a cantankerous old coot, yet he loves the 500 citizens of this fortified village as if they were all family, Ice Hunter and Northman alike. Though he is Northman, he hates Luskan and secretly sells most of the village’s large catch to Calishites in Port Llast, hiring adventurers to guard his small boats on their yearly journey.

Icewolf: The ancient Ice Hunter shaman, Bleak Sky at Morning, wisely rules this village of 200, though the rude antics of the Northmen try even his legendary patience and sense of humor. He and his folk will not side with Luskan in wars against others. Women here wear jewelry made of ancient gold and platinum coins, found in an ice-bound wreck. If stories are true, a king’s ransom remains there.

The Purple Rocks

Government: King Selger rules Trisk and King Bromm rules Utheraal.

Largest Settlements: Vilkstea (700) and Ulf of Thuger (400).

Economy: Raiding, farming, fishing.

Militia: Each king has 2d3 longships with crews of 40. Trisk also has six other vessels: three caravels, a cog, and a war nao with crews of 30, plus some of the kraken’s monstrous allies.

Trisk, the western isle, and Utheraal, the eastern, initially seem little more than rocky outcroppings, no more than a few miles across. Yet between the lightly forested peaks are lush valleys shielded from the harsh storms of the bitter subarctic ocean.

Ruins of Ascarle: Low tide exposes part of this ruined city on Trisk’s north shore. At one time, Ascarle was nearly as large as Waterdeep, possibly inhabited by sea-elves or some other ancient undersea race (maybe the fish-men who are said to dwell in the Deepearth). Treasures of that ancient race (such as rare magical items) can still be found, encrusted in marine growth and buried by sediment. Even at low tide the ruins are deadly. Giant crabs, crabmen, and scrag scour the ruins for delicacies trapped in tidal pools and debris fields.

Slarkrethel, a kraken, lairs in the submerged ruins, along with its allies—an illithid, a band of beautiful but evil nereids, a tribe of foul merrow (aquatic ogre)—and its slaves, over 100 humans trapped in air-filled ruins, some who have lived here all their lives and never seen the surface. For some unfathomable purpose (undoubtedly evil), the kraken has enslaved the folk of Trisk, and forced them to create the Kraken Society, a spy network with agents throughout the North (See Power Groups in Overview).

Vilkstea: The nutrient-rich waters south of Utheraal provide the Vilksteaders with bountiful fish catches, more than enough for their own tables. They export large amounts of dried, smoked, salted, and pickled fish to Gundarlun, which in turn ships it to cities all across Faerun. They also produce Vilksmaarg, a pungent, salty, herbed goat cheese popular in Sword Coast taverns. Still, they remain poor because Utheraal pays Trisk a steep ransom to avoid conquest (and to keep from becoming slaves of the kraken).

Ulf of Thuger: The folk of this town on Trisk fish and farm, but only enough to put food in their mouths. Additional needs are met by piracy, including attacks on other Northmen and pirate ships. The rest of their efforts go toward recording and cataloging the deluge of information that filters into the island through the Kraken Society spy network. Every year the task grows greater as more cities are enmeshed in the kraken's schemes.

Ruathym (ROO-uh-Thim)

Government: United Ruathym is ruled by First Axe Aumark Lithyl. During the war Aumark consolidated four separate kingdoms on the islands into one.

Largest Settlement: Ruathym (5,000)

Economy: Raiding, farming, mining, shipbuilding.

Militia: First Axe Aumark commands 500 warriors (many little more than youths) and has three 40-man longships and a single raker warship on loan from Holgerstead. Ruathym's navy was destroyed by Luskan.

The city of Ruathym and many smaller villages and steadings were all but destroyed by Luskan in a recent war. Much of the land's wealth was looted or put to the torch (though the famous library, the Green Rooms, filled with plundered books from a score of great cities, was spared serious damage). Likewise, the invaders spared the Hall of Black Waves, Umberlee's temple.

Like Luskan, Ruathym thrives on trade and piracy, looking the other way as its warships attack merchant craft. Now and in the past, they have competed for the same "clientele."

Rethgaard: Seafaring dwarves of long ago built this stone fortress. Until recently, Rethgaard refused alliance with Ruathym and actually sided with Luskan. Then it too was plundered by Luskan.

Holgerstead: First Axe Wedigar Ruthmaald rules this United Ruathym sub-kingdom. Its fierce berserkers played a key part in the stunning blow dealt to the invaders.

Inthar (Ruin): A ruined fortress sits atop a rocky crag some 35 miles south of Rethgaard. Eerie green lights shine here at night, silhouetting shadowy shapes as faint whispers float across the waters. It is said that a hidden shaft leads straight down to Hell. None know its origin, but sailors of all lands avoid this rock.

Tuern (TOORN)

Government: Five Northman kings, who recognize High King Threlked Ironfist of Uttersea as liege.

Largest Settlement: Uttersea (2,000)

Economy: Whaling, fishing, farming, diamond and adamantite mining (which the Tuernish do not have the ability to refine or use in their own weapons).

Militia: Each king has 1d3 longships, crewed by 50 warrior/archers.

Tuern is a rocky, but fertile land of black beaches and seething volcanoes. Conditions are harder on Tuern than on many of the other outer islands, but the Northmen here are among the wealthiest in the North. The island's vulcanism produces two great treasures, huge diamonds and the valuable ore from which adamantite is refined (pure adamantite is magically alloyed with iron to create +5 weapons and armor).

This same geothermal activity creates a perfect home for fire giants and red dragons in the crevasse called Flame Fault. The giants here are sea rovers who sail gargantuan long ships, but rarely raid farther east than Gundarlun.

Flame Fault: Flame and smoke continually belch from this deep crevasse in the western mountains. The three red dragons of Flame Fault raid herds for food (though several kingdoms bring monthly tributes of cattle, fish, and slaves to placate the dragons' hunger and offerings of gold and gems to salve their greed). The dragons range far and wide. Many islands suffer under their attacks.

Throne Rock: This fortress is the sanctuary of High Artificer Fizmorayen Fitzmoran, an exiled cleric of Gond (N 14th level). He dwells here with several dwarves, human tinkers and an alchemist. Fizmorayen purchases adamantite ore, then resells it to merchants from Waterdeep. The castle usually contains several tons of valuable ore and is heavily protected by numerous glyphs of warding.

Uttersea: Uttersea is built into the sides of the collapsed caldera of an ancient volcano whose high walls shield the town from all but the worst weather. Heat rising from deep geothermal activity warms the town and the bay, actually boiling it in places. The bay is home to species who normally would not be found so far north, including giant octopi which dwell near the south shore and prey upon ships and fishermen.

The Whalebones

Government: Dozens of petty kings rule over one or more small islands. Garr Ulfsson of Finback is the most powerful, and often acts as a spokesman.

Largest Settlement: 205 people dwell in Garrstead, the fortified lodgings of Garr Ulfsson on Finback island (the westernmost of the Whalebones).

Economy: Whaling, fishing, farming, raiding.

Militia: Each king has a long ship with a crew of 20 to 50 warriors.

The Whalebones are a collection of 50 or more tiny islands (only the largest are shown on the fold-up map), most no larger than a mile to two miles across. Finding a specific island often requires a guide. The islands are grass-capped, rocky tables that rise 50 to 80 feet above their gravel beaches on white chalky cliffs. Northmen have lived here in tiny communities for centuries and the beaches are littered with the bones of countless whales (though many are used to construct sod longhouses).

LOST LANDS, STRONGHOLDS, & RUINS

"2 Eleint. Once more, we are on the road. Needless to say, Khelben 'Blackstaff' Arunsun was not pleased to find his 'old buddy Amelior' cluttering up his tower (we hit every flea market in Waterdeep on A.A.'s 'research' trips). One morning we just woke up out in the middle of nowhere, surrounded by piles of junk, most of which I am now carrying. A.A. says we are about 70 miles east of Waterdeep, near some place called The House of Stone. I think we're lucky to still be on this plane."

Lost Lands

Though it has never been densely populated, the North has seen numerous realms rise to power, then disappear into the mists of history, their deeds the stuff of legends, their ruins the seedbeds of adventure!

Delzoun

The Northkingdom of the dwarves, named for its founder, Delzoun, is only a shining memory. Once it stretched from the Ice Mountains in the Utter North to the Nether Mountains in the south, bordered on the east by the Narrow Sea (now vanished into the Great Desert), and on the west by Silvery Moon Pass (east of present day Silverymoon). The world was 2,000 years younger then.

Delzoun was a rich and proud land, perhaps the height of dwarven power; its smiths crafted intricate and beautiful mechanisms to ease every task; the great dwarven families grew rich and famous, and gold shown everywhere about their persons and homes. The dwarves ranged across the North, building holds for themselves. They were a happy people, but that is all gone now and much of their labor rests in orcish hands.

Today Citadel Adbar guards the richest mines known to the dwarves and orcs menace the dwarves on all sides. Ruins like Ascore and Ghaurin's Mansion hint at the lost glory of Delzoun.

Eaerlann

This elven realm once controlled the eastern High Forest (see chapter 8).

The Fallen Kingdom

This vanished realm was a short-lived effort to stem the demi-human decline in the North by uniting the remaining elves of Eaerlann, the dwarves outside of Delzoun and humans in a common realm. Though noble in purpose, it never had a solid unity and was smashed out of existence by the repeated attacks of vast orc hordes. Even so, the orcs were slaughtered too and driven back north for many generations. The Mere of Dead Men (see chapter 7) is the site of the last clash of this conflict.

The Kingdom had many names, but the "real one" is lost with time. Now the term "The Fallen Kingdom" refers to the rolling wilderlands due east of Waterdeep. Present day remnants include Ardeepforest, Castle Zundbridge, the ruins of The Stone House, and the predecessor to the town of Secomber.

Illefarn

Like Eaerlann in the east, this ancient elven realm left little mark of its passing. Illefarn existed in the forest that once stood where Waterdeep does now (only the Ardeepforest now remains). The growing concentration of humans in the North drove out the elves of Illefarn long ago.

Netheril

Long ago, even as elves record time, this realm of men lay east of the Delimbiyr, stretching from the Nether Mountains in the north to Evereska in the south, and east to the Narrow Sea, whose shores ran southeast from the port of Ascore for hundreds of miles (before it became the Great Desert).

Netheril was a realm of wizards, and many wondrous magical items were crafted here. Yet even these masters of magic could not save their own land. When the titanic efforts of the Netheril mages were ineffective against the advancing desert, those wizards fled the land on wondrous magical carpets, wings, and steeds, leaving lesser folk behind to survive as best they could. The desert advanced and Netheril became but another notation in history as refugees fled westward into elven Eaerlann, southward to what would become Baldur's Gate and northward into dwarven Delzoun.

The cities of Ascalhorn (Hellgate Keep), Sundabar, Karse (ruins in the High Forest), Silverymoon, Llorck, Illusk (now Luskan) and Gauntlgrym (lost somewhere in the Spine of the World) were founded by refugees from Netheril.

According to the best estimations of sages, Netheril was the earliest human civilization in the North and was at its height some 4,000 years ago only to be abandoned some 1,000 to 3,000 years later. However, there is no solid evidence to support an exact date.

Dekanter, near Weathercote Wood, is the only documented ruin of this ancient land—though it has been thoroughly stripped of its ancient treasures. In all likelihood, others exist, hidden in the Fallen Lands, the Graypeaks, the Great Desert, or the Far Forest.

Strongholds, Ruins & Dungeons

Strongholds are fortresses, castles, dwarfholds, and towers. Too small to be called towns or cities, they are often home to powerful lords and their troops.

Ruins are relics from the past, now abandoned and crumbling into the dust of history. In the North, most are infested with orcs and monsters. Many still contain untouched burial chambers and treasure vaults of ancient races... and the guardians that they left behind.

The adventurers' term "dungeon" is used generically to refer to the underground remnants of dwarfholds, such as Mithril Hall, the Hall of Four Ghosts, and the Stronghold of the Nine; or even lost cities like Karse and Ascarle.

Ascore

Once a thriving port on the Narrow sea, Ascore served as the gateway to the dwarven nation of Delzoun. Here, humans, dwarves and elves conducted trade with nations like Eaerlann, Netheril, Nimbral and Myth Drannor. Now it is sand-swept ruins with mighty stone docks thrust proudly into the advancing desert. The empty hulks of colossal stone ships lie half-covered in the desert beyond, the remnants of lost Delzoun's dwarven navy.

From the west, an ancient road leads to the cliffs above Ascore. Here, a pair of gigantic stone griffon statues crouch, grimly guarding the dark, yawning entrance to Ascore—a door in a hill that leads down into the rock before exiting into the ruins at the base of the cliff.

GAME INFORMATION: The ruins of Ascore are said to contain great treasure. Yet even the orcs avoid the city. It may have something to do with the circle of 13 tall, five-sided red pyramids in the heart of the ruins. Whatever, something evil lurks in Ascore, something that has been here for 2,000 years... waiting.

Desert creatures like dunestalkers and pernicon are found here, as well as many kinds of undead.

Castle of Illusion

When lost Ascalhorn was in its prime, droll little Fitzmilliyun Sparkledrim, a powerful gnome illusionist from the lost Shinglefell Gnome Burrow, built the Castle of Illusion in the Fell Pass. He crafted grand puzzles like Milliyun's Mirror Maze, the Crystal Cube and Ten Doors, No-Way-Out around, within, and below the castle, combining mechanical gimmickery with magical illusions to fool even the most perceptive. Within a century of Sparkledrim's death, greedy orcs overran the castle and put its inhabitants to the sword. No treasure was ever found, but the illusions drove the orcs mad.

The castle sat empty for centuries, protected by its illusions. It is now occupied by dour MacBec Maclyon (NE 12th level magic-user). MacBec and his minions (orcs, of course) have sealed off the lower mines.

GAME INFORMATION: MacBec's followers number 30, including a 4th level magic-user, a 6th level fighter body-guard, and a 3d level orcish witch doctor.

The puzzles to be found here include a hall of mirrors (possibly with a mirror of lifetrapping and a mirror of opposition built into it), a 10-foot cube of apparently indestructible crystal in which valuable treasure can be seen, along with at least three skeletons, and a room with ten doors that appears to spin each time a door is opened. Only one door leads out, the rest release traps or magical guardians. The gnomes' treasures are all hidden in the puzzles and traps.

The Crumbling Stairs

In all likelihood, a fine mansion once stood here, harking back to good times during the years of the Fallen Kingdom. Now, only this marble stair and a mouldering foundation remain. A ghost or haunt is said to lurk in the ruins around the stair.

The Dungeon of Death

This ruined dwarfhold at the headwaters of the Shining Creek is not lightly named. Many believe the ruins to be cursed, for the dungeon depths seem to demand a toll of blood and lives from those who pry into its secrets—it's a rare adventuring band which returns from here with all members still breathing. The Dungeon of Death was once a dwarven gem mine. The upper levels, the old dwarven habitats open onto a deep lava "bubble." Here the dwarves mined diamonds, rubies, emeralds and other gems. The bubble is quite deep and even the dwarves never delved into its greatest depths.

GAME INFORMATION: The above-ground ruins are patrolled by barbarians of the Blue Bear tribe, personal servants of the evil annis Tanta Hagara. Hagara provides human victims for the young Nabassu demons who lair in the dungeon. The Nabassu are surrounded by ghouls, ghosts, and shadows of their creation.

The Dungeon of The Hark

"The Hark" is the name of the leader of a were-rat bandit gang operating out of these ruins. They attack travelers on the Delimbiyr River, then retreat to the dungeon. If attacked in their stronghold, the rat men retreat farther into the subterranean complex below the ruins, where more fearsome things are said to lie in wait.

GAME INFORMATION: The Hark, a 5th level were-rat thief, leads a band of 15 were-rats, mostly thieves and fighters. Above-ground, they live in reconstructed houses that were once quite fine. Below ground, they can retreat through territory controlled by Xuchal-lit, a roper, and about a dozen ogres. The roper is an agent of the illithid Beast Lord on a long-term assignment.

The Dungeon of The Ruins

Unlike most ancient dwarfholds, this ruin is primarily above ground. Passing barbarian hunters have noted "great frog-like forms" dancing around huge pyres amidst the ruins.

The Endless Caverns

These are deep caverns in the center of the High Forest (see chapter 8).

The Fork

The Fork is located at the "Y" where the trail east from Sundabar splits to go north and east. Here are found ruins (a mossy foundation) of the mansion of the ancient dwarven hero Ghaurin. Legend says that when the heavens are right, the air shimmers and the mansion reappears as it was so long ago, giving Ghaurin a chance to right an ancient mistake.

Gate

As its name suggests, the ruins of Gate hide a gate between planes. The underground gate takes the form of an immense black cube, with a single door. Inside, a number of colored stone slabs are doorways to other planes, including several alternate Prime Material Planes.

GAME INFORMATION: Gate is guarded by powerful bugbears in the service of Zythalarlr, a smallish beholder, which fancies itself as "the gatekeeper" or just "the keeper."

Gauntlgrym

Gauntlgrym is a large underground city built by dwarves of Delzoun for men in the early years of an amicable existence of dwarves, elves, and men in the North (long before the Fallen Kingdom). It is now abandoned and holds great riches. All who have heard the ballads and tales of bards in the North know this, but the location of this potential treasure trove is long lost. Even dwarves only know that it lies north of the Dessarin and its tributaries, near the valley of Khedrun.

Adventurers returned to Waterdeep in triumph with news of Gauntlgrym's discovery a season ago, then set out once more to recover its treasures, and have not been heard from since.

GAME INFORMATION: Gauntlgrym housed 30,000 men and dwarves in its day. Now, not even goblin races dwell here. Dripping water echoes eerily throughout the cold empty halls broken infrequently by the wails of banshees. Gauntlgrym touches on the Deepearth realms and a powerful illithid (mindflayer) clan controls part of the city.

Although the way is long and deadly, Gauntlgrym also connects with Great Worm Caverns, which house the ancestor mound of the Great Worm Uthgardt tribe.

The Hall of Four Ghosts

This ruined dwarfhold draws its name from its sole standing building, the great hall of the lord's palace. The hall is haunted by four ghosts, tragic lovers who caused each other's deaths.

The citadel here was a lumbering town, harvesting mighty trees from the High Forest for dwarves throughout the North. The everpresent dwarven mine tunnels burrow deep beneath the High Forest. Giant trolls are known to lair here along with their normal relatives.

GAME INFORMATION: The Hall of Four Ghosts connects with a vast tunnel complex that extends for tens of miles beneath the western High Forest. This complex is mostly unexplored, but is known to connect with caves in the Dessarin and Unicorn Run river valleys. Clusters of rooms were once dwarven camps, but many tunnels pre-date even the Hall of Four Ghosts.

Halls of The Hunting Axe

The tumbled stones of this ancient dwarfhold are visible from atop the Stone Bridge. This colony of Delzoun succumbed to ruin long before its homeland disappeared. The few cathedral-like halls that do stand have no equal in the North. Fragments of colored glass amidst the rubble hint at the stained glass that may have adorned the towering windows.

Hellgate Keep

In ancient days, when the elven kingdom of Eaerlann began to suffer under orc attacks from the north, and the human kingdom of Netheril to the east across the Graypeak Mountains was passing away under the onslaught of the Great Desert, the elves built a great fortress in the head-valley of the river Delimbiyr. The fortress commanded Turnstone Pass to the northwest and defended their own northern border. Upon its completion, the elves turned over the citadel, and its task of defending against orcs, to human refugees from Netheril.

The fortified city, known as Ascalhorn (it was built on a jutting crag known as Ascal's Horn), was thought of as another Myth Drannor. Over hundreds of years of success, followed by a generation of peace when no orcs came, the city's people grew proud and splendid. Their wizards nearly attained the power and skill of their Netherese forebears. Possibly they planned to recapture the splendor and power of Netheril or even Myth Drannor—but succeeded only in destroying themselves.

One ambitious dabbler in sorcery named Wulgreth (possibly the Wulgreth who destroyed Karse) opened a gate to the Nine Hells in secret, seeking aid, and received it. The city was slowly infiltrated by devils, at first only as servants, quiet and quick, but subsequently as schemers and go-betweens, subverting many mages to embrace lichdom, then rising to torture and devour the citizenry with cruel ease. In desperation, many turned to arcane lore books and summoned demonkind to battle the servants of the Hells—a strategy that worked far too well, as hordes of demons poured into Ascalhorn and overwhelmed humans, devils, and lichs alike (a few lichs remain as servants, intrepid adventurers report).

Ascalhorn became a ghoulish hold, guarded by cambion troops, and ruled by at least one Type VI demon. The city's troops are commanded by a deathknight, who leads or directs many patrols in the surrounding lands. The city, now known as Hellgate Keep, is shunned by men. Human and dwarven forces have failed on several occasions to take the city, but the evil troops have been likewise rebuffed in attacks on Citadel Adbar, Sundabar, and Silverymoon. Those cities, reinforced by the open city of Everlund, hold Turnstone Pass, albeit shakily, against Hellgate Keep's forces to prevent unchecked attacks throughout the North by the Keep's armies.

GAME INFORMATION: Grintharke, the type VI demon who rules here, was once the master of a city at the base of a dead volcano (later called the Great Pit of Northending) during the age of dinosaurs on another world. He brought his special pets with him: magically modified pterosaurs with manticores-like tail spikes. Shan Nikkoeth, the deathknight commander, also has an other-worldly origin.

The forces of Hellgate Keep scour the wilderness for treasure for their master and the Keep has become a storehouse for the treasure of many lost realms.

Helm's Hold

Southeast of Neverwinter lies an isolated monastery, dedicated to the worship of the god Helm. Founded some eight winters ago by a retired member of the famed Company of Crazed Venturers (of Waterdeep), the monastery was first a single farm known as Helm's Stead. It has grown greatly, and been fortified (hence its name) against bandit and monster attacks, and now numbers some 700 devout worshippers of Helm. The founder, Dumat Erad, became the White Master of Dragons by defeating Iltmul at the Citadel of Mists (see chapter 8).

The Herald's Holdfast

West of Silverymoon is the spell-guarded citadel of Old Night, one of the five High Heralds of western Faerun. The Herald's Holdfast is an invaluable library of heraldry and genealogy of known human, dwarven, elven, halfling, and gnomish peoples as far back as records can be traced. It is said to be an invincible fortress, respected by both good and evil races of the North—even details of the histories and badges of goblinkind are said to be preserved within its walls.

The House of Stone

This sprawling ruin is said to be a relic of the Fallen Kingdom. Although it is nearly as large as a small town, it seems to be a single building. Hundreds of rooms, atriums, halls, temples, and towers are interconnected in a maze-like manner. Some chambers are open to the sky, others are roofed over, while still more are crumbled ruins. Stairs, shafts and wells descend to subterranean areas. Most rooms contain lifelike statues of men, elves, orcs, and minotaurs.

The House seems to operate in some kind of reverse time effect. Rather than crumbling to rubble, ruined areas rebuild themselves unaided and room connections constantly change.

The adventurer Kelvin Nikkelbane described a vast underground room that contained a forest of enormous silvery trees and another is said to have seen spectral images of elves, dwarves, and men flitting about the rooms.

Karse

Karse is a ruined city within the High Forest (see chapter 8).

Kelvin's Cairn

This lone peak in Icewind Dale rises above an odd valley in the tundra which contains a dwarfhold. Here, a small, dwindling clan of dwarves, the descendants of refugees from Mithril Hall, mine beneath the tundra for miles in all directions. Only 250 or so dwarves remain, under the leadership of Grimfeld Silverstrike, a former miner who acts as regent, ruling in place of his predecessor, Bruenor Battlehammer. The entrances to the dwarfhold are known only to the dwarves and those to whom they reveal it.

The Lonely Tower

From the top of this tall white tower, it is possible to glimpse the glacier far to the north. The Lonely Tower is the dwelling of Ssessibil Istahvar a powerful archmage and his small entourage. Ssessibil seeks solitude from humanity which he both fears and loathes. Here, he conducts magical experiments and manufactures potions and magical items. A small army of orcs keeps visitors away.

It is difficult for wizards of Ssessebil's power to keep their whereabouts entirely secret, yet he manages quite well. Rumor has it that Ssessebil is not as human as he appears.

GAME INFORMATION: Ssessebil is a 27th level, LE magic-user. The tower has no visible entrance. In fact, it has only four internal rooms connected by magical "airlock-type" doors. An elemental being and enough of its element to make it truly dangerous guards each room. One contains earth, another fire, the third water and the final one air. In the air room, a pool of silvery liquid (like mercury) acts as a gate which Ssessebil uses to travel to and from his true home on an alternate Prime Plane (where most normally non-sentient creatures are intelligent and can cast spells of low level). The predominant life form is a giant cat-like reptilian biped—Ssessebil's true form.

Ssessebil has a vast selection of potions, at least one of each listed in the DMG and Unearthed Arcana. Ssessebil dwells in Faerun to obtain supplies for his potions, things not readily found in his home plane.

Mines of Mirabar

Mirabar is the chief mining city of the northern Sword Coast. The mountains and hills around the city are pocked with countless mine shafts. Each major mine entrance is fortified and defended year-round by troops loyal to the mine's merchant owners.

Mithril Hall

Located somewhere in the northeastern mountains, this dwarfhold is said to have the richest deposits of mithril known in the North. The dwarves of Mithril Hall were forced out 175 years ago by "dark creatures" when they dug too deep and their mines opened upon dark, seemingly endless caverns. When they fled, their gold, silver, and mithril treasures stayed behind. The chambers of Mithril Hall are always poorly illuminated by flickering torches or enchanted devices.

GAME INFORMATION: Shimmergloom, the greatest shadow dragon in Faerun (a large Great Wyrms with 11 pips per die), claimed Mithril Hall when the dwarves broke in upon his domain. Unlike others of his kind, Shimmergloom is surrounded by an entourage of shadowy followers, including shadows, drelbs, shades, shadow mastiffs, a shadow demon, and a tribe of enslaved derro. Shimmergloom is clever and his forces attack with guile, not brute strength.

Morueme's Cave

Morueme is the clan name for a family of blue dragons who have laired in this cavern complex for over a thousand years. Usually a family grouping of three to six dragons dwell here. Kizzap Morueme, the eldest, is a very old dragon. He lives with a younger mate and two adult offspring—each dragon has its own lair and jealously guarded treasure within the caves. The Morueme clan has a particular hatred of orcs, ogres, and the creatures of Hellgate Keep. They judiciously avoid mankind, but consider orcs and demons fair and entertaining game.

GAME INFORMATION: All Morueme dragons can speak and use magic. Their spell selection is usually exotic, taken from ancient Netherese and Ascorian spell books in their treasure (including at least one page of the Nether Scrolls). In addition to the dragons, the treasure is guarded by hobgoblin mercenaries of the Red Flyers tribe, who have served the dragons for generations. The hobgoblins live in a small fortified encampment outside the caves, protected by catapults and ballistae.

The Nameless Dungeon

This is an elven ruin in the High Forest (see entry in chapter 8).

The Ruins of Dekanter

More correctly, these are the Mines of Dekanter, the only known ruins of lost Netheril. In ancient days, the mines of Dekanter provided that realm with iron. As the mines were worked out, Netherese mages used them for research, to isolate the effects of new spells and to store magical paraphernalia. When Netheril fell, all was abandoned, becoming an extensive crumbling ruin surrounded by low hills (talus piles from the mines). Above the hills, gaping holes and hidden entrances open on the dark mysteries within.

The magic that once filled Dekanter is long depleted. It now serves as home to goblins, gargoyle... and others.

GAME INFORMATION: A tribe of over 200 goblins (75 males) and 30 huge wolves lives in the mines, led by their chieftain Ghistspok. The tribe ranges east of the Graypeak Mountains, avoiding Llorck and Loudwater. Gargoyles lair in the ruins, which are also patrolled by bands of monster zombies and mongrel men. A portion of the mines are the lair of the Beast Lord, the folk-name for a magic-user who creates and breeds unnatural monsters like bulette, stegocentipedes, peryton, beholders, and so forth. This new Beast Lord is an illithid, a powerful mind flayer who seeks to build an army of creatures to aid it in conquering part of the dark realms of the Deepearth.

The Ruins of Intaru's Tower

A ruined fortress located on the High Road between Waterdeep and Leilon, it was destroyed in the final orc assault against the Fallen Kingdom. It is said that on the anniversary of that battle, ghostly defenders walk the battlements waiting for allies who never come. Though the tower is usually uninhabited, attempts by the Lords' Alliance to rebuild it always end in failure.

Southkrypt

This abandoned dwarf-hold east of Leilon is the lair of many strange and dangerous creatures. Adventurers probing the upper levels have encountered norkers and bands of ravening gibberlings. Deeper forays have uncovered xaren, vilstrak, vargouilles and stoppers.

GAME INFORMATION: In addition to the creatures mentioned, the lower halls of Southkrypt are lair to a vampire hill giant shaman (6th level) and his three vampire hill giant slaves.

The Stone Bridge

Surrounded by rolling grasslands without a road or building visible as far as the eye can see, this high, massive stone arch spans the River Dessarin, a stark, weathered, and lonely reminder of ancient days long gone. Built by dwarves over five thousand years ago to link the now-ruined Halls of the Hunting Axe with now-forgotten dwarven holds to the Northwest (like Southkrypt). The loo-foot-wide bridge was built to span the broadest imaginable spring flood and rises in a great arc some two miles long and 400 feet high above the wates of the Dessarin—without supporting pillars. Equally impressive are the four pylon-like sculptures, two flanking each end of the bridge, that rise 500 above the valley. Each weathered pylon depicts a grim, wary dwarven warrior, waiting, watching.

The dwarves explain the awesome size of the bridge and its continued survival, despite armies clashing on it and mages hurling mighty spells to and from it, over the years—to the fact that it was built in homage to Moradin the Soulforger, and is in fact a temple to him. It is true that some lawful good dwarves do make pilgrimages there, and that at least once in times of darkness for the dwarves, Moradin appeared on the bridge.

The Stronghold of The Nine

An ancient dwarfhold in the High Forest now controlled by former adventurers (see chapter 8).

The Tower of Twilight

On the eastern edge of the Neverwinter Woods, a day's ride west of Longsaddle, stands The Tower Twilight. This lone tower rises from an island in a small lake that drains into the woods to the west. The Tower is home to Malchor Harpell, an 18th level, NG magic-user, a former aide of Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun (a Lord of Waterdeep). Malchor often trains lesser magic users—for a fee.

Tulrun's Tent

Towering above the trees of northern forests on five enchanted stone legs, the home of the reclusive 25th level archmage Tulrun avoids unwelcome visitors. Tulrun's Tent consists of a stone platform large enough to hold a small gaily colored silken tent nestled within a dozen gnarly oaks. Inside, the tent is much, much larger than it appears. It is possible to wander its elegant corridors for hours and never see a familiar hall or chamber.

Zundbridge

This double-walled castle, situated on a rocky outcropping above the river gorge southeast of Waterdeep, guards the High Road bridge across the River Dessarin. An inner wall protects the garrison buildings and an outer encircles a vast field where caravans rest while being inspected by Waterdeep customs officers. Most trading costers own permanent "yards" here for their caravans. The outer bailey's north gate opens onto a drawbridge, controlled from within the gate towers.

"Judge" Kazardun, a former dwarvish mercenary (7th level, LG fighter), commands the Waterdeep troops here. He is the Lord's Alliance law as far south as Daggerford and east to Secomber. Zundbridge is home to the Red Rune Inn, claimed by many to make the finest shalass (fish) stew in all Faerun.

"9 Eleint. Near Secomber Have traded all A. A.'s Waterdeep junk to an odd group of adventurers who call themselves the Fellowship of the Hall. I guess the stuff was valuable. I don't think the old dwarf or the drow bought my story about needing help to return a stolen statue, but they agreed to take it to Secomber anyway. Still don't know what I'm going to do with Amelior when I get him back home. Maybe stand him up in the garden for a few months while I finish his book."

RIVERS, MOUNTAINS, AND ROUGH LANDS

"I Marpenoth. The house and lab were in shambles upon our return, with clothing, chairs, and lab equipment strewn everywhere in a chaotic fashion. I breathed a sigh of relief to see that things were as we had left them. I plan to bring A. A. in from the garden before a hard frost hits, though it seems a shame to disappoint the pigeons. Can't find any stone to flesh potions. Laeral of the Nine usually has quite a few on hand. After I finish next chapter, I'll make a trip up into the High Forest and visit her in the Stronghold."

Ardeepforest

Once a district of the Fallen Kingdom and before that part of the vast forest that was elven Illefarn, this wood is now home to a small clan of elderly moon elves, adventurers who chose to remain behind when their brethren crossed over the sea to Evermeet.

GAME INFORMATION: A well-manicured clearing in the Ardeepforest surrounded by unusually tall and thick-trunked elms is a relic of ancient Illefarn. The refreshing glade radiates constant protection from evil and it is always spring here, regardless of the season. Cure disease spells cast here gain a +1 bonus.

Elves feel an incredible, restful aura of peace here, but other races can only vaguely sense the clearing's calmness. Non-magical wood brought into the glade will come alive and magically begin to sprout leaves and roots.

Berun's Hill

This local landmark is a bare-topped, conical hill that commands a splendid view of the valley of the river Dessarin to the east. This lookout has often been used in times of trouble to watch for advancing orc or barbarian tribes coming down from the north and east. It is named for the famous ranger Berun, who met his end here at the hands of such a horde. He failed to stop the orcs, but slew over 300 singlehandedly before he was overwhelmed. Bandits watch here for the approach of likely victims. Northern legend has it that a dwarven tomb lies under the hill, rich in golden armor and treasures, but none has ever found it, and dwarves know nothing more of it than legend.

Blackraven River

This tributary of the River Mirar flows out of canyons in the foothills of The Wall and is named for the gigantic ravens said to lair at its headwaters. Blackraven raiders, mounted on gigantic ravens will not allow outsiders upriver where their ancestor mounds lie.

Bleached Bones Pass

This pass once connected Dekanter with Illefarn to the west, but few use it now. The pass draws its name from piles of sun-whitened bones that line the trail. Numerous small, crude orc strongholds dot the slopes of the pass, warring constantly with one another.

The Cold Run

From the Iceflow north to Icewind Dale, this bleak tundra is home to reindeer, wolves, tundra yeti, and a few Ice Hunter villages which cling to the rocky coast. Warm winds off the Trackless Sea bring a mild summer to the Run, but come winter those same winds shriek bitter, deadly cold.

The Cold Wood

This pine, spruce, and birch forest is all but untouched by humankind. Snow cats (red tigers), ettin, and orcs roam the wood. The Cold Wood is the usual site of Tulrun's Tent, a wizard's stronghold.

The Craggs

These hills south of Mirabar, infested with goblins, hobgoblins and bugbears, contain the worked-out mines that originally brought men to the area.

DawnTreader Gap

This pass through the Graypeaks east of Llorkh is regularly traveled by Zhen-tarim caravans. It is steeper and more demanding than Bleached Bones Pass to the south, but it is easier to defend. A garrison of 30 purple-cloaked "Lord's Men" from Llorkh guard here.

Dead Horse Ford

This ford across the Dessarin near the High Wood draws its name from a battle fought here in which the hero Destril Longtracker had three horses slain beneath him.

Dead Orc Pass

A steep, rocky gorge northeast of Sundabar. The River Rauvin roars through here in a series of cataracts, rapids, and falls, filling the valley with mist and making the narrow trails wet and slippery. The orc-king Graul is thought to have his stronghold here.

Delimbiyr, The River Shining

This clear, cool river forms the eastern and southern boundaries of the High Forest as it runs over a thousand miles from its headwaters in the Nether Mountains to the sea west of Daggerford. The River Shining is fast-flowing with mint-sweet, drinkable water and is home to many szorp: brown, trout-like fish with tasty white flesh. It is navigable from its mouth to Loudwater, and from above the Shining Falls to its headwaters.

The Desert's Edge

Parched scrublike growth along the edge of the Great Desert often hides ruins, relics and desperate creatures waiting for their next meal.

Dessarín, River

The cold and deep River Dessarin flows into the sea south of Waterdeep at Zundbridge. Its waters are home to the silver shalass, fish that are a delicacy across the North. The Dessarin itself rises in the Lost Mountains, isolated peaks on the western High Forest. The Dessarin is bridged at Zundbridge and at The Stone Bridge farther north. It is fordable at Ironford and Dead Horse Ford east of Yartar.

The Dessarin is fed by many other rivers and streams. Its network, which includes the "Laughingflow," the icy River Surbrin, and the River Rauvin, is generally navigable through most of its length. A small boat can take travelers from the sea all the way to the icy falls east of Dead Orc Pass. The Dessarin itself can be negotiated to Dancing Falls at the base of the Lost Peaks. The upper reaches of the network form a vast, open, grassy basin, rising in the east into the Evermoors.

The Evermoors (Trollmoors)

Also known as the "Trollmoors," this barren upland area still shows the scars of the huge bonfires set to burn the corpses of the trolls, or "everlasting ones," that once roamed here in hordes. Trolls still lurk in the hills and bogs, but not in vast numbers as of old.

The Fallen Lands

This is the present-day name for the strip of uninhabitable land west of Anauroch, stretching between "the Far Forests" (now overrun by evil things out of Hellgate Keep) and Weathercote Wood. This was once a part of the realm of Netheril, a kingdom of mages who fled when they could not stem the expansion of the Great Desert. The Fallen Lands are now home only to monsters, though rumors persist of great mages inhabiting its southern reaches, hurling back the fiends of Hellgate Keep with their art. Adventurers have seen a beholder of awesome size here, directing hobgoblin servants to capture monstrous beasts.

At the eastern edge of the Fallen Lands, shifting desert sands have uncovered a ring of nine gigantic statues who are apparently peering down into a wide hole of unknown purpose.

"The Far Forests"

Once, this was a fair wood of healthy trees and frolicing forest creatures. Now it is the lair of fiendish, other-planar creatures from Hellgate Keep. The trees themselves have taken on horrific aspect, parodies of the monsters who stalk their gloomy glades.

"The Fell Pass"

This pass through a southern spur of the Spine of the World was the site of a desperate battle between orcs and the dwarven army of Delzoun. Now, most folk avoid it if they can, for it is haunted by ghosts, haunts, and apparitions of the warriors who died here.

GoblinTide River

This branch of the Surbrin is named for a long-ago battle in which goblin corpses drifted downriver for weeks. Chillingly beautiful cold nymphs frolic in the waters here, garbed in simple tunics bedecked with gems and gold.

Graypeak Mountains

This eastern mountain range separates the Fallen Lands from the Delimbiyr river valley. The range is named for the tribes of gray-skinned stone giants who dwell here. Its mineral wealth was removed thousands of years past during the reign of lost Netheril.

The Great Desert

Anauroch, the Great Desert, is a barren wasteland that forms the eastern border of the Savage Frontier—a vast mass of steppeland, rocky wastes and sandy desert that runs from the Uttermost North almost to the lake of Dragons. Over the millennia, it has crept south, swallowing the Narrow Sea and destroying ancient civilizations. Desert creatures and monsters often wander into the eastern fringes of the Savage Frontier. Nomad tribes from the desert visit Sundabar and Llorck on occasion, though such visits are few. The men of the desert often trade for goods with relics of ancient design.

The High Forest

This giant forest, its contents and occupants are described beginning on p. 49.

The High Moor

Though it is mostly outside the North, stoncutters from Secomber occasionally uncover ancient tombs here. The last crypt discovered yielded a suit of mithril chainmail +4 and a sun blade, but not before mummies within it slew two unlucky stone masons.

The High Road

This carefully maintained highway connects Waterdeep with Nevverwinter, Port Llast, and Luskan to the north, and extends to Baldur's Gate and beyond in the south. It is heavily patrolled by forces of the Lords' Alliance.

The Ice Flow

This chilling, fast-rushing river thunders down out of the icy interior of the Sword Coast's northernmost extent, marking the beginning of the Cold Run. Its unnavigable waters are just above freezing and travel at terrifying speed through a great ice gorge. In spring and high summer, great slabs of ice break off the gorge walls and fall into the water, shattering with the force of a triple strength ice storm, spraying the vicinity with boulders of broken ice. These chunks are swept down the gorge and out to sea, to drift south amid great icebergs from the Sea of Moving Ice. Remorhaz are known to lair nearby and great horrors known as "ice or snow spiders" have also been encountered.

No rich ores have been found here, but there are persistent rumors of incredibly ancient ruins and buried riches in secret places in the gorge.

The Ice Mountains

This snowcapped range far to the northeast contains the remnants of dwarven power in the North, Citadel Adbar and the underground realm of Adbarrim. Few humans are found here, other than the wild hunters of the Red Tiger (snow cat) barbarian tribe or merchants from Sundabar. Frost giants, orcs, verbeeg, devil dogs, remorhaz, ice lizards and white dragons dwell here. It is said that an ancient silver dragon and his bronze dragon companion roam the mountains in the guise of an old hunter and his hound.

Icewind Dale

In this bleak tundra is the farthest bastion of civilization in the Savage Frontier, a loose confederation of 10 towns and villages known collectively as the Ten Towns (see chapter 4). The towns are located on or near the three deadly-cold lakes of Maer Dualdon, Lac Dinneshere and Redwaters, the habitat of the knucklehead trout (found nowhere else in Faerun). The tundra of the Dale is surrounded by ice, with high-walled glaciers to the east and the Sea of Moving Ice to the west and north.

Icewind Dale is home to a few tribes of tundra barbarians, reindeer, polar bears, wolves, elk, the fierce tundra yeti, and a white dragon or two.

Ironford

This ford across the Dessarin is not a particularly shallow or easy crossing. The Bargewright Inn is located here.

"Laughingflow"

The original elven name for this tributary of the Surbrin has been lost; only its rough translation survives. The Laughingflow drains the southern Evermoors, its happy name a stark contrast to the bleak barrens along its course. The Riders of Nesmé maintain a number of palisade and earthworks base camps along its banks and call the river by their own name: "Trollflow."

The Lonely Moor

South of Weathercote Wood, this desolate dusty waste of scrub and rock stretches from the Great Desert to the foothills of the Graypeaks. Here can be found the ruins of Dekanter, leucrotta and worse monsters, and secretive Zhentarim caravans enroute to Llorck.

The Long Road

This less-traveled road connects Mirabar in the far north with Longsaddle, Triboar and Waterdeep to the south. Although it is regularly patrolled by troops from Waterdeep, bandit raids are frequent and they always seem to know what goods are carried and the defenses to be encountered in merchant caravans.

Mere of Dead Men

This vast salt swamp stretches along the shore of the Sword Coast for over a 100 miles, reaching inland over 30 miles at its greatest width. It is a desolate, foetid, insect-infested place, seldom visited by men and home to numerous deadly creatures.

The Mere of Dead Men was named for the thousands of men, elves, and dwarves of the Fallen Kingdom who were slain here when orc hordes routed them here from the present-day site of Triboar.

Travelers on the High Road, which skirts the Mere to the east, have been known to travel for three days and nights without stopping to avoid camping near the Mere. Will-o-(the)-wisps bobbing over the Mere are a common sight at night from the High Road.

Tales are told of floating islands, of eerie pools of magical aspect, of lizard men commanded by liches, and even of a penanggalan of monstrous size that haunts the area. Understandably, few folk are moved to investigate the dark, scummy waters of the Mere to learn the dire truths for themselves.

River Mirar

This icy, unnavigable river races south from the Spine of the World, tumbles through rapids in the Valley Khedrun, swirls rapidly past grim Mirabar and its countless mines until it at last reaches the port city of Luskan in the Illusk Fjord. It is the site of the annual Mirar Run, a 20-mile white water khyek (sealed leather canoe) race during the Mirabar Midsummer festival.

The Nether Mountains

This dark, brooding mountain range once marked the northern boundary of ancient Netheril and the southern boundary of Delzoun. It is home to orcs of the Ripped Gut and Thousand Fists tribes, bands of verbeeg, a small community of pech who are constructing a huge granite cube supposedly filled with gems, the Morueme clan of blue dragons and their hoards, and the Monastery of Loviatar which guards a trove of secret volumes taken from a lost Netherese college of magic.

Neverwinter Woods

This forest east of Neverwinter seems to have a magical quality about it, or at least an air of mystical secrecy. The always-warm Neverwinter river, which flows out of the wood, has its source deep beneath Mount Hotenow, a sleepy volcano in the northern wood. Fire elementals are said to live deep within Hotenow. The steep mountains to the north of Hotenow hide griffon lairs.

These woods have never been logged by men (they are feared and shunned by the locals), and even today are largely unknown. The depths are said to harbor dire creatures. Orc hordes always go around the woods, never through them.

Other Woods

This is not the name of a single forest, but includes the Lurkwood, Southkrypt garden, Southwood, Moonwood and Westwood. These edges of these forests are logged by men, though their dark depths are largely a mystery.

Rauvin, River

The lazy Rauvin winds slowly through the North to join the icy Surbrin near Nesmé. The Rauvin, which takes its name from a ancient dwarf hero, is bridged at Silverymoon (the legendary moonbridge), Everlund, and Sundabar. Its headwaters are in the Ice Mountains northeast of Dead Orc Pass. Although there is much traffic on the Rauvin, it is not a "safe" river. Orcs, trolls, and barbarians constantly harass travelers.

Shining Falls

These spectacularly beautiful falls on the river Delimbiyr halt river traffic north. Once the elven kingdom of Eaerlann had an outpost here, but little remains; even the once-busy portage road around the falls is little more than a deer trail now.

The Spine of The World

This extensive mountain range, which separates the North from the Uttermost North, has many of the highest peaks in all Faerun, all eternally snow-capped. "The Wall" is its other name, used more commonly south of Waterdeep. Though it was once riddled with dwarfholds, now it is home to fierce, cold-loving monsters, countless tribes of orcs, goblins, hobgoblins, bugbears and verbeeg. Hill giants prowl the foothills, and frost giants, white dragons, yeti, and taer claim the high peaks and frigid valleys.

If the mines of Mirabar are any indication, it is also contains the richest mineral deposits in the North, yet due to its monstrous inhabitants, only the smallest fraction of that wealth is exploited. The heart of the range is uncharted, but is said to hide lost cities, abandoned dragon lairs, and even frozen dinosaurs!

Surbrin River

This tributary of the River Dessarin originates on the frigid shores of the Endless Ice Sea, the vast glacier pack north of the Wall. The waters of the Surbrin lose little of their chill before they dump into the Dessarin. The Surbrin is bridged at Yartar and Nesmé and is navigable to where the Rauvin joins it, northeast of Nesmé.

Turnstone Pass

In olden days, this wide pass in the Nether Mountains witnessed constant strife between the allied forces of men and elves against waves of orc invasions from the north. Now it is the front line of the North's defense against the fiends of Hellgate Keep. The rough terrain here is frequently patrolled by warriors from Sundabar and bands of armed undead who follow in the wake of demon commanders.

The Uttermost North

Also called the "Utter North," this refers to that area beyond The Spine of the World mountain range, including Icewind Dale and the glaciers of The Endless Ice Sea. Few humanoid races live this far north.

The Valley of Khedrun (ka-hed-ROON)

Named for a dwarven hero who in legend carved out the homeland of the dwarves in the North from lands dark with wolves, orcs, and bugbears with only his axe, this valley of the upper Mirar is the supposed site of legendary lost Gauntlrym, an underground city. It is also the site of the Great Worm Caverns.

Weathercote Wood

Elves say that gates to other worlds lie in the depths of Weathercote, and that otherworldly mages of awesome power have come to Faerun to dwell in the Wood and guard the gates to prevent others of their kind from using them. The truth of this is not known; neither spells nor psionics are able to penetrate the Wood's interior, and those who enter to investigate do not come out again.

THE HIGH FOREST

"Date unknown. Well, this is where it ends, starving to death in a dank cell, imprisoned by another one of A. A.'s old 'friends.' I've tried to gauge time, but with no natural light and infrequent meals, I can only guess.

"Will try to recap my situation (Tempus's Toes! Amelior's got me writing for posterity now!). Jhingleshod and I found the Stronghold of the Nine. It seemed deserted, so we snooped a bit. Maybe we could just 'borrow' the potion and leave. We met Laeral. She seemed a bit different, nastier; than usual (or maybe it was her hair). After a short argument (maybe 'cock-eyed witch' was a bad choice of words), I awoke here.

"Next time I'll try A. A.'s enemies, they might be more friendly. See if I ever do anything for One-eye again. Wonder if that cock-eyed witch is looking for the stupid spikey crown I found in here. It sure makes for a lousy pillow."

Deep, dark, ancient and unfathomable, the vast High Forest dominates the eastern central marches of the North.

From its southern edge near Secomber to its northern extent near Everlund and Turnstone Pass, it stretches nearly 500 miles. It is like and yet unlike other woods in the north, remaining virtually untouched by woodsmen's axes.

Forest Folk

Treants

The "wood rulers" dwell near the city of Everlund in the part of the forest known as "The Woods of Turlang," after the Treant's aeons-old ruler "Turlang the Thoughtful." Each treant has a stretch of woodland which is carefully maintained in keeping with his or her personality, ranging from immaculately clean tree gardens, to dense, dark and eerie, seemingly haunted forest.

Half-Elven Renegades

The descendants of the folk of Eaerlann inhabit, or infest, much of that lost land's former woodlands. These half-elven brigands are primarily moon-elves, but numerous drow "breeds" are to be found, descendants of elf, drow and human unions long past. Noted among them is their leader, "princess" Tianna Skyflower.

Men

Druids serving Silvanus guard Tall Trees (the great tree remnants of the ancient elven land of Eaerlann) near the forest's eastern edge and occasionally (and with great caution) explore the deeper forest. An adventuring band has a stronghold in the south, and an illusionist one in the north.

Korred

The primary home of these dance-happy forest folk is the wood around the Lost Peaks in the western forest. Great glades form dance floors large enough to host a thousand dancing korred. These diminutive, wild-haired, satyr-like creatures worship Tappan, their own god and Shiallia, a female woodland demigod allied with Mielikki.

Drow

This subterranean elven subrace does not dwell here, but it has long been suspected that the forest hides an entrance to Menzoberranzan, one of the dark elves' Deepearth cities.

Mongrel Men

These mixed breeds have been migrating in numbers to the central forest, apparently being called into the service of a charismatic man who calls himself "The One."

Orcs

Numerous orc tribes dwell in the cool darkness of the southwestern forest. Their crude villages are located about two days' travel into the woods.

Aarakocra

This winged race dwells only in the central Star Mounts, but occasionally is seen near the western fringe of the forest. They are reclusive, having little to do with other folk.

Wizard Weather

The High Forest and the surrounding countryside experience (or suffer from) occasional exotic weather patterns that can only be of magical origin (and are presumed to be caused by the Dire Wood). This weather appears suddenly, ends suddenly and is often destructive and deadly. Recorded types of wizard weather have included red snow ("it tasted like blood"), hot rain ("it boiled the flesh"), blizzards in summer, exotic (invisible, multi-colored, huge, explosive, glowing and black) hailstones, dense fog (with evil creatures lurking within), razor-sharp sleet ("it drew blood and scored metal"), black, acidic rain, and desert-like blazing heat. There is a 1% chance each day of encountering wizard weather while within the High Forest.

The Dire Wood

Deep within the eastern wood, somewhere along the Heartblood river lies the Dire Wood, a small grove of unkillable, black trees, apparently no greater than a mile across.

Also known as the Enchanted Wood, this intensely magical area may actually be an access point to an alternate Prime Material Plane. Whatever the truth may be, the Dire Wood is much larger inside than out. The intense arcane effect of the wood has created a strange land of magic and mystery. Weather here bears no resemblance to the outer world and is itself highly magical. Creatures long extinct elsewhere are found here in abundance (but die upon leaving). Magical sites appear at random, then disappear without a trace.

Somewhere within the Dire Wood are the lost ruins of Karse, an outpost of the latter days of the ancient Netheril.

GAME INFORMATION: As of this writing, the Dire Wood is 150 miles across (its inside dimension). Each year it broadens by about 80 feet as another ring of black trees surrounds the forest. The terrain over which the forest grows is hilly and entirely forested. There are no mountains within the Wood, only a single towering red stone butte, and few normal creatures—even the usual forest animals are gigantic or otherwise magically modified.

Tianna Skyflower, Jhingleshod, "The Iron Axeman," and Wulgreth (see pp. 56-64) call the Dire Wood home.

Heartblood River

This tributary of the Delimbiyr, which flows through the Dire Wood, has its source on the north side of the Star Mounts. Where the Heartblood leaves the Dire Wood, the water has a reddish cast which quickly disappears.

GAME INFORMATION: If the water of the Heartblood is consumed while still reddish, the imbiber is temporarily magically enhanced. For 1d4 hours, spells cast by magic-users and clerics (not by devices) have a +1 chance to succeed, and all imbibers gain a 20% Magic Resistance.

The Lost Peaks

These two small mountains in the northwestern wood are the source of the River Dessarin. Here, so legend says can be found the Fountains of Memory, magical pools which one can use to peer into Faerun's past. The waters allow instantaneous travel to places viewed (though whether the times viewed can be reached is not clear). However, legend also says the Fountains are located within a glade sacred to Tappan, god of the korred who dwell here in quite large numbers.

The Star Mounts

Located in the heart of the High Forest, this steep-sloped cluster of mountains ascends higher than even the tallest peaks in the Spine of the World. It is possible to see the snowcapped mountain tops, and the slopes which sparkle like cut diamonds, from as far away as the Stone Bridge, or the mountains north of Loudwater.

The elves of Eaerlann first named the mountains, giving them the same names as stars in the northern heavens. Most of the original names are forgotten, only their rough translations survive: Bard's Hill, Mount Vision, and Hunterhorn. Yet, a few are remembered: Y'tellarien (The Far Star), called Far Peak, Y'landrothiel (Traveler's Star), called Mount Journey, and N'landroshien (Darkness in Light), called Shadowpeak.

The forest south of the mountains hides a gnarled surface that might be called a badland were it not so densely thicketed. To the north, the land is unusually smooth, as if leveled with a woodworker's plane.

The mountains are also known to be rich in metals, including remarkably pure iron and nickel. But since the end of Eaerlann, no one mines there.

The Star Mounts are an unapproachable curiosity. The ancient elven names hint at some unfathomable mystery (though most suspect the elves know the truth of it). As far as anyone knows, no flying thing less powerful than a dragon can land there due to constant and usually fierce winds.

GAME INFORMATION: The mountains cannot be approached by flying, other than upon an ancient or larger dragon. Strong gusts of wind (possibly huge air elementals?) will dash weaker beings against the cliffs. Still, aarakocra, the bird-like winged race, seem to have no difficulty in flying to and from the mountains.

Huge crystals dot the surface of the mountains, many as large as small houses. There are several uncharted ruins in the mountains with walls made of fractured crystal shards.

The Unicorn Run

This cool, gently-flowing river has its source in the Star Mounts, at the very heart of the High Forest where very few civilized beings have ever been all through the ages (save the elves who do not talk). It tumbles roughly through the rough, densely forested canyonlands south of the mountains, then slowly meanders southward through the hilly forest to join the Delimbiyr at Secomber. Though few chose to do it, the Run is navigable as far as the first of the "sisters," the waterfalls which block further upriver travel. For such a large river, the Unicorn Run is remarkably clear.

The Stronghold of the Nine (see below), lies partway up the run, located on a hill above the valley. Unicorns are known to travel the river's banks (hence its name), possibly traveling to the crystalline slopes of the Star Mounts. A famous halfling adventurer, Gautham Longtoes, is known to have said, after visiting the Run, "I have seen the unicorns, and can die content."

Legends about the Run are many. One holds that an elven king buried the treasure of his court somewhere along the run while flee orcs and hobgoblins— but was soon slain with all his folk. Another holds that the god Mielikki wanders the wood here (though the Harpers claim this "legend" to be plain truth and often make dangerous pilgrimages upriver). The storyweavers of Secomber claim that if you travel the river to its end, you will find the home of the gods, that the river does not originate in this world, but in another. Other folk claim that water from The Unicorn Run remains eternally pure, that it can never be fouled or poisoned.

"Having been far enough upriver on the Run to see the first 'sister,' as it poured like living mist from the verdant canyon forest high above, I know why bards who see this river sing of it for the rest of their lives. It is certainly one of the most beautiful regions of all Faerun." — Amelior

Realms, Ruins & Strongholds

Within the forest, there are few markers of civilization, past or present. Those that might be of interest are noted below.

The Citadel of The Mists

This isolated castle lies in the forest's northern fringes and is home to a powerful illusionist known only as the Mistmaster, reputed to be 26th level. He dwells here with his household retainers who are known to be Iltmul, an 8th level monk, once the White Master of Dragons, now Green Master of Dragons; and Cherissa Mintareil, a 5th level woman warrior who gained great fame in the service of Cormyr. The Mistmaster loves to raise and train pegasi.

The Citadel is rumored to contain great treasure within its vaults, yet few have ever seen the Citadel, let alone passed within.

GAME INFORMATION: The Citadel,

which is built upon the foundation of ancient elven fortress (which may itself have been built upon the ruins of something even more ancient), is guarded by both magical and monstrous guardians, and when the Mistmaster wishes, it is cloaked in swirling mists.

A tall tower houses the pegasi eyrie. It is reached by an exposed internal staircase through a single large chamber, reputedly guarded by charmed air and fire elementals.

Beneath the castle are the cellars of the ancient elven fortress. Passages known to descend deeper have been blocked. . . repeatedly.

Eaerlann

This elven kingdom's name is lost to all but a few in the North. Once it encompassed the eastern forest from Turnstone Pass in the north to the Shining Falls in the south, controlling the upper valley of the River Shining.

Long ago, the elven folk of Eaerlann sailed over the sea to Evermeet. Today, only a crumbling old road and a ruined port mark that any civilization existed here at all. Other ruins, remnants of cities and lost treasures are yet to be found. The forest's Tall Trees region may yet hold remnants of Eaerlann, but the druids there repel both the forces of Hellgate Keep and adventurers.

Some of the folk of Eaerlann joined with the dwarves and men from the west to form the ill-fated Fallen Kingdom along the Sword Coast.

The Endless Caverns

At the edge of the broken lands south of the Star Mounts, a nameless river flows from a huge opening in the cliff face. The rangers of the Harpers know this as the Endless cavern, a deep reaching cavern complex which the elves of Eaerlann believed to be a connection point with the deep realms of the underearth. Here of old dwelt Grax Rekaxx, an ancient green dragon. His moss-covered bones decorate the outermost cave chamber, but no trace was ever found of his vast dragon hoard.

The ranger, Skimmerhorn of Secomber, reported evidence of illithid activity here on his most recent investigation.

Grandfather Tree

An oak tree of titanic proportions, that towers above the rest of the forest but whose location is not known, other than "Somewhere in the northern High Forest." It is sacred ground to the Uthgardt barbarians, but its existence predates the human presence in the North (see p. 54).

Karse

The center of the mystical Dire Wood is the ancient ruins of Karse. In olden days, religious refugees who had been driven from the ancient land of Netheril built this city at the base of the base of a tall butte of red stone which their legends held to be the remnants of Karsus's physical form. Though they originally built without permission from the elves of Eaerlann, an alliance was struck and they mined the rich metal deposits of the Star Mounts. Both normal forest and the black dire oaks have thickly overgrown the ruins.

Here can be found the black glade, a circle of 13 towering dire oaks; the intact, ageless home of the evil archmage Wulgreth; and an eerie black pyramid which oozes evil.

GAME INFORMATION: Karse fell into ruin around the same time as Hellgate Keep was occupied by demons, when the death of the evil wizard Wulgreth caused the creation of the Dire Wood. The wizard yet lives on as an intensely evil, lich-like being within the black pyramid. He seeks pure blood from the heart of Karsus to return to true life. An avatar (minor physical manifestation) of the dying god Karsus dwells in a temple atop the butte, his everflowing blood contributing to the magical nature of the Dire Wood, while deep within the butte, Karsus's gigantic, living heart beats ponderously.

The Nameless Dungeon

Until adventurers from Sundabar brought a glowing suit of mithril chain mail +4 out of the ruins of this elven citadel, the treasures of elven Eaerlann were believed to have disappeared with the elves. The discovery of the Nameless Dungeon has caused a furor among elves in the North. An envoy from Evermeet has gone as far as to ask High Lady Alustriel of Silverymoon to outlaw those known to have trespassed here. There is something in the ancient crypts that the elves do not want anyone to know about.

Old Road

From the mouldering ruins of the ancient elven port on the Delimbiyr, this road once traveled to lost Karse, but now literally fades into nothingness as its paving stones crumble into dust about 90 miles into the forest.

The Stronghold of The Nine

This cavern complex is a former dwarfhold rebuilt by the Nine, a famous adventuring band led by the female archmage Laeral. This group, now mostly retired, makes its home in the seclusion of the High Forest, as far up The Unicorn Run as men dare go. The Stronghold is known to have strange and powerful magical guardians (including nagas and golems) not to mention their retainers, followers and several mercenary bands. The Nine are known to have gathered much treasure over the years—much of it is undoubtedly in the Stronghold.

GAME INFORMATION: The Nine are now the "Five." A disagreement over an item in Laeral's possession began a feud, dividing the once close knit band into three warring factions. The item is an artifact known as the Crown of Horns, a many-horned helm of unknown properties (one property should be obvious, it causes dissension and a desire to possess it). Those who investigate The Stronghold will find its above-ground buildings abandoned and in poor repair. The large underground complex is ill-defended and in constant turmoil as ragged, paranoid warbands gain, lose and regain control of the Crown. To them, everything else in the world pales in comparison to the ugly iron helm.

The five who survive are 15th level or higher and include a fighter, a cleric, two magic-users (Laeral and one other), and a thief. Most of their followers are 2d level or higher.

"Dearest Amelior,

"Perhaps I was too hasty earlier this year. Dove and I will be traveling to Waterdeep in Uktar. Can you find time to talk on our return trip? Even in Silverymoon, the long winter can be lonely.

Alustriel"

"Dear Amelior,

"Sorry to have missed you. It was Dove's idea to let ourselves in. We tried to clean up, but we just made it worse. Hope you like the gift I left.

"Alustriel"

"PS. I love the statue. If you want it back, you'll have to come to Silverymoon. I'll wager you can't guess where I am going to hide it."

UTHGARDT ANCESTOR MOUNDS

"1 Nightal. I'm not dead and Amelior is gone, probably decorating someplace where gooney Alustriel would never allow him were he not in his present condition. For the record, I just walked out of Laeral's Stronghold. My cell was unlocked and I had not been fed for days. Even so, I can't say that I was happy to see the purple squid symbol on the door frame.

"3 Nightal. Book nearly done. With A. A. gone, I didn't think I could describe those barbarian mounds found up north, but I met a strange old coot in green gear at the Frosty Tankard last night. Wan ted me to find Grandad Tree for him, but I kept his mug full and he told me about mounds."

These are the holiest sites of the Uthgardt barbarians. Most tribes believe their tribal founders to be buried in their ancestor mound. Although there are many lesser burial mounds and shrines revered by smaller clans within the tribes, it is to these large mounds devoted to their most ancient and holy ancestors that the Uthgardt tribes return each fall to spend their winters near the protection of their ancestors.

The ancestor mounds are all roughly similar. Two mound rings called cairn rings surround a large central mound called the altar mound. The ancestor mounds of large tribes may also be surrounded by smaller, nondescript burial mounds. Usually all mounds are formed of turf-covered earth.

The spaces between the rings and the altar mound are called vales. They are as wide as a cross section of a cairn ring (about 40 to 45 feet) and are known as the inner and outer vales.

The cairn rings often echo the shape of the altar mound, but many are circular. The outer cairn ring is usually bare, and still serves as a burial ground. Four large stone menhirs are set at the four cardinal directions (N, E, S, W) on the more holy inner ring. The rest of the inner ring is spiked and thicketed with tall wooden poles. The top of each pole is grotesquely carved, depicting fierce human faces, monsters or clan totems.

The altar mound in the center of the ancestor mound is often shaped like a tribal totem beast (though this is often difficult to discern from the ground). A fifth large stone, usually low to the ground marks the altar. There is no writing here, but arcane symbols on the stone are renewed yearly.

Most Uthgardt are superstitious about their ancestor mounds. They both fear and revere them. In the cairn rings surrounding the altar mounds, they have buried their mightiest chieftains with treasures and luxuries for the world beyond life. They believe that the spirits of dead ancestors protect the graves from harm.

The actual location of most ancestor mounds is a secret, yet they are regularly looted by grave robbers, orcs, and Uthgardt who no longer fear their ancestor's curses. Even so, many still contain carefully hidden treasure.

GAME INFORMATION: Each burial mound contains a large number of log-lined crypts 6 to 10 feet below the top of the mound. Few contain real treasure (Treasure types B, M, plus the treasure type of any undead beings who guard the things they valued in life); most have been looted. Tomb guardians are usually more substantial undead beings like wights, coffer corpses, mummies, or skeleton warriors (DM's choice).

All Uthgardt mounds are guarded. Most have a lone (crazed) shaman of 5th to 7th level protecting them. All are protected by champion spirits bound into service each year at Runemeet. At the DM's discretion, champion spirits may be almost any type of spectral undead: ghosts, wraiths, spectres, apparitions, etc. However, their alignment is always CN (they are barbaric guardian beings).

Finally, the eldest Uthgardt shamans work an involved ritual (similar to the clerical spell plane shift) that opens a gateway into the Astral Plane atop the altar mound. Any cleric who knows this secret ritual can open the gate.

Individual Mounds

Beorunna's Well

This is both an ancestor mound and a small town of about 500 Uthgardt, named for another semi-mythological Uthgardt ancestor, Beorunna, the mythical father of Uthgar.

The village is quite unremarkable, a number of huts and tents for the tribesfolk who work the small fields, raise cattle, and hunt the surrounding woods. It is unremarkable until one learns that the unfortified village has never been successfully raided. The Black Lions claim that the spirit of Beorunna keeps them from harm.

The namesake of the village is the huge pit which contains their circular ancestor mound. The pit is supposedly the ruins of a collapsed cavern in which Beorunna died while saving the world.

"It is probable that Beorunna (or Berun in the Northman tongue) was a hero of the pre-Uthgar people who merged with the followers of a renegade from ancient Ruathym. Legend holds that Beorunna destroyed Zukothoth, a type IV demon in the cavern, collapsing it in on both of them. What local legend doesn't say is that a vast fortune in ancient treasure is also in the collapsed cavern. It is quite surprising to me that these folk have survived here for so long. Maybe their legends about the spirit of Beorunna are true."—Amelior

GAME INFORMATION: The ready militia of Beorunna's Well consists of 80 1st, 30 2d level, 20 3rd level, and five 4th level barbarians and is led by Heafstagg Four-finger (6th level barbarian, ST 18, DX 17), the eldest son of Alaric the Strong, the Black Lion tribal chieftain. The trapdoor in the water-surrounded altar leads downward through a flooded passage way to a partially collapsed cavern complex, home to all kinds of slimes, jellies, molds and insectoid creatures. Ickshar, a rakshasa and his ally X'ss'a' (ZHE-see-sa), an illithid have been trapped in stasis here since the collapse of the cavern.

Beorunna, or Bey of Runlatha as he was known in ancient Ascore, was a powerful wizard/warrior who led human refugees from that city northward into dwarven territory to save them from what had occupied their city. Beorunna died in the battle with Zukothoth, but his spirit is perpetually reincarnated into the bodies of small, furry forest animals, which slowly take on semi-human form (a CG, 20th level wizard/10th level warrior). Beorunna guards the folk of Black Lion Village from harm.

Flintrock

This bleak ancestor mound in the moors east of Longsaddle is situated on a gnarly knob of flinty stone. The cairn rings and altar mound are created from piles of heaped rock, barren of plant growth and are shaped like a leaping elk stag. The Elk tribe follows other gods, so the mound is almost abandoned, though a few tribesfolk use it at Runemeet.

Grandfather Tree

This is the other of the two abandoned ancestor mounds, a gnarled oak tree of gigantic proportions towering above the surrounding trees of the High Forest. Its location is not marked for it is not known. The giant oak on the altar mound is the altar itself. The shamans would climb up steps carved in the gnarled bark to perform their rituals. The menhirs on the inner cairn ring are lesser oak trees. There is little evidence of the works of man here and a few rotted logs are all that remain of the tribal totem poles. In summer, the foliage of the great oak shadows the entire ancestor mound. Those brave enough to climb the tree to its uppermost branches can see almost the length and breadth of the High Forest.

Long ago, the mound's champion spirits drove the Blue Bear tribe away for unknown reasons. The tribal sha-man carried away a cutting from this tree to become the now-ancient oak at the Stone Stand ancestor mound. When the arrival of Tanta Hagara and her corrupting influence caused the Tree Ghosts to splinter away from the Blue Bears, both tribes set upon a single goal... find Grandfather Tree.

GAME INFORMATION: The Hall of Mists does exist beneath the tree. A complex of 81 giant ants (MMI) has its lair in the roots also (68 workers, 12 warriors and a queen). The evil of the Hall has warped the ants such that they now have the ability to shift out of phase like phase spiders. Several warped warrior ants will have 5 hit dice and regeneration abilities like trolls. The Hall of Mists itself is part of a small temple complex. A great stone statue of a green slaad and two stone golems resembling bipedal dinosaurs guard the bubbling pool and glowing portals which form the gate between planes here (also see Grandfather in Green in Appendix D).

Great Worm Cavern

This unusual ancestor mound is entirely underground, deep within massive, multi-level caverns at the base of a mountain in The Spine of the World. It can be reached by a well-worn, well-guarded path from the surface. The largest cavern of the complex has a level floor and contains the ancestor mound. The altar mound is shaped like a spiralling winged snake, the great worm. Elrem, the great worm who is both clan totem and chief shaman to the tribe, sleeps at the center of the mound.

The cavern complex is large and unmapped. It is quite possible that other things live here, choosing not to disturb Elrem and his human followers.

GAME INFORMATION: Although he is not a red dragon, Elrem shares that ilk's love for treasure. Generations of Uthgardt have entrusted their funeral riches to Elrem's care, where it has remained unmolested for centuries. As a Great Wurm (extremely old dragonish creature), Elrem has 400% of a normal red dragon's treasure (H,S,T). In addition to Elrem, the ancestor mound is guarded by the normal champion spirits, and the Wyrmguard, 60 3d and 10 5th level barbarians, and 10 5th level shamans.

Morgur's Mound

The altar mound is shaped like a crude, long-necked, wingless dragon, the Uthgardt impression of a thunderbeast. The bones of some great beast are arranged on the mound in roughly their proper relationships, although the ribs are set upright and the neck vertebrae and skull have been threaded onto a pole to tower above the mounds.

"I haven't seen the bones, or the mound, but the 'thunderbeast' of Morgur's Mound is probably an apatosaurus, a beast from ancient history and not the unholy creature of the same name from the Abyss. It may also be that the 'Morgur' of the mound is Morgred Gardolfsson, a brother of Uther Gardolfsson, the Ruathym Northman who may be the legendary Uthgar. If so, then Mogur's Mound most likely holds the loot taken by Gardolfsson's raiders from fabled Illuskan."—Amelior GAME INFORMATION: During Runemeet, the combined power of the shamans can cause the bones to come together as an apatosaurus skeleton: AC 7; MV 6"; HD 15; #AT 1; Dmg 3-18; THAC0 8; SD Edged weapons do half damage, mental spells have no effect, holy water does 2-8 points of damage.

One Stone

Shadowed by deep forest, this abandoned ancestor mound served the now-dead or disappeared Golden Eagle and Red Pony tribes. Instead of an altar mound at the center of the cairn rings, there is a single massive, rounded boulder, easily 20 feet across and 12 feet high and covered with precisely engraved tracery. Carved steps ascend the south face to the altar on top.

"The legend of One Stone tells of a god who sealed a passageway from the Nine Hells with a single rock, thrust into the ground. One can only wonder if the evil that is supposedly sealed beneath the stone was able to reach out to whisk the missing tribes away. Some say the Golden Eagle and Red Pony tribes were destroyed by intertribal rivalry. Darker tales suggest that they disappeared beneath the ground, where they yet dwell today."—Amelior

Ravenrock

This is the alleged breeding site for the gigantic ravens that the Great Raven tribe uses for their "sacred banditry." The holy ground is situated along the Black Raven River, in a canyon near the river's source in the foothills of the Spine of the World.

The central altar is a large natural stone formation which bears a striking resemblance to a great black bird. The giant ravens are neither native to the North nor are they natural creatures. Using secret rituals, the tribal shamans transport normal raven eggs into another plane and return with gigantic ravens only moments later.

GAME INFORMATION: Gigantic ravens have the same game statistics as giant ravens (MMII), with the following exceptions— Hit Dice: 6+2; Damage: 3-12; Size: L (22' wingspread); Level/X.P. Value: IV/225+8/hp.

Shining White

The circular cairn rings of Shining White are separated by vales of purest white, where the barbarians have cut through the shallow turf to the chalk layer below. The menhirs and altar here are made of a bright white marble.

Stone Stand

A tall oak tree surmounts the altar mound here. The oak is a cutting taken long ago from the legendary Grandfather Tree. Both cairn rings here are surmounted by menhirs, spaced roughly 10 feet apart and capped by lintel pieces that link the stones together into two unbroken rings of capped columns.

The nearness of this holy area to Hellgate Keep would seem to make life difficult for the barbarians. Although this ancestor mound is holy to both the Blue Bear and Tree Ghost tribes, only the Blue Bear hold Runemeet here—undisturbed by the things in Hellgate.

GAME INFORMATION: Magic cast within the mound's inner vale (inside the inner cairn ring) is more potent. The effects of all spells are half again more potent. That is, a spell that would last six turns lasts nine. A spell that would heal 1d8 points of damage heals 1d8+1d4, and so on.

"8 Nightal. If I hadn't found it, I wouldn't have believed it (it wasn't here when I left for the High Forest). A wooden wardrobe in A. A.'s sleeping chambers bore the badge of Silvery-moon and was full of... um... women's clothing. I mean, we all have secrets, but... then I snooped a bit more and there he was... in the corner of what turned out to be Alustriel's boudoir looking just like I left him, though someone had cleaned off the pigeon droppings."—Erek

PERSONALITIES OF THE NORTH

"Now we're going to rewrite this chapter. Everything you've written about these fine people is scurrilous tavern talk.

"Imagine her accusing me of being a peeping Tom. Whose idea was that little wardrobe portal? I mean, really.

"We're starting it over, the chapter I mean. And when were done with it, we're rewriting the rest of the book, particularly those nasty little comments you've been jotting in the margins. You did WHAT!?! You've sent the rest to Elminster? EreK! EREK!!!"

The following "movers and shakers" of the North are NPC characters for the DM to use in encounters and are by no means a complete list of all the important or powerful folk of the Savage Frontier. They may become sources of information, allies, mentors and tutors, or even bitter enemies. For most entries, the pronunciation of the character's name is given, along with his or her usual home, and any ability scores of 16 or greater.

Amelior Amanitas (Ah-ME-lee-or ah-mah-NEE-Tass)

Secomber
17th level magic-user and sage
CG, None
Human male IN 17, CH 16

Amelior is an alchemist-at-large, which is a kind way of saying that he is not welcome in most places. Secomber is home and he always returns there. He is a tall man (6'), chunky, with brown but graying curly hair and beard, one eye, spectacles, and simple clothing.

Although he does not appear so, he is a powerful wizard, a learned sage whose major area of study is the Physical Universe (Chemistry & Physics) and whose minor field is the study of the Supernatural & Unusual (which gives him nightmares) and a master alchemist, noted more for his peculiarities than his prowess. He comes across as a bumbling, good-natured eccentric who has an unreasoning fear of evil.

Amelior surrounds himself with clutter, keeps a dozen brightly colored (red, green, fuschia...) cats, and is outrageously absent-minded. He attempts to cheat no one, even though he may forest hiring them. He rarely fights with magic, and then only in self-defense. He is always accompanied by his loyal assistant EreK, a sharp-tongued, irritable 4th level Northman fighter. Amelior goes unarmed, but carries a pair of metallic flasks, one gold, one copper. The gold contains a djinn (Hasan). The copper unleashes two fanatically loyal ogres who fight even beyond death.

Amelior constantly hires adventurers to perform tasks for him, often paying more than the task is worth. His current interest is the High Forest and legends of an enchanted wood within it (for more about Amelior, see DQ1, The Shattered Statue).

Arklem Greeth (AR-klemm GREETH-Like Teeth)

Luskan
18th level magic-user
LE, Azuth
Human male IN 17 CN 16

Arklem Greeth is a hateful, old man, bent over with age and infirmity who exudes a vile odor from his body (many believe he is preparing himself for lichdom). He is the master of the Hosttower of the Arcane, the wizards' guild in Luskan and its true ruling power, though he rarely leaves his chambers atop the Hosttower of the Arcane. High Captain Taerl secretly takes orders from Greeth, though he hates and fears the ancient wizard (the High Captains are under geas to prevent the Hosttower and its wizards from coming to harm). Greeth does not trust other mages (especially after the murder of his aide-de-camp, Morkai the Red). He is always guarded by four charmed warriors (6th level fighters) and many suspect that one or more abishai devils are bound into his service.

Bruenor (BROO-nor)

Wanders
8th level fighter
NG Moradin, Dumathoin
Dwarf male, ST 17, CN 17

Bruenor of Mithril Hall is about as openminded and compassionate as dwarfs come, yet he is a deadly fighter. Bruenor is also the only dwarf in Icewind Dale who still remembers Mithril Hall, a lost dwarfhold in the Spine of the World. He now seeks Mithril Hall to take it back from the evil things that possess it.

Cassius (CASS-ee-uss)

Bryn Shander
7th level fighter
LN, Tymora
Human male CH 16

Diminutive Cassius with his short iron-gray hair and bright blue eyes is the spokesman of Bryn Shander in the Ten-Towns of Icewind Dale and head of their ruling council. Though he rarely speaks of his past, most suspect that he was once a military commander for some petty kingdom in the Inner Sea—his ability with a sword and military leadership skills are legendary in the Ten Towns. He is a skilled diplomat, willing to use strong-arm tactics and has a reputation for getting what he wants, even at another's expense.

Dendybar The Mottled

Luskan
12th/4th level magic user/cleric
CE, Myrkul
Human male, INT 16

Dendybar, a frail-appearing mage, takes his nickname from the unusual patterns dyed into the fabrics of his customary robes. Dendybar is a former priest of Myrkul, who felt he could better serve his god as a mage. The hood that shadows Dendybar's features hides a face like a skin-covered skull, Myrkul's mark upon his most loyal servant. Dendybar is a wizard of the Hosttower of the Arcane, a mercantile guild and school of magic located in Luskan. Several years before, Dendybar, Eldeluc and several others arranged for the death of Morkai the Red in distant Icewind Dale, which allowed Dendybar and Eldeluc to move into key positions within the guild. Dendybar is jealous of Eldeluc's easy rise to power and deeply hates the fat, jovial mage. It will not be long before he eliminates Eldeluc and the archmage. Thereafter, the North is his to claim.

In addition to his magical spells, Dendybar the Mottled may animate 1d6 skeletons or 1d3 zombies each round of combat, so long as bodies are available.

Drizzt Do'Urden (DRIHZ-IT doe-URR-dun)

Wanders
10th level ranger
CG, Gwaeron Windstrom
Drow male

Drizzt is a drow outcast of House Daermon N'a'shezbaernon who can never return to his subterranean homeland of Menzoberranzan again. As a youth, Drizzt discovered that he was different from other drow, that he cared about others and eventually fled, taking with him a life-long ally, a figurine of wondrous power: a small onyx panther from which he can call forth Guenhwyvar, a powerful panther spirit. To gain her, Drizzt had to kill her former owner, an extremely cruel drow noble. Guenhwyvar is more than just a magical item, she is Drizzt's friend.

Drizzt's appearance is typical for a drow, dark skin, pale eyes, pure white hair. He commonly wears a dark brown, hooded cloak to protect himself against the sun. Drizzt fights with two scimitars. One is a normal blade, but the other is magical, a frost brand +3, +6 vs. fire using/dwelling creatures, gained from the hoard of a white dragon.

Drizzt currently travels with the Fellowship of the Hall adventurers' band.

Eldeluc (EL-de-Luke)

Luskan
11th level magic-user
LE, Bane
Human male ST 17

Big, burly, Eldeluc's amiable exterior disguises a soul thoroughly tainted with evil. Along with Dendybar the Mottled, he is an heir apparent to the position of archmage within the Hosttower of the Arcane in Luskan. Though they worked together to eliminate their rival Morkai the Red years ago on an excursion to the Ten Towns, they are at odds with each other in the guild, and Eldeluc hates Dendybar with seething passion. It will not be long before he eliminates Dendybar. Eldeluc's connection with the god Bane has brought him into contact with the Zhentarim of Zhentil Keep.

Elrem The Wise (ELL-remm)

Great Worm Caverns
20th level shaman
CG, Great Worm beast cult
Male great worm

Elrem is a great worm, possibly the only great worm in existence. Imagine a gigantic, metallic green, bat-winged snake with the head of a red dragon and you will have a picture of Elrem. Once human, he acquired this shape through devotion to his deity or as others suggest, he is becoming the deity through the devotions of his followers. Elrem travels the planes, both physically and astrally, searching for knowledge. He is quite friendly, has a wry sense of humor and loves to hear and tell stories—when he is awake, which is not often. In addition to his considerable magical abilities, Elrem wields great psionic powers, including animal telepathy, clairvoyance, empathy, precognition, astral projection, and dimension walk.

Jhingleshod (JING-gul-shahd)

High Forest (Dire Wood near Karse)
10th level fighter
NG, Torm
Once-human male, ST 18(00), DEX 17, CN 18

Jhingleshod, known as the “Iron Axeman” (he once had another name but can no longer remember it) appears to be a man covered from head to toe in exotic plate armor. He lightly wields a mighty axe that most men could not lift. Upon closer inspection, he appears to be a cross between a living being and an animated suit of armor, his skin formed of lightly rusted overlapping plates of iron. Over the armor, he wears a tunic and cloak of forest green. Jhingleshod seeks to destroy his former master, Wulgreth, a once-living wizard who dwells in the heart of the Dire Wood, a mystical forest within a forest. Jhingleshod’s own life is tied to Wulgreth’s—he cannot die until Wulgreth is destroyed. He is a powerful fighter, but often thinks with his reflexes. Jhingleshod’s skin can only be struck by +2 or better magical weapons or by monsters of 6+2 or more hit dice.

Laeral (LAY-er-al)

The Stronghold of the Nine
24th level magic-user
LE, None (formerly: CG Mystra)
Human female, IN 18, DEX 16

Once the leader of the adventuring band known as the Nine, and known for the wondrous magical items that she crafted, she is now the leader of a major faction within their stronghold. Before the discovery of the Crown of Horns in the ruins of Yulash, she devotedly followed Mystra. Now, her mind warped by the crown, she works for no god (though evil forces often profit by her actions).

Those who remember the Laeral of old would be shocked to see her now. Mad eyes peer through unshorn locks turned snow white by rapid aging. Her musical voice is a gruesome cackle and her once-immaculate robes little more than rags. Visitors to The Stronghold of the Nine are treated like intruders by Laeral and her ex-comrades.

Malchor Harpell (MAL-core HAR-pell)

Longsaddle (Tower of Twilight)
18th level magic-user
NG Mystra, Deneir
Human male, IN 18

This former long-time adventurer dwells in the Tower of Twilight east of Neverwinter Wood, from which he rarely travels. He was a student of Khelben “Blackstaff” Arunsun and now trains other mages himself, but still spends most of his time researching the creation of magical items, potions and elixirs. He has mastered the arts of making stone guardians, staves of the magic, wands of magic missiles, rings of feather falling, and rings of warmth. He usually carries these items on his person when traveling along with a lurker cloak and a ring of protection +3. Mal-chor dislikes interruptions (which often means that magical training takes twice as long as it should), but richly rewards good students, loyal friends, and faithful followers with praise, shelter, gifts and even magic.

Pureheartman

Wanders with Great Raven Tribe/
Luskan
11th level magic-user/7th level barbarian shaman
CG, Mystra/Great Raven beast totem
Human male IN 17 WIS 18

Tall, slender, and of noble bearing, he dresses in a cape of black feathers. He is secretly a member of the Hosttower of the Arcane in Luskan and opposes most wrongful plots devised by the likes of Dendybar and Eldeluc.

Radoc (The One, Doc of New Emyrea)

Star Mounts, High Forest
20/25th level cleric/magic-user
LE, Tangg (an other-planar power)
Human male IN 18, WIS 18, CHA 17

Doc, also known as “The One,” has been exiled here from another Prime Plane. He now calls himself Radoc, and dwells in the Star Mounts in the depths of the High Forest. He is purchasing mithril from the orcs in the Spine of the World. His goal is to return to New Emyrea as its master. He bears a glowing mark (placed by the titan Sylla) that can be seen, regardless of any magic, disguise or makeup used to cover it. He possesses bracers of defense AC2, a cloak of protection +5, a ring of protection +2, a ring of fire resistance, and a double-duty mace +4/wand of lightning bolts (10 charges). For further details see module I12, The Egg of the Phoenix.

Regis (REE-jiss)

Wanders
5th level thief, scrimshaw carver
NG, None
Halfling male

Formerly a guild thief in Calimshan, like others in the Ten Towns, Regis came north to escape his past. Short for even a halfling (his claim to three feet tall includes his curly brown hair), "Rumblebelly" makes up for his short height with ample girth brought on by years of "retirement." He carries a gem of suggestion, an enchanted ruby which allows Regis to cast suggestion on others. While he now wanders with the Fellowship of the Hall, his idea of adventure is forgetting to take enough worms on a fishing trip.

Tanta Hagara

Wanders with Blue Bear Tribe
CE
Annis

Most clever Tanta Hagara is typical of her evil race, 8 feet tall, muscular and wiry with deep blue skin, glossy black hair, teeth, and nails and dull greenish-yellow eyes. She dresses in heavy, cowled robes that cover all her skin to avoid frightening her barbaric followers. She uses her change self ability when she must appear before her followers, taking on the form of either a stunningly beautiful, barbaric hunter goddess (with sky-blue skin) or a blue-furred bear. Her followers in the Blue Bear Uthgardt tribe know she is evil, but believe her to be an avatar of their demonic bear spirit.

She is usually not found with her adopted tribe and stalks the wild, either in search of prey (she demands human sacrifice from her depraved followers, but never eats them publicly), or to meet with the demon Grintharke in Hellgate Keep.

Tanta Hagara's goal is to find the Uthgardt ancestor mound Grandfather Tree and make use of the gates in the creator race shrine deep below it.

Tianna Skyflower

High Forest (Dire Wood)
8th level thief/magic-user
CE, Malar
Elf female, IN 15, DEX 18, CN 16

Tianna is of mixed elven, drow and human bloodlines. She is dusky-skinned and dark-haired with the crown a blaze of purest white through the crown. She is able to disguise her distinctive appearance by using a magical item called the ring of five visages, which produces an illusion of another appearance. Her followers are dusky half-drows, drow-human half breeds.

Wulfgar (WULF-gahr)

Wanders
6th level barbarian
CG, Tempos (Tempus)
Human male, IN 17, ST 18(85), CN 17

Wulfgar survived the barbarian assault on the Ten Towns only due to the intervention of Bruenor, ruler of the Kelvin's Cairn dwarfhold. In return for his life, young Wulfgar spent five years in servitude to Bruenor, during which he learned that there was more to life than strength and savagery, that a sharp mind could be more deadly than a sharp axe.

Upon his release, Wulfgar received Aegis-fang, a magical mithril warhammer crafted by Bruenor. When thrown, it unerringly returns to Wulfgar's hand.

After training under Drizzt Do'Urden, Wulfgar slew the white dragon Icingdeath and returned to his tribe. He slew king Heafstaag, and led the barbarians to the rescue of the Ten Towns. Now he has joined with Bruenor, Drizzt, and Regis as they search for lost Mithril Hall.

Wulgreth (WOOL-grith)

Karse/Nine Hells
26th level lich
LE, Bane
Once-human male IN 18

Wulgreth was the wizard who first summoned the devils into Ascalhorn. He fled when the demons were brought in to drive off the devils and later came to Karse in the High Forest, where once again he was responsible for bringing great evil into the world in the form of the Dire Wood. While trying to tap the immortal power of the demigod Karsus, Wulgreth was slain by his servant Jhingleshod, but lives on in a lich-like form. Wulgreth dwells in a black pyramid within the ruins of Karse, surrounded by undead and devilish servitors. He seeks to return to living immortality by slaying immortal Karsus.

Zokan Thunderer

Wanders with Elk Tribe
9th level barbarian
CE, Auril, Talos
Human male ST 18(23) DEX 17

This surly Uthgardt barbarian chieftain is possibly the ugliest, rudest, richest, wildest, most feared, and most hated bandit leader in the north. His barbarians raid caravans and villages incessantly, taking prisoners for ransom, but selling them to traders from the south if the ransom is too small (keeping the ransom money, of course). He has a price on his head, but is difficult to find and even harder to kill—he is always guarded by 10 5th level warriors and a 6th level shaman.

For background on Alustriel, Khelben Arunsun, and Piergeiron, see their entries in the Campaign Set.

Appendix A: Magical Items

DELZOUN'S FIST

This minor artifact, a magical warhammer +5, dwarven thrower was created by Delzoun, the legendary founder of the ancient dwarven Northkingdom that bore his name. He bore it until his sudden and horrible death (upon which he is rumored to have immediately risen as an undead thing). The throwing power works for any fighter (not just dwarves) and it imbues the wearer with hill giant strength (as girdle of giant strength) and acted as a ring of spell turning. The Fist also has one major and two minor malevolent effects which the DM should choose from the tables on pp. 162-3 of the Dungeoneers Masters Guide. The minor malevolent effects occur within 1d3 weeks of owning the item. The major malevolent effect occurs the first time the hammer is used against a non-evil being.

THE NETHER SCROLLS

These magical scrolls were created by mages of the creator races. Later, they became the magical foundation of ancient Netheril, but disappeared long before Netheril fell. The entire collection is said to number 100 scrolls, inscribed in exotic runes upon sheets of purest gold. Their true contents are unknown, but many are suspected to contain exotic spells more powerful than any known today, requiring components that no longer exist. The scrolls are an opportunity to introduce exotic new spells into the DM's campaign.

THE TOME OF TWELVE SEALS

This thick book with its cover made of red dragon underbelly hide contains twelve pages of thick, black leather. Each page contains a single rune-inscribed metal disk, like a seal of some kind. Seven of the seals are gold and shiny, five are made of dull, charred, and tarnished lead.

The runes on the seals are command words that activate the magic of the seal. When activated, the scroll summons a magical entity which the wielder may command for 3d6 Turns. Each of the seven (gold) remaining seals summons a different being (the proper element need not be available for elemental beings). Page one: 16 HD air elemental; page two: 8 HD fire elemental; page four: 12 HD earth elemental; page five: dragon horse; page eight: gibbering moulder; page nine: jann; page ten: marid.

Activating a seal causes it to become lead in a blinding flash.

Appendix B: Northern Proficiencies

Plant Lore. Rangers, druids, and Uthgardt barbarians in the North quickly learn its Plant Lore. A number of plants in Savage Frontier can cure diseases, mend wounds, or even protect against foes. The Wilderness Survival Guide provides detailed rules for this proficiency and the finding of medicinal plants. The table that follows lists useful herbs found in the North. Herbs lose their potency quickly. Unless properly preserved, one point of potency will be lost each successive day after they are gathered.

Pharmacy. This skill, often learned by rangers, magic users, shamans and alchemists, allows the character to preserve medicinal herbs and to be able to make medicines (not potions) from fresh or preserved herbs which allow others not skilled in Pharmacy or Plant Lore to use the healing or curative effects of medicinal plants.

Alchemists in the larger towns (such as Amelior Amanitas of Secomber), will be well versed in the craft. They can work wonders with combinations of sorcery and craftsmanship.

Medicinal Plants of the Savage Frontier

d10 roll	Plant Name	Appearance	Effective as	Method of Application
1-2	Beorunna's cure-all	stems	special, see below *	Boiled in tea
3	Feverbalm	flowers	Cure insanity temporarily (1d10 hours)	Boiled in tea
4	Ghostroot	pasty root	Repels undead as a 6th level cleric for 1d3 turns	Eaten raw
5	Mother'sleaf	leaves	Cure disease (30% chance against any disease)	Boiled in tea
6	Spellshield	berries	Gives imbiber a +1 saving throw against spells	Eaten raw
7-8	Trueroot	red roots	Poison antidote (40% chance against any poison)	Eaten cooked
9-10	Woundwort	small plant	Cures wounds of 1d4 points of damage	Poultice

* Beorunna's cure-all: This plant is a general restorative. It gives a +10 bonus for curing all diseases, or +2 bonus for healing hit points. It can be used in addition to any of the other curative herbs or spells, supplementing the effects of those herbs or magic. However, it is only a supplement. On its own, it cannot cure anyone.

Appendix C: RECENT NEWS AND RUMORS IN THE NORTH

Year of Shadows

Dale Reckoning 1358

Hammer (January)

- The Town of Secomber celebrated the return of the sage Amelior Amanitas and his entourage of colorful cats. Amelior had been away for some time on a journey and returned in spectacular fashion in his flying gasbag.
- This winter is the coldest and snowiest in memory. The weather has taken its toll on the folk of the North. Frost giants have been seen stalking the land as far south as Longsaddle.

Alturiak (February)

- Forced south by the unusually harsh winter, trolls have besieged the walls of Yartar for three weeks without letup. Blizzards keep relief forces away.

Ches (March)

- Adanac Harpell, leader of the village of Longsaddle, has reported by carrier pigeon to Waterdeep that a flight of griffons slaughtered the inhabitants of two farms north of the village. Apparently the griffons have also been attacking travelers. No one in Longsaddle seems able to hunt them down. The location of their lair is unknown, but witnesses claim they come from Neverwinter Wood.
- Seal hunters from Icewolf on The Ice Peak report being driven away from the hunt by handsome warriors dressed like Ice Hunters. Several hunting parties have not returned from the ice. The Ice Hunter folk refuse to join in the hunt this year. If the attacks keep up the seal harvest, particularly of young seals, will be ruined. Suljack, a Luskan High Captain, has threatened harm to hunting parties who do not bring back their agreed-to quotas of seal-skin.

Tarsakh (April)

- Highlord Nanathalor Greysword of Loudwater reports finding the bodies of evil creatures near outer farm holdings, including two drow, and a fish-like humanoid. All bore bite marks. Before each discovery, residents heard an eerie howling. Investigation of caves along the Delimbiyr valley has uncovered evidence of recent activity, but no obvious access to deeper realms.
- The annual spring offensive from Hellgate Keep has yet to materialize in Turnstone Pass. The fey forces of the ghoulish hold have yet to stage even a single sortie. Military leaders in Sundabar are concerned over the quiet.

Mirtul (May)

- News of the sack of the Ten Towns, a trading and fishing outpost located far to the North in Icewind Dale has just reached Waterdeep. Apparently a mad wizard, late of Luskan, attempted to conquer the folk of Icewind Dale last year. As the tale is told, the towns were saved from complete destruction by a dwarf, a halfling, a barbarian horde and... a drow! Although the tale is a good one, few believe it.

Kythorn (June)

- Lord Piergeiron of Waterdeep announced the end of the Ruathym/Luskan war. Apparently the lords of both lands took Lord Piergeiron's threat seriously. Piergeiron stated that Waterdeep would enter the conflict against whomever did not attend truce talks in Waterdeep. Aumark Lithyl, First Axe of Ruathym and the High Captains of Luskan have agreed to cease all hostilities. Luskan must provide Ruathym with six warships and pay were-gild to the several families. Ruathym in turn must open its harbor to all vessels seeking safety or trade.

- A patrol from Leilon secretly followed a band of lizardmen from the Mere of Dead Men as far as the Dessarin. The lizardmen easily crossed the river and continued east. At least 20 were counted, including a shaman.

Flamerule (July)

- Piracy along the Sword Coast has increased drastically. Fierce raiders in low raker warships prey on merchants between Waterdeep and the Moonshaes. Rumors abound that the truce between Luskan and Ruathym forged an alliance.
- An enterprising new group in Waterdeep, the Sea Fist Company, has purchased several old warships from Waterdeep and Neverwinter. The ships, renamed Shining Sword, Protector and Golden Paladin provide escort protection to merchant fleets along the coast. After a shaky start, the group is hiring more marines and has laid the keels on two new ships.

Eleasias (August)

- According to the Harpers, every one of the known Uthgardt ancestor mounds was breached earlier in the summer. All evidence points to lizardmen. Alien looking totems were left at each mound.
- Rumors of a powerful healer living in the High Wood have been heard in Loudwater. An old man calling himself Radoc saved victims of an orc raid and brought them to town. Many noted the glowing symbol on his forehead. He refused questions, but paid for a large purchase of supplies with sparkling, clear crystals, then disappeared.
- Twenty long ships put ashore at Leilon, putting farms to the torch, carrying off livestock, and sinking eight of the twelve ore barges. The Lances of Leilon eventually drove them off, inflicting heavy casualties, but not before close to 200 townfolk had been put to the sword and three months' worth of the town's ore output lay at the bottom of the ocean. None of the long ships flew colors. Interrogation of the dead drew many answers: the Whalebones, Luskan, Ruathym, even the Moonshaes.

Eleint (September)

- Nesmé is under attack by a barbarian horde from the Griffon tribe. A company of Waterdhavian soldiers has been sent, but they may not reach Nesmé in time to make a difference.
- Lord Piergeiron recalled his ambassadors from Luskan and Ruathym and demanded reparations for the attack on Leilon from the High Captains of Luskan.
- The Sea Fist Company of Waterdeep has posted a bounty for news of the whereabouts of their ship Protector, which disappeared on escort mission to The Purple Isles. Also missing is the merchant galleon Gallant Prince of Neverwinter. The two were separated from a convoy during rough weather.

Marpenoth (October)

- Rumors abound that during the Uthgardt barbarians' Runemeet last month, all the tribal holy grounds were connected for a brief instant by high arcs of light that spanned the intervening miles. Since then, the tribes have been slowly migrating south.
- It seems that the leaders of Luskan, Ruathym, Tuern, and the Whalebones have forged a war alliance with High Captain Taerl of Luskan as the acknowledged War Lord. Though no goals have been stated, it is assumed that with the coming of spring, attacks similar to the one on Leilon will commence along the Sword Coast.
- Orc raids have increased five-fold north of the Dessarin and the High

Forest. Survivors describe unusually large bands of orcs who attacked with uncommon, almost desperate ferocity. Several of the tribal sigils, including a one-eyed spider, a three-fingered claw, and a blood-dripping tree are unfamiliar to scholars of orc lore. The more pessimistic sages believe the time is nigh for another orc invasion.

Uktar (November)

- Though the last winter was the most severe in recent memory, the coming winter is already worse. Harbors north of Leilon are already iced-in and snow lays heavy on the land, several feet thick in areas which normally get but a few inches. Sundabar and Silverymoon have fended off attacks by frost giant bands, winter wolves, and huge packs of devil dogs.
- Nesmé is now in the hands of Kralgar Bonesnapper, a powerful chieftain, and Tessarin "Longresses" Alaraun, wizardess of Nesmé. Apparently the city surrendered, rather than face a long siege. The priesthood of Waukeen has been spared, but High Priestess Jygil Zelnathra is in exile.
- A Zhentarim caravan that stopped in Llorck for supplies before heading south met with disaster there. Something, it is not known what, escaped from a locked wagon, overturned three other wagons, destroyed an inn and three other buildings before fleeing into the hills. By the time the Lord's men arrived the "contents" of the upset wagons had begun to wander the streets. Before the night was done 30 monster zombies, undead ogres, bugbears and minotaurs had been destroyed and 10 warriors and townspeople lay dead. The caravan masters disappeared into the night. The confused townfolk described the escaped creature as huge, dark and man-like with fierce beetle-like mandibles—possibly an umber hulk.

- A crate was delivered to Lord Piergeiron via merchant ship from Luskan contained accompanied by a formal letter bearing the seal of the High Captains of Luskan. The contents of the letter are unknown but rumor has it that the box contained a bag of 15 gold pieces and six gibbering apes dressed in once-fine robes—the official regalia of Waterdhavian ambassadors.

Nightal (December)

- An attempt against the life of Lord Piergeiron of Waterdeep ended abruptly when the assassin's knife flew from her hand to transform into a stirge, which repeatedly struck her until she died from blood loss. Attempts to force the corpse to speak met with failure. The identity of the young woman's employers remains a mystery, though both the Zhentil Keep and Calimshan are suspects.
- The Protector, a missing ship that belonged to the Sea Fist Company was found frost-rimed and adrift north of Gundarlun. The ship's crew was missing as were most things of value. The frozen corpses of three sea elves were found trussed-up in salt-pork barrels, each corpse branded with a squid emblem.
- As the year draws to a close, the Feast of the Moon in Waterdeep is more subdued than usual as the people await news the Lords' plan to deal with the alliance of Northmen kingdoms. Many are concerned about mercenary bands that fill the city, anticipating the war that is certain to come with the spring thaw.

Appendix D: ADVENTURES IN THE SAVAGE FRONTIER

Although the place descriptions of the North are liberally seeded with hints and suggestions for adventures, a few are presented here in the form of plot outlines so that each DM can adjust events and NPCs to challenge PCs of all levels (and so that players who peek into these pages cannot learn explicit details). A good DM will modify the events (such as changing names or villains), add plot complications and blend these stories into his or her own campaign.

1. Grandfather in Green

Looking dreadfully out of place in the city, a gnarled old man in green, barbaric clothes makes a nightly appearance at a local tavern. He approaches each group of likely heroes and tells them a strange story.

"Beneath Grandfather Tree in the High Forest lies an ancient shrine with doors that lay open onto evil worlds. Close those doors for me and the ancient treasures that surround them are yours to keep."

Although the old man will not say so, he is the Tree Ghost of a small section of the High Forest, a guardian spirit worshipped by the Tree Ghost tribe of the Uthgardt barbarians. If the PCs accept his quest, he gives them a wish-bone-shaped branch from the ancient tree. If used like a divining rod, this branch always points directly towards Grandfather Tree.

The Grandfather Tree map on page 64 shows the general layout of the giant ant tunnels, the location of the Hall of Mists (temple), and an enlarged view of the temple shrine itself. The entrance to the warren is up in the crotch of the tree trunk. The gates from the shrine lead to the Abyss and the Negative Material Plane. The lizard-like golems will leave the Hall of Mists stalk foes throughout the temple, but not in the ant tunnels. The giant ants here have been magically warped (see Grandfather Tree description in chapter 9). The treasure of the shrine includes much gold and platinum in the form of statuary, religious ornaments and decoration (no coins) and several odd magical items of a clerical nature (the DM may wish to use standard magical items from the DMG, but give them a unique, possibly confusing form: such as a staff of curing in the form of a hideous reptilian statue or a book of vile darkness in the form of a crystal ball which projects its contents into the mind of the reader). This is one place to put a few pages of the Nether Scrolls. At least one item should be sacred to the Tree Ghost tribe. They will unerringly seek out the PCs and ask for the item back. Another item (possibly the crystal ball book) is craved by Tanta Hagara, who will stop at nothing to get her hands on it. If she does, she takes it directly to Hellgate Keep and Grintharke. Whatever deities the PCs may worship (good or evil) will charge the PCs to recover and or destroy the item (the deities will not make personal appearances, only speak through high-ranking clerics).

2. The Hunt is On!

The freshly-painted sign in the alchemist's shop says "Hunters needed, inquire within." The dark, crowded, storefront reeks of spices, preservatives and the distinctive (and particularly odious) aroma of a popular, oily hair pomade. The source of that aroma makes its presence unpleasantly known as one of the PCs touches something in the shop (how could anyone know it would crumble into dust?)

Shayk Alhambrezzo (the oily-haired proprietor who just watched a 50 gp antique crumble into powder) needs hunters: unicorn hunters (this is bound to irritate Mielikki worshippers). Alhambrezzo needs as many as the characters can get for him, hooves and hide too. He will pay 1,000 gp for each horn, 200 for the hide and 50 for a set of four hooves.

The only known source of unicorns in the North is the southern High Forest, along The Unicorn Run.

Whether or not the PCs spot any unicorns is up to the DM. However, this is an excellent opportunity to lead the party on a merry chase through the High Forest, discover the location of an elven tomb or intrude upon the very private war occurring in the Stronghold of the Nine.

3. To Hellgate and Back Again

Why is Hellgate Keep so quiet? What are the demons planning? Lord Helm, Master of Sundabar, asks the PCs to infiltrate the ghoulish hold and find out answers to these questions. The reward is high, but the danger higher. Magical and physical disguises will be provided to the PCs' specifications. Grintharke may be negotiating his return to the Abyss or extending his power deep beneath the earth. This adventure could easily take the adventurers down into the Deepearth or across several of the outer planes.

4. For The Greater Glory

Whether Waterdeep declares war on Luskan and the Captains' Confederation or not, mercenary bands from around the North and all along the Sword Coast will seek employment with either side in the conflict. The PCs are approached to join one of these companies.

The fame of their band precedes them as they travel west. The DM may wish to have each town or village offer them short-term employment. An orc bandit gang is raiding one, a payment of gold or goods to another town requires guarding, something has been carrying off villagers at night (tearing houses and barns into firewood in the process). The company eventually ends up in the employ of Neverwinter (which assigns the mercenaries to guard Port Llast). Luskan will make several attempts to conquer Port Llast with large scale sea and land assaults, backed up by mages from the Hosttower.

5. The Discontent of Our Winter

A bitterly cold winter brings up tavern talk of the frost wizards, rare frost giant witch doctors of unusual power. Legends say the frost wizards use only magics relating to cold and ride on huge white dragons. This seems a laughable myth until the warmth of the tavern is shattered as a snowball literally forms and explodes within the tavern as screams outside break the winter stillness. There is confusion and carnage everywhere as tall white-skinned giants carry off food, valuables, livestock, and villagers, while overhead a huge white form flaps slowly northward carrying a giant robed form on its back. If the characters have any friends here, they are among the missing, as are at least 75% of their own valuables, including their mounts.

GAME INFORMATION: The general guidelines for frost wizards are that they can use all cold-related clerical and magic-user spells and have cold and frost variants of all fire-based spells, such as snowball for fireball, freezing hands for burning hands, and so on.

6. Red Book, Gold Seals

A village elder approaches the PCs and hires them as guards for an estate auction of a local recluse who died and left a collection of unusual, exotic and eccentric items, including books, stuffed monsters (say, isn't that an owlbear?), and many jars with unidentifiable contents. She was, of course, a wizard living here incognito.

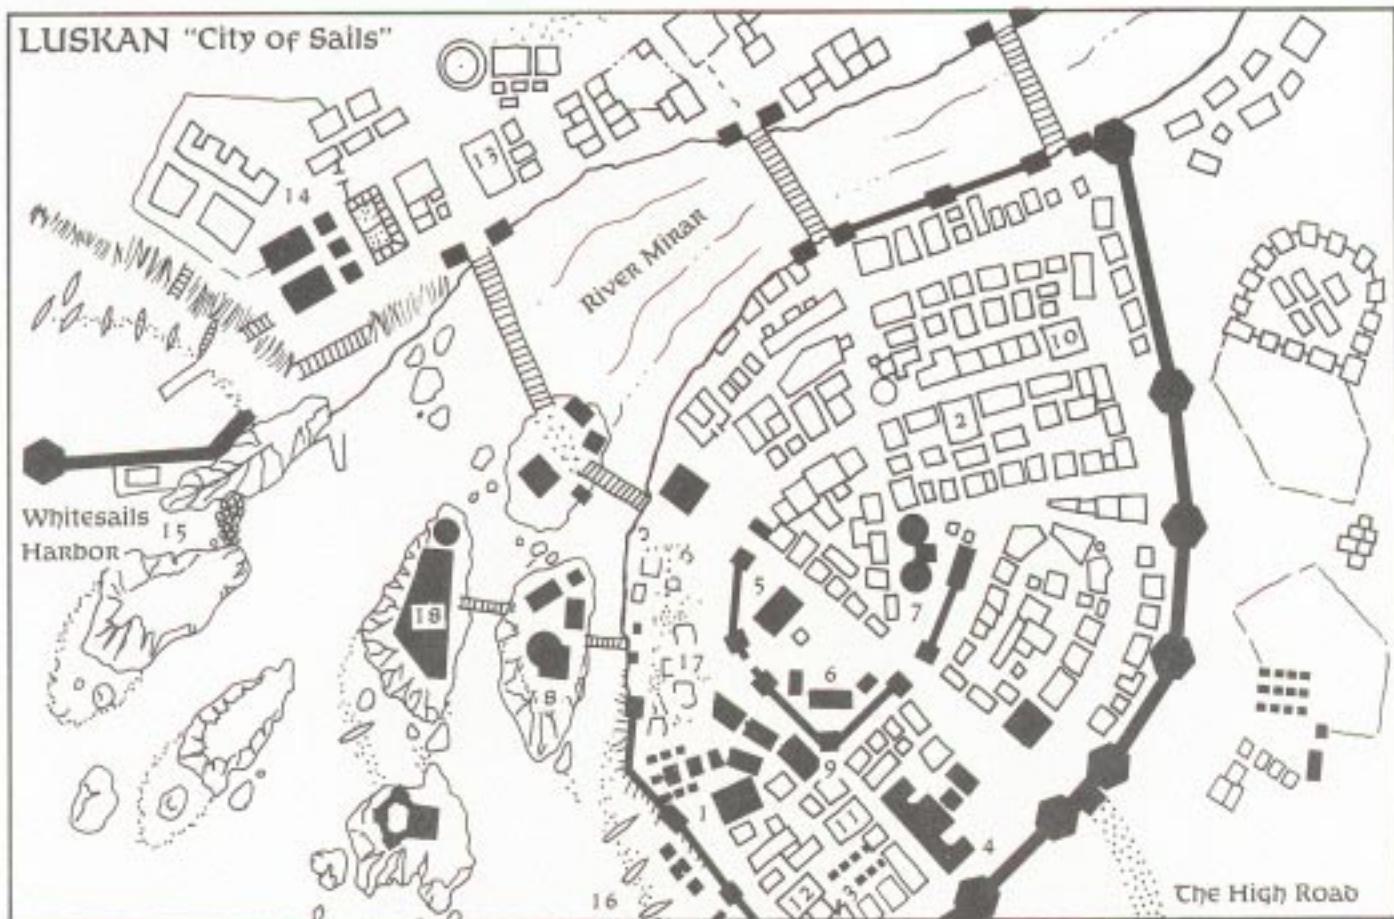

The need for guards is apparent. The auction barn where everything is kept has been burned, and battered, yet something (protective magics?) has kept them out—so far.

No spell books are to be seen, but one book, bound in scaly red leather, contains only twelve pages, each with a single rune-carved metal seal: seven gold, five lead. During the auction, someone attempts to steal it. The thief grabs it and before anyone can react, activates one of the seals on the Tome of Twelve Seals (see Appendix B). His accomplices, who include an illusionist, cause confusion. If the thieves escape, they flee to the headquarters of the Kraken Society in Yartar with the Tome. The village elder, realizing the book's value, wants it back and that is the responsibility of his guards!

Finally, where did the old wizard hide her spellbooks?

LUSKAN "City of Sails"

UTHGARDT ANCESTOR MOUNDS

160 ft.

- ⊙ Menhir
- Totem pole
- ▨ Mound

Menhir

Altar Stone

- A. Outer Cairn Ring
- B. Outer Vale
- C. INNER Cairn Ring
- D. INNER Vale
- E. Altar Mound

A B C D E

Grandfather Tree

KEY

Cliff

Ruin

Sand dune

Bridge

Mound

Trail

Invisible Bridge

Woods

Fields

Tree

Ancestor Mound

Buildings

Fortress wall & tower

1 Inch = 200 feet

FORGOTTEN REALMS

COMPANION SET

Scale: 1 INCH = 20 MILES

	MOUNTAINS (high)		FOREST (heavy)		FALLS LINE
	MOUNTAINS (medium)		FOREST (medium)		CLIFFS
	MOUNTAINS (low)		FOREST (light)		SNOW
	FOOTHILLS		CONIFEROUS FOREST (heavy)		GLACIER
	ROLLING HILLS		CONIFEROUS FOREST (medium)		CITY
	BARREN		CONIFEROUS FOREST (light)		CASTLE / KEEP
	VOLCANO		JUNGLE (heavy)		TOWN
	DESERT (sand)		JUNGLE (medium)		RUINS
	DESERT (rock)		SEA		COMMUNITY
	PLAINS / GRASSLAND		LAKE		ROADS
	CLEAR		RIVER		TRAILS
	SWAMP		DELTA		BRIDGE
	MARSH		REACH		ANCESTOR MOUNDS

FORGOTTEN REALMS is a trademark owned by TSR, Inc.

Ruins of

Ulf of Thuger

The Trackless Sea

Ascarie
The Sunken City

The Purple Rocks

 Vilkstead

B

The Ice Peak

Aur

Sea

GUNDARLUN

BERRANZO

The Wreck of the Golden Crown

GUNDBARG

IRONMASTER

The Coto Run

Fireshear

The Ice Flow

Aurilissbarq

Luskan

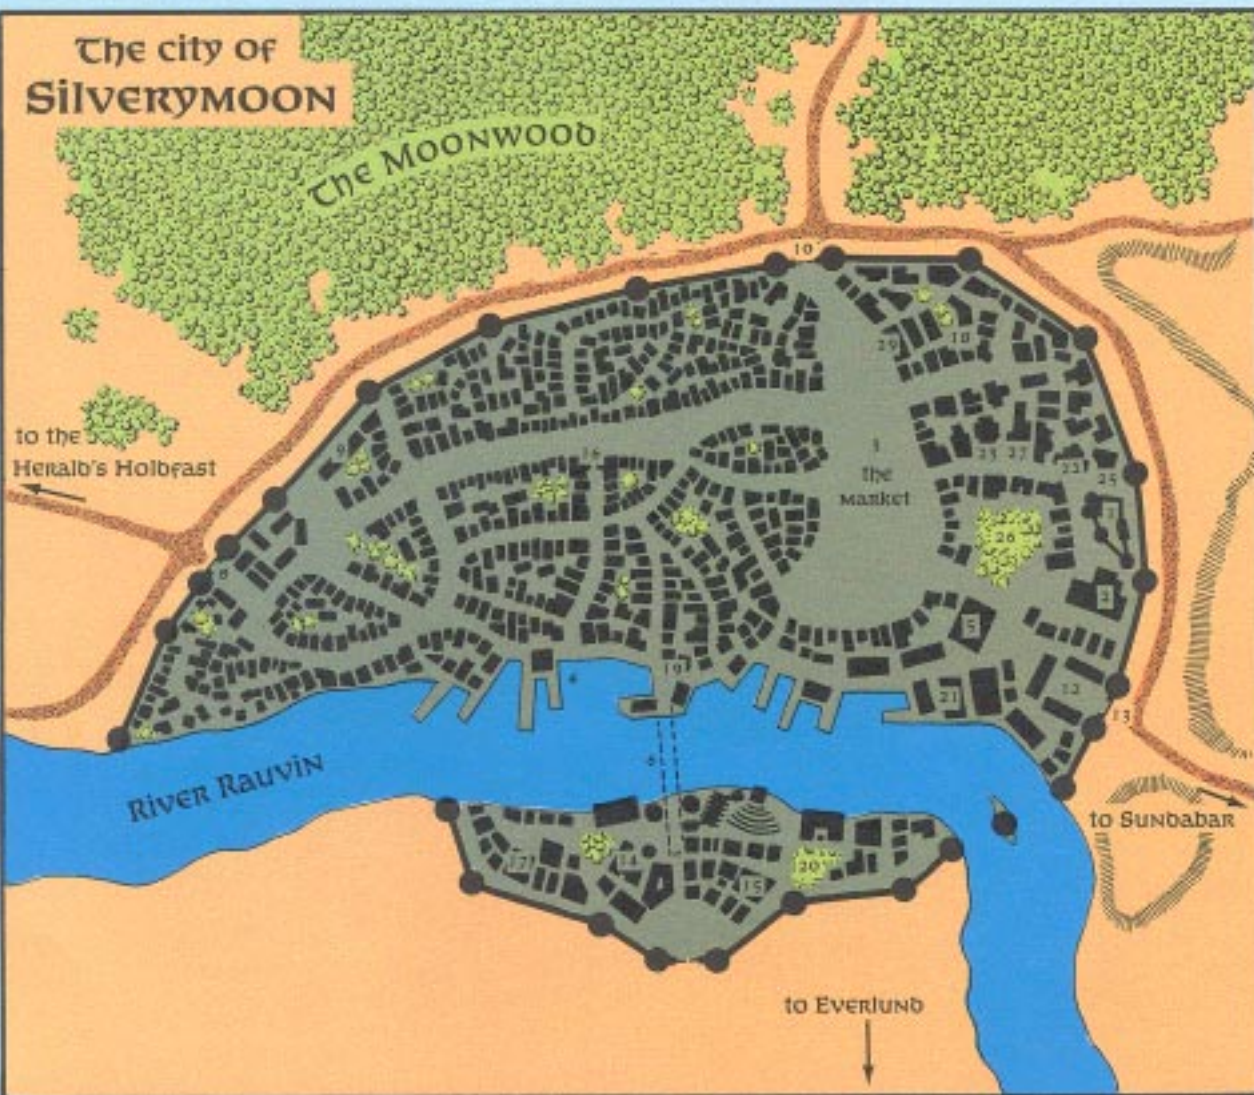

BEORUNNA'S Well

1 inch = 480 feet

The city of SILVERMOON

The MOONWOOD

Icewin

Icewind Dale and the Ten Towns

Sea of Moving Ice

IRONMASTER

BRYN SHAMBER

Icewind Dale

Reghed Glacier

Ruathym

To the Moonshaes

ruathym

shaes

Rethgaard

Inthar

Ruathym

Holgerstead

The Whale BONES

The Spine of the World

Mines of Mirabar

Raven Rock

Valley of Khebrun

Black Raven River

Mirabar

The Ice Lakes

Blackford

River Mirabar

The Craggs

LURKWOOD

GRUNWALD

MORGUR'S MOUND

The Tower of Twilight

LONGSADDLE

Port Llast

NEVERWINTER WOOD

Neverwinter River

BERUN'S HILL

The Long Road

Neverwinter

The High Road

Trib

Great Worm Cavern

Gate

The Fell Pass

Castle of Illusion

The Dungeon of Death

The Dungeon of the Ruins

The Herald's Holdfast

Shining White

River Rauvin

Riffon's Nest

Goblinhoe River

River Surbrin

Nesmé

The Evermoors
(The Trollmoors)

The Laughingflow

Flint Rock

oar

Deab Horse Ford

River Desann

Yantar

The Los

The Lonely Tower

Beorunna's Well

Coldwood

Culrun's Tent

Moonwood

One Stone

Citabel of Many Arrows

Redrun

Dead One Pass

Silvermoon

Sundabar

Everlund

Stone Stand

The Citabel of Mists

Hellgate Keep

The Woods of Curlang

The Lost Peaks

Tall Trees

The Nameless Dungeon

Old Road

The High

Ice Mountains

Citadel Adbar

The Fork

Ascore

Nether Mountains

MORUEME'S CAVE

The Far Forests

Lellon

The Mere
of Dead Men

Ruins of Iniarv's Tower

Southkrypt

Kryptgarden Forest

Westbr

The Stone

Reb Larch

Westwood

Bargewright Inn

Rebcliffs & the Red Rocks

Village of Amphail

Go (te

Mount
Sar

Sancrag

The St

Mount Hellmbrar

Hamlet of Rassalantar

Malben's
Comb Tor

Waterdeep

The Rat Hills

Zunobridge

Ardeeforest

The Serpin

The Star Mounts

The Hall of Four Ghosts

The Halls of the Hunting Axe

Endless Caverns

Stronghold of the Nine

River Despair

Ironford

Quaintan's Creek

Goldenfields (temple-farm)

Stump Bog

The Crumbling Stair

The House of Stone

The Fallen Kingdom

Secomber

The Laughing Hollow

High Forest

■ Karse

The Dire Wood

The Sisters

The Shining Falls

Loubwater

Liorrh

South Wood

Graypeak Mountains

■ The Dungeon of the Hark

Bleached Bones Pass

High Gap

Dawn Pass

Delimbiyr "The River Shining"

Heariblood River

Mounts

Run

High Gap

The Fallen Lands

Dark Mountains

Dawn Pass

The Bones Pass

■ Ruins of Dekanter

Weathercore Wood

Advanced Dungeons & Dragons®

Source Book for the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

The Savage Frontier by Paul Jaquays

North of Waterdeep, the land is cold, vast, and forbidding. The Trackless Sea stretches northward for what seems like forever, interrupted only by the occasional island and, eventually, the ice. On land, towns and villages flourish right up to the Spine Of The World Mountains. It takes a special kind of person to live up here; a determined person used to hardship, a survivor. A person with a great love for life and a great respect for the forces—both natural and unnatural—that can end it.

The Savage Frontier is now fully detailed for your roleplaying campaign. The cultures, personalities, economies, cities, towns, and wilderness are described for an AD&D® campaign of any size or level. From the barbarian tribes of the far north to the Luskan pirates of the Trackless Sea, The Savage Frontier is an exciting land where adventure can be found anywhere. And, of course, it's all part of the best-selling FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Campaign Set, home of many other AD&D® modules, sourcebooks, and even novels!

©1988 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

Printed in the U.S.A.

TSR, Inc.
POB 756
Lake Geneva,
WI 53147 USA

TSR UK Ltd.
The Mill, Rathmore Road
Cambridge CB1 4AD
United Kingdom

ISBN 0-88038-593-6

FORGOTTEN REALMS™

Official Game Accessory

Dreams of the Red Wizards

by Steve Perrin

An Accessory for Characters of All Levels
for use with the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

TSR, Inc.
PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION™

Dreams of The Red Wizards

by Steve Perrin

Table of Contents

Introduction 2
 History of Thay 3
 People and Society of Thay 10
 Geography of Thay 14
 Current Economy of Thay 24
 Current Politics of Thay 25
 Magic of Thay 38
 Religion of Thay 49
 Personalities of Thay 52
 Adventures in Thay 58

Pullout Section:
 Players' Guide to Thay 29-36

Map of Thay 20-21

Credits:

Editing: Karen S. Boomgarden Cover Art: Clyde Caldwell
 Cartography: Dave Sutherland Typography: Kim Janke
 Interior Art: Valerie Valusek Keylining: Stephanie Tabat

TSR, Inc.
 POB 756
 Lake Geneva,
 WI 53147 USA

TSR, Inc.
 PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION™

TSR Ltd.
 120 Church End, Cherry Hinton
 Cambridge CB1 3LB
 United Kingdom

ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS, AD&D, FORGOTTEN REALMS, BATTLESYSTEM, PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION, and the TSR logo are trademarks owned by TSR, Inc.

Distributed to the book trade in the United States by Random House, Inc., and in Canada by Random House of Canada, Ltd. Distributed to the toy and hobby trade by regional distributors. Distributed in the United Kingdom by TSR Ltd.

This material is protected under the copyright laws of the United States of America. Any reproduction or unauthorized use of the material or artwork presented herein is prohibited without the express written permission of TSR, Inc.

© 1988 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved. Printed in U.S.A.

INTRODUCTION

This book is a description of Thay, said by some to be the most evil land of the Forgotten Realms. It is the home of the powerful, evil Red Wizards, whose whim can move mountains and summon great demons to lay waste to armies. Besides the great magic that seems to fill every corner, the land is famed for its rich prosperity, with exquisite, exotic craftworks and rich culture. For all of these things, Thay is perhaps the best-known (and least-visited by those good men who value their freedom) of the Eastern Lands.

The realm is also known for its ancient heritage, byzantine government, and magical-based society. Its slave-traders and slave-gatherers are feared throughout the Realms, and its traveling wizards can walk unhampered through the most squalid streets of Tethyr. To most folk of the Realms, Thay is the great eastern threat, the land of bloody-handed wizards who at any moment might swirl across their borders on the backs of fire elementals and lay waste to the world.

Many of these fears have some basis in fact. This book attempts to lift the veil of rumor and reveal what the Wizards of Thay are truly capable of, and why the lands around the Inner Sea have a true cause to fear the Dreams of the Red Wizards.

How To Use This Book

This book has two uses for the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ game campaign DM. First, it provides a look at Thay and the lands surrounding it, complete with enough statistics that a BATTLESYSTEM™ Fantasy Combat Supplement campaign can be set up using the information supplied within and some translations from raw population statistics to BATTLESYSTEM Fantasy Combat Supplement characteristics. There are certainly sufficient reasons for Thay and her neighbors to go to war with one another, as you will see, and the strategic situation is sufficiently complex to make for some interesting maneuvers and battles.

Of course, this book also provides the necessary information for FORGOTTEN REALMS™ role-playing campaigns set in Thay and among her neighbors.

The second use for this book is to show how events in Thay and the surrounding countries can interact with adventures set anywhere in the Realms, from Neverwinter to Skuld, and everywhere in between.

If you are a DM whose campaign is set in the Realms, and wish to use Thay as a site for occasional adventures (see Rescue! in the appendices) or a complete campaign you should read the entire book, referring to the accompanying map when the wealth of information about the international relationships becomes overwhelming.

If you are going to allow player character magic-users who originate in Thay, study the chapter on Thayvian magic particularly closely. There are many differences between the standard AD&D® game system magic-user and a Red Wizard—no matter how far along the Red Wizard is in his studies. This is also necessary when looking at the descriptions of the major NPCs in the appendices. Looking at them with the eye of a standard AD&D game system DM will only confuse you.

If you are running player characters from other lands who are journeying to Thay, emphasize the rumored differences in magic without being specific. The players will learn about the real differences soon enough.

For a full campaign in Thay, be sure to look at the society and politics chapters closely. There are differences here that can be quite alien to the Western-Europe-style campaign possible even in Cormyr. There is an underlying evil to this society that is foreign to even Amn or Zhentil Keep. The people of Thay are different from the people of the western lands, and the differences can be subtle and trip up player and DM alike.

Of course, you are free to change some aspects of this culture to better fit your own playing style. If you are more comfortable with a society where the police can be counted on to enforce the law, even if the laws are evil, then you may want to change the attitude of the gnoll patrols who maintain the law as they see it in the cities of Thay.

If you are more comfortable with a society in which everyone has some civil rights, then you will have to make some other, perhaps very subtle, changes in how this society looks at the adventurers who enter it.

And, of course, study the history and geography of both Thay and its neighbors. These are the foundation stones of heroic legends and current national politics, and both can be good foundations for exciting adventures as well.

Welcome to Thay. May you and your players' characters live through the experience.

HISTORY OF THAY

History of The Region

"The East" is shrouded in mystery to those lands to the west of the Inner Sea. The entire east and south is considered an area of vast magics and strange tyrannies. These considerations are quite close to the truth.

Before the beginning of the current Age, there were four great lands who controlled the east of the Inner Sea. In the north were Narfell and Raumathar, to the south were Unther and Mulhorand. The northern nations were relatively young, coalescing out of wandering tribes about a thousand years before the end of the previous age. Unther and Mulhorand had first appeared as that age was dawning.

The southern nations had long since found the Alamber Sea a sufficient border to keep their interests apart. They fought for trade rights and for possession of the few islands of the sea, but neither seriously invaded the other country. In the north, however, there were no such convenient barriers to the march of armies, and the two giants of the north were constantly at war. In these days, no one knows what their source of enmity was, but stories of their wars and heroes are still the staple of any wandering bard of the eastern Inner Seas.

Eventually, the two nations slew each other with great magics. Stories in books found in Myth Drannor tell of demons summoned, dragons called, and cities burned. The war came to an end with neither nation surviving. This took place about 1500 years ago, just before the explorers of Tethyr and Amn began to open up the Inner Sea to the current age.

Both Mulhorand and Unther moved to fill up some of the space left vacant by this catastrophe. Unther lept across the Eastern Reach to plant cities on that body of water's northern coast; Mulhorand founded the cities of Bezanur, Tyraturas, Amruthar, Delhumide, and Nethjet in an effort to reach the northern survivors of the great war. But both nations were already feeling the first effects of the other great destroyer of empires: decadence.

Unther could not reach the elves of the Yuirwood with its traders or its armies. Rather than circumvent the forest, it sat where it was and first lost Altumbel, then the North Shore Coastal cities, to forces of rebellion against its smothering bureaucracy, led by the freethinking freebooters who led the migrations east from Amn. Then Unther retreated from the south shore under similar pressures. The city-states that remained formed a loose union known as Chessenta that still remains, though the unity of the cities is laughable to any true nation.

Mulhorand, perhaps because it had a land connection to the north, managed to hold on to its northern conquests longer, but eventually, lost them to a home-grown menace. About four hundred years ago, a sect calling itself the Red Wizards declared its freedom from the god-kings of Mulhorand. They rebelled from the rule of the theocracy and demanded more freedom for magic research.

The sect originally sprang up all over the old kingdom, but its center of strength was in the northern provinces, where the natives did not have the inbred reverence for the god-kings. The wizards led an army to raze the capital city of Delhumide and declared themselves the free nation of Thay. Then they marched south, taking the other cities of northern Mulhorand with little trouble.

Mulhorand roused itself from its stupor long enough to hire an immense mercenary army from Chessenta and send it into the land now called Thay by its new masters. The Red Wizards met this army on the farming plains of Thazalhar. The Wizards met the vastly superior numbers backed with some of the less apathetic priests of the god-kings with sorcery, including what has been described as a major demon, who slaughtered vast hordes of mercenaries before the invaders broke and ran.

Mulhorand effectively shrugged its massive shoulders, further fortified the city of Sultim and the River of the Dawn, and turned over in its bed of apathy to sleep the sleep of decadence. Since then, Mulhorand has not claimed any part of Thay, though they have had to defend themselves, quite successfully, against two invasions from that upstart country.

Thay

Their independence secured, the Red Wizards set about to establish their own nation. The first order of business was sending the major demon back where it came from—an effort that cost them several Wizards. Then they established their capitol of Eltabbar (some say this is named after the demon) and began to order their new country.

Initially, the Red Wizards ruled their new nation themselves, gathering in a Council to make any necessary decisions. Each Wizard tried to extend his own powerbase, taking on apprentices and recruiting other wizards. Many magic-users from Mulhorand who had not participated in the rebellion immigrated to Thay to partake of the greater freedom for magic-users there. Within a century there were too many Wizards to operate as a ruling Council. Every decision was reached, when it was reached, only after weeks of debate. Moreover, magic-users are not well suited to governing. To remain good magi they must continually research and practice their craft. This leaves little time for statecraft and governance.

Recognizing the problem, the Red Wizards devised the current system (described in the Politics chapter of this book) of Tharchions ruling provinces and Zulkirs chosen from among the Red Wizards to rule the entire nation.

Thay's history since independence was gained is a cycle of internal strife, unification to try to conquer neighboring lands, and so on around the circle. The first major period of strife was directly after the foundation of the ruling Zulkirs, when objecting Wizards marshalled their forces and attempted to destroy this new government at birth. However, they were disorganized and warred among themselves (several had kingly ambitions of their own) and the Zulkirs slowly established their rule over a period of almost 40 years by military victory and occasional co-opting of opponents into their ranks.

The Conquering Wizards

Since the establishment of their nation, the Red Wizards have had to trade (or steal) for many things they consider necessary for their lives. They would rather conquer and control the lands that produce these items, so the Zulkirs and Tharchions are continually scheming and planning to gather armies and march on one of their neighbors.

Invariably, those Wizards who are not in on the planning of the conquest decide that either (1) it is really just a scheme by the organizers to take over Thay itself or (2) the organizers will get too powerful and use their new power base to take over Thay and/or exact a revenge on the other Wizards for real or imagined slights. Thus, those left out of the planning either (1) try to subvert those working with the planners into sabotaging the effort or (2) try to take over the homefront power base of the planners while they are off conquering.

The fact that the Wizards not involved in the planning might be very right about the real motivations of the planners does not help build tranquility. Thus, the military history of Thay is one of grand conquests splendidly embarked upon that end in squabbling and disaster. However, the Wizards keep trying.

Current Operations

At this time, there are three major schemes of conquest in operation.

The first scheme of conquests consists of Szass Tam, Zulkir of Necromancy, and the Tharchion of Gauros, who are attempting once again to conquer Rashemen, this time behind an army of zombies.

The second scheme is masterminded by the Tharchion of Thaymount and the Zulkir of the School of Divination, who have taken advantage of a period of Aglarondan laxity to march down off the Thaymount and take over the trading towns of Nethentir and Nethjet. There is also a second prong to their attack, but that is not immediately evident to the casual observer.

The third scheme is perhaps the most ambitious. The Zulkirs of Evocation and Conjunction have combined with the Tharchion of Lapendrar to open a gate to the Elemental Plane of Fire, assemble an army of salamanders and efreeti, and purge the North Coast of competitors to Bezantur once and for all.

Naturally, all this activity has not gone unnoticed. The Zulkir for Enchantment and Charm is most alarmed at all this adventurism, since his plan of steady assassination of heads of state has barely gotten off the ground.

This is the nation that adventurous player characters may be entering at any moment.

Timeline

– 150 DR Mutual Fall of Narfall and Raumathar

- | | | | |
|------------|---|------------|---|
| 1 DR | Founding of Cormyr | 1030 DR | Establishment of Zulkirs as ruling body of Thay |
| 163 DR | Founding of Altumbel | 1031-74 DR | Internal strife in Thay as Zulkirs continue to establish rule |
| 482 DR | Delthuntle and Laothkund break free of Unther | 1065 DR | Battle of Ingdal's Arm Brindor First King of Aglarond |
| 504-679 DR | Steady erosion of Unther's control of North Coast Cities | 1082 DR | Building of Emmech |
| 756 DR | First fisherfolk in Aglarond | 1085 DR | Building of Giants Wall |
| 823 DR | Mourktar breaks free of Unther | 1097 DR | Founding of Impiltur Imphras crowned King |
| 870 DR | Adventurers begin to clear the monsters out of the Yuirwood | 1104 DR | Birth of Zulkir Szass Tam |
| 922 DR | Battle of Thazalhar | 1117-54 DR | Breakup of Chessenta Alliance into squabbling city-states |
| 929 DR | Alliance of Chessenta drives Unther back beyond the Riders To The Sky mtns. | 1122 DR | Imbrar King of Impiltur |
| 934 DR | First Thay invasion of Rashemen | 1127 DR | Ilmara Queen of Impiltur |
| 937 DR | Alliance of the Cities of The Golden Way into Thesk | 1128 DR | Althon King of Aglarond |
| 975 DR | Telflamm annexes Nyth and Culmaster and establishes own nation | 1132 DR | Creation of Long Portage |
| | | 1142 DR | Redsail the pirate retires to Aglarond |
| | | 1159 DR | Zulkir Szass Tam becomes lich |
| | | 1189 DR | Elthond King of Aglarond |
| | | 1169 DR | Imphras II King of Impiltur |
| | | 1194 DR | Battle of Singing Sands Philaspur King of Aglarond |
| | | 1197 DR | Battle of Brokenheads Grey Sisters Queens of Aglarond |
| | | 1225 DR | Lashlimbrar King of Impiltur |
| | | 1237 DR | Marriage of Thara of Aglarond to Elthar of Milvarune |
| | | 1257 DR | Halacar king of Aglarond |
| | | 1260 DR | Battle of Lapendrar Ilione Queen of Aglarond |
| | | 1294 DR | Rilimbrar King of Impiltur |
| | | 1317-23 DR | Great Plague of the Inner Sea |
| | | 1317 DR | Targuth Athkarr becomes Huhong of Rashemen |
| | | 1320 DR | Simbul Queen of Aglarond |
| | | 1334 DR | Hyarmon Hussilthar becomes Huhong of Rashemen |
| | | 1338 DR | Sambryl Queen of Impiltur |
| | | 1357 DR | The Present |

The Lands Surrounding Thay

To a large extent, the history of Thay is that of the neighboring nations. The following is a brief description of the histories of these nations and how they relate to their imperialistic neighbor.

Aglarond

Initially a wilderland inhabited only by a few sylvan elves, satyrs, and the fell forest denizens known more to men in fable than in fact (owlbears, stirges, and the like), Aglarond was little disturbed by men as settlement spread east across the Inner Sea an age ago.

Often visited by pirates and others seeking a temporary refuge or timber to cut, Aglarond remained unsettled for many long winters. A few hermits eked out an existence in coastal caves and later Aglarond became something of a retirement refuge for pirates—those too old, notorious, or badly maimed to continue faring. At length, fishermen seeking untouched areas moved to Aglarond's shores, and slowly small settlements of fisher-folk took hold on the rocky coasts. These villagers faced the sea, and although the woods at their backs seldom erupted to endanger them, they did not explore inland, or boldly cut and fell timber in the manner of the settlers of Cormyr, Sembia, and the Dalelands. The far-off pinnacle and the endless woods remained hostile places for generations; those who ventured too far in did not return.

As the woodcutting slowly ate away at the forest edge, skirmishes with owlbears and satyrs became more common, and were-creatures began to appear. Adventurers on the run or seeking employment also began to arrive in Aglarond, and for a brief, bloody decade still vivid in the songs and travelers' tales, men slaughtered the most dangerous and aggressive of Aglarond's monsters.

As the dangers of the wood grew fewer, hunters and fur-trappers ventured further inland—and eventually discovered that the elves of Aglarond had grown few and humble, weakened by disease and continual warfare with the mountain trolls and the dark elves of the mountain depths. Most of the fisher-folk remained ignorant (and fearful) of the forest depths, and did not venture far into the trees, but the hunters and adventurers fought the trolls and (rarely) the drow, knowing the elves first as wary allies and then as friends—and within another generation a proud (if few in number) half-elven folk had come into being in the depths of the woods, the elves being completely absorbed into the half-elven stock. Over the next decade, the drow "went under" (ground) and came to Aglarond no more, the trolls were nearly eradicated, and the satyrs all left Aglarond or perished in the forest wars, until the half-elves came to rule all of Aglarond's wooded interior. Indiscriminate woodcutting continued around the villages of Oskur and Slusk in particular, and at length the half-elves grew angry enough to move down into the fishing villages and take over.

This led to several armed skirmishes, notably a pitched battle at the remote anchorage of Ingdal's Arm, in which the "pure" humans perished to a man, but at length the half-elves prevailed.

For a time there was ill-feeling, but the just rule of the half-elven (and their undeniable and ever-increasing blood ties to the fisher-folk) soon welded the people into a loyal fellowship under the rule of a king. The first king (the senior warleader of the elves) was the aged Brindor; he established a fighting corps of veterans and youths, named an heir (as he had no surviving mate or offspring of his blood) and began a tradition of government by monarchy and council, each village choosing a representative or elder to be a part of the council, to advise and debate with the king. Those who could not accept the rule of the King moved west, into Altumbel, or north and east into Thesk. Theskan raiders (and later, the growing threat of Thay) were countered by Brindor's only great engineering works:

the fortress of Emmech, at the mouth of the UMBER, and the "Wall of Giants", constructed by giants in return for some mysterious magical service Brindor gave them, which prevented any army that crossed the UMBER Marshes from sweeping into Aglarond's growing farms.

Brindor's heir, Althon, began a great program of irrigation, road-building, and careful husbandry of the much-shrunken woods of Aglarond; eventually to become known as Althon "the Old", he lived nearly a hundred winters, and in his time Aglarond grew into a strong and happy realm, despite the growing power of Thay and the many cities along the coast to the south of what is now known as the Yuirwood. (The wood gained this name because of the Yuir, the name of the original elven tribe that lived there). Althon had two sons, Elthond and Philaspur. Elthond perished in the first great battle against the forces of Thay, Singing Sands (1194 DR, so-called for the lamenting women of Aglarond, who cried and sang all night as they took up the bodies of their slain men from the sands around Emmech), and Philaspur reigned thereafter, perishing himself at the fortress of Glarondar in the battle of Brokenheads (1197 DR). Philaspur's daughters, Thara and Ulae, ruled together after his death: long and well. Known as the "gray sisters" for their raiment, they developed their magical arts to awesome heights, and were believed to have thwarted many forces from Thay ere these reached Aglarond's borders, by means of shrewd dweomerwork. In their later years, both took husbands—Thara wedding Elthar of Milvarune, gaining thereby the friendship of Thesk (which survives to this day); and Ulae wedding the forester Ilion. Thara and Elthar had no children, but Ulae bore a son, Halacar, and a daughter, Ilione.

Halacar reigned from the death of his mother (1257 DR) through a disastrous campaign against Thay, and died of poison, it is thought in the winter of 1260 DR, without wife or offspring. His sister Ilione came to the throne inexpectrienced, but was wiser than Halacar, and carefully built Aglarond's strength, immediately naming as heir her apprentice, the young and mysterious sorceress known only as The Simbul, and ruling long and wisely as Aglarond prospered.

Iliane died of plague in 1320 DR, and since that time the Simbul has ruled the realm with magery greater than any known in the Inner Sea lands since the fall of Myth Drannor; she is thought to still live, and Aglarond still survive, because she personally overmatches even the infamous Red Wizards of Thay.

If the Simbul herself has apprentices or a chosen heir, she has not publicly identified any such to the Council. Her style as Queen of Aglarond (a title she never uses, preferring to be known only as "The Simbul") is her own, different from her predecessors and counterparts in other realms. As Mirt of Waterdeep once said, "Ah, that Lady—she goes her own way." That way must needs be a narrow and often treacherous one; Aglarond's future may well hang in the balance.

The royal banner of Aglarond is three white stars on a royal blue field.

Impiltur

Impiltur was formed two hundred and sixty winters ago, when the city states of Lyrabar, Hlammach, Dilpur, and Sarshel united under Imphras, war-captain of Lyrabar, to face the menace of hobgoblin hordes advancing from the Giantspire mountains, from whence they had only raided sporadically before.

The human armies, bolstered by wood elves from the Grey Forest and dwarves from the Earthfast Mountains, met the hobgoblins in the High Pass west of the River Icehilt, and there was great slaughter. The High Pass was "choked with the bodies of the fallen, and blood began to flow like a river ere it froze; a red river that ran down out of the heights, onto the rocks below." This bitter struggle went on, day and night, in the cold, until on the afternoon of the fourth day, the exhausted human defenders were pushed back, out of the heights, and forced down onto the plain—for although they fought valiantly, and commanded the natural heights and strongpoints of the Pass, the hobgoblins "were without number or end," as the sage Amphyr (who was a Bowman in the battle) put it, and just kept coming over the bodies of their own forces, until they wore out the defenders.

Imphras fled across the plain, harried by the hobgoblins, until he reached Bluefang water, where he rallied his men to stand against the invaders. Some came against him; twice his own force at least—but others ignored the warriors and ran southwards, past the men of Imphras, to take and loot the cities on the coast.

And there the hobgoblins were met by the women the warriors had left behind, with swords in their hands, and among them stood Soargar, the old archmage of Lyrabar, standing with two sticks; and the young sorceress Sambral, and her guest, the archmage Velgarbrin of Baldur's Gate—and these last three unleashed magics that have never again been seen so gathered on one field from that day to this; the earth opened, hobgoblins were snatched into the air by invisible hands—and hurled to earth again, balls of fire crackled and roared all about the screaming hordes, and lightning leaped and hobgoblins fell.

When at last the spells were done, the hobgoblins were fewer than before, but still they came forward, to cut down the women—and then Imphras with his few surviving men fell on their rear like a scythe takes down grass, and they fell and were routed.

The gathered folk of the cities encamped upon the plain and Soargar breathed his last, drained of life by the use of his art, yet content, and he bade the elders of all the cities make Imphras their general, against the hobgoblins coming again. They did so, and Soargar told Imphras of the lost crown of Nar-fell, a thing of wondrous magic hidden in the old dweomercrafter's tower in Lyrabar, where it had slumbered these many years, and of magic swords there—and then fell dead, smiling. And Imphras took the crown, and raised a small tower at Filur, and ruled there, and in time wed Sambral and had heirs.

But it was not in his time that the hobgoblins came again. Sambral died, and after grieving Imphras followed. Their son Imbrar took the throne. His sister Ilmara became a sorceress under Mhilra of Milvarune, and found scrying stones of lost Myth Drannor in her adventures, and founded Ilmwatch. In those stones she found the hobgoblins stirring. Imbrar went up against the hobgoblins before they could attack the realm, and he was not seen again, but neither were the hobgoblins. And the magical swords that he and his guard wore, the legacy from Soargar, were lost.

Ilmara, sorrowing, took up the crown of Narfell and the rule in Filur, and after forty winters took to husband Rilaun of Sarshal, a young warrior half her age, and had a son, whom she named Imphras, and crowned king. Rilaun was wroth, and took arms to seize the crown, but he was murdered ere he could take it, and Imphras II reigned with his mother as regent until he was 16 winters old.

And in time he took to wife Lasheela of Dilpur, and had many sons; and the crown passed to Lashimbrar, and then to his son Rilimbrar, and then to Rilimbrar's eldest daughter, Sambryl.

Sambryl is a mage of power (CG 17th level M-U) who does not like to rule; so she walks the kingdom freely, leaving the defense of the realm in the hands of twelve lords of the Realm tall descendants of Imphras II): Kyhraun; Imbrar; Lashilaun; Soargilm; Haelimbrar; Sambrar; Rilimbraun; Imbraun; Silmgar, Silaunbrar; and Rilaunyr.

Impiltur today is a war-ready realm, still on the frontiers of civilized lands, but largely at peace and friendly with its neighbors of Telflamm, Thesk, Rashemen, and Aglarond. With these nations it keeps a wary eye on Thay, supporting them all in their occasional wars with that realm of wizardry because Impiltur knows that if any of these realms should fall, Thay would be nowhere as friendly a neighbor.

Impiltur is still a land of opportunity for the daring and hard-working; rich new copper, silver, and iron lodes have been found north of Lyrabar and near the High Pass, and trade is increasing in the area.

The arms of Impiltur are a crossed sword and wand on a dun banner, bordered in scarlet.

Telflamm

When Thesk was formed, the Heirarch of the coastal city of Telflamm was snubbed by the autocrats of Phsalt and Milvarune. As a result, Telflamm refused to join with the other cities in their union, and kept its satellites, Culmaster and Nyth, from joining as well.

Despite this history of hostility, Telflamm is friendly to Thesk, and while they are ostensibly trade rivals, they cooperate in defense and safeguarding their shares of the Golden Way.

Telflamm is a favorite port for adventurers coming to the Eastern Realms. They specialize in outfitting adventurers, and maps to the treasures of Raumathar and Narfell are a stock in trade of the city. Some of them are even accurate, though they tend to lead to already-looted sites. Still, one never knows what previous looters may have missed. . .

Telflamm has never been conquered. It is of much more use as an open city.

Thesk

This is the land between Aglarond and Impiltur. Its main reason for existence is the trading path called The Golden Way which has been traditional for traders from the north and east since before the current age. At one time it was controlled by Raumathar. When that nation died in its mutual war of extinction with Narfell, the inns and trading stations along the Golden Way (each established approximately 1 day's slow packhorse's travel away from its neighbors) became centers for the refugees from the kingdom's destruction.

The easternmost of the cities became part of the new land of Rashemen. The others were briefly under the sway of Mulhorand, but aside from collecting taxes, the god-kings had little to do with the people that far north.

The cities banded together and allied themselves with the people of the forest and hills. They called themselves Thesk after the mountain ridge in the center of the lands they claimed. Together, they drove out the Mulhorani tax collectors and established their loose confederacy. When the Red Wizards first rose, the cities of Thesk supported them to establish a buffer state between them and the ancient empire to the south. They have since come to regret this decision, but live with their aggressive neighbor as best they can.

The government of this land is an oligarchy made up of the rulers of the trading cities along the Golden Way from Two-Stars to Milvarune, which acts as the capital (mostly because it is so far removed from Thay).

The Nomads

The nomadic tribes who run their flocks in the Mountains of Thesk in the center of the land also protect the cities and are a thorn in the side of any invading army from Thay. Their tactics are ideally suited to hit-and-run and they work in such a scattered fashion that mass destruction spells cannot damage very many at a time.

The nomad magic-users are mostly shamans, but shamans who have grown in power (perhaps because of the proximity to Thay) so that they are equivalent to Druids. They use many of the same spells, with some differences because of their plains and hills existence.

However, the main reason Thay has not overwhelmed Thesk, or at least taken its easternmost trading cities away from it, is that it would leave them with very vulnerable flanks to Rashemen, Aglarond, and even Impiltur. The Red Wizard policy has traditionally been to secure the flanks, first.

Relations with Others Nations

During the establishment of Aglarond, raiders from Thesk would terrorize the small villages that make up that country. However, the traders of Thesk soon came to realize that the Aglarondans would be far better trading partners than victims. The marriage of one of the rulers of Aglarond to one of the princes of Thesk cemented the relationship, and now they are fast friends.

The city of Telflamm is a trading rival, but supports them against Thay and acts as a convenient duty-free seaport in Thesk's relationships with other nations.

When not fighting Thay, Thesk is glad to act as an intermediary between Thay and potential trading partners who dislike supporting the economy of a slaver nation like Thay. Theskite merchants buy Thayvian produce and products and sell them at generous profits to Impiltur, Cormyr, and anywhere in between.

The rough nation of Impiltur is one of Thesk's main customers for all manner of commodities.

Mulhorand

This "Sleeping Giant" has been in existence through three ages of the Realms. An age ago it was a vital and aggressive power, controlling most of the Alamber Sea and the entire Priador plateau. The god-kings were said to be "in their prime."

Now the god-kings (who seem to be exactly the same people) are said to be "in their dotage," and Mulhorand is a sleepy and decadent land. The god-kings make occasional pronouncements from their towering palaces in Skuld, the City of Shadows, but the country is really run by the bureaucrats of the temple, who are happiest when everything happens just as it has happened for the last two thousand years.

Mulhorand has not attempted conquest since the Red Wizards drove it back from Thay. But it is a rich land, with great natural resources and a heritage of priestly sorcery and enchantment.

It is well known that there is a wealth of magical items available to the rulers of Mulhorand, should they ever care to use them. The Statues that Walk are only one of hundreds of such items in the land, and most of the items are available to the lords and military of that land should it be seriously threatened; therefore, everyone just lets the sleeping giant lay, hoping that something will happen to it to let all of that magic free to the other kingdoms of the Inner Sea.

Mulhorand is unique in the Realms in that magic-users are subservient to the church of the land and must be acolytes of the temple (though they study and use their magic in the usual way). This church control of magic is one of the major reasons why the Red Wizards broke away from Mulhorand and formed their own country.

Visiting magic users must register at the temples of the god-kings and either pledge to support one of the temples with their magic or suffer their spellbooks to be sealed. Breaking the seal notifies the officials of the act, and the temple guards, which include their own magic-users, are quick to respond.

The people of Mulhorand, when they think about Thay at all, consider it a province that will return to the fold when they realize the folly of magic unsupervised by priests. The god-kings are still called Protectors of the Priador whenever their entire list of titles is announced by a herald anywhere in the Eastern Realms.

Like Thay, Mulhorand is a slave state, with most of the slaves concentrated in the great temple farms controlled by the church of the god kings. All slaves are considered to be owned by the god-kings, not individual owners, and must be rented from the church.

Rashemen

This land has existed since the mutual destruction of Raumathar and Narfell, before the beginning of the current Age. Sages speculate that Rashemen, or the Far Land as it is known, is the last remnant of Raumathar, but if so, they have retained no knowledge of that fabled ancient kingdom.

Apparently, Rashemen existed in relative isolation until the founding of Thay and the first Thayvian expedition to conquer that land. At that time, the Witches of Rashemen made their presence felt for the first time and the Red Wizard army was destroyed in one flurry of sorcerous might. Since then, the legions of the Red Wizards have faced off against the "fangs" of Rashemen over the border formed by Lake Mulsantir and the Gorge of Gauros, a stalemate broken only by occasional Thay incursions which are destroyed or repelled by the Witches and the stalwart fighters of Rashemen.

Rashemen is ruled by a Huhrong, or Iron Lord. The present Iron Lord is Hyarmon Huzzilthar, a grizzled, gray-and-white bearded veteran of seventy-six winters; he has directed "the fangs of Rashemen" for twenty-three winters. since he was chosen by the Witches in a process they do not reveal. He replaced the senile "Old Wolf", Targuth Athkarr, who in his turn held the High Seat in Immilmar for seventeen winters, after the death of his predecessor, Lethgar Mimdusko. Targuth was taken in by the Witches, and never seen again; he is believed to have been carefully tended until death, for the Witches (as Rashemi say) "are like that."

Details of Rashemen history, aside from the annals of Thayvian invasions routed, are not easily come by. Very few of the populace are literate and the Witches are the keepers of lore, and they do not disseminate this information to common travelers.

City of Amruthar

Amruthar was founded by the god-kings of Mulhorand in their efforts to colonize the northern lands of the Inner Sea after the mutual self-destruction of Narfell and Raumthar. Its location on the Lapendrar is a strategic one, and it has been an important trading city since its inception.

During the war of rebellion against Mulhorand, the city fathers of Amruthar sided with the wizards immediately, offering them alliance. This is one reason that the city has never been under the sway of the Red Wizards since the establishment of Thay.

Theoretically, this is an independent city, with the the River of Sorrows (Lapendrar) keeping it from Thay.

Actually, Amruthar is a puppet state depending entirely on the whim of the Red Wizards. Just now, it serves as a convenient trading center for those countries whose merchants do not wish to deal with the Red Wizards, but find the money of their agents in Amruthar to be just fine.

The city does have lively politics, with three main groups vying for control.

THE REALISTS want to keep Thay happy and themselves free. In short, this is the status quo party and, counting the citizens who think everything is just fine and refuse to have anything to do with politics, is by far the largest party.

THE AGLARONDANS want to invite Aglarond in to govern them. Since Aglarond has no inclination towards extending itself out that close to Thay, this is not a very realistic party.

THE INDEPENDENTS wish to sever all ties with Thay, impose severe duties on Thayvian goods, and generally treat Thay as if it were just another country, and not a very popular one, at that. This party is halfway between the Realists and the Aglarondans in size.

Thazalhar

This once-rich farmland is now a buffer zone between Thay and Mulhorand. It was devastated in the war between the Mulhorand and the rebels who founded Thay.

Now the land is called "one vast graveyard." Farmers no longer till its enriched soil and it lies fallow and barren.

The Coastal Cities

The cities of Delthuntle, Nethra, Teth, Laothkund, Hilbrand, Lasdur, Taskaunt, Escalant, Murbant, and Thas-selen are known as the Coastal Cities, the Cities of the North Coast (of the Eastern Reach), and the Free Cities. They were established by settlers from Unther at the dawning of the new age and later on by pioneers from the West. The easternmost cities have been under the control of Thay at one time or another for the last four hundred years, but are currently free.

Each city is independent, but they have a loose association for purposes of mutual defense and some trade pacts. The Western cities, which perceive themselves as less in peril from the Red Wizards, are usually slow to respond to a threat to their eastern neighbors from Thay.

Of these "cities," most are actually towns. Only Delthuntle, Laothkund, Hilbrand and Escalant are truly cities, with populations over 5,000 people. Delthuntle and Laothkund have populations of about 50,000 each, Hilbrand and Escalant about 20,000 each.

The cities have fought among themselves and against their trade rivals in Chessenta more often than they have fought Thay or any other invader. Wars among the cities are fought by mercenaries, mostly from Chessenta, and the warfare is one of maneuver and advantage, with one city's forces surrendering if they are obviously outmatched by a foeman.

At this point in time, the cities of Lasdur, Taskaunt, Murbant, and Tahasselen are in flames. See Adventures, "Fire Time."

PEOPLE AND SOCIETY OF THAY

In most of the lands of the Inner Sea, the dominant human racial stock is similar to the men and women of Amn and Tethyr. However, the racial mixture of Thay is almost totally divided between two other racial stocks, with a scattering of the type more familiar to the inhabitants of the western realms of the Inner Sea.

The basic lower and middle class stock of Thay consists of short, hairy, swarthy, sturdy folk; the same stock found in neighboring Rashemen. This body type, called the Rashemi, can be found in the lower free classes and among the slowly-growing middle class of the country. In fact, the middle class is more likely to fall into this category than the lowest class of slaves, since the Red Wizards buy slaves from all over the Realms, and the slaves are of all lands and body types.

The rulers of Thay, on the other hand, are slightly taller and slimmer than their subjects (though not as tall as most Western men), with much less body hair and a sallow rather than swarthy skin. This is the body type most commonly found in the lands of Unther and Mulhorand, which is hardly surprising, since the rulers of Thay are the descendants of Mulhorani who broke away from that ancient kingdom. This body type is called the Mulan.

The Population of Thay

Thay is an ancient land, and has been the home of three different nations. Compared to many lands, it is quite populous.

Counting the slave population, there are about 1.5 million sentient people within the borders of Thay. This is an estimate, as the Zulkirs consider any such information potentially hazardous to the security of the country, and they refuse to take a census. Probably the best-counted members of the society are the slaves, as the slave owners have to keep some record of how many they have and how much they are producing, but there is no central repository for these records and individual slave owners are leery of letting anyone know the extent of their holdings.

Due to the centrally organized farming, where most is done on large slave farms, there is a higher proportion of population in the cities to the people on the farms than is common in the western realms where the farming is done mostly by small collections of free farmers or serfs of small landholders. About 300,000 people live in the cities, the other 1,200,000 in the wayside villages and slave farms. Of the city dwellers, about half are slaves, but in the country, the proportion of slaves to freemen is about seven to one.

In general, there are three social classes in Thay.

The Nobility

These are the rulers of Thay, and comprise both the Tharchions and Tharchionesses who rule the various regions and the Red Wizards themselves.

Members of the Bureaucracy are also among the nobility as are the Autharches who rule sub-regions in the name of the Tharchions.

The nobility is almost entirely comprised of the slim, sallow, folk from Mulhorand, but a few of the lower classes have managed to impress some wizards with their magical ability and be elevated to the rank of wizard's apprentice. Some of the Rashemi have now become members of the Red Wizards.

Traditionally, nobles of Thay disdain and abhor body hair (something of a trial for those of Rashemi descent). Men are known to grow facial hair even as they shave their heads. Women commonly shave their heads and decorate their shaved pates with artistic designs. Sometimes the designs are permanent tatoos, but most are just body paint, and frequently changed. This custom is mainly honored among the Tharchions and Tharchionesses, though most Red Wizards also follow the style when they have the time.

Presumed Red Wizards have been seen outside of Thay with beards and normal body hair. Most of these are obviously of Rashemi descent (part of a program of proving their worthiness by taking on missions to foreign lands), but even Mulani have been seen in such condition. It is thought that, without their specially-trained slave barbers, Red Wizards would rather grow their hair than risk cutting it by themselves or entrusting their heads to local barbers.

There are several noble families in Thay and, as a sign of the possible upward mobility in Thayvian society, new noble families are being started all the time.

In general, anyone appointed to the position of Tharchion (see Politics) or Autharch is automatically noble, and his immediate family (spouse[s], children) is also ennobled. Any other family members including siblings are not ennobled, but, since nepotism is standard in Thay, can expect to become nobility soon.

Red Wizards are also automatically nobles, and they ennoble their immediate families as well.

If the children of a Tharchion do not become Tharchions or Autharches themselves, or children of Red Wizards do not become wizards, they are still nobility. Once a Thayvian becomes a noble, it is almost impossible to take that status away from his family. Only the unanimous decision of the Zulkirs can remove the status of nobility; this is usually done by outlawing the family, arresting all accessible members, and turning the survivors of the arresting process into slaves.

It is not necessary to get all the Zulkirs upset with you to have a downward change in fortunes. Noble families also disappear because of the backstabbing politics of Thay. A family with many sons and siblings and with tentacles of power everywhere in the country can vanish overnight if the right collection of enemies decide the family is getting too powerful for the enemies' good.

Some of the current influential families include:

The Agneh: This family has a long history of Tharchions and Wizards in its membership. The most illustrious current member is Mari Agneh, Tharchioness of Bezantur, who was the black sheep of the family because of her past as an adventuring thief until she was appointed to her current post. She has embraced her family again and appointed most of them to official posts within her city government. Many people have noticed that these posts are those with the most prestige for the least work-a-situation about which the family members have never been heard to protest. The Agneh clan is the leading family of Bezantur.

The Canos: This family is on the rise politically. Though there are no Red Wizards involved with this group, they number a Tharchion, Mikal Canos of Delhumide, and a Tharchioness, Thesaloni Canos of the Aldor. The family has built itself up by its military reputation.

The Daramos: This is a new family, based around the Tharchion of Thazalhar and consisting of him, his wife (who rides as a member of his guard) and their two small children.

The Flass: This family is on the downturn, though it has had a couple of influential Red Wizards among its membership. The Tharchioness of Eltabbar is one of the family, but she has distanced herself from the clan for some years over an almost-forgotten dispute.

The Kren: This is a fairly new family which initially gained prominence due to the efforts of its progenitor, a woman who became a Red Wizard. Her daughter took after her father, however, and is now the Tharchion of Gauros.

The Mediocros: This family gained its position two hundred years ago when their progenitor became Tharchion of Eltabbar. Now, the leading member of the family is Valerios Theokillos, Tharchion of Pyarados. The family maintains its seat in that border city and attempt to sponge off their scion, but he has little time for them. He would much rather deal with his old adventuring friends and they are the ones who have reaped most of the benefits of his largesse.

The Odesseiron: This is an ancient family in Thay, its progenitor was one of the wizards who brought the Demon Prince to this plane and fought off the invaders from Mulhorand. For the most part, the Odesseirons have been Wizards. Homen Odesseiron, Tharchion of Surthay, is the first to gain status as a Tharchion. He is also somewhat famous as the first person to be a member of four Schools of Magic simultaneously, even though he never officially gained the title of Wizard.

The Tam: This is one of the more ancient families of Thay, not only in lineage but in age of its membership. Its head, Zulkir Szass Tarn, is only the third person to hold that position under conditions that are explained in the Notable Persons of Thay section of this book. At this point, we can only say that the seat of the Tam family is commonly referred to as "The Necropolis."

Noble Titles of Thay

One way of distinguishing the working nobility from the non-working variety in Thay is the titles they bear. A Tharchion or Autharch is a leader of the bureaucracy and the equivalent of a civil servant. They are the working nobility. They are referred to as "Lord" or "Lady" or "Your Eminence."

Red Wizards are referred to as "Master" (the sex does not matter) or "Your Omnipotence." The rest of the nobility is referred to as Daeron or Daeronness (literally "noble-born") and referred to personally as "Sir" or "Mistress" or "Your Excellency" or "Your Honor." Higher ranking nobles (the Tharchions and Autharches) rarely bother with such formal titles when talking to lower-ranking nobles.

High ranking priests are called "Lord Priest" (or other, higher, title) or "Your Omniscience." They have no official status in Thay, but still maintain a lot of social status. Which churches exist in Thay and how powerful they are is covered under Religions of Thay.

The Middle Class

Thay has little experience of a middle class, and merchants and tradesmen are generally considered to be just another form of laborer. Since all agriculture is done on slave-run plantations, there is no experience at all of the middle class yeoman farmer that distinguishes so many Western Realms.

In actual fact, with the foiling of several of the Red Wizards' plans for expansion at the expense of their neighbors, tradesmen and traders have become the source of much of what Thay needs to exist. The Red Wizards have recognized this sufficiently to use the legitimate traders of Thay as a cover for their own deprivations among the other kingdoms of the Inner Sea.

Because of the independence of individual members of the ruling class, there is no government regulation of the middle class. This is both a blessing and a curse to merchants and tradesmen. Depending on the Tharch they inhabit, they may be freewheeling entrepreneurs, treating Tharchion and Wizard alike as almost an equal, or they may have to swear fealty to a particular ruler and go to him for permission for any deal they wish to consummate or project they wish to commence. What is worse for these people is that these rules can change with a change in each ruler, which in the assassination-haunted halls of Thay can happen overnight.

The middle class approach to grooming is to be as neat as possible. Because of the rules governing slave grooming, no peasant or merchant is too hairy-shaving is common, and women's hairstyles tend to be shorter than those found elsewhere in the Realms. No peasant wants to be mistaken for a slave.

Slaves

Because of the need to keep many peasants under arms (and the loss of the same peasants in various attempts at conquest) Thay depends on a slave economy. Legitimate traders go throughout the Realms trying to purchase criminals and any other possible candidates for slavery. Of course, they cannot purchase anyone sentenced to limited slavery for a period of time, as the sentencing authority would have no way of knowing that the criminal had been released after his term was spent. However, enough lands use permanent slavery as a punishment that the slave traders are able to find many candidates for the slave pens of Thay. Some Inner Sea countries use "slavery and sale to the merchants of Thay" as a special punishment for especially heinous crimes.

However, most criminals do not have the special requirements that some slaveholders of Thay have. The Red Wizards meet these needs with their own special slavers—the dregs of the Inner Sea are hired to go out and find the ideal candidates, kidnap them, and turn them over to the Red Wizards to become slaves.

Slavery in Thay is universally dreaded throughout the Realms around the Inner Sea. Aside from the meager food and/or hard labor and/or degradation that is the probable lot of any slave in the few lands that allow for any form of slavery, Thayvian slaves are likely to become subjects of experiments, fed to exotic monsters that demand human flesh, or be slaughtered in depraved ceremonies.

Slaves who have been in Thay for more than a month can always be told apart from the peasantry because slaves are not allowed to cut their hair, no matter where on their bodies it grows.

Since the nobles of Thay are also very careful of cleanliness, this means that part of a slave's daily chores is washing an ever-growing head and, sometimes, body of hair.

Under normal circumstances, the slave hair is piled up in masses on the head of the slave, but any slave who is not on his or her master's business must wear his or her hair down, so that they can be told as slaves immediately.

It is possible for a slave to get permission to cut his hair, but it can never be cut to less than half way down the slave's back.

If a slave's hair must be cut for medical reasons, the first question is whether it would not be easier to let the slave die. If they decide to keep him alive, he is shaved where needed, then kept in seclusion until the hair grows out again.

Demi-Humans in Thay

Besides the dominant human population of Thay and the inevitable orcish tribes in the Thaymount and Sunrise mountains, the largest single humanoid tribe in Thay is gnolls. Gnoll mercenaries made up part of the Red Wizards' army of rebellion, and their reward was continued employment in the armies of the Thay and retirement to communities on the borders of the country, particularly the Thaymount and Gorge of Gauros.

Under these conditions, antithetical as they are to the usual form of gnoll habitation, the descendants of the mercenaries thrived. They have made a home for themselves in Thay and can be found throughout the country, usually working as mercenaries and law-enforcers. Thayvian law being what it is, gnolls get a great deal of pleasure out of enforcing it. Unlike their wilder brethren, Thayvian gnolls are neutral evil, not chaotic evil.

It is said that there are dwarves and gnomes in the Sunrise mountains, but they have little to do with the Red Wizards; their sole contact is with the raiding parties that enter the Sunrise Mountains looking for slaves.

Of elves there are none in Thay, except as slaves. Thayvian wizards do not buy adult elves as slaves, but occasionally buy children that they can be sure have not yet learned magic. The drow underneath Aglarond are said to have embassies in Thay, and they may have their own colonies under Thay, but they are not part of the life of the country. Elven adventurers in Thay are remarked on and watched closely.

Halflings are present in Thay as slaves, and, to some extent, as free citizens. Some halfling mercenaries did a favor for a Red Wizard and retired to Bezantur on the proceeds. Their families joined them and now there are halflings in all the cities. The halflings who settle in Thay find the paranoia of Thay's rulers a fertile field for scams and con games—and there is always work for a good thief who doesn't take up much space.

Centaurus can be found throughout Thay, usually as guards on the slave farms. These centaurs were originally inhabitants of Aglarond who were driven out by the half-elves because of their thieving ways and were welcomed by the Tharchion of Thaymount as mercenaries. There is a centaur legion (sponsored by one of the Red Wizards) in the standing army of Thay, and centaurs usually have the run of the roads of Thay.

This does not prevent centaurs from becoming slaves for real or imagined infractions.

Sahuagin are found in Bezantur and on the Aldor fairly frequently. In Thay the sahuagin have found a society they understand, and such trading as they do with the air breathers is done through Thay. Their kingdom in the Alamber Sea is a firm Thayvian ally (as firm as any alliance with the sahuagin can be).

The Society of Thay

Essentially, Thay is an evil society. Overall, the alignment of the country is neutral evil, but this can vary from lawful evil (usually but not always exemplified by the Tharchions and Zulkirs) to chaotic evil (usually exemplified by the actions of many of the Red Wizards who are not Zulkirs).

But wherever one may be in Thay, the rulers and most of their followers are driven by greed and megalomania and paranoia. Each member of the society seems to be dedicated to raising himself to the highest possible pinnacle of success, preferably on the backs of his friends, family, and associates. Not everyone living in Thay feels this way, but it is the way of the majority. It helps explain why members of the ruling class have many acquaintances and associates, but very few friends.

This makes for an almost chaotic evil society, but chaos is kept away by a structure of traditions and laws that allow for the Red Wizards having almost total freedom to do as they please, but just enough restraint through societal pressure and the threat of retribution by all the other wizards to keep Thay from disintegrating into a million tiny magocracies, each with a king mage on top trying to destroy all the other little magic kingdoms.

Part of the unwritten traditions and motivations of the Red Wizards is their envy of the god-kings of Mulhorand. They rebelled from that land to escape the overlordship of these avatars of powerful gods, and established a society that they hope will lead them to the same position through magic instead of worship. Thus, each wizard usually sees himself as a sort of proto-god, and each realizes that he needs a society of worshippers to maintain his power, so they maintain their society as the god-kings have maintained theirs.

Geography of Thay

General Description

Thay is a vast realm, bounded on the north by the river and lake of Mulsantir, its gateway there being the city of Surthay. To the northwest it claims the Surmarsh, a vast marsh and fenland that lies between the rivers Thay and Sur. The central core of Thay then runs south past the eastern slopes of Thaymount and the eastern bank of Lapendrar, the River of Sorrows, for many miles, until turning southeast along the edge of the Priador (high plains) to the many-spired city of Bezantur. Bezantur, on the Alamber Sea (sometimes known as the Sahuagin Sea) is Thay's southern gateway, and has traditionally rivaled the free cities of Thasselen, Murbant, Escalant, Taskaunt, Lasdur, and Hilbrand that share the north shore of the Sea.

From Bezantur, the land claimed by Thay is the seacoast east to the mouth of the River Thazarim, and northwards up that river's west bank to the Sunrise Mountains and then north to the outflow of the Mulsantir.

Thay frequently attempts to swallow the lands along these borders, and currently has destroyed several of the free cities and captured Nethentir and Nethjet, trading cities between Aglarond and Thay.

Within these borders, at the heart of the realm, lies Eltabbar, seat of the Red Wizards and capital of Thay. From the north, one reaches the city of Thay up the river Thay, to the vast Lake Thaylambar. Eltabbar lies upon a bay of that dragon-turtle-inhabited water. From the west, one reaches Thay up the Lapendrar from Escalant, or overland from Nethjet on the river Umber, to the independent city of Amruthar (which is still independent, though now circled by lands claimed by Thayl, from whence by bridge a road runs to Tyraturos, where roads north from Bezantur, south from Eltabbar, and west from Pyarados on the Thazarim meet. (The Thazarim is navigable as far north as Pyarados.) The Sunrise Mountains form an impenetrable barrier to the east, and Elminster knows nothing of what lies beyond them. There are tales of both lamia and evil naga in these mountains, but, he cautions, there are such tales everywhere, and but few of them are true.

Most of the country is on the great, irregular plateau formed by the First Escarpment of the Priador and which rises eastward almost imperceptibly toward the Sunrise Escarpment and the Sunrise Mountains. The land is gently rolling and broken only by occasional streams or one of the major rivers, the peaks of Thaymount, which are encircled by the Second Escarpment, the spires of the cities, and the farming communities and wizard towers that can appear every time a traveler mounts the top of one of the many hummocks in the trail.

Carefully set along each road and navigable river are the tax stations, which are usually accompanied by an inn and some other residences. At each tax station, the owning Wizard's tax collectors collect the taxes for crossing his lands from every traveler. Travelers attempting to travel cross country find themselves in trouble with wandering military patrols and the strange creatures that many wizards keep patrolling their grounds for exactly the purpose of keeping out trespassers.

Most of the land is under cultivation, but the lonely farmhouses seen in other lands are not found in Thay. All arable land is in the hands of the Wizards or Tharchions and their subordinates, and the farm workers (usually slaves) live in the central farming towns and hike or ride to their assigned fields.

This form of cultivation is not terribly efficient, but there is so much land under cultivation that Thay can still export some grains and fruits to neighboring lands.

There are no forests in Thay. The only trees are occasional copses of exotic species that decorate Zulkir-owned streams and decorative trees from other lands planted in the cities and towns.

Lake Mulsantir

This large body of water divides Thay and Rashemen, and is mostly a Rashemi lake. Thay occasionally attempts to gain ascendancy on the lake, but suffers from the simple problem of having little wood with which to build warships. The Witchboats of Rashemen are too much for the Wizards to match without decent wood for their ships.

The River Thay

This river runs between Lake Mulsantir and Lake Thaylambar, and is navigable almost its entire length. Because of this navigability, there is not the extensive road network in northern Thay that is found in the southern Tharches. Instead, everyone uses the river. The land between the River Thay and the much-less-navigable River Gauros is a mass of slave-farms and wizard towers divided by dirt paths. The main centers of population are along the river.

The Long Portage

This is the one part of the River Thay that cannot be traversed upstream. The River comes down off the First Escarpment to the level of Lake Mulsantir down a gentle decline that does not stop boats from traveling downstream, but is too rough and fast to pole or row boats upstream.

For about a century after Thay became a nation, the Guild of Portagers charged exorbitant rates to haul vessels up the river. Then the Wizard Shevas Tam (father of the current Zulkir of the School of Necromancy) was confronted with a demanding chief of the Guild and killed him. Shevas Tam then had his minions slaughter most of the Guild members and Shevas Tam turned them into zombies.

Now the Guild consists of the zombies of the original Guild and any replacements needed (acquired through criminals put to death in Surthay and Eltabbar) as the zombies wear out. The Tam family maintains the zombies and collects a modest fee from each traveler.

The fee might be higher, but the family has little attention to spare for this enterprise, and really hasn't checked to see if the "Guild" is paying for itself lately.

Lake Thaylambor

This very large lake is in central Thay. The former Mulhorand capital of Delhurnide and the current capital of Eltabbar are on opposite sides of the lake.

The lake is said to contain dragon turtles, and fishing boats sometimes disappear forever. Weather control spells keep storms from disturbing the water, so some beast such as dragon turtles may be responsible. The Tharchions of Eltabbar and Delhumide sometimes lead hunting expeditions into the depths and come back with something, minus some boats and followers.

Surmarsh

This large marsh is fed by both the River Sur and River Thay, and is a nightmarish bog broken up by occasional hummocks of high ground and small huts of refugee slaves and criminals who eke out an existence as best they can.

One menace all must deal with in this bog are the lizard men who hold sway as they do in so many of the swamps they have been driven to since man first arrived in the Realms.

These lizard men are divided up into tribes and occasionally raid outside the swamp, but mostly they hold to treaties they have made with the Tharchion of Surthay.

Sometimes they will try to hunt up a runaway slave or criminal that the Thayvians are particularly anxious to catch, but their main function in the alliance is to hold the marsh against invaders. Since the only possible invaders are the people of Thesk, they are not often called on to fulfill their part of the bargain.

The River Sur

This wide, shallow, and fever-infested river is usually considered the border between Thay and Thesk, though no one but assorted Thesk-allied herders grazing their cattle inhabit the area between this river and the Theskian Mountains. The villages that can be found along the river are small farming and fishing villages who trade with the nomads and pay occasional taxes to Thay tax collectors.

Thaymount

These mountains poke out of the plain of the Priador and form the Second Escarpment and the source of the Rivers Umber, Eltab and Laprendrar. In times of weakness, the western border of Thay is the Second Escarpment down to where it intersects the River Laprendrar. These mountains are always known as the Guardpost of the Western Borders, and act as the headquarters for the Tharch of the Thaymount.

The Gold Mines of Thay

The Thaymount is a volcanic region and much newer geologically than the ancient Sunrise Mountains. Part of what the volcanoes brought up to the surface are extensive veins of gold ore, which were discovered by the rebellious Red Wizards and exploited as funding for their revolution against Mulhorand.

Since that time, the gold mines have been a major source of Thayvian wealth. They traditionally fall under the purview of the Tharchion of Thaymount, and he pays a fixed tax on the gold to the Zulkirs. Thus, the more he can get out of the mines, the more he can keep, and if the mines run out of gold, he is still stuck with the tax payments.

Like so much of Thay, the mines are worked by slaves. Being a slave in the mines of Thay is considered among the worst possible fates for a Thayvian slave, whose position is never enviable.

The Citadel

This ancient fortress was part of the Thaymount when the Kingdom of Raumathar first claimed the land in the previous age. Who built it and why is still unknown, though various Red Wizards have sent missions deep into its bowels to try to learn its secrets. As best as anyone can tell from the subject of some of its very faded wall paintings, it might have originally been built by lizard men, before they were driven into the swamps by mankind so many thousands of years ago.

Parties exploring the Citadel's deepest dungeons have found great treasures, but many have never returned. There is some evidence that there is an extensive troglodyte population somewhere in its deepest reaches, and the drow may have a colony there.

The River Umber

The River Umber tumbles out of the Thaymount as a narrow, fast, stream of little use to anyone except as a source of water to the few slave farms owned by the Tharchion of Thaymount and his followers.

Once it cascades down from the Second Escarpment to the plains of the Priador, it slows down and widens out into the narrow lake called only The Upper Lake Umber. This is a largely unpopulated area as it is claimed by both Thay and Aglarond, and only a few fisher families live along its length.

From this lake, the Lower Falls takes the water to the main body of Lake Umber, which has the unwalled trading towns of Nethentir and Nethjet on its north and south shores, respectively.

This area is continuously being fought over by Thay and Aglarond, and has just changed hands again with the current advent of the armies of Thay. There are very few farms except for subsistence farms used to supplement the diet of the inhabitants. Most of the local residents are fishermen who try to ignore whoever claims to be their masters.

The River ElTab

It is said that this river did not exist before Thay won its freedom from Mulhorand, and its creation was part of the spell which summoned a demon prince to help the Red Wizards.

Whatever the truth of this story, the river supplies the water of the city and helps create its unique waterways before it goes on to feed Lake Thaylambur.

Sunrise Mountains

This mountain chain has always been the eastern border of Thay. These mountains have a reputation for impassibility, but it is actually possible to get past them in summer though not with anything bigger than a donkey. Beyond the mountains are arid plains, called the Plains of Purple Dust for reasons that are obvious if you look at them. No one has entered them and come back.

To the east of Thay and Rashemen, to the north of the Plains of Purple Dust, are reputed to be the lands of Raurin and Durpar, known from annals of trading agreements from the days of Narfell and Raumathar. No one has been seen from these lands for centuries.

The River Thazarim

In the days of Mulhorand's rule of this area, this river, between the falls where it comes off the Sunrise Escarpment to the falls from which it tumbles off the First Escarpment, was the core of a fertile farming area. Slave farms still populate the western bank of the river, but the eastern bank is devastated and abandoned, still desolate after the battle that created Thay as a separate nation.

The river itself is used as a travelway along its length between the Escarpments, but the steep falls at each end of this length make boat travel impossible without portaging the river craft. The lower reaches of the river support some slave farms on the west bank and continue the devastated state on the eastern bank. Upstream, the river is narrow, fast, and rocky-impossible to travel on muscle-powered boats. The area upstream is largely unpopulated except for one trading and last-minute supplies village situated on the Sunrise Escarpment, just above the falls.

Alamber or Sahuagin Sea

This body of water is the easternmost part of the Inner Sea. It serves as the border between the ancient kingdoms of Mulhorand and Unther, and is the home of a major sahuagin kingdom, whom the Red Wizards are on at least speaking terms with.

The northernmost island of the Sea is the Aldor, which is the Thayvian naval base. Currently, the dominant naval and merchant power in this area is Thay; both Unther and Mulhorand merchants find it more convenient to ship their goods in Thayvian hulls and accept Thayvian payments for their goods than build their own ships and find their own markets.

However, there are pirates in the area that live in small, secluded villages along the coast of Thay and Mulhorand and on the smaller islands to the south of Aldor. They prey on the smaller coastal trading vessels and occasionally surprise the crews of larger vessels who bring their ships into shore to camp for the night or make emergency repairs. When the Thayvian navy finds and raids one of the pirate villages, the pirates attempt to pass themselves off as fishermen. Sometimes they are successful at this deception, and sometimes the Thayvian marines don't really care and capture and enslave the population of the fishing village anyway—even if it turns out to be just a fishing village.

Piracy on the Alamber is a tricky profession, but the potential rewards are great. By now, pirates have learned to avoid any ship flying the red-and-gold-flame-on-black banner of a Red Wizard unless their spies have indicated that the banner is a ruse.

The River Laprendar

This is the second longest river in the area, and the longest in Thay. It is known as the River of Sorrows because of the miners who have died in the gold mines near its headwaters and because of the men of Aglarond and Thay who died trying to cross or defend the river during Halacar's ill-fated invasion of Thay in 1260 DR.

The Escarpments and The Priador

Thay is broken up into three distinct rises from the ground level of the other surrounding kingdoms. Each is marked by a sudden sharp rise, called an Escarpment, out of the relatively flat plain surrounding it. These Escarpments are not completely vertical, and most are easily climbable, but the incline is very precipitous compared to the surrounding countryside. The easiest inclines are those around some of the rivers, though others are still very steep falls, and where the main roads of southern Thay were built centuries ago.

The Priador is the name for the gently rolling plain that tops the First Escarpment. It is broken only by the various rivers and Lake Thaylambur, and is the central area of Thay. The entire region is broken up into thousands of slave farms and small wilderness areas kept as private game preserves by the Red Wizards and Tharchions.

These game preserves are full of monsters that the Wizards need for spell and potion ingredients, and most of them have no bounds on where they can travel, so travel anywhere around these preserves can be very hazardous.

Travelers who are accosted by such monsters are usually allowed to defend themselves as best they can, but there is no liability to the owner if his monsters kill someone (though, of course, this sort of thing has caused intense feuds when the victims were members of an influential family and the monster's owner refused any or adequate recompense). And, of course, sometimes travelers who are successful in defending themselves may incur the wrath of the owner if the monster was an especially prized or hard to replace species.

Main Cities

Eltabbar

Though it is the capital of the country, and the residence of at least half the Red Wizards, it is the second largest city of the land. Its population is between 80,000 and 100,000 people, about half of whom are the slaves of the Tharchioness and the Red Wizards in residence. Merchants and other non-government non-magic-users are less than enthused about sharing a city with so many paranoid magic-users, and prefer to do business in Bezantur.

The city is walled, with very few buildings outside the walls. The River Eltab comes in under the walls and provides a central core of canals that divide the government area of the town from the business and residence area. The spaces between the canals are divided up into parks, each of which is owned wholly or in part by one of the Red Wizards or the Tharchioness.

Streets are wide and relatively straight here. Distances are easily measured, which encourages people to try to map the town, with results as specified below. There is also an extensive surreptitious trade in "maps of the city," which are erroneous at best, deceptive at worst.

Mapping the city is a problem because it is built in the form of an immense glyph. This is actually the symbol that keeps the demon prince Eltab imprisoned and available to the Red Wizards. This was a mighty magic devised by Jorgmacdon, the first Zulkir of the School of Conjuraton, and his family is still powerful in the country, even though it has not produced anyone to match him since that time.

Whether the canals are part of the glyph holding the Demon Prince, or perhaps the presence of the water itself is necessary to the spell holding him, is not common knowledge. The DM can make his own decision here.

Because the shape of the city is actually the glyph holding Eltab prisoner, it is illegal and severely punished for anyone to make a map of Eltabbar. If someone actually manages to draw an exact map, and then the map is destroyed, it weakens the bonds on Eltab. Each map made divides up the power of the binding further among all the maps and the streets themselves. If enough maps are destroyed, Eltab is freed, and his likely actions could destroy a large section of the Forgotten Realms, Thay not the least among them.

The official explanation for this ban on maps of Eltabbar is a matter of security. If someone knows how the city is laid out, they can invade it more easily. This logic has since progressed to an edict forbidding the mapping of any city of Thay.

The Zulkirs are on the alert for maps made of Eltabbar, and confiscate any they can find. Maps that have been confiscated are kept in the Wizard's Tower, under great wards of protection and stasis to keep them safe.

The city is frequently disturbed by rumblings and shakings. Non-wizard residents think them simple earthquakes. The Red Wizards know that someone has destroyed another map of Eltabbar.

Bezantur

This port was first known as Kensten when it was the southern port of Raumathar. It was destroyed in the war between Narfell and Raumathar and Mulhorand rebuilt it as Bezantur to be a seaport on the same site. While there is no river access to this port (aside from some streams coming down from the First Escarpment), as there is with Escalant to the west, the natural harbor is the best on the coast, with ample depth for the largest ship and protection from the fiercest storms for over a hundred ships.

Bezantur is the largest city of the realm. The population, which has never been counted as long as Thay has owned the city, is somewhat in excess of 100,000 people. Far-travelers who have seen Waterdeep compare the two as being almost equal in size, but each traveler has his own idea as to which is larger.

Most seaborne merchants bring their goods for Thay through this bustling port. It is easily the most cosmopolitan of Thayvian cities.

The city is built around its harbor and enclosed by walls that do not encompass the extensive market town that has taken shape outside its walls. The walls do not cover the actual waterfront, the entrance to the harbor is guarded with forts. The central citadel is fully walled.

Bezantur is also known as "The City of a Thousand Temples," and "The Free City." The first reference is to the large number of churches (though not really a thousand) to different deities that can be found everywhere in the city, catering to the needs of the many travelers who stop in. Elsewhere, temples and clerics are not supported by the authorities, so Bezantur is by far the "holiest" city of the Realm. The other name comes from the tax-free nature of the city, where no one is taxed, and everyone is prey to the thieves. See the Politics section for further explanation of this situation.

Tyranturos

This trading town was built by Mulhorand, and is the third largest city of the realm. This is the crossroads city where the High Road from Eltabbar to Bezantur meets the Eastern Way from Amruthar to Pyarados. Most goods going through southern Thay pass through this caravan town, but not much of it stays there (except for the taxes collected by the Tharchion). From here goods go to and from Bezantur, Pyarados, Amruthar, and Eltabbar.

This city is not walled, though there are fortified manors and a central walled citadel. Its market is famed throughout the East as "the place where anything, or anyone, can be bought." This refers to, among other things, the extensive slave market that happens every day in the central market area of the town.

Pyarados

This is a relatively new city, The City of the East, built by Thay and nestled under the shadow of the Sunrise Mountains and controlling the upper reaches of River Thazarim and the guardian of the Thazalhar Battle Plain. Adventurers getting ready to explore the Sunrise Mountains (and who can obtain official permission) outfit here at exorbitant prices.

This is a large city, with over 50,000 people, and only the central area of the city is guarded by a wall, which is supplemented by that around the fortress of the Tharchion.

Surthay

This is another new city, built to guard Lake Mulsantir against the invasions from Rashemen that the Red Wizards fear from that notably non-aggressive country. Once the Rashemi were seen to be homebodies, Surthay became the stepping off point for many military invasions of Rashemen. At this point, the Red Wizards have not learned the folly of these expeditions.

Despite its position on the lake, Surthay is not really set up as a port city. There is access from the lake to the central marina of the city, but the good natural harbor has not been properly exploited. This is because the Witches of Rashemen still control most of the lake, and tend to sink most Thayvian vessels they encounter. Only Thayvian fishing vessels that hug the southern shore have any survivability on Lake Mulsantir.

Surthay contains about 40,000 people and slaves, and is walled very strongly with high walls and many towers carrying siege engines. There are no outlying buildings permitted around Surthay. Most of the primary wizards of the School of Abjuration have towers here or in the immediate area.

The Ruins of Delhumide

This was the capital of the province when it was part of Mulhorand and a major city of Raumathar before that. One of the god-kings had his seat there, though he was not there (the usual situation) when the Red Wizards first unleashed their controlled Demon Prince and sent him against the holy guardians of the city. When the demon won the struggle, Delhumide was a ruin, and the rule of the god-kings in the north was broken.

Now the city is a broken ruin, with no buildings of more than one story intact. The inhabitants are the armed forces of the Tharchion of Delhumide, various parties of researchers and explorers, and the remaining magical guardians left by the previous owners. These latter are supplemented by denizens of the earth who have begun investigating the extensive dungeons underneath the ruins and made life very interesting for the Thayvian explorers.

The High Road and The Eastern Way

These two roads were built by Mulhorand along the same model as the major roads in that sleeping kingdom. The Red Wizards have maintained these roads better than the god-kings have maintained theirs.

The roads are elevated from the surrounding land and made of hard packed earth covered with paving materials that owe as much to alchemy as common craft. The surface is hard and fast, letting the horsemen of Thay move quickly from spot to spot along it, and letting commerce move quickly as well.

Using the roads is such a benefit in Southern Thay that most merchants don't mind that the roads make the tax stations that much harder to avoid.

The Tax Stations

All along the rivers and roads of Thay are a series of villages about one day's travel apart. These are built around military posts and generally feature a defensible tower and a garrison of about 30 men at arms. These stations tend to accumulate hangers-on, so that thriving villages now surround them, usually featuring at least one inn or tavern and several people providing other services for travelers such as a smithy, a wheelwright, a livery stable, and so forth. This is one of the few openings for private enterprise in Thay, and craftsmen make full use of this opportunity.

Tax stations were built by the Zulkirs but each is maintained by the Red Wizard or Tharchion most concerned with the area. Each tax station takes its toll of travelers for upkeep of the roads and the garrison also arranges for road repairs or, on the rivers, upkeep of docks and other facilities. The workers on these jobs are not the residents of the village, but the slaves from whatever local slave-farm is appropriate.

Surrounding Realms

The geography of Thay is as constrained as much by the boundaries of the lands around it as it is by its own physical features.

Aglarond

A small realm that keeps to itself, Aglarond exerts little influence in affairs of state outside its borders. It is important in the overall balance of the Inner Seas lands, however, simply because its presence prevents Thay from overwhelming the northern "East". Aglarond's strength—and danger, because she stands in magical opposition to the Red Wizards of Thay, who do not kindly suffer rivals—is its current ruler, a female archmage of fabled powers, known only as The Simbul.

Aglarond lies on the northern side of a peninsula jutting out into the eastern end of the Inner Sea; a sparsely inhabited, heavily-wooded realm of few farms and no large cities. Jagged pinnacles of rock stand at its tip, and run along the spine of its lands; to the east, these fall away into vast and treacherous marshes that largely isolate the Simbul's realm from the mainland. Travel in Aglarond is by griffon, ship, or forest trails. It trades lumber, gems, and some copper for glass, iron, cloth goods, and food when freetrading vessels come to port—but sends out no trading vessels of its own. The ships of Aglarond are fishing vessels and the few small biremes and triremes of its navy.

The southern border of the nation is the southern reaches of the Yuirwood, the woods in which the elves lived that became part of Aglarond's unique half-elven heritage. To the south of the Yuirwood are the independent Cities of the North Coast.

Aglarond cannot boast a field army of any size, nor a powerful navy, but within its woods The Simbul's foresters are expert and deadly troops, adept at fire-fighting and at using "coastboats" (long, canoe-like open boats handled with lateen sails, oars, and poles) to raid by night. They are equally adept at traveling in the treetops and fighting amongst them.

The foresters are alert and grim; the menacing might of Thay is uncomfortably near, and Aglarond's blades are all too few.

Little is known of the Simbul's aims and true strength, but she is seen to constantly roam the northern Realms, working to influence all manner of events (presumably to better Aglarond's safety, although she is said to be a member of the Harpers, whose aims are more widespread) in disguise, or behind the scenes.

Impiltur

This young land comprises the area across the Easting Reach from Telflamm and Thesk and Aglarond. It has no contiguous borders with Thay, but it is a friend of most of the nations that do border Thay, and supports them in their wars against the Red Wizards.

Impiltur's neighbors are Lothchas the bandit lord in the Desertspire Mountains and the Ice Gorge to the west, where the hobgoblins lived until their power was broken by Impiltur, and to the east and north the Great Dale and the woods to the north of it. In the open wastes where Narfell once flourished dwells the Nentyarch, a mysterious mage of great power who rules grim men and strange beasts, living in peace—unless the wood is entered by those he has not invited; these simply vanish. This area is known as Ashanath and little more is known of it.

Telflamm

This city-state comprises the city of Telflamm and the subject-cities of Syth and Culmaster. Its prosperity rests in being one of the terminal cities of the Golden Way and its excellent port, which makes it the favored terminal, even though goods have a higher price because they must pass out of the realm

FOREST

EASTING RIVER

Sea of Fallen Stars

ALTUMBEL

AGLAROND

YALWOOD

LYNDAVA

WILLOW

THANWICH

DRYAN

NOVICH

RIVER

MYTH

EMER

CASTLE

PIRE

INVA

CUMBER

CLAW

Cape Dismal

The Falls of River Ford

PHILAN

DABEL

WILLOW

OSER

EMER

CHILL

FANTASY

DRINK

WILLOW

USER

COAST

UNDEAD

MEETING

WINDY

WINDY'S

WINDY

MALDEN

DEATH

WINDY

LATHAM

COIN

CLAW

LATHAM

ALTON

TESK

THAYMOUNT

THAY

The Priador

THE WIZARD'S REACH

Cokashim

Cokashim

Teeth-on-the-Mountain

Barrows

Lake Mearns

Nictich

Nictich

Awasthor

Kithwood

Ruins of Dithumide

Lake Thonassa

Cokashim

Barrows

Phandalon

Phandalon

Phandalon

Cokashim

Phandalon

of Thesk to reach Telflamm.

Despite an ongoing trade rivalry, Telflamm and Thesk are allies in many things, and Telflamm supports Thesk in its struggles with Thay, since Telflamm would have no chance if Thay were its neighbor.

Telflamm is a walled city of perhaps 20,000 population. Much of it is transient, as Telflamm is a favorite spot of debarkation to the East or embarkation for the West. People looking for the assistance of adventurers often come to Telflamm and adventurers go there looking for patrons.

The army of Telflamm is entirely mercenary and used solely for patrolling its roads and keeping the city and its dependents safe. If called on to support Thesk militarily, the coffers of the city would be opened to buy more mercenaries to help their ally. Their own troops would stay to defend the home front.

Thesk

This is the land between Aglarond and Impiltur. The government of this land is an oligarchy made up of the rules of the trading cities along the Golden Way from Two-Stars to Milvarune which acts as a capital (mostly because it is so far removed from Thay). The nomadic tribes who run their flocks in the Thesk Mountains in the center of the land and the plains around the mountains also protect the cities by acting as a thorn in the side of any invading army from Thay. Their tactics are ideally suited to hit-and-run and they work in such a scattered fashion that mass destruction spells cannot damage very many at a time.

It is against foes like these that Thay has developed its cavalry, but the nomads are still capable of riding rings around any Thayvian unit.

The nomad magic users are mostly shamans, but shamans who have grown in power (perhaps because of the proximity to Thay) so that they are equivalent to Druids. They have many of the same spells as druids, with some differences because of their plains and hills existence.

However, the courage and skill of the nomads and shamans, and the mercenaries from the trade towns and cities are not the main reason Thay has not conquered the place. In fact, the military-minded leaders of Thay are aware that conquering Thesk would leave them with very vulnerable flanks to Rashemen and Aglarond. The Red Wizard policy is to secure the flanks first.

Mulhorand

This ancient empire has been in existence for over four thousand years, and its borders have fluctuated for most of that time. However, since Thay broke away about four hundred years ago, the borders of Mulhorand have remained much the same.

Almost the entire east coast of the Alamber Sea is under the sway of Mulhorand. From the River of the Dawn in the North to the River of Swords in the south, the god-kings of Mulhorand hold their lands in a slothful grip. To the north of the capital of Skuld, City of Shadows, only Sultim is a major city. The rest of the land is mostly farmlands occasionally broken by small towns like the crossroads town of Maerlor and the ford-town of Rauthil.

Below Skuld, there are many cities including Gheldaneth and Neldorild. All of these cities are full of monolithic buildings of white stone and the prayer-towers of the god-kings, all surrounded by the squalid huts of the slaves and lower classes. The cities are surrounded by gigantic walls patrolled by mercenary soldiers from Chessenta.

Rashemen

This is the easternmost of the known Realms. It has been dubbed "The Far Land" by merchants of the Western Realms. To its east lie uncounted leagues of rock-and-grass wastelands, and several rumored—but unreached in recent memory—kingdoms of men.

The land of Rashemen is home to a race of short, muscular men who herd goats and rothe', and are adept at stone-and bonecarving.

"Land of Berserkers" some ballads call Rashemen—and indeed, such is the fearless savagery of its warriors, and their stamina, that at least sixteen armies from Thay have been slaughtered or turned back from Rashemen in the last seventy winters, and the Far Land remains free.

Rashemen is ruled by a Huhrong (Iron Lord), or senior war leader, whose palace towers above the roofs of the surrounding city of Immilmar. The Iron Lord commands Rashemen's standing army, which consists of warriors armored in heavy fur and leather tunics, with hand weapons, short bows, lances and mountain ponies. Most patrol the border with Thay—the shores of Lake Mulsantir and the broken lands east of the Gorge of Gauros.

There are many lesser lords, each with his own followers and businesses—but the succession of rulership, and the posts of warleaders of the army, are chosen by the Witches. The Witches dwell mainly in Urling, and provide sorcerous, unmanned, boats (the feared "Witchboats") that patrol Ashane, the Lake of Tears, as far north as the Pool of Erech, and the Mulsantir-waters as far south as Surmarsh and the harbor chains of Surthay, unleashing fell beasts and poisonous gases upon the vessels of Thay.

The Witches also govern the common warriors of Rashemen through the making of "jhuild" (firewine), the potent amber drink that the warriors of the land imbibe heavily before fighting. The Witches are believed to all be female, are known to be over sixty (and probably over a hundred) in number, wear black robes and face-masks, bear magical rings, wands, and whips, and have much-feared (but largely unknown) magical powers.

The continued existence of Rashemen speaks of the real magical power of the Witches. Witches are worshipped and revered in Rashemen—it is death to harm or disobey a Witch—and are known to seek out land take men as lovers for brief periods, presumably as some sort of planned breeding program. If Witches leave Rashemen, they must abandon their black garb and conceal their powers, but none are known to have done so.

Wool, furs, and carved stone and bone—and rare, much-prized casks of firewine (which deadens pain and inflames lust and other aggressive emotions)—are the trade goods of Rashemen; in return cloth and woodwork, lumber and foodstuffs are imported. There are three trade routes from the Far Land: the Long Road to the North, via the Great Dale to the West, and the Golden Way to the southwest. Rashemen is self-sufficient in war-metals and northern herd animals, and makes much heavy, smoky-flavored cheese for use within its borders (the stuff is very nourishing, but an acquired taste, and little-exported).

Snow-racing (naked and afoot, across country) and the hunting of snow-cats are popular sports among both sexes in Rashemen; widespread hobbies include the collecting of rare and beautiful stones (including gems), exploring old ruins in the north of the realm (remnants of a previous kingdom, Raumathar, neighbor—and foe—of the more famous, but equally vanished, realm of Narfell, that lay to the west), and going on “growing up” trips out of Rashemen—a journey that every male of the realm makes when a youth. If he comes back to Rashemen, such a journeyer is considered a man. For most, the dajemma (or journey) is a sightseeing tour around the Inner Sea Lands, but the cumulative effect of the dajemas is to build trading contacts, pick up a lot of incidental information about the Inner Sea Lands, and gain continuous news of politics (and military activities) in the Inner Sea region.

Sages, merchants, and mercenary captains generally agree that Rashemen has no designs upon the lands around; like most of Thay’s neighbors, its primary concern is survival. Rashemen’s warriors are to be feared—but they are seldom encountered outside the Far Land save as drunken youths “on dajemma,” and do not have the reputation of, say, the mercenary companies of the Sword Coast lands, or the Black Helms of Tethyr. For most inhabitants of the Inner Sea lands and Sword Coast, the Far Land remains a mysterious land much sung of in minstrel’s tales, as the setting for this or that feat of brawn.

The total population of Rashemen is no more than 100,000 people, but they abhor slavery and every person is a free citizen of the country.

City of Amruthar

This theoretically independent city rests just over the River of Sorrows (Lapendrar) from the core area of Thay. At some times it has been almost entirely encircled by Thay’s lands, but it maintains its own government—a puppet of Thay’s.

The city is well-walled and actively patrolled by the soldiers of the ruler, called the Heirarch. He has a Council of the most influential people of the city, who are divided up into several political factions described elsewhere.

About 30,000 people live in Amruthar and the farming villages within a day’s ride of the city.

The Cities of The Coast

Most of these nine “cities” were founded by Unther when it tried to expand into this area. Now they are independent trading towns, all trying to vie against Thay’s Bezantur and each other for the cross-sea trade from Chessenta. The western cities of Delthuntle and Laothkund are the largest of the lot, with populations around 70,000 each—almost the size of Bezantur. Hilbrand and Escalant of the east have some pretensions to competition with Bezantur in trade, but no chance of competition in size. They have perhaps 30,000 inhabitants each. The rest of the “cities” are actually unwalled towns of between 5,000 and 15,000 people.

Most of the smaller “cities” of the east, such as Lasdur, Taskaunt, Murbant, an Thasselen have been attacked and captured or destroyed by Thay at one time or another in their histories, and Escalant and Hilbrand have each been burred to the ground once. At this time, Hilbrand has just surrendered to the Tharchion of the Lapendrar and Escalant is under siege by fire elementals.

The coast also has several other villages which are mostly fishing villages and owe allegiance (or at least tax money) to one or another of the larger towns.

Thazalhar

This devastated barren buffer zone between Thay and Mulhorand is bordered by the River Tazarim to the west and north and the River of the Dawn to the south. The Sunrise Mountains are its eastern border. There are no regular residents except for the Tharchion of the region and his troopers. Trading caravans and raiders of trading caravans traverse it, and most goods go by sea on the far safer Bezantur-to-Sultim route.

Its short coastline is home for several pirate families that prey on the smaller vessels of that trade.

CURRENT ECONOMY OF THAY

Thay is a slave-based, agrarian economy. Most of the foodstuffs produced are grown on slave-run farms owned by the great lords of the nation. The individual free farmer found in most parts of the Western countries is unknown in Thay. The closest thing to this form of crop care is the small subsistence gardens grown by some town dwellers in window boxes and planter boxes on their roofs.

The great farms grow several different forms of wheat, orchards full of fruit (mostly citrus) and pastures full of cattle. Because these farms are slave-run, they are not very efficient, but usually make up in bulk produced what they lose in quality of care.

Because of the number of wizards in Thay, many of whom are land-holders, there is rarely drought in Thay. In fact, surrounding nations often have excessive droughts in those dry years when the overwhelming wizardry of Thay (and, to a lesser extent, the Witchcraft of Rashemen) draws whatever stormclouds are available anywhere in the Inner Sea region to the fields of the Red Wizards. For this reason, Thay is often the breadbasket of the entire eastern Inner Sea region.

Nations and city states that normally would have no relationship with Thay must deal with the agents of the Zulkirs to get the grain they need to feed their people. Telflamm and Thesk, especially, populous city-states that import most of their grains and produce in the best of years, must often come hat-in-hand to the Red Wizards for their food.

If the agriculture of Thay were under the control of the government of Thay, the Red Wizards would own the eastern Inner Sea economically if not politically. However, despite the fact that the landholders of Thay are the government of Thay, agriculture is not an instrument of government policy. Each Red Wizard and Tharchion is his own agent, and they often compete for foreign orders, so conquering the Inner Sea through the stomachs of its people has not taken place, much to the relief of the sages who study matters economic.

Thay is a major market for slaves to run its farms and serve other functions. Every slaverunner in the Realms dreams of selling his coffle of slaves in Eltabbar. Because the wizards need every slave they can get, Thay does not export slaves. There is no record of anyone (perhaps the family of a slave kidnapped into servitude) successfully buying back a Thayvian slave. There are stories of people trying to buy back a slave and becoming slaves themselves.

Slaves do escape, and some are rescued by friends and family, but once a slave has been purchased in Thay, he can never legally (according to Thay laws) be a free man again. Slaves cannot be manumitted. They can be retired to lives of leisure if they have pleased their masters greatly, or turned out of the estates of their master for some transgression, but they are still slaves. If found running around free, they can be enslaved by any free person who finds them.

The Crafts of Thay

The Red Wizards have two other exports of value. One is the gold from the mines of the Thaymount and along the Umber and Lapendrar rivers. The Lapendrar river at least partially gains its name of "The River of Sorrows" because of the laments of the families of the miners lost along its shores in the wizard-owned mines. The name also derives from the sorrow of the families of Aglarondan soldiers who died in King Halacar's ill-starred invasion of Thay, when half the army was drowned in a wizard-caused flash flood that caught them in the middle of the river.

Thay also has silver and platinum mines in both the Thaymount and the Sunrise Mountains, and good sources of copper and iron. There are even sources of assorted gems and precious stones such as jade.

The other major Thayvian export is tied into both the mines and the rich variety of animals, both natural and monsterish, that inhabit the Realm. The craftsmen of Thay have little opportunity to work with wood (some specialists carve and work imported wood), but their carving and joining of the bone of exotic beasts, such as the dragon turtles of Lake Thaylambar, and inlaying of their creations with the precious metals of Thay, creates artwork that is admired and coveted in all the Realms.

Some Wizards enhance the work of their craftsmen with magic, creating magical items that are also desired everywhere. Nothing they export is of much use militarily, but some items, such as crystal statuettes that glow in the dark, are useful for adventurers. The Wizards specialize in enchanting objects with cantrips.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL

The Red Wizards have made two rules that are usually followed in their business dealings.

The first rule is that no enchanted item that has military usefulness may be sold outside the country or to a representative of some power outside the country. Thus, no magical offensive or defensive weaponry is sold. Items like the aforementioned glowing statuettes are in a gray area that is ignored at the moment, but could come under the ban if too many hostile adventuring bands showed up in Thay using them. Potions are another gray area which are usually ignored because their use is so limited and so little of any one potion can be produced at any one time.

The other rule is that Thayvians cannot sell food or items to citizens of nations that Thay is invading at the moment. This sometimes has resulted in flurries of sales to a nation such as Aglarond or Rashemen or Mulhorand just before the armies marched, and some invasions have been foiled because the sages of the soon-to-be-invaded nation saw this activity for the warning it was and warned their rulers of the invasion.

CURRENT POLITICS OF THAY

Regional Rulers

The land of Thay is divided up into 11 administrative regions, known as Tharches. Each is ruled by a Tharchion or Tharchioness, who is drawn from the nobility of Thay (see Society of Thay). In each region, the ruler's word is law, though each rules in a different way from his colleagues.

No Tharchion has ultimate authority for the nation, because that is in the hands of the Red Wizards. The authority of a Red Wizard supersedes even that of a Tharchion. The Red Wizards are a loose confederacy that rule the country as a whole; some of them take a particular interest in ruling or managing small parts of the country, others take no interest in anything outside of their own researches and adventuring.

The Red Wizards are evil and paranoid in the extreme. They seek to maintain their own power in their nation while undercutting the power of other realms, which they perceive as dangerous to their existence. Other magic-users who are not of their cult (especially those mages who are involved in ruling rival nations, particularly the Simbul of Aglarond) are viewed as threats to be eliminated. The total number of Red Wizards is unknown.

The Zulkirs

From among the politically interested wizards, the Red Wizards choose Zulkirs to speak for the Red Wizards. There is one Zulkir for each School of Magic, and once chosen they keep the position for life unless they voluntarily resign. The Zulkir for Necromancy, Szass Tam, withdrew from the company of his fellows some years ago and pursues his own devices—but he is still the Zulkir for Necromancy and no one can step forward to replace him.

Zulkirs are chosen from among those of the right School who want the job. They are not necessarily the most powerful of their School, just the one who wants to have something to do with running the country. If no one of a school wants the job, then the school is unrepresented.

The Zulkirs examine each candidate to make sure that he has the proper proficiency in general magic (i.e.; is a wizard—a magic-user of 11th level) If more than one candidate presents himself and seems qualified, he must contest against the other candidates in proficiency with his school's magic. For the wizards of divination, this is not a major problem; the one with the best answers wins the position.

However, contests in Conjunction/Summoning, Alteration, or Invocation/Evocation can be, and frequently are, deadly.

Badges

The Red Wizards and their minions use several badges; that most often seen outside Thay is a leaping red flame (outlined in gold) on a black or deep purple field.

Known Red Wizards found outside of Thay are not of less than 9th level and possibly as much as 15th level. There is a 50% chance of the wizard having bodyguards (usually ogres or other non-human creatures), and an equal chance of having 1-4 low-level (1-8) aspirants to the Red Cloth. The Red Wizards do not go in for subtlety, and wear their crimson robes haughtily in all but situations calling for the utmost discretion.

Besides "showing the flag", this display also serves to cover the activities of the Red Wizards, often of less than 9th level, who act as spies and agents provocateur in the Realms (see Personalities).

Political Factions

There are two major factions among the Red Wizards. The Imperialists are devoted to an expansionistic and imperialistic policy of swallowing neighbor states and eventually the entire Realms. They have attempted this many times, but they are invariably stopped. Many of the Imperialists blame their lack of success on the inactivity of the most potent Wizards of the realm, who happen to be the other major faction and are known as the Researchers.

These worthies believe the true vocation of the magic-user is research and careful application of the research to acquire new and more potent wizardries. While a Researcher might go adventuring or use his powers to help his own fortunes, as a group they are notoriously uninterested in assisting the land of Thay in conquest. Researchers are essentially selfish. If the enterprise does not benefit them directly, they have no interest in it.

Neither political faction is particularly organized, the Red Wizards are too paranoid and megalomaniacal for that. Many an Imperialist considers some Researcher a best friend and another Imperialist a bitter personal enemy. By their nature, Imperialists are more organized than the Researchers, but most adventuring bands are better organized than the "leadership" of the Imperialists.

The main leader of the Imperialists is Lauzoril, Zulkir of the School of Enchantment (see Personalities). He is not known generally to be a Zulkir, but his machinations have come to the attention of the Harpers, and sparked an enmity that is growing more intense as the years of enmity go on.

The main leader of the Researchers, as much as they have leaders, is Sabass of Thay (see Personalities).

Actually, the imperialist dreams of the Wizards have been hampered mainly by internal strife among various factions and personality cults among the Red Wizards, and by the fact that the cult neither trusts mercenaries or high-level adventurers who are not of their cult. Of the large number of invasions of Rashemen, three out of four have been by some particular faction leader of the wizards seeking to expand his domination at home by bringing victories from the field.

The Administration of Thay

As stated before, the day-to-day life of Thay is administered by 11 Tharchions and Tharchionesses. Each controls one Tharch. The Tharches of Thay are as follows:

The Tharch of Eltabbar. This Tharch controls the city of Eltabbar, Lake Thaylambar, and most of the fishing and trading villages around the lake, with one notable exception (see Tharch of Delhumide). The Tharchioness is a young woman whose outer beauty has given her the title of First Princess of Thay outside the Realm, though she officially has no more power than any of her 10 colleagues.

The Tharchioness is in an anomalous position, in that she controls the capital city of the Realm and is at the center of power, yet there are more Red Wizards in residence in this city than in any other part of the Realm, and these are mostly active wizards with an interest in how every part of the country is run, so she never knows when or in what field of her authority she is going to be overruled.

Her reaction to this situation has been to retreat to her palace and engage in flirtatious correspondence with the unattached rulers of several surrounding kingdoms. The day-to-day affairs of her Tharch are handled by her Autharches, who spend most of their time obeying the whims of whichever Red Wizard is interfering this week.

The Tharchioness is said to be a magic-user of some ability herself, of the School of Illusion, but is not thought to be of much beyond fifth level. She changes her name to suit the occasion or her whim. She was born Dmitra Flass, but she has long since foresworn any allegiance to that family.

The Tharch of Thaymount. This Tharch is mostly a military march. In times of peace and or retrenchment, its function is to guard the Thaymount (the mountains that rise out of the Priador in the western part of the Realm) and maintain the northern river traffic along the river Laprendar and guard the gold mines along the upper river. In times of invasion, such as now, the Tharchion also controls the area to the west of the Thaymount, specifically all the lands along the River Umber. At this time Autharches reporting to this Tharchion control the trading towns of Nethentir and Nethjet and patrol Lake Umber and the Umber river up to the Umber Marshes.

The current Tharchion of Thaymount is Spiros Dehkahks, a Lawful Evil fighter of the 12th level and a masterful general. He is supported by the Zulkir of Divination in his current military adventures. He rules from the Citadel of Thaymount, a fortified tower near the headwaters of the River Umber.

The Tharch of Tyraturos. This Tharch encompasses the town from which it takes its name and control of most of the Eastern Way, a paved highway running from Amruthar to Pyarados, and the High Road, a paved highway running from Eltabbar to Bezantur. In essence, the Tharchion of Tyraturos is the ruler of trade within southern Thay, and most tolls gathered on these roads go directly into his coffers. The Red Wizards tax him, rather than the merchants.

This Tharchion, Dimon of Tyraturos, is considered by many to be the most reasonable of the Tharchions. He is an intelligent man who understands that if trade dries up, he no longer has the income but must still pay his taxes. Therefore, he is no more oppressive to foreign traders and the merchants of Thay than the trade moguls of many other nations. The fact that he started his career as a merchant, and is the first member of his family to become a noble might have something to do with his attitudes.

The duties he imposes are no more oppressive than those of other nations, and his roving cavalry patrols are specifically instructed to expedite the problems of the merchants and make sure they do not go away dissatisfied. Some of the patrol leaders even perform their duties without bribes, but not many.

Non-merchants under his rule have different things to say about Dimon. He is as mercurial and paranoid as any of the rulers of Thay and he particularly dislikes adventurers, whom he considers "disruptive and bad for trade."

Dimon is rumored to be a low-ranking priest of Waukeen, though he officially decries this as a fabrication of his political enemies. He has never exhibited any ability as magic-user or fighter. Some rumors about label him a thief, but much the same is said about tax collectors all over the Realms.

The Tharch of Bezantur. Bezantur is the greatest city of Thay and the gateway to the southern Realms and most of the seaways. It is Thay's only seaport. Bezantur is a very cosmopolitan city, with elements of all the Realms represented.

The city is so large that the Tharch named for it encompasses only the city and the High Road up to the first toll station.

The Tharchioness of Bezantur, Mari Agneh, rules the city with a light but whimsical hand. Uniquely, she rules and gathers her taxes by theft. There are no tax collectors or customs officers at the docks to collect a percentage of a cargo. There are no bureaucrats waiting to be bribed. But every cargo that is conveyed anywhere on the docks or through the city, or stored in one of the hundred of warehouses, leaves Bezantur lighter than it entered. Dockworkers, warehousemen, porters, drayers, and random beggars are all members of the Thieves Guild, and Mari Agneh is the Upright Man of the Guild.

One might wonder why she bothers, as she could do the same thieving officially, but her heritage as a master thief probably has something to do with it. As a result of this policy of taxation by theft, the city watch is very slow to respond to any calls for assistance because of theft.

Free-lance thieves are, of course, strongly discouraged, but the discouraging is done by the Guild, not the watch. Calls for investigation of the murder of leather-clad men (the local Guild works unarmored) armed with daggers and shortswords are answered about as fast as theft calls.

Merchants who guard their goods excessively well find themselves and their guards arrested for a variety of trumped-up charges. Depending on how seriously they have thwarted the Tharchioness, they may either be released with apologies to find their goods well-pilfered or wind up on a slave coffle. Most merchants with any experience plan to lose a share of their goods as they pass through Bezantur.

The Tharch of Pyarados. Pyarados is the gateway to the Sunrise Mountains, and tends to have a large population of adventurers. The Tharchion is Valerios Theokillos, a neutral evil 10th level fighter-adventurer who is said to have slain the avatar of one of the god-kings of Mulhorand. Now he is a man in his sixties, and retired into the rule of this easternmost of Thayvian cities.

Adventurers wishing to enter the Sunrise Mountains must either carry gear for many miles through Thay, risking pilferage, or buy it in Pyarados. Valerios owns a part of every outfitting shop in the city. Prices for standard adventuring gear are high, often twice what is found in the Players Handbook and DMG. Every shop has the same price for the same goods. The one cut-rate shop sells used and shoddy goods with a good chance of failure at critical moments.

Valerios, of course, also keeps an eye on returning adventurers, with the intent of taxing them of useful items and loot. He does not take the best of the items (unless they would either be (a) useful to him or (b) dangerous to him or Thay in general), but he has a large hoard of minor magical items, which he sometimes uses as gifts to his aides to keep them loyal.

Certain of the Red Wizards are well aware of this scheme of taxation and visit Valerios frequently to gain the “gifts” he knows he has to give them to keep them from supplanting him with someone else.

The Tharch of Gauros. The Gorge of Gauros is one of the major areas of contention between Thay and the land of Rashemen. The Gorge is full of mineral deposits that are valuable to both countries, and it has been the scene of several battles between the two Realms.

This tharch is a military operation led by Tharchion Azhir Kren, a warrior woman of the 11th level, and essentially is in charge of patrolling the River Mulsantir and, particularly, the Gorge.

Azhir Kren is known to be cruel but fair in her dealings with her soldiers. Lately she has found a new way of keeping her soldiers in the field—the Zulkir of Necromancy has been taking her slain soldiers and turning them into zombies and skeletons. Now the two of them are attempting an invasion of Rashemen behind an army of zombies.

The Tharch of Delhumide. Delhumide is the ruin of the capital of Thay when it was a Mulhorand province. Before then, it was one of the great cities of Raumathar. The ruins are laden with incredible magics, and terrible monsters and booby-traps. The Tharch of Delhumide controls the town and the lake approaches, plus all the land to the east of Lake Thaylambar and to the south of the River Mulsantir.

However, Tharchion Mikal Canos, a 13th level lawful evil Lord, is primarily concerned with Delhumide. His troops stationed there are committed to keeping the monsters therein caught within the broken walls of the city. His duties are not made any easier by the frequent visits by Zulkirs and other Red Wizards who want to investigate the ruins in search of one exotic magical item or another they think might still be there.

The rest of his duties are mainly concerned with guarding the assorted slave-farms in his Tharch and reacting to invasions from Rashemen (rare) and slave revolts (common). Because of the area he must guard, Mikal normally has one of the largest military forces under arms at any one time, though the current spate of invasions has both drained his forces and caused the assorted invading Tharchions to hire most of the mercenaries in Thay—leaving Canos with a minimum force and no way to increase it.

The Tharch of Laprendar. It is somewhat presumptuous of the Red Wizards to label a Tharch with the name of a river they only hold most of one bank of, but such considerations have never stopped the Red Wizards before.

This Tharchion, Hargrid Tenslayer, a 9th level chaotic evil lord, is not Thayvian at all. He is from Thesk, but found the Thayllians much more to his liking after he was run out of Phsant for slaying the child of the heirarch there. He distinguished himself in an otherwise disastrous invasion of Rashemen and was made Autharch of Falls, the area where the Laprendar leaves the Priador to the lower plains, and the traditional border of Thay and the Coastal Cities.

When the Tharchion of the Laprendar died under mysterious circumstances (the usual Thayvian designation for death by poison), Hargrid was unanimously approved as his successor.

Now Hargrid has formed an alliance with the Zulkirs of Evocation and Conjuraton, who have managed to open a gate to the Plane of Fire and ravaged the coast cities of Thasselen, Murbant, Lasdur, and Taskaunt and most of the fishing villages in between.

The Tharch of Surthay. This is both a military and trade post. The Tharchion controls the city of Surthay, such parts of Lake Mulsantir Thay can wrest from Rashemen, the Surmarsh, and the River Thay up to last tax station before the one leading into Lake Thaylambar.

Tharchion Homen Odesseiron is a magic-user who retired early, before he could become a Red Wizard. However he studied in several of the schools, and is said to have a complete complement of spells in four different schools.

Because of Surthay's position of Defender of the North against the hordes of Rashemen (the likelihood of Rashemen conquering, or even wanting to conquer, Thay is very remote, but not to the paranoid masters of Thay), the Zulkir of the School of Abjuration makes this his particular concern, and his residence is found here.

This Tharch also includes the slave farms between the River Thay and River Mulsantir under its purview, and attempts to keep what trails are known in the Surmarsh under patrol.

The Tharch of Aldor. This small Tharch comprises the island in the Alamber Sea that serves as the main naval base of the Thayvian fleet. For a country with one seaport, Thay keeps a large number of warship keels afloat. This is the largest naval establishment, with the secondary, and only other, base in Bezantur.

The Tharchion of Aldor is Thessaloni Canos, sister of Mikal Canos and a 10th level lawful evil Lord. The Red Wizards recognized the quality of each of these commanders but also decided that putting them in close proximity would be hazardous to the health of their regime, so they are almost as far as possible apart as they can be without being in other countries.

The Tharch of Thazalhar. This is a purely military Tharch responsible for patrolling the trade roads between Pyarados and the Mulhorand border on the other side of the River of the Dawn. The Tharchion is Milsantos Daramos, a 7th level lawful evil fighter who commands three small troops of cavalry.

Their main purpose is to guard caravans and put down marauding monsters who may be accumulating a power base in the wasteland. Ostensibly, the Tharchion's seat is at Pyarados, but Milsantos has little love for Valerios, so he is mostly on the trail, camping at one of several familiar sites along the caravan path. His troops are known to be the hardest-riding and longest-enduring troopers in Thay, though their fighting ability is not outstanding.

Milsantos is known for charging way fees in gems and small items of value. He has no place to store vast quantities of coins, and keeps his treasure with him.

The Laws of Thay

Thay has no code of laws that rules its life. The Zulkirs make all pronouncements that affect the populace, and most of these are individual rulings on individual cases. Among their other duties, the Zulkirs are the high judges of Thay.

The law that rules the nation comes from the Tharchions and from tradition. Some of this tradition is taken from Mulhorand, the rest has developed over the centuries since Thay became a nation.

The following is a short description of the most important laws of Thay.

Laws about Murder

Every murder case is handled individually. Some Tharchions let their Autharches or even the constables on the streets administer justice in these cases. The most common punishment for common people is enslavement (a common punishment for any crime). If the murderer is someone such as an adventurer or a magic-user of some sort the usual punishment is death. Slaves who commit murder are punished (how heavily depends on how important the victim was) and either given back to their master or taken over by the government and sent off to the gold mines. Murder of a slave is not murder, it is theft.

Assuming the person in charge of dealing with murder cases takes the time to hear any arguments, any seemingly good reason for killing someone may be accepted, or the most obvious case of self-defense may get the killer sent to the gold mines.

Laws About Assault

There are no real laws about assault, unless the victim is an important member of society, in which case the assaulter may be slain out of hand or enslaved. Of course, the assaulter can be freed or punished depending on the relative importance of the victim to the assaulter.

Laws About Theft

Unlike many Realms, thieves are not branded and maimed in Thay. They are enslaved. This punishment can be handed out for something as unimportant as a loaf of bread. Particularly important thefts, such as that of a magical item from a wizard, can be punished with death. After all, who wants such an accomplished thief as a slave?

Civil Laws

Suits for redress and righting of commercial wrongs must be brought before the person in authority. This can be a Tharchion, an Autharch, or even a local Red Wizard. Most people try to avoid the justice of wizards, however, since they are said, correctly, to be somewhat whimsical in administering justice, and plaintiffs and defendants alike have been turned into frogs for disturbing a wizard with their petty problems. If there is a dispute between Tharchions, a panel of the Zulkirs hears the argument, and more than one Tharchion has lost life or current body as a judgement.

Disputes between wizards are settled between the wizards. There are no mechanisms for settling such disputes by any other method. If they cannot settle it by talk, they declare feud and people start dying. Sometimes one litigant decides that there is no settling the problem before the other does, and the first thing the other knows about the escalation is when he finds his breakfast has been poisoned.

For this reason, among others, most wizards are accomplished alchemists as well, specializing in poisons and anti-

(Continued on page 37)

PLAYERS' GUIDE TO THAY

Glossary of Things Thayvian

Aglarond – Neighboring country to the west. The population is mostly half-elves and the country is ruled by the mysterious Simbul.

Alamber Sea – Also called the Sahuagin Sea for the kingdom of those people that resides in the depths. This separates the ancient kingdoms of Mulhorand and Unther and is mostly plied by ships from Thay.

The Aldor – Island where the Wizards' Reach meets the Alamber Sea. The entire island is a naval base for the Red Wizards.

Altumbel – Peninsula holding the city of Spandeliyon, called the City of Pirates. Known as the least lawful city on the Inner Sea, it was founded by the refugees from Aglarond driven out by the half-elves who now rule the country.

Amruthar – Neutral city on the River Lapendrar. Not possessed by Thay, it acts as an entry port for goods going to Thay.

Assassins – Said to be the main political expeditors in Thay.

Autharch – Subsidiary noble, answerable to the Tharchion or Tharchioness who appointed him.

Bezantur – Seaport city of Thay, the largest city of that country, comparable to Waterdeep in size. "Ruled by thieves."

"Bread Basket of the East" – Another name for Thay, which supplies grain (at high prices) to most of the eastern Realms.

Chessenta – Collection of city-states on the south coast of the Wizards' Reach who rebelled from the ancient kingdom of Unther and now vacillate between open warfare and armed peace with one another. An excellent market for mercenaries.

The Citadel – Mighty fortification in the Thaymount, built by pre-human residents who are said to still reside in devolved form in its lowest dungeons.

Cities of the North Coast – Four cities and six towns, each independent but formed into a loose alliance of defense against the colossus of Thay. Currently, four of the smaller towns are in flames from an attack by Thay.

The cities are, from west to east, Delthuntle, Nethra, Teth, Laothkund, Hilbrand, Lasdur, Taskaunt, Escalant, Murbant, and Thasselen.

Delhumide – Ruined city that had been a capital of Thay in ancient times. Said to be laden with hidden magic.

Eltabbar – Capital city of Thay, a city of wizards. The Tharchioness is such a beauty that she is known as the First Princess of Thay (though only outside the country).

First Escarpment – Cliffs that form the plateau of the Priador. Forms part of the main border of Thay except in times of conquest.

Giants' Wall – Cyclopean wall erected by giants as a returned favor to the first king of Aglarond to defend the country from the incursions of Thay.

The Golden Way – A traderoad leading from the empires of the East through Rashemen to Thesk and Telflamm.

Impiltur – Young kingdom to the north and west of Thay. Ruled in fact by a council of lords in the name of the wizardess who wears the crown, who is named Sambryl.

Lapendrar – "River of Sorrows," so named because of the gold miners who have died working along its banks and the army from Aglarond that died in battle there. Forms the western boundary of much of Thay except in periods of conquest.

Lauzoril – Prominent Red Wizard who has declared a vendetta of sorts against the Harpers.

Mulhorand – Ancient empire of the god-kings south of Thay. The Red Wizards are said to have come from there.

Mulsantir – Lake and river that mark the northern boundary of Thay and the border between Thay and Rashemen.

Narfell – Ancient kingdom that sat between modern Impiltur and Rashemen. Its ruins are still rich.

Nentyarch – Wizard-ruler of the wilderness between Impiltur and Rashemen, where the ancient land of Narfell had its roots. Anyone entering the territory without the good will of this ruler does not return.

The Plain of Purple Dust – Desert on the east side of the Sunrise Mountains. Any lands on the other side of this desert are known only in ancient legend.

The Priador – Flat plateau on which most of Thay rests.

Pyarados – City of Thay. Jumping-off place for adventurers going into the Sunrise Mountains.

Rashemen – Country to the north of Thay, protected by the Witches of Rashemen.

Raumathar – Ancient kingdom that sat where Rashemen now is. Died in war of mutual elimination with Narfell.

Skuld – City of Shadows, capital of Mulhorand.

Slave Farms – The agriculture (except for kitchen gardens) of Thay takes place on these immense plantations which are owned by the Red Wizards and Tharchions of Thay.

Slavers— The scum of the Inner Seas are hired by Thay to kidnap citizens of other Realms to become slaves in Thay.

Slavery— Basis of the economy of Thay. Two-thirds of the people of the nation are slaves. No one in the Forgotten Realms wants to be a slave in Thay.

Sunrise Mountains— The eastern border of Thay. Virtually impassable. Said to be the home of lammasu and griffins.

Surmarsh— Extensive swamp area to the west of Lake Mulsantir between the Rivers Thay and Sur. Home of criminals, refugees, and lizard men who are allied with Thay.

Surthay— Northernmost city of Thay, a lakeport on Lake Mulsantir. The Northern Bulwark.

Szass Tam— The Zulkir of Necromancy in Thay. He is said to know undead as no one has known them before.

Telflamm— A city-state on the shore of the Easting Reach, one of the terminal points for the Golden Way. Ally and trading rival of Thesk.

Tharch— Political division of Thay, ruled by a Tharchion or Tharchioness.

Tharchion or Tharchioness— Ruler of a Tharch. Almost absolute rulers within their domains, but answerable to the Zulkirs.

Thay— The nation ruled by the Red Wizards. Cities of Thay include Eltabar, Bezantur, Tyraturos, Pyarados, and Surthay.

Thaymount— Small range of mountains, probably volcanic, that rise out of the Priador and form the West Wall of Thay when she has shrunk her borders in times of retreat. The Citadel guards these mountains, and the rivers Lapendrar, Umber, and Eltab are fed from their heights.

Thesk— An alliance of trading towns and cities along the western end of the Golden Way. The largest city and capital of the country is Milvarune. The other main city is Phsalt, city of sages. The other towns are Thassalra, Phent, Inkar, Tammarr, Two-stars, and Tezir-On-The-Marsh.

Tyraturos— Crossroads city of Thay, where the High Road and the Eastern Way meet. Sometimes called the “capital of Southern Thay”. The greatest interior markets of Thay happen here. The slave markets are particularly extensive.

Witches— The true rulers of Rashemen. It is said that only their magic has kept Rashemen free from domination by Thay.

Wizards’ Reach— The arm of the Inner Sea that divides Aglarond and Thay from the cities of Chessenta. The Cities of the North Coast are arranged along the north coast of this arm.

Yuirwood— Largest forest in the area of Thay. Former home of the Yuir elves, who are some of the progenitors of the half-elves of Aglarond. Now forms the border between Aglarond and the Cities of the North Coast.

Zulkirs— The Red Wizards who actually rule Thay. There are said to be eight Zulkirs, one for each school of magic. The actual names of these wizards are not usually known.

Rumors

The following rumors can be found in different places in the Forgotten Realms, as indicated by the headings. If you want to follow any of these up, talk to your DM.

- Agents of the Red Wizards of Thay have openly slain merchants in Westgate and Scardale-port, and it is whispered that the fell Red Magic Cult is stirring again; perhaps the Red Wizards will resume their quest for world domination soon, in the Inner Sea Lands.

- A tavern in Ordulin, The Stranded Fish, has been set afire and destroyed in a brawl between local bravos and a bearded, robed mage of great power, thought to be one of the Red Wizards of Thay. The mage escaped the blaze, and his present whereabouts are unknown. It is certain that agents of the city’s Council, and the City Guards, are looking for him.

- The incidence of abductions throughout the Inner Sea area is growing greatly. Authorities are afraid (for reasons they’d rather not discuss) that the Red Wizards are adding to their slave coffles. Many young men and women with some experience in adventuring, though not as magic-users or clerics, are going missing.

Close To Thay

- Armies of “walking dead” are said to be advancing steadily northwards from Thay, led by armored skeletal warriors of great power and fell aspect. Impiltur fears that Thay will overwhelm all the Eastern Lands, and then turn west to crush the Coastal Cities, Impiltur, and Aglarond.

- The Red Wizards of Thay have sent legions of elementals against rebellious neighboring satraps, destroying four of them (the coastal cities of Lasdur, Taskaunt, Murbant, and Thasselen) utterly, taking those lands (and that of Hilbrand, which surrendered without a fight) under Thay's banner. Escalant, the most powerful of the cities, is currently under siege.

- It is thought that such vast numbers of elementals could not be summoned by spell, but rather a gate or portal was opened directly to the Plane of Elemental Fire. The sages of Phsalt warn that if all the hosts of Thay were mustered and hurled against these new forces, Thay would quickly go down to defeat. Whatever means the Red Wizards have for gaining such forces must be ended, they say, and magical forces must be gathered immediately to match this present strength.

- The adventurers' band led by the fighter Mane, formerly resident in Shadowdale, has disappeared in the South. There is talk of their defeat and death in the Yuirwood, but others say they have fallen in battle with the Red Wizards in Thay, or even that Mane has become chieftain and war leader of the nomads of the Shaar. Nothing is certain, however; all is speculation.

- Strange creatures have been sighted in the Yuirwood (west of Thay), and are thought to be spreading. Throughout the fall, trolls seemed to be growing more numerous, and then owlbears were reported. As the weather grew colder, a bulette was seen, and it was rapidly followed by other, nameless or unique, creatures, things which seem to be expanding outwards from the depths of the woods. The adventurer Sparleye was last seen in this area with his company, the Men of the Purple Arrow. Others who have gone into the woods have not returned, and traders are avoiding the area.

- Selfaril, High Blade of Mulmaster (one of the cities in opposition to Zhentil Keep) is said to be seeking a wife: The Tharchioness of Eltabbar, First Princess of Thay. The young, bald-headed Tharchioness has sent a golden earring soaked in her perfume to Selfaril, and he has sent her in return a cloak of snow-white Yeti fur. Having thus exchanged gifts, they may now visit together with no gossip of scandal, instead of only through envoys, and yet part honorably, if they do not want to be mated. Selfaril wants Thay as an ally against Zhentil Keep, and dares not spite its ancient customs.

- To the south of old, vast Thay, the even more ancient kingdom of Mulhorand has been jolted in the past year: the Statues That Walk have begun to move once more. Over a thousand stone statues of time-lost origin stand all about this dusky-hilled country. At odd but long separated intervals, these stone men animate and walk about apparently towards specific (now-vanished?) destinations. They stop at times and then move on again, fight any who bar their way or attack them, and at times hew at rocks or clear pathways through certain areas. This latter behavior is a frightening thing when these areas are many-towered cities or tanglewood forests. The stone men are mute and apparently non-intelligent and no one has yet found a way to control them. Some have crossed through the border walls into Thay as well as into Unther, a desert land that lies south and west of Mulhorand. Tholaunt, Divine Precept of Mulhorand (one of the "god-kings" of Mulhorand) says the coming of the statues to life is not his doing nor that of any of his family, as far as he can tell, and adds that the power of controlling the statues is not known to his family. Some have whispered of strife within his family, though, and say that the Statues may be under the control of another.

- In Aglarond, report is that The Simbul, the famous dweomercrafter who rules that country, appears to have left her court shape-changed (perhaps as a cat or falcon) and vanished. Upon her high seat she left a signed letter directing her council to govern Aglarond wisely and dispose of several specific matters (no details are known) thus and so. It is thought she may have headed north to speak with the elves around the Great Dale (with whom she has an uneasy alliance), and/or to observe events in the strategic Dalelands and discuss things with the remaining elves in Myth Drannor. There are rumors of war between Zhentil Keep and the northern dales and Scardale and its neighboring dales, as well as the sudden announcement of the formation of the Iron Throne, a merchant alliance, which intends to operate in the area. The Simbul is known for her unpredictable behavior and mastery of magic, and the tale most often told of her is her unaided destruction of the Red Sword mercenary company at Mist-bridge.

- Huge balls of fire, four or five in number, appeared in the sky above the Towers of the Blade in Mulmaster shortly after the Simbul left Aglarond. There as a battle involving magic within the Tower and rumor has it that the Simbul was involved.

Quest for Gems

The Nentyarch, ruler of vast lands east and north of Impiltur, has sent agents into the realms, seeking black gems for some unknown magical or religious use.

In Thay

Iyachtu Xvim has been seen in Thay recently, on some quest for his father.

Schools and Spells of The Red Wizards

The following are the spells available from the various schools of the Red Wizards. If you are unfamiliar with a spell, talk to your DM.

The School of Illusion

Cantrips:

Footfall
Groan Hide
Mask
Mirage
Moan
Noise
Palm Rattle
Thump
Two-D'lusion

First Level Spells

Audible Glamer
Change Self
Detect Magic
Nystul's Magic Aura (*)
Phantasmal Force
Phantom Armor
Read Magic
spook

Second Level Spells

Alter Self
Blindness
Blur
Deafness
Fascinate
Hypnotic Pattern
Improved Phantasmal Force
Invisibility
Leomund's Trap (*)
Mirror Image
Misdirection
Ventriloquism

Third Level Spells

Fear
Hallucinatory Terrain
Illusionary Script
Invisibility 10' Radius
Paralyzation
Spectral Force
Wraithform

Fourth Level Spells

Dispel Exhaustion
Improved Invisibility
Massmorph
Phantasmal Killer
Shadow Monsters

Fifth Level Spells

Advanced Illusion
Demi-Shadow Monsters
Dream
Projected Image Shadow Door
Shadow Magic Tempus Fugit

Sixth Level Spells

Demi-Shadow Magic
Eyebite
Mirage Arcane
Mislead
Permanent Illusion
Phantasmagoria
Programmed Illusion Shades
Veil

Seventh Level Spells

Alter Reality
Mass Invisibility
Sequester
Shadow Walk
Simulacrum
Weird

THE SCHOOL OF ALTERATION

Cantrips:

Change
Colored Lights Dim Firefinger Gather
Hairy
Haze
Knot
Mute
Polish
Present Rainbow
Ravel
Shine
Spill
Sprout
Stitch

Tangle
Tarnish
Tie
Untie Wrap

First Level Spells

Affect Normal Fires
Aura Fire*
Burning Hands
Chromatic Orb
Color Spray
Comprehend Languages
Dancing Lights
Darkness
Detect Magic Enlarge Erase
Feather Fall
Firewater
Gaze Reflection
Hold Portal
Jump
Light
Melt
Mending
Message
Phantom Armor
Precipitation
Read Magic
Shocking Grasp
Spider Climb
Wall of Fog
Wizard Mark

Second Level Spells

Alter Self
Bind
Continual Light
Darkness 15' Radius
Deeppockets
Flaming Sphere
Fog Cloud
Fools Gold Irritation
Knock
Levitate
Magic Mouth
Pyrotechnics
Rope Trick
Shatter
Strength
Vocalize
Whispering Wind
Wizard Lock

Third Level Spells:

Blink
Cloudburst
Continual Darkness
Delude
Explosive Runes
Fly
Gust of Wind
Haste
Infravision
Item
Leomund's Tiny Hut (*)
Melf's Minute Meteors (*)
Phantom Wind
Secret Page
Slow
Tongues
Water Breathing
Wind Wall
Wraithform

Fourth Level Spells:

Dimension Door
Enchanted Weapon
Extension I
Fire Gate*
Fire Shield
Leomund's Secure Shelter (*)
Minor Creation
Otiluke's Resilient Sphere (*)
Plant Growth
Polymorph Other
Polymorph Self
Rainbow Pattern
Rary's Mnemonic Enhancer (*)
Solid Fog
Stoneskin
Ultravision
Vacancy
Wizard Eye

Fifth Level Spells:

Airy Water
Animal Growth
Avoidance
Distance Distortion
Dream
Extension II
Fabricate
Leomund's Secret Chest (*)
Major Creation
Passwall
Stone Shape
Telekinesis

Teleport
Transmute Rock to Mud

Sixth Level Spells:

Control Weather
Control Winds *
Death Fog
Disintegrate
Extension III
Glassees
Guards and Wards
Lower Water
Mirage Arcane
Mordenkainen's Lucubration (*)
Move Earth
Otiluke's Freezing Sphere (*)
Part Water
Project Image
Stone to Flesh
Tenser's Transformation (*)
Transmute Water to Dust

Seventh Level Spells:

Astral Spell
Duo-Dimension
Mordenkainen's Magnificent Mansion
(*)
Phase Door
Reverse-Gravity
The Simbul's Synostodweomer * (*)
Statue
Teleport Without Error
Torment
Truename
Vanish

Eighth Level Spells:

Glassteel
Incendiary Cloud
Otiluke's Telekinetic Sphere (*)
Permanency
Polymorph Any Object
Sink

Ninth Level Spells:

Crystalbrittle
Mordenkainen's Disjunction (*)
Shape Change
Succor
Temporal Stasis
Time Stop

SCHOOL OF ENCHANTMENT AND CHARMCantrips:

Curdle
Distract Flavor
Freshen
Wilt
Wink

First Level Spells:

Charm Person
Detect Magic Friends
Hypnotism
Read Magic Run
Sleep
Taunt

Second Level Spells:

Bind
Deeppockets
Forget
Ray of Enfeeblement
Scare

Third Level Spells:

Chant
Charm Undead *
Hold Person Suggestion

Fourth Level Spells:

Charm Monster
Confusion
Fire Charm
Fumble
Leomund's Secure Shelter (*)
Magic Mirror

Fifth Level Spells:

Chaos
Dolor
Fabricate
Feeblemind
Hold Monster
Leomund's Lamentable Belabourment
(*)

Sixth Level Spells:

Eyebite
Geas
Guards and Wards
Mass Suggestion

Seventh Level Spells:

Charm Plants
Truename

Eighth Level Spells:

Antipathy/Sympathy
Binding
Demand
Mass Charm
Otto's Irresistible Dance (*)
Sink

Ninth Level Spells:

Mordenkainen's Disjunction (*)
Succor

THE SCHOOL OF DIVINATIONFirst Level Spells:

Detect Illusion
Detect Invisibility *
Detect Magic Identify
Read Magic

Second Level Spells:

Detect Evil
Detect Invisibility Detect Poison *
ESP
Know Alignment Locate Object
Predict Weather *
Read Illusionist Magic

Third Level Spells

Clairaudience
Clairvoyance Detect Charm *
Find Traps *

Fourth Level Spells:

Magic Mirror

Fifth Level Spells:

Contact Other Plane

Sixth Level Spells:

Legend Lore
True Sight

Seventh Level Spells:

Find the Path*
Stone Tell
Vision

THE SCHOOL OF CONJURATIONS AND SUMMONINGS*Cantrips

Bee
Bluelight
Bug
Gnats
Mouse
Spider
Tweak
Unlock

First Level Spells:

Armor
Detect Magic
Find Familiar
Mount
Push
Read Magic
Unseen Servant

Second Level Spells:

Monster Summoning I
Power Word, Sleep

Third Level Spells:

Assist *
Flame Arrow
Material
Monster Summoning II
Phantom Steed
Sepia Snake Sigil

Fourth Level Spells:

Evard's Black Tentacles (*)
Monster Summoning III

Fifth Level Spells:

Conjure Elemental
Beckon (reverse of Dismissal)
Fire Stones *
Leomund's Secret Chest (*)
Monster Summoning IV
Mordenkainen's Faithful Hound (*)
Summon Shadow

Sixth Level Spells:

Conjure Animals
Death Spell
Enchant an Item
Ensnarement
Invisible Stalker
Monster Summoning V

Seventh Level Spells:

Drawmij's Instant Summons (*)
Limited Wish
Monster Summoning VI
Mordenkainen's Magnificent Mansion
(*)
Power Word, Stun
Prismatic Spray

Eighth Level Spells:

Maze
Monster Summoning VII
Power Word, Blind
Prismatic Wall
Symbol
Trap the Soul

Ninth Level Spells:

Alter Reality
Gate
Power Word, Kill
Prismatic Sphere
Wish

SCHOOL OF INVOCATION/EVOCATION*Cantrips:

Belch
Blink
Chill
Color Cough
Creak
Dampen
Dirty
Dusty
Nod
Salt
Scratch
Smokepuff
Sneeze
Sour
Spice
Sweeten
Tap
Twitch
Warm
Whistle Yawn

First Level Spells:

Alarm
Circle
Detect Magic
Grease
Magic Missile
Read Magic
Shield
Tenser's Floating Disk (*)
Write

Second Level Spells:

Combust *
Fireball
Flame Dagger *
Flash *
Melf's Acid Arrow (*)
Stinking Cloud
Tasha's Uncontrollable Hideous Laughter (*)
Web
Whip
Zephyr

Third Level Spells:

Lightning Bolt
Material
Melf's Minute Meteors (*)

Fourth Level Spells:

Dig
Fire Lance *
Fire Shield
Fire Trap
Ice Storm
Otiluke's Resilient Sphere (*)
Shout
Wall of Fire
Wall of Ice

Fifth Level Spells:

Bigby's Interposing Hand (*)
Cloudkill
Cone of Cold
Fire Stones *
Leomund's Lamentable Belabourment (*)
Sending Wall of Force
Wall of Iron
Wall of Stone

Sixth Level Spells:

Bigby's Forceful Hand (*)
Chain Lightning
Contingency
Death Fog
Guards and Wards
Otiluke's Freezing Sphere (*)
Spiritwrack
Tenser's Transformation (*)

Seventh Level Spells:

Banishment
Bigby's Grasping Hand (*)
Delayed Blast Fireball
Forcecage
Mordenkainen's Sword (*)
Torment

Eighth Level Spells:

Bigby's Clenched Fist (*)
Binding
Demand
Fire Storm *
Incendiary Cloud
Otiluke's Telekinetic Sphere (*)

Ninth Level Spells:

Astral Spell
Bigby's Crushing Hand (*)
Energy Drain
Meteor Swarm

SCHOOL OF ABJURATIONCantrips:

Clean
Dry Dust Exterminate

First Level Spells:

Deny Cold
Deny Fire*
Detect Magic
Protection From Cantrips
Protection From Evil
Read Magic

Second Level Spells:

Dispel Magic
Preserve
Protection From Evil, 10' Radius
Protection From Specific Lycanthrope, 10' Radius (pick one)

Protection From Normal Blunt Weapons *
Protection From Normal Edged Weapons *
Protection From Normal Missiles *
Protection From Plants, 10' Radius*
Protection From Poison*
Resist Energy Drain*

Third Level Spells:

Dispel Illusion
Protection From All Lycanthropes—10' Radius *
Protection From Electricity—10' Radius *
Protection From Specific Elementals—10' Radius* (pick one) Protection from Illusions *
Protection from Magical Blunt Weapons*
Protection From Magical Edged Weapons*
Protection From Magical Missiles *
Protection from Paralyzation*
Protection From Specific Undead—5' Radius* (pick one) Protection From Water *
Remove Curse

Fourth Level Spells:

Minor Globe of Invulnerability
Non-Detection
Protection From All Elementals—10' Radius *
Protection From All Undead—5' Radius*
Protection From Breath Weapons
Dragons *
Protection From Breath Weapons—Non-Dragons *
Protection From cold—15' Radius*
Protection From Fire—15' Radius*
Protection From Gas—5' Radius *
Protection From Mechanical Traps *
Protection From Petrification—10' Radius *
Protection From Possession—10' Radius *
Protection From Shapechangers—10' Radius * Turn Magic*

Fifth Level Spells:

Anti-Magic Shell
Avoidance
Dismissal
Globe of Invulnerability Protection From Acid *
Protection From Magical Traps—5' Radius *
Spell Immunity *

Sixth Level Spells:

Protection From Any Traps—5' Radius*
Protection From Magic—5' Radius *
Repulsion
Spiritwrack
Volley

Seventh Level Spells:

Banishment
Prismatic Spray
Sequester

Eighth Level Spells:

Mind Blank
Prismatic Wall
Serten's Spell Immunity (*)

Ninth Level Spells:

Imprisonment
Prismatic Sphere

SCHOOL OF NECROMANCYFirst Level Spells:

Detect Magic
Datho's Delirium#
Read Magic
Summon Undead *

Second Level Spells:

Feign Death
Speak To Dead*

Third Level Spells:

Animate Dead
Assist *
Charm Undead *

Fourth Level Spells:

Belten's Burning Blood
Magic Jar
Spendelard's Chaser#

Fifth Level Spells:

Grimwald's Greymantle#
Reincarnation

Sixth Level Spells:

Animate Dead Monsters *

Seventh Level Spells:

Clone
The Simbul's Synostodwoemer * (*)

Eighth Level Spells:

Body Sympathy# Regenerate *

Ninth Level Spells:

Restoration*

(*) Spells that must be found, cannot be taught in the normal schools.

* = New Spells, see Magic of Thay chapter.

= New Spells introduced in the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Boxed Set, DM's Sourcebook. See that book for description.

dots. However, when the going gets tough, the wizards go shopping—for a good assassin.

The Assassins' Guild

The presence of assassins is a way of life in Thay. Since there is no legal method of appeal of any judgement by anyone, frustrated litigants must go to the ultimate appeal, the Assassins guild.

In Thay, the guild is composed of equal numbers of magic-users and thieves, with the occasional fighter thrown in for muscle.

The guild itself is legal, or at least there is no law against its activities. Individual members who do commit murders can be punished for them, if they are caught, but the Zulkirs realize that the assassins perform a service and do not do anything to suppress the Guild itself.

The only black mark the Assassins have is their connection to the School of Enchantment and Charm, but they managed to stay removed from the attempt many years ago of that School to take over the country, and therefore managed to stay intact and unregulated. Members of the School of Enchantment and Charm, who are the best of the alchemists, are valued members of the Guild.

The Army of Thay

The army of Thay is a polyglot collection of many troop types. The only unifying factor is the troops' universal dread of the Red Wizards.

Organization

In general, the troops are divided up into foot Legions of between 800 and 2,000 soldiers or cavalry Legions of about 400 to 1,000 horsetroops. Each Tharchion and each Wizard is supposed to either supply a legion or a Circle of magic-users. In general, the Tharchions supply troops and the Wizards supply Circles, but this is not always the case. Some Wizards prefer to hire mercenaries to add to the legions rather than risk themselves on the battlefield, and a couple of Tharchions have enough influence to form a Circle; there are also Wizards who simply refuse to have anything to do with the army. No Tharchion has this option.

Legions of foot soldiers can be skirmishers, light foot, heavy foot, artillerymen (though this is mostly handled by Wizard Circles), and even garrison troops. Each legion has its own unique armor and banners, and some have great reputations.

One of the most feared is the new Legion of Myrkul—over 1,000 zombies marching to the drums of priest/sergeants. While they are not excellent fighters, their aspect can scare an opposing regiment from the field, and they feel no fear nor pain. Moreover, foes of this legion know that if they die without totally disabling wounds, they may join this dismal legion.

Horse Legions can actually consist of troopers riding any number of different animals. Most of the Horse Legions are, indeed, horse cavalry, but the Griffin Legion is the finest aggregate of these fierce creatures ever made. This Legion (sponsored by the Tharchion of Pyrardos) has been in development for centuries and still only numbers 350 men and their steeds. Except for major invasions of other countries or the less-frequent defenses of Thay, this Legion spends most of its time patrolling the Sunrise Mountains.

No matter what sort of animal they are riding, Thayvian cavalry is known for its fighting ability everywhere in the Realms. The early Zulkirs decided that, whatever state the foot troops were in, Thay needed cavalry that could speed from one end of the country to the other to meet a threat or surprise a foe. Most of the Tharchions sponsor cavalry Legions, and their combination of heavy armor and archery makes them a potent factor in any battle. It is only when they must fight in territory that is not friendly to cavalry, such as the UMBER Marshes or the Gorge of GAUROS that they must stand aside and let the foot troops move forward.

The Circles

Circles are an innovation of the Red Wizards that makes their armies truly dreaded in any battle where the Circles can see their foes clearly. A Circle consists of a Wizard and his followers and servants. Through their rituals, and use of the Circle spell, the apprentice/followers of the Wizard can add their power to that of the Wizard, allowing him to cast spells as if his level were increased by the levels of every apprentice in the Circle.

This means that the wizard can memorize spells as if he were a higher level wizard, though he cannot memorize any spells of a higher level than he normally knows. Thus, a 13th level Wizard with 2 apprentices of 3rd level, 2 of 2nd level, and 2 of 1st level can memorize spells and cast them as if he were 25th level, though he cannot memorize the 7th, 8th and 9th level spells that a 25th level wizard could memorize.

MAGIC OF THAY

The following are spells known only to the Red Wizards of Thay of certain schools and those people who may have gotten hold of and translated one of their spellbooks. There is one exception, The Simbul's Synostodweomer, which is called something else in Thay, but is called by that name here because it is the name applied to it in FR4, The Magister. Like the Simbul, the Red Wizards learned this spell from a spell book they captured in a battle with the Witches of Rashemen.

School of Alteration

Aura Fire (Alteration)

Level: 1 Components: V,S
Range: 8" Casting Time: 3 segments
Duration: 4 rounds/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: 12 linear feet/level within a 4" radius

Explanation/Description: This spell is very similar to the faerie fire druid spell of the same level. However, the magic-user must make motions in the air with both hands as if outlining the body to be outlined with light, and the resulting light is a reddish glow.

Fire Gate (Alteration)

Level: 3 Components: V, M
Range: 0 Casting Time: 1 segment
Duration: Special
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Spell caster
Explanation/Description: This spell is like dimension door, but the user must go from one fire to another fire. The user can move 5" per level of the spell caster. If the user appears in a place already occupied, he remains in the Plane of Elemental Fire, helpless, until someone rescues him in the same fashion as a misused dimension door user. If the intended destination fire has been put out, the spell does not work, but it is considered spent regardless.

Control Winds (Alteration)

Level: 6 Components: V, S
Range: 0 Casting Time: 7 segments
Duration: 1 turn/level
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: 4" /level radius hemisphere
Explanation/Description: This spell is identical to the 5th level druid spell except that there is no material component to the spell.

The Simbul's Synostodweomer (Alteration/Necromantic)

Level: 7 Components: V, S
Range: 0 Casting Time: 7 segments
Duration: Special
Saving Throws: None
Area of Effect: Special
Explanation/Description: This spell allows the caster to use the magical energy of any spell already memorized by the caster to heal the caster or another being.

This second spell must be cast in the round following the casting of the syn- ostodweomer; even if this subsequent casting is incomplete or interrupted, the synostodweomer works. The second spell is lost from the caster's mind, and any material components are consumed in the normal manner-but rather than taking effect, the spell's energy is channeled into the caster, who can absorb its energy as healing or pass it on by direct touch to another single being. A spell used to heal by this means yields energy enough to heal 2 hp of damage per level of the spell. Only if there is excess energy can the caster choose to heal both self and another being—the other being is completely healed, and the remaining energy heals the caster (excess energy being lost). Such healing occurs in the round following the infusion of spell energy. If the caster has extra energy but is unable to touch another injured creature during this time, the extra energy is lost.

Once the synostodweomer is cast, whatever spell the caster casts on the following rounds is used to heal, regardless of the caster's subsequent wishes of the level of the spell unleashed. If no spell is cast on the following round, the magic is lost and no healing occurs. Spells from scrolls and spell-like magical items effects, as well as spells cast by beings other than the caster of the synostodweomer cannot be used for such healing.

School of Enchantment/Charm

Chant (Enchantment)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M

Range: 0 Casting Time: 1 turn

Duration: Time of chanting

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 3" radius

Explanation/Description: This spell is like the 2nd level clerical spell of the same name, but the user must have an instrument to accompany the chant.

Charm Undead (Enchantment/Necromantic)

Level: 3 Components: V, S

Range: 6" Casting Time: 4 segments

Duration: Special

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This spell is like charm monster, but only affects undead. Note that undead that are normally immune to charm spells are not immune to this spell, though they have normal saving throws.

School of Divination

Detect Poison (Divination)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M

Range: 0 Casting Time: 1 round

Duration: 1 round/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This spell is just like the 1st level druid spell of same name (UA). However, the material component is powdered unicorn horn.

Predict Weather (Divination)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M

Range: 0 Casting Time: 1 round

Duration: 2 hours/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 16 square miles

Explanation/Description: This is similar to the 1st level druid spell of the same name, but the material component is airborne pollen which must be thrown into the air and the chance of being correct is 50% plus 2% per level of the magic-user. The maximum chance of correctness is 90%.

Speak With Dead (Necromantic/Divination)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M

Range: 1" Casting Time: 1 turn

Duration: Special

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: This is like the 3rd level cleric spell but the body must be present and its voice box intact, and only 3 questions may be asked, no matter what the level of the magic-user. The dead answer to the best of their knowledge, but usually in riddles.

Detect Charm (Divination)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M

Range: 3" Casting Time: 1 round

Duration: 1 turn

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: This spell is like the 2nd level clerical spell of the same name. However, the material component for this spell is a heartflower, a plant that has petals that look like a heart. The user inhales the crushed petals.

Find Traps (Divination)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M

Range: 3" Casting Time: 1 turn

Duration: 1 turn

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 1" path

Explanation/Description: This is like the 2nd level clerical spell of the same name. However, this actually detects the intent to do harm with a mechanism. It does not detect traps that are the result of circumstances. The spell's material component is a small string noose that must be broken.

Find the Path (Divination)

Level: 7 Components: V, S, M

Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round

Duration: 1 turn per level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: Creature touched

Explanation/Description: This is just like the clerical 6th level spell except that the material component is a torch whose flame will always point in the correct direction. If the torch is blown out, the spell is over. The same thing can be done with a lantern flame.

Stone Tell (Divination)

Level: 7 Components: V, S, M

Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 turn

Duration: 1 turn

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One cubic yard of stone

Explanation/Description: This spell is like the clerical 6th level spell of the same name. However, the material component is a stick of chalk with which the magic-user must sketch a face to do the talking. This face must be complete with eyes, ears, and nose or the mouth will not be able to describe what it "saw," "heard," and "smelled."

School of Conjurations and Summonings

Power Word: Sleep (Conjuration)

Level: 2 Components: V

Range: 6" Casting Time: 1 segment

Duration: 5 rounds/level

Saving Throw: Neg.

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This spell is like the normal 1st level sleep spell, but it needs no somatic or material components.

Assist (Necromantic/Conjuring)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M

Range: Touch Casting Time: 4 seg.

Duration: 1 round + 1/level

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One person

Explanation/Description: This spell is like the clerical 2nd level spell aid (UA), but does not include the benefits of the bless. The material component is a small vial of pungent herbs, the scent from which the recipient must inhale.

Fire Stones (Conjuration)

Level: 5 Components: V, S, M

Range: 4" Casting Time: 1 round/stone

Duration: Special

Saving Throw: 1/2

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This spell is like the 6th level druid spell fire seeds, but it uses amber instead of seeds and berries.

School of Evocation

Circle (Evocation)

Level: 1 Components: V, S

Range: Touch Casting Time: see below

Duration: Special

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: The circle of magic-users

Explanation/Description: This spell is similar to the clerical spell combine found in the Unearthed Arcana.

This spell is what makes the Circles of the Red Wizards truly dreaded in any battle where the Circles can see their foes clearly. A Circle consists of a Wizard and his followers and servants. Through use of this spell, the apprentice/followers of the wizard add their power to that of the Wizard, allowing him to cast spells as if his level were increased by the levels of every apprentice in the Circle.

This means that the wizard can memorize spells as if he were a higher level wizard, though he cannot memorize any spells of a higher level than he normally knows. Thus, a 13th level Wizard with 2 apprentices of 3rd level, 2 of 2nd level, and 2 of 1st level can memorize spells and cast them as if he were 25th level, though he cannot memorize the 7th, 8th and 9th level spells that a 25th level wizard could memorize. The apprentices helping the wizard must be of the same school. Note that any school but Evocation must use this spell at 2nd level, not first.

If the wizard is a member of more than one school, his spellcasting ability can only be helped for those spells whose school the Circle's apprentices are part of. It is possible to set up more than one Circle to help one wizard, if they are needed.

To set up a Circle, the apprentices must gather into a circle, each member touching the ones to his sides in some manner. Then each apprentice must speak the spell, which puts him into a trance. The length the spell takes to cast depends on how many levels the apprentice has, because it involves him effectively ordering his life and putting it at the disposal of the wizard. Magic-users with more experience have had more life to put in order. In effect, casting the spell takes 1 turn for each level of experience.

Once all the apprentices are in the trance, the wizard can step into the circle they have formed and draw on their power to help him memorize and throw spells.

Between the time necessary to go into the trance and the time to memorize extra spells, one can see that this takes a long time. It is no good for foiling ambushes.

Combust (Evocation)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M

Range: Touch Casting Time: 4 seg.

Duration: Special

Saving Throw: 1/2

Area of Effect: 30 lbs. per level

Explanation/Description: This spell makes a combustible object burst into flame. The damage done is 1d6 per 30 lbs. of object, and the spell does 1d6 per level of the caster per turn until the object is consumed or the flame is extinguished. This is not a magical flame.

Fire Lance (Evocation)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M

Range: 6" + 1" /level

Casting Time: 3 segments

Duration: Instantaneous

Saving Throw: 1/2

Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This spell uses as its material components any torches or other fire in the area. If there is no open fire within direct line of vision up to 30' per level of magic-user, the spell does not work. If there are fires, they go out when the spell is cast. If there are more individual fires (separated by more than 2" of non-fire) than the level of the magic-user, the fires farthest away do not go out.

However, a small number of fires does not detract from the damage done by the spell. The caster is, in essence, using the presence of the fire to open a momentary gate to the Plane of Elemental Fire and direct its energy at a subject.

The energy of the spell looks like a lance of fire, which gives the spell its name. The caster must make a spear-throwing motion at the subject, which is automatically hit. The lance does 1d6/level to the subject.

Fire Storm (Evocation)

Level: 8 Components: V, S, M

Range: 16" Casting Time: 5 segments

Duration: 1 round

Saving Throw: 1/2

Area of Effect: 2" cube/level, minimum 16" cube

Explanation/Description: This is like the 7th level druid spell of the same name. The material component for this form of the spell is charcoal from the cremation of a dead magic-user.

Flame Dagger (Evocation)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 3 seg.
 Duration: 1 round/level
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: 1" long, dagger-like blade

Explanation/Description: This spell creates a flaming dagger that is like the 2nd level flame sword of the druid (UA) but does 2-5 damage with +2 vs. undead and those vulnerable to fire. It is otherwise the same.

Flash (Evocation)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M
 Range: 10" + 1" /level
 Casting Time: 3 segments
 Duration: Instantaneous
 Saving Throw: 1/2 the time blinded
 Area of Effect: 2" radius sphere

Explanation/Description: This spell creates a blinding flash of light in its area. Everyone affected is -5 to any roll to hit anything—thieves are -25% in all skills for the duration of the effects.

The effects last for 2-20 rounds. Roll separately for each victim unless the DM says not to. A successful saving throw versus magic cuts the effect time in half.

School of Abjuration

Deny Cold (Abjuration)

Level: 1 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
 Duration: 1 turn/level
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: Creature touched

Explanation/Description: This spell has much the same effect of the 1st level clerical spell resist cold, but it acts to repel cold, rather than toughen the body to endure it. The material component is a swatch of fur from a fur-bearing animal.

Deny Fire (Abjuration)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M

Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
 Duration: 1 turn/level
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: Creature touched
Explanation/Description: This spell has much the same effect of the 2nd level clerical spell resist fire, but it acts to repel fire and heat, rather than toughen the body to endure it. The material component is a sliver of red or gold dragon hide.

Protection from Specific Lycanthropes—10' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 turn
 Duration: 4 + level/rounds
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: 10' radius around subject

Explanation/Description: This spell must be learned separately for each form of lycanthrope from which the caster wishes protection. The spell sets up a circle of protection around the subject that moves with him, one that keeps out 49 hit dice (round all hit point pluses down unless they exceed + 3) of the type of lycanthrope protected against. If there are more lycanthropes than are protected against, the remaining lycanthropes can cross the circle and attack.

The material component of this spell, and the derivative spells described later, is wolfsbane, which must be crumbled up and scattered in a circle around the caster during the casting of the spell.

Protection From Normal Weapons (Abjuration)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 2 rounds
 Duration: 5-8 rounds
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: 5" radius sphere around subject

Explanation/Description: This is actually three spells, and each must be learned separately. The three spells are protection from blunt weapons, protection from edged weapons, and protection from missiles. All three spells may be applied to the same recipient at the same time. The recipient and anyone within the radius, which moves with the subject, cannot be touched by a non-magical weapon of the type protected against. The missile protection does not encompass large objects such as ballista bolts or stones hurled by giants.

The material component for this spell is a piece of a broken weapon of the proper type.

Protection from Plants—10' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 2 rounds
 Duration: 5-8 rounds
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: 5" radius around subject

Explanation/Description: All forms of vegetable life, including fungi, slimes, molds, and the like are unable to penetrate this protective sphere that moves with the subject. If it is moved toward plant life that is capable of movement, the plant is pushed away. If the plant life is immobile, the sphere cannot move any farther in that direction unless the subject has enough strength and mass to uproot the plant under normal circumstances.

The material component is ash from the burned remains of some form of dangerous slime or mold.

Protection from Poison (Abjuration)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 6 seg.
 Duration: 3-12 rounds (1d10 + 2)
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: No form of poison, ingested in any fashion, affects the protected individual, and any such poison already in the subject's system is permanently neutralized.

The material component of the spell is a sprig of belladonna.

Resist Energy Drain (Abjuration)
Level: 2 Components: V, S
Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 turn
Duration: 1 turn/level

Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Creature touched
Explanation/Description: This spell gives the subject a saving throw vs. death magic any time he is attacked by undead that drain energy levels. If the saving throw is made, the undead cannot steal the life energy of the subject. This does not work against any sort of attack besides the touch of an undead.

Protection from All Lycanthropes — 10' Radius (Abjuration)
Level: 3 Components: V, S, M

Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 turn
Duration: 5-30 rounds
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: 10' radius around subject

Explanation/Description: This spell is like protection from specific lycanthropes, but it works against all lycanthropes.

Protection from Electricity—10' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 3-12 (3d4) rounds
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: 10' radius around subject

Explanation/Description: All within the radius, which moves with the subject, are immune to any electrical attacks and associated effects.

The material component is a piece of tektite.

Protection from Specific Elementals — 10' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 4 + level/rounds
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: 10' radius around subject

Explanation/Description: This is actually four spells, each of which must be learned individually. The area of protection, which moves with the subject, protects all within from the direct attacks of either air elementals (including all similar creatures such as djinn and invisible stalkers), earth elementals (including efreet and salamanders), fire elementals (including tritons and water weirds). The circle of protection affects a maximum of 24 hit dice of the specific elemental creatures. If an elemental creature has more than 24 hit dice, or the creatures exceed that number in total, the extra creatures (or the entire creature if it has more dice) can pass the circle. There is nothing stopping the elementals from hurling objects past the circle, if they are capable of doing that, and attacks can go out of the circle.

The material component of this spell is a vial of water versus fire elementals, a smoldering ember versus air elementals, a small fan versus earth elementals, and a lump of earth against water elementals.

Protection from Illusions (Abjuration)

Level: 3 Components: V, S
Range: much Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 5-30 (5d6) rounds
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: Special

Explanation/Description: This spell lets the subject see through any illusion or phantasm, but he knows it for what it is and it becomes almost transparent to him, so he can see what it may be hiding.

Protection from Magical Weapons (Abjuration)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 2 rounds
Duration: 5-8 rounds
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: This is actually three spells, and each must be learned separately. The three spells are protection from magical blunt weapons, protection from magical edged weapons, and protection from magical missiles. All three spells may be applied to the same recipient at the same time. The recipient cannot be touched by a weapon of the type protected against, but note that this protection does not apply to spells such as magic missile or Mordenkainen's Sword which simulate the effects of weapons.

The material component for this spell is a piece of a broken magical weapon of the proper type.

Protection from Paralyzation (Abjuration)

Level: 3 Components: V, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 2 rounds
Duration: 5-8 turns
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: This protection extends to all forms of paralyzation, muscle and nerve paralysis included. A hold spell does not work on the protected individual, nor does any sort of paralyzation brought on by gas.

The material component for this spell is dried and ground up carrion crawler tentacle, which the caster must swallow after speaking the spell.

Protection from Specific Undead—5' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 10-80 (10d8) rounds
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: 5" radius around subject

Explanation/Description: This is actually several spells, each of which works against a different form of undead and must be learned separately. This protects all within its circumference, which moves with the subject, from all physical attacks from the undead, but not magic spells or other attack forms. If a creature leaves the protected area it is then subject to physical attack. The protection restrains up to 35 hit dice/levels of undead; excess hit dice/levels can pass through the circle.

The material component for this spell is dust taken from a tomb guarded by the specific type of undead.

Protection from Water (Abjuration)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 5-8 turns
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: 5" radius around subject

Explanation/Description: No form of water, solid, liquid, or gas, can penetrate this sphere of protection, which moves with the subject. If those being protected come upon a form of water, the substance simply does not touch them; thus they do not slip on ice, sink into a body of water, etc.

The material component for this spell is a handful of dry desert sand.

Protection from All Elementals—10' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 4 + level/rounds
Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 10' radius around subject

Explanation/Description: This protects against all elementals. The sphere of protection, which moves with the subject, protects all within from the direct attacks of air elementals (including all similar creatures such as djinn and invisible stalkers), earth elementals (including xorn), fire elementals (including efreet and salamanders), and water elementals (including tritons and water weirds). The circle of protection affects a maximum of 16 hit dice of elemental creatures. If an elemental creature has more than 16 hit dice, or the creatures exceed that number in total, the extra creatures (or the entire creature if it has more dice) can pass the circle. There is nothing stopping the elementals from hurling objects past the circle, if they are capable of doing that, and attacks can go out of the circle.

The material component of this spell is a piece of a substance that came from neither the Prime Material Plane nor any of the Elemental Planes.

Protection from All Undead—5" Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 10-80 (10d8) rounds
Saving Throw: None
Area of Effect: 5" radius around caster

Explanation/Description: This spell works against all forms of undead. All within the circumference of this sphere of protection that moves with the subject are protected from all physical attacks from the undead, but not magic spells or other attack forms. If a creature leaves the protected area it is then subject to physical attack. The protection restrains up to 35 hit dice/levels of undead; excess hit dice/levels can pass through the circle.

The material component for this spell is dust taken from a vampire's casket.

Protection from Breath Weapons—Dragon (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 2 rounds
Duration: 6-12 (2d4 +4) rounds

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: This protection is not limited by alignment or type of dragon breath, it extends to all forms of dragon breath.

The material component of this spell is a gold coin, which is destroyed in the spell.

Protection from Breath Weapons—Non-Dragon (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 2 rounds
Duration: 6-12 (2d4 +4) rounds

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: This protection is not limited by alignment or type of breath, it extends to all forms of breath weapon not used by a dragon.

The material component of this spell is a platinum coin, which is destroyed in the spell.

Protection from Cold—15" Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 6 seg.
Duration: 5-8 (d4 +4) turns

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 15" radius around caster

Explanation/Description: All within this sphere of protection that moves with the subject are protected from the effects of normal cold as low as absolute zero. Against magical cold, the spell acts as the clerical spell resist cold, but with enhanced benefits (+6 on saving throw, damage one quarter normal or one-eighth if save is made).

The material component of the spell is a smoldering ember.

Protection from Fire—15" Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 5-8 (d4 +4) turns

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 15" radius around caster

Explanation/Description: All within this sphere of protection that moves with the subject are able to withstand flame and heat of the hottest sort, even of elemental or magical nature.

The material component for this spell is a vial of water.

Protection from Gas—5" Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 6 seg.
Duration: 5-8 (d4 +4) rounds

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 5" radius around caster

Explanation/Description: All within this sphere of protection that moves with the subject are immune to the effects of any form of gas-poison gas, breath weapons which are gaseous in nature, spells which generate noxious clouds such as stinking cloud and cloudkill, and all similar forms of noxious, toxic, vapors.

Protection from Mechanical Traps (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 8 seg.
Duration: 5-20 (5d4) rounds

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: Traps of mechanical nature do not function against the subject of this spell, but they are not revealed.

The material component for this spell is a thimbleful of axle grease.

Protection from Petrification—10' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
Duration: 5-20 (5d4) rounds

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 10' radius around subject

Explanation/Description: All within the confines of this sphere of protection that moves with the subject are absolutely immune to any attack form, magical or otherwise, which causes flesh to turn to stone.

The material component of this spell is a pinch of scales from the snakes on a medusa's head.

Protection from Possession—10' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
Range: Touch Casting Time: 2 rounds
Duration: 10-60 (10d6) rounds

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 10' radius around subject

Explanation/Description: This spell generates a sphere of protection that moves with the subject and protects all creatures within its confines from possession by magical spell attacks such as magic jar; attack forms aimed at mental control or possession or psychic energy drain which are psionically or magically based; or demon, devil, night hag, or similar creature possession (obsession). Even dead bodies within the magic circle are protected.

The material components for this spell are fragments from a former magic jar.

Protection from Shape-changers—10' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 turn
 Duration: 5-30 rounds
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: 10' radius around caster

Explanation/Description: This spell is like the protection from all lycanthropes spell, but it also works against other types of shapechangers, such as doppelgangers, some forms of dragons, druids, jackalweres, and those under the influence of polymorph spells.

Turn Magic (Abjuration)

Level: 4 Components: V, S
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
 Duration: Special
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: This spell can take two forms, but the form can be chosen on casting the spell.

The spell works the same in either case, but the duration is different. The spell can either be cast to last for 10-60 (10d6) rounds, or to last indefinitely unless it is triggered. If the latter form is used, the spell works once and then must be recast to be used again.

This spell distorts the three normal dimensions with regard to magic spells directed at its subject. Any spell cast at the subject usually rebounds, in part or in whole, upon the caster. The distance between, and area occupied by, the subject and the spell caster are not as they seem when the magic activates the spell. Four important exceptions must be noted:

1. Spells affecting an area and not targetted specifically at the subject are not turned.
2. Spells delivered by touch are not turned.
3. Magic contained in devices, which include wands and rings but do not include scrolls, are not turned.

4. Psionic powers are not considered magic for the purposes of this spell.

When a spell is cast on the subject, roll 1d10. The result is both the proportion of the spell returned to the caster and the bonus to the saving throw against the spell. If the spell is a damage spell, multiply the roll by 10 to get the percentage of damage that returns to the caster. The remainder hits the individual protected by the turn magic spell. The number is also added to the saving throw against the spell of the person with turn magic. The remainder is added to the saving throw of the attacking spell caster.

If the spell normally has no saving throw, the amount rolled on the d10 is the proportion of a roll of d20 for a save. In other words, if the roll is 5, both the subject and the attacking spell caster have saving throws of 16. If the roll was a 7, the turn magic user has a saving throw of 14 (20-7 = 13), and the attacker has a saving throw of 18 (20-3 = 17). This saving throw is not modifiable by any consideration of protection, race, etc.

If an attacking spell has a top limit of number of levels of character it can affect, then the total levels of the caster and the turn magic subject must not exceed the number of levels the spell can affect. Otherwise the spell is a failure.

As long as the turn magic effect is on, the wearer cannot accept a spell voluntarily.

If both caster and subject are protected by turn magic or rings of spell turning, then a resonance is set up that can negate the spell, make it affect both fully and equally or some other unpleasant possibilities. DMs should look at the DMG, page 131, on rings of spell turning to get the exact possible results.

Protection from Acid (Abjuration)

Level: 5 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
 Duration: Special
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: This spell protects the subject from all forms of acid, up to a damage limit of 20 hit dice or a time limit of 9-12 turns (d4 + 8), whichever comes first. Thus, the subject could be protected from three breath attacks from the smallest size of black dragon (normally 6HD of damage per attack), and still have some protection left over, as long as the attacks all happened within the time period.

The material for this spell is a gold mirror.

Protection from Magical Traps—5' Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 5 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
 Duration: 3-12 (1d10 + 2) rounds
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: 5" radius around subject

Explanation/Description: Magical traps do not function within 5" of the subject of the spell, but they are not revealed, either.

The material component of this spell is a thimbleful of axle grease.

Spell Immunity (Abjuration)

Level: 5 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round
 Duration: 1 turn/level
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: One individual

Explanation/Description: This spell is identical to the clerical 4th level spell of the same name (WA).

Protection from Any Traps—5" Radius * (Abjuration)

Level: 6 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 2 rounds
 Duration: 2-8 (2d4) rounds

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 5" radius around subject

Explanation/Description: This spell combines the aspects of the protection from mechanical traps and protection from magical traps spells. Except as shown above, it is identical to those spells.

Protection From Magic—5" Radius (Abjuration)

Level: 6 Components: V, S

Range: Touch Casting Time: 1 round

Duration: 5-30 (5d6) rounds

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 5" radius around subject

Explanation/Description: This very powerful and invisible globe of protection, which moves with the subject, prevents any form of magic from passing in or out of its confines, but normal things are not restricted. Any magical item touching the globe must be saved for with a 50% likelihood of the object being drained of all magic from the power of the globe—the save equals 11 or better on d20.

If multiple magical items encounter the globe simultaneously, the leading item (a magical sword held in advance of its owner, for instance) is the first affected, then the others are checked in order of descending power until the first item fails its save, at which time the globe is cancelled and the item is drained of its magic.

School of Necromancy

Detho's Delirium (Necromantic)

Level: 1 Components: V, S, M

Range: Touch Casting Time: 2 seg.

Duration: 1 round + 1 round/level of caster

Saving Throw: Negates

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: The caster of this spell touches a being who is drugged, drunken, unconscious, or sleeping, while speaking the mystic words and ringing a small silver or brass bell (which can be reused). The touched creature receives a saving throw against spells at - 2; if the save is failed, the creature begins to speak. (A creature feigning drunkenness or unconsciousness is not affected by this spell.) The affected being speaks at random, in all languages known to it, and on random, rambling, topics. It cannot hear questions and cannot be forced by mental or magical control to give specific answers—any attempt to use such control is 96% likely to awaken the creature. While the creature speaks, there is a 22% chance per round (not cumulative) that it will reveal names, truenames, passwords, words of activation, codes, directions, and other useful information. Note that the speaker will rarely identify such fragments of speech for what they truly are, and hearers must speculate themselves on the meanings. Dreams, rumors, jokes, and fairy tales may be mumbled by the speaker, not merely factual information.

The spell will be broken before its duration is over if the affected creature is awakened.

Summon Undead (Conjuration/Necromantic)

Level: 1 Components: V,S,M

Range: See Below Casting Time: 1 turn

Duration: 1-8 turns + 1 turn/level of caster

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: 100' radius per level of caster

Explanation/Description: The nearest 2-12 undead of hit dice equal to or less than the level of the caster and within 100' per level of the magic-user, must travel to the caller at normal pace. The summoned undead will not be hostile, nor are they under the control of the summoner. They may act as they wish.

Once they have arrived at the summoner, the undead may turn around and go back where they came from, attack anyone in their way, talk to the summoner, or perform any other action that seems reasonable to them. Unthinking undead (such as zombies and skeletons) with a purpose immediately return to their station. Wandering unthinking undead stay and wait for orders (for which the caster needs charm undead or a potion of undead control or something similar) unless there are obvious foes besides the summoner to attack.

This is both a Necromancy and a Conjunction spell, but it is not taught in the Conjunction school. The summoner must have bone dust that is scattered to the wind during the spell casting.

Speak With Dead (Necromantic/Divination)

Level: 2 Components: V, S, M
 Range: 1" Casting Time: 1 turn
 Duration: Special
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: One creature
Explanation/Description: See description in School of Divination.

Assist (Necromantic/Conjuring)

Level: 3 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 4 seg.
 Duration: 1 round + 1 round/level of caster
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: One person
Explanation/Description: See description in School of Conjuring.

Charm Undead (Enchantment/Necromantic)

Level: 3 Components: V, S
 Range: 6" Casting Time: 4 segments
 Duration: Special
 Saving Throw: Negates
 Area of Effect: Special
Explanation/Description: See description under School of Enchantment.

Belten's Burning Blood (Necromantic)

Level: 4 Components: V, S, M
 Range: 1"/level of caster
 Casting Time: 4 segments
 Duration: 3 rounds
 Saving Throw: Negates
 Area of Effect: One creature
Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a magic-user can cause any creature who is presently bearing open, bleeding, wounds (i.e. one who has been damaged by edged weapons recently and whose wounds have not yet been dressed or healed) to suffer 3-12 hit points of additional damage per round, by causing a subtle, temporary change in the victim's blood that causes it to be corrosive to adjacent tissue.

The subject must have blood to be affected, and any creature immune or resistant to fire or corrosive damage cannot be affected. The material components of the spell are the visible blood and a pinch of saltpeter. Once the spell is cast, the caster does not have to concentrate on the spell. It continues to work as the caster performs other actions.

The spell causes no damage if the subject's saving throws (versus spells at -3) are successful in each of the three rounds of the duration. If one saving throw is made, the subject still takes damage during the other two rounds of the duration. No hit roll is necessary and the subject need not even be in sight of the caster as long as the caster is familiar with the subject and the subject is within range. Astral or ethereal subjects cannot be affected.

Targets who have altered their shape or entered other objects (such as a tree or stone) are still vulnerable to this spell as long as they are bleeding. Creatures who have powers of regeneration are only affected as long as they have open wounds.

Animate Dead Monsters (Necromantic)

Level: 6 Components: V, S, M
 Range: 1" Casting Time: 7 segments
 Duration: Permanent
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: Special
Explanation/Description: This spell is just like the clerical 5th level spell of the same name (UA) but the material component is just the body to be animated.

The Simbul's Synostodweomer (Alteration/Necromantic)

Level: 7 Components: V, S
 Range: 0 Casting Time: 7 segments
 Duration: Special
 Saving Throws: None
 Area of Effect: Special
Explanation/Description: See description in School of Alteration.

Regenerate (Necromantic)

Level: 8 Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 3 rounds
 Duration: Permanent
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: Creature touched
Explanation/Description: This spell is like the 7th level clerical spell of the same name. The material component is a lizard that can naturally regrow its limbs, which must be slain as part of the spell.

Restoration (Necromantic)

Level: 9(Components: V, S, M
 Range: Touch Casting Time: 3 rounds
 Duration: Permanent
 Saving Throw: None
 Area of Effect: Creature touched
Explanation/Description: This spell is like the clerical 7th level spell of the same name, but its material component is a patch of wight's skin.

Azath

Bane

Beshaba

Bhaal

Gond

Helm

Ilmater

Leira

Loliatar

Malar

Mask

Myrkul

Mystra

Sbar

Talona

Waukeen

Kossuth

RELIGION OF THAY

The basic Alignment of Thay is neutral evil. The Red Wizards dislike religion as a general practice, and refuse to give it any prominence in their government. This is a result of the country's origins, which consisted of a gang of Mulhorandese wizards rebelling against the stultifying theocracy of Mulhorand.

This is not to say that the Red Wizards do not themselves worship the gods. One of the principal gods of many of the Wizards is Myrkuil, which ties into the exhaustive study of Necromancy in the Realms.

Entries for the gods worshipped in Thay are organized thus: Name(s), portfolio, alignment, home plane, symbol, and notes.

Azuth, The High One, Patron of Magic-Users, Demipower, LN, Arcadia
Symbol: A human hand, forefinger pointing upward, outlined in a nimbus of blue fire.

Azuth is worshipped in a desultory way in Thay as the patron of magic-users. Wizards with no real affinity for religion pay him lip service and occasionally make sacrifices in his name. His form has been seen in Thay at one time or another, but has never stayed long.

There are major temples in his honor in Eltabbar and Bezantur, smaller shrines in Tyraturos and Pyarados. Attendance at any of the shrines is desultory. The highest ranking priest of Azuth in Thay is 7th level.

Bane, Lord Bane, the Black Lord, God of Strife, Hatred, Tyranny, Greater Power, LE, Acheron

Symbol: A black hand, open, with thumb and fingers aligned together—sometimes on a red field.

Bane does not have the respect in Thay that he does in Zhentil Keep, but he is worshipped mostly among the Tharchions and Tharchionesses.

There are temples to Bane in Eltabbar, Bezantur, Tyraturos, Pyarados, and Surthay, and major shrines in the ruins of Delhumide and on the Aldor. There is also a private shrine in the Citadel for the Tharchion.

The highest ranking priest of Bane is 12th level—the high priest of the temple of Bane in Bezantur. He is watched very closely by most of the Zulkirs, who feel he may be an agent of Zhentil Keep.

Beshaba, Maid of Misfortune, Black Bess, Lady Doom, Goddess of Mischief, Misfortune, Ill Luck, Accidents, Treachery, Betrayal, Lesser Power, CE, Abyss
Symbol: Black antlers on a red field.

Beshaba is propitiated more than worshipped throughout Thay. The researching magicians of Thay have no wish to suffer ill luck half-way through a magical ceremony.

Shrines to Beshaba appear everywhere there are magic-users in Thay, but there is no temple to her name anywhere.

Bhaal, Lord of Murder, God of Death, Lesser Power, LE, Gehenna
Symbol: a circle of red blood tears, falling counterclockwise, about a white skull.

Bhaal is also worshipped mostly by the ruling class of Thay, particularly those who have gained their high positions through the elimination of competition. The very active Guild of Assassins has at least one temple to Bhaal in each city of Thay.

The main temple of Bhaal is in Eltabbar, the center of politics in Thay. The principal heirophant of this religion in Thay is 10th level, and he reports to the Priest of Bane in Bezantur.

The God-Kings, Masters of the Earth, gods and rulers of Mulhorand, lords of rulers everywhere, Lesser Powers, LN, Prime Material Plane

Symbol: A ziggurat-like tower of white on a blue field.

The God-kings are the rulers of Mulhorand, and not officially appreciated in Thay. However, many Thayvians who are not Red Wizards still worship the gods of their fathers. The worship is not extensive, and is repressed in many parts of the country.

The only temple to the god-kings is a ziggurat outside the walls of Bezantur. The high priest of that temple is continually being arrested for sedition by the Zulkirs, so the most powerful cleric in residence is 8th level, and that one has been in charge only three months.

Gond, Wonderbringer, god of blacksmiths, artificers, crafts and construction, Lesser Power, N, Concordant Opposition

Symbol: A toothed wheel of brass, bronze, iron, or bone.

Gond is the god of the tradesmen and, somewhat, the merchants of Thay. His worship is relatively weak but is not suppressed by the rulers, who consider him a good example to the craftsmen.

The main temple of Gond is in Tyraturos, and is presided over by a cleric of the 9th level.

Helm, He of the Unsleeping Eyes, God of Guardians, Lesser God, LN, Nirvana
Symbol: An open, staring eye, often painted on a metal gauntlet.

Helm is the patron of many of the soldiers of Thay and of the Inner Seas lands in general. His worship is not supported by the hierarchy, but it is tolerated in mercenaries.

Bezantur is the home of the main temple to Gond, but there are temples in all the main cities and shrines in ever garrison and tax station. The highest level cleric is the Grand Master of the Order of Helm, a 9th level cleric who operates out of the Citadel.

Ilmater, God of Endurance, Suffering, Martyrdom, Perseverance, Lesser Power, LG, Twin Paradises

Symbol: The bloodstained rack or crossed hands bound at the wrist.

Ilmater is the god of the slaves and lower classes in Thay. There is an active worship among the slaves of Thay.

There are no temples to Ilmater, but shrines of sorts, usually mobile, are available throughout the realm. Ilmater is worshipped communally, and the highest level cleric in his service is a 5th level priest who is also a runaway slave who wanders the entire country, dodging patrols and ministering to his flock.

Iyachtu Xvim, The Godson, Son of Bane, Demipower, LE

Symbol: A pair of green, glowing eyes on a black field.

The Godson is rarely worshipped. He often acts in his father's interests, and has been seen many times in Thay, no doubt attempting to further his father's worship.

There are no temples to the name of the godson; he is worshipped through the worship of Bane.

Kossuth, The Lord of Flames, The Firelord, Tyrant among Fire Elementals, God of Elemental Fire, Lesser Power, N, Plane of Fire

Symbol in Thay: A sceptre outlined in fire.

All of the elemental rulers are worshipped to some extent in Thay, but Kossuth is pre-eminent among the elemental lords. The Red Wizards have long concentrated on fire magic, and Kossuth and Myrkul are the closest thing to the dominant gods of Thay.

There are temples to Kossuth all over Thay, but the main temple is in the city of Tyraturos, whose surrounding dry plains are the most amenable to his sensibilities. The temple is open to the sky and surrounded by eternal flames which accept the sacrifices of animals and slaves that propitiates Kossuth.

The highest ranking cleric for Kossuth is a 16th level high priest in that temple.

Leira, Lady of the Mists, Goddess of Deception, Illusion, Demipower, CN, Limbo

Symbol: A triangular plaque, point downward, painted in cloudy, swirling, grays.

Leira is the inspiration of the Illusionists of Thay. She is not held in high regard throughout the Realm, but there is a medium-sized temple dedicated to her worship in Eltabbar, whose Tharchioness is thought to be a student of the school of Illusion. The highest ranking cleric of this worship is 8th level, and resides in the Eltabbar temple.

Loviatar, Maiden of Pain, Goddess of Pain, Hurt, Patron of Torturers, Demipower, LE, Gehenna

Symbol: A black whip of nine strands with barbed tips.

Loviatar is the handmaiden of Bane and Bhaal, and worshipped as such among Thayvian nobility. There is a temple in her name in the city of Bezantur (which is known as the City of a Thousand Temples), but otherwise she is worshipped along with Bane and Bhaal. The highest ranking cleric of Loviatar alone is the high priestess of the Bezantur temple. She is 8th level.

Malar, The Beastlord, The Stalker, God of Wild, Marauding Beasts, Bloodlust, and Hunting, Demipower, CE, Tarterus

Symbol: A taloned, bestial claw.

Malar is the only one of the Gods of Fury who is much worshipped in Thay. In general, the Gods of Fury are too independent for the liking of the Red Wizards. However, the bloodlust and killing fever of his worship are popular among the rulers of Thay who enjoy hunting.

Malar has his distinctive woodland temples in special copses (which are avoided and despised by druids) outside most of the cities of Thay and scattered among the usual hunting preserves in the Realm. The high priest of Malar is a 12th level priest residing in Pyarados, where the hunting in the Sunrise Mountains is best. This priest can also act as a cleric of the other Gods of Fury if needed.

Mask, Lord of Shadows, God of Thieves, Intrigue, Lesser Power, NE, Hades

Symbol: Black velvet mask.

Mask is as popular among the underworld of Thay as he is anywhere else in the Realms.

There is a major temple to his worship in the city of Bezantur, where the thieves are dominant, but he only has easily-disguised shrines elsewhere in the Realm. Many Red Wizards give some worship to Mask in hopes of his assistance in their various conspiracies to gain power.

The high priest of Mask in Thay is a 13th level cleric who travels all over the country to keep eyes on his flock. The master of the temple at Bezantur is a 10th level cleric who answers to the master of the temple when he is in town.

Myrkul, Lord of Bones, Old Lord Skull, God of the Dead, Wasting, Decay, Corruption, Parasites, Old Age, Dusk, Fall, Exhaustion, Greater Power, NE, Hades

Symbol: A skull or skeletal hand.

Myrkul is the patron of necromancers, and the college of necromancy is one of the most powerful in Thay. Myrkul and Kossuth are the dominant gods of Thay.

There are temples to Myrkul in every city of Thay and shrines in every slavefarm and tax station. The main temple is in Surthay—home city of the Zulkir of Necromancy.

The high priest of this religion in Thay is a 16th level high priest who resides in Surthay.

Mystra, The Lady of Mysteries, Goddess of Magic, Greater Power, LN, Nirvana

Symbol: A blue-white star.

Mystra is worshipped in some ways by all magic-users, and the Thayvian wizards are no exceptions. Usually, however, she is not worshipped exclusively by any of them.

Mystra has temples in all the cities of Thay. They are usually restricted to Red Wizards and their entourages. The largest temple is in Bezantur, but the chief temple is the scarcely-smaller one in Eltabbar. The high priestess of Mystra is a 14th level cleric in Eltabbar.

Shar, Mistress of the Night, The Lady of Loss, Goddess of Darkness, Night, Loss, Forgetfulness, Greater Power, NE, Hades

Symbol: Circle of black with a border of deep purple.

Shar is worshipped along with

Myrkul, and turned to for consolation when a loved one dies.

Every temple to Myrkul has a shrine to Shar, and there are major temples to her alone in Bezantur, Eltabbar, and Pyarados. The temple in Surthay is part of the temple to Myrkul, but has its own wing.

The main cleric of Shar in Thay is a 12th level priestess who reports to the high priest of Myrkul.

Talona, Lady of Poison, Mistress of Disease, Goddess of Disease, Poisoning, Demipower, CE, Tarterus

Symbol: Three teardrops in a triangle, apex upwards.

Since the plagues of a hundred years before, Talona has been worshipped by the lower classes and some members of the ruling class in a propitiary way to keep her plagues away from the worshippers. Also, the Assassins worship her along with her patron, Bhaal.

There is a major temple to Talona in Bezantur, and every temple of Bane has a shrine to her. There are also private shrines in the homes of several members of the nobility and merchants and in the guildhalls of the Assassins Guild.

The chief priest of Talona is a 9th level cleric who runs the temple in Bezantur.

Waukeen, Liberty's Maiden, Merchantsfriend, Goddess of Trade, Money, Lesser Power, N, Concordant Opposition

Symbol: A woman's full face or profile within a circle of gold.

The growing middle class of Thay worships Waukeen. The Zulkirs are not certain what their attitude toward this goddess should be, but then they are not certain what to do about a lot of things concerning the middle class.

There is a temple of Waukeen in Tyraturos, and of course one in Bezantur. The official highest-ranking cleric of Waukeen is an 8th level priest in Tyraturos, but Dimon of Tyraturos, the Tharchion, is rumored to be a high-ranking priest of the goddess.

MAJOR PERSONALITIES OF THAY

The entries on persons presented in this section are arranged as follows:

Name, Base of Operations, Level and Class, Alignment, Deity, Race and Sex.

Zulkir Szass Tam

Delhumide

24th level Magic-User, School of Necromancy, Red Wizard of Thay

NE Myrkul

Lich Male

Szass Tam is zulkir of the School of Necromancy, third head of his family since the first days of Thay. He has been around for 250 years, 195 of them as a lich. He understands undead as no one else can.

Unlike most liches, Szass Tam presents a very human-like aspect to the world. His clothes are not rotting, and his body is very well preserved, thanks to the preservation spell he has applied to himself that he renews every few weeks. Occasionally he gets forgetful and his body starts to rot a bit, so there is a slight smell of the grave about him, but he keeps himself heavily perfumed to cover that scent.

Because of this preservation, Szass Tam does not frighten low level people away if they look at him. He does have all the other aspects of a lich, including the freezing touch.

Szass Tam's greatest goal is the destruction of Rashemen. He felt he was on the verge of attaining personal immortality without becoming a lich when he had to leave his researches to lead an invading army into Rashemen (He could have not led the army, but that consideration is not something he pays much attention to). The Witches of Rashemen routed the army and Szass Tam was so badly hurt in the battle that he had to become a lich to survive at all.

Now he works on his contribution to the armies of Thay, Myrkul's Legion, a thousand zombies or more dedicated to the destruction of Rashemen. Currently he is sending this legion, backed up by the usual forces at the Gorge of Gauros, into Rashemen to gain his revenge.

Szass Tam's Spellbook

Szass Tam has every Necromancy spell in his spellbook, including the named spells that are not normally in every necromancer's book. He also has cold of cold, dimension door, and phase door; and other spells that may be useful.

He also has two unique spells that are only also known by a couple of his most trusted apprentices.

Preservation (Alteration/Necromancy)

Level: 3

Components: V, S, M

Range: Touch

Casting Time: 1 turn

Duration: 1 day per level of caster

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One medium sized creature

Explanation/Description: This spell preserves meat and other foods as if it had just been killed. It does not work on cooked food. It can be used on dead people to keep them intact until they can be raised (the time preserved does not count toward the time elapsed before raising) or spoken to. It can also be used on a zombie or lich or similar undead to keep the body from rotting.

Animate Dread Warrior of Tam (Necromancy)

Level: 6

Components: V, S, M

Range: Touch

Casting Time: 1 turn

Duration: Permanent

Saving Throw: None

Area of Effect: One creature

Explanation/Description: This spell is used on any newly-dead person on whom the preservation spell has been placed. The body becomes a zombie of unusual power (see INVASION OF THE LIVING DEAD in the Adventures Section) and ability. It does not work on skeletons.

The body affected must be a person with good fighting ability, though it need not originally have been a fighter. However, the body loses any skills other than fighting skills it had, so fighters are the best candidates.

Szass Tam has many magical items. Among them is a wand of whips. This wand shoots forth a whip-shaped field of white, shimmering, magical force to a maximum (horizontal and vertical) range of 7". The wielder of the whip names, looks at, or concentrates upon a specific subject creature or automaton (i.e. golem, undead, homonculus, or the like), and the whip attacks this creature and this creature only. The whip remains in existence for 4 rounds; if the subject is beyond 7" from the wand when it is cast, the whip flashes instantly (in one segment) to the limit of its range, and hangs motionless, waiting, at the point closest to its subject. Otherwise the whip strikes once per round, as a Qual's feather token (see DMG) does: at +1 to hit and damage, doing 2-7 hit points of damage per strike, and binding fast an opponent for 2-7 rounds if a save vs. spell is not made after each successful strike.

Once a whip has bound an opponent, the wand wielder cannot release it to strike again. The whip cannot change subjects. A whip may follow an opponent that it has struck at least once beyond 7", moving with the subject even if the subject teleports, blinks, plane shifts, enters a rock or plant, etc. The whip hits invisible and ethereal, but no astral, creatures without penalty. The wand of whips may be recharged. Only magic-users may wield it.

Alzegund The Trader

Wanders (Cormyr, Sembia, and Dragon Reach)

10th level magic-user, Red Wizard of Thay

LE Kossuth

Human Male

An old, bald, war-scarred necromancer who openly wears robes marked on the breast and back with a red flame badge, he travels the trade routes with six grim men-at-arms, guarding those caravans the Red Wizards want kept safe. Alzegund also spies on the military strength of Cormyr and of Zhentil Keep. He is said to possess a magical bag of tricks and a wand of lightning.

Alzegund is a member of the School of Evocation, and specializes in fire magics. Because he does so much traveling and guarding, he has not climbed as high in his profession as his age would indicate, but he seems to enjoy his work. Indeed, while his guard maintains a tight-lipped and dour watch over him, he is continually buying drinks for other travelers and exchanging stories, some of them at the expense of his masters, the Red Wizards.

Of course, he is principally drawing out his drinking partners to get information from them by making them think he is a harmless tosspot that loves the Red Wizards no more than most of their neighbors. Very few high-ranking officials are taken in by this demeanor, but he can often get vital information from lower-ranking persons, and sometimes uses his magics (he is a proficient alchemist) to do favors for them, which he then claims a reward for by forcing information from his "friends" or even having them steal things for him.

His men-at-arms are all human males. Their membership changes over the years, but now consists of a 6th level fighter, the sergeant, three 4th level fighters who have been with Alzegund for a couple of years, and two 2nd level sword-apprentices who are on their first trip with Alzegund.

AiLoth

Hillsfar and Sembia

6th level magic-user, Red Wizard of Thay

LE Kossuth

Human Male

AiLoth is a white-haired, 6th level magic-user who first came to the Sembia region with Alzegund about twenty years ago. He ostensibly left Alzegund to find his own way in the world, but he was actually left in Sembia purposely to gather information in Sembia and Hillsfar. He acts as a moneylender and "distressed goods/damaged goods" buyer while maintaining a small spy network for the Red Wizards.

AiLoth (pronounced (EYE-loth) has not been extremely subtle in his machinations. His contacts with the Red Wizards are well-known in both Hillsfar and Sembia, though not all of his spies are known and he still occasionally gathers significant information.

Of course, his business is one of the stops of the trading caravans that Alzegund shepherds, so AiLoth can report to his spymaster.

AiLoth might be a good candidate as the instigator of the assassination attempts described in the Adventures Section under the title "Threat of Death."

In keeping with both his cover identity and his needs as a spy, AiLoth is a member of the School of Diviners, but he has also learned a couple of the spells of the School of Invocations/ Evocations and School of Alterations in case he gets into a fight. In general, he keeps the evocation and alteration spells in mind, along with whatever divining spells he thinks will be necessary for his mission.

There are no named spells in his spellbooks.

NagLaTha

Selgaunt

5th level magic-user, Red Wizard of Thay

NE, Azuth

Human Female

This young, black-eyed, black-haired, grim-faced woman has risen quickly in the ranks of the Red Wizards due to her fanatical zeal for all Red Wizard causes, and her ruthless, reckless, furthering of them. Naglatha's allegiance and identity are not known to any authorities in the Dragonreach area; recently arrived in Selgaunt, she is posing as a merchant dealing in curios and rarities of the South-while in reality recruiting merchants and men-at-arms for the Red Wizards' cause; it is likely the Red Wizards are planning disruptive raids to set one power against another, if it seems likely that any of them would aid or reinforce any lands Thay is at war with.

Even Alzegund is unaware of Naglatha's position with the Red Wizards, though he has benefitted from her recruiting. All he knows is that there is a recruiter called "The Black Flame" who is bringing people into his caravans. Naglatha recruits while wearing a black full-face mask embroidered with red flame designs, and none of her recruiting subjects have seen her face—at least while she is recruiting them. Of course, she uses her identity as a merchant to size-up possible recruits before she approaches them as the Black Flame.

Naglatha has two bodyguards who are supposed to be eunuchs from the land of Mulhorand. Actually, they are Thayvian fighters who have not been turned into eunuchs at all, but it is convenient to have them act as eunuchs in public. Therefore, they are fatter and more clean-shaven than normal for bodyguards, and they tend to wear rich clothes and jewelry.

Naglatha operates a small curio shop in the Sembian city of Selgaunt. She leaves "for the South" once a year and is gone for about 3 months, while she reports to her masters in Thay. One of the eunuchs remains in charge of the shop while the other accompanies her.

One of the eunuchs who originally accompanied her to the area about three years ago was killed in an accident about one year ago. When she came back "from the South," next, she had a new eunuch.

The veteran eunuch is Milos Longreach, a 4th level fighter with ST 16 and bracers of defense (AC 4). He uses a massive scimitar which actually acts in all ways as a bastard sword.

The new "eunuch" is a 3rd level thief (he came recommended as a fighter, but his skills and attitude are those of a thief) named Heraclous the Quick who is not at all comfortable in his role. He is a veteran carouser who is constantly scheming to get away from the shop and get in some drinking (among other things). Naglatha has detected this tendency and keeps an eye on him, but he has still managed to get away a few times. His predilection for gallivanting may yet expose his mistress's machinations.

Naglatha is a member of both the School of Illusion and the School of Divination, and has a full complement of spells appropriate to the 5th level for each school.

Lauzoril

Eltabbar

18th level magic-user, Zulkir of the School of Enchantment and Charm, Red Wizard of Thay

NE, Kossuth

Human Male

Lauzoril is not known outside of Thay as a Zulkir, but his position as a leader of the Imperialist party (such as it is) has gotten out to the neighbors of Thay and to their friends. His actions as leader of this party has attracted the attention of the Harpers, which has, in turn, attracted Lauzoril to them.

Lauzoril has no liking for the Harpers and spends much of his time scheming to destroy the members of that organization.

One of his schemes involved the creation of the magic scimitar called Shazzelim and the sending of a guardsman with the scimitar to kill a prominent member of the Harpers (the ranger Dove Falconhand). This plan went awry when the guardsman picked a fight with the wrong woman (the knight Jasilmer) and died. Shazzelim has now been captured by the masters of Zhen-til Keep, so it may still be fulfilling its function as best it might in the hands of warriors of that organization, which has its own grudge against the Harpers.

Lauzoril is not pleased by the current spate of invasions of Thay's neighbors. He feels that all of the attention these efforts will gather can only persuade the Harpers and their allies to "do something" about Thay, and, unlike many of his compatriots, Lauzoril has a healthy respect for what the Harpers can do.

In many cases, characters originating in Thay can get involved in the problems described in the "Adventures In Thay" section because Lauzoril is trying to undermine the various plans for conquest and end the menace before other forces in the world combine to act against Thay and destroy it utterly.

Let anyone think that Lauzoril is a nice man, however, he is also a source for assassination missions against rulers of other countries of the Realms. His master plan for conquest is to assassinate all the major players on the board of the Realms, then move while their followers are uncertain and demoralized.

Lauzoril is a relatively young man for his level, and is always very charming to anyone he talks to. Even when he seems to be about to order one's immediate execution, he is charming. People he has ordered slain in their presence have gone to the executioner smiling.

Shazzelurt

Experience Point Value: 800

Gold Piece Sale Value: 4000

The following is a description of the dagger carried by Lauzoril, which is a mate to the sword Shazzelim, now in possession of Zhen-til Keep. Lauzoril was so pleased with the sword that he made the dagger for his own use.

Description: A wavy-bladed dagger of rather poor steel but keen edge, with a guard of iron curved into a flame motif. Its grip is of leather, dyed red, and wrapped in gold wire. Shazzelurt is neutral evil, has an intelligence of 16 and an ego of 15, and communicates by speech (alignment tongue, common, Thayvian, and gnollish). It is +1 to hit, can detect magic in a 1" radius if the bearer so wills it while touching the hilt, and in like manner can locate object in a 12" radius. It can also detect secret doors in a 1/2" radius at the bearer's will when it is unsheathed, and read magic. It will heal its bearer once per day, at the bearer's will, and has a special purpose: to slay bards. Any bard struck by Shazzelurt is disintegrated unless the victim saves vs. spells.

Sabass of Thay

Bezantur

23rd level wizard, Red Wizard of Thay, School of Conjurations and Summonings

NE, Azuth

Human Male

Sabass is an old man with long gray mustaches and small goatee beard and the usual bald head of a Red Wizard of Thay. He has been a wizard for many years. His career has been very adventurous for a Red Wizard; he spent many years in Impiltur and the unsettled area known as Ashanath to the west of Rashemen, and gained an enviable reputation as an adventuring magic-user.

Now he is very sedentary, and the leader (such as there is one) of the political party known as the Researchers. Sabass is not interested in wars of conquest that disrupt trade and keep him from procuring his needs for his researches, and he speaks against the Imperialists whenever the subject comes up. Other Researchers are content to let him express their views, which are fairly similar. Specifically, the Researchers want to be left alone in their researches and feel the Red Wizards should not be expending valuable treasure and magic on foolish adventuring in other lands.

Sabass is especially not enthused about the current invasion of the North Coast cities using salamanders and efreeti (see "Fire Time"). Adventurers going to him can probably gain assistance in stopping this invasion, which Sabass knows could bring down the wrath of the other elemental lords and perhaps destroy the Balance.

Gombdalla of Pyarados

Yuirwood (for the moment)

20th level Red Wizard of the School of Enchantments and Charms

NE, Malar

Human Female

Gombdalla could have been Zulkir of the School of Enchantments and Charms, but she much prefers to be working in the field. In many ways she is sorry she let Lauzoril have the position, as she considers Lauzoril a coward and a ditherer who doesn't know when to act.

Gombdalla's main interest is in animals and monsters. She prefers non-humans to humans in any dealing. She does not ignore humans or refuse to work with them—she even relies on humans for her defense—but she is fascinated by the "wild" demi-human people such as satyrs and trolls and centaurs (she considers dwarves, elves, halflings, and orcs to be merely strange-looking humans). In Pyarados she has the largest collection of obscure monsters known in the Realms. Many of these creatures are now in the Yuirwood with Gombdalla.

Gombdalla is determined to make her current scheme work, as part of her scheme to take over the School of Enchantment from Lauzoril.

Besides the satyrs and centaurs and trolls, Gombdalla has her own entourage of about ten attendants (of which four are effective in a fight) and Sparleye's adventuring band with her. The general power of these attendants can be adjusted to best match that of any adventurers running into them.

Gombdalla has several Conjunction spells, such as most forms of summon monster, in her spell book along with her Enchantment spells. Her attendants include a journeyman (8th level) of the School of Abjuration and an apprentice (4th level) of the School of Divination who also has some Alteration spells.

The Simbul

Aglarond (wanders widely, in disguise)

27th level magic-user

CN (good tendencies), Mystra

Human female

The Simbul is the ruler of Aglarond, a tall silver-haired lady of awesome magical powers (and an impressive array of magical items, which she rarely uses) whose personal power has kept the forces of Thay from overwhelming her kingdom. She is a mysterious, lonely archmage whose proper name is known only to her sisters (Sylune of Shadowdale, now deceased; Alustriel of Silvery moon; the bard Storm Silverhand; and the ranger Dove), and whose truename is secret even from them. The Simbul travels widely in many planes, shapeshifting constantly, to work mysterious ends understandable only to herself. She can be ruthless if necessary, but usually avoids combat if possible. She bears some sort of magic that provides immunity to fear, charm, hold, suggestion, and similar magics, such as Serten's Spell Immunity.

Besides being an awesome opponent to any character coming from Thay, the Simbul is an excellent NPC for instigating player character activity in Thay. She is continually looking for information about Thay and agents to satisfy her needs for action in Thay. At this time, she is making a circuit of the Eastern Realms, looking for information and assistance. She can find the player characters and ask them to assist her. In the Realms, if the Simbul asks, you fulfill her needs. She's a good friend, and a deadly enemy.

Bulzo Tarhair

Tyraturos

10th level thief

N, Mask

Halfling Male

Bulzo is the master thief of the halflings of Tyraturos. He is slightly graying with a cheery smile and the aggravating habit of disappearing from sight and reappearing at one's right elbow when one is looking to the left, etc.

The halfling thieves of Tyraturos are in competition with the human thieves of the area, and have an elaborate network of sewers and other underground pipes that are big enough for them but not for humans to escape into. Fortunately for Bulzo and his brothers, the human thieves of Tyraturos do not have the "in" with the authorities that the thieves of Bezantur do.

Bulzo has been an adventurer and is fascinated by them. He frequently shows up in front of bewildered adventurers and asks if he can help. If he can, he is very helpful, but he always leaves with a little "memento" of the encounter, above and beyond any payment he may have negotiated for his assistance.

Bulzo has a great fund of adventuring stories and knows at least something about most of the major personalities of southern Thay and something of the major people, such as Szass Tam, of the northern Tharches. He even adventured with Valerios Theokillos and will advise characters to buy their equipment in Tyraturos, because it will cost entirely too much in Pyarados.

Bulzo will also talk about the law, or lack of same, of Thay, to anyone who is interested. He says he is not happy about the state of legal anarchy in Thay, a good thief likes to know just what laws he is breaking in a country; the current system of rule by whim is not conducive to easy planning. Actually, he thinks of it as an interesting challenge.

Among his other items, Bulzo has a ring of invisibility, which is what he uses for his appearing and disappearing.

Azhir Kren

Tharchioness of the Gorge of Gauros
11th level fighter

NE, Myrkul
Human Female

Azhir Kren is a hard-bitten woman who has risen to the top the hard way, despite the influence of her mother, a Red Wizard who died fighting in Rashemen 10 years ago.

Azhir took after her father, a fighter who was once Tharchion of Delhumide, and started as a fighter at an early age. She showed a true proficiency with weapons and survived many battles in the front ranks before becoming a leader.

Since it is possible that characters may have to fight Azhir in the "Invasion of the Living Dead" adventure, her fighting statistics are as follows:

Azhir Kren, F11 Fighter; AC 0; hp 83; MV 9"; #AT 1; Dmg 5-14 (two-handed sword +3 plus Strength bonus); THAC0 7; AL NE; ST 16, IN 12, WI 12, DX 15, CN 17, CH 14

Equipment: Azhir has her father's two-handed sword +3 and her own plate mail +2. She also wears a ring of feather falling.

Homen Odeseiron

Tharchion of Surthay

7th level magic-user, four schools of magic: Necromancy, Conjunction/ Summonings, Abjuration, Invocation/ Evocation, Red Wizard of Thay

NE, Myrkul
Human Male

As Tharchion of Surthay, Homen is the guardian of the North. He managed to rack up an enviable reputation by being a student of four different (though not antithetical) schools of magic, but the time it took to become proficient in four schools finally took its toll on him and he retired from active magic use, though he keeps in practice and uses his spells occasionally.

Homen is now in his seventies, but still bright and interested. He can move about spryly when he needs to. He is tall and only slightly bent, with a completely shaved head and face. He always wears a green robe-the color appeals to him.

Homen is constantly trying to discover a means of foiling the Witches of Rashemen, and pays well for information about them. He has an extensive library of hearsay evidence about the Witches, most of it written by his scribes as he interrogated people with information about Rashemen.

Player characters who have been on the Rashemi side of the "Invasion of the Living Dead" adventure had best give Surthay a wide avoidance, for Homen will not be gentle with anyone who fought for the Rashemi and may know anything about the Witches.

Dickon Sharken

Pyarados
5th level fighter
NE, Helm
Human Male

Dickon came to Thay in his late teens, already an experienced mercenary. He has been in the Sunrise Mountains several times as a member of several different expeditions, and gets a good recommendation from the survivors as a fighter and good follower of orders.

People he has worked for have fewer good things to say about his cruelty and sadism.

However, Dickon is a ready fighter and quite capable for his level. He can be added to any party and he will carry out his end of things very well. He then reports everything he saw to Valerios Theokillos, no matter what assurances he gave to the party.

Dickon Sharken, F5 fighter; AC 3; hp 25; MV 12"; #AT 1; Dmg 3-10 (long-sword plus ST add); THAC0 15; AL NE; ST 18(23), IN 10, WI 12, DX 15, CN 12, CH 11.

Equipment: Dickon is wearing chain mail and fights with long sword and shield. He carries a heavy crossbow as a missile weapon. He has no magic, though he covets it and might even betray his master if given the opportunity to possess some. Of course, he'd rather just possess the magic and give his usual report to Valerios.

Constable Hargun Skullknuckle

Chief of Police, Bezantur
Gnoll Chieftain
NE, Gruumsh
Gnoll male

Hargun is the chief of the constabulary of Bezantur. As a look at that city's Tharchionness's description in the Politics section will show, Hargun has a unique position for masters of the watch of any town, since he is essentially working for the Thieves' Guild.

Hargun is just as happy in this position, as he has almost no problems with finding thieves and solving thefts. His patrols, made up almost entirely of his gnoll brethren, concern themselves with keeping down riots (a duty they enjoy greatly) and looking into other crimes of violence.

Hargun is not an honest policeman—he does not stay bribed. He will gladly take hush money from an adventurer, and betray him the next minute.

Hargun Skullknuckle, Gnoll Chieftain; HD 4; hp 20; AC 3; MV 9"; #AT 1; Dmg 1-8 (scimitar) or 1-2 (whip); THAC0 15; AL NE

Belanna Telmister (Shayanna)

Amruthar
4th level fighter/thief/cleric
N, Erevan Ilesere
Half-elf female

Belanna Shayanna is the daughter of a noble family of Aglarond whose younger brother was stolen by slavers three years ago. She is now trying to find the brother, and looking for help from adventurers in this theoretically neutral city.

Belanna has disguised herself as a human as best she can and taken on the more human name of Telmister. She has little money with her, but can promise substantial rewards from her family, which is very influential in the town of Velprintalar in Aglarond.

Belanna's brother, Beltraegor, is now a slave in the household of Tharchion Dimon of Tyraturos, where he is now a horse handler. He is called Bell. He was stolen before he learned any magic, and his natural empathy was seen as a good thing to take advantage of. He is now 35, a young age for half-elves, and quite bored with his job in the stables of Tyraturos.

Belanna is quite a bit older than her brother, about 63, though she looks to be in her early thirties. She has had some experience as an adventurer. Her attributes are as follows:

Belanna Shayanna, MU4/T4; AC 4; hp 16; MV 12"; #AT 1; Dmg 1-6 (short sword); THAC0 20; ST 13, IN 17, WI 11, CN 15, DX 17, CH 16; AL N

Equipment: Belanna has leather armor, her short sword, and her spell books, plus assorted traveling gear.

Spells in her spellbook:

First Level: charm person, detect magic, hold portal, magic missile, protection from evil, read magic, shield, ventriloquism

Second Level: bind, forget, levitate, locate object, rope trick, scare.

Belanna will happily use her thieving abilities and magic to help a party of adventurers if they promise to help her rescue her brother.

ADVENTURES IN THAY

POTENTIAL INCITING INCIDENTS

The following adventure descriptions are meant to introduce the DM to methods of getting their FORGOTTEN REALMS™ game players to journey to far-off, forbidding Thay. The descriptions provide just the bare bones of the adventures. We start with a rumor that is taken from the Player Notes section, then go to the facts behind the rumor, then give some ideas on how to introduce the PCs to the adventure.

Some of the rumors given in the Players' Notes are not expanded on here. Those are meant to be left open to the DM for his own campaign, to be used as s/he sees fit. Some of them can be used as side issues to the adventures presented here, but the use is entirely up to the DM.

IN FAR LANDS THREAT OF DEATH

The Rumor: Agents of the Red Wizards of Thay have openly slain merchants in Westgate and Scardale-port, and it is whispered that the fell Red Magic Cult is stirring again; perhaps the Red Wizards will resume their quest for world domination soon, in the Inner Sea Lands.

The Facts: The Red Wizards are always resuming their quest for world domination. They never stopped. However, this has little to do with it (see comments on the Armies of Living Dead and Legions of Elementals). In fact, the merchants were agents of Zhentil Keep who were trying to edge into the local slave-napping operation of the representatives of the Red Wizards. Not wishing to let their rivals push into their territory, the Red Wizards struck back through their agents.

Adventure Hooks: Adventurers trying to find a captured friend (see the next adventure) might have been chasing the merchants that the Red Wizards' agents slew. With the death of the merchants, the only clue to the fate of the PCs' friend is gone—unless the agents took the records of the dead merchants and know where the person was sold.

Alternately, the merchants slain were not the real targets of the Red Wizards. The agents were new to the area and got the wrong targets. The real merchants of Zhentil Keep are worried, and hire the PCs to defend them, "in case the Red Wizards attack us next." Of course they don't mention their real affiliation or why the Red Wizards might be after them.

This gives the PCs the opportunity of defending a position rather than attacking it—the usual adventurer situation. Give them the opportunity to set traps and spring ambushes. Of course, they also have the chance to find out just what the Zhentil Keep merchants are doing and who they are affiliated with. Then the PCs can take whatever action they feel necessary—from freeing the slaves taken and killing the merchants themselves to simply holding the merchants up for more money by using the threat of telling the local authorities what is going on. There is lots of area in between, depending on the alignments and motivations of the player characters.

In either case, the player characters can end up fighting the agents of the Red Wizards, which should include several fighters (adjusted according to the number of adventurers) and at least one Red Wizard (actually of a level compatible to that of the player characters—probably somewhere from 5th to 15th) of the school of Evocation with a couple of the special Red Wizard spells (see the Magic chapter) in his spellbook.

Assuming they are successful, the player characters have earned the enmity of the Red Wizards (and perhaps Zhentil Keep, too) and gained some information on the magics of Thay that will make them want to travel there.

SOLD INTO SLAVERY

The Rumor: The incidence of abductions throughout the Inner Sea area is growing greatly. Authorities are afraid, for reasons they'd rather not entertain, that the Red Wizards are adding to their slave coffles. Many young men and women with some experience in adventuring, though not as magic-users or clerics, are going missing.

The Facts: True enough. Recent excesses (see the Closer To Home section following) have reduced the slave population of Thay and the recruiters are redoubling their efforts to get more slaves for the farms and experiments of the Red Wizards.

Adventure Hooks: For a small group of players, get their characters all drugged (perhaps the wrong tankards of ale in a tavern they don't know). They wake up without their gear, chained in a slave coffle on its way by slave ship to Thay.

This is certainly a good start to a different adventure. The players must get free (any good thieves in the group?), turn the tables on their kidnappers, and take over the slave ship they have been chained to. Note that Thay does not use slaves on oars—that is a position for a specialist, not a slave. This ship is mostly a wide-bottomed sailing cargo ship, anyway, with a relatively small crew of about a dozen 0-level characters and the slavers, who are of a compatible level and number with the player characters.

The slavers have the advantage of gear (including, perhaps, some of the PCs' equipment) and their freedom, but they must sleep and eat in shifts and cannot all be awake and ready when the player characters make their break.

From this point, the characters can try to get home, or perhaps go on to explore this strange land that tried to steal them into slavery.

Rescue!

The Rumor: A friend of the player characters has gone missing. Now he or she has been seen on a slaver ship going to Thay.

The Facts: Sure enough, the friend has been taken.

Adventure Hooks: If the player characters want to see their friend again, they must take ship themselves and try to find and rescue their friend from the fate feared universally throughout the Realms, to be a slave in Thay.

If you have a large party of player characters, the capture-the-party adventure above is too cumbersome to use. Instead, give the characters incentive to find the slavers and get their friend back (maybe he has the destroyed map to the next treasure committed to memory). This can be a dashing journey across the Realms, ending with a sea chase and battle off the coast of Thay, perhaps with Thayan naval triremes within hailing distance that must be dissuaded from interfering (remember that the Thayan navy has magic-users, too).

Close To Home Invasion of The Living Dead

The Rumor: Armies of “walking dead” are said to be advancing steadily northwards from Thay, led by armored skeletal warriors of great power and fell aspect. Impiltur fears that Thay will overwhelm all the Eastern Lands, and then turn west to crush the Coastal Cities, Impiltur, and Aglarond.

The Facts: Zulkir Szass Tam has finally completed the manning of Myrkul’s Legion and decided to test out his army of zombies against the hated Rashemi. With the cooperation and supporting forces of the Tharchioness of Gauros, the zombies are on the march.

Adventure Hooks: Of course, this could be the golden opportunity to try out the BATTLESYSTEM™ Fantasy Combat Supplement rules with a full scale battle between the lightly armed but well-trained toops of Rashemen against a heavy infantry with little training but no morale problem whatsoever.

Assuming that you would rather run a role-playing game, assume that the Player Characters are adventurers exploring the ruins of Raumathar when they are contacted by the Witches of Rashemen. Play up this contact with lots of eerie effects and mysterious appearances and disappearances—the Witches are like that.

The Witches want the adventurers to infiltrate the camp of the living dead and destroy the leaders—the Dread Warriors created by Szass Tam (see Personalities section for description of this character and of his spell of animate dread warrior):

These super-zombies are the tactical commanders of the Legion of Myrkul, and if they can be destroyed, the zombies will have to have living commanders who are much more vulnerable to the spells of the Witches.

Elements of the adventure include creeping through a camp of the dead, where most of the inhabitants are alert and moving or just standing and watching, and avoiding the gaze of a diviner with wizard eye who observes a different section of the camp every minute. Once the characters reach the headquarters they must deal with the Dread Warriors. There are as many of them as will make a good struggle for the player characters.

DREAD WARRIOR

Frequency: Rare

No. Appearing: 1-12

Armor Class: 2-4

Move: 9”

Hit Dice: 4

% In Lair: Nil

Treasure Type: Nil

No. of Attacks: 1

Damage/Attack: 3-10

Special Attacks: Nil

Special Defenses: Nil

Magic Resistance: See Below

Intelligence: Low

Alignment: Neutral Evil

Size: M

Psionic Ability: Nil

Attack/Defense Modes: Nil

Dread Warriors are like zombies, but they must be created just after death and they still retain some small intelligence—enough to carry out unimaginative orders.

A Dread Warrior must be created from the body of a fighter, who retains some of his fighting skill. That's why he has 4 hit dice. He is also usually armored well, as he is a valuable part of the army of Thay.

Dread Warriors are turned as a wight is turned, and they have all the immunities to various magics that zombies do. They are faster than normal zombies, and have a normal initiative roll. The damage they do is 3-10 (1d8 +2) or by weapon type +2 (for Strength). In any situation requiring Strength, they have the equivalent of 18(01). The weapons they use are the same that their fighters' bodies used.

Dread Warriors have the ability to command other zombies, and convey to them commands as complicated as they can understand. This exceeds the usual zombie limit of a dozen words, but is still not very complex.

THE ZOMBIES OF MYRKUL'S LEGION

These zombies are the same as the zombies given in The Monster Manual, but they have been equipped with decent armor, and have an armor class of 5, not 8.

Fighting the Zombies

The alternative to the player characters trying to sneak in among the zombies, particularly if you have an inexperienced player character group that is notably incapable of sneaking, is to have them join the Rashemi in defending either the northeast wall of the Gorge of Gauros or some Rashemi town against the zombie army.

Fight the rest of the battle abstractly, either using die rolls or your own whim to determine the success of the fight, and provide occasional reports to the player characters about how their allies are doing. Face the player characters with 20 or so heavily armored zombies to battle. If they have a cleric who drives most of the zombies away, then confront them with Dread Warriors in sufficient number to leave some which can continue to attack, even if the cleric is successful against them.

If the player characters are successful in their area of the battle, then the Rashemi, backed up by their redoubtable Witches, will probably be successful in their part of the battle. Then the player characters can try to press the attack back on the commanders of the zombies. Depending on the level of the player characters, they might even meet the Tharchion of Gauros, or Zulkir Szass Tam himself. See the Personalities Section for more detail on these people.

If the player characters are not of sufficient level, run them up against a subsidiary necromancer with some human or gnollish guards and use that as the final threat to the party.

Fire Time

The Rumor: The Red Wizards of Thay have sent legions of elementals against rebellious neighboring satraps, destroying four of them (the coastal cities of Lasdur, Taskaunt, Murbant, and Thasselen) utterly, taking those lands (and that of Hilbrand, which surrendered without a fight) under Thay's banner. Escalant, the most powerful of the cities, is currently under siege.

It is thought that such vast numbers of elementals could not be summoned by spell, but rather a gate or portal was opened directly to the plane of elemental fire. The sages of Phsalt warn that if all the hosts of Thay were mustered and hurled against these new forces, Thay's army would quickly go down to defeat. Whatever means the Red Wizards have for gaining such forces must be ended, they say, and magical forces must be gathered immediately to match this present strength.

The Facts: The Zulkir of Conjunction and Summoning is working with the Tharchion of the Lapendrar to rid Thay of the competition of the North Coast Cities once and for all. The Zulkir opened up a gate to the Plane of Elemental Fire and obtained the help of the Lords of Fire (the tributary lords to Kosuth, Lord of Flames). The lord of salamanders has provided a troop (about 100 beings) of those monsters and the Sultan has given the command of a troop of efreeti to the Zulkir.

In return, the Zulkir and the Tharchion have promised to leave the South Coast ablaze forever, a place on the Material Plane for fire elementals to cavort to their hearts' content. Of course, the Zulkir intends to renege on this promise if he can somehow make it seem like he tried but was unsuccessful. The Lords of Fire, of course, intend to use the North Coast as simply a stepping stone to taking over the Realms as a satrap of their domain.

Adventure Hooks: No matter how you approach this adventure, it is not meant for a low level party. Characters should probably be 7th level and above to have a chance of success. The first possible variation on this adventure, of course, is a simple battle against an army of salamanders and efreeti, plus the two or three human Thayvian legions who are backing them up. Unless the player characters are of incredibly high level, this would best be done using the BATTLESYSTEM™ Fantasy Combat Supplement rules, with the player characters either part of or leading the defenders of Escalant (who are a mixed bag of troop types hired as mercenaries—and who do not have very high morale against this kind of invading army).

Another approach is to give the player characters the mission of stopping the invasion at the source—the gate opened up to bring the salamanders and efreeti through.

The site of the gate is at the village at the top of the First Escarpment next to the River Lapendrar. The name of the village is First Falls. At this time, the site can be told by the pillar of smoke rising above it, the aftereffect of the wholesale burning the salamanders did just for fun after they came through the gate. The village is in ruins, and some of the villagers, who mostly work to support the local travel tax collectors, fish, and do enough farming to keep themselves alive, are trying to rebuild.

The gate itself is on the opposite side of town from the river. It is standing by itself in a burned-out patch of grass, and looks like a steady flame about ten feet high and six feet across, but there is nothing around it to burn. The gate is guarded by an honor guard of salamanders and efreeti (adjust numbers to suit number of characters and power of party).

The gate can be destroyed with a simple successful dispel magic (it was established by a 24th level wizard) or a blow with a rod of cancellation or some other such anti-magic attack. If the gate is destroyed, the salamanders and efreeti are drawn back to their own plane, since they were not shielded with the elemental transference magics that let such beings live on the Material Plane otherwise.

This is a stopgap. After all, another gate can be formed, but it gives time for a more powerful party to perform the following mission. If there is a more powerful player party available, they can perform the mission. Otherwise, say that a powerful party of NPCs has finally gotten together and, now that the invasion threat does not have to be met, they will perform the final mission.

The final mission is for a very powerful and suitably protected party to enter the Elemental Plane of Fire and try to bring this invasion to the attention of Kossuth, Lord of Flame. The Lord of Salamanders and Sultan of the Efreeti do not have their lord's permission for this little excursion, and Kossuth may just see this as an attempt to build up their power to match his own. Besides, he realizes that this will eventually attract the attention of the other elemental rulers, none of whom wish the Lord of Flames to gain such an advantage over them.

Naturally, the Lord of Salamanders and Sultan of Efreeti do not want their expedition brought to the attention of their master. No matter what their actual motivations, they know that he will take the above interpretation of their actions, and they will not be able to dissuade him. Therefore, they will attempt to stop the player characters in some way that does not leave the trademarks of their interference.

Thus, rather than use salamanders and efreeti against the party, they will try to destroy them in a way that looks accidental or at least not attributable to their efforts.

Mane Event

The Rumor: The adventurers' band led by the fighter Mane, formerly resident in Shadowdale, has disappeared in the South. There is talk of their defeat and death in the Yuirwood, but other say they have fallen in battle with the Red Wizards in Thay, or even that Mane has become chieftain and war leader of the nomads of the Shaar. Nothing is certain, however; all is speculation.

The Facts: Mane gathered together his friends (who could be the player characters) and took them on an expedition into the Yuirwood of Aglarond. He had found a map that led to the treasure of the pirate leader known as Redsail, who disappeared 200 years ago after a 40-year career of killing and looting throughout the Inner Sea.

Adventure Hooks: This is a wide-open adventure with lots of places to go. If the player characters are in Mane's band, they enter the Yuirwood, follow the map, and are confronted by a band of satyrs. Unlike their merry woodland and meadow creature cousins found elsewhere, these satyrs are fierce and warlike. Redsail managed to bury his treasure in a spot close to the center of the forest because he was on good terms with the remnants of the Yuir elves who lived there. Now, however, the elves are gone and the satyrs have taken refuge from their oppressors in the darkest part of the forest.

Worse for the party, the satyrs have some allies. One group of allies is a tribe of centaurs. The other group is a Red Wizard, Gombdalla of Pyarados, and her entourage. For details on Gombdalla, see the Personalities section.

Naturally, the Red Wizard and satyrs have long-since found Redsail's treasure, and are using it to build up their power base in the forest.

Gombdalla's principal plan is to organize the satyrs and centaurs as a fifth column inside Aglarond for the next Thayvian invasion.

If you do not want to team your normal player characters up with someone named Mane, you can, of course, read them the rumor and then have them confronted by a member of Mane's band who had been deathly ill and could not go with them on this mission. The NPC can either be recovered or still very ill, depending on whether you want him or her to accompany the player characters (this is also a good way to introduce a new character to the party, if such a thing is needed).

The former companion to Mane has a copy of the map that Mane left with him or her. He or she wants to find out what happened. The companion is very sure that Mane is not a chieftain of nomads. Mane hated nomads...

In this case, you can send the party after Mane, and have them run into the same situation. Mane's party has been wiped out. Perhaps Gombdalla and her people have more magical weapons and items because of what they took from Mane and company. And their plans to destroy Aglarond from within have some help from the other fell beasts that are starting to congregate in the Yuirwood.

This means that this adventure can coincide with the following one.

Out of The Woods

The Rumor: Strange creatures have been sighted in the Yuirwood and are thought to be spreading. Throughout the fall, trolls seemed to be growing more numerous, and then owlbears were reported. As the weather grew colder, a bulette was seen, and it was rapidly followed by other nameless or unique creatures, things which seem to be expanding outwards from the depths of the woods. The adventurer Sparleye was last seen in this area with his company, the Men of the Purple Arrow. Others who have gone into the woods have not returned, and traders are avoiding the area.

The Facts: Sparleye and the Men of the Purple Arrow are, in fact, Thayvian agents. They disappeared into the woods at the order of Gombdalla, who wanted some human backup if the non-humans she is dealing with proved intractable. Now the band is helping train the satyrs and centaurs in mass tactics and getting them used to the armor that was sent from Thay in the summer. The trolls, owlbears, and other monsters are some of Gombdalla's pets that she is expending to keep snoopers out of the area while she trains the satyrs and centaurs.

Adventure Hooks: As far as the world knows, Sparleye and his followers were adventurers. Perhaps a little nastier than some, but still just adventurers. Moreover, the Council of Aglarond is very concerned about all these monsters, which they thought had been eradicated from the Yuirwood centuries ago. They want someone to go in and find out what is going on.

If the party looking for Mane (or Mane's party) arrives in Aglarond, they may get asked to look into this matter as well. Aglarond is offering a sizable reward (which should depend on the competency of the adventuring party) and helping Aglarond is helping the Simbul—a lady who is always a good person to befriend. She would probably be doing this herself, but she is not available right now.

The Statues That Walk

The Rumor: To the south of old, vast, Thay, the even more ancient kingdom of Mulhorand has been jolted in the past year: the Statues That Walk have begun to move once more. Over a thousand stone statues of time-lost origin stand all about this dusky-hilled country. At odd but long separated intervals, these stone men animate and walk about apparently towards specific (now-vanished?) destinations. They stop at times and then move on again, fight any who bar their way or attack them, and at times hew at rocks or clear pathways through certain areas.

This latter behavior is a frightening thing when these areas are many-towered cities or tanglewood forests. The stone men are mute and apparently non-intelligent and no one has yet found a way to control them. Some have crossed through the border walls into Thay as well as into Unther, a desert land that lies south and west of Mulhorand.

Tholaunt, Divine Precept of Mulhorand (one of the "god-kings" of Mulhorand) says the coming of the statues to life is not his doing nor that of any of his family, as far as he can tell, and adds that the power of controlling the statues is not known to his family. Some have whispered of strife within his family, though, and say that the Statues may be under the control of another.

The Facts: As a matter of fact, Derlaunt, Precept of Gheldaneth, and cousin to Tholaunt, is entirely responsible. He found an old record that seemed to indicate a method of controlling one of the statues, which would be a definite coup in the ongoing power games that occupy the time of the god-kings. He performed the ritual as best he could interpret it. He rapidly found that (1) he could not control the statue and (2) the ritual as he performed it had awakened all of them. He has no idea of how to stop them. He already tried what should be the reverse of the ritual. No good.

Adventure Hooks: The simplest adventure can take place anywhere surrounding Mulhorand, or in Mulhorand itself. One of the statues is marching straight at a town or city. It must be stopped.

STATUE THAT WALKS

Frequency: Rare

No. Appearing: 1

Armor Class: 2

Move: 12"

Hit Dice: 100 Hit Points

% In Lair: Nil

Treasure Type: Nil

No. of Attacks: 1

Damage/Attack: 5-30

Special Attacks: Nil

Special Defenses: See Below

Magic Resistance: See Below

Intelligence: Non-

Alignment: Neutral

Size: L (18' tall)

Psionic Ability: Nil

Attack/Defense Modes: Nil

Statues That Walk are actually oversized stone golems. However, they do not have the ability to cast a slow spell. Their strength is comparable to that of a fire giant.

The Statues were built as caretakers by a race long-since gone in the Realms when members of that race knew they were dying out from a series of plagues they could not fight. The race was proud of its monuments and buildings, and built the Statues to maintain the glory of these structures and tear down anything that would detract from them.

The Statues performed their duties for centuries until the magic-users and priests of the lizard-men who supplanted the builders found a method of stopping them (a very long and drawn-out ritual taking days and needing special glyphs to be drawn on every one of the Statues. The Divine Precept will discover this ritual in a few months). The lizard-men could not harm the Statues, but they could take apart the buildings they guarded and did so, using them for their own structures which were later taken down and reused by the humans who supplanted the lizard-men.

The Statue will march into the town and, when it runs into a building, tear it down, then go on to the next one. The town is on the site of one of the monuments built thousands of years ago by the creators of the Statue. At this point, the remains of the monument are about 200 feet under the current ground surface, but the Statue knows where it should be by the number of paces he took to get to it, and he will keep tearing the town apart until he finds the monument or is certain that he cannot find the monument, at which time he becomes rigid again and waits for orders.

If the ritual for stopping is not performed on each of the Statues, they will each stop when they get to the site of one of the monuments or buildings they are supposed to take care of and find that it is not there. They are awaiting the order to go on to the next job on their rounds. They stop because the lizard-men's spell permanently destroyed the Statues' ability to move on from one job to the next. They have to be started by the ritual the Precept of Gheldaneth performed to go on to the next assignment.

There are no known vestiges of the original culture remaining except the Statues. However, you can assume that one or two (being used for entirely different purposes, of course) are still around if you want to surprise the player characters by having a Statue approach an ancient wizard's tower and start polishing it.

The Simbul's Journey

The Rumor: In Aglarond, the Simbul, the famous dweomercrafter who rules that country, appears to have left her court shape-changed (perhaps as a cat or falcon) and vanished. Upon her high seat she left a signed letter directing her council to govern Aglarond wisely and dispose of several specific matters (no details are known) thus and so. It is thought she may have headed north to speak with the elves around the Great Dale (with whom she has an uneasy alliance), and/or to observe events in the strategic Dalelands and discuss things with the remaining elves in Myth Drannor. There are rumors of war between Zhentil Keep and the northern dales and Scardale and its neighboring dales, as well as the sudden announcement of the formation of the Iron Throne, a merchant alliance, which intends to operate in the area. The Simbul is known for her unpredictable behavior and mastery of magic, and the tale most often told of her is her unaided destruction of the Red Sword mercenary company at Mistbridge.

Huge balls of fire, four or five in number, appeared in the sky above the Towers of the Blade in Mulmaster shortly after the Simbul left Aglarond. There was a battle involving magic within the Tower and rumor has it that the Simbul was involved.

The Facts: The Simbul gained some inkling of the various plans of the Red Wizards and has decided to check for herself. The incident at the Towers of the Blade was a side issue, dealing with the importunings of the First Blade, who thought that the Simbul would make a better mate for him than the First Princess of Thay. She proved him wrong.

Adventure Hooks: The Simbul is far afield when suddenly Thay has invaded Rashemen (see INVASION OF THE LIVING DEAD) and the North Coast cities (see FIRE TIME) and even has infiltrators in the Yuirwood (see MANE EVENT and OUT OF THE WOODS). If the adventuring party consists of people who have done favors for the Harpers, or are known to be upright souls, the Simbul will suddenly reveal herself to them and ask that they go back to her home country and investigate these things. She is in the middle of a major investigation herself, and cannot spare the time. She knows the player characters can handle the assignment. She gives them a small vial of a strange liquid. If they expose the liquid to the air, she will know they need help and fly to aid them. But it had better be important.

You can use this encounter as a way to get player characters into any of the other adventures. The Simbul's vial contains an air elemental which will find her quickly, and she will take whatever form will return her to the party the quickest. She will tell them that she cannot be with them instantly, so they had better use the vial when they know they are up against a major problem, such as journeying into the Elemental Plane of Fire, but before they get into the middle of it. The vial will not work if they go to another plane.

In Thay Godson's Quest

The Rumor: Iyachtu Xvim has been seen in Thay recently, on some quest for his father.

The Facts: Bane is not happy with Thay and the Red Wizards. While it is true that some of the Wizards worship Bane, most tend to neglect worship of any god, or worship more neutral deities. Worse, the Red Wizards have made it plain that many of them have the eventual goal of accumulating enough power to become gods themselves.

There is not much he can do about this, but he has sent his son in response to an exhortation by the High Priest of Bane in Bezantur to punish these blasphemers.

The Godson is attempting to find a Red Wizard foolish enough to call on him to destroy other wizards. With all the conflicting plots and counterplots currently affecting Thayvian culture, it is only a matter of time.

In the meantime, he is using intermediaries (disguised priests of Bane) to establish himself as an assassin of powerful targets, the better to be contacted by Red Wizards who might want to use his services.

Adventure Hooks: Any contact with the Godson should be by high-level characters. The player characters are contacted by a rich merchant (who might or might not be Thayvian, but who is currently in Thay) who needs help. He has heard that he is marked for death by a rival, and he fears that his mercenary bodyguards are inadequate for the job. He needs help in the form of magic and clerical power, and he comes to the adventurers to supply it.

The merchant is sufficiently powerful that he can recruit the adventurers from outside of Thay if need be. The godson likes to advertise his intent (though not necessarily his presence) before killing a victim, so there is time for the characters to arrive.

From there, it is simply a matter of waiting, and perhaps experiencing the culture of Thay first-hand, until the Godson finally shows up.

IYACHTU XVIM, "The Godson"

Demigod

ARMOR CLASS: -2

MOVE: 13"

HIT POINTS: 96

NO. OF ATTACKS: 2

DAMAGE/ATTACK: 9-12/9-12 or by weapon

SPECIAL ATTACKS: See Below

SPECIAL DEFENSES: True Sight

MAGIC RESISTANCE: 70%

SIZE: L (12' tall)

ALIGNMENT: Lawful Evil

WORSHIPPERS' ALIGNMENTS: Lawful Evil

SYMBOL: A pair of green, glowing eyes on a black field

PLANE: Prime Material (Acheron)

CLERIC/DRUID: nil

FIGHTER: 15th Level Fighter

THIEF/ASSASSIN: Nil

MONK/BARD: Nil

PSIONIC ABILITY: V

S:22 (+4, +10), I:17, W:16, D:20, C:20, CH:17

The son of Bane, he serves as the instrument of his father's will, traveling constantly about the Prime Material Plane to wherever Bane desires to take a direct hand in local affairs. He fights with his great clawed hands or with the Soul Blade, a giant +3 LE scimitar that drains 2 life energy levels whenever it hits a living opponent (level 0 = death, not undead status). The Godson is usually naked and has mottled brown-black, scaled skin. He has green, burning eyes and can create darkness 15' radius about himself at will. Once every 66 turns he can plane shift from Acheron to the Prime Material Plane or vice versa.

Iyachtu does not like wearing garments, and cannot abide the burning touch (2-12 hit points damage per strike) of silver in whatever form.

Much of the Godson's past deeds and true nature are a mystery to mortals in the Realms, even among the high priests of Bane, but few creatures wish to meet him personally to satisfy their curiosity.

The Wizard's Tower

The Rumor: The wizard Dillomat has not been seen outside of his tower for months. It is thought that he may have died, as he was old and feeble when last seen. The Autharch of the northeast region of Tyraturos is looking for brave adventurers to enter the tower (and its many guardians and pitfalls) and find out Dillomat's current status and whether the Red Wizards should reclaim the tower for some other of their number. Dillomat has no known heirs.

The Autharch has received authority to offer anyone entering the tower first pick of the contents (one pick per person) if Dillomat has indeed died, or a healthy reward in platinum coins if Dillomat is still alive, but incommunicado. It is difficult to determine which condition is the more deadly for adventurers entering the tower.

The Facts: The Autharch first sent his own people into the tower. They didn't come out. The first offer, 100 gp to each prospective adventurer, went begging when the report of the missing tax collectors came out.

Dillomat is not dead, or at least he is not dead on this plane. He left for another plane about three months ago and has not returned.

However, Dillomat's tower is not unoccupied. He had collected a small band of monsters as helpers and associates, and they are still in residence. In fact, they are being fed by a couple of doppelgangers who slip out of the tower, change form, and go shopping in the market. They are also responsible for several recent disappearances.

Space considerations forbid extensive detailing of the monsters to be found in the tower, but they involve several different types from several planes. Their main function is to guard the tower.

Adventure Hook: This one is obvious. Scale the monsters and the magical item rewards to meet the actual level of player characters. Remember that Dillomat lived in this tower. There may be traps, but not many and not trapping the main corridors and living areas. The various monsters should be traps enough.

No monster should be of Large size, and probably several Small size monsters would be appropriate. One mystery to point out is that several of these monsters need food and water, and that is available. If the characters are initially driven out, perhaps they figure this out and trace the doppelgangers and gain another entry that way.

GREY FOREST

● Lyrabar

Hill of Tombs
● Hlammath

Fitur

● Dilpur

● Songhal

Sea of Fallen Stars

Spandeliyon

●

EASTING REACH

Keelbest

Spears

Nyth

Ethbil

River Eth

River Flam

Telflamm

Phent

Inkarr

Culmaster

Thassalra

Cape DRAGONFANG

THESI

Milvarune

The Fang or South Fang

Sea of Dlung

Dahst

FIndar

Osker

EMMeth

Orllhar

Furthinghome

ASHANATH

Spearsmouth Dale

Phsant

Tamar

Two-Stars

Tezir-on-the-Mars

River Sun

Nethentir

Lake Umber

River Umber

Nethjet

HESK

THAYMOUN

Crtar

ATH

RASHEMEN

ars

ir-on-the-Marsh

River Mulsantin

Lake Mulsantin

Gorge of Gaumos

SUrthay

SUrmarsh

The Long Portage

River Mulsantin

River Chay

River Gaumos

YMOUNT

Citadel

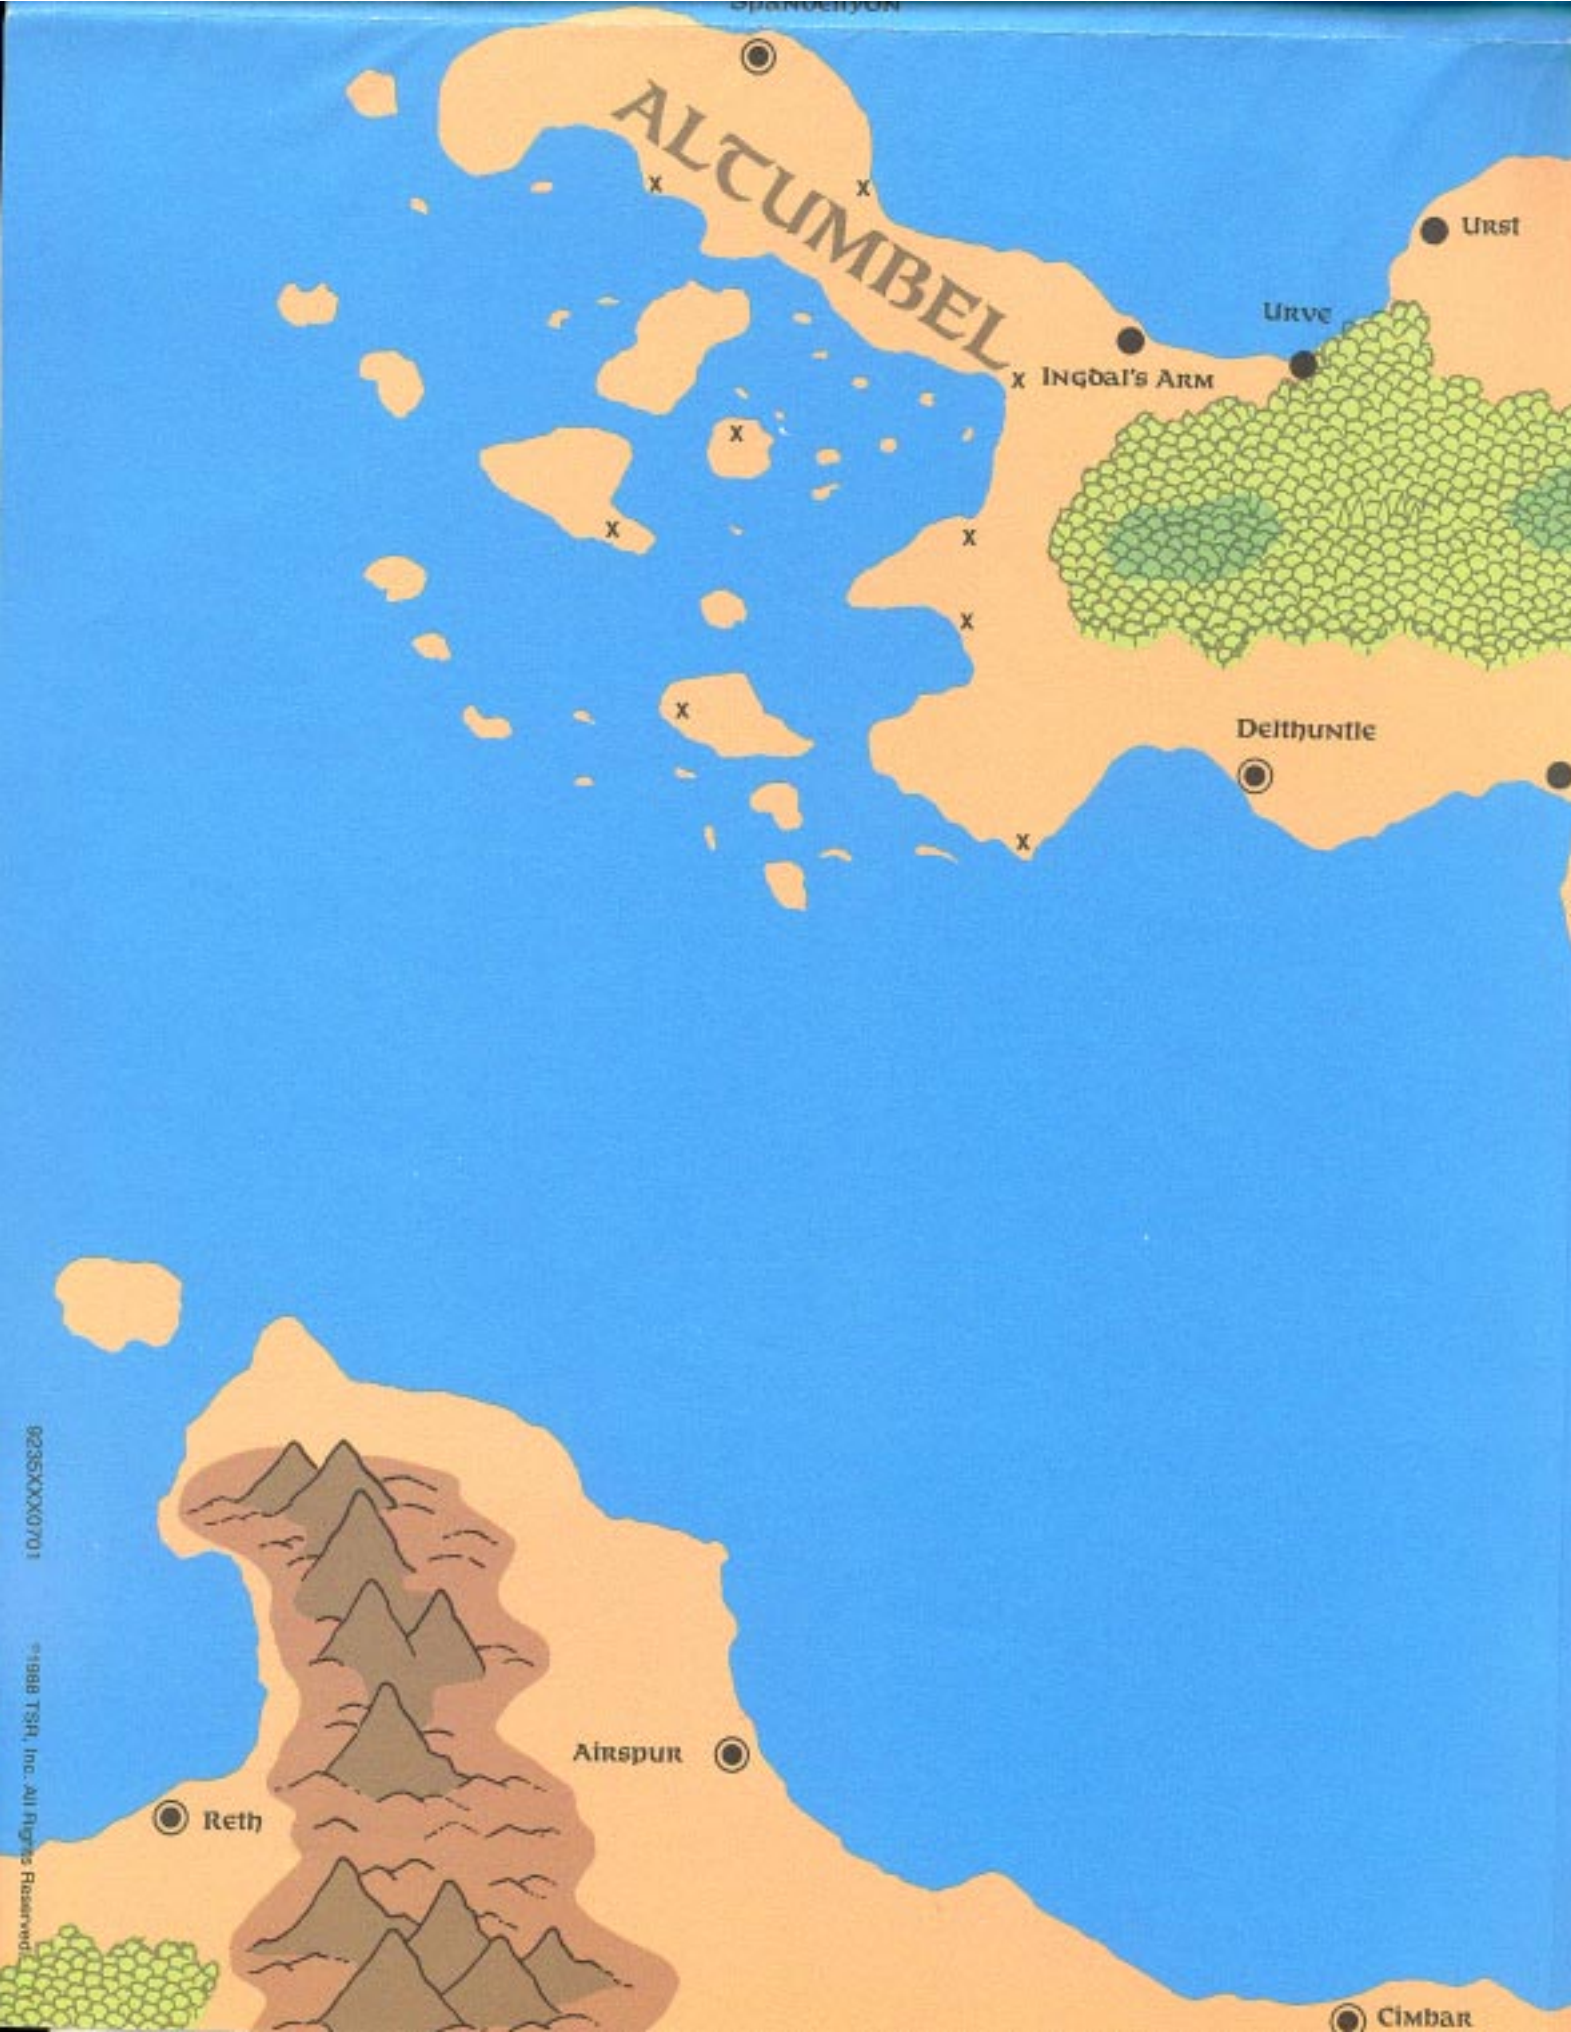

Gold Mines

Ruins of Delhumide

Lake Chaylambax

River Eltax

Eltabbar

ALTUMBEL

Urst

Urve

Ingdal's Arm

Delthuntle

Airspun

Reth

Cimbar

9235XXXX0701

©1988 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved

AGLAROND

YUIRWOOD

Bay of Chessenta

THE

THESKEL

River UMBER

Nethjet

2ND ESCARPMENT

Cannath

Watchwall

JARONBAR

AMRUTHAR

askaunt

Escalant

Murbant

Chasselen

1st ESCARPMENT

THE WIZARD'S REACH

MOUNT CHUIBANE

KEL

The Long Beach

THAY

The Priador

The Aldor

THAZALHAR
River of the Dawn

SUNRISE MOUNTAINS

MULHORAND

to Alamban Sea (Schaugin Sea)

to Durpat and Raumin

Eltabbar

Cyraturos

Pyarados

Bezantur

Sultim

High Road

Eastern Way

Sunrise Escarpment

Gold Mines

to Plain of Purple Dust

Advanced Dungeons & Dragons®

Source Book for the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ Game World

Dreams of the Red Wizards

by Steve Perrin

The Red Wizards of Thay. As cruel and horrible as they are powerful, they have ruled their eastern realm for as long as any sage can remember. They can be powerful allies, or deadly enemies. The Red Wizards know the darkest secrets of the strongest magic, and will sell their skills to the highest bidder. Thay is a land of slavers and tyrants, of intrigue and murder, of danger and opportunity. In this book, the government, personalities, economy, cities, people, and wilderness of Thay are described for an AD&D® campaign of any size or level. Dreams of the Red Wizards also includes new spells and magical items unique to the Red Wizards, plus a four-color map of Thay that can be added to the previously published maps of the Forgotten Realms!

©1988 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

Printed in the U.S.A.

TSR, Inc.
POB 756
Lake Geneva,
WI 53147 USA

TSR UK Ltd.
The Mill, Rathmore Road
Cambridge CB1 4AD
United Kingdom

ISBN 0-88038-615-0

0 46363 09235 1

FORGOTTEN REALMS™

Official Game Accessory

Hall of Heroes

Complete descriptions and AD&D® game stats for the greatest heroes and villains of the FORGOTTEN REALMS™ novels and accessories.

TSR, Inc.
PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION™

Hall of Heroes

Table of Contents

Introduction	2
Major Characters	3 - 55
Adon	3 - 4
Alias	5 - 9
Bruenor Battlehammer	10 - 13
Cyric	14
Doin Sanehiro	16 - 18
Drizzt Do'Urden	19 - 22
Dragonbait	23 - 26
Elminster	27 - 33
Kelemvor	34 - 37
Prince Tristan Kendrick	38 - 41
Midnight	42 - 43
Robyn	44 - 46
Shandril Shessair	47 - 50
Narm Tamaraiith	51 - 52
Wulfgar	53 - 55
Minor Characters	56 - 105
Adventuring Brotherhoods	106 - 128

Credits

Authors: Jeff Grubb and Kate Novak (Alias, Dragonbait); David E. Martin (Adon, Cyric, Kelemvor, Midnight, Mourngrym Amcathra, Shaerl Amcathra); Jim Lowder (King Azoun IV, Akabar Bel Akash, Cassana, Dimswart, Mistinarperadnacles Hai Draco, Zrie Prakis, Olive Ruskettle); Bruce Nesmith (Elminster, Narm Tamaraiith, Shandril Shessair, Lhaeo, Rauglothgar); Steve Perrin (Tristan Kendrick, Robyn, Alzegund, Khelben Arunsun, Fzoul Chembryl, Cyndre, Daryth, Duman, Finellen, Kappiyan Flurmastyr, Grunnarch, Hobarth, Kazgaroth, Maaril, Manshoon, Manxam, Mirt, Genna Moonsinger, Orgauth, Pawldo, Nymara Scheiron, Storm Silverhand, The Simbul, Sylune of Shadowdale, Vangerdahast, Xanathar); Mike Pondsmith (Doin Sanehiro, Jinchin, Kuang, Masakado, Okotampe, Onoye, The Wanderer); R.A. Salvatore (Bruenor Battlehammer, Drizzt Do'Urden, Wulfgar, Alustriel, Catti-Brie, Dendybar, Artemis Entreri, Malchor Harpell, Piergeiron, Regis, Sydney)

Editing: Scott Bowles
 Cover Art: Jeff Easley
 Interior Art: Ned Dameron
 Typography: Kim Janke, Angelika Lokotz and Betty Elmore
 Keylining: Paul Hanchette
 Special thanks to Scott Ciencin and Ed Greenwood

TSR, Inc.
 POB 756
 Lake Geneva,
 WI 53147 USA

TSR Ltd.
 120 Church End, Cherry Hinton
 Cambridge CB1 3LB
 United Kingdom

ADVANCED DUNGEONS & DRAGONS, AD&D, FORGOTTEN REALMS, DRAGON, PRODUCTS OF YOUR IMAGINATION, and the TSR logo are trademarks owned by TSR, Inc.

Distributed to the book trade in the United States by Random House, Inc., and in Canada by Random House of Canada, Ltd. Distributed to the toy and hobby trade by regional distributors. Distributed in the United Kingdom by TSR Ltd.

This material is protected under the copyright laws of the United States of America. Any reproduction or unauthorized use of the material or artwork contained herein is prohibited without the express written permission of TSR, Inc.

©1989 TSR, Inc. All Rights Reserved. Printed in U.S.A.

INTRODUCTION

King Arthur. Robin Hood. Edward, the Black Prince. Roland. Joan of Arc... All of these people, whether or not they ever really existed, have one very special thing in common—they are all heroes. As heroes, all of these men and women hold an important place in our culture, and our hearts. For heroes afford us all a roadmap to the heights we can achieve, if only we work hard enough and follow our dreams.

What you hold in your hands is a roll call of heroes, and all of them call one fantasy world—the Forgotten Realms—their home. These characters, like the Merlins and Friar Tucks who are their literary great-great-grandfathers, show us magnificent feats of courage and wisdom.

Sometimes, as in Darkwalker on Moonshae, the heroes are called upon to right great wrongs that threaten a kingdom. Sometimes, as in the upcoming Avatar Trilogy, the heroes are asked to battle the gods themselves and save the entire world from certain destruction. The courage and skill necessary to succeed in these adventures is obvious.

Yet, all the beings who fight for Law or Good included in these pages may not flash a sword with the finesse of the evil swordsmen they encounter, or throw lightning bolts with as great a fury as the archmages who oppose them. But it was not power alone that made Shandril Shessair go on, even though the whole world seemed against her in Spellfire. It was her spirit, her will to live and be free, as well as her amazing powers, that let Shandril defeat all her enemies.

For the true hero, then the battles fought with the spirit are as important as the ones fought with a blade or incantation. In Azure Bonds, for example, Alias' battle to control her own destiny and understand her origin is just as important as her combat with the dark god, Moander. In fact, one battle without the other is really just empty brava-do.

Of course, heroes have to be challenged along the road to their goal. Perhaps they even fail for a time. Still, the grail they seek would not be as valuable without the doubt and hardship faced on the way to recovering it. And if they stumble along the way, that's fine, too; we don't really expect our heroes to be perfect. (Besides, they'd be rather boring if they were.) In the end, however, we expect the true hero to see through the troubles that block his path and find a way to reach his goal, whether it be Mithril Hall or peace for the Moonshaes, by putting his beliefs into action.

On this front, however, the hero would be nowhere without a worthy opponent, someone to hide the grail in an inaccessible place and try to prevent him from finding it. Heroes are nothing without villains to challenge them.

You will find in these pages, therefore, the significant evil characters in our heroes' lives. These beings are often the ones that started the hero on his quest. In every case, by opposing the hero, the villain made the hero reach for new heights of strength and wisdom.

Where would King Arthur be without Mordred to thwart his vision of Camelot? Where would Robin Hood be without Sir Guy or the Sheriff of Nottingham to keep him working for the poor and oppressed? It's hard to imagine.

Fzoul Chembryl's search for power and Dendybar the Mottled's quest for the Crystal Shard are really just as interesting as the goals of the heroes they oppose. They, too deserve a place in these pages.

Of course there are thousands of heroes and villains worthy of induction in to our Hall. Most of you have probably played characters that might deserve a place there. But for now, at least, the Hall of Heroes is limited to just some of the worthy of the Forgotten Realms.

The monuments inscribed to the elite of the Realms in these pages have been constructed with care and diligence.

Once you enter the Hall, you will find three sections of entries. First, you will meet the major heroes of the Realms: Elminster, Bruenor, Tristan Kendrick, and the rest. Included along with their game stats, you will find personal histories, background information on related characters, and even role-playing hints.

Next, you will encounter the minor heroes of the Realms, those who have yet to play a central part in a FORGOTTEN REALMS™ story. You will find the evil characters here, as well, from Casana of Westgate to Rauglothgar the dracolich. For these characters, we have given you game stats, brief character histories, and role-playing tips, too.

In the third section of the book, you'll find information on two famous adventuring brotherhoods: the seemingly ever-present Knights of Myth Drannor, and the Company of Eight from the module Empire of the Sands. All the members of both adventuring companies are detailed, giving you enough information on each member to run the group as well-developed NPCs in your FORGOTTEN REALMS campaign.

That's one of the major reason the Hall was built: to give you all the information you need to include these heroes and villains in your own AD&D® games set in the Forgotten Realms. In addition, we know you'll find the characters you are not familiar with interesting enough to want to read more about their heroism in the FORGOTTEN REALMS products you've missed. Finally, we've even thrown in previews of some soon-to-be major heroes in the Realms: the four heroes from the upcoming Avatar Trilogy, and the heroes of a projected Kara-Tur novel.

The heroes you will find within the Hall will inspire the player characters in your campaign to be greater heroes themselves. Just as assuredly, the villains found within these pages will make your players strive to defeat them, if only to survive the encounter. Use the material found here wisely and one day your characters, too, could stand in the Hall of Heroes.

Jim Lowder
January 11, 1989

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Adon

ARMOR CLASS: 2

MOVE: 12"

Hit Points: 25

NO. OF ATTACKS: 1

DAMAGE/ATTACK: By weapon type or spell

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Spell use

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil

MAGIC RESISTANCE: Nil

SIZE: M (5'11")

ALIGNMENT: Neutral Good

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

Fifth-Level Human Cleric

S:11 I:9 W:15 D:12 C:12 CH:13

Armor: Plate mail, large shield.

Languages: Common, Elven.

Skills: Medicine, herbalism.

Weapons of proficiency: Mace (1d6 + 1/1d6), flail (1d6 + 1/1d6 + 2), war hammer (1d4/1d4).

Possessions: Plate mail, large shield, mace, war hammer, holy symbol (on neck cord), holy water (four vials), notebook filled with poems he's written praising women.

Experience points: 25,000.

Money: Under 400 gp at any time.

Spells: Adon can cast five first-level, four second-level, and one third-level spell each day. Spells marked below with an asterisk are ones he favors and almost certainly regains each day.

- First-level — Bless, ceremony, command, *cure light wounds, detect evil, detect magic, *light, protection from evil, sanctuary
- Second-level — Detect charm, *hold person, resist fire, silence (15' radius), snake charm, speak with animals.
- Third-level — Cure disease, dispel magic, prayer.

Combat: Adon's attacks differ greatly depending on the circumstances and whether or not women are involved.

Adon prefers to capture humanoid opponents alive because the dead cannot be converted. Since non-humanoids cannot be converted, he attacks them with impunity.

If Adon is attacked while unprepared or unwilling to unleash his full powers, such as when he is relaxing or surrounded by townspeople, he will attempt to use his spells to seize control of the attacker. Once the opponent is safely neutralized, Adon tries to determine if his captive is under another's control, magical or otherwise.

If others are threatened, especially women, Adon will rush to their assistance. He will attack on sight anyone he sees abusing a woman. If this occurs within a community, he will use his remaining spells to make the malefactor see the error of his ways. If this occurs in the wild, he will tie up or otherwise subdue the malefactor to insure that person can no longer harm the previously distressed woman.

Adon's weak point is women. His adoration of them compromises his combat sense. He cannot move himself to attack a woman. Even if she is trying to kill him, Adon concentrates on parrying her attacks rather than striking his own blows. He always cedes the initiative to a female opponent. If he unwittingly kills a woman in combat, he will try to make sure she is resurrected as soon as possible.

However, if his own female companions are threatened, he will fight completely unrestrained to protect them, battling to their side, then moving in front of them to protect them from further attack.

Appearance: Adon is in his mid-20s and has fair skin, light brown hair, and green eyes. Though he is plain featured, he does everything he can to increase his physical attractiveness. He dresses well and even keeps his battle gear shiny.

Personality: Adon is very vain, always managing to catch his reflection in any mirror. He is sure that he can raise his appearance up to his high self-image. He is incredibly verbose; once he begins speaking, he is prone to keep going until every possible listener has fled the area.

Adon holds an unswerving belief in the perfection of womankind. He believes each woman deserves to be atop a pedestal; even if she climbs down, he promptly puts her back up. His smothering optimism eventually drives to distraction any woman who spends any time with him. He is oblivious to his patronizing attitude.

Relatives: Abrasax (father), Phylicia (mother), Phred (distant cousin).

Allies: Kelemvor, Midnight, Cyric.

Patron deity: Sune Firehair.

Personal history: Adon was born the only child of Abrasax and Phylicia. He was raised as a devout, borderline fanatic, worshiper of Sune Firehair. His father, Abrasax, had a pleasing smile and a shrewd business sense, and was considered a genius of management and investment. Abrasax made several fortunes, which he quickly tithed to the Sune church, keeping only what he needed to maintain a suitable middle-class lifestyle. Phylicia was a gorgeous brunette with emerald eyes, a legendary beauty with a quiet grace that would be the envy of royalty. Unfortunately, she had a voice that would make a demon cringe, a flaw to which she was totally oblivious. However, Abrasax and Phylicia remained the darlings of society, as Abrasax's financial acumen made him every bit as desirable of company as did Phylicia's smoldering beauty.

Adon grew up in the midst of this comfortable, pampered world, and his parents studied him to see which of their best traits lived on in their son. They were disappointed in almost every case.

Adon lacked ambition, even as a child. At an early age, he had realized there was little need to work if everything he needed was provided free of charge. Study was equally meaningless since the gods could instantly bestow wisdom with their merest act. By age 14, Adon was thoroughly set into a life of enforced idleness, punctuated by social activities and brief periods of eating and exercise.

He had physical problems as well. He had somehow managed to inherit not one of his parent's attractive features. Rather, he was the spitting image of

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Abrasax's distant cousin, Phred, a man who had turned out to be a total failure in the jousting fields of love. Adon was, in a word, plain.

Abrasax despaired at the direction Adon's life was taking. The boy's penchant for luxury was slowly draining the family finances. Abrasax found himself working harder and tithing less. Even the ever-doting Phylicia was beginning to flinch when she overheard the market gossip about her wastrel son.

A desperate ploy by Abrasax to galvanize Adon worked far too well and produced unexpected results. On the night of his 15th birthday, the jaded boy was transformed into a fiery idealist. Thinking it was just a phase, Abrasax intended that Adon would see the folly of his crusading spirit and finally begin to prepare to eventually assume the family business.

Instead, Adon came home and announced he would become a crusader in the service of Sune Firehair. His parents were filled with happiness and regret. At 18, Adon became the youngest cleric ever to graduate from the temple of Sune, where he was schooled in armed and unarmed combat. By 19, he was assigned to the temple in the city of Arabel. While there, Adon met Cyric and Kelemvor, and later the magic-user Midnight, and together the four adventurers became central figures in the crisis of the gods.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Alias

ARMOR CLASS: 4
MOVE: 12"
Hit Points: 48
NO. OF ATTACKS: 1
DAMAGE/ATTACK: By weapon type
SPECIAL ATTACKS: Nil
SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil
MAGIC RESISTANCE: Nil
SIZE: M (5'10") 140 pounds)
ALIGNMENT: Neutral Good
PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil
Sixth-level Human Fighter
S:17 I:17 W:17 D:17 C:17 CH:17

Weapon proficiencies: All swords, dagger (thrown or wielded), mace (both types), ax (both types), club, dart, all pole arms, lance (all types), morning star, staff, weaponless combat.

Known languages: Common.

Features: Green eyes, reddish-blond hair.

Magical items: Magical tattoos — A set of twisting blue runes were once set into Alias' right arm. At first glance, they appeared to be part of a tattoo, but closer inspection revealed they were a set of magical sigils which affected Alias' actions. The sigils originally bound Alias to the masters who created her, but with their demise, these symbols have disappeared. The pattern currently is a snaking swirl of thorns and waves, ending with a rose at the wrist. The pattern cannot be removed magically. It will radiate a bright blue light if a detect magic or similar divination spell is cast upon it.

Alias' Story

From the notes of the Sage Elminster, as told to the Master Bard Olive Ruskettle:

Alias was created by a group of powerful individuals to act as a magical servant, spy, and assassin. Alias was intended to masquerade as a human, but to carry out particular actions over a particular time.

The original conception for what became Alias was by an individual now known only as the Nameless Bard. The bard was seeking a way to carry on his songs and stories beyond his death, without fear of their meaning becoming lost or corrupted. To that end, he and his assistants created a humanoid "vessel" which was to contain that knowledge. The spells to activate this "vessel" went afoul, killing an assistant and maiming another. Nameless was brought before his fellow Harpers — an organization of bards, druids, and rangers devoted to maintaining The Balance. He was found guilty of letting his pride result in the death of others, and for this crime, was sentenced to exile on another plane, deprived of his name, and, worst of all, all his tales and stories were eliminated from the records. This was at a time when the North was less populated than today, so such actions were within the Harpers' power.

The Harpers were not as effective as they thought in removing all trace of Nameless' work from the Realms, for once something is thought of, it is difficult to unthink it. Eventually, a powerful southern sorceress, one Cassana of Westgate, happened upon the tale and discovered Nameless' place of extra-dimensional exile. He was held at the Citadel of White Exile, a rocky spur located at the junction where the Plane of Gems and the Positive Material Plane meet. Cassana rescued Nameless, getting from him a promise to aid her in creating another vessel. Nameless, lonely from long exile, feeling no loyalty to the Harpers, and still vitally interested in preserving his tales, agreed.

Cassana was an evil sorceress and recruited others of her ethical ilk to perform the necessary magical operations. Nameless pushed his own doubts about his new allies to the back of his mind, glad only to be given a second chance to create his perfect vessel.

Cassana's allies included Zrie Prakis the lich, a former lover who was more powerful than Cassana, but totally under her control. (Both Cassana and Zrie have their own entries in this book.) Using their magics, Cassana constructed Alias' body, and Zrie made it immortal. The Fire Knives, a group of thieves and assassins which had been chased out of Cormyr, provided most of the manpower and "acquisitions" required for the spells cast by Zrie and Cassana. A cult of a long-dead god, Moander, also called "The Jawed One," donated the energy needed to bring Alias to life. Lastly the creation needed a spirit and a soul.

Cassana contacted a powerful demon, through what she believed to be the demon's agent, a nasty-looking halflingish creature named Phalse. Phalse was no more a halfling than the king of Cormyr is a centaur, but was rather the demon himself, maintaining a ruse to spy on the others in the alliance. Phalse was charged with bringing a pure soul into the mix, an innocent who would be sacrificed to bring the new vessel (which was to become Alias) to life.

Phalse found his innocent in the form of the saurial paladin known as Dragonbait. The sacrifice was marked, as was Alias, with the symbols of the alliance — Cassana's insect squiggle, Zrie's interlocked rings, the jawed palm of Moander, the flaming dagger of the Fire Knives, the blue-upon-blue circles of Phalse, and the last, no marking at all, symbolizing Nameless. Nameless learned of these symbols shortly after he completed his task, creating the history and background of the vessel, and putting his songs within it. Upon discovering Alias had come to life before the sacrifice of the saurial, and fearing for his creation's purity, he helped free her and the saurial. When the others learned of his betrayal, they imprisoned him beneath Cassana's home in Westgate.

Needless to say, the members of the evil alliance began to squabble amongst themselves after this setback, and their pact began to disintegrate as they began plotting to betray one another.

Alias and Dragonbait flew across the Inner Sea, to Suzail, capital of Cormyr. Alias was semiconscious at this time, and remembers little of the voyage and nothing of her creation. When she awoke (at the Hidden Lady inn in Suzail, where Dragonbait had left her), she thought she had a “gap” in her memory, taking up the space between where Nameless’ story stopped and her present situation began. Because Nameless had not “programmed” her with a memory about the sigils, which were to have been hidden before she was let loose, it seemed to Alias that the strange tattoos had suddenly appeared. Associating them with her memory loss, she set about trying to have them removed. Removal proved a problem, however, because the runes were an inherent part of Alias’ makeup and actively resisted all spells that attempted to harm them. Magic could still affect Alias, but it could not affect the runes. In addition, the runes glowed a bright blue when a divination spell was used on them.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Alias sought out magical and clerical aid and sagely counsel to solve her problem, and in the process, was brought into contact with the noble halfling Olive Ruskettle and the trader Akabar Bel Akash. Dragonbait also rejoined her. Although Alias did not remember fleeing from Westgate with him, he seemed familiar to her, so she allowed him to come along as well.

Each of the members of the evil alliance responsible for Alias’ creation had a different goal for her. Her motivation to achieve these goals ranged from a “strong desire” to do something to a mindless compulsion.

The Fire Knives desired revenge against the king of Cormyr, Azoun IV, because he had banished them from his country many years before. They programmed Alias with a pattern which would force her to attack at the sound of the king’s voice. It might have worked, if someone imitating the king, rather than Azoun, had not accidentally sprung the effect’s tripwire.

Moander’s minions were trying to bring back the Realmsian incarnation of their god who had long ago been imprisoned in the ruins beneath Yulash. From them, Alias received a strong desire to go north and to work the necessary magics to free Moander. They succeeded in freeing their god, but Moander was in such a weakened state that soon thereafter Alias’ allies destroyed it.

Nameless placed his songs within Alias, and with them the desire (whether intentional or not) to sing in Shadowdale, in the heart of Harpers country, to show off to those who had imprisoned him. This too drove Alias north soon after her awakening.

Zrie Prakis’ motives remain unclear, but he was apparently unhappy with his undead service as Cassana’s slave, and hoped to reverse the situation. Cassana was the physical model used to create Alias, and Alias had all of the youthful beauty of the sorceress without her evil madness.

Cassana herself opted for a more variable plan. She tied her symbol to the power of her wand, which also maintained her power over Zrie Prakis. When within range of the wand (100’), Alias would perform Cassana’s bidding. Cassana also saw Alias as a way of maintaining her own immortality, and intended to possess the woman's body (after the other members of the alliance were dead, of course).

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Phalse was perhaps the most farsighted of all. He saw Alias as the first "trial run" for an army of similar creatures, 12 of which Alias and her allies discovered, not yet brought to life as Alias had been. Phalse intended to bend them to his purposes alone. First and foremost among Phalse's goals was the full destruction of Moander, whom Phalse regarded as his bitterest rival.

All the plans of the evil alliance failed, however, in large part owing to the fact that Alias unexpectedly proved to have a soul and will of her own, linked to the saurial's, but independent nonetheless. Thus she had developed her own personality, one which attracted good friends to help keep her out of trouble when she attacked a Wyvernspur noble whom the runes mistook for King Azoun of Cormyr. These friends also accompanied her during her quest to discover the meanings of the runes and ultimately destroy them. When she freed Moander's Realmsian form, these same friends (the saurial Dragonbait, the merchant Akabar Bel Akash, and the noble and highly underrated halfling bard Olive Ruskettle) recruited the red dragon Mistinarperadnacles and destroyed Moander within a day.

The evil alliance's attempts to recapture Alias included attacking her with assassins of the Fire Knives Guild, a crystal elemental under Zrie Prakis' control, and a kalmari created by Cassana. All these creatures were defeated by Alias and her friends. Furthermore, these victories succeeded in further enhancing Alias' will. Unfortunately, during the battle with Moander, Alias and her friends were all transported to Westgate, where they were finally captured by Cassana and her alliance. By that time, Alias had already learned and accepted her origin, and this strengthened her character and her will as well.

A second ceremony was set up to sacrifice the saurial and bring Alias totally under the control of Cassana and her allies. The sacrifice, held on the Hill of Thorns outside Westgate, was disrupted by an attack by Alias' friends, who had freed Nameless and come to her rescue. But it was Alias' own sense of will that broke the spell. Zrie and Cassana were apparently slain in the battle, along with all the remaining Fire Knives. Phalse fled through an extra-dimensional portal to the Citadel of White Exile.

Alias, Dragonbait, Nameless, Akabar, and the underrated but highly talented halfling bard Ruskettle followed Phalse to the citadel, where Phalse's full plan, and the duplicate Aliases, were revealed. The demon, which had abandoned his halfling form, fought Alias in his true form, as a beholder-headed man. Alias defeated him anyway, breaking the last visible hold the evil alliance had on her. After the disappearance of all the sigils of the evil masters, Alias reasserted her belief in part of the purpose for which Nameless had designed her — restoring his songs to posterity. At that moment, in the space Cassana had left for Nameless' sign, a blue rose blossomed.

With the death of Phalse, the multiple Aliases vanished, though whether they dissolved or were magically teleported is unknown. The idea of a dozen such women wandering the Realms, deadly and excessively competent, disturbs the thoughts of at least one very powerful person in the Realms.

In the final summation, Alias has proven herself to be, not some automaton or golem, but truly a human, with human emotions and values. She sings Nameless' songs, but changes them and creates her own as well. While this defeats Nameless' original purpose, he has decided that the end result is better than what he had hoped for.

The reason for Alias' power, ability, and free thought is currently unknown. Nothing in the plans of Nameless or the alliance accounts for her free will. It could be the strength of Dragonbait's will which is linked to her own, or some unaccounted variable in her creation, or the actions or some unknown, outside force. The fact remains that Alias is as "human" as most of the natives of the Realms (and often more human than most).

After discovering her identity and the apparent destruction of all her creators save for Nameless, Alias chose to remain a wanderer. She is usually found in the company of her partner, Dragonbait. She can be found throughout the lands of the Sea of Fallen Stars occasionally as far west as the Sword Coast.

Alias is an adventuress, not a mercenary. She fights as often for the cause of good as for any monetary reward. She dislikes organized law and rules, however, and will bend or break them as need be (and as Dragonbait will allow her to). She retains a dislike of clerics, which likely was initially patterned into her as a way of dissuading her from seeking clerical help. She still regards them as book-banging fools who know nothing of the real world.

One thing Alias despises is slavery in any form. Having been enslaved by arcane means herself, she has a pretty wide interpretation of slavery, and a complete enmity toward those who practice or tolerate it.

Alias is very good songstress, well-versed and trained from Nameless' own experience. Most of the songs she knows are ancient, those of Nameless which were suppressed by the Harpers as well as many others forgotten over the long passage of the years. She also writes her own tales now, and elaborates on those she already knows. Her voice is perfect, and in the opinion of one humble but incredibly talented halfling who has traveled with her, Alias could become a fairly good bard, if she could abide the training and discipline.

While Alias has the memories given her by Nameless and the skills provided by the alliance, her body is still newborn and unhardened by experience. She will tire more easily than she "remembers" she did in her non-existent past. Nonetheless, she has twice the endurance of a normal man.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Similarly, she “remembers” liking the taste of alcohol, but she has a child’s palate and resistance, so besides not really enjoying the taste of most alcoholic beverages, she is easily inebriated by them.

Magical Life

Being a treatise on the nature of automatons, golems, clones, simulacra, and other forms of magically created life in the Realms, with special attention paid to the being known as Alias.

By Lhaeo,
Scribe to Elminster

The Realms are a magical place, filled with a large number of creatures who are capable of using magic (men and elves), those who have spell-like or spell-mimicking abilities (beholders or mind flayers), those whose origins as a race are the result of magic (owlbears and perytons), and those who are created specifically from magic and enchantments. This last is the subject for this discussion, and includes creatures such as automatons, golems, homoculi, some weapons, clones, simulacra, and, at the topmost part of the scale, the being called Alias and her sisters. All of these may be referred to by the moon elven term of Qua’sioh — in Common, “made life.”

The simplest form of Qua’sioh is the automaton, a device which performs certain functions by mechanical or magical means according to a set timetable. For example, there is a mechanical clock in Luskan which, on the hour, displays a scene of automaton warriors battling against an automaton dragon. In this case, all the automatons are controlled by rods and pins running back into the clock itself, and the spinning of the clock’s mechanism powers them.

Another form of automaton is the Iron Cobra of Thay, though the origins of the creature seem to be from further east along the Inner Sea. This creation is an obvious imitation snake made of a dark, unknown metal. As opposed to being controlled by rods and pins, the iron cobra can react to simple verbal commands or track down a target.

In both cases, automatons are considered at best simple tools, no more intelligent in their way than a hammer, a pot, or a dagger. No one considers destroying a clockwork form or defeating an iron cobra or similar creature to be taking a life.

The next step up is the golem, an magically created statue with a rude intelligence, ability to follow orders, and a generally humanoid form. There are four basic types of golem, three created by magic-users, the forth by and for clerics.

There have been experiments with other types of golems reported throughout the Realms, but these experiments are usually unsuccessful, short in duration, or refer to other magical creatures which are given the “golem” name (such as the bone golems of Calimshan).

The three magical golems are, in increasing order of power, flesh, stone, and iron golems. The flesh golem is a reanimated and strengthened creature of human and humanoid flesh. Stone golems and iron golems, on the other hand, are statues created of the appropriate material. These last two are occasionally used in siege warfare, but more often used, along with the flesh golem, as guards or protective devices. Iron golems tend to be larger and more powerful than stone golems, but one of the largest stone golems is the Walking Statue of Waterdeep, which was created by Khelben Arunsun to protect his city. The statue is 90’ high, and made of gray granite.

The one successful clerical golem is the clay golem, built of inanimate material, much like the stone and iron golems. Unlike its magical brethren, the clay golem has a chance of going berserk in combat and trying to slay all living things in the area. For this reason, such creatures are used primarily as guards of temples and shrines in little-populated reaches.

All golems follow simple verbal commands, and are treated as humanoid, if unintelligent, creatures, and usually are considered the property of their creators. In Waterdeep, letting a golem create havoc will result in the wizard or cleric involved in the golem’s creation being held responsible for damages.

Golems may be created in one of two ways, either by investiture of large amounts of gold, coupled with a number of powerful spells cast by a mage or cleric of a particular level. Mages and clerics of lower levels may create golems using a manual of golems.

Related to golems, but more primitive and closer in function to magical automatons, are beings such as stone guardians and caryatid columns. These are primarily used as treasure protectors and magical traps.

Another type of magical creature created by wizards is the homonculous. This creature differs from the golems in that it requires a second individual, in this case an alchemist, to create the final creature. In addition, the homonculous is mentally linked to the wizard, knows what the wizard knows, while in turn, the mage can see and hear through the creature’s eyes and ears.

Being mentally linked to the mage, the homonculous is more versatile than golems and other constructs. This mental link is 1,440’ in range. If the homonculous is forced beyond this range, the creature goes into a hibernating state until the link is reestablished.

Homonculi are relatively rare in the Realms, and then only found around high-level magic-users. This is because the death of a homonculous will result in massive internal and mental damage to the mage to which it is linked, making it one more vulnerability for a class which is already plagued by poor armor class, low hit points, and poor weapon proficiencies.

Legally, even more so than golems, homonculi are considered to be an extension of the creating mage’s body and persona, such that actions performed by the creature are considered to be actions performed by the mage in most courts of law. If a homonculous steals, for example, in the streets of Waterdeep, the mage is held responsible and must pay the penalty for such actions.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

As an aside, a similar legal approach can apply to a magic-user's familiar, whom, while not a creation of the magic-user, is a creature which is bound to the mage in a similar fashion.

Such legalisms do not apply to enchanted magical items, such as swords and the like, which have some form of intelligence. The development of intelligence and ego among magical weapons is of disputed origin in the Realms, with an apparent plethora of methods used to endow these weapons with magical intelligence. A number of ways have been provided, ranging from extra-planar endowments by powerful beings to good fortune to certain dark rites (the last only used for intelligent weapons of Evil alignments).

Whatever the origin, a magical weapon is sometimes endowed with an intelligence and an ego. The last is an important addition, one missing from the previous examples of magical intelligence. A golem or homonculus, it may be argued, has some mean intelligence, but lacks a will of its own. A magical weapon that has ego and intelligence, however, may enforce its will on an unwilling and/or unwitting user to further its own ends or special purposes. In some (thought not all) situations, this may be a mitigating factor in an individual's defense, if it could be proven that the sword's will, not the owner's, was responsible for some attack or another. This responsible and advanced view is held in Waterdeep, Cormyr, and the Dalelands, but is sadly lacking in most of the South, which tends to hold the individual responsible regardless of the situation.

There are two spells which duplicate the form of an individual — simulacrum and clone. Simulacrum is a seventh-level magic-user spell which creates a magical duplicate of an individual's form from ice and snow. Use of further spells (reincarnation and limited wish) allows the spell-caster to invest this form with motive power and some of the personality and knowledge of the individual upon which it is modeled.

A simulacrum is an imperfect copy at best, as its knowledge is incomplete and it cannot advance further in ability and level. As a result, this spell is rarely used in the Realms, and then only for particular specific reasons, such as the desire to regain knowledge or power from a dead party member when there is no other spell available, or some deception is planned using the simulacrum. In one case, in old Teshendale, its ruler/wizard created a simulacrum of himself to rule the land while he slipped the bonds of leadership to pursue his own life. A second wizard in The Living City once used a host of simulacrums as lab assistants in his work.

The simulacrum is a living, if magical, being, but lacks the ego and sense of self-identity to set its own course. As a result, it is dominated by its creator, who, if crafty, can pursue the ruse for some time before someone discovers the situation. Legally, simulacrums are treated variously as property, extensions of the mage, extensions of the individual being duplicated, or new beings with whatever rights are granted to sentient beings.

Clones, on the other hand, are created by an eighth-level magic-user spell, and are almost always used to create an exact duplicate of an individual who has since died and could not be raised. This is due to the fact that, in most situations, a clone and its original stock cannot exist simultaneously, and such an existence drives one or both of the individuals insane. This magical form of guaranteeing that one cannot be in two places at one time tends to make legal problems relatively simple. A clone is regarded in most civilizations as a legal heir to the previous individual's estates and rank, and is treated as the same individual, much like an individual who has recently received a raise dead or reincarnation spell. Clones have full legal rights, and are often used as an "insurance policy" for adventurers who are about to enter an area where escape and/or recovery of the body may prove difficult — including trips to other planes, suicide missions, and wars. As quests, curses, and geases transfer over to these new individuals as well, so too do any pronouncements against the individual — a clone of a man sentenced to death in Cormyr would still be hung, even if his predecessor met a similar fate.

This brings us at last to Alias, a magical creature which displays a high level of human characteristics in an individual fashion. The exact spells involved in Alias' origin are unknown, save that they required the combined power of an elder god's cult, a guild of thieves and assassins, two powerful mages (one living, one undead), and a demon of "name"-level power. It may be surmised that a clone spell or some variant was used in her creation, as she bears a striking resemblance to Cassana, one of the powerful mages. Further, unlike the simulacrum, Alias has proven that she has her own will, and in this fashion is similar to an intelligent magical weapon — capable of exerting her own "ego," as it were.

Whether it was through the development of her own sense of will, or the interference of the saurial Dragonbait, is unknown, but the control, while initially effective, diminished over time to the point that she could resist the power of those creators and make herself her own woman.

This magical non-detection does create problems for further research, as most divination spells do not function in regard to her, and the true seeing and true sight reveal her to be nothing more than an ordinary (or extraordinary) mortal. This may be because she is a human in all respects, or may be a function of the spells which created her. In either event, Alias has proved unwilling to sit still for extended research into her condition.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Bruenor Battlehammer

ARMOR CLASS: -3

MOVE: 12"

Hit Points: 112

NO. OF ATTACKS: 3/2

DAMAGE/ATTACK: By weapon type (+1)

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Head butt

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil

MAGIC RESISTANCE: Nil

SIZE: M (4'6")

ALIGNMENT: Neutral Good

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

Ninth-Level Dwarf Fighter

S:17(+1 +1) I:12 W:15 D:15 C:19 CH:15

As classic an example of the dwarven stereotype as you will ever find, Bruenor Battlehammer grumps and stomps around with a constant scowl stamped upon his face, and all the while sporting a heart that is both loyal and compassionate. He more than compensates for his lack of height around the bigger humans with an overpowering and dominating personality. When Bruenor speaks, people listen; and when Bruenor growls, smart people find a place to hide.

His brow is ever-furrowed in his scowling facade, bushy red eyebrows deepening the already deep set of his pale gray eyes. Fiery red, his beard stands out a mile away, and his long and pointy nose sticks out above it like the handle of a bushy mop.

Actually, Bruenor is large by dwarven standards, standing a good 4½' tall and possessing a solid 175 pounds of gnarled muscle. There is a texture about him, a hardness that gives the impression of rooted strength, like mountain stone. Even his fellow dwarves shake their heads in awe of his toughness. "Sure that 'is head be the perfect mold for hammerin' bowl or shield," they whisper of Bruenor — behind his back, of course. Not that they believe that Bruenor would take offense, and certainly none is intended, but they fear that if Bruenor ever got wind of the notion, he might just try it out!

As with everything about him, Bruenor's equipment reflects this aspect of toughness. His battered and bent field plate armor, finely forged by Bruenor himself a hundred years ago, still holds strength enough to turn a giant's blow, and his shield, emblazoned with the foaming mug standard of Clan Battlehammer, has taken a thousand hits. (The armor is +2 and the shield +1.)

But without doubt, the most beaten piece of Bruenor's attire is his helmet; one horn is broken away and there are dents within its dents. That it still fits on his head is amazing enough, but Bruenor sometimes even uses it as a weapon. The dwarf can head-butt an opponent for 1d4 points of damage while wearing the helmet, and 1d2 damage bareheaded.

If Drizzt Do'Urden is reckless in battle, Bruenor is simply crazy. He wades into a fight face first, and is more than happy to take a hit if he can dole one out in return. Wulfgar learned this the hard way when he and Bruenor first met, as foes, on a battlefield.

"Ferocious as his heritage dictated, though, the youth (Wulfgar) showed no fear, and Bruenor's hesitation had given him the first swing. With deadly accuracy, he slammed his standard pole down onto his foe, snapping it in half. Tough as the mountain stone he mined, Bruenor put his hands on his hips and glared up at the barbarian, who nearly dropped his weapon, so shocked was he that the dwarf still stood.

" 'Silly boy,' Bruenor growled as he cut the youth's legs out from under him. 'Ain't ye never been told not to hit a dwarf on the head?' "

— from The Crystal Shard

He is a slugger, snarling and growling, and customarily teasing his opponents with a belittling song or rhyme while hacking away with his many-notched axe. The weapon, too, is a product of the dwarfs own handiwork. It is +3 and specially weighted to allow

Bruenor to swing it with one hand or two. (Treat as a hand ax for one-handed, a battle-ax for two-handed.)

Bruenor likes options and new experiences. He'll often pull some outrageous and very dangerous stunt in a battle simply for the thrill of it, though he almost always winds up better off for the risk anyway. Once he tied himself to a boulder, then hurled himself into two ogres, tumbling all of them from the facing of a cliff. The rope stopped Bruenor's descent, and he taunted the ogres as they continued their drop to the bottom of the gorge.

But, though ferocious and deadly when he has to be, Bruenor clearly distinguishes between opponents deserving an immediate audience with their chosen god and innocents caught up in the middle of something they are powerless to control. Gruff and surly, and nasty as a demon to an enemy, Bruenor's true character lies in an extraordinary measure of compassion. He truly lamented having to cut down Wulfgar on the field that day, and moved on "shaking his head at the waste of one so tall and straight, with intelligent eyes to match his physical prowess." In the aftermath of the battle, when he returned to the side of the hill and learned that the youth lived, he chased away anybody who meant to see the boy dead. Then Bruenor, the warrior and hero of his clan, took the boy under his protection, and nurtured him back to health. Wulfgar had come to Ten-Towns with his people that day to plunder and destroy, but Bruenor had to discover if his initial observations about the inner character of this barbarian were correct.

In the unfathomable scheme of the fates, that single act of mercy became the salvation of Ten-Towns a few years later.

And a friendship of one-time enemies began that will live on forever in the songs of the bards of the Forgotten Realms.

Of course, Bruenor is always quick to deny any such emotions, but his list of kindhearted deeds runs too long to be ignored and grows proportionately as the years pass by. He befriended Drizzt Do'Urden when Drizzt had no other friends, and when a goblin raid on the town of Termalaine left the human child, Catti-brie, orphaned, Bruenor took her in and raised her as his own. And Catti-brie did not suffer for any lack of love from her adoptive father.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Yet even these acts the dwarf passes off as simple good sense, talking of the benefits of having a ranger roaming the outskirts and watching over his clan, or of bringing in the orphaned girl because he needed a helping hand around his house. "Ye do what ye has to do!" is his motto, and he lives in full accord with it. But part of what Bruenor "has to do" involves following the instincts of a generous heart. He can deny it to the world, even to himself most times, but his closest friends know better.

And though he is constantly complaining, Bruenor is actually quite content with his existence and generally takes whatever hardships befall him as minor inconveniences — then fights back like a ravenous wolf against whatever, or whomever, is instigating the problem.

In all the hard times of life on the frontier — the monsters, the rogues, the meager living — there is only one nagging problem that Bruenor cannot shake.

He wants to go home.

He was the son of Bangor, and the grandson of Garumn, king of Mithril Hall. Clan Battlehammer did not always reside in Icewind Dale, in the middle of the three-lakes region that harbors Ten-Towns. They marched in less than two centuries ago, a ragtag band of refugees simply looking for an honest way to survive. Bruenor was an unbearded child then, but now he is the last in all the Realms who remembers the splendors of Mithril Hall, his ancient homeland.

Clan Battlehammer counts fewer than a hundred heads now, but at its height, it numbered more than 10,000. The mines, rich with the precious mithril, rang out in the hammering song of the dwarven gods, and even the poorest members of the clan had enough wealth to spend long, leisurely days crafting a single shining item.

Their works were the rave of the North, commanding incredible profits, and their mines were so well hidden that no enemy could lay any claim to the rivers of the silvery metal.

But the dwarves delved too deep, into holes dark enough to open a rift to the Plane of Shadow. And dark things crept through.

The end came swiftly.

And when the rout was complete, fewer than 300 of the 10,000 remained alive: the very young, the very old, and the very weak. They spent many months at the nearby dwarven city of Settlestone, awaiting word from Garumn that the mines were cleared. But the word never came, and any who went in search of answers to Mithril Hall never returned.

And so the refugee road led Clan Battlehammer to Ten-Towns, and the dwarves set up their forges and worked for the fishermen. A sorry existence for craftsmen who had reached the very pinnacle of their art. The older dwarves died away in despair, the youngest forgot what had been. But Bruenor remembered. If Bangor and Garumn were dead, he was the king of Mithril Hall, and his vow from the very first day after the routing of

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Clan Battlehammer was to one day return to the secret mines and reclaim what was rightfully his.

But the heartbroken elders of his clan, lamenting the despoilment of all that they had ever built, would not think of returning to Mithril Hall, and, thinking that they were acting in his best interests, would not tell the inquisitive young Bruenor anything that would help him find the way.

A passing century, and then the bulk of another, did not quench Bruenor's thirst for revenge. Yet he knew his dreams of returning to be futile, for he had no idea of where the halls might lie, and so well had his clan kept the knowledge private, that no one at all had more than the slightest hints of where to begin looking. Many came to believe that the whole legend of "the halls where the silver rivers run" was a ruse to cover a marketing trail from some southern city, and many others, believing in the lost treasures, set out to find the place, only to return months, or even years later, wondering if the skeptics had been correct.

Bruenor remained undaunted in his desire, but he kept patient, waiting for the opportunity to present itself properly. He was as fine a smithy as any in the Northland, and a worthy leader of his small band. And as Ten-Towns began to prosper in the marketing of the ivory from the precious fish, the knucklehead trout, that swam the waters of the three lakes, the dwarves did quite well.

They fought many battles against the numerous monsters of Icewind Dale and carved out a wonderful complex of tunnels and halls beneath the tundra, and Bruenor engulfed himself fully within his crafting work, creating his own fine armor, shield, and ax, and many other artifacts that distinguished him even above the other skilled smithies of his clan.

And then, for Wulfgar, the youth he had defeated and captured and then come to love, he created Aegis-fang. His gods blessed him in that task. A war hammer of unprecedented strength, Aegis-fang is a weapon worthy of the lost days of the finest magics, a throw-back to the skill of the dwarven masters who once pounded the anvils forging weapons for the gods themselves. But for Bruenor, Aegis-fang marked the end of an era. It represented the pinnacle of his work, the highest he could ever hope to achieve. And, satisfied, he never fired his forge again.

And with the dying of Bruenor, the smithy, came the rebirth of Bruenor, the rightful king of Mithril Hall. He sensed that the time had come. His fellow dwarves thought him crazy for even thinking of leaving the fine life they had carved out of the savage wilderness, but respected his loyalty to their heritage and his rank among their clan, and volunteered to follow him wherever he chose to go.

But Bruenor sought other company for the initial journey. His kin could claim their rightful place after the halls had been found, but the search required skills they did not possess. For years Bruenor had been teasing Drizzt into making a commitment to join him on his quest, and finally, with Bruenor feigning a deathbed scene, the drow agreed.

And so the Companions of the Hall were formed, first Bruenor and Drizzt, and then Wulfgar, to their delight, pledged to come along. Finally (and surprisingly!), Regis trotted up beside them on the first leg of their road, and the band was complete.

Bruenor could go home.

About The Northland Dwarves:

The glory of the dwarves in the Forgotten Realms reached its pinnacle more than 1,000 years ago in the days of Delzoun, the Northkingdom of the Dwarves. Primarily mountain dwarves, these sturdy folk battled through the harsh environment of the Northland and carved out mighty fortresses and prosperous mines in the area from the Ice Mountains to the Nether Mountains, and between Silverymoon Pass and the Narrow Sea (now the Great Desert). They were a concentrated group at first, 150,000 strong and all close enough together to lend support in the first days, or even hours, of a battle. Though as plentiful as they are now, the various orc tribes in the region learned quickly to avoid the tough dwarves.

"Delzoun was a rich and proud land, perhaps the height of dwarven power; its smiths crafted intricate and beautiful mechanisms to ease every task; the great dwarven families grew rich and famous, and gold shone everywhere about the persons and homes of the dwarves of Delzoun. The dwarves ranged across the North, building homes for themselves and (for hire) for men, and their work endures still. They were a happy and hearty people. That is all gone now."

— from Waterdeep and the North
by Ed Greenwood

It wasn't orc tribes or any other enemy that brought the downfall of Delzoun. The Northkingdom came into being out of necessity; in the untamed land, only mighty numbers could guarantee survival. But as the Northland grew more populated (though not necessarily more civilized!) and new markets and trade routes opened up, many of the individual clans of the dwarven kingdom saw options open before them for greater prosperity.

Several smaller clans drifted away from Citadel Adbar, the primary stronghold in Delzoun, but two major divisions rocked the Northkingdom beyond recovery. Ironically, the dwarves viewed the expeditions as a good thing, envisioning a dwarven empire stretching all the way to the Sword Coast.

The first division came about when Ilgostrogue Sstar left Citadel Adbar with nearly a quarter of the Northkingdom's population, 35,000 grim-faced dwarves, his sights set on Mirabar and the claims of great riches in the area. By the time they had crossed through the mountains north of Sundabar, the orcs were striking at them every day, and they were a ragged troop indeed by the time they reached Mirabar. They had left in their wake a toll of dead orcs that could feed all the carrion birds in all the Realms for a hundred years, but their own ranks had been cut nearly in half. Disillusionment claimed thousands more in Mirabar as they traded the horrors of the Northland road for a settled existence within the safety of the city.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

And the brutal trek had taken its toll upon Ilgostrogue as well. Denying the folly of the adventure and fighting to tread the deep waters of his own guilt, the clanmaster was no longer content with Mirabar. Consumed by his delusions of the grand dwarven empire, he drove the loyal remnants of his army forward, to the end of the Spine of the World and across the pass of Icewind Dale.

Ilgostrogue died happy when he saw the sea, believing in his final delirium that his vision of the empire had come to pass. But those left behind him understood the true nature of their situation. Twelve thousand dwarves is a considerable force, but caught unsupported so very far from home, in a wild land where the weather can claim many more than the orcs and giants combined, their future was not so bright.

Councils were called even as the first cold blasts of the long winter began creeping into the land. The consensus at first was to return and set up around Mirabar, as they had originally intended when they had left Citadel Adbar, but Beerkanstrogue, son of Ilgostrogue, planted his booted feet squarely upon the ground and called for his kin to pay homage to the vision of his father. And so the dwarves, loyal to the last, worked as only dwarves can work, and constructed Ironmaster, their tribute to Ilgostrogue, in a rocky valley not far from where the clanmaster first looked out over the sea. They have survived over the centuries — their numbers dwindling, though, to the present 9,000 — making pots and other trading goods from the exceptionally rich veins of iron ore that they found under the rocks and the ever-frozen ice of the tundra.

They have never forgotten their terrible ordeal, though many of the details have been distorted over the years, and the real tragedy of Clan Sstar is the emotional scarring the journey caused. Reclusive in the extreme, no non-dwarven races are allowed anywhere near their fortress, and even their fellow dwarves share little with them now. When the remnants of Clan Battlehammer made their way to Ironmaster after the despoilment of Mithril Hall, they were not turned away, but they were looked upon with such suspicion and disrespect that they would not remain.

Even more tragic was the second division of Delzoun, 300 years after Clan Sstar's departure, when Bunko Battlehammer led his clan to the southern spurs of the Spine of the World, just west of Silverymoon, in search of reputed mithril deposits. In league with Clan Battlehammer, Clan Ironshield followed, building the city of Settlestone south of the mountains as a buffer market for the secret mines of Clan Battlehammer. With the mithril deposits running thicker and more pure than even the most optimistic tales would tell, these dwarves enjoyed unparalleled success for several centuries. But the bright light that was Mithril Hall burned away quickly by a dwarfs estimation, and compared to the 13,000 dwarves that originally left the Northkingdom that fateful season, Clan Battlehammer now numbers fewer than 100, and Clan Ironshield drifted apart and faded away, with individuals finding their own roads and their own homes in the growing number of cities in the Northland.

Citadel Adbar remains strong even now, with approximately 15,000 dwarves under King Harbromm, and Ironmaster, under Lord Clanmaster Strogue Sstar, houses 9,000. They are a far cry from the early power of the Northkingdom, and bear a grim warning for the future of the Forgotten Realms, a testimony to the vulnerability of the long-lived races. Typically non-prolific, the low birth rate among dwarves and elves simply cannot replace the losses incurred through constant battling with the goblinoids.

And woe to the Realms, for a barren place it will be indeed, when the last ring of a dwarven hammer is rung, when the last note of an elven song is sung.

Roleplaying Tips:

Sometimes abrasive, always opinionated, Bruenor is above all else, forward and direct. First impressions mean a lot to him, and if someone initially gets on his bad side, it will take that individual a long time to change Bruenor's outlook. No one will ever have to guess how they stand with the dwarf, though. He'll tell them in no uncertain terms.

He usually has a sour word for everybody, but there is a distinct difference in the tone of the sarcasm aimed at friends and those insults aimed at people he does not like. When Regis slows down the Companions on the road, Bruenor might tell him, "If ye pulled yer belt over yer fat belly, ye'd find walkin' easier!" but if he didn't truly like the halfling, his statement would be more on the order of, "Keep up, or get out!"

A DM must be careful in handling this character, and must always keep the dwarf's high charisma in mind. Bruenor is a positive grumbler, using his growling tactics to raise the performance levels of those around him. He is never petty, and would sooner walk away than get into an argument over some insignificant issue. And if anyone, no matter their social standing or battle-prowess, calls him out over an insult, he's more than happy to oblige. His friends, and even new acquaintances, understand that they can count on Bruenor to stand beside them to the bitter end, and this undeniable loyalty and strength, and a pragmatic bravery that leads him into battle against impossible odds with a resigned shrug and let's-get-it-over-with grin, make the surly side unimportant.

And anyone who is around the dwarf for any length of time might come to view his grumbling and roughness as a facade for the true warmth of his nature. Certainly his friends love him, his fellow dwarves revere him, and even his most hated enemies respect him and avoid the wicked low cuts of his fell ax.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Cyric

ARMOR CLASS: 1 (9)

MOVE: 12"

Hit Points: 14

NO. OF ATTACKS: 1

DAMAGE/ATTACK: By weapon type (+1)

SPECIAL ATTACKS: +1 to hit

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil

MAGIC RESISTANCE: Nil

SIZE: M (6')

ALIGNMENT: Lawful Evil

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

Third-Level Human Fighter

Fifth-Level Thief

S:17 I:11 W:10 D:15 C:15 CH:15

Armor: Plate mail, small shield.

Languages: Common, Thieves' Cant.

Possessions: Plate mail, small shield, long sword, short sword, dagger, hand axe.

Weapons of proficiency: Long sword (1d8 + 1/1d12 + 1), short sword (1d6 + 1/1d8 + 1), dagger (1d4 + 1/1d3 + 1), long bow (1d6).

Experience points: 6,000 as fighter, 14,000 as thief.

Money: 12,000 gp (as individual, mostly in high-value gems).

Combat: Cyric is +1 to hit and damage. His high dexterity lowers his armor class by 1.

Cyric is cautious about joining in combat; he is very aware that getting killed is a sure way to frustrate one's ambition. However, once he commits to the battle, he becomes a furious fighter.

Appearance: Cyric's lean appearance belies his strong, quick body. His face is equally suited to sly, mischievous humor or frightening dark moods. Crows'-feet surround his eyes, though he is only in his late 20s, and his hair is brown.

He prefers dark clothing and strong armor. During his thieving days, he wore a blackened leather chest plate and carried a short sword. As a fighter, he preferred a combination of chest plate and mail.

Personality: Cyric is mysterious and secretive. He is not proud of his past. He wants to bury it all and become a warrior, but his past keeps resurfacing. Cyric is also a loner. He values freedom above all else and finds most relationships far too restrictive.

Still, he has his good traits. He has an endearing sense of humor and a quiet eloquence that cuts to the heart of the matter.

Relatives: None.

Known allies: Adon, Kelemvor, Midnight.

Patron deity: None.

Home: Zhentil Keep (birthplace), Sembia (childhood home).

Personal history: Cyric was born in the filthy back alleys of Zhentil Keep. He never knew his parents. When he was older, he pieced together some of his origin. His mother was a young woman who was madly devoted to a Zhentarim officer. The officer rejected the woman's claim of paternity and cast her out. She fell in among the beggars and homeless, who cared for her and helped her through the delivery. Later, the officer returned and murdered her. He sold the infant Cyric to slavers.

Cyric was bought and freed by a wealthy Sembian family. They raised him as their son in a life of privilege. They were very forgiving and lenient, perhaps too much so, for Cyric always felt a bit different from the other children. He constantly tested the limits of how far he could go.

He was an intelligent child who devoured new learning the way other children consumed sweetmeats. He was most interested in geography and the customs of far-off countries.

When he was 10, he learned of his background when he overheard his parents arguing about him. He ran away from home, but was caught and returned by a civil patrol. Cyric's angry protestations at being returned eventually spread the truth of his origin, and his parents became social outcasts. When Cyric ran away again at age 12, no one stopped him.

Cyric almost died as he faced the world alone and unprepared. He became a cynic as he realized that everyone was truly alone; the gods could not care less if any one person lived or died. He taught himself how to survive, first in the wild, then in the city. He became an effective street thief and even managed to acquire a knife. He also managed to acquire the attention of the Thieves' Guild. When they kidnapped him into their midst, Cyric won their approval and support. He proved a fast learner in the thievery arts.

He went independent in his 16th year. For the next eight years he used his skills to indulge in his one passion, travel. He found that people were the same wherever he went. He cynically observed that poverty and inequality were as universal as luxury and splendor. He became contemptuous of the middle class and the work ethic. His thieving filled a philosophical need to lash out at society.

At 24, he realized that, despite his adventures thus far, he had not made a single mark anywhere and lacked a direction for his future. He returned to his past. Secretly returning to Zhentil Keep, he learned the details of his past and may have encountered his father. However the man was killed before Cyric could learn more.

Cyric left Zhentil Keep at that time, convinced that he had to abandon his life of thievery. He became a fighter and worked for causes he thought were good. Over the next five years, Cyric was an adventurer of little repute. He was, however, happy during this time, as he enjoyed the freedom afforded him as a member of a wandering party of heroes.

One of Cyric's acquaintances during those years of adventuring was a mercenary named Kelemvor, who eventually convinced Cyric to join the guard in Arabel. There Cyric also met Adon, a cleric of Sune Firehair. Together, Cyric, Adon, and Kelemvor worked for Myrmeen Lhal, keeping the peace in her land.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Doin Sanehiro

MOVE: 12"

Hit Points: 61

DAMAGE/ATTACK: By weapon type or spell

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Spell use

SPECIAL DEFENSES: See below

MAGIC RESISTANCE: Nil

SIZE: M (5'6")

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

Fifth-Level Shukenja

Eighth-Level Human Samurai

S:14 I:12 W:16 D:13 C:16 CH:14

Proficiencies: Calligraphy, etiquette, horsemanship, reading/writing.

Commonly used spells: Bless, detect evil, deflection, aid, trance, dream sight, castigate, abjure, remorse, cure critical wounds, flame walk.

The carpenter sees not the wood, but the sword within the wood. Likewise, the enlightened soul sees not the man, but the hero within that man.

The Legend of Monkey

At first glance, Doin Sanehiro is not the stuff of which heroes are made. While taller than most of the Kozakuran race, he is only 5'6", although he is well muscled and has a full head of thick, gray-shot hair. His speech is simple, direct, and honest. His face is weathered and handsome in a rough kind of way — women take to him. His hands are hard from years of wielding the sword. An educated man, well versed in the classics of literature, his calligraphy is his special pride. His skill in settling disputes between rival clans earned him the respect of samurai throughout the kingdoms of Kozakura.

In better times, he was well dressed (if not a bit conservatively), in the gray kimono of his liege lord's clan, patterned with its distinctive hollyhock symbol, and wearing two swords of great honor and antiquity in his obi. But now his beard runs rough on his chin, and his garb is the simple robe of the shukenja. For a fatal battle has left him a masterless ronin, his swords dishonored by the blood of demons, and his name lost forever among the screams of his dying companions.

In his youth, Sanehiro was a cunning fighter, not a skilled one. His tactics were those of the battlefield and the wine shop brawl — he was just as likely to knee an enemy in the stomach as use his blade. His swordsmanship was the hard-won skill of hundreds of fights, beginning as a low-ranked samurai in his youth, and progressing through a lifetime of campaigns under his dai-myō's command.

As he matured, Sanehiro's greatest victories came not through the Way of the Sword, but by the Way of the Pen, acting as an administrator and head of the Samuraidokoro (samurai board) for Kanazaki Province. In this capacity, he oversaw the training and ranking of the clan's samurai retainers, working long hours to ensure that they were the finest possible.

Sanehiro's battlefield experience served his lord in other ways. While not a brilliant military tactician, his knowledge of strategy and practical warfare made him an opponent to be reckoned with. Even in the fatal battle of Kiroshina (which cost Sanehiro's lord his life), this hardheaded samurai's tactical expertise enabled the Shiramura Clan to throw back the five of the six waves of attacks — no mean feat, considering their forces were outnumbered 4-1. It was this loyalty to his lord which cost Sanehiro all that he valued most — his position, family, and good name.

Sanehiro's Fall

The year 256 found the Shiramura Clan masters of the verdant rice lands of Kanazaki Province. Yet, within this year, stories began to circulate of a powerful opponent to their rule, an itinerant monk named Jinchin.

At first, this lay monk appeared to be just one of many wandering holy men, espousing vague bits of theology and the occasional prophecy. Gradually, as Jinchin began to gather a following, the lord of Shiramura assigned several of his retainers to arrest and detain this upstart monk. When these and other retainers vanished without a trace, it became obvious that Jinchin was more than a mere holy man, and that his goal was nothing less than the absolute conquest of the Land Beneath Heaven.

By the new year, Jinchin had gathered a great army to himself. Originally formed of ronin (masterless samurai) dissatisfied with the current regime, this vast horde gradually began assimilating even less reputable recruits: brigands, criminals, sorcerers, and the like. Soon, it was rumored that the very fiends of the Underworld had joined Jinchin's ranks — there were tales of twisted, many-legged shapes which stalked the night, of terrible undead creatures and obscene meldings of man and beast. This was the legacy Jinchin's army left behind it, as inexorably, it crushed its way through the besieged Shiramura forces and spread a fell shadow over the province.

At the battle of Kiroshina, outnumbered 4-1 and facing a monstrous host of oni, bakemono, and other sorcerous creatures, the samurai armies of Lord Shiramura fell, leaving the province under the iron boot of the evil monk. It is not known how Doin Sanehiro escaped being slain, although legend has it that he was knocked senseless by a mighty oni as he struggled valiantly to defend his lord. What is known is that on the evening of the second bloody day, Sanehiro staggered to his feet to find his lord dead, and the Shiramura armies routed.

Convinced by a fellow survivor that his duty lay in defending the Shiramura castle against the encroaching armies, Sanehiro chose not to join his lord in death. Instead, he returned to find the castle destroyed, his family murdered, and the monsters of the renegade monk Jinchin crouched in the ruins.

While struggling to reach Shiramura Castle, Sanehiro was joined by a fellow survivor of the battle, an amnesiac (who would later be known by legends as The Wanderer), and by an enigmatic young physician calling himself Kuang. It was Kuang who convinced Sanehiro to again forego his pledge to join his lord in death, and instead to devote himself to bringing about Jinchin's downfall.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

The Monkey

Fleeing the forces of the evil Jinchin, Sanehiro and his companions fell into the company of two more travelers. It is then, according to legend, that Sanehiro first took on the nickname of "Monkey," in order to disguise his true identity. His new allies, Onoye (a spirit woman of considerable, if hidden, power), and Okotampe (a restless and argumentative hengeyokail, accepted this name (with a great deal of amusement), although they soon learned Sanehiro's true identity.

Through his battles with Jinchin, it soon became evident to Sanehiro that his skill with the sword was no match for the monk's sorcerously inspired abilities. While hiding among the tenju villages of the west provinces, Sanehiro gradually was convinced to learn the way of the shukenja — a way of sorcery and subtle power far greater than any blade. In keeping with his decision, the grizzled veteran put down his swords, took up the three-ringed staff, and chose to be known only as the Monkey from that time.

As a shukenja, Sanehiro/Monkey much resembles his old self, although his head is shaved in the style of the priests of the Way, and his samurai garb has been replaced by the scarlet robe. Two ancient swords adorn his waist; these however, are broken within their scabbards, relics of his old life and his last clash of blades with Jinchin. Instead, Monkey's strength lies within the towering oak staff he carries. The staff, capped with the three silver rings of his profession, enhances both Monkey's saving throws vs. magical attacks by +4 and his shukenja spell rolls by +3.

Monkey normally wears no armor. However, in time of great danger or when facing a battle, he will wear his old samurai armor, rated at +2.

Dungeon Master's information: Sanehiro/Monkey is usually found in the company of three individuals. These are the hengeyokai Okotampe, the spirit woman Onoye, and the masterless warrior known only as The Wanderer. He will often be joined by his good friend Kuang, whose true identity is T'u Lung Prince Shin Gisen. In addition, Monkey may be found with any number of villagers or acolytes from his temple.

Monkey is not a wanderer by nature; in most cases, he can be encountered within his home village of Tomobiki, located in the south of Shiramura Province. It is here that he has constructed a small temple and dojo for the training of young shukenja. Monkey is particularly interested in those samurai who have lost their lords through misfortune or those who seek another path beyond that of the sword. His main purpose, as he sees it, is to defend his small village from outside harm. Those who endanger the village or threaten its people do so at the risk of his considerable power.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

If Monkey is encountered on the road, it is a sign of trouble throughout the land, something that threatens Kozakura on a grand scale. In these cases, he will most likely be gathering together a party of companions to defend the province or right a great evil.

The Earth Spider (A Great Evil)

FREQUENCY: Rare

NO. APPEARING: 1

ARMOR CLASS: -1

MOVE: 18"

HIT DICE: 12

Hit Points: XX

% IN LAIR: 100%

TREASURE TYPE: Special

NO. OF ATTACKS: 2

DAMAGE/ATTACK: 2d6/2d6

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Surprise, grasp

MAGIC RESISTANCE: 50%

INTELLIGENCE: High

ALIGNMENT: Lawful Evil

Size: L

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

Magical Attacks: Web, possess, hypnotism, detect invisible, transfix, minor creation

One of Sanehiro/Monkey's greatest adversaries is the creature known only as the Earth Spider. This evil spirit appears in the form of a huge black spider, its twisted, multi-eyed visage melded with that of a screaming man.

The Earth Spider ruled over the Land of Men many centuries ago, until he was bound by the hand of the Celestial Emperor into the Realm of Mirrors. Here, he and his foul legions of insectile young are trapped, unable to affect the Land of Men in a direct fashion. The Earth Spider must instead take possession of a living man and work its will through its host. This process gives the host great powers of sorcery, but eventually wastes him away to a non-living shell.

The Earth Spider cannot escape the Realm of Mirrors unless he can contrive, in one way or another, to wed an innocent female of the Wood Spirit people. With the consummation of this unholy marriage, he will be able to open a gate from the Realm of Mirrors, releasing himself and his minions into the world of men once more. It was to this end that the Earth Spider, through his host Jinchin, sought to capture Sanehiro and his spirit companion Onoye.

The Earth Spider may take any one of three forms: its original, grotesque arachnid form, the form of its current host, or (should it escape the Realm of Mirrors) the form of a comely male Kozakuran.

While the Earth Spider cannot directly reach into the world of men, it can reach out through the medium of dreams. These dreams, linked to the spirit world, have great power. It is through this medium that the Earth Spider may entice or entrap its host. Its power can also kill.

Dungeon Master's information:

The Earth Spider will rarely, if ever, be directly encountered by your player's group. Instead, it will work through a variety of agents and hosts. Killing the Earth Spider's host will not destroy the Earth Spider; like all demons, it must be slain on its home plane, in this case, the Realm of Mirrors. Killing the host will only serve to banish the Earth Spider for up to 1d6 years, during which time it will actively be seeking a new host for its evil designs.

The Earth Spider's most dangerous powers are those of the dream world. At moments when a player is asleep, the demon can attempt to reach through his or her dreams and attack. These attacks can be treated as the spells of mind control and power word kill, and characters retain appropriate saving throws as per their character class. The Earth Spider is the sworn enemy of the Imperial House; banished by an ancestor of the Emperor, it has never forgotten its enmity. As such, it will do anything in its power to cause harm to members of the Imperial family, the Shogunate, or those loyal to the Emperor's government.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Drizzt Do'Urden

ARMOR CLASS: 1

MOVE: 15"

Hit Points: 77

NO. OF ATTACKS: 3

DAMAGE/ATTACK: By weapon type or spell

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Spell use, critical hits (see below)

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Stealth (see below)

MAGIC RESISTANCE: +2 to saves vs. magic

SIZE: M (5'4" 1

ALIGNMENT: Chaotic Good

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

10th-Level Elven Ranger

S:13 I:17 W:16 D:20 C:15 CH:14

To have a black elf, a drow, roaming the surface world of the Forgotten Realms is a rarity indeed, but to have one championing the cause of good is rarer still. Yet that is the case of Drizzt Do'Urden, ranger and hero.

Drizzt is of typical physical build for a black elf: slender, around 125 pounds, with long and graceful fingers that perfectly grasp the pommel of a weapon. While his black skin and white hair distinguish Drizzt among the surface dwellers, his penetrating lavender eyes stand him apart from even his own kind. Fiery orbs of passion and curiosity, their sparkle is strikingly visible even within the shadows of a low-pulled cowl.

But though the coloration and inner glow are unusual for a black elf, the lavender orbs are bound by Drizzt's dark heritage. In the night, they are as keen as a cat's, and tuned to the dark, as are all of Drizzt's senses. He needs no torch to guide him, even in a lightless tunnel. But in the day, under the shine of the sun that his people do not know, Drizzt is at a disadvantage. Even when low clouds darken the sky, the daylight makes him dizzy and his eyes ache from constant squinting.

He manages, though, and accepts the discomfort with his customary stoicism. And his familiarity with the dark brings him an advantage as well.

Because of his heritage and his agility, Drizzt can hide in shadows, move silently, and climb walls as well as a 10th-level thief. Likewise, his keen hearing, sharpened by his daylight vision problems, allows him to hear noise equally well.

The statistics for his thieving abilities are: move silently 98%, hide in shadows 88%, hear noise 35%, climb walls 99%. (These stats are adjusted for racial and dexterity bonuses.)

When he left Menzoberranzan, the lightless city of the underworld, Drizzt retained some of the innate magical abilities of the drow. (See complete description of the character race of Drow in the UNEARTHED ARCANA book.) Two spells in particular, darkness and faerie fire, often aid Drizzt in his trials. He normally conjures the 5' radius globe of darkness to cover an escape or to blind a larger foe, such as a dragon, and the faerie fire is employed as often for dramatic effect as to clearly outline a target. For example, purplish flames sprouting from the skin of a superstitious and magic-hating barbarian more often than not take the warrior's heart out of a battle. Drizzt has left more than one potential opponent rolling in the dirt in a frantic attempt to extinguish the magical flames.

Not that Drizzt needs these advantages, though. Few in all the Realms could match weapons against Drizzt. Deadly with a longbow, but preferring the face-to-face challenge of melee combat, Drizzt fights with two scimitars, attacking three times each round and suffering no penalties "to hit" because of his incredible dexterity. One of the scimitars is a +3 frostbrand that he took from the hoard of Icingdeath, the white dragon that he and Wulfgar defeated. The other is a normal weapon, but equally deadly in the hands of the skilled ranger. So accurate are his wicked cuts, that if Drizzt's "to hit" roll exceeds the minimum required for a hit by more than 5, he scores double weapon damage and has a base 10%, plus or minus 3% per level difference between him and his opponent, chance of killing the foe instantly.

For armor, he wears the fine chain-link mesh (AC 5) of his people, though its magical properties (it was once +3) have long since faded away under the light of the sun. The chain mail is completely unencumbering and unnoticeable beneath the dark green cloak that Drizzt customarily wears.

He is a perfectionist, in combat and in everything he does, striving to attain the highest standards within his code of morality and self-discipline. Yet Drizzt is careful not to impose his personal standards upon others. Kindly and compassionate, he remains a valuable ally to all the Good races, despite the harsh treatment he usually receives from ignorant people who can't see his worth for the color of his skin and the reputation of his heritage. For Drizzt believes in the brotherhood of the races, human, dwarf, elf, half-elf, half-ling, and gnome, and always views the world with sympathy and empathy for the other person's viewpoint. And thus, he accepts his lot in life without complaint.

But Drizzt's outward calm and composure are only half of his dichotomous personality. He is the peacemaker, the level head in critical situations, always willing to avoid an unnecessary fight if possible. But when all of the options have been exhausted and a fight is unavoidable, a battle-lust burns within the drow that makes even his closest friends step back and shudder. He never allows his rage to blind him to the most advantageous path to victory, and that makes him deadlier still, but he is ferocious in battle, a foe of blinding speed and unrivaled accuracy.

Furthermore, Drizzt is a ranger in the purest sense of the word. Where goblins and other giant-class creatures are involved, no fight is unnecessary. His friends sometimes consider him reckless; Wulfgar is fully convinced that Drizzt's daring will one day get them into a situation from which they cannot escape. And even Bruenor, fearless and stone hard, shrugs in amazement at his drow friend's daring.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

"The eager gleam in Drizzt's eye gave Bruenor the impression that the drow had more in mind than watching. 'Crazy elf,' he said under his breath. 'Probably'll take on the whole lot of 'em by himself!' He looked around curiously again at the dead giants. 'And win!'"

— from The Crystal Shard

But Drizzt, always calculating the odds and searching out the best possibilities, trusts in his luck and understands his abilities. If the situation presented itself properly, he would take on a lair by himself.

And win.

Drizzt was born and spent the first 65 years of his life in Menzoberranzan, a mighty drow city far beneath the surface of the world. He was a member of the house of Daermon N'a'shezbaernon, a prominent family, ninth in line of succession to the throne of the dark city. Though similar to his kin physically, except for his eyes, Drizzt learned very quickly that he shared little emotional and moral characteristics with his evil people.

He always hoped that he would find some redeeming quality in his people, some shred of evidence that things did not have to remain as they were, for the loyalty of blood ties runs strong in him. But at the same time, Drizzt feared that he might come to find himself more akin to their malicious way of thinking than he believed.

"He had always known that he was unlike his kin in many ways, though many times he had feared that he would prove to be more akin to them than he believed. Yet he was rarely passionless, considering the death of another more important than the mere sport it represented to the vast majority of drow. He couldn't label it, for he had never come across a word in the drow language that spoke of such a trait, but to the surface dwellers that later came to know Drizzt, it was called conscience."

— from The Crystal Shard

Shortly after his 60th birthday, his passage into adulthood by the standards of his society, Drizzt participated in his first surface raid. Accompanied by a score of his kin, he crept out of a dark hole under the nighttime sky of the Forgotten Realms. Before dawn, the party returned to the tunnels that would lead them back to Menzoberranzan, but in their wake they left a massacre of elves — male, female, and children. The horror that Drizzt witnessed that fateful night convinced him beyond any doubt that he would one day soon leave his kin and not look back.

It would be a drastic step, for Drizzt knew what type of life awaited him outside of the protective borders of Menzoberranzan. The final outrage concerned an associate, Masoj Hun'ett. Masoj held in his possession a figurine of wondrous power, an onyx statue depicting a panther. Vile in the extreme, Masoj often brought forth the marvelous cat, Guenhwyvar, to carry out his senseless murders and tortures. Drizzt had befriended Guenhwyvar, the cat had even saved his life once, and he could not bear to see the proud beast lowered into such demeaning servitude.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

It was the only time that Drizzt ever killed a fellow drow, an act that revolted him so profoundly that he vowed never to strike down one of his kin again. After his scimitar did its work, Drizzt took the statuette and fled, never to return. Guenhwyvar, the entity of the panther, became his closest companion, sharing the dark road as often as the magic of the figurine would permit. The two eventually made their way out of the tunnels of the underworld, surfacing on the southern slopes of the Spine of the World Mountains west of Mirabar.

Guenhwyvar: AC 4; HD 6 + 6; hp 45; Move 15"; 3 attacks: 1d4/1d4/1d12, plus rear claw rake for 2d4/2d4 if both paws score a hit; Move silently and hide in shadows at 95%; Never surprised. The figurine can be used a maximum of 24 hours total per week, and no more than three separate summonings are possible.

They traveled throughout the smaller towns of the region, unintentionally causing a panic wherever they went. Several times, Drizzt was set upon, but understanding the protective intentions of his misguided foes, he never really fought back. He would parry away the attacker's weapon and deftly disarm the man, then move along on his way.

So he lived the life of the nomad, wandering the countryside and getting by as well as he could, holding to his hopes that he might yet find a niche in this world. But the scenario always played out the same, and Drizzt took to avoiding people altogether, shrugging away his pangs of loneliness in his knowledge that he was living by his principles.

But even Drizzt had his limits. How long he might have survived in that empty existence, he'll never know, but the black cloud of despair inevitably found its way over him. Then he met Mooshie.

Mooshie was old and nearing death even as Drizzt found him in his secret cave in a mountain in the Spine of the World. Blind, the hermit could not know that Drizzt was a drow, but Drizzt would later come to believe that with Mooshie, his race wouldn't have mattered anyway.

What Mooshie gave to Drizzt in the seven months that they spent together was hope, a reaffirmation of his beliefs and principles in the form of a goddess, Mielikki, and a patron hero, Gwaeron Windstrom. A ranger himself, Mooshie recognized similar qualities in Drizzt's character and dedicated the last months of his life to training Drizzt and sharing the experiences of his long life. When Drizzt buried the old man the next spring, he resumed his nomadic existence, but with a renewed bounce in his graceful stride and a fiery glimmer in his eyes. In discovering a god figure in accordance with his own tenets, he had found a focus for his life.

It was on the road outside of Mirabar that Drizzt first heard of Ten-Towns. The frontier settlements of rogues and outcasts seemed to fit with the role into which he had been forced when he had come to the surface, and with hope for a more normal lifestyle, he made the long trek around the mountains and through Icedwind Dale.

But when he arrived in Bryn Shander, he found little difference. Even the outcasts of the mainstream society were not quick to welcome a drow, and once again Drizzt was relegated to the periphery of the communities. He patrolled the borders of the towns, living in a series of caves and shelters that he constructed, and keeping a vigilant, though unappreciated guard against the intrusions of the wild.

Then one day Drizzt came upon a battle on the open tundra. He rushed to the aid of a dwarf locked in combat with a tundra yeti. By the time he got there, the monster was dead on the ground and the dwarf, Bruenor Battlehammer, was already hard at work skinning it. Still, the gesture did not slip past unnoticed. Certainly no love exists between the dwarven and drow races, but Clan Battlehammer of Icedwind Dale, and Bruenor in particular, put more store in a person's actions than in what others tell them a person's actions will be. To the nine hells with the reputation of the dark elves, Bruenor had found a courageous and loyal ally that day on the field.

And Drizzt, at last, had found a friend.

As the years passed in Ten-Towns, and Drizzt's list of heroic deeds continued to grow, and the true nature of his character began to shine clearly through the prejudiced veil of his dark heritage, others began to see his worth. He still found himself shunned by the vast majority, but Drizzt made several trusted friends, most notably Regis, Wulfgar, and Catti-brie.

Let the rest of the world think what they may, he has his faith, his cat, and his friends.

On The Drow Elves

The drow elves, sometimes called the night elves, are not often seen by the surface-dwelling races of the Forgotten Realms. This invisibility has led many of the peoples, especially the short-lived humans, to question the very existence of the drow, or at least to believe that the dark elves have dwindled and faded away to be of no serious threat.

These assumptions are foolish and possibly dangerous. Drow rarely appear on the surface simply because they truly prefer their dark caverns in the depths of the world. They do come to the surface occasionally (and exactly how often may never be known, for they usually disguise their cruel raids to look like a goblinoid strike, and it is very rare that a witness would survive), but driven under by their surface cousins thousands of years ago, they have acclimated themselves to the mysterious underworld and, for the most part, have lost all desire for the open sky and the feel of the wind on their faces.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

And this is a good thing for the surface dwellers!

Far from fading away, the black elves thrive in the underground realm. Menzoberranzan is only the third largest of the eight reputed drow cities (and there may be more), and the drow in Drizzt's former home number more than 40,000. And given the brutal nature of the underworld, and particularly of drow society, even the weakest of the black elf citizenry is formidable by the softer standards of the surface. Furthermore, drow are skilled in the arts of magic, and especially adept at destructive magics and in dealing with creatures from other planes of existence. They count many demons among their sinister allies.

The threat of the drow may forever remain a potential disaster. They are chaotic in the extreme, and while some may want revenge upon their surface cousins or to expand their domain above the ground, many others are quite content to remain in their dark cities and have no ambition to ever return to the surface.

And one of the realities of the class-structured society of the drow is "advancement by elimination." A drow city is ruled by a family, with a succession line of other, rival families extending all the way back to the peasants. A family better its position on the succession ladder by weakening a family ranked above it, probably through assassination or a technique called Cuel'a'cul. Cuel'a'cul involves laying a series of lies and false evidence against a target family designed to bring the wrath of a more powerful family, or families, crashing down upon it. It is a dangerous practice, for if the deception is exposed, all of the other parties unite against the perpetrating family and wipe it out.

But the privileges of rank in the dark cities are great indeed, and under the constant temptation of advancement, the practice continues. Perhaps the most successful Cuel'a'cul was executed by Drizzt's own family, Daermon

N'a'shezbaernon. The house of Hau'felesse, two rungs on the ladder above Drizzt's family, came into the disfavor of D'everdun, the ruling family of the city, over a land dispute. Daermon N'a'shezbaernon, with no ties, good or bad, to Hau'felesse, but always ready to seize an opportunity for advancement, saw his family's chance.

First they murdered a member of the house of D'everdun and laid an intricate web of clues to point toward still a fourth family. Then they underlaid a second series of clues, more obscure, but not beyond the eye of the ruling family's vast network of informants, that belied the first set of evidence and made the whole scam appear to be a Cuel'a'cul attempt by Hau'felesse against the fourth family.

The house of Hau'felesse no longer exists.

But even with all of the well-earned paranoia, the threat of the drow remains substantial. If a mighty leader could unite them through sheer strength — and their demon goddess, Lolth, is a concern, though she is as chaotic as they — she would have a powerful force at her disposal. Perhaps not powerful enough to conquer the Forgotten Realms, but certainly a deadly strike force and nucleus of her dark army.

So a word of warning to short-lived humans whose beliefs tend to stem only from personal experience:

Don't forget the drow!

Roleplaying Tips

Drizzt is very reserved around strangers, quietly observing newcomers from the perimeters of their conversations. Player characters might even think him a snob, though in truth, he is merely defending himself against the heartaches of false expectations. It takes Drizzt a long time, not to trust in someone else, but to believe that someone else will trust in him. His defense against the realities of the drow reputation is seclusion, and his group of friends remains a select few.

But there is plenty of untapped love and friendship within Drizzt, and he would happily accept a new friend, providing he is convinced that the person accepts him for what he is and shares his viewpoints on morality. Minor indiscretions can be tolerated — after all, Drizzt is a friend of Regis! — but any attitude of bullying or bringing harm or grief to someone for no justifiable reason would invoke the drow's wrath. At the least, he would simply depart from the party. If he saw worth in other members of the group, he would either warn the instigator to change his behavior, dismiss the offending individual from the party, or leave the rogue dead on a field of honor, depending upon the seriousness of the offense. In no instances will Drizzt compromise his principles or tolerate a malicious individual, unless he is merely buying time for a better opportunity to strike back for the cause of good.

In battle, Drizzt always seeks the most advantageous route and method of attack. He inspires companions to new levels with his skill and fearlessness, and would willingly sacrifice himself to save an ally. He would willingly return to die beside a friend rather than run away, as long as even the tiniest sliver of hope remained.

Away from the battlefield, Drizzt is more vulnerable. But far from an easy mark for a confidence scam, he is ever-wary and always anticipating the worst, even if he presents an aura of optimism. A character might find a way to sting him emotionally, and wouldn't likely be punished for the act. (Unless Wulfgar or Bruenor got wind of it.) But someone feigning friendship in order to get an easy strike at the drow is likely to be the one surprised.

And pity he who incurs the wrath of Drizzt Do'Urden!

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Dragonbait

ARMOR CLASS: 5

MOVE: 12"

Hit Points: 50

NO. OF ATTACKS: 1

DAMAGE/ATTACK: By weapon type

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Nil

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil

MAGIC RESISTANCE: 50% (with sword)

SIZE: M (4'10", 150 pounds)

ALIGNMENT: Lawful Good

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

Seventh-Level Saurial "Paladin"

S:15 I:14 W:16 D:13 C:17 CH:4 (18)

Weapon proficiencies: Crossbow, bastard sword, long sword, two-handed sword, battle-ax, weaponless combat, saurial broad sword (1d8/1d10 damage).

Magical items: Magical tattoos — As for Alias; "Holy avenger" (+5 sword) — This oddly shaped sword was Dragonbait's chief weapon in his adventures with Alias. It has a wide, top-heavy blade with jagged teeth and a short handle and functions as a holy avenger sword, providing a magic resistance of 50% in a 5' radius, dispelling magic at the same level as the wielder, and inflicting +10 hit points of damage to Chaotic Evil opponents. To all others, it functions as a +2 sword. Humans in particular will find this sword difficult to wield, and as such are -2 with it, regardless of its magical bonus, until proficiency with the weapon (technical a "saurial broad sword") is gained.

Dragonbait's Story

(From the notes of Elminster, translated (without his permission) to the vernacular by Olive Ruskettle.)

Dragonbait is a saurial, a race of sentient lizard-like creatures who are not native to the Realms, but rather come from an alternate material plane. Dragonbait is the first known saurial in the Realms, and the only one (known, that is — the Realms is a wide place, and who knows what can turn up in the Jungles of Chult). Saurials are bipedal reptilian creatures similar to the Realmsian dinosaur, but as intelligent as mankind (and in Dragonbait's case, more intelligent than most).

Dragonbait is short, with a blunted muzzle, powerful, peglike teeth, green scales, and yellow eyes. A single fin grows from the back on his head. He wears clothes, though it is not known whether he does so out of modesty or needs to for protection.

Dragonbait's culture is apparently similar to that of the Realms, such that the creature has made the transfer between the two worlds with a minimum of personal shock. Then again, Dragonbait may just be a quick learner and easily adaptable to new situations. He appears to have an intuitive grasp of human nature as well, able to approach individuals in a non-threatening fashion, and get his point across without words.

Dragonbait is apparently mute, save for some growls and guttural snorts. In actuality, his race has a very highly developed sense of smell, and communicates by scent in the same fashion as humanoid races of the Realms use voice. These scents are easily picked up and translated by other saurials, and by dragons as well, pointing out a possible connection between the two. To normal humans, a saurial must "shout" a scent to be understood, and then only the very basics of emotion are transmitted by smell.

Dragonbait's known scents are: brimstone: confusion, roses: sadness, lemon: pleasure/joy, baked bread: anger, violets: danger/fear, honeysuckle: tenderness/concern, wood smoke: devotion/piety, tar: victory/celebration, and ham: nervousness/worry. There are others as yet unrevealed.

Dragonbait has turned his inability to communicate properly in the Realms to his advantage by appearing to be less than he really is. He understands Common though he cannot speak it. Many assume that his inability to communicate equals an inability to comprehend. Dragonbait does not correct them on this matter.

The name "Dragonbait" was given to him by the warrior Alias soon after her awakening (see Alias). Originally meant as a threat ("One wrong move and you're dragon bait, understand?"), the saurial took this as his name. The comical appellation further adds to the creature's apparent harmlessness. Dragonbait's true name is a combination of scents and subsonic guttural clicks. The dragon Mist knew it, but died without passing on that knowledge.

In his own world, Dragonbait is a holy fighter who crusades for good. In that respect, and in many of the abilities he shows, he is a "paladin." The quotation marks are noted only because Dragonbait is obviously non-human, and in the Realms (at least), only humans can be true paladins. Dragonbait does exhibit many paladin-type powers, including:

- Saving throws at +2;
- Immunity to all disease;
- Laying on hands for 14 points healing per day;
- Detect evil, up to 60' distance — in Dragonbait's case, this ability (called the Shen-state) doesn't detect evil so much as it reveals a know alignment, showing colors for the various alignments, with the intensity of those colors showing the strength of those alignments;
- Wielding his world's equivalent of a holy sword.

Unlike paladins, Dragonbait cannot:

- Radiate protection from evil;
- Turn undead as a cleric;
- Use clerical spells.

It is unknown if Dragonbait can summon the equivalent of a paladin's mount, and in what form that mount would appear.

Dragonbait's home world and native dimension are unknown to any in the Realms, and he will not divulge that information. He was captured by the demon Phalse while on a mission in the Abyss, so that even Phalse and his alliance do not know his origin. He was imprisoned by Phalse, the sorceress Cassana, the lich Zrie Prakis, members of the Fire Knives and minions of Moander and was to be used as a sacrifice, with his death activating the form of a living slave, Alias.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Something, as yet unrevealed, went wrong in their plans, and Alias revived early. Dragonbait helped the semiconscious woman to escape, and pair fled to Suzail, in Cormyr. Using his shen abilities, Dragonbait determined that while Alias was the creation of an evil alliance, she was basically good, with the potential for becoming either good or evil.

Dragonbait had promised Nameless he would remain with Alias and protect her, but the saurial would have likely done so in any event. The pair shared the same curse in the form of the tattoo. In addition, Dragonbait sensed a potential for good in the warrior. Posing as a humble servant, Dragonbait aided Alias, the mage Akabar, and the halfling thief (bard!) Olive Ruskettle in their adventures.

When the evil alliance recaptured Alias and Dragonbait, it was the swords-woman's and the saurial's combined will that finally broke the spell binding her to her makers. The alliance was defeated, but at a cost — in the final battle with Phalse, Alias lost Dragonbait's holy sword when both Phalse and the sword were pitched into the Positive Material Plane and exploded.

Dragonbait now carries a non-magical version of his saurial blade and continues to accompany Alias in her adventures through the Realms. Though Alias (and several others, including Elminster) know of Dragonbait's true nature, he continues to play the part of humble servant, leaping into action as a true warrior only when necessary. In the case of Dragonbait, it can be truly stated that paladinhood is proven more by actions than by words.

Notes on Saurials

Dragonbait is a saurial, one of a race of extra-dimensional creatures from an alternate Prime Material Plane. Little is known of this plane, and what follows is pure speculation on the basis of interviews (such as they are) with the saurial, careful research, and wild guesses.

What we laughingly call higher sentience in mammalian life does not apparently exist in Dragonbait's plane. Instead, the lizardish, dragonish, and dinosaurian creatures of his dimension fill the niches vacated by man, goblin, orc, pixie, and other similar creatures. Whereas the lizard man is restricted to his fetid swamps here, the troglodyte to his underground mazes, and the dragons to far-off peaks, in Dragonbait's home, they are the norm, perhaps the ancestors of the modern saurials. A lizard man may be related to a saurial in much the same way as an orc is to a man — a similarity of form and function and perhaps a common place of origin.

In any event, Dragonbait's culture is on a par with any in the Realms, and in some areas (such as ethics), could even be further evolved than those in Faerun. Their craft in both steel and magic is demonstrated by the quality of

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Dragonbait's sword, which in addition to being a fine weapon, was perfectly shaped for his smaller hands.

Saurials have vision on the par with humans, extending down into the infra-red range. It is their sense of smell that is truly remarkable, such that they use scents to communicate. The scents used by Dragonbait are noted above, and may or may not apply to other saurials. There may be different saurial languages and dialects, but this is unlikely, as the dragon Mist readily picked up the challenge of Dragonbait in his own "tongue."

Saurials are proficient with their own weapons, equivalents of those found in most of the Realms. The saurial broad sword used by Dragonbait, for example, is broader at the tip of the blade and notched in an ornate fashion, while the handle is shorter than for the human equivalent. A saurial dart may be wider in its wings, and a dagger may have three edges to it. In terms of AD&D® game combat, however, all weapons function as well as their human equivalents. Saurials suffer a -1 to hit with human weapons, while humans suffer a similar penalty with saurial weapons.

Saurials seem to possess no special abilities other than those possessed by the "character class" of individual saurials. That is, assuming that Dragonbait is representative as a paladin of his race, he exhibits no other special abilities than those of paladins found in the Realms. While it is possible that some of these abilities may be natural to all saurials, the sample taken (a single saurial) is too small to determine it as fact.

Saurials as player characters: The existence of the saurial paladin Dragonbait makes one wonder about other saurials and their nature. Saurials would be at best very rare in the Realms, and are not native to its plane of the Realms. (Saurials would be considered extra-planar creatures as far as spells concerning their summoning, banishment, and the effect of protection from good/evil spells.) If the DM determines that a character may be played as a saurial, use the following modifications:

Statistics — As normal for AD&D® characters, with two modifications:

- Saurials cannot gain "% STR" stat — the maximum strength they may have is 18.
- Saurials may have any charisma stat among their own kind, but their maximum charisma among other, non-saurial races is 5. The charisma listed for Dragonbait in parenthesis is that which he has among other saurials and among creatures such as dragons, lizard men, and troglodytes.

Alignment — It is assumed that saurials can be of any alignment available. The fact that the only such creature available for studies is a paladin does not preclude the existence of others having different alignments.

Weapons proficiency — Note the restriction for weapons above — saurials suffer no penalty when using weapons of saurial design, and a -1 to hit penalty when using weapons of human (or other) design.

Languages — None, other than the scent language of the saurials, which may be roughly comprehended by humans who anticipate such things, and by creatures who have both good intelligence and a fine sense of smell.

Infravision — Saurials can sense objects in the dark up to 60' away through seeing varying degrees of heat.

Special abilities: None known, though if saurials represent the equivalent of "humans" in their home dimension, then there might be the equivalent of scaly elves, reptilian dwarves, and the like. Dragonbait has said little on the subject, and the entire matter is one of rampant speculation.

Character classes — Saurials can be of any character class available to humans in the Realms. There are some minor differences for Realmsian play:

- Fighters — No differences, other than those noted for weapons. Saurial fighters (and their subclasses) can gain proficiencies in human weapons with proper training.

- Paladins — See above under Dragonbait's stats for his abilities.

- Rangers — Saurial rangers are surprised one time in eight, and surprise opponents 50% of the time. They do not gain a +1 per level damage benefit against "giant class." They do gain this benefit against lizard men, troglodytes, dragons, and other reptilian (and amphibian, at DM's option) creatures. Otherwise they have all ranger abilities and requirements.

- Clerics — Saurial clerics worship saurial gods, and as such, are more severely limited in the Realms. They are considered to be two planes removed in regards to contacting their gods, with the result that they may cast only cast first-and second-level spells when in the Realms. See magic-users below for effects of spells.

- Druids — While both saurial and human druids worship "nature," they do so in different ways and respect different aspects of their nature-gods. They are limited as clerics in their spell choice. However, some types of swamp reeds will function for saurial druids as well as mistletoe and oak do for their human equivalents.

- Magic-Users — Saurials have no written language as yet determined, and as such, the concept of spellbooks is lost on them. Dragonbait has proved familiar with the concept of spellbooks, such that saurial mages likely use "memory sticks" — notched poles which function in the same fashion as spellbooks. These might be mistaken for magical staves by the uninformed or strangers. While saurial mages use spells that parallel or mimic human spells (much like saurial and human weapons are similar), saurial and human magic is not compatible in any way. The saurial mind is different than that of humans, and rather than a verbal component, the mute saurials have a "scent" component that makes their spells impossible for humans to cast and vice versa. With research (as for a new spell), a human mage may come up with the equivalent of a saurial spell and vice versa, but one cannot use the other's spellbooks or memory sticks.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

- Illusionists — Saurial illusions extend into the infrared part of the spectrum, and in addition, give off a scent proper for their appearance.

- Thieves and assassins — Saurial thieves (and their subclasses) suffer a blanket -5% on all thieving abilities.

- Other classes (barbarian, cavalier, the ORIENTAL ADVENTURES classes (a saurial samurai?)) — Left to the DM's discretion on all major abilities, taking into account saurials' limitations such as muteness, and advantages, such as their sense of smell.

Level limitations — The exact level limitations on saurials are as yet unknown, again, given the small size of the sample currently living in the Realms. In game terms, the highest level of saurials is ninth in any class, with exceptional individuals (those that, if human, would gain a bonus to experience), able to reach 10th level.

Class limitations — Saurials cannot be dual-class characters (like elves, half-elves, and the like). They can be characters with two classes, in accordance with normal AD&D® rules as regards humans.

Racial relations — Most other races are either neutral (80%) or unfriendly (20%) to saurials in general, usually along the lines of how they feel about lizard men in general. Humans are neutral to them, with adjustments for how much a bother they are, how many turn up, and regional differences.

Saving throws — Saurials have normal saving throws for their class. Due to their keen sense of smell, however, they are more vulnerable to gas-based attacks (such as stinking cloud or the chlorine of a green dragon), and as such, save against such attacks at -2.

Armor class — All saurials (even the mages) are armor class 5. They may wear armor, but it will only help them if it raises their armor class above 5 (That is, mere leather would do no good, while plate would offer as much protection as plate would to a human — AC 3). A shield will add 1 to the AC, just as for humans, Saurials cannot wear human armor comfortably and vice versa.

Psionics — It is unknown if any Saurials have psionic abilities, and the extent of them if they do.

Weaponless attacks — A saurial without any weapons may still attack twice with his claw-like hands (1d3 points damage each), or strike with his tail (1d2 points damage). Not much, but better than a weaponless human.

Zero-level saurials — If zero-level humans exist as the standard for all humans, it follows that zero-level saurials may well exist on Dragonbait's home world. A zero-level saurial would have 1d4 hit points, AC 5, Move 12" , # AT 2 or 1, Damage 1d3/1d3 or 1d2.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Elminster

ARMOR CLASS: 10 (7 with ring)

MOVE: 12"

Hit Points: 96

NO. OF ATTACKS: 1

DAMAGE/ATTACK: By weapon type or spell

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Spells and magic items

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Spells and magic items

MAGIC RESISTANCE: See below

SIZE: M

ALIGNMENT: Chaotic Good

PSIONIC ABILITY: 266

ATTACK/DEFENSE MODES: All/All

26th-Level Human Magic-User

S:13 I:18 W:18 D:18 C:14 CH:17

A human male of advanced age, Elminster appears to be a gray-bearded man of weathered visage, gruff voice, dancing eyes, and nondescript attire. He is a natural storyteller and mimic, and can be quite imperious or persuasive if he wants to be. He is a consummate actor, and if need be, can convince most people to believe his role. For game purposes, he can act as if any of the above characteristics are any value up to their true number, and he can change his attractiveness with makeup.

He rarely travels in the Realms (although it is apparent that he once traveled there widely), preferring these days to explore other worlds. When he does travel, it is usually in the disguise afforded by a shape change spell, or under cover of invisibility. Elminster travels to acquire information; his great love is the discovery of the long forgotten, or of creatures and magic totally new to him.

Elminster smokes a meerschaum pipe (burning some strange substance that produces thick green or blue smoke, sparks, and smoke rings), and can drink heavily without apparent ill effects. He can be witty and clever in conversation if he so desires, or haughty, or charming or terrible and commanding. As he has grown older, Elminster has become more whimsical, given to sudden impulses and doing things "for the hell of it." He is not aggressive, but is fearless, and will fight if crossed, threatened, or attacked.

Elminster keeps a low profile in the Realms, preferring not to openly engage in diplomacy or politics of any sort. Officially, he maintains a sage's neutrality; in fact, he prefers to see peace, freedom from slavery and oppression for all peoples (of all races), tolerance, and maintenance of wilderness and natural beauty. He often works with circles of druids and allied rangers, magic-users of like mind (notably Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun; Alustriel, High Lady of Silvermoon; and The Simbul, mage-queen of Aglarond), and that mysterious group known only as the Harpers, working covertly to prevent war and limit the influence of rulers and groups viewed as evil.

Elminster has perhaps the best private library in the Realms, and hence is often consulted on matters of history and genealogy, but he is most famous as the foremost authority on rare and arcane magic, and on dangerous and unusual beasts. Elminster enjoys imparting wisdom to others, but intensely dislikes giving up the time necessary to train a magic-user up to a new level of mastery, and will not undertake such tutelage for those with whom he is not friendly or to whom he's not beholden. Adventurers come to him from all over the Realms, and he is said to be fabulously wealthy as a result of the fees they pay (having only to sell the right to copy a spell to certain mages, if he ever desires more wealth). He never dresses as a person of wealth or influence, however; formal or grand clothing, to Elminster, is a simple black or gray robe, clean and unadorned. Rumors of his wealth are borne out by the fact that he aids those it pleases him to aid, and turns away others, regardless of how much or how little any of them offer in payment.

Over the years, Elminster's memory has been developed to an astonishing degree; he can call to mind with crystal clarity the likeness of creatures or things seen only once, or seen long ago. Other sages speculate that this is the results of a wish spell cast centuries ago. At his present stage of maturity, he only uses wishes when in dire need, which hasn't happened in over a century. However, he has admitted that in his youth (when he was only 200 or 300 years old) he used them occasionally.

His vast experience and nearly perfect memory allow him to identify all known non-unique magic-user spells (and many illusionist, clerical, and druidic magics) by the opening activity of a visible spell-caster's casting. This often enables him to counter spell effects with fast, high-level magics of his own.

He also has the unique natural ability (from birth, origin unknown, and leading to his present career) to see magical auras — precise location, hues, shapes, and intensities — on persons and things within 3" (even when darkness prevents his normal sight). This includes illusions and polymorphed or otherwise transformed objects. He can even see the potential for magic-wielding (which he calls "power") in a creature, as betrayed by the unconscious mental seeking or manipulation of pathways of power between the Positive and Prime Material planes. In a rare display of openness, he conjectured that it might be a rare passive psionic discipline. Although Elminster himself is psionic, he has little interest in the disciplines and has done little research into them.

His favorite spells are known to include identify, magic missile, magic mouth, disintegrate, legend lore, teleport, imprisonment, meteor swarm, and shape change. He dislikes conjuration and summoning spells of all sorts, and prefers not to deal with creatures from the lower or the elemental planes. A curious exception is his fondness of firetails. He has been known to wear a necklace of missiles, and customarily wears a +3 ring of protection and a ring of regeneration. He may have ioun stones of any sort upon his person, and always carries a staff, usually non-magical.

Elminster rarely uses his psionic abilities in combat against non-psionics; he will sometimes use these disciplines while traveling. He possesses the minor disciplines of body equilibrium, cell adjustment, object reading, and sensitivity to psychic impressions, and the major disciplines of energy control and mind bar.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Elminster's precise age is unknown (he will coyly evade any questions on this topic), but he is at least 600 winters of age — and presumably the user of potions of longevity and vitality, and perhaps also a regular imbiber of elixir of life potions. This count of years is inescapable, given that he once had Arkhon "the Old" as a tutor, and that he remembers the city of Myth Drannor in all its glory.

The "Old Sage," as he is now known, has taught such famous workers of magic as The Simbul, the witch Sylune (now deceased), and the bard Storm Silverhand, who remained with him for many years as apprentice and lover before making her own way in the Realms — and perhaps knows more of Elminster's past than any other living creature. Elminster now dislikes teaching in any concentrated form — he has sickened of such work, he says, by hearing too many sages, magic-users, and "scholars of the 'if I stop talking for an instant I shall cease to exist' school — and knowing how much I came to resemble them."

He is also irked by the constant demands of those who would hire his knowledge for information on magic and monsters. "War! It's always this or that power, this or that weapon. Kings make war unceasingly, for the greater men are, the more petty men are . . . and no one wants to hear about how to get good crops, where to plant or where not to plant, or how to guard beauty in the taking of riches for rock and soil. No one want to listen to such things, because — mark ye — sword and spells rule the Realms, not cool heads and warm hearts." The true learning of being a mage, according to Elminster, is the knowledge of when not to use one's powers.

Elminster's true parentage is unknown. His manners and dealings would lead one to believe that he was of noble birth. However, he's visited enough courts and mixed with enough high society throughout the Realms to have the etiquette and wily wit of a chancellor.

It is known that he was born somewhere in the North — probably somewhere near the great city of Waterdeep, or at least the Sword Coast. His knowledge of the lands from Mirabar south to Baldur's Gate, and east to Cormyr and the Desert, is vivid and varied when he speaks of events 500 years ago. The tone of his voice suggests that he is remembering things he experienced and was part of, not things he has studied in books of lore.

During this time of perhaps 40 years, Elminster had a varied career adventuring (suggesting that he had no parents, or was parted from them early) — having little to do with magic, it appears, save as the spoils of tomb-pillaging and delving in the lost cities of the dwarves. Any character class abilities gained during this period have been lost centuries ago by severe disuse. He was fascinated by the past, as revealed in the tombs he entered and in bardic lays and ballads heard in taverns, and was also intrigued by the magic that slumbered in scrolls and items that he and his band found.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

He speaks of Arkhon "the Old," perhaps the foremost human sage (and a mage of note, too) in the North at the time, and it's suspected that he took tutelage under Arkhon in Waterdeep, and probably also learned the rudiments of an adventuring mage's art through his contacts (the merchants and "fences" of goods from the past) in the caravan city of Scornubel. Possible tutors in magic of the time were Myrjala "Darkeyes," the half-elven adventurer, and the merchant-mage Lycon, called "Wolf-beard" for his appearance and manner.

After this period, for reasons unknown (perhaps to flee enemies, seek a change of life, or merely to advance in training), Elminster traveled with his caravan comrades east via Iriaebor to Cormyr and the still-fledgling Dalelands. There, he is known to have become a friend of elves, one of the few humans allowed to travel to the Elven Court without special leave. There he came to the school of wizardry established by the Seven Wizards, where he studied under Mentor and the mage known only as "The Masked." He stayed in Myth Drannor some 20 years, growing in lore and maturity, and when he deemed it time, left the city (not long before its destruction) with Alais, an elven lady, to begin an epic travel about the Realms to learn its lands and lore.

For 15 years he traveled, ranging more widely about the Realms than any man alive had at the time. At length, Alais took him over the sea to Evermeet, the island kingdom of the elves. There she remained, to pass away, and he returned, changed in outlook and humor, to visit one keep of learning after another, quietly scoring the libraries of the Realms — and discreetly furthering his arts under the tutelage of such mages as Torose and Shalane of Taerloon. It is thought that at this time he mastered and completed whatever processes he thought necessary for his own longevity, for Elminster then dropped out of sight for over 200 years, doubtless into seclusion at some haunt of his own devising, to experiment in magery on his own, develop some of his spells, and create magic items. At some point during this time, he is known to have tentatively explored some of the lower planes. When he returned to public view, in Waterdeep, he began to operate as a sage for hire, and to take on apprentices. Then, as now, he retained only those he liked and thought fit: the adventuress Laeral, founder of The Nine; Alustriel, who was later to become ruler of city of Silverymoon; the witch Sylune, who became the wife of Aumry, lord of Shadowdale; and Murask of Neverwinter.

Since then, Sylune's husband was slain, and Elminster answered her call for aid by coming to Shadowdale, where he helped to overthrow an evil usurper and quell an uprising of drow from the depths. Elminster loved the peace and beauty of the dale, its nearness to the Elven Court, and its simple folk, and he stayed. Thereafter, he taught the bard Storm Silverhand, Sylune's sister, and aided The Simbul and Khelben Arunsun for the first time, working together against evil magery from Thay, Mulmaster, and Zhentil Keep — foes that have remained, in one form or another, to this day.

It is suspected that he had a hand in raising the present Lords of Waterdeep (a secretive group that includes Khelben Arunsun) to power, and in forming the Harpers, but there is no hard evidence, and Elminster just smiles and winks now and then when queried. He has often aided mages, and elves in particular, over the last half century or so, but has taken few apprentices, and less of a hand in open politics.

Presently Elminster resides in a place he loves — the verdant farming valley of Shadowdale. He lives quietly, respected by the townsfolk, who consult him on matters of history and genealogy and advice on the upbringing of their sons and daughters. His cluttered, two-story tower overlooking a fish pond is his home. He is accompanied by a scribe named Lhaeo, of great renown.

Elminster does travel more or less continuously in the "endless worlds," as he puts it, these days — and may turn up on any parallel Prime Material Plane a DM wishes. There is only a one-in-10 chance of finding him in his tower under normal circumstances. However, Lhaeo can contact him if need be, and he always seems to be around just when you need him the most.

When out and about, he will always be seeking unusual magic, monsters, and — of even more importance to him — information on how each world works: its ecology, societies, and unique beauties. Rather than being a dramatic figure of power, he travels quietly, in disguise. He does present a model of a cautious, prepared mage of power — and no one should find him a pushover. When traveling, Elminster protects himself with the following spells: shield, protection from normal missiles, stone skin, statue, Serten's spell immunity, and Elminster's evasion (see below).

In addition, his is likely to have all of the following unique spells ready. These spells are the results of many years of research and experimenting by Elminster himself, and he will not divulge the method of their casting to just anyone. Certain of his colleagues know the formulae, Khelben "Blackstaff" Arunsun and The Simbul, to name two.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Inscribe (Education/Alteration)

Level: 6
Components: V,S,M
Range: 7"
Casting time: 1 round
Duration: 1 turn +1 turn/level
Saving throw: special
Area of Effect: 1 inscription

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, a magic-user may be able to inscribe any writing, runes, or glyphs, even a spell he or she cannot understand at the time (due to low level, lack of time to study or write, or insufficient intelligence or training) into a spellbook or onto a suitably prepared writing surface (such as a slate or scroll). The original is unaltered, and the duplicate contains all the properties of the original, including type of ink, smudges, errors, etc. For example, a strange glyph of warding would still retain all of its harmful properties.

Non-magical writings are always successfully copied. Magical writings are subject to a saving throw modified by the difference in level between the inscriber's highest castable spell level and the level of the spell being copied. If the inscriber can cast up to sixth-level spells and is attempting to copy an eighth-level spell, there is a -2 modifier to the saving throw. If the saving throw is failed, 2 points of damage per spell level being copied are taken. In addition, the inscriber is stunned for 1d3 rounds.

The spell animates an enchanted quill (reusable) and uses ink that includes a drop of the caster's blood. The DM can use his discretion for the components and spells necessary to construct the quill and mix the ink.

The quill must be within 1" of the spell it is copying, and the caster must be within 7" of the quill. The spell takes no concentration, and the inscriber can perform any action so long as he stays within 7" of the quill. The quill will evade attempts to grab it, but can be destroyed by 4 hp of damage.

The quill writes normal text at a rate of one turn per normal sized page. Magical writings are copied at one turn per level of the spell being copied. The DM may want to modify the time for extra-large pages or if complex drawings are being copied.

Worldwalk (Alteration)

Level: 9
Components: V,S,(M)
Range: 3"
Casting time: 3 segments
Duration: up to 1 turn per level
Saving throw: none
Area of effect: special

Explanation/Description: By means of this spell, an ultra-dimensional connection is temporarily created between the plane the caster is on and a different plane chosen by him. The portal is a shimmering disc of force 2" across, floating on edge up to 3" from the caster, wherever he wills it. It is held open without concentration until the caster wills it to vanish or the spell's duration expires. Anything caught between the planes when it is dispelled is flung into the uppermost plane of Limbo.

Up to 10 creatures can pass through the portal in a given round (1 per segment), assuming that they race through in an organized line, one right on the heels of the other. Objects not in contact with a creature are also sent to the uppermost plane of Limbo, and scattered there randomly.

If the destination plane is personally known to the caster, no material component is needed. The chance of successfully reaching the requested plane is 5% per level of the caster. Failure indicates an opening into an alternate Prime Material Plane.

Unknown planes can be reached if the caster is in physical contact with material from that plane. The material is not consumed and can be brought along if it is possible. If the material component is missing, the caster must provide a verbal description of the plane desired even if it is only from his imagination, then there is only a 10% base chance of reaching the correct plane. Add +1% for each level of the spell-caster.

Elminster's Evasion (Evocation)

Level: 9
Components: V,S,M
Range: 0"
Casting time: 1 turn + other spells
Duration: special
Saving throw: none
Area of Effect: the spell-caster

Explanation/Description: This is an enhanced and customized version of the contingency spell of which Elminster is quite proud; he calls it a "good and true alternative to lichdom." Upon the declared conditions (no more than six simple clauses), the spell-caster's body, complete with his soul or spirit, even if separated from the body, with any of the items held at the time, is snatched through a momentary (1 segment) worldwalk portal to the place where the spell was originally cast, even if that place is many planes distant.

When casting the evasion spell, the worldwalk it uses must also be cast, along with telekinesis to move the body, and two other spells of the caster's choice. All four of these spells must be personally cast and can not come from devices or other spell-casters. The evasion remains in effect until one of the six conditions is met.

The material components of this spell are a pint of the caster's blood and a gem of at least 5,000 gp value. Both are consumed in the casting. The caster also loses 1d4 hit points which cannot be healed, until the spell is triggered, at which time they can be recovered by normal or magical means.

Elminster's version uses only five conditions — death, loss of control over his mental faculties, loss of control over his physical body, destruction of both upper limbs or equal physical damage, and uttering the command word

MAJOR CHARACTERS

“Thaele.” He usually casts this spell from an extra-dimensional “safe hold” (location unknown), to which the evasion would take him. Upon arriving, some sort of magical creature (unseen servant, homonculous, or golem; Elminster is deliberately vague) administers an elixir of health, elixir of life, Keoghtom’s ointment and up to six potions of healing.

The two spells to be activated on his arrival are a very carefully worded wish, to restore him to mental and or physical health if necessary, and a sending spell which contacts Elminster’s friend The Simbul, mage-queen of Aglarond, saying “I am sorely wounded, if you value my life, come to the safe hold quickly.”

Elminster’s Tower

For a sage of great renown and Faerun’s most powerful arch-mage, Elminster’s tower is amazingly nondescript. It has two floors and a flat roof with time-worn crenelations on the edge. One of the oldest structures in Shadowdale, it dates back to the earliest settlers of the region. They were farmers and hunters who built this small stone tower to keep out the predators at nights.

When Elminster came to Shadowdale, it was falling apart, the mortar crumbling, and the top story had shorn away on one side during a bad storm. Elminster chose it for two reasons. One was the highly attractive price: Nobody else wanted it. The other was its strategic location in the dale, off the beaten path, but still within walking distance to the Old Skull Inn, where a man can get decent drink and hear a tale or two.

Elminster worked subtle magics into the reconstruction of the tower. Its walls and mortar are full of lead, which prevents certain creatures from seeing through them. On both the Astral and the Ethereal planes, his tower is a solid cylinder without entrance. No form of teleport or plane shifting spell will allow entrance unless Elminster speaks a command word first. Even then it is only possible for a single round.

The entire tower acts as an amulet of proof against detection and location. No device or spell can ever see or hear into it. The whole structure radiates a protection from evil, 10’ radius. Elminster has no illusions that these measures guarantee his privacy or even his safety. For the greater part, he relies upon his reputation, and upon the sign at the foot of the path leading to his tower. It reads, “No trespassing. Violators should notify next of kin. Have a pleasant day,” in both Common and Thorass.

The first floor is a general study and workroom. It has a few small tables and a couple of dilapidated easy chairs. The table surfaces and floor around them are filled with stacks of paper, some of which reach close to the ceiling, totally obscuring the furniture itself. There is a footpath leading from the kitchen to the chairs, and to the staircase.

Most of the papers are written by Elminster, although many of them have been copied over by Lhaeo into legible writing. Of any random selection of 100 papers, 99 are safe readings of descriptions of strange lands, creatures and cultures. One will be some sort of magic. Of those, nine in 10 are minor spell variants such as a levitate spell that works at an angle to gravity, or a dancing lights spell that allows control over the color of the light.

The remaining papers are not safe to read. They could contain anything, from horrible new glyphs of warding, to malignant intelligences trapped in the parchment. For this reason, all visitors are cautioned not to poke around in the stacks. Some things are better left undisturbed.

An open archway leads to the kitchen. The larder is stocked with exceptionally plain fare, although there is a wide variety of spices, some are even from other realms of existence. A single large cupboard on the side hold all of the common spell components that a mage would want. The more unusual ones Elminster keeps on his person. On a special shelf in this cupboard rests a jar and several glass vials. The jar holds a dozen or so stones, all of which have had continual light cast upon them, some with a half brightness variant. The vials are potions of healing, extra-healing, elixirs of health, and a special concoction that immediately cures hangovers and rids the body of any alcohol.

The second floor is the sleeping room. It has but a single bed in it. Elminster and Lhaeo rarely sleep at the same time, each keeping unusual hours. There is one accessible wardrobe where they both keep everyday clothing. A spot on the floor next to the bed usually has papers or other before bed objects on it.

The rest of the room is filled with wardrobes and trunks, frequently stacked one on top of another. These hold many strange wonders, few of which are magical. Several wardrobes contain fine clothing from lost Myth Drannor. One actually has a full set of plate mail in it, although it is not fit for battle. Lhaeo keeps his short sword +2 of quickness in one of the trunks.

There is a trapdoor in the ceiling, with a wooden ladder leading up to it. Always wizard locked, it leads to the rooftop. Elminster has been known to venture up there on occasions to sit and watch the world go by. The crenelations do make the rooftop a defensible area, although it has never been used as such by Elminster or Lhaeo.

Elminster’s Safe Hold

Not much is known of this extra-dimensional place. By putting together various subtle clues, it seems likely that it is its own pocket dimension. It is a well fortified structure with plenty of open space for trial-casting new spells. It is certain that this is where Elminster keeps his spellbooks. Copies of Lhaeo’s finished works also end up here in his extensive (although undoubtedly disorganized) library. It is certain that there are many different magic items in the safe hold. Elminster always seems to be able to put his hands on just the right piece, when it is necessary. Some forgotten closet probably holds enough treasure (particularly gems for use as spell components) to make even the richest man drool.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

There are no reliable tales of it ever being plundered, or even entered, but as Elminster says, "Never underestimate the greed of men." Any who would find their way there are certain to encounter Elminster's servants, which include stone and iron golems, and maybe a spectator or two. In general, Elminster does not use living servants that do not wish to serve him. He will never have a summoned or conjured creature do his bidding.

Sages in The Forgotten Realms

A sage is simply a learned man. As Elminster says "Any damn fool can call himself a sage, all he has to do is know more about something than whoever is sitting next to him." Any creature that has gathered information can be considered a sage.

There are those in the Realms who sell their knowledge and call themselves sages. These men are usually experts in a single field of study. A few, like Elminster, are masters of a handful of topics. Usually they have exceptional intelligence or have lived a very long time.

Most sages, unlike Elminster, do not travel. They rely upon news or writings from travelers, and therefore are only found in places frequented by well traveled men. These include large cities and smaller cities at strategic crossroads. Elminster considers himself retired from general practice and is not for hire anymore.

Below is a table of general fields of study which a sage might have, along with a table of percentages for finding such a sage in an average-sized city. The chance of locating a sage in a city is modified by the DM for location and extreme circumstances. Certain regions in the Realms tend to promote certain fields of study. Next to each field is the area or region that gives a +10% chance to find a sage in that field of study. Usually this refers to a particular area within the field. For example, Orllumbor is famous for shipbuilding and therefore would only get a bonus for finding sages knowledgeable in that specialty, not all types of engineering.

study	Chance to find of	Specialty
Alchemy	10%	Thay
Architecture	5%	Sembia, Waterdeep
Art	20%	Calimshan
Astrology	30%
Astronomy	10%	Amn
Botany	25%	Cormyr
Cartography	20%	Amn, Lantan, Waterdeep
Cryptography	5%	Calimshan
Ecology	10%	Cormyr
Engineering	30%	Lantan, Orllumbor, Impiltur
Folklore	25%	Dales
Genealogy	25%	Tethyr
Geography	10%
Heraldry	30%
History, human	30%	Waterdeep
History, non-human	5%	Dales
Languages, human	40%	Amn, Baldur's Gate
Languages, non-human	5%	Dales
Law	35%	Cormyr, Zhentil Keep
Magic	10%	Mulhorand, Thay
Mathematics	20%	Waterdeep
Medicine	10%
Music	30%
Philosophy	25%
Politics	5%	Calimshan, Tethyr, Zhentil Keep
Planes, inner	15%
Planes, outer	5%	Mulhorand
Religion	25%
Trade
economics	15%	Amn, Waterdeep
Warfare	5%	Baldur's Gate, Thay, Zhentil Keep
Zoology	20%	Sembia

There are a few famous sages in the Realms other than Elminster, although he would never admit to it. These men and women are known well enough that they can charge more for their services. Usually they deliver information on topics not accessible by common sages. Any character class ability of these sages is unknown by the general public.

Raash — Zhentil Keep: A lean man of some 50 winters, Raash is considered by many to be the foremost authority on dragons in the Realms, excepting Elminster, and a sixth-level magic-user. He is fairly wealthy, enough to be able to refuse work if need be. He is famous for his barbed temper. Raash only accepts interesting work, giving more mundane assignments to one of the two sages who work under him. His fees are five times normal, and those of his assistants are three times normal. Their specialties are zoology and ecology. They are particularly knowledgeable about enchanted creatures.

Drake "Deepecups" — Iriaebor: He is a short, stout, bearded man of around 60 winters. He is famous for his written works on dwarfish history and social customs. He speaks and writes all known forms of dwarfish fluently, and with a flawless accent. He is often consulted by adventuring parties that plan on exploring the old dwarven digs. At double the normal fees, he ought to be wealthy, but he has a soft spot for good ale.

Selinor — Ordulin in Sembia: Her knowledge of the Elven Court is second only to that of the elf sages themselves. She has personally advised statesmen and politicians needing to negotiate with the Elven Court. She speaks and writes all forms of elvish with a perfect accent. With the current passage of the Elven Court, she is swamped with work for the next year. Her fees are four times normal, and she has five scribes working for her.

Simple maps of Myth Drannor (artistic renditions) can be bought for 50 gp by anybody in her shop. Any adventuring party using such a map will find it to be highly inaccurate for travel purposes. She only sells accurate travel maps to those who do not intend to harm the ruins and gets 250 gp for them (use the before and after maps in the boxed set).

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Duncan — Arabel of Cormyr: A young sage of 43 winters, his family was slaughtered by goblins when he was young. Driven to understand how this could happen, he has become the foremost authority on the goblin races, their history, society, and ecology in the Realms. His fees are triple normal, and he pays for any unusual information pertaining to the goblin races. Duncan is also a fourth-level ranger and does a some of his own information gathering.

Jantoo — Waterdeep: Considered to be the greatest philosopher alive today, she can either support or refute most questions, depending upon her whim. Two of her most famous works concern the existence of free will in mankind. One paper conclusively proves it does exist, the other that it does not. Unwed, she has said publicly that she will marry the man who can win an argument with her.

Bezier — Waterdeep: Tutored under the great Furier, Bezier is a lesser mathematician. However, this still puts him a cut above most living mathematicians in the Realms. He has many sages and scribes who work for him. In recent years, rumor has it that he has grown feeble-minded. At over 80 winters, this is to be expected.

Viticun — Eltabbar of Thay: Known only by reputation in the western lands, he is thought to know more about the workings of magic and its relationship to the inner and outer planes than any man alive. He is a devoted follower of the cult, and is a powerful wizard (18th level). Viticun only accepts work from loyal followers of the Cult of the Red Wizards. He apparently has no talent for leading men or any desire to enter into politics. A famous story is told of The Simbul visiting him in magical disguise and coming away with a great secret. The truth of this is not known.

Skarn Stonegrinder — Impiltur: A dwarf who associates freely with men, he understands geology, mining, and metal smithing like no human does. It is not known why he lives amongst men in Impiltur. His name is spurned by dwarves who admit to knowing of it, although they do not say why. He takes his fees as a percentage of the operation on which he advises. His wealth is great, but hidden somewhere in the Earthfast Mountains. He was a seventh-level fighter before becoming a sage, and owns a hammer of thunderbolts.

Delitar the Slow — Westgate: He is called the slow because of the stutter in his speech. It can take him a long time to relate a story verbally. However, pity the adventurer who assumes he is slow in thinking. Delitar is considered to be the greatest human historian of these times. His works are quoted by most other sages in the Realms. He has three other sages who specialize in the history of some regional area, along with many scribes.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Kelemvor

ARMOR CLASS: 2 (3 as panther)

MOVE: 12"

Hit Points: 44

NO. OF ATTACKS: 1

DAMAGE/ATTACK: By weapon type

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Nil

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil

MAGIC RESISTANCE: Nil

SIZE: M (5'10")

ALIGNMENT: Lawful Neutral

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

Fifth-Level Human Fighter

Lycanthrope (Werepanther)

S:18/94 I:7 W:7 D:12 C:17 CH:13

Armor: Plate mail, large shield.

Languages: Human, Panther.

Possessions: Plate mail, large shield, bastard sword, dagger.

Weapons of proficiency: Bastard sword (2d4 + 5/2d8 + 5), short sword (1d6 + 5/1d8 + 5), lance (1d6 + 5/1d8 + 5, double if mounted), dagger (1d4 + 5/2d4 + 4), bow (1d6).

Experience points: 22,000.

Money: 450 gp.

Combat: Due to his great strength, Kelemvor is +2 to hit and +5 to damage.

Kelemvor is a fierce fighter whose natural fighting skills are more than a match for most foes. He does not shy away from attacking foes who outnumber him tenfold. His lycanthropic abilities apparently extend to his human form. Although he can suffer wounds from normal weapons, he soon shrugs off their effects. Kelemvor simply considers himself to be a fast healer.

Kelemvor cannot control his transformation into a panther, so his lycanthropy rarely works to his advantage. In battle, however, Kelemvor's panther form is terrifyingly vicious. The werepanther attacks as a 5 Hit Die monster, striking with the claws on its two front paws, doing 1d4 points damage for each paw. The werepanther will also bite for 1d8 points of damage.

The werepanther can only be harmed by silver or magical weapons of at least +1. It possesses keen night vision that enables it to see in near-lightless conditions, acute hearing, and a sensitive sense of smell.

Appearance: In human form, Kelemvor is muscular and ruggedly attractive man in his early 30s, with long black hair. His mouth is more prone to scowls than smiles, and he often wears military garb. Even when trying to relax in civilian garb, he still wears at least a chest plate.

His panther form is physically identical to a black panther.

Personality: Kelemvor is an extremist in everything he does. He only shows his wilder side and keeps his sensitivity a deeply buried secret.

Because of his family's curse, he is a tragic figure, constantly forced to seek the life of a mercenary. He has assumed a gruff, callous exterior that protects him more from his own feelings than from emotional strife caused by others. He hates the fact that his curse demands he take payment for any deed he does that is not in his best interest, but realizes that any selfless act will bring forth his panther form, possibly causing the death of some innocent.

Kelemvor is driven to seek a place of law and order. To him it would be a safe place ruled by benevolent authority. This drive is tied to his search for a benevolent father-figure to replace the monster who sired him. Kelemvor will ally himself to such father-figures but as soon as they betray his idealized vision (as all do in time), he leaves, more embittered than before. His search for true order gives him a limited view of the world. Everything is seen in black or white.

Because of his memories of his corrupt father, Kelemvor is unwilling to assume command. If faced with an incompetent superior, Kelemvor simply leaves.

The werepanther form is more animalistic in its behavior, but retains enough of Kelemvor's memories that it will not attack Kelemvor's friends or allies. Kelemvor himself has only dim memories of what the panther does or feels.

Relatives: Kendrel Lyonsbane (father, deceased), Cyndril (mother, deceased), Guntharr (brother, deceased), Burne (uncle, deceased).

Allies: Adon, Cyric, Midnight.

Patron deity: none.

Home: Lyonsbane Keep.

Personal history: Kelemvor was the fourth and final son Cyndril bore Kendrel. The 10 years she had waited since her last child had taken their toll; she died in childbirth. Throughout his childhood, Kelemvor was always blamed for her death.

As the youngest child, Kelemvor had the hardest burden to carry. Not only did he have to meet his father's aspirations, he had to match the accomplishments of his far-older brothers. When he was 8, his brothers were already writing their own legends as they battled in far-off lands. Kendrel was retired from fighting; an old war injury forced him to settle for work as a military advisor. The inaction rankled him even more since the injury was the result of his own carelessness. Still, he never acknowledged his own part in his downfall. It was far easier to blame his inaction on Kelemvor's improper care at the hands of a succession of nannies.

By the time he was 10, Kelemvor had begun to show appreciation for art and beauty. His teacher was Tannith, a lovely and sensitive woman. This "corruption," as Kendrel saw it, was the final straw. He discharged Tannith and took full control of Kelemvor's upbringing; the boy was now locked into a military future. Kelemvor ran into Tannith weeks later, and he learned she had been savagely abused and left for dead by his father's friends. The fire of hatred kindled in Kelemvor's breast.

Kelemvor learned to channel his fury into fighting. He became an apt pupil whose rapid progress in the deadly arts delighted Kendrel. The father never guessed his son's motivation. He was sure it was the family bloodline proving true. He would soon know how right he was.

When Kelemvor was 13, he reached a turning point in his life, meeting Lilian-

MAJOR CHARACTERS

na, a 15-year-old beauty who reminded Kelemvor of his lost nanny. She was full of laughter, art, song, and an indomitable love for Kelemvor despite his gruff exterior. She slowly worked on penetrating his emotional armor.

Once again Kendrel sought to destroy the boy's happiness. Kelemvor discovered his father beating Lilianna. He leaped to her defense, but was no match for his father. Kelemvor's selfless attack on his brutal father triggered something deep inside of him.

Kelemvor felt his body burn as he transformed into an adult panther. The beast tore Kendrel apart. When two bodyguards rushed into the room, the panther ripped them apart as well. During the carnage, Lilianna cowered in the corner. Then she recognized that Kelemvor's mind was still in control. She helped him escape the castle and flee into the woodlands.

Kelemvor remembers little of the next six months. He prowled as a panther most of the time; his humanity was so completely submerged that even his human form was that of a feral wild man, more animal than human. Eventually his animal rage subsided and he returned again to human form and intelligence.

Kelemvor's uncle, Burne, went searching for his nephew when he learned of his brother's death. Burne was an intelligent, kind man, very different from his cruel, petty brother. Burne recognized how different Kelemvor was from the rest of his family, and saw, too, that Kendrel mistreated the boy badly.

Burne and his adventuring company found young Kelemvor wandering in the countryside. Kel's uncle was saddened to learn that the boy had inherited the family curse, but felt no sorrow for Kendrel's death. It was from his uncle that Kelemvor learned of the curse that would probably haunt him for the rest of his life.

Kyle Lyonsbane was the first and only of the Lyonsbanes to receive the curse due to his own actions. Kyle was a professional mercenary, and, to him, every service had its price—even if it had to be taken from the purses of widows and orphans.

In a battle long ago, Kyle had the choice of defending a wounded sorceress (who had been struck down while protecting Kyle from a sneak attack) or rushing through the enemies' lines to sack their stronghold, which was about to fall. Kyle chose the latter, and the sorceress cursed him with her dying breath. The curse would make sure that no Lyonsbane ever worked for profit again. If Kyle or his ancestors ever did anything for personal gain, they would turn into a beast.

Over time, however, the curse became unstable and only affected some of Kyle's descendants. By the time the curse had passed through five generations of Lyonsbanes, down to Kelemvor, it had mutated in a more unusual way, too. No longer was the cursed Lyonsbane required to act unselfishly. Now, if the curse's victim did something without payment, he was changed into a panther.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Like most spiteful acts, the sorceress's curse did more damage to the world than it did good. Yet, Kelemvor adjusted, joining Burne's company—for pay, of course.

The panther was quiescent for the next three years. It was a fresh start and a happy time of sorts. Although forced to live the life of a mercenary warrior, Kelemvor found that he enjoyed the martial life surrounded by Burne's companions. Kelemvor grew into a fighter to be reckoned with.

Sometimes his dreams reminded him of the life he had led and the life he could have had. In his 18th year, the nightmare of his past gained reality. Burne's company was ambushed and slaughtered to a man. Too late, Kelemvor battled the man who had taken Burne's life. The man was Kelemvor's eldest brother Guntharr. Brotherly hate fueled their battle; the blows and words they exchanged were equally vicious. Though he was desperately outnumbered, Kelemvor fought his brother's company. This selfless act released the curse again, and the beast slew Guntharr and every one of his men aside from a few who fled.

The disheartened Kelemvor returned to the warrior life. Even here there was no release from his inner torment. He became resentful of the ultimate lack of meaning in a mercenary's life. He especially resented incompetent superiors whose decisions cost too many men their lives. Kelemvor could have been a better leader, but he never tried. The ghost of his father, the image of a man corrupted by command, made sure Kelemvor never took the reins of authority.

Eventually Kelemvor left his employers. He felt the urge to search for a prize whose form eluded him, even in dreams. Then the crisis of the gods occurred. Kelemvor met up with Cyric, Adon, and the sorceress, Midnight.

New Lycanthropes in The Realms

The magical energies unleashed during the divine crisis had a peculiar side effect. As the crisis abated, reports came in of new lycanthropic species. Some were accidentally created when one of these freak maelstroms of pure magic enveloped a human and an animal. The two merged together into a single being with traits of both. A second group included those who remained physically independent but gained the ability to transform into another's form. A third group appears to have been deliberately created. A fourth group includes those that appeared as a result of long-standing curses; apparently these lycanthropes had always existed, but have only just recently come to light. All the new lycanthropes either fill niches left unoccupied or seem to be intended to specifically oppose known lycanthropic species.

Individuals may acquire their lycanthropy in an apparently spontaneous transformation during a time of stress. In such cases, the new lycanthropy is often related to some long dormant factor in that person's bloodline.

Some of these new lycanthropes are listed below. As additional species become known, game masters will have to develop statistics for them. Some guidelines for creating new lycanthropes are:

- Climate: Any, but tending toward the animal's range.
- Frequency: Rare.
- Organization: As per normal animal.
- Active cycle: The lycanthropic form is only present during the night.
- Diet: As per animal.
- Intelligence: Any.
- Treasure: Any.
- Alignment: Any.
- Number appearing: As per animal.
- Armor class: Normal animal AC minus 1d4.
- Movement: Normal human or animal rate (depending on form).
- Hit Dice: Lycanthrope hit dice are the sum of normal human and normal animal hit dice.

- Number of attacks: As per animal.
- Damage/attack: At least as dangerous as the normal animal.

Special attack: As per animal.

- Special defenses: 90% of new lycanthropic species can only be harmed by silver or magical weapons of +1 or greater.

- Magic resistance: 90% of new lycanthropic species have no magical resistance.

- Size: Any hybrid forms are halfway between the human and animal sizes.

- Morale: Most are steady (11-12) or very steady (13-14).

Recently discovered lycanthropes include:

Werbison: These Neutral Good creatures are the largest and, so far, the only herbivorous lycanthropes. They are humanoids of above average size who can turn into a form resembling a minotaur but possessing a bison-like head and short horns. Werbison attack by charging headfirst into their opponents; the charge does 1d4 points of damage. The hooved feet stomp for 1d2 points of damage. They normally do not bite opponents, hence the spread of this form of lycanthropy is limited only to those the werbison purposely infects.

Werecoats: These Chaotic Good creatures have two forms. One resembles a human-sized house cat. The other is a hybrid with feline features (hind legs, head, claws, tail, and fur) over a humanoid frame. They are sworn enemies of the wererats. Werecoats speak any feline language, even when in human form. Each front claw does 1d2 points of damage or rakes for 1d3 each. The bite does 1d4. Even in human form, the strong fingernails enable each hand to do 1 point of damage.

Weredogs: These Lawful Good creatures resemble large dogs such as mastiffs, St. Bernards, or German shepherds. Their bites do 1d6 points of damage. They have 3 hit dice +3. Weredogs appeared as a canine counter to the werewolves. They are often Good-aligned people whose personalities were so strong that they managed to alter the effects of the impending lycanthropy. Weredogs are sworn to destroy the more numerous and powerful werewolves. Unfortunately, most people still have trouble telling weredogs and werewolves apart. Consequently, those the weredog tries to help may be scared and turn against it.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Weredolphins: These are Lawful Good beings that are able to transform themselves into elf-like humanoids or bottlenose dolphins. Weredolphins attack by ramming (2d4 points of damage). They can summon 1d10 dolphins or other small cetaceans or 1d2 whales. During the day, weredolphins may rest atop whales or come ashore. They are the enemies of the weresharks and wereseals.

Weredragons: These are people who are able to transform themselves into a hybrid form that combines a humanoid shape with distinctly dragon-like features such as scales, fangs, claws, wings, and a long tail. All have wings, even those species emulating the non-winged gold dragons. Each of these creatures have the same alignment as the dragon it resembles. They have 8 hit dice. Their bites and clawed hands each do 1d6 points of damage. They can also use the dragon's breath weapon once each day.

Wereleopards: These Lawful Neutral lycanthropes transform into shapes similar to spotted leopards. They have a hybrid form that combines the overall humanoid shape with leopard-like feet, tail, pelt, face, and ears. Wereleopards move silently at great speed (12) and climb easily, even when carrying a burden equal to their weight.

Wereowls ("Wrowls"): These Neutral Good beings are the first known avian lycanthropes. They transform at night into man-sized great snowy owls. Wereowls, which are highly intelligent, can speak Common in this form. They attack with their claws (1d3 each) and beaks (1d2). They fly at a rate of 18 and are maneuverability class C. Wereowls are the natural enemies of the harpies.

Werepanthers: These Lawful Neutral lycanthropes turn into sleek black panthers or slim, athletic humans with dark hair and a slight trace of elven features. It is unknown which is the werepanther's real form (50% chance either way). Werepanthers move silently at great speed (12) and climb easily, even when carrying a burden equal to the their weight. Their ebony coats make them difficult to spot in the dark.

Werespiders: These Lawful Evil creatures turn into giant web-spinning spiders with poisonous bites. Even as humans, they are skilled weavers and spinners. Werespiders are firm believers in a society as strictly ordered as their webs. They detest Chaotic spider-like monsters.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Prince Tristan Kendrick

ARMOR CLASS: -1

MOVE: 12"

Hit Points: 37-95

NO. OF ATTACKS: 1

DAMAGE/ATTACK: 1d8 + 1/1d8 + 4

(Normal long sword/ Sword of Cymrych Hugh)

SPECIAL ATTACKS: Nil

SPECIAL DEFENSES: Nil

MAGIC RESISTANCE: Nil

SIZE: M

ALIGNMENT: Neutral Good

PSIONIC ABILITY: Nil

12th-Level Human Ranger

S:17 I:16 W:14 D:18 C:17 CH:18

Physical description: Tristan is a young human male who, early in his career, seemed to have no care in the world. When in times of peace, Tristan wears the usual Ffolk garb of cloak and trousers and boots. He has a new coat of hair on his chin.

In combat, Tristan wears a suit of banded mail armor and favors a long sword. He is an indifferent archer, though he has learned more as he has progressed in experience.

As high king, Tristan wears the crown of the high king, which is a simple gold circlet with eight points.

Equipment: Tristan wields the Sword of Cymrych Hugh, a long sword first used by his ancestor to defeat Kazgaroth and found the line of the high kings. When he found it, its hilt was wrapped in old, dull, leather, and it rode in a scabbard of dull, brown, leather. The blade, however, is silver, and it shines with a light all its own. The blade is emblazoned with a crest and motto in the Old Script. According to the "Ballad of Cymrych Hugh," the sword was forged by dwarven smiths from metal forged by the Goddess herself.

This sword is a long sword +4. It has a special purpose of defeating Kazgaroth. Its special purpose power is to cause fear in its target for 1d4 rounds. It detects evil in a 2" radius and communicates by empathy. Its Intelligence is 12, and its Ego 13. If Kazgaroth is within 36" of the sword, and the wielder touches the sword by the hilt, he must make a successful saving throw vs. spell or be compelled to seek out the monster and battle it directly.

Tristan also rides the white stallion Avalon, a war horse who is very similar to a paladin's war horse. Avalon is larger than any other horse on the Moonshaes. Possession of this steed gives the rider command over the fighting services of the Sister Knights of Synnoria, otherwise known as the Warriors of the Llewyr. These are a troop of elven warrior maidens. The troop never numbers more than 25 (there were 20 when they first took service with Tristan), and each is a third-level fighter with AC 1, riding a heavy war horse with the speed and maneuverability of a medium horse. These horses are mares and geldings of Avalon's herd. The troop is led by Brigit, a fifth-level fighter.

Tristan's other main "equipment" is Canthus, a moor hound from the isle of Moray. Canthus is a large and powerful specimen of the already powerful breed, with a proud bearing unusual for its kind. His brown coat gleams, thick and smooth, over broad shoulders and long, slender, but powerful legs. His teeth are the size of a man's little finger.

Canthus is a war dog (see MONSTER MANUAL) but he has 3 + 3 hit dice, 20 hit points, and an armor class of 5. His damage per attack is 1d8 + 2. Canthus has a dog's normal intelligence, but is inspired by the Goddess to protect and serve Tristan. Canthus also wears a torque of the Goddess (see Robyn) under his spiked iron collar.

Personality: Initially, Tristan was outwardly carefree and inwardly troubled by his father's constant criticism. As events transpired in the Moonshae Isles, first with the advent of Kazgaroth and then the machinations of the Council of Wizards, he became more self-confident and assertive. However, he still had a tendency to retreat from his cares when danger was not pressing on him, trying to drown his sorrows in drink and carousing. This did nothing to endear him to his father, who saw him first as an unworthy wastrel, and then as a good war officer who was still incompetent as a peacetime leader.

When his father was slain by assassins (see background), Tristan was first cast adrift. But he found his path in trying to track down his father's murderers, and the path took him to his true heritage, as high king of the Ffolk of the Moonshae Isles.

Motivations: Initially, Tristan's motivation was both to live up to his father's exacting standards and to avoid the onerous duties of being the prince of Corwell whenever he could. This constant contradiction in motivation drove him to drink and other excesses. But the coming of Kazgaroth made him realize that he owed the duty of leadership to his people, and the machinations of the Council of Wizards made him realize that he had to unite all of the Ffolk under one strong ruler to keep them and their way of life intact against the threats of Kazgaroth, the Northmen, and the people of the mainland.

Background: Tristan was prince of Corwell, son of King Bryon Kendrick of the royal line of Corwell. His mother died a few years after he was born, and his father mourned her for 10 years after that, in some part blaming Tristan for her death.

King Bryon was determined to make his son a good ruler for Corwell, but lacked the ability to make such a goal interesting to Tristan. Bryon also had the care of Robyn, the young daughter of the great druid, Brianna Moonsinger, who had died trying to destroy Kazgaroth single-handedly. Tristan grew up with Robyn, at first thinking her his sister, then, as he realized there was no real relationship, his brotherly fondness turned to love.

However, he continued to disappoint his father until, on a hunting trip with his tutor, the arms master Arlen, Robyn, his old friend Pawldo, his new hound Canthus, and his new friend Daryth of Calimshan, he ran afoul of firbolgs, and Arlen was killed.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

He was saved by Keren, the greatest bard of the Moonshaes, and learned that the high king felt there was a threat looming for Corwell.

When Keren disappeared after leaving Corwell for Alaron, Tristan and his friends attempted to find him and finally followed his trail to Myrloch Vale where they rescued him and the dwarf Finellen from the firbolgs and discovered the fabled Sword of Cymrych Hugh in a firbolg treasure house.

Going back to Corwell, the party discovered that the Northmen had invaded in force, destroying several cantreves and marching on Corwell itself. Moreover, a party of Northmen were going through Myrloch Vale in an attempt to cut off the retreat of the refugees from the cantreves and keep them from reinforcing Corwell.

Attempting to catch the Northmen, Tristan and his friends first found the stallion Avalon and the Sisters of Synnoria, then met Finellen again, this time with a party of dwarves who had been sent to oppose the firbolgs going to join the Northmen under Kazgaroth's direction.

Tristan forged the elven war maidens, the dwarves, and refugees from the cantreves into a force that met the Northmen on the road and drove them away, allowing the refugees to escape to Corwell. Canthus was seemingly killed at this time, though his body was not recovered.

In fact, Canthus was revived by Genna Moonsinger, the great druid of Gwynneth, who sent him off to oppose the werewolf who had taken command of the Pack, one of the "children" of the Goddess.

Tristan and his friends arrived in Corwell to find it besieged by Thelgar Ironhand (actually Kazgaroth) of Oman, who had already slain the Leviathan, another of the Goddess' children.

Tristan fought Kazgaroth and the besieging Northmen, finally wounding the monster sorely. When Canthus led the Pack into the Northmen, Robyn destroyed almost all of the Bloodriders, and Tristan wounded Kazgaroth. The beast gave up his plan of conquest and fled. Tristan and his friends followed, finally confronting Kazgaroth again at the Moonwell Kazgaroth had corrupted.

In a hard-fought battle, they finally brought the beast low, slaying it with a combination of the sword and druidic magic. By the end of the fight, Tristan, Pawldo, Daryth, and Keren had all fallen, but the Goddess was able to bring all but Keren (who had been disintegrated) back to life.

For the next year, Tristan helped his father supervise the recovery of Corwell. However, his father was still critical of his every effort, so he spent much of his time in carousing and hunting to avoid his father's eye. Also, in the course of the fight against Kazgaroth, Robyn had discovered her heritage as a druid, and went off to Myrloch Vale to study the arts with her newly discovered aunt, Genna Moonsinger, the great druid. Tristan, who had fallen finally and irrevocably in love with Robyn, was also devastated by her absence, and tried to solace himself in his revelries.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

However, a year after Kazgaroth was slain, the machinations of Cyndre and his Council of Sorcerers came to fruition. Assassins attacked Tristan and his father and killed the king. Daryth, coming to their aid, recognized Razfallow, a half-orc assassin he had known in Calimshan.

Tristan was not necessarily the first choice to assume his father's crown. He was opposed by Pontswain, a cantrev lord with a royal lineage who attempted to parlay his long experience and Tristan's youth into his selection as the new king.

It was decided to let the high king decide, but when Pontswain and Tristan (with Daryth and Canthus) attempted to go to Alaron, their boat was sabotaged and they found themselves washed up on the castle of Queen Allisyn, where Tristan was told that a new high king would be selected who bore the Sword of Cymrych Hugh. They were then picked up by a passing bard and taken to Alaron.

There they were arrested by the Scarlet Guard of the high king, who was convinced that Tristan was there to assassinate him.

Rescued by Pawldo and Daryth, Tristan and Pontswain were forced to go deep into the earth, where they found first Alexei, one of the Council of Sorcerers, whom Cyndre had imprisoned there. Then, as they escaped through a secret passage that led out of Caer Callidyr, they found Finellen, who was leading a force of dwarves sent to hunt duergar (gray dwarves).

Eventually finding their way to the surface again, Tristan joined forces with O'Roarke, a nobleman who had been disinherited by the high king and who had set himself up in the forest as an outlaw.

There, he was met by Robyn, who was fleeing the destruction of the Moonwell on Corwell by Hobarth.

When Cyndre led the Scarlet Guard to destroy O'Roarke's hideout, the friends managed to get away, incidentally fulfilling most of the aspects of Queen Allisyn's prophecy on the way.

Finally, they defeated Cyndre and the high king in a climatic battle, and Tristan was proclaimed the new high king, having fulfilled all the conditions of the prophecy.

From Alaron they journeyed back to Myrloch Vale, to find it devastated by Hobarth, Bhaal himself, and a corrupted Genna Moonsinger. By clever diplomacy, Tristan managed to enlist Grunnarch, the last king of the Northmen, on his side and find a force to oppose Bhaal and his minions. In this final struggle they lost good friends, such as Daryth, but finally managed to prevail.

Now Tristan is the monarch of all the Moonshaes, and he and Robyn must face a new Moonshae unlike anything they have known before.

With the destruction of much of Myrloch Vale, and the destruction of most of the druids of the Moonshaes, the Goddess is no longer a major force in the Moonshae Islands. New gods are coming to the islands, and somehow they must be accommodated, and the Ffolk and Northmen must find a way to accommodate their ways of life to these new gods. Tristan and Robyn, with Grunnarch, must somehow lead their combined people into this new, frightening, age.

Other notes: Using Tristan in a campaign set in the Moonshaes depends on the time period in which the DM sets the adventure. If set in the time depicted in FR2, MOONSHAE, Tristan is a young lad, perhaps 10 years old, and already suffering from the moodiness and grim authority of his father.

If set in the time just before the advent of Kazgaroth, Tristan is a popular but little-respected young prince still trying to find a place in the world that he enjoys without the onerous duties of being a prince. At this time he can be an interesting chance-met tavern or hunting companion. During the time depicted in the three books of The Moonshae Trilogy, Tristan is how you find him in the books, a young man much worried by fate and trying to make the Moonshaes a safe place for himself and his people again.

The period between the first two books of the trilogy is an interesting time to know Tristan, as he is a great hero, yet still chafing at the duties of being a prince. At this time, he makes a rather desperate hunting and drinking companion, trying to lose his sorrow over the departure of Robyn to Myrloch Vale and the ongoing criticisms of his father. At this time, he is ready for any adventure to take his mind off his self-pity.

After the time of the Trilogy, Tristan is a fair and powerful king, who rules the Ffolk and influences the Northmen as well. Domestic relationships are quiet, but there are still monsters loose throughout Gwynneth and the other isles, thanks to the efforts of Hobarth and Bhaal. Newcomer adventurers, perhaps brought to the Moonshaes by stories of combat and loot to be found, can get plenty of work from King Tristan to help the people clean up the monsters that still threaten them.

If someone should get into combat with Tristan at any time in his career, they will find him a good close-in fighter, who rarely uses missile weapons when he can close with a sword. Of course, when the sword is that of Cymrych Hugh, one can understand his preference for that weapon.

On a more peaceful note, Tristan is a very open and trusting young man. He is easily guiled and fooled by a friendly voice and manner. If he finds he has been fooled, however, he is quick to anger and want revenge. Con men should consider carefully their plots if they think to take advantage of his good nature.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

The Royal Line of The Moonshaes

Many hundred years ago, the king of the small kingdom of Callidyrr on the island of Alaron united the Ffolk of the Moonshaes to fight the incursions of the beast who had named himself Kazgaroth. With the blessings of the Goddess and a sword forged for him by the finest of dwarven craftsmen, Cymrych Hugh faced Kazgaroth. The might of the sword and the king drove the beast back to the darkened recesses of his home, badly wounded but not killed. There it remained for many centuries.

Cymrych Hugh returned to Callidyrr to build the spectacular Caer Callidyrr, the seat of the high kings, and to deal with his sorrow.

Queen Allisynn: Cymrych Hugh survived the war with Kazgaroth, though he was sorely wounded. His young queen, Allisynn, was not so fortunate. In honor of his love for this queen, Cymrych Hugh had a palace created to house her body and vast treasures. This castle resides on an island that spends most of its time at the bottom of the Strait of Alaron, but rises to the surface perhaps four times a year on particularly bright days so that his queen can once again enjoy the sunlight.

The sahuagin of the area use the castle as a way point for their patrols. They are too evil to touch the treasures safely, but they oppose anyone who might be allowed to touch the treasures in a typical display of sahuagin spite.

When Tristan Kendrick was adrift on the strait, the castle appeared to him and, when he explored it, he saw Queen Allisynn, who returned the Sword of Cymrych Hugh to him (it had been lost in the shipwreck that set him adrift). She also gave him a prophecy that stated that a new high king would arise who held the sword and had the name of Cymrych.

The sons of Cymrych Hugh: Cymrych Hugh had to remarry to provide more high kings to follow him. He married the daughter of a major chieftain of Gwynneth and had three children before she died in childbirth. He remarried again and had two more children before he finally died of complications arising from the wounds he received in the battle with Kazgaroth so many years before. His oldest son, who was only 13, took over the crown of the high king, and Cymrych Hugh's other children married into the noble families of the Isles and became the progenitors of all the kings of the Moonshaes. The war with Kazgaroth had destroyed most of the ruling families, so the children and grandchildren of Cymrych Hugh rapidly became part of the bloodlines of all the royal families.

Moreover, even the husbands of his daughters took Cymrych as a family name. Within a couple of centuries, every noble family in the Moonshaes had Cymrych as a family name.

Unfortunately, this was the only unifying factor among them. While each ruler gave lip service to the primacy of the high king, each attempted to otherwise promote his own importance to the detriment of the others.

When the Northmen arrived from the Sword Coast, they found a collection of squabbling kingdoms, ready-made for conquest. The reigning high king, Dolan Cymrych, attempted to meet the Northmen at the northern tip of Alaron, near what is now Sunderstaad, but he made the mistake of attempting to cross Whitefish Bay in a coracle flotilla. They were met by the fast-sailing long ships of the Northmen, and the flotilla was virtually destroyed. Dolan died trying to cover his followers' retreat, and the crown of the high kings went to the bottom of the sea.

Dolan's son, Conn, survived the battle, but the loss of the crown (not to mention the battle) was a severe blow to his position. While he was the undisputed high king, his authority was undermined. Each lord paid his respects to the high king but gave him no attention. Instead, each small king and cantrev lord attempted to fight the Northmen in his own way, and usually lost. In a hundred years, the Northmen had settled in Norland, Norheim, Oman, and northern Alaron and Gwynneth, and relations with them settled down to occasional raids and counter-raids.

Conn had rescued the Sword of Cymrych Hugh, but that proved no more potent than any other good sword against the Northmen invaders.

A hundred years later, when the Northmen had become just another fact of life to the Ffolk, another high king led his men into Myrloch Vale to quell firbolg incursions into Corwell. The Ffolk were ambushed and, though the Ffolk won the fight, the high king slain in the fighting. The sword was not recovered. Apparently, firbolg survivors of the fight took it away with them and stored it in their treasuries, where it was eventually recovered by Tristan Kendrick.

The names of Cymrych Hugh: About 400 years ago, when the crown of Cymrych Hugh had been lost and the various kingdoms and cantrevs were moving further and further away from allegiance to the high king, the names of the royal families began to change. Many of the families had Cymrych as their name, so the various branches took to spelling and pronouncing their particular names differently. Thus, the royal line of Corwell derived Kendrick from Cymrych.

Thus, when Queen Allisynn said that Tristan was to see a high king who held the Sword of Cymrych Hugh and was named Cymrych, she was really talking about Tristan himself, and she proved this true by bringing the crown of the high king to Tristan when his followers were proclaiming him the new high king.

Thus, Tristan is the first high king in centuries to possess both the crown and sword of the high king. That, and the destruction of so many royal families of the Moonshaes — thanks to the depredations of Kazgaroth and the machinations of Cyndre and Hobarth, should make him the greatest high king to reign in the history of the Moonshaes since Cymrych Hugh himself.

MAJOR CHARACTERS

Midnight
