BASILISKS

The basilisk bears a menacing and harrowing reputation on account of its lethal glare. These eight-legged lizards dwell in isolated rocky areas. There are many interesting ideas that exist in the world about how the basilisk came into being. The most prominent tale of the basilisk's origin is that a chicken, specifically a rooster, laid upon the egg of a snake or serpent. As a former colleague has reported, this is obviously preposterous.

Despite their savage reputation, basilisks are still often sought out by humanoids as a target of hunting. Although they are reported to be largely solitary, further research on this beast has turned up surprising information. They are in fact a social creature that has been discovered to cannibalize its own kind when starvation finds them, as it often does when they are trapped in humanoid cities.

NOTABLE TRAIT

Petrifying Gaze.

If a creature starts its turn within 30 feet of the basilisk and the two of them can see each other, the basilisk can force the creature to make a Constitution saving throw (DC varying by basilisk) if the basilisk isn't incapacitated. On a failed save, the creature magically begins to turn to stone and is restrained. It must repeat the saving throw at the end of its next turn. On a success, the effect ends. On a failure, the creature is petrified until freed by the greater restoration spell or other magic.

A creature that isn't surprised can avert its eyes to avoid the saving throw at the start of its turn. If it does so, it can't see the basilisk until the start of its next turn, when it can avert its eyes again.

If it looks at the basilisk in the meantime, it must immediately make the save. If the basilisk sees its reflection within 30 feet of it in bright light, it mistakes itself for a rival and targets itself with its gaze.

BLINK DOGS

Blink dogs are similar in size and shape to other canine species, but with magical abilities. Their temperaments match those of dogs, but their actions are influenced by a high level of intelligence, which surprises many trainers who are not used to working with blink dog breeds. Over the years, the term 'blink dog' has become a blanket term for any canine with magical abilities, but originally it only referred to what we now call the hunting blink dog.

The earliest tales of blink dogs was that they were born from a litter of puppies blessed by a forest sprite. Earlier in the year, a hunter had saved the forest sprite's tree from a group of traveling bandits who wanted to plunder it for treasure. The hunter leapt to the sprite's defense with his pack of dogs and successfully fended off the scoundrels. Sadly, one of the dogs was lost in the fight, unable to dodge a fatal sword blow to the head. When the hunter's dogs had a litter that fall, the sprite blessed the dogs in thanks for their heroic efforts. Each dog was able to blink in and out of existence, ensuring that none of the pack would never again be caught by a fatal blow.

BULETTES

Bulettes, often times called 'land sharks', swim through the ground as well as their seadwelling ancestors did the oceans. Taking their prey by surprise, they thrust up with sharp teeth and powerful jaws. With a penchant for humanoid flesh, they are dangerous to observe and even more so to train.

In addition to sharks, bulettes share their ancestry with the more docile giant turtle. The bulette has a hardened, natural armor that protects the creature from the rocks, roots, and bones under the ground through which they travel. They have sharp, thick claws on each leg, good for angling upwards and tearing aside ceilings of grass, sand, ice, and even stone.

COCKATRICES

Even the common cockatrice is a sight to behold; its diverse origins blend to form an elegant, lithe body with plumage that seamlessly flows into the scales that protect its torso and back. Its colors, temperament, and even abilities are varied, depending on the creature who incubated the egg. Cockatrices produce their own eggs, but often will sneak their eggs into nests of other creatures for incubation, resulting in different variations of cockatrices.

The origins of this species is still a matter of debate among academics and mages; many of whom are more than willing to talk about where they “actually” came from in exchange for space by the tavern fire and a few complimentary ales. The only thing they can indeed agree upon is that magic had to be involved to bring together the parts into a working whole.

COUATLS

Couatl have maintained an active presence within civilizations near their homelands over centuries of recorded history. Their aid and guidance are not only tales of legend, but memories of recent decades. My research led me to the expertise of one Amiko kaj Zorgo, a bold-hearted half-orc druid from the southern continent. By the time I met him, Amiko had spent nearly two decades of his life in the service of various couatl mates. His personal experience and academic knowledge made him an invaluable guide, and certainly my research would not have been so complete without his expertise.

DRAGON TURTLE

The word dragon not only denotes a species of creatures, but has an ancient weight, a meaning. It represents something great and powerful, something to be feared, but most of all to be respected. It is not surprising the subjects of this entry have many names with one commonality: the word dragon. They swam in the oceans of the earth when it was still young; before folk much smaller than them came into being, before thoughts were given a voice and immortals were called gods. They are as eternal as the waters of the earth. In my elven tongue they are known as ear'loki, or sea dragons, but for the sake of the many readers who many peruse this book I shall keep to their name in the common tongue: dragon turtles.

FAERIE DRAGONS

Adventurers often associate the fey with sprites, nymphs, dryads, and the like. Strange creatures who, though in appearance seem almost humanoid, have customs and cultures far unlike our own. But the presence of fey goes far beyond shy nymphs in woodland ponds. Faerie dragon courts are scattered throughout the world, spreading their mischief in towns and countrysides, or leading travelers off well-beaten paths into magical secrets and dark shadows from which they might never emerge.

HARPIES

The harpy was long thought to be one of the most understood magical creatures in the material plane. Recent observations by myself and other scholars in the last several decades have revealed more accurate information, discrediting long-held beliefs preached by travelers and villagers alike. It should be noted, however, that no discredited rumors have made the harpy less dangerous than before, and the fearless adventurer is still advised to take extreme caution when encountering these melodic — but deadly — creatures.

HIPPOCAMPI

Once the villains of children's nightmares, the hippocampus now features in bardic tales of heroic ocean quests. Fishermen of the southern seas popularized the name "hippocampus" centuries ago, combining the words for "sea monster" and "horse." An understandable mistake, given the creature's eerily similar yet dissimilar appearance to the horse. My own research and observations, compiled after a year amongst the sea-elf fishing tribes south of the Pocaenan wildlands and the Tide-dancer merfolk, however, revealed attributes more reminiscent of whales and dolphins.

ABILITIES

Deep Acclimation. The hippocampus can survive at extreme aquatic depths.

Water Breathing. The hippocampus can breathe only underwater.

ACTIONS

Bite. Melee Weapon Attack: +6 to hit, reach 5 ft., one target. Hit: 33 (4d12 + 7) piercing damage.

Lure. The hippocampus targets a creature that can see its light within 60 feet. The target makes a DC 15 Intelligence saving throw. On a failed save, the creature is charmed and moves towards the hippocampus on its turn. At the end of each of the creature's turns, it can attempt a new saving throw to end this effect.

Swallow. The hippocampus makes one bite attack against a Large or smaller creature that is charmed by it. If the attack hits, that creature takes the bite's damage and is swallowed, and the charmed effect ends. While swallowed, the creature is blinded and restrained, it has total cover against attacks and other effects outside the hippocampus, and it takes 17 (5d6) acid damage at the start of each of the hippocampus' turns.

If the hippocampus takes 25 damage or more on a single turn from a creature inside it, the hippocampus must succeed on a DC 15 Constitution saving throw at the end of that turn or regurgitate all swallowed creatures, which fall prone in a space within 10 feet of the hippocampus. If the hippocampus dies, a swallowed creature is no longer restrained by it and can escape the corpse using 20 feet of movement, exiting prone.

HYDRAS

Living in the highest places in the world is the peregrine hippogriff. These delicate and cunning creatures live in castle towers, high mountaintops, and giant trees if they can find them. Unlike their common cousins, peregrine hippogriffs live in mated pairs, building their nests together high above anything else. Young peregrine hippogriffs learn to fly quickly, as a sudden fall could easily lead to their death. Several castles with high-enough towers boast a peregrine hippogriff pair. It has become popular enough that some nobles build high towers with these hippogriffs in mind.

LIZARDFOLK

The lizardfolk are some of the most insular creatures I have observed, which only encourages the many misunderstandings surrounding their tribes. It is said the lizardfolk were once ancient monsters more akin to serpents than lizards, but received the gifts of legs and intelligence from long-forgotten gods. Eventually their tribes spread and evolved with their environments, leading to the four major variations of lizardfolk encountered throughout the material realm today.

MANTICORES

Some say they are the result of horrible magical and alchemical experiments that escaped the laboratory to hunt. Some say all of the evil, violent thoughts in the world coalesced one day to form them. Whatever the origin, the manticore is a monstrous beast. It has the body of a large cat and the wings of a bat, with spines down its back which ends in the tail of a scorpion. Its face is monstrous yet also vaguely human, and rests in a contorted expression of rage.

Manticores seem to have a deep-seated hatred of humans and humanoids. They seek the taste of human flesh, and seem to enjoy the suffering of their victims. One should be very wary when seeking to slay a manticore, for even victory may be pyrrhic when you walk away with their poison in your veins.

MYCONIDS

There has never been a more important time to speak about myconid preservation than today. As more species become aware of one another, it becomes increasingly difficult to understand each other. This can be doubly said for the mighty species of myconids who are not animal life, but plant life.

What makes conservation, or better put, preservation, so difficult with the myconids is the common misconception that because one can sprout from the ground centuries old they are ancient and wise. While these two descriptors may be totally true in reference to their own ways and their own kind, newly sprouted myconids are naive to the ways of our world. We should set realistic expectations for these alien creatures and perhaps learn better how to communicate with them, rather than expecting them to adapt to us.

OTYUGHS

Putrid mounds of walking refuse is often the first thought a person has when thinking of the noble otyugh. What most fail to see in these olfactory-sense-assaulting monsters is that they are not monsters at all, but creatures perfectly designed to live as one in their natural environment: garbage.

A great many creatures in the realms were created by wizards, but the otyugh species is one of the only ones 'enhanced' by an alchemist. Many years ago, an alchemist whose name was lost to time needed something to help clean up her experiments. If left alone, they tended to grow claws, teeth, and feet — running off to terrify pesky villagers who would oft speak of raising arms against the alchemist.

OWLBEARS

Owlbears are often perceived as a simple species; violent beasts who originated as a botched experiment by a foolhardy wizard. And while I cannot deny the creatures' violent natures, owlbears are far more complex creatures whose various forms of nonverbal communication allow them to convey a wealth of knowledge between one another. Many incorrectly assume owlbears are birds because of their avian features. However, like the platypus, owlbears are considered mammals, if not with the caveat that they came into creation by way of magical means.

PEGASI

Created by magic and inspiring the imagination of all, the pegasus remains one of the most well-known and beloved of the mythical beasts. Were it not for the magic infused in the beasts, their wings could not truly hold them up. Known mostly as some of the most notorious mounts for heroes, pegasi are elusive and difficult to find in the wild. Their impressive powers of wind control and flight means they can live nearly anywhere, making it hard for humanoid to reach them when they do not want to be found.

Many breeders now live scattered throughout the kingdoms, selling their stock. These pegasi are overbred and because of eugenics, now have multiple health problems and temperament concerns. While there may be one or two decent breeders left, overall these once fashionable beasts have fallen out of favor for more exotic and less ill-behaved mounts.

PHASE CATS

Although superficially similar to other cat-like beasts, phase cats originate from another plane entirely. An old bardic tale tells of how a litter of young phase cats appeared from nowhere, and how the farmers watched in confusion as the cats appeared to tussle and play, while a nearby herd of sheep was devoured one by one. There are several stories like this, and it is possible that small populations have phased into our plane over many generations. Little is known about the plane from which they originate, except that it was also the former home of blink dogs. Phase cats and blink dogs are natural enemies, and phase cats will roar and whip their tendrils wildly at the sight of a blink dog.

RUST MONSTERS

Although superficially similar to other cat-like beasts, phase cats originate from another plane entirely. An old bardic tale tells of how a litter of young phase cats appeared from nowhere, and how the farmers watched in confusion as the cats appeared to tussle and play, while a nearby herd of sheep was devoured one by one. There are several stories like this, and it is possible that small populations have phased into our plane over many generations. Little is known about the plane from which they originate, except that it was also the former home of blink dogs. Phase cats and blink dogs are natural enemies, and phase cats will roar and whip their tendrilclaws wildly at the sight of a blink dog.

SPHINXES

Guarding the most ancient of spaces across the world, the sphinx has become an almost universal symbol of death, destruction, and of course, riddles. These mysterious creatures roam the most aged of places, preventing would-be looters from entering their homes. They say the gods bind them to these places, trapping them until death. There's no proof there is a mystical binding to the sphinx, except it has been reported that upon being released from their duty, the animals die.

TREANTS

Treants came into existence through faerie magic. Forest-dwelling fae needed trusted guardians to protect their forest homes, and each year they sang to the trees begging them to wake up. Slowly but surely the trees awoke, and so the first treants were born. The fae asked nothing from the treants but to protect the land, which pleased the treants greatly, and so it was for many years. Part of the natural cycle of the world, the treants knew they were part of all things. Being part of all things carries with it a desire to know all things. The treants created saplings so part of them could experience as much of the world as possible. Their saplings founded new groves, protecting the life that grew within their lands; so treants spread through the realms and many different types sprouted into existence.

UNICORNS

Unicorns possess an innate curiosity, empathy, and gift for illusion that inspire their position as muses in many cultures. People revere them as symbol of righteousness, but like many creatures, they possess a multitude of natures. Some varieties have traveled and adapted to new environments so that they are almost unrecognizable next to the white-pelted, silver-maned creature of bards' tales.

WYVERNS

First discovered in northern mountains and forests, the wyvern has earned itself a fearsome reputation. Due to their reptilian nature and large size, they were initially believed to be dragons. This has been proven incorrect for a variety of reasons, although many in the world still seem confused by this. The wyvern is not as intelligent like its draconic cousin, nor magically imbued with any sense of humanoid intellect. They are deadly, quick, and ravenous.

Despite being encountered more and more as humanoid territories grow, wyverns continue to be mistaken for their larger cousins. Multiple kingdoms have reported infestations of the large beasts, yet few are eager to hunt them because of their barbed, venomous tails, and sometimes their ability to breathe a poisonous gas. They are indeed noxious creatures that are nearly impossible to hunt and kill.
